The Court of Appeal divided, however, on whether Sun Life's conduct in dealing with Ms. Fidler's benefits rose to the level of bad faith. Writing for the majority, Finch C.J.B.C. concluded that Sun Life's conduct fell short of the duty of utmost good faith "by a very wide margin" (para. 71). He held that Sun Life's "arbitrary denial of long-term disability benefits to a vulnerable insured for over five years" (para. 74) required denunciation and deterrence. Punitive damages in the amount of $100,000 were, in his view, a rational and proportionate response to Sun Life's conduct.

Ryan J.A. dissented on the issue of punitive damages. She interpreted the trial judge's reasons as "conclud[ing] that Sun Life had behaved badly, but not . . . maliciously" (para. 102), and that Sun Life's conduct "did not reach the depths of bad faith required for an award of punitive damages" (para. 101). In Ryan J.A.'s view, Ms. Fidler had not shown that these conclusions were palpably and overridingly wrong.

Sun Life's appeal seeks to have the awards for both aggravated and punitive damages set aside.

II. Analysis

(a) Damages for Mental Distress for Breach of Contract

Damages for breach of contract should, as far as money can do it, place the plaintiff in the same position as if the contract had been performed. However, at least since the 1854 decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Hadley v. Baxendale (1854), 9 Ex. 341, 156 E.R. 145, at p. 151, it has been the law that these damages must be "such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally . . . from such breach 24 Sur la question de savoir si le traitement du dossier de M^me^ Fidler par Sun Life était entaché de mauvaise foi, toutefois, la Cour a rendu une décision partagée. Rendant jugement pour la majorité, le juge en chef Finch a conclu que Sun Life s'était écartée [TRADUCTION] « considérablement » (par. 71) de son obligation d'agir avec la plus entière bonne foi. Il a déclaré que [TRADUCTION] « le refus arbitraire [de Sun Life] de verser des prestations d'invalidité de longue durée à une assurée vulnérable, pendant plus de cinq ans » (par. 74) nécessitait dénonciation et dissuasion. Il a donc estimé que l'attribution d'une somme de 100 000 $ en dommages-intérêts punitifs constituait une réponse rationnelle et proportionnée à la conduite de Sun Life.

25 La juge Ryan a exprimé sa dissidence sur la question des dommages-intérêts punitifs. Selon elle, les motifs du juge de première instance indiquaient qu'il avait [TRADUCTION] « conclu que Sun Life avait mal agi mais qu'elle n'avait pas fait preuve de malveillance » (par. 102) et que sa conduite [TRADUCTION] « n'atteignait pas le degré de mauvaise foi nécessaire pour donner droit à des dommages-intérêts punitifs » (par. 101). Selon la juge Ryan, M^me^ Fidler n'avait pas démontré que ces conclusions procédaient d'une erreur manifeste et dominante.

26 Par son pourvoi, Sun Life nous demande d'annuler l'attribution de dommages-intérêts majorés et de dommages-intérêts punitifs.

II. Analyse

a) Les dommages-intérêts pour souffrance morale par suite de violation de contrat

27 Les dommages-intérêts pour violation de contrat servent à rétablir le demandeur dans la situation où il se serait trouvé si le contrat avait été exécuté, dans la mesure où une réparation pécuniaire peut le faire. Toutefois, il est établi en droit, au moins depuis 1854 et l'arrêt de la Cour de l'Échiquier Hadley c. Baxendale (1854), 9 Ex. 341, 156 E.R. 145, p. 151, que cette réparation doit être [TRADUCTION] « celle qu'on peut considérer justement et raisonnablement of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties".

28 Until now, damages for mental distress have not been welcome in the family of remedies spawned by this principle. The issue in this appeal is whether that remedial ostracization continues to be warranted.

29 In Hadley v. Baxendale, the court explained the principle of reasonable expectation as follows:

> Where two parties have made a contract which one of them has broken, the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect of such breach of contract should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally, i.e., according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties, at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it. Now, if the special circumstances under which the contract was actually made were communicated by the plaintiffs to the defendants, and thus known to both parties, the damages resulting from the breach of such a contract, which they would reasonably contemplate, would be the amount of injury which would ordinarily follow from a breach of contract under these special circumstances so known and communicated. But, on the other hand, if these special circumstances were wholly unknown to the party breaking the contract, he, at the most, could only be supposed to have had in his contemplation the amount of injury which would arise generally, and in the great multitude of cases not affected by any special circumstances, from such a breach of contract. [Emphasis added; p. 151.]

30 Hadley v. Baxendale makes no distinction between the types of loss that are recoverable for breach of contract. The principle of reasonable expectation is stated as a general principle. Nevertheless, subsequent cases purported to rule out damages for mental distress for breach of contract except in certain defined situations.

31 While courts have always accepted that some non-pecuniary losses arising from breach of soit comme celle qui découle naturellement [. . .] de cette rupture du contrat, soit comme celle que les deux parties pouvaient raisonnablement et probablement envisager ».

Jusqu'à présent, les dommages-intérêts pour souffrance morale n'ont pas été bien accueillis dans le groupe des mesures de réparation engendrées par ce principe. Il s'agit en l'espèce de déterminer si cet ostracisme demeure justifié.

Dans Hadley c. Baxendale, le tribunal a expliqué ainsi le principe de la prévisibilité raisonnable :

> [TRADUCTION] Lorsque deux parties ont passé un contrat que l'une d'elles a rompu, la réparation que l'autre partie doit recevoir pour cette rupture doit être celle qu'on peut considérer justement et raisonnablement soit comme celle qui découle naturellement, c'est-à-dire selon le cours normal des choses, de cette rupture du contrat, soit comme celle que les deux parties pouvaient raisonnablement et probablement envisager, lors de la passation du contrat, comme conséquence probable de sa rupture. Cependant, si les demandeurs avaient porté à la connaissance des défendeurs les circonstances spéciales dans lesquelles le contrat avait été conclu et qu'elles aient été connues des deux parties, les dommages-intérêts exigibles par suite de la rupture du contrat et envisagés par les deux parties seraient donc fondés sur le préjudice découlant normalement d'une rupture de contrat dans les circonstances particulières telles qu'elles étaient connues et avaient été révélées. Mais d'un autre côté, si ces circonstances spéciales étaient totalement inconnues de la partie qui rompt le contrat, tout au plus pourrait-on considérer qu'elle avait en vue le préjudice qui découlerait généralement et dans la majorité des cas, abstraction faite de toutes circonstances particulières, à la suite d'une rupture de contrat. [Nous soulignons; p. 151.]

L'arrêt Hadley c. Baxendale n'établit aucune distinction entre les types de pertes susceptibles de recouvrement par suite d'une violation de contrat. Le principe de la prévisibilité raisonnable est énoncé comme un principe général. Néanmoins, des arrêts subséquents ont déclaré que la souffrance morale causée par la violation de contrat ne donnait pas lieu à une réparation, sauf dans certaines situations bien précises.

Bien que les tribunaux aient toujours reconnu que certaines pertes non pécuniaires découlant contract are compensable, including physical inconvenience and discomfort, they have traditionally shied away from awarding damages for mental suffering caused by the contract breach.

This tradition of refusing to award damages for mental distress was launched in Hobbs v. London and South Western Rail. Co. (1875), L.R. 10 Q.B. 111, and Hamlin v. Great Northern Railway Co. (1856), 1 H. & N. 408, 156 E.R. 1261 (Ex.). In 1909, in the case of Addis v. Gramophone Co., [1909] A.C. 488, the House of Lords "cast a long shadow over the common law" when it rejected a claim for mental distress because the conduct said to cause the distress was not actionable: Eastwood v. Magnox Electric plc, [2004] 3 All E.R. 991, [2004] UKHL 35, at para. 1.

To this day, Addis is cited for the proposition that mental distress damages are not generally recoverable for breach of contract: see Malik v. Bank of Credit and Commerce International S.A., [1998] A.C. 20 (H.L.), per Lord Nicholls, at p. 38; Wallace v. United Grain Growers Ltd., [1995] 9 W.W.R. 153 (Man. C.A.), at para. 81, var'd [1997] 3 S.C.R. 701; Morberg v. Klassen (1991), 49 C.L.R. 124 (B.C.S.C.); Taylor v. Gill, [1991] 3 W.W.R. 727 (Alta. Q.B.); Chitty on Contracts (29th ed. 2004), vol. II, at p. 1468; and see S. M. Waddams, The Law of Damages (4th ed. 2004), at p. 222.

In short, the foundational concepts of reasonable expectations had a ceiling: mental distress. As Bingham L.J. said in Watts v. Morrow, [1991] 1 W.L.R. 1421 (C.A.), at p. 1445:

> A contract-breaker is not in general liable for any distress, frustration, anxiety, displeasure, vexation, tension or aggravation which his breach of contract may cause to the innocent party. This rule is not, I think, founded on the assumption that such reactions are not foreseeable, which they surely are or may be, but on considerations of policy. [Emphasis added.]

de la violation de contrat donnent lieu à une indemnisation, notamment les inconvénients et l'inconfort physiques, ils ont traditionnellement pris leur distance à l'égard des dommages-intérêts pour souffrance morale.

32 Ce sont les décisions Hobbs c. London and South Western Rail. Co. (1875), L.R. 10 Q.B. 111, et Hamlin c. Great Northern Railway Co. (1856), 1 H. & N. 408, 156 E.R. 1261 (Ex.), qui sont à l'origine de cette tradition. En 1909, dans l'arrêt Addis c. Gramophone Co., [1909] A.C. 488, la Chambre des lords [TRADUCTION] « a jeté une ombre sur la common law » lorsqu'elle a rejeté une demande de dommages-intérêts pour souffrance morale au motif que la conduite censément à l'origine de la souffrance ne conférait pas un droit d'action : Eastwood c. Magnox Electric plc, [2004] 3 All E.R. 991, [2004] UKHL 35, par. 1.

33 Encore maintenant, l'arrêt Addis est invoqué à l'appui de l'argument voulant que la souffrance morale causée par une violation de contrat n'est généralement pas indemnisable : voir Malik c. Bank of Credit and Commerce International S.A., [1998] A.C. 20 (H.L.), lord Nicholls, p. 38; Wallace c. United Grain Growers Ltd., [1995] 9 W.W.R. 153 (C.A. Man.), par. 81, mod. par [1997] 3 R.C.S. 701; Morberg c. Klassen (1991), 49 C.L.R. 124 (C.S.C.-B.); Taylor c. Gill, [1991] 3 W.W.R. 727 (B.R. Alb.); Chitty on Contracts (29e éd. 2004), vol. II, p. 1468; et voir S. M. Waddams, The Law of Damages (4e éd. 2004), p. 222.

35 A number of policy considerations have been cited in support of this restriction. One is the perceived minimal nature of mental suffering:

> [A]s a matter of ordinary experience, it is evident that, while the innocent party to a contract will generally be disappointed if the defendant does not perform the contract, the innocent party's disappointment and distress are seldom so significant as to attract an award of damages on that score.

36 Others have suggested that a "stiff upper lip" expectation in commercial life is the source of the prohibition. In McGregor on Damages (17th ed. 2003), the author explains:

> The reason for the general rule is that contracts normally concern commercial matters and that mental suffering on breach is not in the contemplation of the parties as part of the business risk of the transaction. [p. 63]

This resonated in Johnson v. Gore Wood & Co., [2001] 2 W.L.R. 72 (H.L.), at p. 108, where Lord Cooke observed: "Contract-breaking is treated as an incident of commercial life which players in the game are expected to meet with mental fortitude."

37 This Court's jurisprudence has followed the restrictive interpretation of Addis, generally requiring that a claim for compensation for mental distress be grounded in independently actionable conduct. The general rule that damages for mental distress should not be awarded for breach of contract was thus preserved: Peso Silver Mines Ltd. (N.P.L.) v. Cropper, [1966] S.C.R. 673.

38 Without resiling from the general rule that damages for mental suffering could not be awarded at contract, the courts in the 1970s acknowledged that the reasons of principle and policy for the rule did not always apply, and began to award such damages

Au nombre des considérations de principe énumérées à l'appui de cette restriction figure le caractère apparemment négligeable de la souffrance morale :

(Baltic Shipping Co. c. Dillon (1993), 176 C.L.R. 344 (H.C. Austr.), p. 365, le juge en chef Mason)

On a également fait découler cette interdiction du « stoïcisme » que l'on attend des commerçants. Dans McGregor on Damages (17e éd. 2003), l'auteur explique ce qui suit :

Dans l'arrêt Johnson c. Gore Wood & Co., [2001] 2 W.L.R. 72 (H.L.), p. 108, lord Cooke fait écho à cette conception lorsqu'il fait remarquer ce qui suit : [TRADUCTION] « Les violations de contrat sont considérées comme des incidents du commerce et l'on attend de ceux qui prennent part à la vie commerciale qu'ils y opposent fermeté d'âme. »

Dans ses décisions, notre Cour a suivi l'interprétation restrictive de l'arrêt Addis en exigeant de façon générale que les demandes de dommages-intérêts pour souffrance morale soient fondées sur une conduite donnant par elle-même ouverture à action. C'est ainsi qu'elle a maintenu la règle générale selon laquelle la souffrance morale découlant d'une violation de contrat ne devrait pas donner lieu à des dommages-intérêts : Peso Silver Mines Ltd. (N.P.L.) c. Cropper, [1966] R.C.S. 673.

Dans les années 1970, les tribunaux ont reconnu, sans pour autant s'écarter de la règle générale de la non-indemnisation de la souffrance morale en matière contractuelle, que les raisons de principe fondant cette règle ne s'appliquaient pas toujours, where the contract was one for pleasure, relaxation or peace of mind. The charge was led, as so many were, by Lord Denning. In Jarvis v. Swans Tours Ltd., [1973] 1 All E.R. 71 (C.A.), the plaintiff had contracted with the defendant to arrange a holiday. The defendant breached the contract by providing a terrible vacation. Acknowledging but declining to follow what he referred to as the "out of date" decisions in Hamlin and Hobbs, which had sired Addis, Lord Denning held that mental distress damages could be recovered for certain kinds of contracts:

> In a proper case damages for mental distress can be recovered in contract, just as damages for shock can be recovered in tort. One such case is a contract for a holiday, or any other contract to provide entertainment and enjoyment. If the contracting party breaks his contract, damages can be given for the disappointment, the distress, the upset and frustration caused by the breach. [p. 74]

This holding in Jarvis emerged from the common law chrysalis as the "peace of mind exception" to the general rule against recovery for mental distress in contract breaches. This exception was confined to contracts which had as their object the peace of mind of a contracting party. Bingham L.J. in Watts v. Morrow stated: "Where the very object of [the] contract is to provide pleasure, relaxation, peace of mind or freedom from molestation, damages will be awarded" (p. 1445).

More recently, the House of Lords in Farley v. Skinner, [2001] 4 All E.R. 801, [2001] UKHL 49, loosened the peace of mind exception so as to permit recovery of mental distress not only when pleasure, relaxation, or peace of mind is the "very object of the contract", but also when it is a "major or important object of the contract" (para. 24).

et ils ont commencé à accorder des dommages-intérêts sous ce chef lorsque le contrat avait pour objet le plaisir, la détente ou la tranquillité d'esprit. C'est lord Denning qui, comme tant d'autres fois, a mené la charge. Dans l'affaire Jarvis c. Swans Tours Ltd., [1973] 1 All E.R. 71 (C.A.), le demandeur avait confié par contrat à la défenderesse l'organisation de ses vacances. En fournissant des vacances exécrables, la défenderesse avait violé le contrat. Lord Denning a évoqué les décisions Hamlin et Hobbs, dont procédait l'arrêt Addis, mais a refusé de les suivre, les qualifiant de [TRADUCTION] « dépassées », et a statué que dans le cas de certains types de contrats, des dommages-intérêts pouvaient être accordés pour souffrance morale :

39 Cette décision rendue dans Jarvis a émergé du cocon de la common law comme « l'exception de la tranquillité d'esprit » à la règle générale interdisant l'indemnisation pour souffrance morale en matière contractuelle. Cette exception a été limitée aux contrats visant à assurer la tranquillité d'esprit à l'un des contractants. Le lord juge Bingham a déclaré ce qui suit dans Watts c. Morrow : [TRADUCTION] « Si l'objet même du contrat est le plaisir, la détente, la tranquillité d'esprit ou l'absence de tracas, l'indemnisation est permise » (p. 1445).

40 Plus récemment, dans l'arrêt Farley c. Skinner, [2001] 4 All E.R. 801, [2001] UKHL 49, la Chambre des lords a élargi l'exception de la tranquillité d'esprit pour permettre l'indemnisation de la souffrance morale non seulement lorsque « l'objet même du contrat » est le plaisir, la détente ou la tranquillité d'esprit, mais également lorsque ces éléments constituent [TRADUCTION] « un objet substantiel ou important du contrat » (par. 24).

41 The right to obtain damages for mental distress for breach of contracts that promise pleasure, relaxation or peace of mind has found wide acceptance in Canada. Mental distress damages have been awarded not only for breach of vacation contracts, but also for breaches of contracts for wedding services (Wilson v. Sooter Studios Ltd. (1988), 33 B.C.L.R. (2d) 241 (C.A.)), and for luxury chattels (Wharton v. Tom Harris Chevrolet Oldsmobile Cadillac Ltd. (2002), 97 B.C.L.R. (3d) 307, 2002 BCCA 78). Some courts have included disability insurance contracts: see Warrington and Thompson v. Zurich Insurance Co. (1984), 7 D.L.R. (4th) 664 (Ont. H.C.J.). The Ontario Court of Appeal has endorsed contractual damages for mental distress where peace of mind is the "very essence" of the promise: see Prinzo v. Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care (2002), 60 O.R. (3d) 474, at para. 34.

Le droit d'obtenir des dommages-intérêts pour souffrance morale par suite de la violation d'un contrat conclu en vue du plaisir, de la détente ou de la tranquillité d'esprit a reçu un large accueil au Canada. Les tribunaux ont accordé de tels dommages-intérêts non seulement pour la violation de contrats relatifs à des vacances, mais également pour violation de contrats visant des services relatifs à un mariage (Wilson c. Sooter Studios Ltd. (1988), 33 B.C.L.R. (2d) 241 (C.A.)) et des biens personnels de luxe (Wharton c. Tom Harris Chevrolet Oldsmobile Cadillac Ltd. (2002), 97 B.C.L.R. (3d) 307, 2002 BCCA 78). Des tribunaux ont inclu dans cette catégorie les contrats d'assurance-invalidité : voir Warrington et Thompson c. Zurich Insurance Co. (1984), 7 D.L.R. (4th) 664 (H.C.J. Ont.). La Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a accepté l'indemnisation pour souffrance morale en matière contractuelle lorsque la tranquillité d'esprit constitue [TRADUCTION] « l'essence même » de la promesse : voir Prinzo c. Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care (2002), 60 O.R. (3d) 474, par. 34.

42 In Vorvis v. Insurance Corp. of British Columbia, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1085, this Court described the line of cases awarding mental distress damages as standing for the proposition that "in some contracts the parties may well have contemplated at the time of the contract that a breach in certain circumstances would cause a plaintiff mental distress" (p. 1102). It is thus clear that an independent actionable wrong has not always been required, contrary to Sun Life's arguments before us.

Dans l'arrêt Vorvis c. Insurance Corp. of British Columbia, [1989] 1 R.C.S. 1085, cette Cour a expliqué que la suite d'arrêts accordant des dommages-intérêts pour souffrance morale portent que « dans certains contrats, les parties peuvent fort bien avoir prévu, au moment de la passation du contrat, que sa violation dans certaines circonstances causerait au demandeur un préjudice moral » (p. 1102). Ainsi, il est clair qu'une faute indépendante donnant ouverture à action n'a pas toujours été requise, contrairement à l'argument que nous a présenté Sun Life.

43 The view taken by this Court in Vorvis that damages for mental distress in "peace of mind" contracts should be seen as an expression of the general principle of compensatory damages of Hadley v. Baxendale, rather than as an exception to that principle, is shared by others. In Baltic Shipping, Mason C.J. of the High Court of Australia questioned whether one should confine mental distress claims for breach of contract to particular categories, noting:

D'autres partagent le point de vue retenu par cette Cour dans Vorvis selon lequel il faudrait voir dans l'indemnisation de la souffrance morale dans le cas de contrats visant la « tranquillité d'esprit » une expression du principe général des dommages-intérêts compensatoires exposé dans Hadley c. Baxendale plutôt qu'une exception à ce principe. Dans Baltic Shipping, le juge en chef Mason de la Haute Cour de l'Australie s'est demandé s'il convenait de restreindre à certaines catégories les demandes d'indemnisation pour souffrance morale découlant de violations de contrat, et il a fait remarquer ce qui suit :

. . . the fundamental principle on which damages are awarded at common law is that the injured party is to be restored to the position (not merely the financial position) in which the party would have been had the actionable wrong not taken place. Add to that the fact that anxiety and injured feelings are recognized as heads of compensable damage, at least outside the realm of the law of contract. Add as well the circumstance that the general rule has been undermined by the exceptions which have been engrafted upon it. We are then left with a rule which rests on flimsy policy foundations and conceptually is at odds with the fundamental principle governing the recovery of damages, the more so now that the approaches in tort and contract are converging. [p. 362]

Similarly, Professor J. D. McCamus argues, in The Law of Contracts (2005), at p. 877, that once peace of mind is understood as a reflection of, or "proxy" for the reasonable contemplation of the contracting parties, "there is no compelling reason not to simply apply the foreseeability test itself". At this point, the apparent inconsistency between the general rule in Hadley v. Baxendale and the exception vanishes. See also: S. K. O'Byrne, "Damages for Mental Distress and Other Intangible Loss in a Breach of Contract Action" (2005), 28 Dal. L.J. 311, at pp. 346-47, and R. Cohen and S. O'Byrne, "Cry Me a River: Recovery of Mental Distress Damages in a Breach of Contract Action — A North American Perspective" (2005), 42 Am. Bus. L.J. 97.

Pareillement, le professeur J. D. McCamus affirme, dans The Law of Contracts (2005), p. 877, que lorsqu'on voit la tranquillité d'esprit comme une manifestation ou une représentation de ce que les cocontractants pouvaient raisonnablement envisager, [TRADUCTION] « aucune raison impérieuse n'empêche d'appliquer simplement le critère de la prévisibilité lui-même ». La contradiction qui semble exister entre la règle générale formulée dans Hadley c. Baxendale et l'exception disparaît alors. Voir aussi : S. K. O'Byrne, « Damages for Mental Distress and Other Intangible Loss in a Breach of Contract Action » (2005), 28 Dal. L.J. 311, p. 346-347, et R. Cohen et S. O'Byrne, « Cry Me a River : Recovery of Mental Distress Damages in a Breach of Contract Action — A North American Perspective » (2005), 42 Am. Bus. L.J. 97.

We conclude that damages for mental distress for breach of contract may, in appropriate cases, be awarded as an application of the principle in Hadley v. Baxendale: see Vorvis. The court should ask "what did the contract promise?" and provide compensation for those promises. The aim of compensatory damages is to restore the wronged party to the position he or she would have been in had the contract not been broken. As the Privy Council stated in Wertheim v. Chicoutimi Pulp Co., [1911] A.C. 301, at p. 307: "the party complaining should, so far as it can be done by money, be placed in the same position as he would have been in if the contract had been performed". The measure of these damages is, of course, subject to remoteness principles. There is no reason why this should not include damages for mental distress, where such damages were in the reasonable contemplation of the parties at the time the contract was made. This conclusion follows from the basic principle of compensatory contractual damages: that the parties are to be restored to the position they contracted for, whether tangible or intangible. The law's task is simply to provide the benefits contracted for, whatever their nature, if they were in the reasonable contemplation of the parties.

Nous concluons que l'indemnisation de la souffrance morale causée par la violation de contrat peut, dans les cas appropriés, être accordée en application du principe de l'arrêt Hadley c. Baxendale : voir Vorvis. Le tribunal devrait se poser la question suivante : « qu'était-il promis au contrat? » et accorder une indemnisation pour manquement à ces promesses. Les dommages-intérêts compensatoires visent à rétablir la partie lésée dans la situation où elle se serait trouvée s'il n'y avait pas eu violation de contrat. Comme l'a affirmé le Conseil privé dans Wertheim c. Chicoutimi Pulp Co., [1911] A.C. 301, p. 307 : [TRADUCTION] « le plaignant devrait, dans la mesure où une réparation pécuniaire peut le faire, être rétabli dans la situation où il se serait trouvé si

45 It does not follow, however, that all mental distress associated with a breach of contract is compensable. In normal commercial contracts, the likelihood of a breach of contract causing mental distress is not ordinarily within the reasonable contemplation of the parties. It is not unusual that a breach of contract will leave the wronged party feeling frustrated or angry. The law does not award damages for such incidental frustration. The matter is otherwise, however, when the parties enter into a contract, an object of which is to secure a particular psychological benefit. In such a case, damages arising from such mental distress should in principle be recoverable where they are established on the evidence and shown to have been within the reasonable contemplation of the parties at the time the contract was made. The basic principles of contract damages do not cease to operate merely because what is promised is an intangible, like mental security.

46 This conclusion is supported by the policy considerations that have led the law to eschew damages for mental suffering in commercial contracts. As discussed above, this reluctance rests on two policy considerations — the minimal nature of the mental suffering and the fact that in commercial matters, mental suffering on breach is "not in the contemplation of the parties as part of the business risk of the transaction": McGregor on Damages, at p. 63.

le contrat avait été respecté ». L'importance de l'indemnisation accordée est évidemment fonction de l'application des règles d'exclusion des dommages indirects. Rien ne justifie de ne pas y inclure des dommages-intérêts pour souffrance morale lorsque ces dommages-intérêts étaient raisonnablement prévisibles pour les parties lors de la conclusion du contrat. Cette conclusion découle du principe fondamental de l'indemnisation en matière contractuelle : le rétablissement des parties dans la situation envisagée dans le contrat, qu'elle soit matérielle ou non. Le rôle du droit consiste simplement à assurer aux parties les avantages prévus au contrat, quelle qu'en soit la nature, s'ils étaient raisonnablement prévisibles.

Il ne s'ensuit pas cependant que toute souffrance morale associée à la violation d'un contrat peut donner lieu à indemnisation. Dans le cas des contrats commerciaux usuels, la possibilité d'une violation de contrat causant une souffrance morale n'entre généralement pas dans ce qui est raisonnablement prévisible. Il n'est pas inhabituel qu'une personne lésée par la violation d'un contrat ressente de la frustration ou de la colère. Le droit n'accorde pas de dommages-intérêts pour la frustration dans un tel cas. Il en va autrement toutefois lorsque les parties concluent un contrat dont un des objets est d'assurer un avantage psychologique particulier. Dans un tel cas, la partie lésée devrait en principe pouvoir être indemnisée de ces souffrances si elles sont établies en preuve et s'il est démontré qu'elles étaient raisonnablement prévisibles par les parties au moment de la conclusion du contrat. Les principes fondamentaux des dommages-intérêts en matière contractuelle ne cessent pas de s'appliquer du simple fait que l'objet promis, la sécurité d'esprit par exemple, est intangible.

Les considérations de principe pour lesquelles le droit répugne à indemniser la souffrance morale en matière contractuelle commerciale étayent cette conclusion. Comme on l'a vu, deux raisons de principe fondent cette hésitation : le caractère négligeable de la souffrance morale et le fait qu'en matière commerciale, la souffrance morale découlant d'une violation de contrat [TRADUCTION] « ne fait pas partie de ce que les parties envisagent comme

Neither applies to contracts where promised mental security or satisfaction is part of the risk for which the parties contracted.

This does not obviate the requirement that a plaintiff prove his or her loss. The court must be satisfied: (1) that an object of the contract was to secure a psychological benefit that brings mental distress upon breach within the reasonable contemplation of the parties; and (2) that the degree of mental suffering caused by the breach was of a degree sufficient to warrant compensation. These questions require sensitivity to the particular facts of each case.

While the mental distress as a consequence of breach must reasonably be contemplated by the parties to attract damages, we see no basis for requiring it to be the dominant aspect or the "very essence" of the bargain. As the House of Lords noted in Farley, the law of contract protects all significant parts of the bargain, not merely those that are "dominant" or "essential". Lord Steyn rejected this kind of distinction as "a matter of form and not substance" (para. 24). Lord Hutton added:

> I can see no reason in principle why, if a plaintiff who has suffered no financial loss can recover damages in some cases if there has been a breach of the principal obligation of the contract, he should be denied damages for breach of an obligation which, whilst not the principal obligation of the contract, is nevertheless one which he has made clear to the other party is of importance to him. [para. 51]

Principle suggests that as long as the promise in relation to state of mind is a part of the bargain in the reasonable contemplation of the contracting parties, mental distress damages arising from its breach are recoverable. This is to state neither more nor less than the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale.

We conclude that the "peace of mind" class of cases should not be viewed as an exception to the risque commercial lié à l'opération » : McGregor on Damages, p. 63. Aucune de ces raisons ne s'applique aux contrats lorsque la sécurité d'esprit ou la satisfaction promises font partie du risque envisagé par les parties.

47 Cela ne dégage pas le demandeur de l'obligation de prouver sa perte. Le tribunal doit être convaincu : (1) que le contrat visait notamment à assurer un avantage psychologique et que la violation du contrat a causé une souffrance morale raisonnablement prévisible par les parties; et (2) que la souffrance morale causée était suffisamment intense pour justifier une indemnisation. Ces deux points exigent une attention spéciale aux faits particuliers à chaque cas.

48 Bien que pour donner lieu à indemnisation, la souffrance morale consécutive à une violation contractuelle doive raisonnablement être prévisible pour les parties, il n'existe à notre avis aucune raison d'exiger qu'elle constitue l'aspect dominant ou « l'essence même » du marché. Comme la Chambre des lords l'a fait remarquer dans l'arrêt Farley, le droit des contrats protège tous les éléments importants du marché, non simplement les éléments « dominants » ou « essentiels ». Lord Steyn a rejeté les distinctions de ce genre qui, d'après lui, relèvent [TRADUCTION] « de la forme et non du fond » (par. 24). Lord Hutton a ajouté ce qui suit :

Le principe sous-entend que si la promesse se rapportant à l'état d'esprit fait partie du marché raisonnablement envisagé par les parties, la souffrance morale causée par le manquement à cette promesse peut donner lieu à des dommages-intérêts. Cela n'est ni plus ni moins que la règle formulée dans Hadley c. Baxendale.

49 Nous concluons qu'il ne faut pas voir les affaires de « tranquillité d'esprit » comme une exception à general rule of the non-availability of damages for mental distress in contract law, but rather as an application of the reasonable contemplation or foreseeability principle that applies generally to determine the availability of damages for breach of contract.

50 One further point should be added.

51 It may be useful to clarify the use of the term "aggravated damages" in the context of damages for mental distress arising from breach of contract. "Aggravated damages", as defined by Waddams (The Law of Damages (1983), at pp. 562-63), and adopted in Vorvis, at p. 1099, > describ[e] an award that aims at compensation, but takes full account of the intangible injuries, such as distress and humiliation, that may have been caused by the defendant's insulting behaviour.

As many writers have observed, the term is used ambiguously. The cases speak of two different types of "aggravated" damages.

52 The first are true aggravated damages, which arise out of aggravating circumstances. They are not awarded under the general principle of Hadley v. Baxendale, but rest on a separate cause of action — usually in tort — like defamation, oppression or fraud. The idea that damages for mental distress for breach of contract may be awarded where an object of a contract was to secure a particular psychological benefit has no effect on the availability of such damages. If a plaintiff can establish mental distress as a result of the breach of an independent cause of action, then he or she may be able to recover accordingly. The award of damages in such a case arises from the separate cause of action. It does not arise out of the contractual breach itself, and it has nothing to do with contractual damages under the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale.

la règle générale interdisant l'indemnisation de la souffrance morale en matière contractuelle, mais plutôt comme des cas d'application du principe de la prévisibilité raisonnable qui régit généralement l'attribution de dommages-intérêts pour violation de contrat.

Il convient d'ajouter un autre point.

Il peut être utile de préciser l'emploi de l'expression « dommages-intérêts majorés » dans le contexte de l'indemnisation pour souffrance morale causée par une violation de contrat. Selon la définition qu'en donne Waddams (The Law of Damages (1983), p. 562-563) et retenue dans Vorvis, p. 1099, les « dommages-intérêts majorés » > désignent des dommages-intérêts qui visent à indemniser, mais qui tiennent compte pleinement du préjudice moral, comme l'anxiété et l'humiliation, que le comportement injurieux du défendeur a pu causer.

Comme l'ont fait remarquer de nombreux auteurs, l'emploi de l'expression est ambigu. La jurisprudence reconnaît deux catégories distinctes de dommages-intérêts « majorés ».

La première catégorie concerne les dommages-intérêts majorés proprement dits, qui résultent de circonstances aggravantes. Ils ne sont pas accordés en vertu du principe général établi dans Hadley c. Baxendale mais reposent sur une cause d'action distincte — généralement la responsabilité délictuelle — comme la diffamation, l'oppression ou la fraude. L'idée que des dommages-intérêts pour souffrance morale causée par la violation d'un contrat puissent être accordés lorsque le contrat avait notamment pour objet d'assurer un avantage psychologique particulier n'a aucun effet sur la possibilité que le demandeur obtienne ces dommages-intérêts. Si un demandeur peut établir la souffrance morale résultant de la violation d'une cause d'action indépendante, alors il peut recouvrer des dommages-intérêts en conséquence. Dans un tel cas, l'attribution de dommages-intérêts découle de la cause d'action distincte. Elle ne découle pas de la violation du contrat elle-même, et elle n'a rien à voir avec les dommages-intérêts en matière contractuelle en vertu de la règle établie dans Hadley c. Baxendale.

The second are mental distress damages which do arise out of the contractual breach itself. These are awarded under the principles of Hadley v. Baxendale, as discussed above. They exist independent of any aggravating circumstances and are based completely on the parties' expectations at the time of contract formation. With respect to this category of damages, the term "aggravated damages" becomes unnecessary and, indeed, a source of possible confusion.

53 La seconde catégorie concerne les dommages-intérêts pour la souffrance morale causée par la violation du contrat elle-même. Ceux-ci sont accordés en vertu de la règle établie dans Hadley c. Baxendale, comme nous l'avons vu précédemment. Ils sont indépendants de toute circonstance aggravante et reposent entièrement sur les attentes qu'avaient les cocontractants au moment de la formation du contrat. Relativement à cette catégorie de dommages-intérêts, l'expression « dommages-intérêts majorés » devient inutile et constitue de fait une source de confusion possible.

It follows that there is only one rule by which compensatory damages for breach of contract should be assessed: the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale. The Hadley test unites all forms of contractual damages under a single principle. It explains why damages may be awarded where an object of the contract is to secure a psychological benefit, just as they may be awarded where an object of the contract is to secure a material one. It also explains why an extended period of notice may have been awarded upon wrongful dismissal in employment law: see Wallace v. United Grain Growers Ltd., [1997] 3 S.C.R. 701. In all cases, these results are based on what was in the reasonable contemplation of the parties at the time of contract formation. They are not true aggravated damages awards.

54 Il s'ensuit qu'une seule règle permet que des dommages-intérêts compensatoires soient accordés pour violation d'un contrat : la règle de l'arrêt Hadley c. Baxendale. Le critère de cet arrêt réunit en un principe unique toutes les formes de dommages-intérêts en matière contractuelle. Ce qui explique pourquoi des dommages-intérêts peuvent être accordés lorsque le contrat a notamment pour objet d'assurer un avantage psychologique, tout comme ils peuvent être accordés lorsque le contrat a notamment pour objet d'assurer un avantage matériel. Cela explique aussi qu'une prolongation de la période de préavis ait pu être accordée dans un cas de congédiement injustifié en droit de l'emploi : voir Wallace c. United Grain Growers Ltd., [1997] 3 R.C.S. 701. Dans tous les cas, ces résultats sont fondés sur ce que les parties pouvaient raisonnablement envisager au moment de la formation du contrat. Il ne s'agit pas de dommages-intérêts majorés proprement dits.

The recognition that Hadley v. Baxendale is the single and controlling test for compensatory damages in cases of breach of contract therefore refutes any argument that an "independent actionable wrong" is a prerequisite for the recovery of mental distress damages. Where losses arise from the breach of contract itself, damages will be determined according to what was in the reasonable contemplation of the parties at the time of contract formation. An independent cause of action will only need to be proved where damages are of a different sort entirely: where they are being sought on the basis of aggravating circumstances that extend beyond what the parties expected when they concluded the contract.

56 Turning to the case before us, the first question is whether an object of this disability insurance contract was to secure a psychological benefit that brought the prospect of mental distress upon breach within the reasonable contemplation of the parties at the time the contract was made? In our view it was. The bargain was that in return for the payment of premiums, the insurer would pay the plaintiff benefits in the case of disability. This is not a mere commercial contract. It is rather a contract for benefits that are both tangible, such as payments, and intangible, such as knowledge of income security in the event of disability. If disability occurs and the insurer does not pay when it ought to have done so in accordance with the terms of the policy, the insurer has breached this reasonable expectation of security.

57 Mental distress is an effect which parties to a disability insurance contract may reasonably contemplate may flow from a failure to pay the required benefits. The intangible benefit provided by such a contract is the prospect of continued financial security when a person's disability makes working, and therefore receiving an income, no longer possible. If benefits are unfairly denied, it may not be possible to meet ordinary living expenses. This financial pressure, on top of the loss of work and the existence of a disability, is likely to heighten an insured's anxiety and stress. Moreover, once disabled, an insured faces the difficulty of finding an economic substitute for the loss of income caused by the denial of benefits. See D. Tartaglio, "The Expectation of Peace of Mind: A Basis for Recovery of Damages for Mental Suffering Resulting from the Breach of First Party Insurance Contracts" (1983), 56 S. Cal. L. Rev. 1345, at pp. 1365-66.

58 People enter into disability insurance contracts to protect themselves from this very financial and emotional stress and insecurity. An unwarranted delay in receiving this protection can be extremely une cause d'action indépendante que si les dommages-intérêts sont d'une toute autre nature : s'ils sont réclamés en raison de circonstances aggravantes qui vont au-delà de ce que les parties escomptaient lors de la conclusion du contrat.

En l'espèce, la première question est de savoir si le contrat d'assurance-invalidité visait notamment à procurer un avantage psychologique faisant en sorte que, au moment de la conclusion du contrat, les parties pouvaient raisonnablement prévoir que la violation du contrat leur causerait une souffrance morale. Nous estimons que oui. Le marché conclu stipulait qu'en contrepartie du paiement des primes, l'assureur verserait des prestations à la demanderesse en cas d'invalidité. Il ne s'agit pas d'un simple contrat commercial. Il s'agit plutôt d'un contrat procurant des avantages matériels, comme des paiements, et des avantages immatériels, comme l'assurance d'une sécurité de revenu en cas d'invalidité. Si l'assuré devient invalide et l'assureur fait défaut de verser les prestations prévues par la police, ce dernier porte atteinte à cette expectative raisonnable de sécurité.

La souffrance morale est une conséquence que les parties au contrat d'assurance-invalidité peuvent raisonnablement prévoir advenant un défaut de versement des prestations prévues. L'avantage immatériel que procure un tel contrat est la perspective pour une personne de continuer à jouir d'une sécurité financière lorsque l'invalidité l'empêche de travailler et, donc, de gagner un revenu. Si l'assuré se fait injustement refuser les prestations, il peut se trouver dans l'impossibilité de subvenir à ses besoins. Cette pression financière s'ajoutant à la perte de son travail et à l'invalidité va vraisemblablement accroître l'angoisse et le stress de l'assuré. De plus, l'assuré invalide est confronté à la difficile tâche de pallier la perte de revenu causée par le refus de l'assureur de verser les prestations. Voir D. Tartaglio, « The Expectation of Peace of Mind : A Basis for Recovery of Damages for Mental Suffering Resulting from the Breach of First Party Insurance Contracts » (1983), 56 S. Cal. L. Rev. 1345, p. 1365-1366.

C'est précisément pour se protéger contre cette insécurité et ce stress financiers et émotionnels que les gens souscrivent des polices d'assurance-invalidité. Retarder sans justification le bénéfice de cette stressful. Ms. Fidler's damages for mental distress flowed from Sun Life's breach of contract. To accept Sun Life's argument that an independent actionable wrong is a precondition would be to sanction the "conceptual incongruity of asking a plaintiff to show more than just that mental distress damages were a reasonably foreseeable consequence of breach" (O'Byrne, at p. 334 (emphasis in original)).

protection peut causer un stress énorme. Les dommages-intérêts accordés à M^me^ Fidler pour la souffrance morale découlaient de la violation du contrat par Sun Life. Accepter l'argument de cette dernière selon lequel l'indemnisation de ce préjudice était assujettie à l'existence d'une faute indépendante donnant ouverture à action équivaudrait à entériner [TRADUCTION] « l'incohérence conceptuelle consistant à obliger un demandeur à démontrer plus que le simple fait que la souffrance morale était une conséquence raisonnablement prévisible de la violation » (O'Byrne, p. 334 (en italique dans l'original)).

The second question is whether the mental distress here at issue was of a degree sufficient to warrant compensation. Again, we conclude that the answer is yes. The trial judge found that Sun Life's breach caused Ms. Fidler a substantial loss which she suffered over a five-year period. He found as a fact that Ms. Fidler "genuinely suffered significant additional distress and discomfort arising out of the loss of the disability coverage" (para. 30 (emphasis added)). This finding was amply supported in the evidence, which included extensive medical evidence documenting the stress and anxiety that Ms. Fidler experienced. He concluded that merely paying the arrears and interest did not compensate for the years Ms. Fidler was without her benefits. His award of $20,000 seeks to compensate her for the psychological consequences of Sun Life's breach, consequences which are reasonably in the contemplation of parties to a contract for personal services and benefits such as this one. We agree with the Court of Appeal's decision not to disturb it.

59 La deuxième question est de savoir si l'intensité de la souffrance morale en l'espèce justifiait qu'une indemnité soit accordée. Là encore, à notre avis, la réponse est oui. Le juge de première instance a conclu que la violation du contrat par Sun Life a causé à M^me^ Fidler une perte substantielle qu'elle a subie pendant cinq ans. Il a conclu en fait que [TRADUCTION] « la perte des prestations d'invalidité a véritablement causé [à M^me^ Fidler] une détresse et un inconfort additionnels substantiels » (par. 30 (nous soulignons)). La preuve, notamment une preuve médicale volumineuse attestant le stress et l'inquiétude qui ont affligé M^me^ Fidler, étayait amplement cette conclusion. Le juge a estimé que le simple versement des arrérages et de l'intérêt ne compensait pas M^me^ Fidler pour les années où elle avait été privée de prestations. En lui accordant 20 000 $, il a voulu l'indemniser des conséquences psychologiques découlant de la violation du contrat par Sun Life, conséquences que les parties à un contrat de services et d'avantages personnels comme celui qui nous occupe peuvent raisonnablement prévoir. Nous souscrivons à la décision de la Cour d'appel de ne pas intervenir à cet égard.

(b) Punitive Damages

Ms. Fidler also seeks punitive damages. The trial judge declined to award them, citing no bad faith, but the Court of Appeal reversed this aspect of his judgment and awarded Ms. Fidler an additional $100,000 as punitive damages.

b) Les dommages-intérêts punitifs

60 M^me^ Fidler a également demandé des dommages-intérêts punitifs. Signalant qu'il n'y avait pas eu mauvaise foi, le juge de première instance a refusé de les accorder, mais la Cour d'appel a infirmé cette partie de son jugement et a accordé à M^me^ Fidler un montant additionnel de 100 000 $ à titre de dommages-intérêts punitifs.

61 While compensatory damages are awarded primarily for the purpose of compensating a plaintiff for pecuniary and non-pecuniary losses suffered as a result of a defendant's conduct, punitive damages are designed to address the purposes of retribution, deterrence and denunciation: Whiten v. Pilot Insurance Co., [2002] 1 S.C.R. 595, 2002 SCC 18, at para. 43.

62 By their nature, contract breaches will sometimes give rise to censure. But to attract punitive damages, the impugned conduct must depart markedly from ordinary standards of decency — the exceptional case that can be described as malicious, oppressive or high-handed and that offends the court's sense of decency: Hill v. Church of Scientology of Toronto, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 1130, at para. 196; Whiten, at para. 36. The misconduct must be of a nature as to take it beyond the usual opprobrium that surrounds breaking a contract. As stated in Whiten, at para. 36, "punitive damages straddle the frontier between civil law (compensation) and criminal law (punishment)". Criminal law and quasi-criminal regulatory schemes are recognized as the primary vehicles for punishment. It is important that punitive damages be resorted to only in exceptional cases, and with restraint.

63 In Whiten, this Court set out the principles that govern the award of punitive damages and affirmed that in breach of contract cases, in addition to the requirement that the conduct constitute a marked departure from ordinary standards of decency, it must be independently actionable. Where the breach in question is a denial of insurance benefits, a breach by the insurer of the contractual duty to act in good faith will meet this requirement. The threshold issue that arises, therefore, is whether the appellant breached not only its contractual obligation to pay the long-term disability benefit, but also the independent contractual obligation to deal with the respondent's claim in good faith. On this threshold issue, the legal standard to which Sun Life and other insurers are held is correctly described by O'Connor J.A. in 702535 Ontario Inc. v. Lloyd's

Alors que les dommages-intérêts compensatoires visent principalement à compenser les pertes, pécuniaires ou non, occasionnées au demandeur par la conduite du défendeur, les dommages-intérêts punitifs ont pour objet le châtiment, la dissuasion et la dénonciation : Whiten c. Pilot Insurance Co., [2002] 1 R.C.S. 595, 2002 CSC 18, par. 43.

De par sa nature, la violation de contrat doit parfois être réprimée. Mais pour entraîner la condamnation à des dommages-intérêts punitifs, la conduite reprochée doit s'écarter de façon marquée des normes de conduite acceptées; c'est le cas exceptionnel d'une conduite que l'on peut qualifier de si malveillante, opprimante ou abusive qu'elle choque le sens de la dignité de la cour : Hill c. Église de scientologie de Toronto, [1995] 2 R.C.S. 1130, par. 196; Whiten, par. 36. L'inconduite doit être d'une nature propre à provoquer davantage que la réprobation entourant l'inexécution d'un contrat. Selon l'arrêt Whiten au par. 36, « les dommages-intérêts punitifs chevauchent la frontière entre le droit civil (indemnisation) et le droit criminel (punition) ». Le droit criminel et les régimes de réglementation en matière quasi criminelle sont reconnus comme les principaux moyens de châtiment. Il importe que les tribunaux n'aient recours aux dommages-intérêts punitifs que dans les cas exceptionnels, et encore, avec retenue.

Dans Whiten, notre Cour a énoncé les principes régissant l'attribution de dommages-intérêts punitifs et a affirmé que dans les cas de violation de contrat, la conduite doit non seulement s'écarter des normes ordinaires de bonne conduite mais doit en plus donner elle-même ouverture à action. Si la violation en question consiste en un refus de verser les prestations d'assurance, cette exigence sera respectée du fait que l'assureur a violé l'obligation contractuelle d'agir de bonne foi. La question préliminaire qui se pose est donc de savoir si l'appelante a violé non seulement l'obligation contractuelle de verser les prestations d'invalidité de longue durée, mais aussi l'obligation contractuelle indépendante de traiter de bonne foi la réclamation de l'intimée. Relativement à cette question préliminaire, la norme juridique à laquelle les assureurs, dont

> The duty of good faith also requires an insurer to deal with its insured's claim fairly. The duty to act fairly applies both to the manner in which the insurer investigates and assesses the claim and to the decision whether or not to pay the claim. In making a decision whether to refuse payment of a claim from its insured, an insurer must assess the merits of the claim in a balanced and reasonable manner. It must not deny coverage or delay payment in order to take advantage of the insured's economic vulnerability or to gain bargaining leverage in negotiating a settlement. A decision by an insurer to refuse payment should be based on a reasonable interpretation of its obligations under the policy. This duty of fairness, however, does not require that an insurer necessarily be correct in making a decision to dispute its obligation to pay a claim. Mere denial of a claim that ultimately succeeds is not, in itself, an act of bad faith.

The proper characterization of Sun Life's conduct on the "good faith" issue requires a careful consideration of the evidence. The trial judge concluded that Sun Life did not act in bad faith. He heard the evidence over nine days. He had an opportunity to observe the witnesses, who included James Craig, a representative of Sun Life's disability management unit, and Ms. Fidler herself. Bearing in mind the subjective element of the duty of good faith, the trial judge's assessment of Mr. Craig's credibility in particular takes on some significance in determining whether Sun Life acted with an improper purpose in denying Ms. Fidler's claim.

Having heard and considered the evidence, the trial judge rejected Ms. Fidler's punitive damages claim. In his reasons, the trial judge noted the following evidence: Sun Life's surveillance recorded activities that were not inconsistent with Ms. Fidler's self-reporting; an internal memorandum exaggerated the nature of Ms. Fidler's activities; a claims administrator with Sun Life had written a > [TRADUCTION] L'obligation d'agir de bonne foi oblige aussi l'assureur à traiter équitablement la réclamation de son assuré. L'obligation d'agir équitablement s'applique aussi bien à la manière dont l'assureur fait enquête et évalue la réclamation qu'à la décision de payer ou non la demande. Pour décider s'il doit refuser de payer une demande présentée par son assuré, l'assureur doit évaluer le bien-fondé de cette demande de façon impartiale et raisonnable. Il ne doit pas refuser ou retarder le paiement afin de tirer profit de la vulnérabilité financière de l'assuré ou de se ménager une position de force dans la négociation du règlement. La décision de l'assureur de refuser le paiement devrait être fondée sur une interprétation raisonnable des obligations que lui impose la police. Toutefois, cette obligation d'agir équitablement ne signifie pas pour autant que l'assureur doit nécessairement avoir raison lorsqu'il décide de contester son obligation d'indemniser un assuré. Le simple rejet d'une demande qui finira par être reconnue comme valable ne constitue pas en soi un acte de mauvaise foi.

Sun Life, sont astreints a été correctement décrite par le juge O'Connor dans l'arrêt 702535 Ontario Inc. c. Lloyd's London, Non-Marine Underwriters (2000), 184 D.L.R. (4th) 687 (C.A. Ont.), par. 29 :

64 L'appréciation de la conduite de Sun Life par rapport à la question de la « bonne foi » nécessite un examen minutieux de la preuve. Le juge de première instance a conclu que l'assureur n'avait pas fait preuve de mauvaise foi. L'audition de la preuve a duré neuf jours. Le juge a pu observer les témoins, au nombre desquels figuraient James Craig, qui représentait le service de gestion des régimes d'invalidité de Sun Life, ainsi que M^me^ Fidler elle-même. Si l'on tient compte de l'élément subjectif de l'obligation d'agir de bonne foi, l'appréciation que le juge a faite de la crédibilité de M. Craig, en particulier, revêt de l'importance dans l'examen de la question de savoir si Sun Life poursuivait un but inapproprié lorsqu'elle a refusé la réclamation de M^me^ Fidler.

65 Après l'audition et l'examen de la preuve, le juge de première instance a rejeté la demande de dommages-intérêts punitifs de M^me^ Fidler. Il a signalé les éléments de preuve suivants dans ses motifs : la surveillance effectuée par Sun Life a permis d'enregistrer des activités qui n'étaient pas incompatibles avec les déclarations de M^me^ Fidler; une note de service interne avait exagéré la nature des memorandum contemplating the successful denial of Ms. Fidler's claim in the event of litigation; and Sun Life's medical consultant was wrong in concluding that there was no medical or non-medical evidence that Ms. Fidler could not perform light work.

66 On the other hand, he took into consideration that the medical reports about Ms. Fidler's condition were inconclusive; that Sun Life acted in reliance on its own consultants and experts; that Ms. Fidler's condition was contracted at a young age; and that her previous experience was in sedentary work. He summarized his considerations and conclusions as follows:

> I must recognize, however, that after two years of benefits had been paid to Ms. Fidler, the test for continued coverage was whether Ms. Fidler could perform any work at all. Given the fact that the nature of Ms. Fidler's illness is of a type that is not demonstrated by indicators such as an x-ray or MRI, I do not think that Sun Life's conduct should be characterized as an act of bad faith. I say this even though Sun Life carried out what would appear to be at times a rather zealous approach to refuting Ms. Fidler's entitlement to the long term disability benefits despite strong medical evidence that she continued to be disabled. [para. 38]

67 The majority of the Court of Appeal, per Finch C.J.B.C., found palpable and overriding error on the question of bad faith. Finch C.J.B.C. relied in particular on three aspects of the record: first, the absence of medical evidence to justify a denial of Ms. Fidler's claim; second, Sun Life's internal memoranda exaggerating the surveillance results and indicating an intention to avoid looking "bad" in the event of litigation; and third, Sun Life's failure to disclose to Ms. Fidler the surveillance video on which it relied in denying her claim.

68 The surveillance team's observations were, arguably, consistent with the information provided by Ms. Fidler in her supplementary answers to the questionnaire. Moreover, Sun Life's internal activités de M^me^ Fidler; un gestionnaire de règlement de Sun Life avait indiqué dans une note de service que Sun Life pourrait avoir gain de cause dans l'éventualité d'un litige se rapportant au refus de la réclamation de M^me^ Fidler; et le médecin consultant de Sun Life avait conclu à tort à l'absence de preuve médicale ou non médicale établissant que M^me^ Fidler ne pouvait effectuer un travail léger.

D'autre part, il a pris en considération le fait que les rapports médicaux concernant l'état de M^me^ Fidler n'étaient pas concluants, que Sun Life avait agi sur la foi de ses propres consultants et spécialistes, que M^me^ Fidler avait contracté sa maladie à un jeune âge et que son expérience de travail antérieure se rapportait à du travail sédentaire. Il a résumé ainsi son raisonnement et ses conclusions :

Le juge en chef Finch, au nom de la majorité de la Cour d'appel, a jugé qu'il y avait eu erreur manifeste et dominante sur la question de la mauvaise foi. Il s'est appuyé en particulier sur trois éléments du dossier : d'abord, l'absence de preuve médicale justifiant le refus de la réclamation de M^me^ Fidler; ensuite, les notes de service internes de Sun Life exagérant les résultats de la surveillance et indiquant la volonté d'éviter une image négative dans l'éventualité d'un litige; et enfin, le défaut de Sun Life de communiquer à M^me^ Fidler la vidéo de surveillance sur laquelle elle se fondait pour refuser la réclamation.

On peut soutenir que les observations de l'équipe de surveillance concordaient avec les renseignements fournis par M^me^ Fidler dans les réponses supplémentaires qu'elle a données au questionnaire. De memoranda, such as the surveillance summary and the medical consultant's report, reveal bald factual misstatements that weigh against a finding that Sun Life fairly and carefully considered the insured's claim.

On the other hand, the fact that Ms. Fidler's behaviour in the course of the surveillance seemed to demonstrate an ability to engage in some activities, taken with the ambiguity of the IME assessment, helps reduce the force of a conclusion that Sun Life had an improper purpose in denying Ms. Fidler's claim.

Except for the matter of disclosure, this evidence was expressly considered by the trial judge. And the disclosure issue is significantly tempered by the fact that Sun Life set out in a letter to Ms. Fidler the specific activities observed in the surveillance and the conclusions Sun Life drew as a consequence.

We share Finch C.J.B.C.'s concerns about Sun Life's decision to terminate benefits relating to an unobservable disability in the absence of any medical evidence indicating an ability to return to work. And we appreciate that the facts in this case represent conduct that is extremely troubling — the five-year denial by Sun Life of disability benefits without medical support for the denial is, to say the least, inappropriate. But an insurer will not necessarily be in breach of the duty of good faith by incorrectly denying a claim that is eventually conceded, or judicially determined, to be legitimate. In this respect, we respectfully part company with Finch C.J.B.C. who, in awarding punitive damages, characterized Sun Life's concession that Ms. Fidler was entitled to benefits as "the civil equivalent of [a] 'guilty plea'" (para. 78). The question instead is whether the denial was the result of the overwhelmingly inadequate handling of the claim, or the introduction of improper considerations into the claims process.

plus, les documents internes de Sun Life, comme le rapport de surveillance et le rapport du médecin consultant, renferment des affirmations de fait laconiques et inexactes qui empêchent de conclure que Sun Life a examiné la réclamation de l'assurée avec soin et impartialité.

69 D'autre part, le fait que la conduite de M^me^ Fidler pendant la surveillance semblait démontrer qu'elle pouvait se livrer à quelques activités, combiné aux conclusions ambiguës de l'examen médical indépendant, contribue à affaiblir la conclusion que Sun Life poursuivait un but inapproprié en refusant la réclamation de M^me^ Fidler.

70 Sauf pour ce qui est de la non-communication de la vidéo, le juge de première instance a expressément pris en considération ces éléments de preuve. Et la question de la non-communication perd beaucoup d'importance du fait que Sun Life a décrit dans une lettre envoyée à M^me^ Fidler les activités précises observées pendant la surveillance et les conclusions qu'elle en a tiré.

71 Comme le juge en chef Finch, nous trouvons préoccupant que Sun Life ait décidé, en l'absence de toute preuve médicale indiquant que l'assurée était apte à reprendre le travail, de mettre fin au versement de prestations relatives à une invalidité impossible à observer. Et nous sommes conscientes que les faits révèlent une conduite extrêmement troublante — il est pour le moins inapproprié que Sun Life ait refusé pendant cinq ans de verser des prestations d'invalidité sans preuve médicale à l'appui. Mais un assureur ne manque pas nécessairement à son obligation d'agir de bonne foi lorsqu'il refuse à tort une réclamation qu'il reconnaît ensuite comme légitime ou qui est déclarée telle par un tribunal. Sur ce point, nous divergeons d'avis avec le juge en chef Finch qui, en accordant des dommages-intérêts punitifs, a considéré que l'admission par Sun Life que M^me^ Fidler avait droit à des prestations était [TRADUCTION] « l'équivalent au civil d'[un] plaidoyer de culpabilité » (par. 78). Il convient plutôt de se demander si le refus découle d'une analyse terriblement bâclée de la réclamation ou de l'application de considérations malhonnêtes dans le processus de règlement.

72 Ultimately, each case revolves around its own facts. As O'Connor J.A. stated in 702535 Ontario:

> What constitutes bad faith will depend on the circumstances in each case. A court considering whether the duty has been breached will look at the conduct of the insurer throughout the claims process to determine whether in light of the circumstances, as they then existed, the insurer acted fairly and promptly in responding to the claim. [para. 30]

73 The trial judge's conclusion that Sun Life did not act in bad faith was the product of a thorough review of the relevant evidence, and depended heavily on his appreciation of the basis on which Sun Life denied Ms. Fidler's claim. He considered every salient aspect of how Sun Life handled Ms. Fidler's claim, including those features that might be relied upon to suggest that Sun Life approached the claim obstructively or dismissively, but made no such finding.

74 Nor did the trial judge find an improper purpose on the part of Sun Life. The trial judge's reliance, in particular, on the difficulty Sun Life had in ascertaining whether Ms. Fidler was actually disabled supported his conclusion that Sun Life did not act in bad faith and that, instead, its denial of benefits was the product of a real, albeit incorrect, doubt as to whether Ms. Fidler was incapable of performing any work, as required under the terms of the policy.

75 Sun Life's conduct was troubling, but not sufficiently so as to justify interfering with the trial judge's conclusion that there was no bad faith. The trial judge's reasons disclose no error of law, and his eventual conclusion that Sun Life did not act in bad faith is inextricable from his findings of fact and his consideration of the evidence. As Ryan J.A. concluded in dissent:

> The trial judge saw and heard the witnesses. He examined the written material filed as exhibits. It was for him to assess the evidence and to determine its weight

En bout de ligne, l'issue de chaque affaire dépend des faits qui lui sont propres. Comme le juge O'Connor l'a affirmé dans l'arrêt 702535 Ontario :

La conclusion du juge de première instance que Sun Life n'avait pas agi de mauvaise foi procédait d'un examen exhaustif de la preuve pertinente et elle était solidement appuyée sur son évaluation des motifs pour lesquels Sun Life avait rejeté la réclamation de M^me^ Fidler. Il a examiné tous les points saillants du traitement de la réclamation par Sun Life, y compris les aspects susceptibles d'indiquer que l'assureur s'était livré à de l'obstruction ou n'avait pas accordé l'importance voulue à la réclamation, mais il n'a pas conclu en ce sens.

Le juge de première instance n'a pas considéré non plus que Sun Life avait poursuivi un but inapproprié. Sur le fondement des difficultés rencontrées par Sun Life pour s'assurer de l'invalidité de M^me^ Fidler, en particulier, il a conclu que Sun Life n'avait pas agi de mauvaise foi et que son refus de verser les prestations reposait plutôt sur un doute qui, pour mal fondé qu'il fût, n'en était pas moins réel sur la question de savoir si M^me^ Fidler était incapable d'exercer tout emploi, comme l'exigeait la police.

La conduite de Sun Life était troublante, mais pas au point qu'il soit justifié d'infirmer la conclusion du juge de première instance sur l'absence de mauvaise foi. Les motifs du juge ne révèlent aucune erreur de droit, et sa conclusion que Sun Life n'avait pas agi de mauvaise foi est indissociable de ses conclusions de fait et de son examen de la preuve. Comme la juge Ryan de la Cour d'appel l'a indiqué dans sa dissidence :

> [TRADUCTION] Le juge de première instance a vu et entendu les témoins. Il a examiné les pièces déposées en preuve. Il lui appartenait d'apprécier la preuve

and effect. In my view Ms. Fidler has not been able to demonstrate that the conclusions of the trial judge were unreasonable or palpably wrong. [para. 104]

The award of punitive damages, of course, does not depend exclusively on the existence of an actionable wrong. In Whiten, the Court clearly established the relevant factors to consider in determining whether or not an award of punitive damages is warranted. Absent bad faith in this case, however, there is no need to go further.

Ms. Fidler is entitled to $20,000 for mental distress, but her claim for punitive damages is dismissed. Accordingly, we would allow the appeal in part, set aside the Court of Appeal's award of punitive damages and restore the order of Ralph J., with costs to Ms. Fidler throughout.

et d'en déterminer l'importance et l'effet. À mon avis, M^me^ Fidler n'a pas été en mesure de démontrer que les conclusions du juge étaient déraisonnables ou entachées d'une erreur manifeste. [par. 104]

Certes, l'attribution de dommages-intérêts punitifs ne dépend pas exclusivement de l'existence d'une faute donnant ouverture à action. Dans Whiten, cette Cour a énoncé les facteurs qu'il faut prendre en compte pour déterminer si l'attribution de dommages-intérêts punitifs est justifiée. Cependant, en l'absence de mauvaise foi en l'espèce, il n'est pas nécessaire de poursuivre l'analyse.

M^me^ Fidler a droit à 20 000 $ pour souffrance morale, mais sa demande de dommages-intérêts punitifs est rejetée. Par conséquent, nous sommes d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi en partie, d'annuler l'attribution de dommages-intérêts punitifs par la Cour d'appel et de rétablir l'ordonnance du juge Ralph, avec dépens en faveur de M^me^ Fidler devant toutes les cours. 76

Pourvoi accueilli en partie, avec dépens en faveur de l'intimée.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR NEWFOUNDLAND AND LABRADOR

Civil procedure — Class actions — Certification — Pleadings — Causes of action — Plaintiffs alleging defendants profited from dangerous and deceptive video lottery terminals — Plaintiffs relying on waiver of tort, breach of contract and unjust enrichment as causes of action and seeking gain-based award — Plaintiffs' action certified as class proceeding — Whether plaintiffs' claims disclose reasonable cause of action.

ALC, constituted by the governments of the four Atlantic provinces, is empowered to approve the operation of video lottery terminal games ("VLTs") in Newfoundland and Labrador. The plaintiffs applied for certification of a class action against ALC, on behalf of any natural person resident in Newfoundland and Labrador who paid to play VLTs in that province in the six years preceding the class action. The plaintiffs claim that VLTs are inherently dangerous and deceptive. Relying on three causes of action (waiver of tort, breach of contract and unjust enrichment), the plaintiffs seek a gain-based award, quantified by the profit ALC earned by licensing VLTs.

ALC applied to strike the plaintiffs' claim on the basis that it disclosed no reasonable cause of action, and the plaintiffs applied for certification of their claim as a class action. The certification judge dismissed ALC's application, and further held that the plaintiffs had satisfied the requirements necessary for certification. The Court of Appeal substantially upheld the certification judge's conclusions, and allowed the plaintiffs' claims in waiver of tort, breach of contract and unjust enrichment to proceed to trial.

Held (Wagner C.J. and Karakatsanis, Martin and Kasirer JJ. dissenting in part): The appeals should be allowed, the certification order set aside and the plaintiffs' statement of claim struck in its entirety.

Per Abella, Moldaver, Côté, Brown and Rowe JJ.: Each claim that the plaintiffs have pleaded is bound to fail because it discloses no reasonable cause of action.

EN APPEL DE LA COUR D'APPEL DE TERRE-NEUVE-ET-LABRADOR

Procédure civile — Recours collectifs — Autorisation d'exercer un recours collectif — Actes de procédure — Causes d'action — Demandeurs alléguant que les défendeurs ont tiré profit d'appareils de loterie vidéo dangereux et trompeurs — Demandeurs invoquant les causes d'action de renonciation au recours délictuel, violation de contrat et enrichissement sans cause et cherchant à obtenir une réparation fondée sur les gains réalisés — Action des demandeurs autorisée en tant que recours collectif — Les demandes présentées par les demandeurs révèlent-elles une cause d'action raisonnable?

La SLA, constituée par les gouvernements des quatre provinces de l'Atlantique, a le pouvoir d'approuver l'exploitation des appareils de loterie vidéo (« ALV ») à Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador. Les demandeurs ont présenté une demande d'autorisation d'un recours collectif contre la SLA, au nom de toute personne physique résidant à Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador ayant payé pour jouer sur des ALV dans cette province au cours des six années précédant l'introduction du recours collectif. Les demandeurs font valoir que les ALV sont intrinsèquement dangereux et trompeurs. S'appuyant sur trois causes d'action (renonciation au recours délictuel, violation de contrat et enrichissement sans cause), les demandeurs sollicitent une réparation fondée sur les gains réalisés, calculée en fonction des profits que la SLA a touchés en accordant des licences d'utilisation des ALV.

La SLA a présenté une demande visant à faire radier l'action des demandeurs au motif qu'elle ne révélait aucune cause d'action raisonnable, et les demandeurs ont demandé l'autorisation d'exercer leur action à titre de recours collectif. Le juge d'autorisation a rejeté la demande de la SLA, concluant en outre que les demandeurs avaient satisfait aux conditions nécessaires à l'autorisation. La Cour d'appel a confirmé en grande partie les conclusions du juge d'autorisation et a permis l'instruction des demandes fondées sur la renonciation au recours délictuel, la violation de contrat et l'enrichissement sans cause présentées par les demandeurs.

Arrêt (le juge en chef Wagner et les juges Karakatsanis, Martin et Kasirer dissidents en partie) : Les pourvois sont accueillis, l'ordonnance autorisant l'exercice du recours collectif est annulée et la déclaration des demandeurs est radiée en entier.

The plaintiffs cannot rely on the doctrine of waiver of tort as an independent cause of action for disgorgement. This novel cause of action does not exist in Canadian law and has no reasonable chance of succeeding at trial. In addition, the term "waiver of tort" is apt to generate confusion and should be abandoned. Despite its early acceptance, this term is a misnomer. Rather than forgiving or waiving the wrongfulness of the defendant's conduct, plaintiffs relying on the doctrine are simply electing to pursue an alternative, gain-based, remedy.

Restitution for unjust enrichment and disgorgement for wrongdoing are two types of gain-based remedies. What the plaintiffs seek in this case is disgorgement, which does not require proof of deprivation to the plaintiff, and requires only that the defendant gained a benefit. Restitution is awarded in response to the causative event of unjust enrichment, where there is correspondence between the defendant's gain and the plaintiff's deprivation. Disgorgement should be viewed as an alternative remedy for certain forms of wrongful conduct, not as an independent cause of action. In order to make out a claim for disgorgement, a plaintiff must first establish actionable misconduct. By pleading disgorgement as an independent cause of action, however, the plaintiffs in this case seek to establish an entirely new category of wrongful conduct — one that is akin to negligence but does not require proof of damage. Although disgorgement is available for some forms of wrongdoing without proof of damage (for example, breach of fiduciary duty), it is a far leap to find that disgorgement without proof of damage is available as a general proposition in response to a defendant's negligent conduct. Granting disgorgement for negligence without proof of damage would result in a remedy arising out of legal nothingness, and would be a radical and uncharted development. This is not the type of incremental change that falls within the remit of courts applying the common law.

The plaintiffs' claim that VLTs are "similar to" three-card monte within the meaning of s. 206 of the Criminal Code and that their operation is therefore prohibited also has no reasonable chance of success. Statutory interpretation requires discerning legislative intent by examining statutory text in its entire context and in its grammatical Les demandeurs ne peuvent invoquer la renonciation au recours délictuel en tant que cause d'action indépendante en restitution des gains illicites. Cette nouvelle cause d'action n'existe pas en droit canadien et n'a aucune chance raisonnable d'être accueillie au procès. De plus, le terme « renonciation au recours délictuel » prête à confusion et devrait donc être abandonné. Bien qu'il soit accepté depuis longtemps, ce terme est inexact. Plutôt que de pardonner au défendeur sa conduite fautive ou de fermer les yeux sur le caractère fautif de celle-ci, le demandeur qui invoque la doctrine choisit simplement de demander une réparation subsidiaire, fondée sur les gains réalisés.

La restitution pour enrichissement sans cause et la restitution des gains illicites pour cause d'acte fautif sont deux types de réparations fondées sur les gains réalisés. En l'espèce, les demandeurs sollicitent la restitution des gains illicites, qui ne nécessite pas de prouver que le demandeur a subi un appauvrissement, mais seulement que le défendeur a obtenu un avantage. La restitution est accordée en réponse à l'élément causal d'un enrichissement sans cause, lorsque le gain réalisé par le défendeur correspond à l'appauvrissement subi par le demandeur. La restitution des gains illicites devrait être considérée comme une réparation subsidiaire pour certaines formes de conduite fautive, non comme une cause d'action indépendante. Pour établir le bien-fondé d'une demande en restitution des gains illicites, le demandeur doit d'abord établir l'inconduite donnant ouverture à l'action. En plaidant la restitution des gains illicites en tant que cause d'action indépendante, cependant, les demandeurs en l'espèce cherchent à créer une toute nouvelle catégorie de comportement fautif — qui s'apparente à la négligence mais qui n'exige pas de preuve de l'existence d'un préjudice. Bien que la restitution des gains illicites soit possible pour certaines formes d'actes fautifs sans qu'il soit nécessaire de prouver le préjudice (par exemple, en cas de manquement à une obligation fiduciaire), il est cependant difficile de conclure que la restitution des gains illicites sans preuve de préjudice est disponible de façon générale en cas de conduite négligente du défendeur. Accorder la restitution des gains illicites pour cause de négligence sans preuve de préjudice donnerait lieu à une réparation issue d'un néant juridique, et serait un changement radical tout à fait nouveau. Ce n'est pas le type de changement progressif qui relève de la compétence des tribunaux appliquant la common law.

L'allégation des demandeurs selon laquelle les ALV sont « analogues » au jeu de bonneteau au sens indiqué à l'art. 206 du Code criminel et que leur exploitation est donc interdite n'a aucune chance raisonnable d'être accueillie. L'interprétation des lois exige de dégager l'intention du législateur en lisant le texte législatif dans son and ordinary sense, in harmony with the statute's scheme and objects. In determining what games can be considered "similar to" three-card monte, it must be kept in mind that courts cannot create common law crimes through an act of judicial interpretation. Furthermore, while expert evidence may assist in deciding whether the defined elements of an offence are made out on the facts of a particular charge, expert evidence cannot purport to define the elements of an offence. The text of the provision and its surrounding context suggest that the prohibition of games similar to three-card monte was directed towards the game's concrete attributes and not towards the abstract feature of deception. Had Parliament sought to prohibit broadly deceptive games, it would have straightforwardly done so. Games "similar to" three-card monte must therefore involve, at a minimum, a player betting on the location of an object after a series of a manipulations. Nothing in the pleadings describes VLTs as operating in this manner.

The plaintiffs' breach of contract claim is also doomed to fail. Whether this claim discloses a reasonable cause of action should be considered in light of the remedies the plaintiffs actually seek — that is, disgorgement and punitive damages — and the question of whether these remedies are available to the plaintiffs, assuming the truth of their pleadings. The ordinary form of monetary relief for breach of contract is an award of damages, measured according to the position which the plaintiff would have occupied had the contract been performed. Disgorgement for breach of contract may be appropriate in exceptional circumstances, but only where, at a minimum, other remedies are inadequate and only where the circumstances warrant such an award. As to those circumstances, courts should in particular consider whether the plaintiff had a legitimate interest in preventing the defendant's profit-making activity. The key to developing principles for gain-based recovery in breach of contract is to consider what legitimate interest a gain-based award serves to vindicate. A coherent approach that reconciles the relief awarded with the structure of breach of contract as a cause of action should be preferred. While the circumstances in which a gain-based award will be appropriate cannot be clearly delineated in advance, one would expect future legitimate interests protected by a gain-based award to resemble those interests that have been protected in the past. Courts have, in some exceptional circumstances, long awarded monetary amounts departing from the ordinary measure of expectation damages. An award that appears to be measured by a defendant's gain might serve a compensatory purpose that distinguishes it from disgorgement and which therefore tends to support recovery. Where, as contexte global, selon le sens ordinaire et grammatical qui s'harmonise avec l'économie et les objets de la loi. Lorsqu'il s'agit de déterminer quels jeux peuvent être considérés « analogues » au bonneteau, il faut garder à l'esprit que les tribunaux ne peuvent créer de crimes de common law en procédant par interprétation. De plus, bien qu'elle puisse aider la cour à décider si les éléments constitutifs d'une infraction sont établis pour une accusation en particulier, la preuve d'expert ne peut servir à définir les éléments d'une infraction. Le libellé de la disposition et son contexte tendent à indiquer que l'interdiction visant les jeux analogues au bonneteau était dirigée vers les attributs réels du jeu et non vers la caractéristique abstraite de la tromperie. Si le législateur avait voulu interdire les jeux de hasard trompeurs en général, il l'aurait fait sans détour. Les jeux « analogues » au bonneteau supposent donc nécessairement, à tout le moins, qu'un joueur parie sur l'endroit où se trouve un objet après une série de manipulations. Rien dans les actes de procédure ne décrit les ALV comme fonctionnant de cette manière.

La demande fondée sur la violation de contrat introduite par les demandeurs est aussi vouée à l'échec. La question de savoir si cette demande révèle une cause d'action raisonnable devrait être examinée à la lumière des réparations que les demandeurs cherchent à obtenir — c'est-à-dire la restitution des gains illicites et les dommages punitifs — et la question de savoir si les demandeurs ont droit à ces réparations, en tenant les faits allégués pour avérés. La réparation pécuniaire habituelle pour violation de contrat est l'octroi de dommages-intérêts, calculés en fonction de la situation dans laquelle le demandeur se serait trouvé si le contrat avait été exécuté. La restitution des gains illicites pour violation de contrat peut convenir dans certaines circonstances exceptionnelles, mais seulement dans la mesure où, à tout le moins, les autres réparations ne conviennent pas et les circonstances justifient d'accorder cette réparation. Pour ce qui est de ces circonstances, les tribunaux devraient en particulier établir si le demandeur avait un intérêt légitime à empêcher le défendeur d'exercer ses activités lucratives. L'élément essentiel pour élaborer les principes d'une indemnisation fondée sur les gains réalisés en cas de violation de contrat consiste à se demander quel intérêt légitime une telle mesure vise à défendre. Une approche cohérente qui concilierait la réparation accordée et la structure de la violation de contrat en tant que cause d'action devrait être privilégiée. Il est vrai que les circonstances dans lesquelles il conviendra d'accorder une réparation fondée sur les gains réalisés ne peuvent pas être clairement définies à l'avance, mais on peut penser qu'à l'avenir, les intérêts légitimes protégés par une telle réparation ressembleront à ceux qui ont été protégés par le passé. Les tribunaux ont longtemps accordé, dans certaines here, the argument is that the quantum of loss is equal to the defendant's gain, but the plaintiff would simply rather pursue disgorgement, a gain-based remedy is not appropriate. Further, there is nothing exceptional about the breach of contract the plaintiffs allege: once the allegations of criminal conduct are put aside, the plaintiffs' claim is simply that they paid to play a gambling game and did not get exactly what they paid for. The plaintiffs cannot be said to have a legitimate interest in ALC's profit-making activity, and their claim has no reasonable chance of achieving disgorgement damages for breach of contract.

Punitive damage awards for breach of contract are also exceptional, but will be awarded where the alleged breach of contract is an independent actionable wrong. The actionable wrong need not be tortious: punitive damages may also be awarded where the defendant breaches a contractual obligation. Not every contract, however, imposes actionable good faith obligations on contracting parties: while good faith is an organizing principle of Canadian contract law, it manifests itself in specific circumstances and its application is generally confined to existing categories of contracts and obligations. The alleged contract between ALC and the plaintiffs does not fit within any of the established good faith categories; accordingly, their claim for punitive damages has no reasonable chance of success.

Finally, the plaintiffs' unjust enrichment claim has no reasonable chance of success. The principled unjust enrichment framework requires establishing that ALC was enriched, that the plaintiffs suffered a corresponding deprivation, and that the enrichment and corresponding deprivation occurred in the absence of any juristic reason therefor. The juristic reason element proceeds in two stages: first, the plaintiff must demonstrate that the defendant's enrichment cannot be justified by any of the established categories of juristic reason; and second, the defendant can rebut the plaintiff's case by showing that there is a residual reason to deny recovery. In the present circonstances exceptionnelles, des réparations pécuniaires s'écartant de l'évaluation ordinaire de l'indemnisation pour la perte du profit escompté. Un montant octroyé qui serait calculé en fonction du gain réalisé par le défendeur pourrait servir un objectif compensatoire qui le distingue de la restitution des gains illicites et qui tend donc à fonder le recouvrement. Lorsque, comme en l'espèce, le demandeur soutient que le montant de la perte équivaut aux gains réalisés par le défendeur, mais qu'il intente simplement un recours en restitution des gains illicites, la réparation fondée sur les gains réalisés ne convient pas. De plus, la violation de contrat qu'allèguent les demandeurs n'a rien d'exceptionnel : une fois les allégations de conduite criminelle écartées, les demandeurs prétendent simplement qu'ils ont payé pour jouer à un jeu de hasard et qu'ils n'ont pas obtenu exactement ce pour quoi ils ont payé. On ne peut affirmer que les demandeurs ont un intérêt légitime dans les activités lucratives de la SLA, et les demandeurs n'ont aucune chance raisonnable d'obtenir la restitution des gains illicites pour violation de contrat.

L'octroi de dommages-intérêts punitifs pour violation de contrat est aussi une mesure exceptionnelle, mais elle sera accordée si la violation alléguée du contrat équivaut à une faute indépendante donnant ouverture à l'action. Il n'est pas nécessaire que la faute donnant ouverture à action soit d'ordre délictuel : des dommages-intérêts punitifs peuvent aussi être accordés lorsque le défendeur contrevient à une obligation contractuelle. Toutefois, ce ne sont pas tous les contrats qui imposent aux parties contractantes des obligations d'agir de bonne foi donnant ouverture à action : bien que la bonne foi soit un principe directeur du droit canadien des contrats, c'est un principe qui se manifeste dans des situations précises et son application se limite généralement aux catégories existantes de contrats et d'obligations. Le contrat qui unirait la SLA et les demandeurs n'entre dans aucune des catégories de bonne foi établies; par conséquent, leur demande de dommages-intérêts punitifs n'a aucune chance raisonnable d'être accueillie.

Enfin, la demande pour enrichissement sans cause présentée par les demandeurs n'a aucune chance raisonnable d'être accueillie. Le cadre d'analyse de l'enrichissement sans cause requiert qu'ils établissent que la SLA s'est enrichie, qu'ils ont subi un appauvrissement correspondant et que l'enrichissement et l'appauvrissement correspondant ont eu lieu en l'absence d'un motif juridique. L'élément de motif juridique comporte deux étapes : premièrement, le demandeur doit démontrer qu'aucune des catégories établies de motifs juridiques ne peut justifier l'enrichissement du défendeur; et deuxièmement, le défendeur peut réfuter la preuve du demandeur en démontrant qu'il existe case, there is no need to go beyond the first stage. The plaintiffs' own pleadings allege that there was a contract between ALC and the plaintiffs under which the plaintiffs paid to play VLTs, and nothing in the pleadings could serve to vitiate the alleged contract. A defendant that acquires a benefit pursuant to a valid contract is justified in retaining that benefit.

Per Wagner C.J. and Karakatsanis, Martin and Kasirer JJ. (dissenting in part): The appeal should be allowed in part. There is agreement with the majority that a mere breach of a duty of care, in the absence of loss, cannot ground a claim for disgorgement. There is also agreement that VLTs cannot constitute "three-card monte" as defined in the Criminal Code, and that the plaintiffs' claim in unjust enrichment must be struck. However, there is disagreement with whether the plaintiffs' claim in breach of contract is a reasonable cause of action, as well as the conclusion that there are no available remedies for that breach. The plaintiffs' claim should be certified as a class action on the common issues of breach of contract, punitive damages and the appropriateness of a disgorgement remedy.

The elements of a cause of action for breach of contract are the existence of a contract and the breach of a term of that contract. Loss is not an essential element. The plaintiffs have pleaded the nature of the contract, the terms they say are implied, and the manner in which ALC breached the contract between them. The first implied term pleaded is a warranty that the VLTs were not inherently dangerous. In the alternative, the plaintiffs plead that ALC breached an implied term requiring ALC to warn the plaintiff class of any inherent danger in the consumption of the games and to satisfy itself of their safety. Finally, the plaintiffs allege that ALC breached an implied term of good faith. It is not plain and obvious that implying these terms would improperly touch on or fetter ALC's authority as a public regulator of VLTs.

The claim for breach of contract should not be struck on the basis that it is plain and obvious that there are no available remedies. There are several remedies that are open to the plaintiffs on their pleadings, including nominal un autre motif de refuser le recouvrement. En l'espèce, il n'est pas nécessaire d'aller au-delà de la première étape. Les demandeurs allèguent dans leurs propres actes de procédure qu'il y avait un contrat entre eux et la SLA, en vertu duquel ils devaient payer pour jouer sur les ALV, et rien dans les actes de procédure ne pourrait entacher la validité du contrat qui serait intervenu entre les demandeurs et la SLA. Un défendeur qui tire un avantage dans le cadre d'un contrat valide est justifié de conserver cet avantage.

Le juge en chef Wagner et les juges Karakatsanis, Martin et Kasirer (dissidents en partie) : Le pourvoi devrait être accueilli en partie. Il y a accord avec les juges majoritaires pour dire qu'un simple manquement à une obligation de diligence, en l'absence de perte, ne peut fonder une demande de restitution des gains illicites. Il y a également accord pour dire que les ALV ne peuvent constituer un jeu de « bonneteau » au sens donné à ce terme dans le Code criminel, et que la demande fondée sur l'enrichissement sans cause présentée par les demandeurs doit être radiée. Toutefois, il y a désaccord avec l'analyse de la question de savoir si la demande fondée sur la violation de contrat présentée par les demandeurs est une cause d'action raisonnable, et avec la conclusion selon laquelle il n'y a aucune réparation possible pour cette violation. L'action des demandeurs devrait être autorisée en tant que recours collectif portant sur les questions communes relatives à la violation de contrat, aux dommages-intérêts punitifs et au caractère approprié de la réparation de restitution des gains illicites.

Les éléments d'une cause d'action pour violation de contrat sont l'existence d'un contrat et la violation d'une condition de celui-ci. La perte n'est pas un élément essentiel. Les demandeurs ont invoqué la nature du contrat, les conditions qu'ils affirment être implicites et la manière dont la SLA aurait violé le contrat conclu entre eux. La première condition implicite invoquée est une garantie que les ALV n'étaient pas intrinsèquement dangereux. Subsidiairement, les demandeurs soutiennent que la SLA a violé une condition implicite par laquelle la SLA était tenue de mettre en garde le groupe de demandeurs contre tout danger inhérent à la consommation des jeux et de s'assurer de la sécurité de ceux-ci. Enfin, les demandeurs soutiennent que la SLA aurait violé une condition implicite d'agir de bonne foi. Il n'est pas évident et manifeste que l'incorporation de ces conditions implicites toucherait ou entraverait indûment le pouvoir de la SLA en tant qu'organisme de réglementation public des ALV.

La demande fondée sur la violation de contrat ne devrait pas être radiée du fait qu'il est évident et manifeste qu'il n'y a aucune réparation possible. Plusieurs réparations pourraient être accordées aux demandeurs au vu de leurs damages, declaratory relief, disgorgement, and punitive damages.

A court finding breach of contract may make binding declarations of right, whether or not any consequential relief is or could be claimed. Nominal damages are always available for causes of action, like breach of contract, that do not require proof of loss. This alone precludes striking the claim.

Whether disgorgement is an appropriate remedy for breach of contract in this case is a matter for trial that cannot be resolved on the pleadings alone. While the customary remedy for a breach of contract is compensation measured in the form of expectation damages, in some cases, disgorgement of a defendant's profits can be an appropriate remedy for breach of contract. Disgorgement is an exceptional remedy, available where a plaintiff has shown that the ordinary remedies of contract law are inadequate to protect and vindicate their contractual right. Although compensatory damages will often help to achieve deterrence of wrongful conduct, they will not always be adequate or appropriate in the circumstances of the breach. The measure of a disgorgement award implicitly effects deterrence and is dictated by the minimum amount necessary to make the wrong unprofitable.

Disgorgement awards are not limited to situations in which they serve a compensatory purpose. A self-interested and deliberate breach; the impracticability of calculating loss; and the plaintiff's legitimate interest in preventing the defendant's profit-making activity, including where the defendant had a quasi-fiduciary duty to the plaintiff, weigh in favour of a disgorgement remedy. No single factor is necessarily crucial or dispositive. The plaintiffs' pleadings in this case correspond with several factors that, if established at trial, may point to a disgorgement remedy, including that the plaintiffs were vulnerable to ALC's abuse of its power and that ALC's breach was self-interested, deliberate, and in bad faith. A trial judge may also find that ascertaining the actual amount lost is impracticable since VLTs are designed not to create records of who uses them and how much money they have lost.

Un tribunal qui conclut à la violation de contrat pourra faire des déclarations de droit obligatoires, qu'un redressement en conséquence soit ou puisse être demandé ou non. Les dommages-intérêts symboliques peuvent toujours être accordés pour des causes d'action, comme la violation de contrat, qui ne nécessitent pas une preuve de perte. Ce fait à lui seul exclut la radiation de la demande.

La question de savoir si la restitution des gains illicites est une réparation appropriée pour la violation de contrat en l'espèce doit être tranchée au procès et ne peut l'être au vu des actes de procédure à eux seuls. Même si la réparation habituelle pour violation de contrat est l'indemnisation évaluée sous forme de dommages-intérêts en fonction de la perte de profit escompté, dans certaines situations, la restitution des gains illicites du défendeur peut être une réparation appropriée en cas de violation de contrat. La restitution des gains illicites est une réparation exceptionnelle, qui peut être accordée lorsqu'un demandeur démontre que les réparations ordinaires du droit des contrats sont inadéquates pour protéger et défendre son droit contractuel. Bien que les dommages-intérêts compensatoires aident souvent à créer un effet dissuasif à l'égard de la conduite fautive, ils ne seront pas toujours adéquats ou appropriés eu égard aux circonstances de la violation. La portée de la réparation de restitution des gains illicites a implicitement un effet de dissuasion et est dictée par le montant minimal nécessaire pour rendre la faute non profitable.

Les réparations de restitution des gains illicites ne se limitent pas aux situations où elles servent une fin compensatoire. Une violation intéressée et délibérée; l'impossibilité pratique de calculer la perte; et l'intérêt légitime du demandeur à empêcher les activités lucratives du défendeur, y compris le cas où le défendeur a une obligation quasi-fiduciaire envers le demandeur, militent en faveur d'une réparation de restitution des gains illicites. Aucun facteur à lui seul n'est forcément décisif ou déterminant. Les prétentions que formulent les demandeurs dans leurs actes de procédure en l'espèce correspondent à plusieurs facteurs qui, s'ils sont établis au procès, pourraient donner lieu à une réparation de restitution des gains illicites, notamment le fait que les demandeurs étaient vulnérables à l'abus de pouvoir de la SLA et que la violation qu'a commise la SLA était intéressée, délibérée et de mauvaise foi. Le juge du procès pourrait aussi conclure qu'il est impossible en pratique de fixer le montant réellement perdu, puisque les ALV ne sont pas conçus pour créer des relevés identifiant les utilisateurs et les montants d'argent qu'ils ont perdu.

The plaintiffs have also pleaded a sufficient basis to support a claim for punitive damages. The focus of punitive damages is on the defendant's misconduct, not the plaintiff's loss, and injury to the plaintiff is not a condition precedent to an award of punitive damages. The plaintiffs have pleaded a breach of the duty of honest performance, which can constitute an actionable wrong to ground a claim for punitive damages.

With regard to certification, the class representative must show that there is some "basis in fact" that there is an identifiable class of two or more persons, that there is at least one common issue, and that the class action is the preferable procedure. This standard ensures that there is an evidentiary foundation to support the certification order.

The proposed class definition uses objective criteria that will allow for identification of those who can attest to playing the games, and there is a basis to believe that at least two persons will be able to establish that they paid ALC to gamble on VLT games during the proposed class period.

An issue is common where its resolution is necessary to the resolution of each class member's claim. The issues relating to breach of contract, disgorgement, and punitive damages are appropriate common issues, but the issue relating to aggregate monetary relief is not. On breach of contract, the pleadings assert a civil wrong that is common to each member of the class: whether the terms alleged by the plaintiffs are in fact implied, and whether the functioning of the VLTs routinely violates those terms, would be the same for every consumer. On disgorgement, determining whether the circumstances of this case are exceptional, such that other contractual remedies are inadequate, is a substantial ingredient of each member's claim and will benefit all members of the class. For punitive damages, ALC's conduct and the alleged breach of the duty of good faith would be common to all class members.

But there is no basis in fact to certify aggregate monetary relief as a common issue. Before making an award of disgorgement, the court must be satisfied that the breach of contract is causally connected to the gain to be

À l'égard de l'autorisation, le représentant du groupe doit établir l'existence d'un certain « fondement factuel » selon lequel il existe un groupe identifiable d'au moins deux personnes, il y a au moins une question commune, et le recours collectif est le meilleur moyen de régler les questions. Cette norme assure qu'il existe une preuve sur laquelle peut reposer l'ordonnance d'autorisation.

La définition du groupe proposée s'appuie sur des critères objectifs qui permettront l'identification des personnes qui peuvent attester avoir pris part aux jeux, et il existe des motifs de croire qu'au moins deux personnes seront capables d'établir qu'ils ont payé la SLA pour jouer à des jeux de hasard sur un ALV durant la période visée par le recours collectif.

Une question est commune lorsque sa résolution est nécessaire pour le règlement des demandes de chaque membre du groupe. Les questions relatives à la violation de contrat, à la restitution des gains illicites et aux dommages-intérêts punitifs sont des questions communes appropriées, mais la question relative aux mesures de redressement pécuniaire global ne l'est pas. Pour ce qui est de la violation de contrat, les actes de procédure invoquent une faute civile qui est commune à tous les membres du groupe : la question de savoir si les conditions qu'allèguent les demandeurs sont effectivement implicites, et celle de savoir si le fonctionnement des ALV viole systématiquement ces conditions, seront les mêmes pour chaque consommateur. Quant à la restitution des gains illicites, le fait d'établir si les circonstances de la présente affaire sont exceptionnelles, de sorte que les autres réparations contractuelles sont inadéquates, est un élément important de la demande de chaque membre et profitera à tous les membres du groupe. En ce qui a trait aux dommages-intérêts punitifs, la conduite de la SLA et le manquement allégué à l'obligation d'agir de bonne foi seraient des questions communes à tous les membres du groupe.

Toutefois, il n'y a pas de fondement factuel permettant de certifier le redressement pécuniaire global comme question commune. Avant d'accorder une réparation de restitution des gains illicites, le tribunal doit être convaincu disgorged. To ensure that ALC's total liability is limited to that flowing from the breach, some plausible methodology is needed to estimate ALC's liability from its breach of contract, including what its profits might have been had it not breached its contractual obligations. No methodology has been suggested.

Finally, with regard to preferability, the keystone of the plaintiffs' action is a deception common to each member of the class. Determining the content of a contract entered into by each member, and whether that contract was systematically breached, does not require individualized assessments and is more practical and efficient than individual actions. A class action has the potential to acknowledge, vindicate and protect individual players' contractual interest in a safe and fair game.

que la violation du contrat a un lien de causalité avec le gain à restituer. Pour faire en sorte que la responsabilité totale de la SLA se limite à celle découlant de la violation, il faut une méthode plausible pour estimer la responsabilité financière de la SLA au titre de sa violation de contrat, y compris ce qu'auraient été ses profits si elle n'avait pas violé ses obligations contractuelles. Or, aucune méthode n'a été proposée.

Enfin, eu égard à la question du meilleur moyen, la clé de voûte de l'action des demandeurs est une tromperie commune à tous les membres du groupe. Il est plus pratique et efficace de déterminer le contenu d'un contrat auquel est partie chaque membre et d'établir si le contrat a été systématiquement violé, que d'intenter des actions à titre individuel, et cette façon de faire n'exige pas d'évaluations individuelles. Un recours collectif a la possibilité de reconnaître, de défendre et de protéger l'intérêt contractuel de chaque joueur à jouer à un jeu sûr et juste.

I. Introduction

[2] The plaintiffs' essential claim is that VLTs are inherently dangerous and deceptive. Indeed, they say that VLTs are so deceptive that they contravene the Criminal Code's prohibition of games similar to "three-card monte" (Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, s. 206). Relying on three causes of action ("waiver of tort", breach of contract and unjust

Le juge Brown —

I. Introduction

enrichment), the plaintiffs seek a gain-based award, quantified by the profit ALC earned by licensing VLTs.[1]

[3] More particularly, and as to waiver of tort, the plaintiffs allege that ALC breached a duty to warn of the inherent dangers associated with VLTs, including the risk of addiction and suicidal ideation. This, they say, supports their claim in waiver of tort, which they also say is an independent cause of action that allows for a gain-based remedy to "be determined at trial of common issues without the involvement of any individual class member" (A.R., vol. II, at p. 104).

[4] As to the claim for breach of contract, the plaintiffs allege a contract arising from ALC's offer of VLTs to the public, and the plaintiffs' corresponding acceptance by paying to play. As an implied term of this contract, they say that ALC was required to provide safe games that were fit for use and of merchantable quality, to use reasonable skill and care in its provision of VLT gaming, and to act in good faith. ALC breached these terms, they say, by supplying deceptive VLTs.

[6] The plaintiffs succeeded in obtaining certification at the Supreme Court of Newfoundland and Labrador, and that result was substantially affirmed by the Newfoundland and Labrador Court of Appeal. In my respectful view, however, none of these claims d'action (« renonciation au recours délictuel », violation de contrat et enrichissement sans cause), les demandeurs sollicitent une réparation fondée sur les gains réalisés, calculée en fonction des profits que la SLA a touchés en accordant des licences d'utilisation des ALV[1].

[1] While the pleadings advance other causes of action, those claims were struck by the Newfoundland and Labrador Court of Appeal, and the plaintiffs have not cross-appealed that decision.

[3] Plus particulièrement, et pour ce qui est de la renonciation au recours délictuel, les demandeurs soutiennent que la SLA a manqué à son obligation de mise en garde contre les dangers inhérents aux ALV, notamment le risque de dépendance et d'idées suicidaires. C'est sur ce manquement, affirment-ils, que repose leur demande fondée sur la renonciation au recours délictuel qui, ajoutent-ils, est une cause d'action indépendante ouvrant droit à une réparation fondée sur les gains réalisés [TRADUCTION] « qui sera établie lors de l'instruction des questions communes sans la participation des membres du groupe » (d.a., vol. II, p. 104).

[4] Quant à la demande fondée sur la violation de contrat, les demandeurs affirment que le contrat en question existe du fait que la SLA offre des ALV au public et que les demandeurs acceptent en payant pour jouer. Selon eux, il découle implicitement de ce contrat que la SLA doit offrir des jeux sécuritaires qui sont propres à être utilisés et de qualité marchande, faire preuve d'une compétence et d'une diligence raisonnables lorsqu'elle fournit des jeux sur ALV, et agir de bonne foi. Ils soutiennent que la SLA a manqué à ces obligations en fournissant des ALV trompeurs.

have any reasonable chance of success. I would therefore allow the appeals, set aside the certification order, and strike the plaintiffs' claims against ALC.

II. Overview of Proceedings

A. Supreme Court of Newfoundland and Labrador — 2014 NLTD(G) 114, 356 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 293; 2016 NLTD(G) 216, 93 C.P.C. (7th) 307

[7] The matter came before the certification judge in the form of two applications: (1) ALC's application, made under r. 14.24(1)(a) of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1986, S.N.L. 1986, c. 42, Sch. D (2014 NLTD(G) 114, 356 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 293), to strike the plaintiffs' claim on the basis that it disclosed no reasonable cause of action, and (2) the plaintiffs' application for certification of their claim as a class action under the Class Actions Act, S.N.L. 2001, c. C-18.1. The parties agreed that the certification judge's decision on ALC's application would also determine whether the plaintiffs had satisfied the first criterion for certification in s. 5 of the Class Actions Act — that "the pleadings disclose a cause of action".

[8] The certification judge dismissed ALC's application, and further held that the plaintiffs had satisfied the requirements necessary for certification. In particular and because the plaintiffs intended to pursue a collective remedy (calculated on the basis of ALC's profits) without proving individual damage, he concluded that there were common issues among the class that would be better addressed through a class action.

B. Newfoundland and Labrador Court of Appeal — 2018 NLCA 71, 29 C.P.C. (8th) 1

[9] ALC appealed the certification judge's decisions on both applications. Writing for the majority, de ces demandes n'a de chance raisonnable d'être accueillie. Je serais donc d'avis d'accueillir les pourvois, d'annuler l'ordonnance autorisant l'exercice du recours collectif et de radier les demandes introduites à l'encontre de la SLA.

II. Aperçu des décisions des instances inférieures

A. Cour suprême de Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador — 2014 NLTD(G) 114, 356 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 293; 2016 NLTD(G) 216, 93 C.P.C. (7th) 307

[7] L'affaire a été soumise au juge d'autorisation sous la forme de deux demandes : (1) la demande de la SLA, fondée sur l'al. 14.24(1)(a) des Rules of the Supreme Court, 1986, S.N.L. 1986, c. 42, ann. D (2014 NLTD(G) 114, 356 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 293), visant à faire radier l'action des demandeurs au motif qu'elle ne révélait aucune cause d'action raisonnable, et (2) la demande présentée par les demandeurs visant l'autorisation d'exercer leur action à titre de recours collectif en vertu de la Class Actions Act, S.N.L. 2001, c. C-18.1. Les parties ont convenu que la décision rendue par le juge d'autorisation saisi de la demande de la SLA permettrait aussi d'établir si les demandeurs avaient satisfait au premier critère d'autorisation prévu à l'art. 5 de la Class Actions Act — soit que [TRADUCTION] « les actes de procédure révèlent une cause d'action ».

[8] Le juge a rejeté la demande de la SLA, concluant en outre que les demandeurs avaient satisfait aux conditions nécessaires à l'autorisation. Plus particulièrement, et parce que les demandeurs entendaient solliciter une réparation collective (calculée en fonction des profits réalisés par la SLA) sans prouver l'existence d'un préjudice individuel, il a conclu qu'il était préférable que certaines des questions communes aux membres du groupe soient tranchées dans le cadre d'un recours collectif.

B. Cour d'appel de Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador — 2018 NLCA 71, 29 C.P.C. (8th) 1

[9] La SLA a interjeté appel des décisions rendues sur les deux demandes par le juge saisi de la demande

Green J.A. substantially upheld the certification judge's conclusions, and allowed the plaintiffs' claims in waiver of tort, breach of contract and unjust enrichment to proceed to trial.

[10] Regarding waiver of tort, the majority concluded that the doctrine could operate as an independent cause of action for disgorgement, where it would serve the purpose of deterring wrongful conduct. Further, according to the majority, plaintiffs alleging negligence need not prove damage to establish an entitlement to disgorgement. All this led the majority to conclude that the plaintiffs' claim for waiver of tort — that is, for disgorgement as a remedy for negligence in the absence of demonstrated damage — disclosed a reasonable cause of action (paras. 185 and 189).

[11] Addressing the plaintiffs' allegations of criminal conduct, the majority concluded that expert evidence would be required to conclude whether VLTs are similar to three-card monte and therefore prohibited by s. 206 of the Criminal Code. Such claims, said the majority, would have to be determined at trial.

[12] Finally, the majority held that the pleaded facts, particularly considering the allegations of criminal conduct, could reasonably support a claim for disgorgement as a remedy for breach of contract. In view of its conclusion on waiver of tort as an independent cause of action, the majority found it unnecessary to address "issues raised in argument under the heading of unjust enrichment simpliciter, i.e. whether the pleading discloses a cause of action in unjust enrichment, calling for the application of the traditional three-part test set out in such cases d'autorisation. S'exprimant au nom des juges majoritaires, le juge Green a confirmé en grande partie les conclusions du juge d'autorisation et il a permis l'instruction des demandes fondées sur la renonciation au recours délictuel, la violation de contrat et l'enrichissement sans cause présentées par les demandeurs.

[13] In dissent, Welsh J.A. would have allowed ALC's appeal and struck all the claims. In her view, the claims in contract and tort did not have a reasonable chance of success given that the plaintiffs did not plead damage to individual plaintiffs; it was plain and obvious that VLTs were not similar to three-card monte; and, there was a juristic reason for ALC's enrichment at the expense of the plaintiffs.

III. Analysis

[14] ALC's application to strike relies on r. 14.24(1) of the Rules of the Supreme Court, which allows the court to strike any portion of a statement of claim that discloses no reasonable cause of action. The parties agree that determining whether any reasonable cause of action is disclosed in the plaintiffs' statement of claim will also satisfy the first requirement of the plaintiffs' application for certification. The test to be applied under both applications, therefore, is whether it is plain and obvious, assuming the facts pleaded to be true, that each of the plaintiffs' pleaded claims disclose no reasonable cause of action. Simply stated, if a claim has no reasonable prospect of success it should not be allowed to proceed to trial (R. v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., 2011 SCC 42, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 45, at para. 17).

[15] A central issue in this case arises from the plaintiffs' reliance on the doctrine of waiver of tort. The plaintiffs say that a claim relying on waiver of tort as an independent cause of action for disgorgement has at least a reasonable chance of succeeding at trial. Before the Court of Appeal's decision in this case, however, no Canadian authority had recognized such a cause of action, although the plaintiffs rely on a line of class action certification decisions in c.-à-d. à savoir si l'acte de procédure révèle une cause d'action fondée sur l'enrichissement sans cause, commandant l'application du critère traditionnel à trois volets énoncé dans des décisions comme [Garland c. Consumers' Gas Co., 2004 CSC 25, [2004] 1 R.C.S. 629] » (par. 230).

[13] Dissidente, la juge Welsh aurait accueilli l'appel de la SLA et radié toutes les demandes. À son avis, les demandes en responsabilité contractuelle et délictuelle n'avaient aucune chance raisonnable d'être accueillies étant donné que les demandeurs n'avaient pas fait valoir que, individuellement, ils avaient subi un préjudice; qu'il était évident et manifeste que les ALV n'étaient pas analogues au jeu de bonneteau; et qu'il y avait une cause juridique à l'enrichissement de la SLA aux dépens des demandeurs.

III. Analyse

[14] La requête en radiation présentée par la SLA est fondée sur le par. 14.24(1) des Rules of the Supreme Court, qui permet à la cour de radier toute partie d'une déclaration qui ne révèle aucune cause d'action raisonnable. Les parties conviennent que le fait d'établir si la déclaration des demandeurs révèle une cause d'action raisonnable satisfera aussi à la première condition de la demande d'autorisation des demandeurs. Le critère devant être appliqué dans le cas des deux demandes est donc celui de savoir s'il est évident et manifeste, dans l'hypothèse où les faits allégués seraient avérés, que chacune des demandes formulées par les demandeurs ne révèle aucune cause d'action raisonnable. En termes simples, si une demande n'a aucune possibilité raisonnable d'être accueillie, elle ne devrait pas pouvoir suivre son cours (R. c. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltée, 2011 CSC 42, [2011] 3 R.C.S. 45, par. 17).

[15] L'une des principales questions dans la présente affaire découle du recours par les demandeurs à la doctrine de la renonciation au recours délictuel. Ceux-ci affirment qu'une demande fondée sur la renonciation au recours délictuel en tant que cause d'action indépendante en restitution des gains illicites a au moins une chance raisonnable d'être accueillie au procès. Avant que la Cour d'appel ne rende sa décision en l'espèce, cependant, aucune which courts have refrained from finding that it is plain and obvious that such an action does not exist. The plaintiffs place significant emphasis on Pro-Sys Consultants Ltd. v. Microsoft Corporation, 2013 SCC 57, [2013] 3 S.C.R. 477 ("Microsoft"), where this Court, citing conflicting authorities on this point, declined to resolve it (para. 97).

[16] In my view, developments since Microsoft, and distinguishing features of this case, allow us to definitively resolve whether the novel cause of action proposed by the plaintiffs exists in Canadian law. I say so for four reasons.

[17] First, the argument in favour of recognizing the plaintiffs' novel cause of action relies on the relationship between the concept of waiver of tort and the broader law of restitution (or, as it is now more commonly referred to in Canada, the law of unjust enrichment). This area of our law has developed rapidly in recent years in ways that have deepened our understanding of unjust enrichment (see e.g. Moore v. Sweet, 2018 SCC 52, [2018] 3 S.C.R. 303; M. McInnes, The Canadian Law of Unjust Enrichment and Restitution (2014), at pp. vii-ix; J. D. McCamus, "Waiver of Tort: Is There a Limiting Principle?" (2014), 55 Can. Bus. L.J. 333, at p. 334; A. Burrows, The Law of Restitution (3rd ed. 2011), at pp. 3-9). More particularly, several commentators have, since Microsoft, made helpful contributions by specifically commenting on waiver of tort as an independent cause of action (see e.g. G. Weber, "Waiver of Tort: Disgorgement Ex Nihilo" (2014), 40 Queen's L.J. 389; S. Barton, M. Hines and S. Therien, "Neither Cause of Action nor Remedy: Doing Away with Waiver of Tort", in T. L. Archibald and R. S. Echlin, eds., Annual Review of Civil Litigation, 2015 (2015); E. M. Iacobucci and M. J. Trebilcock, "An Economic Analysis of Waiver of Tort in Negligence Actions" (2016), 66 U.T.L.J. 173). What was once seen as a state of legal autorité canadienne n'avait reconnu une telle cause d'action, bien que les demandeurs aient invoqué une série de décisions en matière d'autorisation de recours collectifs dans lesquelles les tribunaux se sont abstenus de conclure qu'il est évident et manifeste qu'une telle cause d'action n'existe pas. Les demandeurs accordent une importance considérable à l'arrêt Pro-Sys Consultants Ltd. c. Microsoft Corporation, 2013 CSC 57, [2013] 3 R.C.S. 477 (« Microsoft »), dans lequel la Cour, citant des décisions contradictoires sur le sujet, a refusé de trancher la question (par. 97).

[17] Premièrement, l'argument en faveur de la reconnaissance de la nouvelle cause d'action invoquée par les demandeurs repose sur le lien entre le concept de renonciation au recours délictuel et le droit plus général en matière de restitution (ou, comme on l'appelle maintenant communément au Canada, le droit relatif à l'enrichissement sans cause). Ce domaine de notre droit a rapidement évolué au cours des dernières années de manière à ce que nous ayons maintenant une compréhension plus approfondie de l'enrichissement sans cause (voir, p. ex., Moore c. Sweet, 2018 CSC 52, [2018] 3 R.C.S. 303; M. McInnes, The Canadian Law of Unjust Enrichment and Restitution (2014), p. vii-ix; J. D. McCamus, « Waiver of Tort : Is There a Limiting Principle? » (2014), 55 Rev. can. dr. comm. 333, p. 334; A. Burrows, The Law of Restitution (3e éd. 2011), p. 3-9). Plus particulièrement, plusieurs auteurs ont, depuis l'arrêt Microsoft, apporté des contributions utiles en s'exprimant expressément sur le sujet de la renonciation au recours délictuel en tant que cause d'action indépendante (voir, p. ex., G. Weber, « Waiver of Tort : Disgorgement Ex Nihilo » (2014), 40 Queen's L.J. 389; S. Barton, M. Hines et S. Therien, « Neither Cause of Action nor Remedy : Doing Away with Waiver of Tort », dans T. L. Archibald et R. S. Echlin, dir., Annual Review uncertainty at the time Microsoft was decided has been made clearer.

[18] Secondly, and since Microsoft was decided, this Court has recognized in Hryniak v. Mauldin, 2014 SCC 7, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 87, the need for a culture shift to promote "timely and affordable access to the civil justice system" (para. 2). Where possible, therefore, courts should resolve legal disputes promptly, rather than referring them to a full trial (paras. 24-25 and 32). This includes resolving questions of law by striking claims that have no reasonable chance of success (S. G. A. Pitel and M. B. Lerner, "Resolving Questions of Law: A Modern Approach to Rule 21" (2014), 43 Advocates' Q. 344, at pp. 351-52). Indeed, the power to strike hopeless claims is "a valuable housekeeping measure essential to effective and fair litigation" (Imperial Tobacco, at para. 19).

[19] Of course, it is not determinative on a motion to strike that the law has not yet recognized the particular claim. The law is not static, and novel claims that might represent an incremental development in the law should be allowed to proceed to trial (Imperial Tobacco, at para. 21; Das v. George Weston Ltd., 2018 ONCA 1053, 43 E.T.R. (4th) 173, at para. 73; see also R. v. Salituro, [1991] 3 S.C.R. 654, at p. 670). That said, a claim will not survive an application to strike simply because it is novel. It is beneficial, and indeed critical to the viability of civil justice and public access thereto that claims, including novel claims, which are doomed to fail be disposed of at an early stage in the proceedings. This is because such claims present "no legal justification for a protracted and expensive trial" (Syl Apps Secure Treatment Centre v. B.D., 2007 SCC 38, [2007] 3 S.C.R. 83, at para. 19). If a court would not recognize a novel claim when the facts as pleaded are taken to be true, the claim is plainly doomed to fail and should be struck. In making this determination, it is not uncommon for courts to resolve complex questions of of Civil Litigation, 2015 (2015); E. M. Iacobucci et M. J. Trebilcock, « An Economic Analysis of Waiver of Tort in Negligence Actions » (2016), 66 U.T.L.J. 173). Ce qui était considéré comme un état d'incertitude juridique à l'époque où l'arrêt Microsoft a été rendu est maintenant beaucoup plus clair.

law and policy (see e.g. Imperial Tobacco; Cooper v. Hobart, 2001 SCC 79, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 537; Syl Apps; Alberta v. Elder Advocates of Alberta Society, 2011 SCC 24, [2011] 2 S.C.R. 261).

[20] Lax J.'s observations in Andersen v. St. Jude Medical, Inc., 2012 ONSC 3660, are particularly apposite, as she heard arguments on the scope of waiver of tort after a 138-day trial. The circumstances did not require her to resolve the issue, but Lax J. observed that the parties "did not rely on any evidence . . . to support or oppose extending the waiver of tort doctrine to a negligence case", nor did the plaintiffs "lead any policy evidence to explain why waiver of tort should be available" (para. 585 (CanLII)). She concluded that "deciding the waiver of tort issue does not necessarily require a trial and that it may be possible to resolve the debate in some other way" (para. 587).

[21] Thirdly, failing to address whether an independent cause of action for waiver of tort exists will perpetuate an undesirable state of uncertainty. As Greg Weber writes, "[w]aiver of tort has become a hollow and internally inconsistent doctrine, leaving judges and litigants confused about how and when a cause of action might support disgorgement" (p. 392). Uncertainty about whether an action lies for disgorgement without proof of damage has significant ramifications, which are most apparent in the context of class actions. For 16 years since Serhan (Estate Trustee) v. Johnson & Johnson (2004), 72 O.R. (3d) 296 (S.C.), such claims have been commonly advanced but never fully tried. In the meantime, certification judges have had "little alternative but to affirm that the question of the doctrine's availability is indeed a live issue for trial, which can and does result in certification to the detriment of the defendant, who is then practically compelled to pay a settlement to the plaintiff" (J. M. Martin, "Waiver of Tort: An Historical and Practical Survey" (2012), 52 Can. Bus. L.J. 473, at p. 476 (footnote omitted);

Il n'est pas rare qu'en rendant de telles décisions, les tribunaux règlent des questions complexes de droit et de principe (voir, p. ex., Imperial Tobacco; Cooper c. Hobart, 2001 CSC 79, [2001] 3 R.C.S. 537; Syl Apps; Alberta c. Elder Advocates of Alberta Society, 2011 CSC 24, [2011] 2 R.C.S. 261).

[21] Troisièmement, le fait de ne pas se prononcer sur l'existence d'une cause d'action indépendante pour renonciation au recours délictuel perpétuera un état d'incertitude non souhaitable. Comme l'écrit Greg Weber : [TRADUCTION] « [l]a renonciation au recours délictuel est devenue une doctrine vide de sens et intrinsèquement contradictoire, à tel point que les juges et les parties ne savent ni comment ni quand une cause d'action peut ouvrir droit à la restitution des gains illicites » (p. 392). L'incertitude quant à savoir si une action en restitution des gains illicites peut être intentée en l'absence de preuve de préjudice a des conséquences importantes, qui ressortent davantage dans le contexte des recours collectifs. Au cours des 16 années qui ont suivi la décision Serhan (Estate Trustee) c. Johnson & Johnson (2004), 72 O.R. (3d) 296 (C.S.), de telles demandes ont souvent été introduites, mais n'ont jamais été instruites au fond. Pendant ce temps, les juges saisis d'une demande d'autorisation n'avaient [TRADUCTION] « d'autres choix que de dire que la question du recours à la doctrine est effectivement une question devant être see also H. M. Rosenberg, "Waiving Goodbye: The Rise and Imminent Fall of Waiver of Tort in Class Proceedings" (2010), 6 Can. Class Action Rev. 37, at p. 38). Indeed, this Court's decision to refrain from striking the waiver of tort claim in Microsoft has been taken as an affirmative statement that such claims are viable (see e.g. C.A. Reasons, at para. 182; Ewert v. Nippon Yusen Kabushiki Kaisha, 2019 BCCA 187, 25 B.C.L.R. (6th) 268, at para. 73; Authentic T-Shirt Co. ULC v. King, 2016 BCCA 59, at paras. 41-42 (CanLII)). Nothing is gained, and much court time and considerable litigant resources are lost, by leaving this issue unresolved.

[22] Finally, while waiver of tort as a novel cause of action was not a central issue in Microsoft, it is in the present appeals. The Court of Appeal accordingly canvassed the law comprehensively, and concluded not only that the plaintiffs' claim should proceed to trial, but that waiver of tort should be definitively recognized as an independent cause of action. On appeal to this Court, the parties and interveners have similarly devoted substantial attention to the issue. The question is therefore ripe for decision, and these appeals presents an appropriate vehicle for deciding it.

A. Disgorgement for Tortious Wrongdoing

(1) Disgorgement As a Novel Cause of Action

[23] As I discuss below, the term "waiver of tort" is confusing, and should be abandoned. The concern is not for consistent terminology for its own sake, but rather for clarity of meaning: cases dealing with tranchée à l'issue d'un procès, qui peut donner lieu, et qui donne effectivement lieu, à une autorisation au détriment du défendeur, qui est alors à toutes fins pratiques contraint de verser une somme à titre de règlement au demandeur » (J. M. Martin, « Waiver of Tort : An Historical and Practical Survey » (2012), 52 Rev. can. dr. comm. 473, p. 476 (note en bas de page omise); voir aussi H. M. Rosenberg, « Waiving Goodbye : The Rise and Imminent Fall of Waiver of Tort in Class Proceedings » (2010), 6 Rev. Can. R. C. 37, p. 38). De fait, la décision de la Cour de s'abstenir de radier la demande relative à la renonciation au recours délictuel dans l'arrêt Microsoft a été considérée comme une confirmation de la viabilité de telles demandes (voir, p. ex., les motifs de la C.A., par. 182; Ewert c. Nippon Yusen Kabushiki Kaisha, 2019 BCCA 187, 25 B.C.L.R. (6th) 268, par. 73; Authentic T-Shirt Co. ULC c. King, 2016 BCCA 59, par. 41-42 (CanLII)). Laisser cette question en suspens fait perdre beaucoup de temps aux tribunaux ainsi que des ressources importantes aux parties en litige, et il n'y a là rien à gagner.

[22] Enfin, même si la renonciation au recours délictuel à titre de nouvelle cause d'action n'était pas une question centrale dans l'arrêt Microsoft, elle l'est dans les présents pourvois. En conséquence, la Cour d'appel a examiné de manière exhaustive le droit applicable et a conclu non seulement que l'action des demandeurs devait faire l'objet d'une instruction, mais aussi que la renonciation au recours délictuel devrait être définitivement reconnue à titre de cause d'action indépendante. En appel devant la Cour, les parties et les intervenants ont de la même façon accordé beaucoup d'attention à la question. Celle-ci est donc mûre pour une décision, et les présents pourvois offrent l'occasion de la trancher.

A. Restitution des gains illicites pour faute délictueuse

(1) Restitution des gains illicites en tant que nouvelle cause d'action

gain-based remedies tend to employ inconsistent nomenclature that leads to confused and confusing results. Even the term "restitution" has been applied inconsistently, sometimes referring to the causative event of unjust enrichment and sometimes referring to a measure of relief (McInnes (2014), at pp. 10-11). In my view, restitution properly describes the latter — meaning, restitution is the law's remedial answer to circumstances in which a benefit moves from the plaintiff to the defendant, and the defendant is compelled to restore that benefit. Further, restitution stands in contrast to another measure of relief, disgorgement, which refers to awards that are calculated exclusively by reference to the defendant's wrongful gain, irrespective of whether it corresponds to damage suffered by the plaintiff and, indeed, irrespective of whether the plaintiff suffered damage at all (McInnes (2014), at p. 11-12; see also L. D. Smith, "The Province of the Law of Restitution" (1992), 71 Can. Bar Rev. 672; J. Edelman, Gain-Based Damages: Contract, Tort, Equity and Intellectual Property (2002), at pp. 65-93). While this Court's decisions have occasionally referred to disgorgement variously as "restitution damages" or "restitution for wrongdoing", the ambiguity inherent in such terminology calls for greater precision (see e.g. Bank of America Canada v. Mutual Trust Co., 2002 SCC 43, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 601, at para. 25; Kingstreet Investments Ltd. v. New Brunswick (Finance), 2007 SCC 1, [2007] 1 S.C.R. 3, at para. 33).

tant que fin en soi, mais plutôt à la clarté du sens : les affaires portant sur des réparations fondées sur les gains réalisés tendent à employer une terminologie incohérente, ce qui crée de la confusion. Même le terme « restitution » n'est pas employé de manière uniforme, référant parfois à l'élément causal de l'enrichissement sans cause et parfois à une mesure de réparation (McInnes (2014), p. 10-11). À mon avis, la restitution correspond à cette dernière définition — c'est-à-dire que la restitution est la mesure réparatrice applicable en droit lorsque l'avantage qu'avait le demandeur passe au défendeur, et que ce dernier est tenu de remettre cet avantage. Par ailleurs, la restitution se distingue d'une autre mesure de réparation, la restitution des gains illicites, qui s'entend d'une somme octroyée calculée exclusivement en fonction du gain illicite du défendeur, qu'elle corresponde ou non au préjudice subi par le demandeur et, de fait, que le demandeur ait même subi un préjudice ou non (McInnes (2014), p. 11-12; voir aussi L. D. Smith, « The Province of the Law of Restitution » (1992), 71 Can. Bar Rev. 672; J. Edelman, Gain-Based Damages : Contract, Tort, Equity and Intellectual Property (2002), p. 65-93). Bien que dans les décisions de la Cour, la restitution des gains illicites soit parfois appelée « restitution de l'avantage obtenu » ou « restitution consécutive à un acte fautif », l'ambiguïté inhérente à cette terminologie commande une plus grande précision (voir, p. ex., Banque d'Amérique du Canada c. Société de Fiducie Mutuelle, 2002 CSC 43, [2002] 2 R.C.S. 601, par. 25; Kingstreet Investments Ltd. c. Nouveau-Brunswick (Finances), 2007 CSC 1, [2007] 1 R.C.S. 3, par. 33).

required), while restitution is awarded in response to the causative event of unjust enrichment (most recently discussed by this Court in Moore), where there is correspondence between the defendant's gain and the plaintiff's deprivation (Edelman, at pp. 80-86).

[25] Here, the plaintiffs seek disgorgement, not restitution: they say that they are entitled to a remedy quantified solely on the basis of ALC's gain, without reference to damage that any of them may have suffered. There are two schools of thought on where disgorgement fits in the overall legal structure of private obligations. The prevailing view is consistent with that which I have just stated. Disgorgement, as a gain-based remedy, is precisely that: a remedy, awarded in certain circumstances upon the plaintiff satisfying all the constituent elements of one or more of various causes of action (specifically, breach of a duty in tort, contract, or equity).

[26] Some scholars, however, see disgorgement as an independent cause of action, which addresses unjust enrichment but does not operate on the same basis as the principled unjust enrichment framework adopted by this Court (P. D. Maddaugh and J. D. McCamus, The Law of Restitution (loose-leaf), vol. 1, at pp. 3-4 to 3-7; see also J. Beatson, "The Nature of Waiver of Tort" (1978-1979), 17 U.W.O. L. Rev. 1; D. Friedmann, "Restitution for Wrongs: The Basis of Liability", in W. R. Cornish et al., eds., Restitution: Past, Present and Future: Essays in Honour of Gareth Jones (1998), 133). And a handful of them have suggested that it should be possible to pursue a remedy of disgorgement in cases that are akin to negligence, but where the plaintiff cannot prove — or chooses not to prove — resulting damage (McCamus; C. Jones, "Panacea or Pandemic: Comparing 'Equitable Waiver of Tort' to 'Aggregate Liability' in Cases of Mass Torts with Indeterminate Causation" (2016), 2 Can. J. of Compar. & Contemp.

seulement que le défendeur ait obtenu un avantage (sans qu'il soit nécessaire de prouver que le demandeur a subi un appauvrissement), alors que la restitution est accordée en réponse à l'élément causal d'un enrichissement sans cause (analysé récemment par la Cour dans l'arrêt Moore), lorsque le gain réalisé par le défendeur correspond à l'appauvrissement subi par le demandeur (Edelman, p. 80-86).

[26] Certains auteurs voient cependant la restitution des gains illicites comme une cause d'action indépendante qui permet de remédier à l'enrichissement sans cause mais qui n'a pas le même fondement que le cadre d'analyse adopté en ce domaine par la Cour (P. D. Maddaugh et J. D. McCamus, The Law of Restitution (feuilles mobiles), vol. 1, p. 3-4 à 3-7; voir aussi J. Beatson, « The Nature of Waiver of Tort » (1978-1979), 17 U.W.O. L. Rev. 1; D. Friedmann, « Restitution for Wrongs : The Basis of Liability », dans W. R. Cornish et autres, dir., Restitution : Past, Present and Future : Essays in Honour of Gareth Jones (1998), 133). De plus, quelques-uns d'entre eux ont suggéré qu'il devrait être possible de demander la restitution des gains illicites dans les affaires qui s'apparentent à de la négligence, mais où le demandeur ne peut prouver — ou choisit de ne pas prouver — qu'il a subi un préjudice (McCamus; C. Jones, « Panacea or Pandemic : Comparing "Equitable Waiver of Tort"

L. 301). The plaintiffs' waiver of tort claim relies on this latter proposition.

[27] As I will explain, disgorgement should be viewed as an alternative remedy for certain forms of wrongful conduct, not as an independent cause of action. This view follows naturally from the historical origins of unjust enrichment and gain-based remedies more generally.

[29] Where a tort was made out but the plaintiff chose to pursue a claim in assumpsit to recover the defendant's ill-gotten gains, the plaintiff was said to "waive the tort" (Edelman, at pp. 121-22). Despite its early acceptance, however, the term waiver of tort was a misnomer. Rather than forgiving or waiving the wrongfulness of the defendant's conduct, plaintiffs relying on the doctrine were simply electing to pursue an alternative, gain-based, remedy (Edelman, at p. 122; see also United Australia, Ltd. v. Barclays to "Aggregate Liability" in Cases of Mass Torts with Indeterminate Causation » (2016), 2 Can. J. of Compar. & Contemp. L. 301). La demande fondée sur la renonciation au recours délictuel présentée par les demandeurs s'appuie sur cette dernière proposition.

[28] Le droit moderne en matière d'enrichissement sans cause tire son origine du bref d'assumpsit (Peel (Municipalité régionale) c. Canada, [1992] 3 R.C.S. 762, p. 786-788). Le recours au bref d'assumpsit permettait aux demandeurs d'échapper aux restrictions imposées par les autres formes d'action, qui auraient pu empêcher leur action de suivre son cours (McInnes (2014), p. 34; Martin, p. 482-484). Même si le bref reposait sur la prémisse que le défendeur s'était engagé à verser une somme d'argent au demandeur et qu'il n'avait pas respecté sa promesse, le recours spécial indebitatus assumpsit permettait aux demandeurs de profiter des avantages de l'assumpsit alors qu'un tel engagement n'existait pas vraiment. Il créait la fiction juridique d'un contrat implicite, qui permettait aux demandeurs d'intenter une action en assumpsit, [TRADUCTION] « même lorsque l'imputation d'une promesse de payer était absurde, comme lorsque le défendeur a tiré un avantage de la perpétration d'un délit » (McInnes (2014), p. 34-35; voir aussi Martin, p. 489-496).

[29] Lorsque le délit avait été établi mais que le demandeur avait choisi de recourir au bref d'assumpsit pour recouvrer les gains illicites réalisés par le défendeur, il était réputé avoir [TRADUCTION] « renoncé au recours délictuel » (Edelman, p. 121-122). Bien qu'il soit accepté depuis longtemps, le terme renonciation au recours délictuel est inexact. Plutôt que de pardonner au défendeur sa conduite fautive ou de fermer les yeux sur le caractère fautif de celle-ci, le demandeur qui invoquait la doctrine choisissait simplement de Bank Ltd., [1941] A.C. 1 (H.L.), at pp. 13 and 18). The doctrine always operated as "nothing more than a choice between possible remedies", and not as an independent cause of action (United Australia, at p. 13; Martin, at pp. 504-5). That this is so is apparent from decisions of this Court, including Arrow Transfer Co. Ltd. v. Royal Bank of Canada, [1972] S.C.R. 845, where Laskin J. (as he then was), for the majority on this point, held that the plaintiff's claim for a gain-based remedy was dependent on the tort of conversion having been completed (p. 877).

[30] Two points follow from this. First, and as this case demonstrates, the term waiver of tort is apt to generate confusion and should therefore be abandoned (Edelman, at p. 122). Secondly, and relatedly, in order to make out a claim for disgorgement, a plaintiff must first establish actionable misconduct.

[31] Recognizing that disgorgement is simply a remedy for certain forms of wrongful conduct places the central issue in this case in context. By pleading disgorgement as an independent cause of action, the plaintiffs seek to establish an entirely new category of wrongful conduct — one that is akin to negligence but does not require proof of damage. Supporters of this type of claim assert that "there is simply no reason in principle why the rules for compensatory damages need to be identical to the rules for disgorgement" (McCamus, at p. 359) and that, given that the purpose of granting disgorgement is to deter wrongful conduct rather than to provide compensation, there is no reason to require proof of damage (p. 354).

demander une réparation subsidiaire, fondée sur les gains réalisés (Edelman, p. 122; voir aussi United Australia, Ltd. c. Barclays Bank Ltd., [1941] A.C. 1 (H.L.), p. 13 et 18). La doctrine s'est toujours appliquée comme [TRADUCTION] « un simple choix entre des réparations possibles », et non comme une cause d'action indépendante (United Australia, p. 13; Martin, p. 504-505). C'est ce qui ressort des décisions de la Cour, dont l'arrêt Arrow Transfer Co. Ltd. c. Banque Royale du Canada, [1972] R.C.S. 845, où le juge Laskin (plus tard juge en chef), s'exprimant au nom des juges majoritaires sur ce point, a conclu que l'action du demandeur visant une réparation fondée sur les gains réalisés reposait sur la perpétration du délit de détournement (p. 877).

[31] Reconnaître que la restitution des gains illicites est simplement une réparation pour certaines formes de comportement fautif met en contexte la question se trouvant au cœur de la présente affaire. En plaidant la restitution des gains illicites en tant que cause d'action indépendante, les demandeurs cherchent à créer une toute nouvelle catégorie de comportement fautif — qui s'apparente à la négligence mais qui n'exige pas de preuve de l'existence d'un préjudice. Les tenants de ce type d'action affirment [TRADUCTION] « [qu']il n'y a tout simplement aucune raison de principe pour laquelle les règles applicables à l'octroi de dommages-intérêts compensatoires devraient être identiques à celles de la restitution des gains illicites » (McCamus, p. 359) et que, étant donné que la restitution des gains illicites vise à décourager les comportements fautifs plutôt qu'à fournir une indemnisation, il n'y a aucune raison d'exiger une preuve de préjudice (p. 354).

But it is a far leap to find that disgorgement without proof of damage is available as a general proposition in response to a defendant's negligent conduct. Determining the appropriate remedy for negligence, where liability for negligence has not already been established, is futile and even nonsensical since doing so allows "the remedy tail [to] wag the liability dog" (Haida Nation v. British Columbia (Minister of Forests), 2004 SCC 73, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 511, at para. 55). This observation applies with no less force to the plaintiff who seeks disgorgement, since the availability of gain-based relief lies in "aligning the remedy with the injustice it corrects" (E. J. Weinrib, "Restitutionary Damages as Corrective Justice" (2000), 1 Theor. Inq. L. 1, at p. 23 (emphasis added)).

[33] It is therefore important to consider what it is that makes a defendant's negligent conduct wrongful. As this Court has maintained, "[a] defendant in an action in negligence is not a wrongdoer at large: he is a wrongdoer only in respect of the damage which he actually causes to the plaintiff" (Clements v. Clements, 2012 SCC 32, [2012] 2 S.C.R. 181, at para. 16). There is no right to be free from the prospect of damage; there is only a right not to suffer damage that results from exposure to unreasonable risk (E. J. Weinrib, The Idea of Private Law (rev. ed. 2012), at pp. 153 and 157-58; R. Stevens, Torts and Rights (2007), at pp. 44-45 and 99). In other words, negligence "in the air" — the mere creation of risk — is not wrongful conduct. Granting disgorgement for negligence without proof of damage would result in a remedy "arising out of legal nothingness" (Weber, at p. 424). It would be a radical and uncharted development, "[giving] birth to a new tort over night" (Barton, Hines and Therien, at p. 147).

[34] The difficulty is not just normative, although it is at least that. The practical difficulty associated with recognizing an action in negligence without

[33] Par conséquent, il est important de se demander ce qui fait que la conduite négligente d'un défendeur est fautive. Comme l'a dit la Cour : « [l]e défendeur à une action en négligence n'est pas l'auteur d'un tort en général; il est uniquement l'auteur du préjudice qu'il cause réellement au demandeur » (Clements c. Clements, 2012 CSC 32, [2012] 2 R.C.S. 181, par. 16). Le droit d'être à l'abri de l'éventualité d'un préjudice n'existe pas; il existe seulement un droit de ne pas subir de préjudice découlant de l'exposition à un risque déraisonnable (E. J. Weinrib, The Idea of Private Law (éd. rév. 2012), p. 153 et 157-158; R. Stevens, Torts and Rights (2007), p. 44-45 et 99). En d'autres mots, de « simples rumeurs » de négligence — la simple création d'un risque — ne constituent pas un comportement fautif. Accorder la restitution des gains illicites pour cause de négligence sans preuve de préjudice donnerait lieu à une réparation [TRADUCTION] « issue d'un néant juridique » (Weber, p. 424). Ce serait là un changement radical tout à fait nouveau, [TRADUCTION] « [donnant] naissance du jour au lendemain à un nouveau délit » (Barton, Hines et Therien, p. 147).

[34] La difficulté est à tout le moins normative, mais elle n'est pas que ça. La difficulté pratique que pose la reconnaissance d'une action en négligence proof of damage becomes apparent in considering how such a claim would operate. As the Court of Appeal recognized, a claim for disgorgement available to any plaintiff placed within the ambit of risk generated by the defendant would entitle any one plaintiff to the full gain realized by the defendant. No answer is given as to why any particular plaintiff is entitled to recover the whole of the defendant's gain. Yet, corrective justice, the basis for recovery in tort, demands just that: an explanation as to why the plaintiff is the party entitled to a remedy (Clements, at para. 7; Weinrib (2000), at pp. 1-7). Tort law does not treat plaintiffs "merely as a convenient conduit of social consequences" but rather as "someone to whom damages are owed to correct the wrong suffered" (Weinrib (2000), at p. 6). A cause of action that promotes a race to recover by awarding a windfall to the first plaintiff who arrives at the courthouse steps undermines this foundational principle of tort law.

sans preuve de préjudice devient apparente lorsqu'on s'attarde au fonctionnement d'une telle action. Comme l'a reconnu la Cour d'appel, la possibilité pour tout demandeur exposé au risque généré par le défendeur de demander la restitution des gains illicites permettrait à tout demandeur d'avoir droit à tous les gains réalisés par le défendeur. Aucune réponse n'est donnée à la question de savoir pourquoi un demandeur précis est autorisé à recouvrer l'ensemble des gains réalisés par le défendeur. Pourtant, la justice réparatrice, le fondement de l'indemnisation en matière délictuelle, exige précisément cela : une explication quant aux raisons pour lesquelles le demandeur est la partie qui a droit à la réparation (Clements, par. 7; Weinrib (2000), p. 1-7). En droit de la responsabilité délictuelle, les demandeurs ne sont pas considérés comme de [TRADUCTION] « simples intermédiaires pratiques de conséquences sociales », mais plutôt comme « des personnes à qui des dommages-intérêts sont dus pour réparer le tort causé » (Weinrib (2000), p. 6). Une cause d'action qui favorise une course au recouvrement, en accordant un gain fortuit au premier demandeur qui se présente en cour, mine ce principe fondamental du droit de la responsabilité délictuelle.

[35] This is not the type of incremental change that falls within the remit of courts applying the common law (Salituro, at p. 670). It follows that the novel cause of action proposed by the plaintiffs has no reasonable chance of succeeding at trial.

[35] Ce n'est pas le type de changement progressif qui relève de la compétence des tribunaux appliquant la common law (Salituro, p. 670). Il s'ensuit que la nouvelle cause d'action proposée par les demandeurs n'a aucune chance raisonnable d'être accueillie au procès.

(2) Disgorgement for the Completed Tort of Negligence

(2) Restitution des gains illicites pour délit complet de négligence

[36] The Court of Appeal majority concluded that, even if disgorgement for wrongdoing is not an independent cause of action, the plaintiffs have adequately pleaded the elements of the tort of negligence, and may therefore seek disgorgement for tortious wrongdoing on that basis. While disgorgement for tortious wrongdoing was initially applied only in the context of proprietary torts, including conversion, deceit, and trespass, it found broader application in the late 20th century (Martin, at pp. 505-6). It has even been suggested that disgorgement may be available for negligence in certain circumstances, and the issue remains unsettled (Edelman, at pp. 129-30; C.-M. O'Hagan, "Remedies", in L. N. Klar et al., eds., Remedies in Tort (loose-leaf), vol. 4, at §200). While that may have to be decided in an appropriate case, as I will explain the plaintiffs have not adequately pleaded a claim in negligence, and it is unnecessary to resolve the question here.

[37] Causation of damage is a required element of the tort of negligence. As I have explained, the conduct of a defendant in negligence is wrongful only to the extent that it causes damage (Clements, at para. 16). While the plaintiffs allege that ALC had a duty to warn of the inherent dangers associated with VLTs, including the risk of addiction and suicide, those dangers are not alleged to have materialized. The plaintiffs do not allege that proper warnings would have caused them to spend less money playing VLTs or to avoid them altogether.

[38] It follows that I respectfully disagree with Court of Appeal's conclusion that the plaintiffs would not be "precluded from leading evidence that the breach of duty (assuming it can be proven) led to some form of injury" (para. 186). Again, causation of damage is a required element of the cause of action of negligence, and it must be pleaded. Here, not only have the plaintiffs not pleaded causation, their pleadings expressly disclaim any intention of doing so. The absence of a pleading of causation, they acknowledge, arises from an intentional litigation strategy to increase the likelihood of obtaining certification of their action as a class action by avoiding having to prove individual damage. This particular claim also has no reasonable chance of success.

laissé entendre que la restitution des gains illicites pourrait être disponible en cas de négligence dans certaines circonstances, et la question n'a pas encore été réglée (Edelman, p. 129-130; C.-M. O'Hagan, « Remedies », dans L. N. Klar et autres, dir., Remedies in Tort (feuilles mobiles), vol. 4, §200). Bien que cette question puisse devoir être tranchée dans le cadre d'une affaire qui s'y prête, comme je vais l'expliquer, les demandeurs n'ont pas valablement plaidé la négligence, et il est inutile de trancher la question en l'espèce.

[37] Le fait de causer un préjudice est un élément requis du délit de négligence. Comme je l'ai expliqué, la conduite du défendeur à une action en négligence n'est fautive que dans la mesure où elle cause un préjudice (Clements, par. 16). Bien que les demandeurs soutiennent que la SLA avait une obligation de mise en garde contre les dangers inhérents aux ALV, notamment le risque de dépendance et de suicide, il n'est pas allégué que ces dangers se sont concrétisés. Les demandeurs ne font pas valoir que, grâce à une mise en garde adéquate, ils auraient dépensé moins d'argent en jouant sur des ALV ou encore qu'ils les auraient complètement évités.

[38] Par conséquent, je ne peux souscrire à la conclusion de la Cour d'appel portant que [TRADUCTION] « rien n'empêcherait [les demandeurs] de présenter des éléments de preuve montrant que le manquement à l'obligation (à supposer qu'il puisse être prouvé) a causé un certain préjudice » (par. 186). Je répète que le fait de causer un préjudice est un élément requis de la cause d'action en négligence, et qu'il doit être invoqué. En l'espèce, non seulement les demandeurs n'ont pas allégué avoir subi un préjudice, mais leurs actes de procédure mentionnent expressément qu'ils n'ont pas l'intention de le faire. Ils reconnaissent que l'absence d'allégation de préjudice découle d'une stratégie intentionnelle visant à accroître la probabilité d'obtenir l'autorisation d'exercer leur action en tant que recours collectif en évitant d'avoir à prouver le préjudice individuel. Cette demande n'a pas non plus de chance raisonnable d'être accueillie.

B. Alleged Criminal Conduct

[39] The plaintiffs further allege that the Criminal Code prohibits the operation of VLTs. While breach of statute is not a recognized cause of action (R. in right of Canada v. Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, [1983] 1 S.C.R. 205, at p. 225), the allegations of criminal conduct are intended to serve two purposes. First, the plaintiffs say that the presence of criminal conduct warrants exceptional relief for breach of contract, specifically disgorgement or punitive damages. Secondly, the plaintiffs argue that, if ALC's conduct is criminal, there is no juristic reason for ALC's enrichment at the plaintiffs' expense, which grounds their claim in unjust enrichment.

[40] The plaintiffs' argument is that VLTs are so inherently deceptive that they should be considered a game "similar to" three-card monte within the meaning of s. 206 of the Criminal Code, which states in part:

206 (1) Every person is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term of not more than two years . . . who

(g) induces any person to stake or hazard any money or other valuable property or thing on the result of any dice game, three-card monte, punch board, coin table or on the operation of a wheel of fortune;

(2) In this section, three-card monte means the game commonly known as three-card monte and includes any other game that is similar to it, whether or not the game is played with cards and notwithstanding the number of cards or other things that are used for the purpose of playing.

While s. 207(1)(a) of the Criminal Code exempts provincial lottery schemes from most gaming and betting prohibitions, that exemption does not extend

B. Allégation de conduite criminelle

206 (1) Est coupable d'un acte criminel passible d'un emprisonnement maximal de deux ans [. . .] quiconque, selon le cas :

g) décide une personne à risquer ou hasarder de l'argent ou quelque autre bien ou chose de valeur sur le résultat d'un jeu de dés, d'un jeu de bonneteau, d'une planchette à poinçonner, d'une table à monnaie, ou sur le fonctionnement d'une roue de fortune;

(2) Au présent article, bonneteau s'entend du jeu communément appelé « three-card monte »; y est assimilé tout autre jeu analogue, qu'il soit joué avec des cartes ou non et nonobstant le nombre de cartes ou autres choses utilisées dans le dessein de jouer.

Bien que l'al. 207(1)a) du Code criminel fasse bénéficier d'une exception les systèmes de loterie provinciaux relativement à la plupart des interdictions to three-card monte (s. 207(4)(a)). Thus, the argument goes, if VLTs are games similar to three-card monte, their operation would be unlawful, even through a provincial lottery scheme.

[41] It is well-settled that statutory interpretation requires discerning legislative intent by examining statutory text in its entire context and in its grammatical and ordinary sense, in harmony with the statute's scheme and objects. In determining what games can be considered "similar to" three-card monte, I also bear in mind that courts cannot create common law crimes through an act of judicial interpretation (R. v. D.L.W., 2016 SCC 22, [2016] 1 S.C.R. 402, at para. 3).

[42] The Court of Appeal concluded that expert evidence is required to determine the essence of three-card monte, which would then be used to evaluate whether VLTs share three-card monte's essential features (para. 208). I find myself in respectful disagreement with that conclusion. While expert evidence may assist in deciding whether the defined elements of an offence are made out on the facts of a particular charge, expert evidence cannot purport to define the elements of an offence (R. v. Levkovic, 2013 SCC 25, [2013] 2 S.C.R. 204, at para. 73). While permissible expert evidence might therefore describe the features of VLTs for the purpose of establishing similarity, it is a court's role, and only a court's role, to discern Parliament's intention in prohibiting games "similar to" three-card monte.

[43] Beginning with the text of the prohibition, I observe that s. 206(2) refers to "the game commonly known as three-card monte". The Canadian Oxford Dictionary (2nd ed. 2004) defines "three-card monte" as a game played with three cards where "players bet on which of three cards lying face down is the queen." Similarly, and shortly before Parliament enacted this Criminal Code prohibition, the Quebec Court of Appeal described three-card monte as "a game played with three cards . . . shuffled or manipulated by the dealer and placed face down and the opponent backs his ability to spot the en matière de jeux et de paris, cette exception ne s'applique pas au jeu de bonneteau (al. 207(4)a)). Ainsi, selon cet argument, si les ALV sont des jeux analogues au jeu de bonneteau, leur exploitation serait illégale, même si elle relève d'un système de loterie provincial.

[42] La Cour d'appel a conclu qu'une preuve d'expert est nécessaire pour savoir ce qui constitue l'essence du jeu de bonneteau, pour pouvoir ensuite évaluer si les ALV partagent les mêmes caractéristiques essentielles que celui-ci (par. 208). En toute déférence, je ne suis pas de cet avis. Bien qu'elle puisse aider la cour à décider si les éléments constitutifs d'une infraction sont établis pour une accusation en particulier, la preuve d'expert ne peut servir à définir les éléments d'une infraction (R. c. Levkovic, 2013 CSC 25, [2013] 2 R.C.S. 204, par. 73). Même si la preuve d'expert admissible peut en conséquence décrire les caractéristiques des ALV en vue d'établir les similarités avec le jeu de bonneteau, il appartient à la cour, et seulement à celle-ci, de dégager l'intention qu'avait le législateur en interdisant les jeux « analogues » au bonneteau.

[43] Si je commence par le libellé de l'interdiction, je constate que le par. 206(2) renvoie au « jeu communément appelé "three-card monte" ». Le Canadian Oxford Dictionary (2e éd. 2004) définit le « three-card monte » comme un jeu qui se joue avec trois cartes [TRADUCTION] « où les joueurs parient sur une des trois cartes placées face cachée qu'ils croient être la reine ». De même, et peu avant que le Parlement ait adopté cette interdiction du Code criminel, la Cour d'appel du Québec a décrit le bonneteau comme [TRADUCTION] « un jeu qui se joue avec trois cartes [. . .] brassées ou manipulées par le position of a particular card" (The King v. Rosen and Lavoie (1920), 61 D.L.R. 500 (Que. C.A.), at pp. 502-3).

[44] Section 206(2)'s text has a wider reach, however, capturing "similar" games, "whether or not the game is played with cards and notwithstanding the number of cards or other things that are used for the purpose of playing". The plaintiffs contend that this expanded definition is meant to capture all games of a broadly deceptive nature. In my view, however, it is apparent from the historical background, from statements indicating why the provision was introduced, and from the text of the provision itself, viewed in its surrounding context that this prohibition does not reach so far.

[45] The state of the law prior to this provision's enactment lends important insight into its purpose. In Rosen and Lavoie, the Quebec Court of Appeal held that three-card monte did not constitute a contravention of the Criminal Code's cheating at play offence (s. 209). Shortly thereafter, the Member of Parliament for Jacques Cartier introduced a private member's bill to outlaw three-card monte specifically. He stated during second reading that the proposed changes were a direct response to Rosen and Lavoie targeting the specific game of three-card monte (House of Commons Debates, vol. 2, 5th Sess., 13th Parl., April 11, 1921, at p. 1858). As to why it was necessary to further prohibit games similar to three-card monte, he explained:

> If we made it a crime for people to play with three cards, they might play with four cards or they might play with other instruments than cards, and that is why we thought it proper to enlarge the clause so as to endeavour to cover other cases.

The Minister of Justice adopted the member's statements and opted to include the new provisions in broader Bill of proposed amendments to the Criminal Code (House of Commons Debates, vol. 2, donneur et placées face cachée, et où le joueur mise sur son aptitude à repérer une carte en particulier » (The King c. Rosen and Lavoie (1920), 61 D.L.R. 500 (C.A. Qc), p. 502-503).

> Si nous défendions de jouer avec trois cartes on jouerait peut-être avec quatre ou avec d'autres instruments que des cartes. Voilà pourquoi nous avons cru devoir étendre la portée de l'article de manière à comprendre les autres cas.

Le ministre de la Justice a fait siennes les déclarations du député et a décidé d'inclure les nouvelles dispositions dans un projet de loi général proposant des modifications au Code criminel (Débat de la at p. 1857; see also House of Commons Debates, vol. 4, 5th Sess., 13th Parl., May 6, 1921, at p. 3006).

[46] While this Court has recognized that the statements of particular Members of Parliament cannot necessarily be taken as expressing the intention of Parliament as a whole (R. v. Heywood, [1994] 3 S.C.R. 761, at pp. 788-89), the statements recounted here were made by those directly responsible for introducing the three-card monte prohibition, and as such provide relevant evidence of legislative purpose. They indicate that the phrase "similar to" was included in s. 206(2) to capture games that involve betting on the location of a particular object after a series of movements, regardless of whether the game is played with three playing cards.

[47] The text of the provision and its surrounding context further suggest that the prohibition of games similar to three-card monte was directed towards the game's concrete attributes and not towards the abstract feature of deception. One would expect that, had Parliament sought to prohibit broadly deceptive gambling games, it would have straightforwardly done so (R. Sullivan, Sullivan on the Construction of Statutes (6th ed. 2014), at pp. 207-8). It defies logic that Parliament would choose to create such an offence by prohibiting three-card monte. Moreover, three-card monte is listed alongside other types of gambling games that are defined by their physical characteristics (punch boards, coin tables, and wheels of fortune). It would be anomalous to interpret the inclusion of three-card monte in this list as an intention to prohibit all deceptive games (Sullivan, at pp. 230-34).

[48] All this leads me to conclude that games "similar to" three-card monte involve, at a minimum, a player betting on the location of an object after a series of manipulations. Nothing in the pleadings describes VLTs as operating in this manner. Thus, the claim that VLTs are similar to three-card monte has no reasonable chance of success.

Chambre des communes, vol. 2, p. 1898; voir aussi Débats de la Chambre des communes, vol. 4, 5e sess., 13e lég., 6 mai 1921, p. 3058-3059).

C. Breach of Contract

[49] At first glance, the plaintiffs' breach of contract claim might merit different treatment than their claim in tort, since breach of contract — unlike the tort of negligence — does not require proof of loss as an element of the cause of action (Rogers & Rogers Inc. v. Pinehurst Woodworking Co. (2005), 14 B.L.R. (4th) 142 (Ont. S.C.), at para. 91). But that is of no moment here, since the plaintiffs have made it clear — both in their pleadings and at every level of court — that they seek only non-compensatory remedies for breach of contract, namely disgorgement and punitive damages. Whether the plaintiffs' breach of contract claim discloses a reasonable cause of action should be considered in light of the remedies the plaintiffs actually seek. The question to be decided here, then, is whether these remedies are available to the plaintiffs, assuming the truth of their pleadings.

(1) Disgorgement for Breach of Contract

[50] The ordinary form of monetary relief for breach of contract is an award of damages, measured according to the position which the plaintiff would have occupied had the contract been performed (Bank of America, at para. 25). Correspondingly, the orthodox position maintained that disgorgement of the defendant's profits was not an available remedy for breach of contract (H. D. Pitch and R. M. Snyder, Damages for Breach of Contract (2nd ed. (looseleaf)), at pp. 1-36 to 1-39; S. Watterson, "Gain-Based Remedies for Civil Wrongs in England and Wales", in E. Hondius and A. Janssen, eds., Disgorgement of Profits: Gain-Based Remedies throughout the World (2015), 29, at p. 55; see also Asamera Oil Corp. Ltd. v. Sea Oil & General Corp., [1979] 1 S.C.R. 633, at p. 673).

C. Violation de contrat

[49] À première vue, la demande fondée sur la violation de contrat introduite par les demandeurs pourrait recevoir un traitement différent que leur demande fondée sur la responsabilité délictuelle, puisque la violation de contrat — à la différence du délit de négligence — n'exige pas la preuve d'une perte comme élément de la cause d'action (Rogers & Rogers Inc. c. Pinehurst Woodworking Co. (2005), 14 B.L.R. (4th) 142 (C.S. Ont.), par. 91). Or, cela n'est pas pertinent en l'espèce, puisque les demandeurs ont indiqué clairement — dans leurs actes de procédure et devant chaque juridiction — qu'ils sollicitaient seulement des réparations de nature non compensatoire pour la violation de contrat, soit la restitution des gains illicites et des dommages-intérêts punitifs. La question de savoir si la demande fondée sur la violation de contrat introduite par les demandeurs révèle une cause d'action raisonnable devrait être examinée à la lumière des réparations qu'ils cherchent à obtenir. La question que nous sommes ici appelés à trancher, en conséquence, est celle de savoir si les demandeurs ont droit à ces réparations, en tenant les faits allégués pour avérés.

(1) Restitution des gains illicites pour violation de contrat

[50] La réparation pécuniaire habituelle pour violation de contrat est l'octroi de dommages-intérêts, calculés en fonction de la situation dans laquelle le demandeur se serait trouvé si le contrat avait été exécuté (Banque d'Amérique, par. 25). En conséquence, les tenants de l'opinion traditionnelle soutiennent que la restitution des gains illicites réalisés par le défendeur n'est pas une réparation à laquelle donne droit la violation de contrat (H. D. Pitch et R. M. Snyder, Damages for Breach of Contract (2e éd. (feuilles mobiles)), p. 1-36 à 1-39; S. Watterson, « Gain-Based Remedies for Civil Wrongs in England and Wales », dans E. Hondius et A. Janssen, dir., Disgorgement of Profits : Gain-Based Remedies throughout the World (2015), 29, p. 55; voir aussi Asamera Oil Corp. Ltd. c. Sea Oil & General Corp., [1979] 1 R.C.S. 633, p. 673).

[51] More recently, courts have accepted that disgorgement may be available for breach of contract in certain exceptional circumstances (Attorney General v. Blake, [2001] 1 A.C. 268 (H.L.); Bank of America, at paras. 25 and 30-31). In Blake, the defendant was a former member of the British secret intelligence service who had defected to become an agent for the Soviet Union. He was discovered and sentenced to 42 years' imprisonment, but escaped prison and fled the country. Blake later entered into a contract to publish his memoirs, in contravention of the confidentiality undertaking in his employment agreement with the intelligence service. The information in his memoirs was, however, "no longer confidential, nor was its disclosure damaging to the public interest" (p. 275). Further, Blake's fiduciary obligations ceased to exist when he was dismissed from his post. The sole question was, therefore, whether the Crown could pursue disgorgement for his breach of contract.

[51] Plus récemment, les tribunaux ont reconnu que la restitution des gains illicites peut être possible en cas de violation de contrat dans certaines circonstances exceptionnelles (Attorney General c. Blake, [2001] 1 A.C. 268 (H.L.); Banque d'Amérique, par. 25 et 30-31). Dans l'arrêt Blake, le défendeur, un ancien membre du service du renseignement britannique, était devenu agent pour l'Union soviétique. Après avoir été découvert, il a été condamné à une peine d'emprisonnement de 42 ans, mais il s'est échappé de prison avant de fuir le pays. M. Blake a par la suite conclu un contrat pour la publication de ses mémoires, contrevenant ainsi à la clause de confidentialité du contrat de travail qu'il avait signé avec le service du renseignement. La cour a cependant jugé que l'information contenue dans ses mémoires n'était [TRADUCTION] « plus confidentielle et que sa divulgation ne portait pas non plus atteinte à l'intérêt public » (p. 275). Par ailleurs, les obligations fiduciaires de M. Blake ont pris fin lorsqu'il a été congédié de son poste. La seule question était donc celle de savoir si la Couronne pouvait le poursuivre en restitution des gains illicites pour ne pas avoir respecté son contrat.

[52] Lord Nicholls, for a majority of the House, held that disgorgement for breach of contract may be appropriate in exceptional circumstances, but only where, at a minimum, the remedies of damages, specific performance, and injunction are inadequate (Blake, at p. 285; One Step (Support) Ltd. v. Morris-Garner, [2018] UKSC 20, [2018] 3 All E.R. 659, at para. 64; see also Watterson, at p. 55). As to the types of circumstances that should be considered exceptional, Lord Nicholls concluded:

> No fixed rules can be prescribed. The court will have regard to all the circumstances, including the subject matter of the contract, the purpose of the contractual provision which has been breached, the circumstances in which the breach occurred, the consequences of the breach and the circumstances in which relief is being sought. A useful general guide, although not exhaustive, is whether the plaintiff had a legitimate interest in preventing the defendant's profit-making activity and, hence, in depriving him of his profit. [Emphasis added; p. 285.]

[53] Rien en droit canadien ne va à l'encontre de la norme des circonstances « exceptionnelles » énoncée par lord Nicholls dans l'arrêt Blake. D'ailleurs, l'observation suivante faite par la Cour au par. 31 de l'arrêt Banque d'Amérique — « [l]es tribunaux évitent généralement de recourir à cette méthode de calcul des dommages-intérêts [de la restitution] » — confirme que, à l'instar de la Chambre des lords dans l'arrêt Blake, elle estime que la restitution des gains illicites n'est pas une réparation généralement disponible. En particulier, et encore comme il a été conclu dans l'arrêt Blake, la restitution des gains illicites pour cause de violation de contrat n'est possible que si les autres réparations ne conviennent pas et que si les circonstances justifient d'accorder cette réparation. Pour ce qui est de ces circonstances, les tribunaux devraient en particulier établir si le demandeur avait un intérêt légitime à empêcher le défendeur d'exercer ses activités lucratives.

[54] Ultimately, Lord Nicholls concluded in Blake that the circumstances before him were indeed "exceptional". The ordinary measure of expectation damages could not have vindicated the Crown's interest, as no economic loss resulted from the publication of Blake's memoirs. Further, in Lord Nicholls view, the Crown had a legitimate interest in Blake's profits because his confidentiality undertaking was "closely akin to a fiduciary obligation" (p. 287). I pause here because, I respectfully differ on this latter point. The imposition of "quasi-fiduciary" relationships by operation of law is a concept foreign to Canadian law (RBC Dominion Securities Inc. v. Merrill Lynch Canada Inc., 2008 SCC 54, [2008] 3 S.C.R. 79, at paras. 51-54, per Abella J. (dissenting)). I therefore prefer the view of Professor McInnes, who states:

[54] En définitive, lord Nicholls a conclu dans l'arrêt Blake que les circonstances de l'affaire dont il était saisi étaient effectivement « exceptionnelles ». La mesure ordinaire de l'indemnisation pour la perte du profit escompté ne permettait pas de défendre l'intérêt de la Couronne, car la publication des mémoires de M. Blake n'avait causé aucun préjudice économique. Par ailleurs, de l'avis de lord Nicholls, la Couronne avait un intérêt légitime dans les profits réalisés par M. Blake parce que la clause de confidentialité à laquelle il était soumis [TRADUCTION] « se rapprochait d'une obligation fiduciaire » (p. 287). J'ouvre ici une parenthèse pour dire que, en toute déférence, je ne partage pas cette opinion quant au dernier point. La création d'une relation « quasi-fiduciaire », par application de la loi, est une notion étrangère au droit canadien (RBC Dominion Valeurs mobilières Inc. c. Merrill Lynch Canada Inc., 2008 CSC 54, [2008] 3 R.C.S. 79, par. 51-54, la juge Abella (dissidente)). Je préfère donc l'opinion suivante du professeur McInnes :

To . . . impose relief in a contractual context on the basis of an undefined notion of quasi-fiduciary duty dangerously ignores Justice Sopinka's warning that such obligations "should not be imposed . . . simply to improve the nature or extent of the remedy". It is not merely that Lord Nicholls' approach fails to reveal a sound basis for liability; it also implicitly invites lower courts to similarly manipulate equitable doctrine for instrumental purposes. Such an exercise is inimical to the development of coherent principle.

("Gain-Based Relief for Breach of Contract: Attorney General v. Blake" (2001), 35 Can. Bus. L.J. 72, at p. 85, citing Norberg v. Wynrib, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 226, at p. 312.)

[55] As to what circumstances will create a legitimate interest in the defendant's profit-making activity, I agree with Lord Nicholls that the boundaries of this remedy are "best hammered out on the anvil of concrete cases" (Blake, at p. 291). I can, however, offer some observations.

[56] Many scholars have recognized that it is difficult to reconcile disgorgement for breach of contract with private law principles (see e.g. E. J. Weinrib, "Punishment and Disgorgement as Contract Remedies" (2003), 78 Chi.-Kent L. Rev. 55, at p. 70; D. Winterton, "Contract Theory and Gain-Based Recovery" (2013), 76 M.L.R. 1129; McInnes (2001)). This Court has gone even further, cautioning that disgorgement awards may have the undesirable effect of deterring "efficient breach[es] of contract" (Bank of America, at paras. 30-31, Weinrib (2003), at p. 73). More importantly, it is difficult to explain disgorgement for breach of contract from the standpoint of corrective justice (Weinrib (2003), at p. 57). Granted, some attempts have been made to articulate a corrective justice rationale, but those accounts have been met with substantial criticism (see P. Benson, "Contract as a Transfer of Ownership" (2007), 48 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 1673; A. Botterell, "Contractual Performance, Corrective Justice, and Disgorgement for Breach of Contract" (2010), 16 Legal Theory 135; and A. R. Sangiuliano, "A Corrective Justice Account of Disgorgement for Breach of Contract by Analogy to Fiduciary Remedies" (2016), 29 Can. J.L. & Jur. 149, at pp. 160-74).

nature ou la portée du redressement ». Non seulement l'approche du lord Nicholls ne laisse voir aucun motif valable de responsabilité, mais elle invite implicitement les tribunaux d'instance inférieure à manipuler ainsi la doctrine d'equity à des fins utiles. Une telle pratique est incompatible avec l'élaboration d'un principe cohérent.

[57] In my view, the key to developing principles for gain-based recovery in breach of contract is to consider what legitimate interest a gain-based award serves to vindicate. A coherent approach that reconciles the relief awarded with the structure of breach of contract as a cause of action should be preferred (McInnes (2001), at pp. 88-93; see also N. W. Sage, "Disgorgement: From Property to Contract" (2016), 66 U.T.L.J. 244). To that end, it is useful to recall that courts have, in some exceptional circumstances, long awarded monetary amounts departing from the ordinary measure of expectation damages. That is to say, while disgorgement awards quantified solely by reference to the defendant's profit are a relatively recent development, other gain-based awards are nothing new. For example, this Court has awarded damages quantified by the amount a defendant saved through deficient performance, though the plaintiff would have been no better off had the contract been performed (Sunshine Exploration Ltd. v. Dolly Varden Mines Ltd. (N.P.L.), [1970] S.C.R. 2). The Court of Appeal of Nunavut suggested a similar measure of relief in circumstances where the damage caused by the defendant's deficient performance was simply too difficult to quantify (Nunavut Tunngavik Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2014 NUCA 2, 580 A.R. 75, at para. 88 ("Inuit of Nunavut")). And courts have also granted what might be termed "negotiating damages" to prevent a defendant from obtaining for free an advantage for which it did not bargain (Wrotham Park Estate Co. v. Parkside Homes Ltd., [1974] 2 All E.R. 321 (Ch. D.); Smith v. Landstar Properties Inc., 2011 BCCA 44, 14 B.C.L.R. (5th) 48, at paras. 39-44; see also Morris-Garner, at paras. 91-100). As the Supreme Court of the United Kingdom recently explained in Morris-Garner, at para. 95:

> Negotiating damages can be awarded for breach of contract where the loss suffered by the claimant is appropriately measured by reference to the economic value of the right which has been breached, considered as an asset. . . .

[57] À mon avis, l'élément essentiel pour élaborer les principes d'une indemnisation fondée sur les gains réalisés en cas de violation de contrat consiste à se demander quel intérêt légitime une telle mesure vise à défendre. Une approche cohérente qui concilierait la réparation accordée et la structure de la violation de contrat en tant que cause d'action devrait être privilégiée (McInnes (2001), p. 88-93; voir aussi N. W. Sage, « Disgorgement : From Property to Contract » (2016), 66 U.T.L.J. 244). À cette fin, il est utile de rappeler que les tribunaux ont longtemps accordé, dans certaines circonstances exceptionnelles, des réparations pécuniaires s'écartant de l'évaluation ordinaire de l'indemnisation pour la perte du profit escompté. C'est donc dire que, si les montants accordés au titre de la restitution des gains illicites quantifiés uniquement en fonction du profit réalisé par le défendeur sont relativement nouveaux, d'autres réparations fondées sur les gains n'ont rien de nouveau. Par exemple, la Cour a accordé des dommages-intérêts calculés en fonction du montant que le défendeur avait économisé en raison d'une exécution fautive, alors que le demandeur ne se serait pas trouvé en meilleure position si le contrat avait été exécuté (Sunshine Exploration Ltd. c. Dolly Varden Mines Ltd. (N.P.L.), [1970] R.C.S. 2). La Cour d'appel du Nunavut a suggéré une mesure de réparation semblable dans un cas où le préjudice causé par l'exécution fautive du défendeur était simplement trop difficile à quantifier (Nunavut Tunngavik Inc. c. Canada (Attorney General), 2014 NUCA 2, 580 A.R. 75, par. 88 (« Inuit of Nunavut »)). Des tribunaux ont aussi accordé ce que l'on pourrait appeler des [TRADUCTION] « dommages-intérêts tenant lieu de négociations » en vue d'empêcher un défendeur d'obtenir gratuitement un avantage qu'il n'avait pas négocié (Wrotham Park Estate Co. c. Parkside Homes Ltd., [1974] 2 All E.R. 321 (Ch. D.); Smith c. Landstar Properties Inc., 2011 BCCA 44, 14 B.C.L.R. (5th) 48, par. 39-44; voir aussi Morris-Garner, par. 91-100). Comme l'a récemment expliqué la Cour suprême du Royaume-Uni dans l'arrêt Morris-Garner, par. 95 :

The rationale is that the claimant has in substance been deprived of a valuable asset, and his loss can therefore be measured by determining the economic value of the right in question, considered as an asset. The defendant has taken something for nothing, for which the claimant was entitled to require payment. [Emphasis added.]

[58] As these various examples demonstrate, an award that appears to be measured by a defendant's gain might arguably, in certain circumstances, serve a compensatory purpose that distinguishes it from disgorgement and which therefore tends to support recovery (McInnes (2001), at pp. 76-80; Weinrib (2003), at pp. 71-72; see also Morris-Garner, at paras. 39-40). Whether viewed as compensatory or not, these cases are indicative of the types of circumstances where a plaintiff is entitled to receive a monetary award that goes beyond the economic position that it would have occupied had its contract been performed (see Burrows, at pp. 672-77; McInnes (2014), at p. 285). While the circumstances in which a gain-based award will be appropriate cannot be clearly delineated in advance (Blake, at p. 285; Morris-Garner, at para. 94), one would expect future legitimate interests protected by a gain-based award to resemble those interests that have been protected in the past.

[59] Returning to the present case, and applying the standard articulated in Blake, the plaintiffs' claim for disgorgement is plainly doomed to fail. I say this, first, because disgorgement is available for breach of contract only where, at a minimum, other remedies are inadequate. Circumstances of inadequacy arise when the nature of the claimant's interest is such that it cannot be vindicated by other forms of relief. This may arise where, for example, the plaintiff's loss is "impossible to calculate" or where the plaintiff's interest in performance is not reflected by a purely economic measure (Inuit of Nunavut, at para. 80; see also Morris-Garner, at paras. 39-40; Burrows, at p. 676). Where, as here, the argument is that the quantum of loss is equal to the defendant's gain, but the plaintiff would simply été violé, considéré comme un élément d'actif. [. . .] La raison en est que le demandeur a en substance été privé d'un élément d'actif important, et que sa perte peut donc être évaluée en calculant la valeur économique du droit en question, considéré comme un élément d'actif. Le défendeur a pris quelque chose sans rien fournir en retour, chose pour laquelle le demandeur a le droit d'exiger le paiement. [Je souligne.]

[58] Comme le démontrent ces divers exemples, un montant octroyé qui serait calculé en fonction du gain réalisé par le défendeur pourrait, dans certaines circonstances, servir un objectif compensatoire qui le distingue de la restitution des gains illicites et qui tend donc à fonder le recouvrement (McInnes (2001), p. 76-80; Weinrib (2003), p. 71-72; voir aussi Morris-Garner, par. 39-40). Qu'elles soient ou non considérées comme étant de nature compensatoire, ces affaires montrent le genre de circonstances dans lesquelles un demandeur a droit à une réparation pécuniaire qui lui aurait permis d'être dans une situation économique allant au-delà de celle dans laquelle il aurait été si le contrat avait été exécuté (voir Burrows, p. 672-677; McInnes (2014), p. 285). Il est vrai que les circonstances dans lesquelles il conviendra d'accorder une réparation fondée sur les gains réalisés ne peuvent pas être clairement définies à l'avance (Blake, p. 285; Morris-Garner, par. 94), mais on peut penser qu'à l'avenir, les intérêts légitimes protégés par une telle réparation ressembleront à ceux qui ont été protégés par le passé.

[59] Revenant à la présente affaire et appliquant la norme énoncée dans l'arrêt Blake, je ne peux que constater que la demande en restitution des gains illicites présentée par les demandeurs est manifestement vouée à l'échec. Je dis cela avant tout parce que la restitution des gains illicites n'est possible pour la violation de contrat que lorsque, à tout le moins, les autres réparations ne conviennent pas, ce qui se produit lorsque la nature de l'intérêt du demandeur est telle qu'il ne peut la faire valoir par d'autres formes de réparation. C'est ce qui arrive lorsque, par exemple, la perte subie par le demandeur est [TRADUCTION] « impossible à calculer » ou lorsque l'intérêt du demandeur à ce que le contrat soit exécuté ne peut se traduire en termes purement économiques (Inuit of Nunavut, par. 80; voir aussi Morris-Garner,

[60] My colleague Karakatsanis J. suggests that compensatory damages may be inadequate here because VLTs do not create records for particular customers, and that ALC's conduct may have contributed to the plaintiffs' lack of evidence. But the plaintiffs do not make these allegations. More importantly, compensatory damages are not inadequate merely because a plaintiff is unwilling, or does not have sufficient evidence, to prove loss (Inuit of Nunavut, at para. 85; see also Morris-Garner, at para. 90). Again, and as Inuit of Nunavut demonstrates, inadequacy flows not from the availability of evidence, but from the nature of the claimant's interest. There, the claimant's interest was in the Government of Canada's agreement to develop a general monitoring plan to support collection and analysis of "information on the long term state and health of . . . the Nunavut Settlement Area" (para. 9). While the Government of Canada's failure to do so resulted in an identifiable loss to the Inuit of Nunavut, it could not possibly be quantified in monetary terms. The Nunavut Court of Appeal therefore recognized that it would be appropriate to award gain-based damages measured by the amount the Government of Canada saved by breaching the agreement. This is a far cry from the plaintiffs' circumstances here. Their gambling losses are readily quantifiable and can be remedied through an award of compensatory damages.

[61] Disgorgement for breach of contract is exceptional relief; it is not available at the plaintiff's election to obviate matters of proof. And there is nothing exceptional about the breach of contract the plaintiffs allege. Once the allegations of criminal conduct are put aside (given that I determined that they should be struck), the plaintiffs' claim is simply that they paid par. 39-40; Burrows, p. 676). Lorsque, comme en l'espèce, le demandeur soutient que le montant de la perte équivaut aux gains réalisés par le défendeur, mais qu'il intente simplement un recours en restitution des gains illicites, la réparation fondée sur les gains réalisés ne convient pas.

[60] Ma collègue la juge Karakatsanis laisse entendre que les dommages-intérêts compensatoires peuvent ne pas convenir en l'espèce parce que les ALV ne créent pas de relevés pour des clients précis et que la conduite de la SLA pourrait avoir contribué au manque de preuve des demandeurs. Cependant, les demandeurs ne font pas de telles allégations. Surtout, on ne peut dire que les dommages-intérêts compensatoires ne conviennent pas simplement parce que le demandeur refuse de prouver la perte, ou qu'il ne dispose pas d'une preuve suffisante pour l'établir (Inuit of Nunavut, par. 85; voir aussi Morris-Garner, par. 90). De plus, comme le démontre l'arrêt Inuit of Nunavut, le caractère inadéquat découle non pas de la disponibilité de la preuve, mais de la nature de l'intérêt du demandeur. Dans cette affaire, l'intérêt du demandeur visait le fait que le gouvernement du Canada avait accepté d'élaborer un plan général de surveillance afin de soutenir la collecte et l'analyse de [TRADUCTION] « renseignements sur l'état et la santé à long terme [. . .] de la région du Nunavut » (par. 9). Alors que le défaut du gouvernement canadien d'exécuter cette obligation a donné lieu à une perte déterminable pour les Inuits du Nunavut, cette perte ne pouvait être quantifiée du point de vue monétaire. La Cour d'appel du Nunavut a donc reconnu qu'il conviendrait d'accorder des dommages-intérêts fondés sur les gains réalisés, évalués en fonction du montant que le gouvernement du Canada a épargné en contrevenant à l'entente. On est loin de la situation des demandeurs en l'espèce. Leurs pertes découlant du jeu sont facilement quantifiables et un octroi de dommages-intérêts compensatoires peut y remédier.

[61] La restitution des gains illicites pour violation de contrat est une mesure de réparation exceptionnelle; le demandeur ne peut choisir de s'en prévaloir pour éviter des questions de preuve. De plus, la violation de contrat qu'allèguent les demandeurs n'a rien d'exceptionnel. Une fois les allégations de conduite criminelle écartées (puisque j'ai conclu qu'elles devraient être to play a gambling game and did not get exactly what they paid for. The plaintiffs cannot be said to have a legitimate interest in ALC's profit-making activity.

[62] It follows that the plaintiffs' claim has no reasonable chance of achieving disgorgement damages for breach of contract.

(2) Punitive Damages for Breach of Contract

[63] Punitive damage awards for breach of contract are also exceptional, but will be awarded where the alleged breach of contract is an independent actionable wrong (Whiten v. Pilot Insurance Co., 2002 SCC 18, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 595, at para. 78). As this Court held in Whiten, the actionable wrong need not be tortious: punitive damages may also be awarded where the defendant breaches a contractual obligation of good faith (para. 79).

[64] Having concluded that all of the plaintiffs' other claims are bound to fail, the only remaining actionable wrong is the claim that ALC breached an obligation of good faith owed to the plaintiffs under the alleged contract. To that effect, the plaintiffs' claim alleges:

> . . . the nature of the contract between the parties and the vulnerability of the Plaintiffs implies a duty of good faith which requires the Defendant to consider the interests of the Plaintiffs as at least equal to its own and not to offer or supply an inherently dangerous service or product. The Defendant breached its implied duty of good faith by designing, testing, researching, formulating, developing, manufacturing or altering, producing, labeling, advertising, promoting, distributing, and/or selling VLTs which were inherently dangerous to users and which the Defendant knew or ought to have known would lead to dependency and addiction.

radiées), les demandeurs prétendent simplement qu'ils ont payé pour jouer à un jeu de hasard et qu'ils n'ont pas obtenu exactement ce pour quoi ils ont payé. On ne peut affirmer que les demandeurs ont un intérêt légitime dans les activités lucratives de la SLA.

[62] Il s'ensuit que les demandeurs n'ont aucune chance raisonnable d'obtenir la restitution des gains illicites pour violation de contrat.

(2) Dommages-intérêts punitifs pour violation de contrat

> [TRADUCTION] . . . la nature du contrat entre les parties et la vulnérabilité des demandeurs suppose une obligation d'agir de bonne foi qui exige que le défendeur tienne compte des intérêts des demandeurs au moins autant que des siens et qu'il n'offre ni ne fournisse un service ou un produit intrinsèquement dangereux. Le défendeur a manqué à son obligation implicite d'agir de bonne foi par ses activités de conception, de mise à l'essai, de recherche, de formulation, de mise au point, de fabrication ou de modification, de production, d'étiquetage, de publicité, de promotion, de distribution et/ou de vente ayant pour objet des ALV qui étaient intrinsèquement dangereux pour les utilisateurs, et que le défendeur savait ou aurait dû savoir qu'ils pouvaient mener à une dépendance.

[65] As this Court explained in Bhasin v. Hrynew, 2014 SCC 71, [2014] 3 S.C.R. 494, however, not every contract imposes actionable good faith obligations on contracting parties. While good faith is an organizing principle of Canadian contract law, it manifests itself in specific circumstances. In particular, its application is generally confined to existing categories of contracts and obligations (para. 66). The alleged contract between ALC and the plaintiffs does not fit within any of the established good faith categories. Nor did the plaintiffs advance any argument for expanding those recognized categories.

[66] Accordingly, the plaintiffs' claim for punitive damages has no reasonable chance of success.

(3) Whether the Claim Should Survive For Nominal Damages

[67] The remaining question on breach of contract is whether the plaintiffs' claim should survive as a hollow cause of action that does not support any of the remedies they seek. In my view, it should not. While I agree with my colleague Karakatsanis J. that declaratory relief and nominal damages are available in theory as remedies for breach of contract, a reasonable claim is one that has a reasonable chance of achieving the outcome that the plaintiff seeks. That is not this claim. To be sure, the circumstances here are unusual. Not only did the plaintiffs plead only gain-based relief and punitive damages, both of which I have concluded are unavailable in the circumstances, the plaintiffs also expressly disclaimed remedies quantified on the basis of individual loss. At no point did the plaintiffs argue that their claim should survive because nominal damages are available. In my view, the plaintiffs' breach of contract claim should be assessed on the basis of the questions put before the Court — namely, whether a gain-based remedy or punitive damages are available in the circumstances. And on that basis, it is obvious that the plaintiffs' breach of contract claim does not disclose a reasonable cause of action. To allow this claim to proceed to trial would simply be to delay the inevitable, and

(3) La demande devrait-elle subsister pour ouvrir droit à des dommages-intérêts symboliques?

[67] La dernière question qui se pose quant à la violation de contrat est de savoir si la demande présentée par les demandeurs devrait subsister en tant que cause d'action vide de sens n'ouvrant droit à aucune des réparations sollicitées. Je ne le crois pas. Bien que je sois d'accord avec ma collègue la juge Karakatsanis pour dire qu'un jugement déclaratoire et des dommages-intérêts symboliques sont possibles en théorie en tant que réparation pour la violation du contrat, une demande raisonnable en est une qui a une chance raisonnable d'atteindre le résultat recherché par le demandeur. Ce n'est pas le cas en l'espèce. Certes, la situation qui nous occupe est inhabituelle. Non seulement les demandeurs ne revendiquent qu'une réparation fondée sur les gains réalisés et des dommages-intérêts punitifs (et j'ai conclu que ces deux mesures n'étaient pas disponibles dans les circonstances), mais les demandeurs ont expressément renoncé aux réparations quantifiées en fonction de la perte individuelle. En aucun temps les demandeurs n'ont fait valoir que leur demande devrait subsister parce que des dommages-intérêts symboliques étaient possibles. À mon avis, la demande fondée sur la violation de contrat présentée par les demandeurs devrait être évaluée en fonction would not reflect a "proportionate procedur[e] for adjudication" (Hryniak, at para. 27).

(4) Certification

[68] Even were the breach of contract claim to survive, the application judge's certification decision would have to be revisited. Given my conclusion that each of the plaintiffs' claims should be struck, it is unnecessary to address certification in detail. I respectfully disagree with my colleague, however, that the plaintiff's breach of contract claim, standing alone, would satisfy the preferability requirement in s. 5(1)(d) of the Class Actions Act (Karakatsanis J. Reasons, at paras. 165-70). As I have explained, punitive damages and disgorgement are unavailable to the plaintiffs. Without those remedies, the plaintiffs would be pursuing a breach of contract action wherein each plaintiff effectively elects to pursue nominal damages in lieu of the actual damages they have suffered. Such an action would not further the principal goals of class actions, namely judicial economy, behavior modification, and access to justice (Hollick v. Toronto (City), 2001 SCC 68, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 158, at paras. 27-28).

D. Unjust Enrichment

[69] The plaintiffs also rely on the principled unjust enrichment framework (or what the Court of Appeal referred to as "unjust enrichment simpliciter"). This claim requires establishing that ALC was enriched, that the plaintiffs suffered a corresponding deprivation, and that the enrichment and corresponding des questions soumises à la Cour — soit celle de savoir si une réparation fondée sur les gains ou des dommages-intérêts punitifs sont possibles dans les circonstances. Il est donc évident que la demande fondée sur la violation de contrat introduite par les demandeurs ne révèle aucune cause d'action raisonnable. Permettre l'instruction de cette demande ne ferait que retarder l'inévitable et ne rendrait pas compte de « procédures de règlement des litiges [. . .] proportionnées » (Hryniak, par. 27).

(4) Autorisation d'exercer un recours collectif

[68] Même si la demande fondée sur la violation de contrat devait subsister, la décision d'autorisation du juge saisi de la demande devrait être revue. Étant donné ma conclusion que chacune des demandes présentées par les demandeurs devrait être radiée, il n'est pas nécessaire d'aborder la question de l'autorisation en détail. Soit dit en tout respect, je ne suis pas d'accord avec ma collègue, cependant, pour dire que la demande fondée sur la violation de contrat présentée par les demandeurs, à elle seule, satisferait au critère du meilleur moyen prévu à l'al. 5(1)(d) de la Class Actions Act (motifs de la juge Karakatsanis, par. 165-170). Comme je l'ai expliqué, les demandeurs n'ont pas droit à des dommages-intérêts punitifs ni à la restitution des gains illicites. Sans ces réparations, les demandeurs intenteraient une action pour violation de contrat dans laquelle chacun des demandeurs choisit en fait de réclamer des dommages-intérêts symboliques plutôt que des dommages-intérêts fondés sur la perte réellement subie. Une telle action n'atteindrait pas les principaux objectifs du recours collectif, à savoir l'économie de ressources judiciaires, la modification des comportements et l'accès à la justice (Hollick c. Toronto (Ville), 2001 CSC 68, [2001] 3 R.C.S. 158, par. 27-28).

D. Enrichissement sans cause

[69] Les demandeurs se fondent également sur le cadre d'analyse de l'enrichissement sans cause (ou sur ce que la Cour d'appel a appelé [TRADUCTION] « l'enrichissement sans cause simpliciter »). Une telle action requiert qu'ils établissent que la SLA s'est enrichie, qu'ils ont subi un appauvrissement deprivation occurred in the absence of any juristic reason therefor (Moore, at para. 37). The appellants argue that this claim is bound to fail because, even if ALC has been enriched at the plaintiff's expense, there is a juristic reason for the exchange.

[70] The juristic reason element of the unjust enrichment analysis proceeds in two stages. First, the plaintiff must demonstrate that the defendant's enrichment cannot be justified by any of the established categories of juristic reason. If none of the established categories of juristic reason are present, the plaintiff has a prima facie case for unjust enrichment. At the second stage, the defendant can rebut the plaintiff's prima facie case by showing that there is a residual reason to deny recovery (Moore, at paras. 57-58).

[71] Here, I do not have to go beyond the first stage of the analysis. The plaintiffs' own pleadings allege that there was a contract between ALC and the plaintiffs under which the plaintiffs paid to play VLTs. A defendant that acquires a benefit pursuant to a valid contract is justified in retaining that benefit (Moore, at para. 57). Nothing in the pleadings, apart from perhaps the allegations of criminal conduct that I have determined are bound to fail, could serve to vitiate the alleged contract between the plaintiffs and ALC. It follows that I agree with the appellants that the plaintiffs' unjust enrichment claim has no reasonable chance of success.

IV. Conclusion

[72] Each claim that the plaintiffs have pleaded is bound to fail because it discloses no reasonable cause of action. I would allow the appeals, set aside the certification order, and strike the plaintiffs' statement of claim in its entirety. The appellants have not sought costs, and I would therefore award none.

correspondant et que l'enrichissement et l'appauvrissement correspondant ont eu lieu en l'absence d'un motif juridique (Moore, par. 37). Les appelantes soutiennent que cette action est vouée à l'échec parce que, même si la SLA s'est enrichie aux dépens des demandeurs, un motif juridique justifie l'échange qui a eu lieu.

[71] En l'espèce, je n'ai pas besoin d'aller au-delà de la première étape de l'analyse. Les demandeurs allèguent dans leurs propres actes de procédure qu'il y avait un contrat entre eux et la SLA, en vertu duquel ils devaient payer pour jouer sur les ALV. Un défendeur qui tire un avantage dans le cadre d'un contrat valide est justifié de conserver cet avantage (Moore, par. 57). Rien dans les actes de procédure, à part peut-être les allégations de conduite criminelle qui, comme je l'ai conclu, sont vouées à l'échec, ne pourrait entacher la validité du contrat qui serait intervenu entre les demandeurs et la SLA. En conséquence, je conviens avec les appelantes que la demande pour enrichissement sans cause présentée par les demandeurs n'a aucune chance raisonnable d'être accueillie.

IV. Conclusion

The reasons of Wagner C.J. and Karakatsanis, Martin and Kasirer JJ. were delivered by KARAKATSANIS J. (dissenting in part) —

I. Introduction

[73] The plaintiffs in this proposed class action allege that the Video Lottery Terminal (VLT) games offered by Atlantic Lottery Corporation (ALC) in Newfoundland and Labrador are deceptive, harmful, and inherently addictive. They further contend that ALC, both a regulator and a business corporation, deliberately put people at risk of addiction by deceiving the paying public for the sole purpose of making money. The statement of claim seeks a gain-based remedy through seven possible causes of action.

[74] The application judge at the Supreme Court of Newfoundland and Labrador dismissed ALC's application to strike the plaintiffs' statement of claim and certified the class action. The majority of the Court of Appeal of Newfoundland and Labrador struck two claims but allowed the remainder to proceed as a class action. ALC and several third parties now appeal to this Court.

[75] There are two main issues before this Court: whether to strike the plaintiffs' claims and whether to certify the plaintiffs' class action. The Court's concern is not whether the plaintiffs' claim will be successful, but rather whether it should be allowed to proceed to trial, and proceed as a class action.

[76] I agree with Brown J. that a mere breach of a duty of care, in the absence of loss, cannot ground a claim for disgorgement and that the term "waiver of tort" should not be used to refer to a cause of action. I also agree that VLTs cannot constitute "three-card monte" as that phrase is defined in the Criminal

Version française des motifs du juge en chef Wagner et des juges Karakatsanis, Martin et Kasirer rendus par

LA JUGE KARAKATSANIS (dissidente en partie) —

I. Introduction

[76] Je suis d'accord avec le juge Brown pour dire qu'un simple manquement à une obligation de diligence, en l'absence de perte, ne peut fonder une demande de restitution des gains illicites et que l'expression « renonciation au recours délictuel » ne devrait pas être employée pour désigner une cause

Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, and that the plaintiffs' claim in unjust enrichment must be struck. However, I disagree with his analysis of whether the plaintiffs' claim in breach of contract is a reasonable cause of action as well as his conclusion that there are no available remedies for that breach.

[77] I agree with the courts below that common issues relating to breach of contract, punitive damages, and the availability of the remedy of disgorgement of ALC's gains are properly certified. However, I would not, on this record, certify the availability of aggregate monetary relief as a common issue. It follows that I would allow the appeals only in part, allowing the breach of contract claim to proceed and remain certified as a class action.

II. Statement of Claim and Procedural History

[79] The plaintiffs, Douglas Babstock and Fred Small, are individuals seeking to be the representative plaintiffs in a class action against ALC. In their statement of claim, the plaintiffs bring a class action on behalf of persons and estates harmed by the VLT d'action. Je suis également d'accord pour dire que les ALV ne peuvent constituer un jeu de « bonneteau » au sens donné à ce terme dans le Code criminel, L.R.C. 1985, c. C-46, et que la demande fondée sur l'enrichissement sans cause présentée par les demandeurs doit être radiée. Toutefois, je ne souscris pas à son analyse de la question de savoir si la demande fondée sur la violation de contrat présentée par les demandeurs est une cause d'action raisonnable, ni à sa conclusion selon laquelle il n'y a aucune réparation possible pour cette violation.

II. Déclaration et historique procédural

gambling that the defendant, ALC, manages in the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador. ALC has not yet filed its defence.

[80] The plaintiffs state that ALC is both a regulator and a business corporation driven by profit motive, remitting profits to the province in the range of $60-90 million annually. The statement of claim alleges that ALC knows or ought to know that VLTs are, and have been designed to be, inherently deceptive, addictive, and dangerous, programmed to create cognitive distortions of consumers' perceptions of winning. The plaintiffs say that ALC acted in bad faith, and that the reprehensibility of ALC's conduct is relevant to the issue of remedy. They do not advance claims for personal injuries but instead seek, among other remedies, damages equal to the total unlawful gain obtained by ALC from the class members, disgorgement of ALC's profits, and punitive damages.

[81] ALC joined several third parties in the action, including VLC, Inc.; IGT-Canada Inc.; International Game Technology; Spielo International Canada ULC; and Tech Link International Entertainment Limited (collectively, the third parties), who are the manufacturers and suppliers of VLTs and who supplied VLTs to ALC during the proposed class period.

[82] The plaintiffs brought an application for certification under the Class Actions Act, S.N.L. 2001, c. C-18.1 (CAA), and ALC brought an application to strike the plaintiffs' statement of claim under r. 14.24 of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1986, S.N.L. 1986, c. 42, Sch. D.

et des successions qui ont été lésées par les jeux de hasard sur des ALV que la défenderesse, la SLA, administre dans la province de Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador. La SLA n'a pas encore déposé sa défense.

[80] Les demandeurs affirment que la SLA est à la fois un organisme de réglementation et une société commerciale à but lucratif, qui verse à la province des profits de l'ordre de 60 à 90 millions de dollars annuellement. Dans leur déclaration, ils soutiennent que la SLA sait ou devrait savoir que les ALV sont — et ont été conçus pour être — intrinsèquement trompeurs, générateurs de dépendance et dangereux, programmés pour créer des distorsions cognitives des perceptions chez les consommateurs quant aux possibilités de gagner. Les demandeurs affirment que la SLA a agi de mauvaise foi, et que le caractère répréhensible de la conduite de la SLA est pertinent en ce qui concerne la question de la réparation. Ils ne réclament rien au titre de préjudices personnels, mais sollicitent plutôt, entre autres réparations, des dommages-intérêts d'un montant égal au gain illicite total obtenu par la SLA auprès des membres du groupe, la restitution des gains illicites de la SLA et des dommages-intérêts punitifs.

[81] La SLA a mis en cause plusieurs tiers, y compris VLC, Inc.; IGT-Canada Inc.; International Game Technology; Spielo International Canada ULC; et Tech Link International Entertainment Limited (collectivement, les tierces parties), qui sont des fabricants et fournisseurs d'ALV et qui ont fourni des ALV à la SLA pendant la période visée par le recours collectif projeté.

III. Decisions on the Breach of Contract Claim and Certification

A. Supreme Court of Newfoundland and Labrador (2014 NLTD(G) 114, 356 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 293, and 2016 NLTD(G) 216, 93 C.P.C (7th) 307 (Faour J.))

[83] On ALC's application to strike the claim, the application judge found that breach of contract was a reasonable cause of action and that disgorgement was potentially available as a remedy. He rejected the argument that ALC's status as a regulator prevented the implication of any terms into its contracts with the plaintiffs, finding that it was not plain and obvious that ALC would be able to defend against every allegation on the basis of its regulatory status. He found that the plaintiffs' failure to plead damage or individual loss arising from the breach of contract, and to instead claim the defendants' gain from the breach, was not a bar to their cause of action. In his certification reasons (which touched on other claims beyond breach of contract), Faour J. found that the criteria for certification had been established.

B. Court of Appeal of Newfoundland and Labrador (2018 NLCA 71, 29 C.P.C. (8th) 1 (Green, Welsh, and Harrington JJ.A.))

[84] In the Court of Appeal, Green J.A., writing for the majority, upheld the application judge's conclusion that breach of contract was a reasonable cause of action on the basis that it is actionable in the absence of pleaded or proven loss. The majority found disgorgement to be a potential remedy given its uncertain parameters; it could not be said that the claim for disgorgement of profits was doomed to fail. The majority also refused to strike the plaintiffs' claim for punitive damages given their allegations that ALC had engaged in reprehensible and high-handed conduct. Finally, the majority concluded that

III. Décisions sur la demande fondée sur la violation de contrat et sur l'autorisation d'exercer le recours collectif

A. Cour suprême de Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador (2014 NLTD(G) 114, 356 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 293, et 2016 NLTD(G) 216, 93 C.P.C. (7th) 307 (le juge Faour))

[83] Statuant sur la demande de la SLA en radiation de l'action, le juge a conclu que la violation de contrat était une cause d'action raisonnable et que la restitution des gains illicites pouvait éventuellement être accordée à titre de réparation. Il a rejeté l'argument voulant que, en raison de la qualité d'organisme de réglementation de la SLA, il ne pouvait y avoir de conditions implicites dans ses contrats avec les demandeurs, et a conclu qu'il n'était pas évident et manifeste que la SLA serait en mesure d'opposer une défense à chaque allégation sur le fondement de sa qualité d'organisme de réglementation. Selon le juge, le fait que les demandeurs n'aient pas plaidé de préjudice ou de perte individuelle découlant de la violation de contrat, mais qu'ils ont plutôt réclamé le gain que les défendeurs ont tiré de la violation, ne faisait pas obstacle à leur cause d'action. Dans ses motifs relatifs à l'autorisation (qui portaient sur d'autres demandes, outre la violation de contrat), le juge Faour a conclu que les critères en vue de l'autorisation du recours collectif avaient été établis.

B. Cour d'appel de Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador (2018 NLCA 71, 29 C.P.C. (8th) 1 (les juges Green, Welsh et Harrington))

[84] En Cour d'appel, le juge Green, s'exprimant au nom des juges majoritaires, a confirmé la conclusion du juge saisi de la demande, selon laquelle la violation de contrat était une cause d'action raisonnable parce qu'elle donnait ouverture à action en l'absence de perte plaidée ou prouvée. Les juges majoritaires ont conclu que la restitution des gains illicites était une réparation possible en raison de ses paramètres incertains; on ne pouvait affirmer que la demande de restitution des gains illicites était vouée à l'échec. Les juges majoritaires ont en outre refusé de radier la demande de dommages-intérêts punitifs

the application judge had not erred in certifying the plaintiffs' class action.

[85] Welsh J.A. dissented, finding that the claim for breach of contract should be struck because the plaintiffs did not plead loss or damage.

IV. Analysis

[86] In these reasons, I consider two issues. First, is breach of contract a reasonable cause of action on these pleadings? Second, should the action for breach of contract remain certified as a class action?

A. Standard on a Motion to Strike

[87] A pleading may be struck or amended on the ground that it discloses no reasonable cause of action or defence (Rules of the Supreme Court, 1986, r. 14.24(1)(a)). When considering whether to strike a pleading on this ground, the question is whether the claim has "no reasonable prospect of success" (R. v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., 2011 SCC 42, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 45, at para. 17), or whether it is "plain and obvious" that the action cannot succeed (Hunt v. Carey Canada Inc., [1990] 2 S.C.R. 959, at p. 980). This is a high standard that applies to determinations of fact, law, and mixed fact and law. The facts pleaded are assumed to be true "unless they are manifestly incapable of being proven" (Imperial Tobacco, at para. 22).

[88] On a motion to strike, the statement of claim should be read "as generously as possible and to accommodate any inadequacies in the form of the allegations which are merely the result of drafting deficiencies" (Operation Dismantle v. The Queen, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 441, at p. 451), because "cases should, if possible, be disposed of on their merits" (Montreal Trust Co. of Canada v. Hickman, 2001 NFCA 42, présentée par les demandeurs, en raison de leurs allégations selon lesquelles la SLA s'était livrée à un comportement répréhensible et abusif. Enfin, les juges majoritaires ont conclu que le juge saisi de la demande n'avait pas commis d'erreur en autorisant le recours collectif des demandeurs.

[85] La juge Welsh, dissidente, a conclu que la demande fondée sur la violation de contrat devrait être radiée parce que les demandeurs n'avaient pas plaidé de perte ou de préjudice.

IV. Analyse

[86] Dans les présents motifs, j'examine deux questions. D'abord, la violation de contrat est-elle une cause d'action raisonnable au vu des actes de procédure en l'espèce? Ensuite, l'action en violation de contrat devrait-elle demeurer autorisée en tant que recours collectif?

A. Norme applicable à la requête en radiation

[87] Un acte de procédure peut être radié ou modifié au motif qu'il ne révèle aucune cause d'action ou moyen de défense raisonnable (Rules of the Supreme Court, 1986, al. 14.24(1)(a)). Pour décider s'il y a lieu de radier un acte de procédure pour ce motif, la question est de savoir si la demande n'a « aucune possibilité raisonnable d'être accueillie » (R. c. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltée, 2011 CSC 42, [2011] 3 R.C.S. 45, par. 17), ou s'il est « évident et manifeste » que l'action ne saurait aboutir (Hunt c. Carey Canada Inc., [1990] 2 R.C.S. 959, p. 980). Il s'agit d'une norme élevée qui s'applique aux conclusions de fait, aux conclusions de droit et aux conclusions mixtes de fait et de droit. Les faits allégués sont présumés vrais « sauf s'ils ne peuvent manifestement pas être prouvés » (Imperial Tobacco, par. 22).

204 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 58, at para. 12). At times, a proposed cause of action is so obviously at odds with precedent, underlying principle, and desirable social consequence that regardless of the evidence adduced at trial, the court can say with confidence that it cannot succeed. But this is not often the case, and our common law system generally evolves on the basis of the concrete evidence presented before judges at trial.

[89] This is why claims that do not contain a "radical defect" (Hunt, at p. 980) should nevertheless proceed to trial. Courts should consider whether the pleadings are sufficient to put the defendant on notice of the essence of the plaintiff's claim (Holland v. Saskatchewan, 2008 SCC 42, [2008] 2 S.C.R. 551, at para. 15) and whether "the facts pleaded would support one or more arguable causes of action" (Anderson v. Bell Mobility Inc., 2009 NWTCA 3, 524 A.R. 1, at para. 5). In Markevich v. Canada, 2003 SCC 9, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 94, this Court explained that a cause of action is "only a set of facts that provides the basis for an action in court" (para. 27).

[90] The threshold to strike a claim is therefore high. Where a reasonable prospect of success exists, the matter should be allowed to proceed to trial (Imperial Tobacco, at paras. 17 and 21). The correct posture for the Court to adopt is to consider whether the pleadings, as they stand or may reasonably be amended, disclose a question that is not doomed to fail (Hunt, at p. 978, quoting Minnes v. Minnes (1962), 39 W.W.R. 112 (B.C.C.A.), at pp. 116 and 122).

B. Breach of Contract

(1) Breach of Contract as a Cause of Action

[91] The elements of a cause of action for breach of contract are the existence of a contract and the breach of a term of that contract. In order to strike the claim for breach of contract, ALC and the third parties must demonstrate either that a necessary fact is not pleaded or that there is a legal reason why

Trust Co. of Canada c. Hickman, 2001 NFCA 42, 204 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 58, par. 12). Parfois, une cause d'action alléguée est si nettement contraire à la jurisprudence, au principe sous-jacent et aux conséquences sociales souhaitables que, sans égard à la preuve présentée au procès, le tribunal peut affirmer avec certitude que l'action ne saurait aboutir. Ce n'est toutefois pas souvent le cas, et notre système de common law évolue généralement sur le fondement d'éléments de preuve concrets présentés à des juges dans le cadre de procès.

[90] En conséquence, le seuil à atteindre pour la radiation d'une demande est élevé. Lorsque la demande a une possibilité raisonnable d'être accueillie, il faut permettre qu'elle soit instruite (Imperial Tobacco, par. 17 et 21). La Cour doit donc se demander si les actes de procédure, tels qu'ils sont rédigés ou peuvent raisonnablement être modifiés, révèlent une question qui n'est pas vouée à l'échec (Hunt, p. 978, citant Minnes c. Minnes (1962), 39 W.W.R. 112 (C.A. C.-B), p. 116 et 122).

B. Violation de contrat

(1) La violation de contrat en tant que cause d'action

no contractual term existed or could be breached. In my view, they have done neither. As I discuss below, the plaintiffs have pleaded everything necessary to sustain a claim of breach of contract in this case. I begin by reviewing the plaintiffs' statement of claim more broadly before turning to the breach of contract claim.

[92] The plaintiffs allege that a disproportionate number of VLT gamblers have become addicted to gambling and are the source of a disproportionately large share of ALC's VLT revenues in the province. According to the pleadings, in Newfoundland and Labrador, 9.7 percent of VLT players are at moderate risk of problem gambling and an additional 8.6 percent are problem gamblers, compared to a problematic gambling rate of only about 3 percent for other forms of gambling. The plaintiffs have not pleaded that either of the representative plaintiffs are problem gamblers.

[93] The statement of claim also alleges that VLTs are deceptive in that both the mechanics of the game and the odds of winning are concealed. The VLTs are said to have asymmetrical virtual reels that are programmed to weight the distribution of symbols so that the visual reels give a false impression of the odds of winning. The plaintiffs also allege that the machines include a "stop" button that creates the illusion of control over the outcome, but is deceitful in that it provides no such control: in reality, the outcome is based on a random number generator. The pleadings further state that ALC knows or ought to know of the deceptive nature of VLTs and that these deceptive design features can be eliminated such that VLTs become a reasonably safe form of gambling and generate a reasonable stream of profit.

[94] Turning to the breach of contract claim, the plaintiffs allege that there was a contract between the parties "to provide a safe, interactive and entertaining way to play games of chance with the opportunity to win small cash prizes in exchange for small frequent cash bets" (Statement of Claim, at para. 46). Given the absence of a written contract between the parties, their claim rests on the existence of an implied contract. The plaintiffs have pleaded that ALC breached some of the contract's terms.

[95] The first implied term is a warranty that the VLTs were of merchantable quality and fit for use — that they were not inherently dangerous. ALC is alleged to have breached this term by "designing, testing, researching, formulating, developing, manufacturing or altering, producing, labeling, advertising, promoting, distributing and/or selling" VLTs that were "inherently dangerous to users" (Statement of Claim, at para. 47). The plaintiffs allege that ALC knew or ought to have known using VLTs would lead to dependency and addiction. In the alternative, the plaintiffs state that ALC breached a second implied contractual term: to use reasonable care and skill in its provision of VLT gaming. The plaintiffs plead that a necessary incident of this second implied term was that ALC owed the plaintiff class a duty to warn of any inherent danger in the consumption of the games and to satisfy itself of the safety of the games, which they allege ALC did not do. Finally, the plaintiffs allege that ALC breached an implied term of good faith.

[96] In this case, the plaintiffs have pleaded the nature of the contract between the parties, the terms they say are implied, and the manner in which ALC breached the contract between them. The existence and breach of these implied terms are thus matters that would usually be left for trial. Indeed, as M.J.B. Enterprises Ltd. v. Defence Construction (1951) Ltd.,

based on the presumed intention of the parties where the implied term must be necessary "to give business efficacy to a contract or as otherwise meeting the 'officious bystander' test as a term which the parties would say, if questioned, that they had obviously assumed" . . . .

(para. 27, quoting Canadian Pacific Hotels Ltd. v. Bank of Montreal, [1987] 1 S.C.R. 711, at p. 775.)

[97] This is the most commonly invoked manner of inferring the existence of implied terms in a contract and requires a factual determination based on the evidence adduced in a particular case. These terms are thus often referred to as being "implied in fact", and the existence of such a term in a contract is a question of fact that must be made out at trial (G. R. Hall, Canadian Contractual Interpretation Law (3rd ed. 2016), at pp. 176-78).

[98] The third parties, however, submit that the parties would have been precluded from implying these contractual terms because ALC, one of the parties to the alleged contract, is a public regulator. They submit that the contract here is simply the right to play a VLT game that has been approved by ALC as a regulator, whose authority cannot be limited or fettered by implying terms in the contract of play.

[99] I see no reason to find at this early stage that the terms the plaintiffs allege are implied in fact are unavailable at law. Without deciding whether ALC was acting in its capacity as a natural person in relation to its VLT operations, I note that ALC has authority to enter into contracts given that it has the capacity, rights, powers, and privileges of a natural person (CBCA, s. 15(1)). On a motion to l'a confirmé la Cour dans M.J.B. Enterprises Ltd. c. Construction de défense (1951) Ltée, [1999] 1 R.C.S. 619, il peut y avoir introduction dans un contrat de conditions implicites fondées sur l'existence d'une intention présumée des parties, soit la condition implicite dont l'introduction est nécessaire « pour donner à un contrat de l'efficacité commerciale ou pour permettre de quelque autre manière de satisfaire au critère de "l'observateur objectif", [condition] dont les parties diraient, si on leur posait la question, qu'elles avaient évidemment tenu son inclusion pour acquise » . . .

(par. 27, citant Société hôtelière Canadien Pacifique Ltée c. Banque de Montréal, [1987] 1 R.C.S. 711, p. 775.)

[98] Les tierces parties soutiennent toutefois que les parties n'auraient pas pu incorporer implicitement ces conditions contractuelles parce que la SLA, une des parties au contrat allégué, est un organisme de réglementation public. Ils soutiennent que le contrat en l'espèce vise simplement le droit de jouer à un jeu sur ALV qui a été approuvé par la SLA en sa qualité d'organisme de réglementation, dont les pouvoirs ne peuvent être limités ou entravés par l'incorporation de conditions implicites dans le contrat de jeu.

strike, it is not enough for the third parties to point in broad strokes to ALC's role as a "regulator" to ground a legal impediment to having implied these contractual terms.

[100] Indeed, the third parties have not pointed to anything in the regulatory scheme that would clearly preclude the terms the plaintiffs allege are implied when ALC sells games to playing members of the public. Under s. 5 of the Lotteries Act, the Lieutenant-Governor in Council is authorized to make regulations in relation to lottery schemes, including with respect to the amounts and values of prizes, the terms and conditions attached to prizes, and the consideration to be paid or given to secure a chance to win prizes (s. 5(d) and (e)). Section 8 of the Video Lottery Regulations delineates some of these conditions and prohibits operation of VLTs that do not comply with certain requirements — including the size of wagers, a player's monetary exposure in one play, and the minimum and maximum payout of prices for money accepted (between 80 percent and 96 percent). While some of the rules of the game are thus delineated in this regulatory scheme, the scheme leaves room to imply terms going to the core of the plaintiffs' grievance — concealment of the mechanics of the game, the odds of winning, and the asymmetrical visual reels that give players a false illusion of control.

[101] In other words, at this preliminary stage, I see nothing in the regulatory scheme that would preclude the regular application of contract law or that would conflict with a contractual term relating to how ALC ensures the safety and transparency of the games it offers to the public. Further, it is not plain and obvious that implying the terms alleged by the plaintiffs would improperly touch on or fetter ALC's authority. Under the Video Lottery Regulations, ALC is authorized to approve video lotteries (that is, a scheme or enterprise of one or more VLTs) and their sites and advertisement (ss. 2(e), 3, 5, and 10); the manufacture, supply, and operation of VLTs (ss. 4 and 6); and droits, pouvoirs et privilèges d'une personne physique (LCSA, par. 15(1)). Dans le cadre d'une requête en radiation, il ne suffit pas que les tierces parties invoquent de façon générale le rôle de la SLA en tant qu'« organisme de réglementation » pour établir l'existence d'un obstacle juridique à l'incorporation implicite de ces conditions contractuelles.

[100] De fait, les tierces parties n'ont pas renvoyé à quoi que ce soit dans le régime réglementaire qui écarterait manifestement les conditions que les demandeurs prétendent être implicites lorsque la SLA vend des jeux aux membres du public joueurs. En vertu de l'art. 5 de la Lotteries Act, le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil est autorisé à prendre des règlements en lien avec les loteries, notamment en ce qui a trait aux montants et aux valeurs des lots, aux modalités et conditions qui s'y rattachent et à la contrepartie à payer ou à donner pour obtenir une chance de gagner des lots (al. 5(d) et (e)). L'article 8 du Video Lottery Regulations énonce quelques-unes de ces conditions et interdit l'exploitation d'ALV qui ne respectent pas certaines exigences — y compris le montant des mises, le risque pécuniaire encouru par un joueur sur un jeu et les montants minimal et maximal des lots par rapport à l'argent accepté (entre 80 p. 100 et 96 p. 100). Bien que certaines règles du jeu soient ainsi énoncées dans ce régime réglementaire, celui-ci laisse place à l'incorporation de conditions implicites qui touchent à l'essentiel de ce dont se plaignent les demandeurs, à savoir la dissimulation du fonctionnement du jeu, des probabilités de gagner et des rouleaux visuels asymétriques qui donnent aux joueurs une illusion de contrôle.

the operation of video lottery games (s. 4). However, any impact that the alleged implied terms might have on ALC's authority, and the interaction, if any, of such a contract with fettering principles, is best determined with the benefit of a full and developed factual record (see Andrews v. Canada (Attorney General), 2014 NLCA 32, 354 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 42; Levy v. British Columbia (Crime Victim Assistance Program), 2018 BCCA 36, 7 B.C.L.R. (6th) 84). This is particularly so given the public policy issues at play, involving the implication of terms aimed at protecting public safety by preventing, or warning of, the danger of addiction.

[102] It is thus not plain and obvious that the contractual terms alleged are unavailable at law. I would therefore conclude that the plaintiffs' statement of claim pleads a contractual term and a breach of that term — the necessary elements for a breach of contract claim.

(2) Available Remedies For Breach of Contract

[103] Brown J. concludes that the cause of action for breach of contract, as framed, must fail because it is plain and obvious that there are no available remedies for this claim. As I elaborate below, I cannot agree that there is no valid cause of action for breach of contract on the basis that there is no available remedy. In my view, there are several remedies that are open to the plaintiffs on their pleadings, including nominal damages, declaratory relief, disgorgement, and punitive damages.

(a) Nominal Damages or Declaratory Relief

[104] Unlike a claim in negligence, loss is not an essential element of a cause of action for breach of leurs emplacements et la publicité faite à leur égard (al. 2(e) et art. 3, 5 et 10); la fabrication, la fourniture et l'exploitation d'ALV (art. 4 et 6); et l'exploitation de jeux de loterie vidéo (art. 4). Toutefois, il est préférable que la question de l'incidence éventuelle des conditions implicites alléguées sur le pouvoir de la SLA et celle de l'interaction, s'il en est, entre un tel contrat et les principes constituant une entrave, soient tranchées en fonction d'un dossier factuel complet et étoffé (voir Andrews c. Canada (Attorney General), 2014 NLCA 32, 354 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 42; Levy c. British Columbia (Crime Victim Assistance Program), 2018 BCCA 36, 7 B.C.L.R. (6th) 84). Cela est d'autant plus vrai compte tenu des questions d'ordre public en jeu, soulevant l'introduction de conditions implicites qui visent à protéger la sécurité du public par l'élimination du risque de dépendance ou la mise en garde contre ce risque.

[102] Il n'est donc pas évident et manifeste que les modalités contractuelles alléguées sont inexistantes en droit. Par conséquent, je suis d'avis de conclure que les demandeurs, dans leur déclaration, invoquent une modalité contractuelle et une violation de celle-ci — les éléments nécessaires d'une demande fondée sur la violation de contrat.

(2) Réparations possibles pour violation de contrat

[103] Le juge Brown conclut que la cause d'action pour violation de contrat, telle que formulée, est vouée à l'échec car il est évident et manifeste qu'il n'y a aucune réparation possible pour cette demande. Comme je vais l'expliquer, je ne peux convenir qu'il n'y a pas de cause d'action valable pour violation de contrat du fait qu'il n'y a aucune réparation possible. À mon avis, plusieurs réparations pourraient être accordées aux demandeurs au vu de leurs actes de procédure, notamment des dommages-intérêts symboliques, un jugement déclaratoire, la restitution des gains illicites et les dommages-intérêts punitifs.

a) Dommages-intérêts symboliques ou jugement déclaratoire

contract. In my view, there is a basis for an action for breach of contract and a basis to obtain remedies against ALC even in the absence of pleadings of specific personal loss. For example, a court finding breach of contract may make binding declarations of right, whether or not any consequential relief is or could be claimed, and whether or not a declaration was pleaded as relief sought (Rules of the Supreme Court, 1986, r. 7.16; see also L. Sarna, The Law of Declaratory Judgments (4th ed. 2016), at pp. 5-6; Native Women's Assn. of Canada v. Canada, [1994] 3 S.C.R. 627, at pp. 647-48).

[105] In addition, nominal damages may be given in all cases of breach of contract as a manner of "affirming . . . that there is an infraction of a legal right" (Owners of the Steamship "Mediana" v. Owners, Master and Crew of the Lightship "Comet", [1900] A.C. 113 (H.L.), at p. 116, per Lord Halsbury L.C.). Nominal damages are thus always available for causes of action, like breach of contract, that do not require proof of loss, even if they are not pleaded (see, e.g., Place Concorde East Ltd. Partnership v. Shelter Corp. of Canada Ltd. (2006), 211 O.A.C. 141, at paras. 56 and 75-78; Saskatchewan Government Insurance v. Wilson, 2012 SKCA 106, 405 Sask. R. 8, at para. 13; J. Edelman, McGregor on Damages (20th ed. 2018), at pp. 406-7; M. Gannage, "Nominal Damages for Breach of Contract in Canada" (2011), 69 Advocate 833, at p. 834; J. Cassels and E. Adjin-Tettey, Remedies: The Law of Damages (3rd ed. 2014), at p. 355). Assuming that the plaintiffs can ultimately prove the existence of a contract and its breach by ALC, they may be entitled to an award of nominal damages.

[106] Litigants have the right to pursue reasonable causes of action to vindicate their rights. In my view, the plaintiffs' breach of contract claim is a reasonable cause of action. As it is actionable without proof of d'une cause d'action pour violation de contrat. À mon avis, il y a matière à action en justice pour violation de contrat et matière à obtention de réparations contre la SLA même si les actes de procédure ne font pas état d'une perte personnelle en particulier. Par exemple, un tribunal qui conclut à la violation de contrat pourra faire des déclarations de droit obligatoires, qu'un redressement en conséquence soit ou puisse être demandé ou non, et qu'un jugement déclaratoire soit demandé ou non à titre de réparation (Rules of the Supreme Court, 1986, art. 7.16; voir aussi L. Sarna, The Law of Declaratory Judgments (4e éd. 2016), p. 5-6; Assoc. des femmes autochtones du Canada c. Canada, [1994] 3 R.C.S. 627, p. 647-648).

[105] De plus, des dommages-intérêts symboliques peuvent être accordés dans tous les cas de violation de contrat comme manière [TRADUCTION] « d'affirmer [. . .] qu'il y a atteinte à un droit reconnu par la loi » (Owners of the Steamship "Mediana" c. Owners, Master and Crew of the Lightship "Comet", [1900] A.C. 113 (H.L.), p. 116, le lord chancelier Halsbury). Par conséquent, les dommages-intérêts symboliques peuvent toujours être accordés pour des causes d'action, comme la violation de contrat, qui ne nécessitent pas une preuve de perte, même s'ils ne sont pas demandés dans les actes de procédure (voir, p. ex., Place Concorde East Ltd. Partnership c. Shelter Corp. of Canada Ltd. (2006), 211 O.A.C. 141, par. 56 et 75-78; Saskatchewan Government Insurance c. Wilson, 2012 SKCA 106, 405 Sask. R. 8, par. 13; J. Edelman, McGregor on Damages (20e éd. 2018), p. 406-407; M. Gannage, « Nominal Damages for Breach of Contract in Canada » (2011), 69 Advocate 833, p. 834; J. Cassels et E. Adjin-Tettey, Remedies : The Law of Damages (3e éd. 2014), p. 355). À supposer que les demandeurs puissent, au final, prouver l'existence d'un contrat et la violation de celui-ci par la SLA, ils pourraient avoir droit à des dommages-intérêts symboliques.

[106] Les plaideurs ont le droit de faire valoir des causes d'action raisonnables pour défendre leurs droits. À mon avis, la demande fondée sur la violation de contrat présentée par les demandeurs est une loss, it always necessarily implies nominal damages. This alone precludes striking the claim.

(b) Disgorgement of Profits

[107] While I agree with Brown J. that disgorgement is not an independent cause of action and has no reasonable chance of success as such, it does not follow that disgorgement cannot be pleaded as a remedy for breach of contract. As I will explain, disgorgement can be an appropriate remedy for breach of contract, though whether it is appropriate in this case is a matter for trial that cannot be resolved on the pleadings alone.

[109] Nevertheless, despite this usual approach, the compensation principle does not always apply; there are well-established exceptions to that principle and other forms of relief can be appropriate, such as specific performance of the contract or an injunction (IBM Canada Limited v. Waterman, 2013 SCC 70, [2013] 3 S.C.R. 985, at para. 36; Semelhago cause d'action raisonnable. Puisqu'elle donne ouverture à une action sans preuve de perte, elle implique toujours, nécessairement, des dommages-intérêts symboliques. Ce fait à lui seul exclut la radiation de la demande.

b) Restitution des gains illicites

[107] Bien que je sois d'accord avec le juge Brown pour dire que la restitution des gains illicites n'est pas une cause d'action indépendante et n'a aucune chance raisonnable de succès à ce titre, il ne s'ensuit pas que la restitution des gains illicites ne peut pas être plaidée en tant que réparation pour violation de contrat. Comme je l'expliquerai, la restitution des gains illicites peut être une réparation appropriée en cas de violation de contrat, même si la question de savoir si elle est appropriée en l'espèce doit être tranchée au procès, et ne peut l'être au vu des actes de procédure à eux seuls.

v. Paramadevan, [1996] 2 S.C.R. 415, at para. 14; R. J. Sharpe, Injunctions and Specific Performance (loose-leaf), at p. 2-1).

[110] And, in some cases, disgorgement of a defendant's profits can be an appropriate remedy for breach of contract. Disgorgement is a measure of relief based solely upon the defendant's profit rather than the plaintiff's loss (Edelman (2018), at pp. 472-73). It is an exceptional remedy, available where a plaintiff has shown that the ordinary remedies of contract law are inadequate to protect and vindicate their contractual right.

[111] In Attorney General v. Blake, [2001] 1 A.C. 268 (H.L.), the House of Lords ordered disgorgement of profit as a remedy for breach of contract. In 1989, George Blake, a former member of the United Kingdom's Secret Intelligence Service (and Soviet spy), entered into a contract to publish a book of state secrets that he had undertaken never to reveal, thereby breaching his contractual undertaking. By the time of publication, however, the information was not confidential and its disclosure caused no loss to the Crown. There was, therefore, nothing to compensate. Compensatory damages could neither vindicate the government's contractual right nor deter and denounce the wrong committed by the defendant.

[112] The majority of the House of Lords concluded that disgorgement of the profits gained from that publishing contract — some £90,000 — was the appropriate remedy in all the circumstances for the breach of the undertaking. In determining that disgorgement was the appropriate remedy, Lord Nicholls explained that:

Normally the remedies of damages, specific performance and injunction, coupled with the characterisation of some contractual obligations as fiduciary, will provide an adequate response to a breach of contract. It will be only in exceptional cases, where those remedies are inadequate, par. 36; Semelhago c. Paramadevan, [1996] 2 R.C.S. 415, par. 14; R. J. Sharpe, Injunctions and Specific Performance (feuilles mobiles), p. 2-1).

[112] Les juges majoritaires de la Chambre des lords ont conclu que la restitution des gains illicites tirés de ce contrat de publication — environ 90 000 £ — était la réparation appropriée eu égard à l'ensemble des circonstances pour la violation de l'engagement. En statuant que la restitution des gains illicites était la réparation appropriée, le lord Nicholls a expliqué ce qui suit :

that any question of accounting for profits will arise. [p. 285]

[113] Lord Nicholls held that "[n]o fixed rules can be prescribed" in this analysis and stressed the importance of having regard to all the circumstances, including:

(a) the subject matter of the contract;

(b) the purpose of the contractual provision which has been breached;

(c) the circumstances in which the breach occurred;

(d) the consequences of the breach; and

(e) the circumstances in which relief is being sought.

[114] The majority of the House of Lords concluded that disgorgement was appropriate in the circumstances, including that: the Attorney General had a legitimate interest in preventing Blake from profiting from the disclosure of confidential information; Blake had a quasi-fiduciary obligation to the intelligence service; Blake's profits indirectly stemmed from his breaches in the 1950s (which brought him notoriety leading to the book deal); and allowing agents a financial incentive to violate their undertaking would endanger the effectiveness of the intelligence service (pp. 286-87).

[115] While Blake set a standard for disgorgement in "exceptional circumstances", some have emphasized the need to further circumscribe and better reconcile the remedy with private law principles (see, e.g., A. Swan, J. Adamski and A. Y. Na, Canadian Contract Law (4th ed. 2018), at p. 582; S. M. Waddams, "Breach of Contract and the Concept of Wrongdoing" (2000), 12 S.C.L.R. (2d) 1, at pp. 7-13). The disgorgement remedy can appear more difficult to justify under traditional contract principles than compensatory or restitutionary damages, as the measure of relief is not based on what was been transferred or subtracted from the claimant que dans des situations exceptionnelles, lorsque ces réparations sont inadéquates, que se posera la question de la remise des profits. [p. 285]

[113] Le lord Nicholls a statué [TRADUCTION] « [qu'a]ucune règle fixe ne peut être prescrite » dans cette analyse et il a souligné l'importance de tenir compte de l'ensemble des circonstances, y compris :

a) l'objet du contrat;

b) l'objet de la clause contractuelle qui a fait l'objet de la violation;

c) les circonstances dans lesquelles la violation s'est produite;

d) les conséquences de cette violation;

e) les circonstances dans lesquelles la réparation est demandée.

(J. Edelman, Gain-Based Damages: Contract, Tort, Equity and Intellectual Property (2002), at p. 81).

[116] But non-compensatory remedies for breach of contract are not inherently contrary to private law principles. For example, punitive damages may be awarded for breach of contract, even though they bear no relation to what the plaintiff should receive in compensation (see, e.g., Whiten v. Pilot Insurance Co., 2002 SCC 18, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 595, at para. 92). Thus, the availability of punitive damages for breach of contract confirms that gain-based remedies, such as disgorgement, are compatible with the existing scheme of remedies for private wrongs (R. J. Sharpe, "Commercial Law Damages: Market Efficiency or Regulation of Behaviour?", in The Law Society of Upper Canada, ed., Special Lectures 2005: The Modern Law of Damages (2006), 327, at p. 346).

[117] Indeed, it has been posited that the existence of disgorgement as a remedy is primarily justified by the need to deter wrongful conduct, underpinned by the recurring principle of contract law that a wrongdoer should not be permitted to profit from their wrong (Edelman (2002), at pp. 81-83; K. Barnett, Accounting for Profit for Breach of Contract: Theory and Practice (2012), at pp. 12 and 26; Attorney-General v. Observer Ltd., [1990] 1 A.C. 109 (H.L.), at p. 286; J. D. McCamus, "Disgorgement for Breach of Contract: A Comparative Perspective" (2003), 36 Loy. L.A. L. Rev. 943, at p. 945). Although compensatory damages will often help to achieve deterrence of wrongful conduct (Royal Bank of Canada v. W. Got & Associates Electric Ltd., [1999] 3 S.C.R. 408, at para. 28), they will not always be adequate or appropriate in the circumstances of the breach. And since disgorgement awards are limited by the amount of profit, the measure of the award implicitly effects deterrence and is "dictated by the minimum amount necessary to make the wrong unprofitable" (Edelman (2002), at p. 83).

puisque l'évaluation du redressement n'est pas fondée sur ce qui a été transféré ou soustrait du demandeur (J. Edelman, Gain-Based Damages : Contract, Tort, Equity and Intellectual Property (2002), p. 81).

[118] Further, it is clear that disgorgement awards are not limited to situations in which they serve a compensatory purpose. While the United Kingdom Supreme Court has recognized that some remedies that appear to be gain-based serve compensatory purposes (One Step (Support) Ltd. v. Morris-Garner, [2018] UKSC 20, [2018] 3 All E.R. 659, at para. 91), the remedy in Blake cannot be described as compensatory. The facts of Blake make clear that an award of disgorgement may be available without the claimant's having suffered a loss to be compensated, and Canadian courts have suggested that disgorgement may be available where "expectation damages are not readily quantifiable, or where the circumstances of the case call for a different measure of damages to provide an effective remedy" (Nunavut Tunngavik Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2014 NUCA 2, 580 A.R. 75, at para. 85 (emphasis added)). Compensatory principles of contract law do not explain why a disgorgement remedy may be necessary to vindicate or protect a contractual right in a particular case.

[118] De plus, il est clair que les réparations de restitution des gains illicites ne se limitent pas aux situations où elles servent une fin compensatoire. Bien que la Cour suprême du Royaume-Uni ait reconnu que certaines réparations qui semblent fondées sur les gains réalisés servent des fins compensatoires (One Step (Support) Ltd. c. Morris-Garner, [2018] UKSC 20, [2018] 3 All E.R. 659, par. 91), la réparation dont il est question dans l'arrêt Blake ne saurait être qualifiée de compensatoire. Il ressort clairement des faits dans l'arrêt Blake qu'une réparation de restitution des gains illicites peut être ordonnée sans que le demandeur ait subi une perte devant être indemnisée, et les tribunaux canadiens ont laissé entendre que la restitution des gains illicites pouvait être ordonnée lorsque [TRADUCTION] « les dommages-intérêts en fonction de la perte du profit escompté ne sont pas facilement quantifiables, ou lorsque les circonstances de l'affaire commandent une évaluation différente des dommages-intérêts pour accorder une réparation efficace » (Nunavut Tunngavik Inc. c. Canada (Attorney General), 2014 NUCA 2, 580 A.R. 75, par. 85 (je souligne)). Les principes d'indemnisation du droit des contrats n'expliquent pas pourquoi une réparation de restitution des gains illicites peut être nécessaire pour défendre ou protéger un droit contractuel dans une affaire donnée.

[119] For example, although it may not support disgorgement on its own, a self-interested and deliberate breach weighs in favour of disgorgement when awarding compensatory damages alone would fail to deter wrongdoers who are "prepared to hurt somebody" because they "may well gain by doing so" (Edelman (2002), at p. 84, quoting Cassell & Co. Ltd. v. Broome, [1972] A.C. 1027 (H.L.), at p. 1094; see also P. Birks, "Restitutionary damages for breach of contract: Snepp and the fusion of law and equity" (1987), 4 L.M.C.L.Q. 421; American Law Institute, Restatement of the Law, Third: Restitution and Unjust Enrichment (2011), vol. 2, at §40).

[120] Further, when calculating loss is impracticable, a narrow focus on compensation may relieve a wrongdoer from the obligation to remedy their wrong, whereas an award of disgorgement ensures that those who breach their contracts do not do so for free (see Nunavut Tunngavik, at paras. 85 and 88; Esso Petroleum Co. Ltd. v. Niad Ltd., [2001] EWHC Ch. 458, at para. 63).

[121] And there are multiple circumstances in which a plaintiff has a legitimate interest in preventing the defendant's profit-making activity, even when they themselves may have suffered no loss. These include where the defendant expressly contracted not to do the particular thing that constituted the breach (Chitty on Contracts, vol. I, General Principles (33rd ed. 2018), at para. 26-063; Experience Hendrix LLC v. PPX Enterprises Inc., [2003] EWCA Civ. 323, at paras. 30 and 36); where the defendant had a quasi-fiduciary duty to the plaintiff (Blake, at p. 287); and where the plaintiff's contractual right is quasi-proprietary, such as in Blake, where the information released by Blake "in a sense, belonged to the government" but was used for his own gain (S. Waddams, Principle and Policy in Contract Law: Competing or Complementary Concepts? (2011), at p. 201; see also D. Friedmann, "Restitution of Benefits Obtained Through the Appropriation of Property or the Commission of a Wrong" (1980), 80 Colum. L. Rev. 504).

[122] I cannot agree that it is plain and obvious that a quasi-fiduciary duty should be rejected as a factor justifying a disgorgement remedy. This Court has explicitly referred to the existence of quasi-fiduciary duties as an unresolved question and it is not appropriate to resolve that question on this motion to strike in the absence of argument (see RBC Dominion Securities Inc. v. Merrill Lynch Canada Inc., 2008 SCC 54, [2008] 3 S.C.R. 79, at para. 22). I would thus not rule out the possibility that contractual relationships based on trust, confidence, and the protection of vulnerability arising from the relationship could give rise to a disgorgement remedy even if they are not strictly fiduciary (see A. R. Sangiuliano, "A Corrective Justice Account of Disgorgement for Breach of Contract by Analogy to Fiduciary Remedies" (2016), 29 Can. J.L. & Jur. 149, at p. 178). In such cases, as Lord Steyn wrote d'une faute de l'obligation de réparer le tort qu'il a causé, alors qu'une réparation de restitution des gains illicites fait en sorte que ceux qui violent leurs contrats ne le font pas impunément (voir Nunavut Tunngavik, par. 85 et 88; Esso Petroleum Co. Ltd. c. Niad Ltd., [2001] EWHC Ch. 458, par. 63).

[121] Par ailleurs, il existe de multiples situations où un demandeur a un intérêt légitime à empêcher les activités lucratives du défendeur, même lorsqu'il n'a pas lui-même subi de perte. Ces situations comprennent le cas où le défendeur s'est engagé expressément à ne pas faire la chose qui constituait la violation (Chitty on Contracts, vol. 1, General Principles (33e éd. 2018), par. 26-063; Experience Hendrix LLC c. PPX Enterprises Inc., [2003] EWCA Civ. 323, par. 30 et 36); le cas où le défendeur a une obligation quasi-fiduciaire envers le demandeur (Blake, p. 287); et le cas où le droit contractuel du demandeur est quasi propriétal, comme dans l'arrêt Blake, où les renseignements révélés par M. Blake [TRADUCTION] « appartenaient, en un sens, au gouvernement », mais ont été utilisés pour son propre gain (S. Waddams, Principle and Policy in Contract Law : Competing or Complementary Concepts? (2011), p. 201; voir aussi D. Friedmann, « Restitution of Benefits Obtained Through the Appropriation of Property or the Commission of a Wrong » (1980), 80 Colum. L. Rev. 504).

[122] Je ne peux me rallier à la thèse voulant qu'il est évident et manifeste qu'une obligation quasi-fiduciaire devrait être rejetée à titre de facteur justifiant une réparation de restitution des gains illicites. La Cour a expressément mentionné l'existence d'obligations quasi-fiduciaires en tant que question non réglée et il ne convient pas de régler cette question dans le cadre de la présente requête en radiation en l'absence d'arguments (voir RBC Dominion Valeurs mobilières Inc. c. Merrill Lynch Canada Inc., 2008 CSC 54, [2008] 3 R.C.S. 79, par. 22). En conséquence, je n'écarterais pas la possibilité que des relations contractuelles fondées sur la confiance et la protection de la vulnérabilité découlant de cette relation puissent donner lieu à une réparation de restitution des gains illicites même si elles ne sont pas strictement fiduciaires (voir A. R. Sangiuliano, « A Corrective Justice Account of Disgorgement in Blake, it is arguable that "[t]he reason of the rule applying to fiduciaries" may apply to the defendant (at p. 292 (emphasis added)), even if the rule itself does not.

[123] The overarching question in awarding disgorgement for breach of contract is whether, in all the circumstances, other remedies would not adequately protect or vindicate the contractual right (Blake, at p. 285; Edelman (2002), at pp. 154-55; Barnett, at p. 11; McCamus, at p. 961). I agree with Lord Nicholls's speech in Blake that when assessing whether disgorgement is appropriate, a non-exhaustive list of factors is to be preferred over a hard and fast rule. No single factor is necessarily crucial or dispositive; these considerations may work in tandem to support a disgorgement remedy (Waddams (2011), at pp. 200-201; see also Blake, at p. 285; Chitty on Contracts, at para. 26-063).

[124] The plaintiffs' pleadings in this case correspond with several factors that, if established at trial, may point to a disgorgement remedy. For example, the pleading that ALC's breach was self-interested, deliberate, and in bad faith may engage the deterrence rationale. Similarly, the plaintiffs' pleading that they were vulnerable to ALC's abuse of its power and the public trust may engage some of the values underlying fiduciary relationships, as was the case in Blake. The pleading that the plaintiffs' relationship with ALC engages trust, confidence, and vulnerability tends to distinguish it from a standard commercial relationship, a factor which supports recovery (see Vercoe v. Rutland Fund Management Ltd., [2010] EWHC 424, at paras. 340-43).

for Breach of Contract by Analogy to Fiduciary Remedies » (2016), 29 Can. J.L. & Jur. 149, p. 178). Dans de tels cas, comme l'a écrit le lord Steyn dans l'arrêt Blake, on peut soutenir qu'il est possible que [TRADUCTION] « [l]a raison qui sous-tend la règle applicable aux fiduciaires » s'applique au défendeur (p. 292 (je souligne)), même si la règle elle-même ne s'y applique pas.

circumstances for breach of contract, in my view, whether the circumstances of this case are exceptional is clearly a determination for the trial judge alone. I am not persuaded that the trial judge will inevitably conclude that there is nothing exceptional about this case, or that the plaintiffs' claim is simply that they paid to play a gambling game and did not get exactly what they paid for. The plaintiffs pleaded that ALC, a corporation charged with managing a profit-making lottery scheme offered to the public, intentionally deceived those playing members of the public by knowingly providing an unfair game and putting them at risk of gambling addiction in order to turn a profit. They specifically pleaded that they had a legitimate interest in ALC's performance of its contractual obligation to provide safe games and that remedies other than disgorgement would be inadequate to deter ALC from misconduct. In assessing whether other remedies would be inadequate to protect their contractual rights, a trial judge may also find that ascertaining the actual amount lost is impracticable since VLTs are designed for players to have the opportunity to "win small cash prizes in exchange for small frequent cash bets" and not to create records of who uses them or how much money they have lost. The trial judge may even conclude that ALC's conduct in approving such designs may have, purposefully or not, contributed to that impracticability, such that the plaintiffs were not simply unwilling to prove their loss. These are matters for the trial judge.

gains illicites ne peut être ordonnée que dans des circonstances exceptionnelles pour violation de contrat, à mon avis, il est clair que seul le juge de première instance peut trancher la question de savoir si les circonstances de la présente affaire sont exceptionnelles. Je ne suis pas convaincue que le juge de première instance conclura inévitablement que la présente affaire n'a rien d'exceptionnel, ou que les demandeurs prétendent simplement qu'ils ont payé pour jouer à un jeu de hasard et qu'ils n'ont pas obtenu exactement ce pour quoi ils ont payé. Les demandeurs ont soutenu que la SLA, une société chargée d'administrer un système de loteries à but lucratif offert au public, avait intentionnellement trompé les membres du public joueurs en fournissant sciemment un jeu injuste et en les exposant à un risque de dépendance au jeu afin de réaliser un profit. Ils ont expressément plaidé qu'ils avaient un intérêt légitime à ce que la SLA exécute son obligation contractuelle d'offrir des jeux sûrs et que les réparations autres que la restitution des gains illicites ne conviendraient pas pour dissuader la SLA d'adopter une conduite fautive. Lorsqu'il évalue si d'autres réparations seraient inadéquates pour protéger leurs droits contractuels, le juge de première instance peut aussi conclure qu'il est impossible en pratique de fixer le montant réellement perdu, puisque les ALV sont conçus pour que les joueurs aient la possibilité de [TRADUCTION] « gagner de petits lots en argent en contrepartie de petites mises d'argent fréquentes » et non pour créer des relevés identifiant les utilisateurs ou les montants d'argent qu'ils ont perdu. Le juge de première instance peut même conclure que la conduite de la SLA en ce qu'elle a approuvé un tel fonctionnement peut, à dessein ou non, avoir contribué à cette impossibilité pratique, de sorte que les demandeurs n'ont pas simplement refusé de prouver leur perte. Ce sont là des questions que le juge de première instance doit trancher.

[126] The plaintiffs' decision not to prove individualized loss, personal injury, or specific claims based on addiction is not fatal. As is evident from Blake, loss is not a legal prerequisite for disgorgement. The plaintiffs instead seek remedies based on a breach of contract allegedly suffered by all class members, and what ultimately matters is whether other remedies for breach of contract would be inadequate to vindicate and protect the plaintiffs' contractual rights.

[127] Finally, Brown J. finds that because the plaintiffs have failed to demonstrate a causal link between the remedy sought and the alleged breach of contract, there can be no remedy of disgorgement on these pleadings. Pleadings, however, are not required to set out the evidence on which the parties will rely. Whether the plaintiffs will be able to prove causation between the breach and the gain to be disgorged is a matter of evidence, as I discuss below, but does not preclude disgorgement as an available remedy as a matter of law.

[128] As Lord Steyn noted in Blake, when to award disgorgement is an issue "best hammered out on the anvil of concrete cases" (p. 291). This is best done based upon evidence at trial.

(c) Punitive Damages

[129] The plaintiffs have also pleaded a sufficient basis to support a claim for punitive damages: their allegations of reprehensible conduct and deception in the performance of a contract have put the duty of honest performance in issue.

[130] The objective of punitive damages is to punish the defendant rather than compensate a plaintiff (Whiten, at para. 36). They are to be awarded where the defendant's conduct is "so malicious, oppressive and high-handed that it offends the court's sense of decency" (Hill v. Church of Scientology of Toronto, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 1130, at para. 196). Critically, the focus of punitive damages is on the defendant's misconduct, not the plaintiff's loss (Whiten, at para. 73), and injury to the plaintiff is not a condition precedent fondées sur une violation de contrat dont tous les membres du groupe auraient été victimes, et ce qui compte en définitive est de savoir si les autres réparations pour violation de contrat seraient inadéquates pour défendre et protéger les droits contractuels des demandeurs.

c) Dommages-intérêts punitifs

[130] Les dommages-intérêts punitifs ont pour objet de punir le défendeur, plutôt que d'indemniser le demandeur (Whiten, par. 36). Il y a lieu de les accorder lorsque la conduite du défendeur est « si malveillante, opprimante et abusive qu'elle choque le sens de dignité de la cour » (Hill c. Église de scientologie de Toronto, [1995] 2 R.C.S. 1130, par. 196). Fait crucial, les dommages-intérêts punitifs se rattachent à la conduite répréhensible du défendeur, et non à la perte du demandeur (Whiten, par. 73), to an award of punitive damages (H. D. Pitch and R. M. Snyder, Damages for Breach of Contract (looseleaf), at pp. 4-1 to 4-2).

[131] The misconduct at issue must "take it beyond the usual opprobrium that surrounds breaking a contract", and punitive damages should only be resorted to in "exceptional cases" (Fidler, at para. 62). In addition to this exceptional conduct requirement, the defendant's conduct giving rise to the claim must itself be an independent actionable wrong (Whiten, at para. 78; Fidler, at para. 63).

[132] This Court confirmed in Whiten that an independent actionable wrong does not require an independent tort, and held that a breach of the contractual duty of good faith can constitute an "actionable wrong" to ground a claim for punitive damages (para. 79). I note that since the pleadings in this case were filed in 2012, this Court in Bhasin v. Hrynew, 2014 SCC 71, [2014] 3 S.C.R. 494, has recognized a duty of honest performance applicable to all contracts as a "general doctrine of contract law" (at paras. 74-75 and 93): parties "must not lie or otherwise knowingly mislead each other about matters directly linked to the performance of the contract" (para. 73). Bhasin was resolved on the basis of a breach of that duty alone.

[133] The plaintiffs have pleaded a breach of the duty of honest performance recognized in Bhasin. They allege that the contractual relations between ALC and consumers of VLT gaming are subject to an implied term of good faith. In addition to this allegation, the pleadings are replete with allegations of dishonesty — that VLTs are "inherently deceptive", "give a false impression of the odds of winning", "manipulate" consumers, and contain a "stop" button that is "deceitful" (Statement of Claim, at paras. 12, 14, 19 and 21) — and allege ALC's full knowledge et il n'est pas nécessaire que le demandeur ait subi un préjudice pour que des dommages-intérêts punitifs soient accordés (H. D. Pitch et R. M. Snyder, Damages for Breach of Contract (feuilles mobiles), p. 4-1 à 4-2).

of that deception. In Bhasin itself, Cromwell J. recognized that allegations of dishonesty were sufficient to put the duty of honest performance in issue (para. 19).

[134] Thus, I disagree with Brown J.'s conclusion that the alleged contract between ALC and the plaintiffs does not give rise to an established duty of good faith. The plaintiffs have specifically pleaded punitive damages, as well as facts to justify such damages with sufficient particularity (Whiten, at paras. 85-86). There is no reason to conclude that punitive damages are unavailable to these plaintiffs as a matter of law.

(3) Conclusion on Motion to Strike the Breach of Contract Claim

[135] I therefore conclude that the plaintiffs' statement of claim discloses a reasonable cause of action for breach of contract, with several potential remedies available to the plaintiffs at law. There is no basis to strike their claim for breach of contract.

C. Certification

[136] There are five requirements for certification of a class action: (1) the pleadings must disclose a cause of action, (2) there must be an identifiable class of two or more persons, (3) the proposed representative must be appropriate, (4) there must be at least one common issue, and (5) the class action must be the preferable procedure (CAA, s. 5).

[137] The parties agreed that the outcome of the motion to strike would determine the first factor of the certification analysis under s. 5(1) and the breach of contract claim therefore satisfies that requirement. There is no serious dispute that the proposed representatives are appropriate. The third parties dispute the remaining three requirements.

sont munis d'un bouton d'arrêt qui est « trompeur » (déclaration, par. 12, 14, 19 et 21) — et ils allèguent que la SLA était parfaitement consciente de cette tromperie. Dans l'arrêt Bhasin, le juge Cromwell a reconnu que les allégations de malhonnêteté suffisaient à mettre en cause l'obligation d'exécution honnête (par. 19).

(3) Conclusion sur la requête en radiation de la demande fondée sur la violation de contrat

[135] En conséquence, je conclus que la déclaration des demandeurs révèle une cause d'action raisonnable pour violation de contrat, et que plusieurs réparations sont susceptibles d'être accordées en droit aux demandeurs. Rien ne justifie de radier leur demande fondée sur la violation de contrat.

C. Autorisation d'exercer un recours collectif

[136] Cinq conditions doivent être réunies pour l'autorisation d'un recours collectif : (1) les actes de procédure doivent révéler une cause d'action, (2) il doit exister un groupe identifiable d'au moins deux personnes, (3) le représentant proposé doit être approprié, (4) il doit y avoir au moins une question commune et (5) le recours collectif doit être le meilleur moyen de régler ces questions (CAA, art. 5).

[138] The class representative must show that there is some "basis in fact" for each remaining requirement (Pro-Sys Consultants Ltd. v. Microsoft Corporation, 2013 SCC 57, [2013] 3 S.C.R. 477, at para. 99; Hollick v. Toronto (City), 2001 SCC 68, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 158, at para. 25). Certification requires that the representative plaintiff provide a "certain minimum evidentiary basis" (Hollick, at para. 24 (emphasis omitted), citing Taub v. Manufacturers Life Insurance Co. (1998), 40 O.R. (3d) 379 (Gen. Div.), at pp. 380-81), and the "basis in fact" standard ensures that there is an evidentiary foundation to support the certification order, even if that record is not exhaustive or one upon which the merits will be argued (AIC Limited v. Fischer, 2013 SCC 69, [2013] 3 S.C.R. 949, at para. 41, citing McCracken v. Canadian National Railway Co., 2012 ONCA 445, 111 O.R. (3d) 745, at paras. 75-76). The certification process "does not allow for an extensive assessment of the complexities and challenges that a plaintiff may face in establishing its case at trial" and the approach is not to engage "in a robust analysis of the merits at the certification stage" (Microsoft, at para. 105), but to instead ensure that the action is suited to being a class proceeding (Pro-Sys Consultants Ltd. v. Infineon Technologies AG, 2009 BCCA 503, 312 D.L.R. (4th) 419, at para. 65; Hollick, at para. 16).

[139] At first instance, the application judge decided to certify the action on certain common issues (see appendix). The majority of the Court of Appeal amended the certification order in light of the claims it struck, but otherwise found that ALC and the third parties' arguments on appeal were no more than an attempt to reargue the factual and discretionary issues before the application judge.

(1) Identifiable Class of Two or More Persons

[140] The class is defined in the certification application as "[n]atural persons and their estates, resident in Newfoundland and Labrador, who, during the Class Period, paid the Defendant [ALC] to gamble on VLT games, excluding video poker and [138] Le représentant du groupe doit établir l'existence d'un certain « fondement factuel » pour chacune des conditions restantes (Pro-Sys Consultants Ltd. c. Microsoft Corporation, 2013 CSC 57, [2013] 3 R.C.S. 477, par. 99; Hollick c. Toronto (Ville), 2001 CSC 68, [2001] 3 R.C.S. 158, par. 25). L'autorisation exige que le représentant des demandeurs offre un « minimum d'éléments probants » (Hollick, par. 24 (soulignement omis), citant Taub c. Manufacturers Life Insurance Co. (1998), 40 O.R. (3d) 379 (Div. gén.), p. 380-381), et la norme du « fondement factuel » assure qu'il existe une preuve sur laquelle peut reposer l'ordonnance d'autorisation, même si cette preuve n'est pas exhaustive ou n'est pas propre à présider au débat sur le fond (AIC Limitée c. Fischer, 2013 CSC 69, [2013] 3 R.C.S. 949, par. 41, citant McCracken c. Canadian National Railway Co., 2012 ONCA 445, 111 O.R. (3d) 745, par. 75-76). Le processus d'autorisation « ne permet pas d'apprécier toutes les difficultés et tous les défis que le demandeur devra surmonter pour prouver ses allégations au procès » et l'approche consiste à ne pas se livrer « à une analyse rigoureuse sur le fond à l'étape de la certification » (Microsoft, par. 105), mais plutôt à assurer que l'action se prête à un recours collectif (Pro-Sys Consultants Ltd. c. Infineon Technologies AG, 2009 BCCA 503, 312 D.L.R. (4th) 419, par. 65; Hollick, par. 16).

(1) Groupe identifiable d'au moins deux personnes

[140] Dans la demande d'autorisation, le groupe est défini comme suit : [TRADUCTION] « Personnes physiques et leurs successions, résidant à Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador qui, durant la période visée par le recours collectif, ont payé la défenderesse [la SLA]

keno games, in Newfoundland and Labrador". The third parties submit that the class is "indeterminate" because there is "no conceivable way to verify who the class members are".

[141] The identifiable class requirement ensures it is possible to determine who is entitled to notice, who is entitled to relief, and who will be bound by the final judgment (Sun-Rype Products Ltd. v. Archer Daniels Midland Company, 2013 SCC 58, [2013] 3 S.C.R. 545, at para. 57). There must be some basis in fact that at least two persons will be able to self-identify as members of the class, and a person's claim to membership in the class must "be determinable by stated, objective criteria" (Western Canadian Shopping Centres Inc. v. Dutton, 2001 SCC 46, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 534, at para. 38; Jiang v. Peoples Trust Co., 2017 BCCA 119, 408 D.L.R. (4th) 1, at para. 81).

[142] In this case, the proposed class definition uses objective criteria that will allow for identification of those who can attest to playing the games, and there is a basis to believe that at least two persons will be able to establish that they paid ALC to gamble on VLT games during the proposed class period. This can be distinguished from the proposed class in Sun-Rype, which was defined as those who had purchased products containing a particular ingredient, which was often used interchangeably with another, and with product labels that did not identify it. In that case, there was no basis in fact to show that the putative class members would have had the information to determine their own class membership (Sun-Rype, at paras. 61-65). Here, there is no such evidentiary concern that would prevent individuals from determining their membership, and the fact that the number of class members or the identity of each class member is not or may not be determined is not a bar to certification (CAA, s. 8(d)).

pour jouer à des jeux de hasard sur des ALV, excluant les jeux de vidéopoker et de keno, à Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador ». Les tierces parties affirment que le groupe est [TRADUCTION] « indéterminé », parce qu'il « est impossible de concevoir une façon de vérifier qui en sont les membres ».

[142] En l'espèce, la définition du groupe proposée s'appuie sur des critères objectifs qui permettront l'identification des personnes qui peuvent attester avoir pris part aux jeux, et il existe des motifs de croire qu'au moins deux personnes seront capables d'établir qu'ils ont payé la SLA pour jouer à des jeux de hasard sur un ALV durant la période visée par le recours collectif. Cette situation se distingue de celle du groupe proposé dans l'arrêt Sun-Rype, qui avait été défini comme les personnes qui avaient acheté des produits contenant un ingrédient en particulier, lequel était souvent utilisé de façon interchangeable avec un autre, et avec des étiquettes de produits qui ne l'identifiait pas. Dans cette affaire, aucun fondement factuel ne permettait d'établir que les membres du groupe proposé auraient disposé des renseignements nécessaires pour déterminer s'ils appartenaient ou non au groupe (Sun-Rype, par. 61-65). En l'espèce, aucun problème de preuve semblable n'empêcherait les individus de déterminer s'ils appartiennent au groupe, et le fait que le nombre de membres du groupe ou l'identité de chaque membre de celui-ci ne soit pas déterminé ou ne puisse peut-être pas l'être n'empêche pas l'autorisation du recours collectif (CAA, al. 8(d)).

(2) Common Issues

[143] The common issue requirement for certification is met if the "claims of the class members raise a common issue, whether or not the common issue is the dominant issue" (CAA, s. 5(1)(c)). An issue is common where its resolution is necessary to the resolution of each class member's claim (Dutton, at para. 39). Issues are not common when they are dependent upon findings of fact that must be made with respect to each individual claimant (Williams v. Mutual Life Assurance Co. of Canada (2000), 51 O.R. (3d) 54 (S.C.J.), at para. 39, aff'd (2003), 226 D.L.R. (4th) 112 (Ont. C.A.)). Findings made by the application judge on these issues are entitled to deference from an appellate court (Microsoft, at para. 111). As recognized in Pioneer Corp. v. Godfrey, 2019 SCC 42, [2019] 3 S.C.R. 295, at paras. 110-11, identification of an issue as common to the members of the class is a question of fact that attracts the standard of review of palpable and overriding error.

[144] In light of the causes of action that have been struck from the plaintiffs' statement of claim, only four of the common issues as certified by the application judge remain relevant to the plaintiffs' breach of contract claim:

(e) Has the Defendant breached a duty owed in contract or tort?

(f) Can monetary relief be measured on an aggregate, class-wide basis and, if so, what is the amount of aggregate monetary relief?

(g) If the answer to Issue (f) is no, can loss or damage be measured by the gain to the Defendant, and if so, what is the appropriate restitutionary remedy and in what amount?

(2) Questions communes

[143] La condition relative à l'existence d'une question commune pour qu'il y ait autorisation du recours collectif est remplie si les [TRADUCTION] « demandes des membres du groupe soulèvent une question commune, que celle-ci soit ou non la question dominante » (CAA, al. 5(1)(c)). Une question est commune lorsque sa résolution est nécessaire pour le règlement des demandes de chaque membre du groupe (Dutton, par. 39). Lorsqu'elles dépendent de conclusions de fait qui doivent être tirées à l'égard de chaque demandeur individuel, les questions ne sont pas communes (Williams c. Mutual Life Assurance Co. of Canada (2000), 51 O.R. (3d) 54 (C.S.J.), par. 39, conf. par (2003), 226 D.L.R. (4th) 112 (C.A. Ont.)). Une cour d'appel doit faire preuve de déférence à l'égard des conclusions tirées par le juge saisi de la demande sur ces questions (Microsoft, par. 111). Comme l'a reconnu la Cour dans l'arrêt Pioneer Corp. c. Godfrey, 2019 CSC 42, [2019] 3 R.C.S. 295, par. 110-111, l'identification d'une question comme étant commune aux membres du groupe est une question de fait qui entraîne l'application de la norme de contrôle de l'erreur manifeste et déterminante.

[144] Compte tenu des causes d'action qui ont été radiées de la déclaration des demandeurs, seulement quatre des questions communes certifiées par le juge saisi de la demande demeurent pertinentes à l'égard de la demande fondée sur la violation de contrat présentée par les demandeurs :

e) La défenderesse a-t-elle manqué à une obligation ayant un fondement contractuel ou délictuel?

f) Les mesures de redressement pécuniaire peuvent-elles être évaluées globalement, à l'échelle du groupe et, dans l'affirmative, quel en est le montant?

g) Si la réponse à la question f) est négative, la perte ou le préjudice peut-il être calculé en fonction du gain réalisé par la défenderesse et, dans l'affirmative, quelle est la réparation par restitution appropriée et quel en est le montant?

(i) Should punitive or exemplary damages be awarded against the Defendant and, if so, in what amount?

[145] These issues overlap with one another, use unclear restitutionary language to describe the remaining claim for disgorgement of profits, and make reference to claims that have been struck. In my view, four core issues remain to be considered in this proposed class action:

(a) whether ALC breached a duty owed in contract;

(b) whether disgorgement of ALC's profits is an appropriate remedy;

(c) whether monetary relief can be measured on an aggregate, class-wide basis and, if so, the amount; and

(d) whether punitive or exemplary damages should be awarded against ALC and, if so, the amount.

I conclude that all but the issue relating to aggregate monetary relief are appropriate common issues.

(a) Breach of Contract

[146] The third parties submit that liability is not a common issue because only some class members became problem gamblers. They argue that it will have to be individually determined whether each person became a problem gambler and whether their loss of control was caused by the characteristics of the machines.

[147] I disagree. First, the third parties have approached this issue as though the plaintiffs' claim seeks recovery of losses particular to each problem gambler; this does not reflect the proposed class, nor the theory of the plaintiffs' case, as they chose not to prove individual loss or use personal injury as the measure of damages. The pleadings instead assert a civil wrong that is common to each member

i) Y a-t-il lieu de condamner la défenderesse à verser des dommages-intérêts punitifs ou exemplaires et, dans l'affirmative, quel devrait en être le montant?

[145] Ces questions se recoupent, elles emploient des termes imprécis en matière de restitution pour décrire la demande restante pour la restitution des gains illicites et elles renvoient à des demandes qui ont été radiées. À mon avis, il reste quatre questions fondamentales à examiner dans le présent recours collectif proposé :

a) La SLA a-t-elle manqué à une obligation contractuelle?

b) La restitution des gains illicites de la SLA est-elle une réparation appropriée?

c) Les mesures de redressement pécuniaire peuvent-elles être évaluées globalement, à l'échelle du groupe et, dans l'affirmative, quel en est le montant?

d) Y a-t-il lieu de condamner la SLA à verser des dommages-intérêts punitifs ou exemplaires et, dans l'affirmative, de quel montant?

Je conclus que ce sont toutes des questions communes appropriées, à l'exception de celle relative aux mesures de redressement pécuniaire globales.

a) Violation de contrat

of the class. Second, the VLTs are the vehicle for a contract between ALC and the consumer. Each time a consumer pays money to play the VLT, they enter into the same implied contract, carried out in the same way, based on the programming of the VLTs. The expert's affidavit suggests that what players see on the VLT screen conceals and misrepresents how the game actually works. Whether the terms alleged by the plaintiffs are in fact implied will be the same for each consumer. Whether the functioning of the VLTs routinely violates those terms would also be the same for every consumer and will be necessary to resolve each member's claim (Dutton, at para. 39). I would not disturb the finding of the courts below that breach of contract is a common issue.

(b) Disgorgement

[148] The plaintiffs seek an accounting or disgorgement of ALC's profits for the breach of contract claim. The third parties say that assessing ALC's gain from its breach of contract would require individual determination because some players have become problem gamblers and some have not. They submit that the amount of any benefit to ALC as a result of the breach of contract will have to be individually determined. In short, the third parties' submission is that success for one class member does not mean success for all.

[149] While I agree that the required causal link for disgorgement may preclude certification of some aspects of the disgorgement analysis (such as quantum, discussed below in relation to aggregate monetary relief), I am not persuaded that no aspect of disgorgement as a remedy can be determined on a class-wide basis. In my view, whether a disgorgement award is appropriate, based on the multi-factored analysis described above, can be determined for the entire class les dommages-intérêts. Les actes de procédure invoquent plutôt une faute civile qui est commune à tous les membres du groupe. En second lieu, les ALV servent de véhicule à un contrat entre la SLA et le consommateur. Chaque fois qu'un consommateur verse de l'argent pour jouer sur un ALV, il conclut le même contrat implicite, exécuté de la même façon, fondé sur la programmation des ALV. Selon l'affidavit de l'expert, ce que les joueurs voient à l'écran de l'ALV dissimule et représente faussement le fonctionnement réel du jeu. La question de savoir si les conditions qu'allèguent les demandeurs sont effectivement implicites sera la même pour chaque consommateur. La question de savoir si le fonctionnement des ALV viole systématiquement ces conditions serait également la même pour chaque consommateur et il faudra y répondre pour trancher la demande de chaque membre (Dutton, par. 39). Je suis d'avis de ne pas modifier la conclusion des juridictions inférieures selon laquelle la violation de contrat est une question commune.

b) Restitution des gains illicites

[148] Les demandeurs sollicitent une remise ou la restitution des gains illicites de la SLA au titre de la demande fondée sur la violation de contrat. Les tierces parties affirment que pour évaluer le gain qu'a tiré la SLA de la violation de contrat, il faudrait le faire au cas par cas, car certains joueurs sont devenus des joueurs à problèmes et d'autres non. Ils soutiennent que le montant de tout bénéfice de la SLA découlant de la violation de contrat devra être déterminé au cas par cas. Bref, selon les tierces parties, le succès d'un membre du groupe ne signifie pas le succès de tous.

[149] Bien que je sois d'accord pour dire que le lien de causalité exigé pour la restitution des gains illicites est susceptible d'empêcher la certification de certains aspects de l'analyse portant sur la restitution des gains illicites (comme le quantum, dont il est question ci-dessous en lien avec les mesures de redressement pécuniaire globales), je ne suis pas convaincue qu'aucun aspect de la restitution des gains illicites en tant que réparation ne peut être at once based on evidence and analysis that will be common to all class members.

[150] While compensatory damages are the normal measure of relief for breach of contract, it does not necessarily follow that they will be either practical or adequate for the class members in this case. The focus of the disgorgement analysis is on the gain of the defendant, and each of these contracts was allegedly entered into in materially the same circumstances and breached through the same conduct. If ALC's breaches are self-interested and deliberate in relation to the representative plaintiffs, then they are self-interested and deliberate in relation to the whole class; if it is impracticable to determine the amount of the representative plaintiffs' loss as a result of those breaches — because VLTs are operated with cash and do not produce receipts or other records for particular customers, or even that ALC's conduct contributed to that impracticability — then it is impracticable for the entire class. Whether the plaintiffs have a legitimate interest in ALC's profit-making activity would be common to all members of the VLT-playing public. The circumstances of the breach and the interest in deterring breaches of contracts of this nature will be similar for all members; a common inquiry into allegations of systemic conduct by a corporation in a monopolistic lottery scheme offered to the public will avoid duplication of fact-finding and legal analysis (Dutton, at para. 39).

[151] An issue can be common "even if it makes up a very limited aspect of the liability question" (Cloud v. Canada (Attorney General) (2004), 73 O.R. (3d) 401 (C.A.), at para. 53). Here, determining whether the circumstances of this case are exceptional, such that other contractual remedies are inadequate, is a substantial ingredient of each member's claim and tranché à l'échelle du groupe. À mon avis, la question de savoir si une réparation de restitution des gains illicites est appropriée, en fonction de l'analyse multifactorielle décrite ci-dessus, peut être tranchée pour l'ensemble du groupe en une seule fois sur le fondement de la preuve et d'une analyse qui sera commune à tous les membres du groupe.

[151] Une question peut être commune [TRADUCTION] « même si elle ne constitue qu'un aspect très limité de la question de la responsabilité » (Cloud c. Canada (Attorney General) (2004), 73 O.R. (3d) 401 (C.A.), par. 53). En l'espèce, le fait d'établir si les circonstances de la présente affaire sont exceptionnelles, de sorte que les autres réparations will benefit all members of the class. I would therefore find that this aspect of ALC's potential liability to the plaintiffs in disgorgement is amenable to common determination, and would articulate the question as follows: "Would the ordinary remedies of contract law be inadequate to protect or vindicate the class members' contractual right such that disgorgement is available as a remedy?"

contractuelles sont inadéquates, est un élément important de la demande de chaque membre et profitera à tous les membres du groupe. En conséquence, je conclurais que cet aspect de la responsabilité éventuelle de la SLA envers les demandeurs au titre de la restitution des gains illicites se prête à un jugement commun, et je formulerais la question ainsi : « Les réparations ordinaires du droit des contrats seraient-elles inadéquates pour protéger ou défendre le droit contractuel des membres du groupe, de sorte que la restitution des gains illicites pourrait être accordée comme réparation? »

(c) Aggregate Monetary Relief

c) Redressement pécuniaire global

[152] The third potential common issue relates to whether monetary relief can be measured on an aggregate, class-wide basis and, if so, in what amount. In my view, there is no "basis in fact" on the record before us to certify this as a common issue.

[153] Section 29(1) of the CAA sets out three preconditions to an aggregate monetary award: (a) monetary relief must be claimed on behalf of some or all class members; (b) no questions of fact or law other than those relating to the assessment of monetary relief can remain to be determined in order to establish the amount of the defendant's monetary liability; and (c) all or part of the defendant's liability to some or all class members must be reasonably determined without proof by individual class members. The inquiry invites the Court to consider whether the non-individualized evidence presented by the plaintiffs is sufficiently reliable, whether use of the evidence will produce unfairness or injustice to the defendant (e.g., overstating the defendant's liability), and whether denying an aggregate approach would result in reduced or denied access to justice for the plaintiffs (see Ramdath v. George Brown College of Applied Arts and Technology, 2015 ONCA 921, 392 D.L.R. (4th) 490, at para. 76).

[153] Le paragraphe 29(1) de la CAA énonce trois conditions préalables à l'octroi d'un redressement pécuniaire global : a) le redressement pécuniaire doit être demandé au nom de tous les membres du groupe ou de certains d'entre eux; b) il ne reste à trancher que des questions de fait ou de droit se rapportant à l'évaluation du redressement pécuniaire afin de fixer le montant correspondant à l'obligation pécuniaire du défendeur; et c) la totalité ou une partie de la responsabilité du défendeur envers tous les membres du groupe ou certains d'entre eux peut raisonnablement être établie sans que les membres du groupe aient à en faire la preuve individuellement. Dans le cadre de l'enquête, la Cour est appelée à se demander si la preuve non individualisée présentée par les demandeurs est suffisamment fiable, si le recours à la preuve produira une iniquité ou une injustice envers le défendeur (p. ex., en surestimant la responsabilité de celui-ci) et si le refus d'une approche globale priverait les demandeurs de l'accès à la justice ou réduirait cet accès (voir Ramdath c. George Brown College of Applied Arts and Technology, 2015 ONCA 921, 392 D.L.R. (4th) 490, par. 76).

[154] The key concern in certifying this issue is whether there is some basis in fact to determine part or the whole of ALC's total liability as a result of its breach of contract. The issue is primarily a question of causation. Whether the remedy is ultimately based on compensating class-wide loss or disgorging ALC's gains, causation between the breach of contract and the quantum awarded will have to be proven.

[155] As Ernest J. Weinrib has recognized in the compensatory context, causation connects the plaintiff and defendant "as the doer and sufferer of the same injustice" ("Causal Uncertainty" (2016), 36 Oxford J. Legal Stud. 135, at p. 136). The same reasoning requires a causal link between a wrong and a gain. Thus, while the appropriateness of a disgorgement remedy in contract is ultimately a contextual question, before making the award the court must be satisfied that the breach of contract is causally connected to the gain to be disgorged — a requirement also found in other contexts in which disgorgement is an available remedy. For example, in the context of a breach of fiduciary duty, disgorgement is a familiar remedy, but it is only available where the breach of the duty is linked to the gain (Strother v. 3464920 Canada Inc., 2007 SCC 24, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 177, at para. 77). Another example is that of an inventor seeking an accounting of profits, who "is only entitled to that portion of the infringer's profit which is causally attributable to the invention" — consistent with a common sense view of causation from the breach (Monsanto Canada Inc. v. Schmeiser, 2004 SCC 34, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 902, at para. 101).

[156] In the context of a breach of contract, it is similarly important to connect the breach to the gain to be disgorged. Indeed, James Edelman writes that "the only difference between compensatory damages and disgorgement damages is that the former aim to put the claimant in the position as if the wrong had not occurred and the latter aim to put the defendant in that position" (Edelman (2002), at p. 103; see also Barnett, at p. 12; M. A. Eisenberg, Foundational Principles of Contract Law (2018), at p. 335). As noted by this Court in Mutual Trust, this remedy may be appropriate where "a defendant has, as a result of his or her own breach, profited in excess of his or her expected profit had the contract been performed" (para. 30 (emphasis added)). Applying a "but-for-the-breach" standard ensures a causal connection between the quantum of gain and the plaintiff's right (Smith, at p. 136; Barnett, at pp. 189, 192 and 210).

[155] Comme l'a reconnu Ernest J. Weinrib dans le contexte de l'indemnisation, la causalité unit le demandeur et le défendeur [TRADUCTION] « en tant qu'auteur et victime d'une même injustice » (« Causal Uncertainty » (2016), 36 Oxford J. Legal Stud. 135, p. 136). Le même raisonnement exige un lien de causalité entre une faute et un gain. Par conséquent, bien que le caractère approprié d'une réparation de restitution des gains illicites en matière contractuelle soit ultimement une question contextuelle, le tribunal doit, avant d'accorder la réparation, être convaincu que la violation du contrat a un lien de causalité avec le gain à restituer — une exigence que l'on trouve aussi dans d'autres contextes où la restitution des gains illicites peut être accordée à titre de réparation. Par exemple, dans le contexte d'un manquement à une obligation fiduciaire, la restitution des gains illicites est une réparation courante, mais elle ne peut être ordonnée que si le manquement à l'obligation est lié au gain (Strother c. 3464920 Canada Inc., 2007 CSC 24, [2007] 2 R.C.S. 177, par. 77). Un autre exemple est celui de l'inventeur qui demande la remise des profits, lequel « a seulement droit à la remise de la portion des profits réalisés par le contrefacteur, qui a un lien de causalité avec l'invention » — conformément à une conception normale du lien de causalité avec le manquement (Monsanto Canada Inc. c. Schmeiser, 2004 CSC 34, [2004] 1 R.C.S. 902, par. 101).

[157] All this means that the plaintiffs need to provide some methodology that is "sufficiently credible or plausible to establish some basis in fact for the commonality requirement", that is, a realistic prospect of assessing class-wide monetary relief in the aggregate (Microsoft, at para. 118).

[158] The plaintiffs seek disgorgement of the "unlawful gain" and have pleaded that VLTs could be "a reasonably safe form of gambling [that] generate[s] a reasonable stream of profit" absent the pleaded breaches (Statement of Claim, at para. 31). On this pleading, the plaintiffs must identify some methodology for determining the amount in excess of the "reasonable stream of profit" ALC would have gained absent the breach of contract. The plaintiffs' evidence on this point is limited, as their expert was asked only to estimate ALC's revenue from VLT line games that are derived from problem gamblers. However, the plaintiffs' class membership is not limited to problem gamblers, and instead captures all natural persons or estates who paid ALC to gamble on VLT games. Further, the expert does not provide any estimation or methodology to account for any revenue ALC might have made even while upholding and performing its contract with the class, by offering safe and non-deceptive VLT games to class et les dommages-intérêts de restitution des gains illicites est que les premiers visent à placer le demandeur dans la situation où il se trouverait si la faute n'avait pas eu lieu et que les derniers visent à placer le défendeur dans cette situation » (Edelman (2002), p. 103; voir également Barnett, p. 12; M. A. Eisenberg, Foundational Principles of Contract Law (2018), p. 335). Comme l'a affirmé la Cour dans l'arrêt Mutual Trust, cette réparation peut être appropriée lorsque « le défendeur a réalisé, du fait de sa propre inexécution, un gain supérieur à celui qu'il pouvait escompter si le contrat avait été exécuté » (par. 30 (je souligne)). L'application de la norme du « facteur déterminant » (parfois décrite au moyen des mots « n'eût été ») assure un lien de causalité entre le montant du gain et le droit du demandeur (Smith, p. 136; Barnett, p. 189, 192 et 210).

members or by warning class members of the inherent dangers of the games.

[159] To meet the required causal nexus and ensure that ALC's total liability is limited to that flowing from the breach and not overstated, some plausible methodology, grounded in the facts and data of the case, is needed to estimate ALC's financial liability from its breach of contract, including what ALC's profits might have been had it not breached its contractual obligations to class members. No methodology has been suggested.

[160] I note that the plaintiffs have also pleaded that the deceptive nature of VLTs is so integrated into their profit generation that VLT gaming could not have been marketed at all without the wrongdoing. Although this pleading appears in the section pleading disgorgement as a cause of action (and would therefore be struck in its current form for disclosing no reasonable cause of action), I accept that it could be restored. On such a pleading, the amount to be disgorged to the class as a whole would be the entirety of ALC's profits from VLT gaming, and issues of causation are simplified. But a bare pleaded allegation is not enough to establish "some basis in fact". The purpose of the basis in fact requirement is to ensure that the class proceeding does not "founde[r] at the merits stage" (Microsoft, at para. 104). Here, the plaintiffs' expert has provided no evidence to suggest that VLTs could not be marketed without wrongdoing. This is a bare allegation and therefore cannot provide some basis in fact that monetary relief can ultimately be determined on a class-wide basis.

[161] For these reasons, I am not satisfied that there is some basis in fact to certify whether the amount of monetary relief can be assessed on an aggregate, class-wide basis as a common issue. There is no basis in fact on either of the alternative pleadings that respecté et exécuté son contrat avec le groupe, en offrant des jeux sur ALV sûrs et non trompeurs aux membres du groupe ou en les mettant en garde contre les dangers inhérents à ces jeux.

[160] Je remarque que les demandeurs ont aussi fait valoir que la nature trompeuse des ALV est à ce point intégrée dans leur production de profits que les jeux sur ALV n'auraient pas pu être commercialisés du tout sans la faute. Bien que cette allégation figure dans la partie où est plaidée la restitution des gains illicites en tant que cause d'action (et elle serait radiée en sa forme actuelle, car elle ne révèle aucune cause d'action raisonnable), j'admets qu'elle peut être rétablie. Au vu de cette allégation, le montant à restituer au groupe dans son ensemble serait l'intégralité des profits que la SLA a tirés des jeux sur ALV, ce qui simplifie les questions de causalité. Toutefois, une simple allégation dans un acte de procédure ne suffit pas pour établir un « certain fondement factuel ». L'exigence du fondement factuel a pour objet de faire en sorte que le recours collectif ne « s'écroule [pas] à l'étape de l'examen au fond » (Microsoft, par. 104). En l'espèce, l'expert des demandeurs n'a fourni aucune preuve laissant entendre que les ALV ne pouvaient pas être commercialisés sans qu'il y ait de faute. Il s'agit d'une simple allégation et elle ne peut donc pas fournir un certain fondement factuel selon lequel un redressement pécuniaire peut, au final, être établi à l'échelle du groupe.

the quantum of monetary relief owed to all the class members could be reasonably determined.

[162] The failure to certify the calculation of aggregate monetary relief as a common issue does not preclude the trial judge from ultimately turning to the aggregate award provisions in the CAA if appropriate (Pioneer, at para. 114, citing Microsoft, at para. 134).

(d) Punitive Damages

[163] I agree with the application judge that the punitive damages claim is a common issue. As noted above, the focus of punitive damages is on the defendant's misconduct, not the plaintiff's loss (Whiten, at para. 73).

[164] This Court has recognized that punitive damages may be amenable to determination as a common issue, including in cases where liability will relate to a class of victims as a group and the court will be making "exactly the kind of fact-finding that will be necessary to determine whether punitive damages are justified" (Rumley v. British Columbia, 2001 SCC 69, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 184, at para. 34). In this case, ALC's conduct and the alleged breach of the duty of good faith would be common to all class members. The application judge's finding that "a determination on this question will address the common interests of all members of the class" (NLTD Certification Reasons, at para. 119) is entitled to deference and I see no reason to interfere with it.

(3) Preferable Procedure

[165] Section 5(2) of the CAA provides that in determining whether a class action is a preferable

l'un ni l'autre des actes de procédure subsidiaires ne révèle un fondement factuel selon lequel le montant du redressement pécuniaire dû à tous les membres du groupe pourrait être raisonnablement déterminé.

d) Dommages-intérêts punitifs

[164] La Cour a reconnu que les dommages-intérêts punitifs peuvent être traités comme une question commune, notamment dans les affaires où la responsabilité a trait à des victimes en tant que groupe et où le tribunal se livrera « exactement [au] genre de recherche des faits à laquelle le tribunal devra se livrer pour déterminer si des dommages-intérêts exemplaires sont justifiés » (Rumley c. Colombie-Britannique, 2001 CSC 69, [2001] 3 R.C.S. 184, par. 34). En l'espèce, la conduite de la SLA et le manquement allégué à l'obligation d'agir de bonne foi seraient des questions communes à tous les membres du groupe. Il y a lieu de faire preuve de déférence à l'égard de la conclusion du juge saisi de la demande selon laquelle [TRADUCTION] « une décision sur cette question abordera les intérêts communs de tous les membres du groupe » (motifs de la décision de la division de première instance de la C.S. T.-N.-L. sur l'autorisation, par. 119) et je ne vois aucune raison d'intervenir.

(3) Procédure constituant le meilleur moyen

[165] Le paragraphe 5(2) de la CAA prévoit que pour établir si le recours collectif serait le meilleur procedure for the fair and efficient resolution of the common issues, the court may consider all relevant matters including whether:

(a) questions of fact or law common to the members of the class predominate over questions affecting only individual members;

(b) a significant number of the members of the class have a valid interest in individually controlling the prosecution of separate actions;

(c) the class action would involve claims that are or have been the subject of another action;

(d) other means of resolving the claims are less practical or less efficient; and

(e) the administration of the class action would create greater difficulties than those likely to be experienced if relief were sought by other means.

[166] As noted in Hollick, preferability is best analysed through the lens of the three main advantages of class actions — judicial economy, access to justice, and behaviour modification — and must take into account the importance of the common issues in relation to the claims as a whole (paras. 27 and 30). The third parties submit that individual issues predominate over common issues and that the claims break down into an individualistic determination with respect to both liability and quantum. Again, however, I agree with the application judge that ALC and the third parties' objections do not address the action as framed, and instead proceed on the assumption that the plaintiffs are seeking recovery of losses suffered, as particularized to each class member.

moyen de régler les questions communes de manière juste et efficace, le tribunal peut tenir compte de tous les facteurs pertinents, notamment les suivants :

a) les questions de fait ou de droit communes aux membres du groupe l'emportent sur celles touchant uniquement les membres individuels;

b) un nombre important de membres du groupe ont véritablement intérêt à mener individuellement la poursuite d'actions distinctes;

c) le recours collectif comprend des demandes qui ont été ou qui font l'objet d'autres instances;

d) les autres modes de règlement sont moins pratiques ou efficaces;

e) la gestion du recours collectif créerait de plus grandes difficultés que l'adoption d'un autre moyen pour solliciter le redressement.

[166] Comme l'a affirmé la Cour dans l'arrêt Hollick, il convient d'analyser la question du meilleur moyen en fonction des trois principaux avantages du recours collectif — l'économie de ressources judiciaires, l'accès à la justice et la modification des comportements — et il faut examiner l'importance des questions communes par rapport à l'ensemble des demandes (par. 27 et 30). Les tierces parties soutiennent que les questions individuelles l'emportent sur les questions communes et que les demandes se réduisent à une détermination au cas par cas en ce qui concerne tant la responsabilité que le quantum. Cependant, encore une fois, je souscris à l'opinion du juge saisi de la demande voulant que les objections de la SLA et des tierces parties ne répondent pas à l'action telle qu'elle est formulée et présupposent plutôt que les demandeurs cherchent à obtenir le recouvrement des pertes subies, ventilées pour chaque membre du groupe.

plaintiff. That alone would make this a preferable procedure.

[168] Further, a common set of fact-finding will allow the trial judge to determine, without duplication, whether other contractual remedies will adequately vindicate and protect the contractual interest the class members had in playing a safe, honest game offered by a corporation charged with running a monopolistic public scheme.

[169] On punitive damages in particular, ALC submits that a class action is not a preferable procedure, because granting punitive damages in the absence of other monetary relief would allow the plaintiffs to play the role of "a private Attorney General". However, punitive damages are not necessarily parasitic on the plaintiff's having suffered a loss or personal injury. The fact that punitive damages focus on the defendant's conduct makes a class proceeding "particularly well-suited" to such awards (Chace v. Crane Canada Inc. (1997), 44 B.C.L.R. (3d) 264 (C.A.), at para. 24), especially where the allegation of liability is founded on systemic wrongdoing (see, e.g., Rumley, at para. 34). Deterrence of wrongful conduct is a primary goal of class actions (C. Jones, "The Class Action as Public Law", in J. Walker and G. D. Watson, eds., Class Actions in Canada: Cases, Notes, and Materials (2014), 28, at p. 29), and punitive damages are measured, in part, to ensure deterrence (Whiten, at para. 111).

pas d'évaluations individuelles pour chaque membre du groupe. Cette considération à elle seule fait du recours collectif le meilleur moyen.

as a class, a cause of action that they could, as a matter of law, already bring individually. The economy of the class action derives partly from the savings in litigation costs and partly from the removal of barriers that those individuals might otherwise face (Rumley, at para. 39). The latter point is particularly compelling in light of the many economic, social, and psychological barriers that individual players or problem gamblers may face in coming forward and advancing a claim for breach of contract against ALC through individualized avenues. This is especially so given that those individuals who have suffered particularly from ALC's alleged breach may be the least capable of advancing a claim. Class actions "overcome barriers to litigation by providing a procedural means to a substantive end" (Fischer, at para. 34). In this case, that end includes the potential to acknowledge, vindicate, and protect individual players' contractual interest in a safe and fair game, or to encourage behavioural modification and to punish allegedly deceptive, manipulative, and high-handed conduct in the provision of such games. Even if breach of contract were the only common issue, a trial to determine whether ALC systematically breached contracts with VLT players would go some way to acknowledging players' contractual interests and, potentially, vindicating and protecting those interests.

(4) Conclusion on Certification

[171] For the above reasons, I conclude that the plaintiffs' claim should be certified as a class action on the common issues of breach of contract, punitive damages, and the appropriateness of a disgorgement remedy.

V. Conclusion

[172] For these reasons, I would allow the appeals in part. I would strike disgorgement (referred to in les gens peuvent s'unir pour faire valoir, en tant que groupe, une cause d'action qu'ils pourraient chacun faire valoir individuellement en droit. L'économie liée au recours collectif découle en partie des coûts épargnés en matière de frais de justice et en partie du retrait des obstacles auxquels ces gens feraient autrement face (Rumley, par. 39). Ce dernier élément est particulièrement convaincant en raison des nombreux obstacles d'ordre pécuniaire, social et psychologique auxquels peuvent faire face les joueurs individuels ou les joueurs à problèmes, en se manifestant et en faisant valoir une demande fondée sur la violation de contrat contre la SLA par des voies individuelles. Cela est d'autant plus vrai étant donné que les individus qui ont souffert particulièrement de la violation reprochée à la SLA peuvent être ceux qui sont les moins capables de faire valoir une demande. Le recours collectif « permet de surmonter les obstacles aux litiges en fournissant un moyen procédural d'arriver à une fin substantielle » (Fischer, par. 34). En l'espèce, cette fin comprend la possibilité de reconnaître, de défendre et de protéger l'intérêt contractuel de chaque joueur à jouer à un jeu sûr et juste, ou d'encourager une modification du comportement et de punir une conduite qui serait trompeuse, manipulatrice et abusive dans la prestation de ces jeux. Même si la violation de contrat était la seule question commune, un procès pour trancher la question de savoir si la SLA a systématiquement violé les contrats intervenus avec des joueurs d'ALV permettrait dans une certaine mesure de reconnaître les intérêts contractuels des joueurs et, éventuellement, de défendre et de protéger ces intérêts.

(4) Conclusion sur l'autorisation du recours collectif

[171] Pour les motifs qui précèdent, je conclus que l'action des demandeurs devrait être autorisée en tant que recours collectif portant sur les questions communes relatives à la violation de contrat, aux dommages-intérêts punitifs et au caractère approprié de la réparation de restitution des gains illicites.

V. Conclusion

[172] Pour ces motifs, je suis d'avis d'accueillir les pourvois en partie, et de radier la restitution des the pleadings as "waiver of tort") and unjust enrichment as causes of action. I would certify the class action with common issues as follows:

(1) Has ALC breached a duty owed in contract?

(2) If there is a breach of contract, would the ordinary remedies of contract law be inadequate to protect or vindicate the class members' contractual right such that disgorgement is available as a remedy?

(3) If there is a breach of contract, should punitive or exemplary damages be awarded and, if so, in what amount?

[173] Of course, the plaintiffs may seek to amend their pleadings in accordance with these reasons. As s. 37 of the CAA generally precludes costs awards in respect of applications for certification, I would order that the parties bear their own costs.

gains illicites (appelée « renonciation au recours délictuel » dans les actes de procédure) et l'enrichissement sans cause en tant que causes d'action. J'autoriserais le recours collectif portant sur les questions communes suivantes :

(1) La SLA a-t-elle manqué à une obligation contractuelle?

(2) S'il y a eu violation de contrat, les réparations ordinaires du droit des contrats seraient-elles inadéquates pour protéger ou défendre le droit contractuel des membres du groupe, de sorte que la restitution des gains illicites pourrait être accordée à titre de réparation?

(3) S'il y a eu violation de contrat, y a-t-il lieu d'octroyer des dommages-intérêts punitifs ou exemplaires et, dans l'affirmative, quel devrait en être le montant?

Applicant (Respondent)

and

Respondent (Appellant)

Sukhjinder Bhangu, for the appellant

Ajay Duggal and Harinder Dhaliwal, for the respondent

Heard: October 1, 2013

On appeal from the judgment of Justice David Price of the Superior Court of Justice, dated August 21, 2012, with reasons reported at 2012 ONSC 4797.

Epstein J.A.:

INTRODUCTION

[1] The appellant landlord, David Gerlach, appeals from a judgment ordering him to pay the respondent tenant, Dasham Carriers Inc., damages in the amount of $130,600. These damages flow from Mr. Gerlach's improper termination of Dasham's lease of commercial property (the "leased premises").

[2] On appeal, the appellant does not contest the finding that he wrongly terminated the lease. The appeal is restricted to the quantum of damages.

[3] For the reasons that follow, I would allow the appeal to correct an error the application judge made in computing the respondent's damages. In my view, this is a mere error in calculation as opposed to an error of law.

[4] Before this court, the appellant also sought a review of the order of Cronk J.A., dated September 17, 2013, in which she struck his affidavit, dated May 7, 2013, along with all references to it in his factum. I see no basis to interfere with Cronk J.A.'s order and would therefore dismiss the motion.

BACKGROUND FACTS

[5] On May 1, 2010, the appellant and respondent entered into a three-year lease. The lease required the respondent to pay rent to the appellant of $6,500 per month for the first year and $7,000 per month thereafter.

[6] Pursuant to a term of the lease allowing it to do so, the respondent sublet the premises. On October 1, 2010, it entered into a sublease with Jandu Truck Centre for the west portion of the leased premises. The sublease, which ended on April 30, 2013, required Jandu to pay the respondent monthly rent of $4,000. In May 2011, the respondent entered into a sublease with Truck Spa. It provided for the payment of monthly rent of $4,800. In October 2011, Truck Spa sold its business to Best Performance Truck Repairs Inc. Best Performance assumed Truck Spa's obligations under its sublease.

[7] On December 1, 2011, the respondent entered into a sublease directly with Best Performance under which Best Performance would pay the respondent monthly rent of $4,600 until April 30, 2012 and then $4,800 until the end of the respondent's lease on April 30, 2013.

[8] Subsequently, the appellant entered into a one-year lease with Jandu for $4,500 per month. This lease commenced on May 1, 2012 – one year before the respondent's lease with the appellant and its sublease with Jandu were to expire.

[9] On May 6, 2012, the appellant improperly terminated the respondent's lease. At that time, the two subtenants were paying aggregate monthly rent to the respondent of $8,800. Dasham was therefore receiving $1,800 more from its subtenants than it was paying to the appellant.

THE APPLICATION JUDGE'S ANALYSIS OF THE DAMAGES TO WHICH THE RESPONDENT IS ENTITLED

[10] Citing Hamilton v. Open Window Bakery Ltd., 2004 SCC 9, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 303, and Agribrands Purina Canada Inc. v. Kasamekas, 2011 ONCA 460, 106 O.R. (3d) 427, supplementary reasons at 2011 ONCA 581, 56 C.C.L.T. (3d) 206, the application judge held, correctly in my view, that the respondent's damages arising out of the appellant's wrongful termination of the lease is the amount that would restore the respondent to the position it would have been in had the lease agreement been performed.

[11] To understand the nature of the application judge's error, an error that arose in spite of his identifying the appropriate legal principles, it is necessary to set out, verbatim, the application judge's explanation of his approach to the calculation of the respondent's damages. This approach is set out at paras. 67-75 of his reasons.

> 67 In the present case, to be "restored", [the respondent] is entitled to the difference between the rent it received from the sub-tenants and the rent it paid to [the appellant].
> 68 [The respondent] was entitled to receive $4,000.00 per month from its sub-tenant, Jandu, beginning in October 1, 2010, and $4,800.00 per month from its sub-tenant, Best Performance, beginning October 1, 2011.
> 69 Throughout this period, it was paying $7,000.00 per month to [the appellant], as its rent increased on April 30, 2011, from $6,500.00 per month to $7,000.00 per month.
> 70 Based on the foregoing, [the appellant] owes [the respondent] $8,800.00 per month from May 1, 2012, when [the appellant] received rent from both of [the respondent's] former sub-tenants for the property in respect of which [the respondent] still held a valid lease, to the end of his three year term on April 30, 2013, for a total of $105,600.00. In addition, he owes [the respondent] $4,800.00 per month for the earlier period from December 1, 2011, when he entered into his separate lease with Best Performance, to the end of April 2012, when he signed his lease with Jandu. He owes [the respondent] a total of $24,000.00 for the earlier period ($4,800.00 x 5 months). Its total lost rent was therefore $130,600.00 ($105,600.00 + $24,000.00).

71 From this amount should be deducted $7,000.00 for any month in which [the respondent] did not pay its rent to [the appellant].

72 [The appellant] questions whether he should be required to pay the rent received from [the respondent's] former sub-tenants beyond the initial terms of their sub-leases with [the respondent].The fact is that both Jandu and Best Performance continued their leases into the final year of [the respondent's] lease with [the appellant], paying the same amount of rent which they previously had paid to [the respondent]. I therefore find, on a balance of probabilities, that both would have renewed their sub-leases with [the respondent].

73 In Hamilton v. Open Bakery Ltd., above, the Supreme Court affirmed the principle of remoteness, which restricts damages to the amount required to put the plaintiff in the position it would have been in if the contract had been performed. [The respondent's] claim for its loss during the period of renewal must be based on at least "probable renewal" in order to avoid being too speculative. In Morgan v. Fry, where the defendant wrongfully caused the plaintiff to be dismissed from his employment, damages were allowed on the basis [the judge found on the evidence] that the plaintiff would "probably have" retained his employment in order to be entitled to lost wages.

74 Jandu and Best Performance would probably have renewed their subleases with [the respondent] because they did so with [the appellant]. [The respondent] is therefore entitled to damages for the renewal period.

75 The appellant holds the rent he receives from his tenants ([the respondent's] former sub-tenants) in trust for [the respondent], and shall pay this amount to [the respondent], less the rent that [the respondent] would > have been required to pay [the appellant] pursuant to the lease that [the appellant] breached.

[12] To this point the application judge's analysis was entirely consistent with the law and an application of the facts to the law. The calculation error appears in para. 89, in which the application judge performed the mathematical calculation of the respondent's damages:

> 89 Based on the foregoing, it is ordered that:
> 1. [The appellant] shall pay [the respondent] its damages in the amount of $130,600.00.
> 2. [The appellant] shall refund [the respondent's] security deposit in the amount of $14,735.00.
> 3. [The appellant] shall pay post-judgment interest on the sum of $145,335.00 from today's date.
> 4. If the parties are unable to agree on costs, they may make submissions in writing, not to exceed three pages, with a Costs Outline, by August 31, 2012.

[13] The judgment, as issued and entered, tracks this calculation.

ISSUES

[14] There is only one issue of substance in this appeal. As identified above, it is the quantum of damages.

[15] Neither the appellant nor the respondent disputes the legal principles upon which the application judge approached the calculation of the respondent's damages. They agree that the respondent is entitled to the amount that will restore it to the position it would have been in had the appellant not breached the lease agreement. Their disagreement lies in what factors should be considered in the calculation of this amount.

ANALYSIS

(a) Request for a review of the order of Cronk J.A.

[16] I will first deal with the appellant's request for a review of the order of Cronk J.A. In addition to striking out the appellant's affidavit of May 7, 2013 and all exhibits to which it refers, the order required the appellant to deliver a new factum in which all references to the affidavit and exhibits were removed. The impugned affidavit post-dates the application judge's reasons, is unsworn and contains material not in the record before the application judge. The appellant's original factum made repeated references to the affidavit and exhibits, but the appellant had not moved for an order allowing the introduction of fresh evidence. In these circumstances, I see no reason to interfere with Cronk J.A.'s disposition of the motion and would therefore dismiss the appellant's motion to review the order.

(b) The Appeal

[17] When a party sustains a loss by reason of a breach of contract, damages are to be awarded in an amount that will place him in the same position as if the contract had been performed. This method of calculating damages, commonly referred to as "expectation damages," is the standard common law rule.

[18] There is no special approach to the calculation of damages recoverable by a wrongly evicted tenant. The calculation is governed by the rule applicable to all breaches of contract: the tenant is entitled to be placed in the same position as if the lease agreement had been performed. This proposition was recognized in Haack v. Martin, [1927] S.C.R. 413, a case in which the Supreme Court wrestled with the calculation of a farmer's loss of profit as a result of his being evicted from land he had leased for the purpose of operating a farm. Although Haack is a dated case, its discussion of damages for wrongful eviction remains good law today and continues to be cited in Ontario: see e.g. Burns v. Sohi, 2012 ONSC 2414, 21 R.P.R. (5th) 205, at para. 300; and Upper Room Alliance Group Ltd. v. John Volken Foundation (2008), 54 B.L.R. (4th) 97 (Ont. S.C.), at paras. 139-40, supplementary reasons at [2008] O.J. No. 4899.

[19] This approach to the calculation of expectation damages in wrongful eviction cases, namely, the benefit the tenant expected to receive to the end of the lease term less the rent the tenant would have had to pay the landlord, was approved by this court in Procopio v. D'Abbondanza (1975), 8 O.R. (2d) 496 (C.A.), at p. 498. In Procopio, the tenant entered into a lease under which she was paying below-market rent. The landlord subsequently locked her out of the rental unit. The court held that the tenant was entitled to damages equivalent to the difference between the current market value of the rental premises and the amount she was paying under the favourable terms of the lease.

[20] Accordingly, to calculate the amount required to restore the respondent to the position it would have been in if the contract had been performed, the respondent is entitled to the benefit it would have received over the course of the twelve months left to run under the lease – that is, the amount of rent it would have received from its two subtenants – less the amount of rent it would have owed the appellant for the use of the leased premises during that period.

[21] The passages set out above demonstrate that this is precisely how the application judge intended to measure the respondent's damages. However, this is not how the application judge calculated the respondent's damages in para. 89 of his reasons. He overlooked the second part of the equation. He neglected to subtract the amount the respondent would have owed the appellant for rent during the final year of the lease. This is an obvious oversight and must be corrected.

[23] I start with the respondent's income over the twelve month period. The application judge found as a fact that both subtenants would have continued to sublet their portions of the leased premises until the end of the respondent's lease. This finding was open to him to make on the evidence and I see no reason to interfere with it. Accordingly, the respondent reasonably expected to receive aggregate rent of $8,800 per month from its subtenants for twelve additional months.

[24] From this must be deducted the cost the respondent reasonably expected to pay in order to use the leased premises during the final year of the lease for the purposes of earning rental income from its subtenants. The parties agree that ten months' rent remains owing to the appellant under the terms of the lease.

[25] The appellant submits, for the first time in this court, that the rent during that last year was $7,910, not $7,000. I do not accept this submission. The additional $910 is HST and is not part of the rent.

[26] Paragraph 75 of the reasons appears to have caused some confusion as a result of the application judge's choice of words, specifically, his statement that the appellant holds the rent he receives from the respondent's former subtenants

"in trust" for the respondent. However, what follows next, a statement that the appellant "shall pay this amount to [the respondent], less the rent that [the respondent] would have been required to pay [the appellant] pursuant to the lease that [the appellant] breached" (emphasis added), makes the application judge's reasoning clear. To the extent necessary to restore the respondent to the position it would have been in if the lease agreement had been performed, the appellant holds any rent he receives during the final year of the respondent's lease (plus the rent the respondent would have received from Best Performance but for the breach) effectively to the credit of the respondent. From this amount, the rent the respondent would have had to pay under the lease must be deducted. The excess belongs to the respondent.

[27] The respondent submits that because it was wrongly evicted from the leased premises, the rent it would have paid the appellant under the lease should not be deducted from the amount of damages to which it is entitled. It argues that reducing its damage award by this amount while simultaneously allowing the appellant the benefit of the rent he is receiving from Jandu permits the appellant to "double dip" and is simply unfair.

[28] I disagree. First, and most importantly, determining the respondent's damages in accordance with my above calculation puts the respondent in the position it would have been in had the lease agreement not been breached. This position involves two things. The respondent pays the rent due under the lease. The respondent receives the benefit of the rent from its subtenants.

[29] Second, even if, as a result of his use of the premises during the remainder of the lease, the appellant realized a profit beyond what he would have received from the respondent's rent payments, this would not affect the quantum of the respondent's damages in the light of the fact that his claim is solely for damages for breach of contract. As previously noted, the measure of damages for a breach of contract is expectation damages: see Bank of America Canada v. Mutual Trust Co., 2002 SCC 43, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 601, at para. 26. As recognized by both the Supreme Court and academic commentators, "[n]o general principle exists whereby a defendant can be made to account for a profit derived from a simple breach of contract": see S.M. Waddams, The Law of Damages, 5th ed. (Toronto: Thomson Reuters, 2012), at p. 9-9; Asamera Oil Corp. Ltd. v. Sea Oil & General Corp., [1979] 1 S.C.R. 633, at pp. 672-73, varied as to the amount of interest ordered, [1979] 1 S.C.R. 677. Therefore, the focus in any damages calculation is on the injured party's loss and on the measure of compensation required to restore it to the position it would have been in had the contract been performed. Any benefit or detriment to the breaching party is simply not relevant to this determination.

[30] This principle is most clearly illustrated by cases involving an "efficient breach." In such cases, the defendant's profit from the breach is greater than the measure of damages required to compensate the plaintiff. Even when there is an efficient breach, courts award expectation damage – the amount of the plaintiff's loss. The injured party is not entitled to a higher damage award merely because the breaching party has profited from his repudiation of the contract. To the contrary, the Supreme Court has issued a clear directive that an "[e]fficient breach should not be discouraged by the courts. This lack of disapproval emphasizes that a court will usually award money damages for breach of contract equal to the value of the bargain to the plaintiff": Bank of America, at para. 31. Therefore, even if, as the respondent alleges, the appellant has profited from his repudiation of the lease, it does not change the amount of damages to which the respondent is entitled.

[31] Based on the application judge's approach – an approach that is in accordance with the governing legal principles – the amount the appellant is required to pay to put the respondent in the position it would have been in had the lease been performed is $35,600. I arrive at this number by calculating the total amount of rent the respondent would have received from its subtenants, $105,600 ($8,800 x 12), and subtracting the $70,000 that remained outstanding under the lease with Mr. Gerlach ($7,000 x 10).

THE APPELLANT'S ARGUMENTS CONCERNING THE DAMAGE DEPOSIT AND PROOF OF INCOME

[32] The appellant submits that the application judge erred in ordering him to return the $14,735 security deposit. He argues that the full amount of the deposit has been credited for unpaid amounts of the first and last months' rent owing under the lease. However, the appellant is unable to point to any evidence in the record in support of this submission. I would therefore not give effect to this ground of appeal.

[33] For the first time on appeal, the appellant also challenges the application judge's finding that the respondent actually entered into a sublease with, or received any income from, Best Performance. I would reject this argument. Without any evidence to the contrary, the application judge was entitled to accept the sublease as genuine and draw the inference that it was in good standing.

[34] Finally, I should comment on the fact that the parties agreed that the application judge misapprehended the evidence about the respondent's lease with Best Performance and also made an arithmetic error – two mistakes that increased, by $25,000, the damages he found owing to the respondent. These were fair concessions. The correction I would make to the application judge's calculation of damages eliminates the effect of these errors.

CONCLUSION

[35] I appreciate that the approach I have taken to resolve the application judge's oversight in not deducting the $70,000 in rent owed to the appellant in his calculation of damages was not argued by counsel for the appellant. Normally, I would not determine an appeal on a basis not put forward by counsel as it is counsel's responsibility, not the court's, to advance a party's position. However, as I see it, there is a factor that allows me to proceed as I have. My analysis tracks that of the application judge but for a correction that is necessary in order to bring the final calculation in line with his reasons. The application judge, as I have said, accurately identified the way in which the respondent's damages should be calculated and noted, a number of times, that the $7,000 monthly rent the respondent owed to the end of the lease must be deducted from the rental income it would have received from the subtenants. The respondent was required to pay rent in order to use the leased premises for the purposes of earning rent money from the subtenants. Subtracting the cost of having access to the leased premises is an essential part of putting the respondent in the position as though the contract had been fulfilled.

[36] I am of the view that endorsing the application judge's reasoning to this effect fits precisely within the jurisdiction provided in s. 134(1)(a) of the Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.43. This section gives this court unconditional authority to "make any order or decision that ought to or could have been made by the court or tribunal appealed from." The guiding force, as it invariably is and must be, is the interests of justice.

[37] In my opinion, in these circumstances, it is in the interests of justice to apply the correct law and give effect to the application judge's analysis.

DISPOSITION

[38] I would dismiss the motion to review the order of Cronk J.A.

[39] For the above reasons, I would allow, in part, the appeal from the judgment of Price J. by varying paragraph 1 of the judgment to reflect a damage award in the amount of $35,600. Except for a necessary adjustment to the post-judgment interest calculation in paragraph 3 of the judgment, I would leave the remainder of the judgment unchanged.

[40] In the circumstances I would make no order as to costs.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR ALBERTA

Contracts — Equitable remedies — Rectification of contract — Written contract not reflecting prior oral agreement — Whether equitable remedy of rectification available — Whether lack of due diligence a bar to rectification.

Damages — Punitive damages — Written contract not reflecting prior oral agreement owing to fraud of one of parties — Whether trial judge's award of punitive damages should be restored.

The respondent operated an 18-hole golf course. The appellant O entered into negotiations with B, the respondent's principal, for a joint venture. The trial judge found that B and O made an oral agreement, which included an option on the 18th fairway for a specific residential development to be undertaken by B. During the negotiations, B discussed with O photographs and plans of a double row of houses clustered around a cul-de-sac along the length of the 18th fairway. When O's lawyer reduced the terms of the oral agreement to writing, the option clause accurately specified the 480-yard length of the proposed development, but instead of sufficient width to permit a double row of houses (approximately 110 yards), the clause as written allowed only enough land for a single row of houses (110 feet).

EN APPEL DE LA COUR D'APPEL DE L'ALBERTA

Contrats — Réparations fondées sur l'equity — Rectification du contrat — Contrat écrit ne reflétant pas l'entente verbale antérieure — Y a-t-il ouverture à la réparation en equity que constitue la rectification? — Le défaut de faire montre de diligence raisonnable fait-il obstacle à la rectification?

Dommages-intérêts — Dommages-intérêts punitifs — Contrat écrit ne reflétant pas l'entente verbale antérieure en raison de la fraude commise par l'une des parties — La décision du juge du procès accordant des dommages-intérêts punitifs doit-elle être rétablie?

L'intimée exploitait un terrain de golf comptant 18 trous. L'appelant O a entamé des négociations en vue d'établir une coentreprise avec B, le propriétaire de l'intimée. Le juge de première instance a estimé que B et O avaient conclu une entente verbale, qui comportait une option visant la construction d'un complexe domiciliaire particulier par B au 18e trou. Durant les négociations, B a examiné avec O des photographies et des plans du type de complexe qu'il envisageait, à savoir une double rangée de maisons regroupées autour d'un cul-de-sac le long du 18e trou. Après que l'avocat de O a couché par écrit les termes de l'entente verbale, la clause établissant l'option mentionnait de façon précise la longueur de 480 verges du complexe proposé, mais, telle qu'elle avait été rédigée, au lieu

When B sought to exercise the option, O insisted on the written terms, despite knowing that these terms did not accurately reflect the prior oral option agreement. The respondent commenced the present action against the appellants for rectification of the agreement or damages in lieu thereof, punitive damages and solicitor-client costs. The trial judge held that the respondent was entitled to rectification of the option clause, awarding damages in lieu assessed on the basis of the loss of profit on a fully built residential development. Punitive damages were assessed at $200,000. The Court of Appeal set aside the punitive damages award. In all other respects, the appeal was dismissed.

Held: The appeal and cross-appeal should be dismissed.

Per McLachlin C.J. and L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Major, Binnie and Arbour JJ.: The necessary preconditions to obtaining the equitable remedy of rectification of the contract are met in this case. First, the respondent has shown the existence and content of the prior oral agreement. There was a definite project in a definite location to which O and B had given their definite assent. Although the parties did not discuss a metes and bounds description, they were working on a defined development proposal. O's numbers (110 x 480) can be accepted, while rejecting the error created by his apparently duplicitous substitution of feet for yards in the write-up of the option clause. Second, it was found that O had fraudulently misrepresented the written document as accurately reflecting the terms of the prior oral contract. Third, the precise terms of rectification are readily ascertained, namely to change the word "feet" in the phrase "one hundred ten (110) feet in width" to "yards". Fourth, there is convincing proof of B's unilateral mistake and O's knowledge of that mistake. B's version of the oral agreement was sufficiently corroborated on significant points by other witnesses and documents. While as an experienced businessman, B ought to have examined the text of the option clause before signing the document, due diligence on the part of the plaintiff is not a (fifth) condition precedent to rectification. Lack of due diligence may be taken into account in the exercise of a discretion to refuse the remedy, but here lack of due de prévoir une largeur suffisante pour permettre la construction d'une double rangée de maisons (environ 110 verges), elle ne faisait état que d'une largeur suffisante pour une seule rangée de maisons (110 pieds). Lorsque B a voulu lever l'option, O a insisté sur l'application de la convention écrite même s'il savait qu'elle ne reflétait pas fidèlement l'entente verbale antérieure concernant l'option. L'intimée a entamé contre les appelants la présente action, dans laquelle elle sollicitait soit la rectification de la Convention soit des dommages-intérêts en tenant lieu, des dommages-intérêts punitifs et les dépens sur la base procureur-client. Le juge du procès a conclu que l'intimée avait droit à la rectification de la clause relative à l'option, et il a accordé des dommages-intérêts tenant lieu de rectification, établis sur la base de la perte des profits qui auraient été réalisés par la construction complète du complexe domiciliaire. Les dommages-intérêts punitifs ont été fixés à 200 000 $. La Cour d'appel a annulé la décision accordant les dommages-intérêts punitifs, mais elle a toutefois rejeté l'appel sur tous les autres points.

Arrêt : Le pourvoi principal et le pourvoi incident sont rejetés.

Le juge en chef McLachlin et les juges L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Major, Binnie et Arbour : Les préalables nécessaires pour donner ouverture à la réparation en equity que constitue la rectification sont réunis en l'espèce. Premièrement, l'intimée a établi l'existence et la teneur de l'entente verbale antérieure. Il existait un projet défini et devant être réalisé à un endroit déterminé, dont O et B avaient convenu précisément. Bien que les parties n'aient pas discuté de la description technique des lieux, elles travaillaient à un projet d'aménagement défini. Il est possible d'accepter les chiffres inscrits par O (110 x 480), tout en écartant l'erreur créée par sa substitution apparemment frauduleuse, relativement à une des dimensions, d'une mesure en pieds à une mesure en verges dans la rédaction de la clause relative à l'option. Deuxièmement, il a été jugé que O avait fait une assertion inexacte et frauduleuse en laissant croire que l'écrit reflétait fidèlement les conditions prévues par l'entente verbale antérieure. Troisièmement, la façon précise par laquelle l'écrit doit être rectifié est facile à déterminer : Il s'agit de remplacer le mot « pieds » par le mot « verges » dans la phrase « cent dix (110) pieds de largeur ». Quatrièmement, il existe une preuve convaincante de l'erreur unilatérale de B et de la connaissance par O de cette erreur. La version donnée par B de l'entente verbale était suffisamment corroborée sur des aspects importants par d'autres témoins ainsi que par des documents. Bell, en tant qu'homme d'affaires expérimenté, aurait dû examiner le texte de la clause diligence was offset by the finding of fraud against O, and rectification was therefore properly granted.

In the absence of an error of principle, or a factual record that supports the appellants' criticisms, the findings in the courts below on the amount of compensatory damages must stand. Damages for breach of the contract, as rectified, include losses flowing from the special circumstances known to the parties at the time they made their contract.

The award of punitive damages in this case should not be restored as it does not serve a rational purpose. Only in exceptional cases does tort attract punitive damages. An award of punitive damages is rational "if, but only if" compensatory damages do not adequately achieve the objectives of retribution, deterrence and denunciation. In this case, neither the making of a punitive damages award nor the $200,000 assessment meets the test of rationality.

Per LeBel J.: Subject to the comments on punitive damages in Whiten, the majority reasons were agreed with. Rectification of the contract was properly ordered, but punitive damages would fulfill no rational purpose in this case.

relative à l'option avant de signer le document, mais la diligence raisonnable de la part du demandeur n'est pas un (cinquième) préalable au prononcé d'une ordonnance de rectification. L'absence de diligence raisonnable peut être prise en compte dans l'exercice du pouvoir discrétionnaire de refuser la réparation en question, mais en l'espèce cette omission est contre balancée par la conclusion de fraude prononcée contre O, et la rectification a donc été accordée à bon droit.

En l'absence d'erreur de principe ou d'éléments factuels qui appuieraient les critiques formulées par les appelants, les conclusions des juridictions inférieures sur le montant des dommages-intérêts compensatoires doivent être confirmées. Les dommages-intérêts accordés pour la rupture du contrat rectifié doivent par conséquent inclure les pertes découlant des circonstances particulières connues des parties au moment où elles ont conclu le contrat.

La décision d'accorder des dommages-intérêts punitifs en l'espèce ne doit pas être rétablie puisqu'elle ne sert aucun objectif rationnel. Ce n'est que dans des circonstances exceptionnelles qu'un délit civil commande des dommages-intérêts punitifs. Une décision accordant des dommages-intérêts punitifs n'est rationnelle que « si, mais seulement si » les dommages-intérêts compensatoires ne permettent pas de donner effet adéquatement aux objectifs de châtiment, de dissuasion et de dénonciation. En l'espèce, ni la décision accordant des dommages-intérêts punitifs ni la somme de 200 000 $ accordée à ce titre ne satisfont au critère de la rationalité.

Le juge LeBel : Sous réserve des commentaires exposés sur la question des dommages-intérêts punitifs dans l'arrêt Whiten, il y a accord avec les motifs de la majorité. C'est à juste titre que la rectification du contrat a été ordonnée, mais des dommages-intérêts punitifs ne serviraient aucune fin rationnelle dans la présente affaire.

1 BINNIE J. — In this appeal the Court is called on to deal with rectification of a contract for a real estate development dream that turned into a nightmare for the warring partners. Houses were to have been built along the 18th fairway of the Sylvan Lake Golf Course, within commuting distance of Red Deer, Alberta. It did not happen because the parties fell out over the amount of land to be included in the development contract.

2 There was a written contract but the respondent's President did not bother to read it before it was signed. Had he done so, the error in reducing the parties' prior oral agreement to writing would likely have been detected and the development would have gone ahead. The appellants, who rely on the written document, say that a party who fails to exercise due diligence in its business affairs should be refused the equitable remedy of rectification. That is their strongest argument.

3 The principal witness and "directing mind" of the appellant Performance Industries Ltd. ("Performance"), which stands firm on the written document, is Terrance O'Connor. For him, the joint venture ended with his actions being characterized by the trial judge as "fraudulent, dishonest and deceitful" (1999), 246 A.R. 272, at para. 114. The trial judgment made him personally liable (jointly and severally with his company Performance Industries Ltd.) for $1,047,810, including a

Version française du jugement du juge en chef McLachlin et des juges L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Major, Binnie et Arbour rendu par

LE JUGE BINNIE — Dans le présent pourvoi, notre Cour est appelée à se prononcer sur la rectification d'un contrat envisageant la réalisation d'un rêve d'aménagement immobilier qui s'est transformé en cauchemar pour les associés en conflit. On projetait de construire des maisons le long du 18e trou du terrain de golf de Sylvan Lake, en périphérie de Red Deer, en Alberta. Le projet ne s'est pas concrétisé en raison de la mésentente survenue entre les parties au sujet de la superficie du terrain visé par le contrat d'aménagement.

Il existait un contrat écrit, mais le président de l'intimée ne s'est pas donné la peine de le lire avant de le signer. S'il l'avait fait, l'erreur qui a été commise lorsqu'on a couché par écrit l'entente verbale intervenue antérieurement entre les parties aurait vraisemblablement été décelée et le projet d'aménagement aurait été réalisé. Les appelants, qui se fondent sur l'écrit, affirment qu'une partie qui a omis de faire montre de diligence raisonnable dans ses opérations commerciales doit être déboutée de sa demande en rectification fondée sur l'equity. Il s'agit de leur argument le plus solide.

Le témoin principal et l'« âme dirigeante » de l'appelante Performance Industries Ltd. (« Performance »), qui s'en tient fermement à l'écrit, est Terrance O'Connor. L'entreprise commune lui a finalement valu de voir ses actions être qualifiées par le juge de première instance de [TRADUCTION] « frauduleuses, malhonnêtes et dolosives » ((1999), 246 A.R. 272, par. 114). Ce dernier l'a condamné personnellement (solidairement avec sa société Performance Industries Ltd.) à verser la somme de $200,000 award of punitive damages, plus costs on a solicitor-client basis. He and his company appeal to this Court on various errors of law, few of which were argued before the trial judge.

For his erstwhile partner, Frederick Bell, whose corporate vehicle is Sylvan Lake Golf & Tennis Club Ltd. ("Sylvan"), his commercial aspirations have been trapped in the courts for seven years. This was because, so the trial judge found, O'Connor swore false affidavits, refused to produce relevant documents, gave false testimony in the course of two separate trials, and did "everything in his power to prevent the truth from coming to light" (para. 115). Bell is now said to be a spent force, "divorced [and lacking] the initiative or drive and determination to proceed with such a development at his present age" (para. 90). Bell obtained a $200,000 punitive damage award at trial, but this was disallowed by the Alberta Court of Appeal ((2000), 255 A.R. 329, 2000 ABCA 116). In its cross-appeal, his company, Sylvan, seeks restoration of that award.

Because of the punitive damages issues, this appeal was heard concurrently with Whiten v. Pilot Insurance Co., [2002] 1 S.C.R. 595, 2002 SCC 18, judgment which is being released concurrently with this judgment.

In my view, for reasons which differ somewhat from the memorandum of judgment handed down by the Alberta Court of Appeal, the appeal and the cross-appeal should be dismissed both with costs on a party-and-party basis.

I. Facts

Sylvan had operated a 171.53 acre, 18-hole golf course since 1979 under a lease which gave it a right of first refusal in the event the owner decided to sell the land. On November 3, 1989, a purchaser unrelated to O'Connor or Performance offered to 1 047 810 $, y compris 200 000 $ au titre des dommages-intérêts punitifs, plus les dépens établis sur la base procureur-client. Sa société et lui se pourvoient devant notre Cour, invoquant diverses erreurs de droit, dont peu ont été débattues devant le juge de première instance.

4 Dans le cas de son ancien associé, Frederick Bell, propriétaire de la société Sylvan Lake Golf & Tennis Club Ltd. (« Sylvan »), le litige qui traîne devant les tribunaux depuis sept ans met un frein à ses aspirations commerciales. Tout cela, de conclure le juge de première instance, parce qu'O'Connor a souscrit des affidavits mensongers, refusé de produire des documents pertinents, donné de faux témoignages au cours de deux procès distincts et fait [TRADUCTION] « tout en son pouvoir pour empêcher la vérité d'éclater au grand jour » (par. 115). Aujourd'hui, Bell serait, dit-on, un homme usé, [TRADUCTION] « divorcé [et sans] l'initiative ou l'enthousiasme et la détermination nécessaires pour s'engager, à son âge, dans une telle entreprise » (par. 90). Bell a obtenu une somme de 200 000 $ au titre des dommages-intérêts punitifs en première instance, mais la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta a infirmé cet aspect du jugement ((2000), 255 A.R. 329, 2000 ABCA 116). Dans son pourvoi incident devant notre Cour, sa société, Sylvan, demande le rétablissement de cette décision.

5 Parce qu'il est question dans les deux cas de dommages-intérêts punitifs, le présent pourvoi a été entendu avec l'affaire Whiten c. Pilot Insurance Co., [2002] 1 R.C.S. 595, 2002 CSC 18, qui est décidée en même temps.

6 Je suis d'avis, pour des motifs quelque peu différents de ceux exposés par la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta, de rejeter le pourvoi principal et le pourvoi incident, avec dépens sur la base partie-partie dans les deux cas.

I. Les faits

7 Sylvan exploitait depuis 1979 un terrain de golf d'une superficie de 171,53 acres et comptant 18 trous, en vertu d'un bail qui lui conférait un droit de premier refus si le propriétaire du golf décidait de le vendre. Le 3 novembre 1989, un acheteur sans purchase the golf course property for $1.3 million. Sylvan then had until December 31, 1989 to make the purchase on the same terms and conditions. The outside offer triggered the chain of events that led to this action.

8 O'Connor was familiar with the Sylvan Lake Golf Course, having played it frequently and having hosted his corporate tournament at that site for some years.

9 O'Connor, unbeknownst to Bell, had approached the landowner with a view to purchasing the leased golf course property, without result. He had obtained a financing commitment as early as March 31, 1989, from the Federal Business Development Bank ("FBDB"). On learning that Sylvan had exercised its right of first refusal, O'Connor approached Bell with an offer of financial assistance, which was declined. However, when Bell's former partner dropped out, and Sylvan's efforts to finance the purchase of the golf course through other means proved unsuccessful, Bell went back to O'Connor. Bell testified that at that meeting he discussed with O'Connor how Bell wanted to secure another five years of operation of the golf course with a chance at the end of that time to secure his retirement by the development of the 18th hole for residential development. Negotiations for a joint venture ensued near the end of November or early December 1989.

10 After a number of preliminary meetings, O'Connor spent about two and a half hours at Bell's home during the December 16-17 weekend. The two men met at length in O'Connor's truck a day or two later. The trial judge found that Bell and O'Connor came to a verbal agreement on the terms of their joint venture. They would pool their resources plus a $700,000 mortgage from the FBDB to purchase the property. Sylvan (Bell) would thereafter operate the facilities for five years for its own account without any day-to-day involvement of O'Connor. In brief, at the conclusion of five years, Sylvan would be bought out by Performance aucun lien avec O'Connor ou Performance a offert d'acheter le terrain de golf pour la somme de 1,3 million de dollars. Sylvan avait jusqu'au 31 décembre 1989 pour faire l'acquisition du golf aux mêmes conditions. L'offre extérieure a déclenché la succession d'événements qui ont conduit à la présente action.

O'Connor connaissait le terrain de golf de Sylvan Lake, puisqu'il y avait joué fréquemment et y avait organisé le tournoi de golf de son entreprise pendant quelques années.

À l'insu de Bell, O'Connor avait discuté avec le propriétaire du terrain de golf loué par Sylvan de la possibilité d'acquérir le terrain, mais sans succès. Dès le 31 mars 1989, il avait obtenu un engagement de financement de la Banque fédérale de développement (« BFD »). Lorsqu'il a appris que Sylvan avait exercé son droit de premier refus (ou droit de préemption), O'Connor a fait une offre d'aide financière à Bell, qui l'a refusée. Toutefois, lorsque l'ancien associé de Bell s'est désisté et que les efforts de Sylvan en vue de financer par d'autres moyens l'achat du golf se sont révélés infructueux, Bell a repris contact avec O'Connor. Bell a témoigné que, au cours de leur rencontre, il avait dit à O'Connor qu'il souhaitait s'assurer la faculté d'exploiter le golf pendant une autre période de cinq ans, ainsi que la possibilité, au terme de cette période, de réaliser un complexe domiciliaire près du 18^{e} trou, dans le but de s'assurer une retraite confortable. Des négociations en vue d'établir une coentreprise se sont amorcées vers la fin novembre ou le début décembre 1989.

Après un certain nombre d'entretiens préliminaires, O'Connor a passé environ deux heures et demie à la résidence de Bell au cours de la fin de semaine des 16 et 17 décembre. Les deux hommes ont discuté abondamment dans le camion d'O'Connor un ou deux jours plus tard. Le juge de première instance a estimé que Bell et O'Connor s'étaient entendus verbalement sur les modalités de leur coentreprise. Ils mettraient en commun leurs ressources ainsi qu'un prêt hypothécaire de 700 000 $ consenti par la BFD pour acheter le terrain de golf. Sylvan (Bell) l'exploiterait ensuite pour son propre compte pendant cinq ans, sans la participation journalière

For present purposes, the only contentious issue was the option for a residential development to be undertaken by Bell (or a third party) "along the 18th fairway". O'Connor and Bell did not discuss a metes and bounds description of the optioned land, but Bell testified, and the trial judge accepted, that he showed O'Connor photographs and plans of the sort of development he had in mind, namely a double row of houses (i.e., on both sides of a street) clustered around a cul-de-sac along the length of the 18th fairway (480 yards). A photograph of a comparable golf course development where Bell had lived in the Bayview area of Toronto formed part of the negotiations (and was marked at trial as Exhibit 1, Tab 67). O'Connor agreed to option the land to permit such a development, otherwise (as the trial judge found) Bell would not have agreed to the five-year joint venture. The parties agreed that the purchase price of the optioned land would be $400,000 by a third party (or $200,000 if the existing owner Sylvan (Bell) chose to develop the parcel).

As part of the agreement, O'Connor undertook to have his lawyer reduce the verbal terms to writing. In due course, a document was produced. Clause 18, the option, accurately specified the 480-yard length of the proposed development, but instead of sufficient width to permit a double row of houses (approximately 110 yards), clause 18 allowed only enough land for a single row of houses (110 feet). This misstatement of the oral agreement was thus pleaded in para. 9 of the Statement of Claim:

Paragraph 18 of the December 21st, 1989 written Agreement did not accurately reflect the terms of the oral agreement made between Performance and Sylvan in that it misdescribed the width of the lands subject d'O'Connor. Au terme de la période de cinq ans, Sylvan serait achetée par Performance (O'Connor) pour une somme déterminée, déduction faite de tout solde de l'emprunt hypothécaire obtenu de la BFD.

11 Dans le présent pourvoi, le seul point litigieux est l'option relative à la construction du complexe domiciliaire susceptible d'être exécutée par Bell (ou par un tiers) au [TRADUCTION] « 18e trou ». O'Connor et Bell n'ont pas discuté de la description technique du terrain visé par l'option, mais dans son témoignage Bell a affirmé — et le juge de première instance l'a cru — avoir montré à O'Connor des photographies et des plans du type de complexe qu'il envisageait, à savoir une double rangée de maisons (c.-à-d. de chaque côté d'une rue) regroupées autour d'un cul-de-sac le long du 18e trou (qui mesure 480 verges). Une photographie montrant un complexe comparable — qui est situé près d'un terrain de golf et où Bell a habité dans la région torontoise de Bayview — a été produite dans le cours des négociations (et déposée en preuve sous la cote P1, onglet 67). O'Connor a accepté de consentir une option visant l'achat de terrains en vue de permettre la construction d'un tel complexe, option sans laquelle (a conclu le juge de première instance) Bell n'aurait pas accepté la coentreprise de cinq ans. Les parties ont convenu que le prix d'achat des terrains visés par l'option serait de 400 000 $ en cas d'acquisition par un tiers (ou de 200 000 $ si Sylvan (Bell), qui en était alors propriétaire, décidait de les aménager).

[TRADUCTION] Le paragraphe 18 de la Convention écrite du 21 décembre 1989 ne reflète pas fidèlement les termes de l'entente verbale intervenue entre Performance et Sylvan, en ce qu'il décrit faussement la largeur des to the Agreement as "One Hundred and Ten (110 ft.) feet in width east to west", when the width of the lands comprising the 18th hole was approximately 110 yards in width east to west. [Emphasis in original.]

Bell had in mind a development of about 58 homes on about 11 acres. O'Connor's draft allowed 3.6 acres. Bell testified, and the trial judge accepted, that he had specifically told O'Connor during the negotiations that a single row housing development (which is all that clause 18 would permit) would "be a waste of land and an uneconomic use of the 18th hole" (para. 42).

13 Clause 18 of the Joint Venture Agreement, as drawn up by O'Connor's lawyer, provided as follows:

18. The parties agree that sale of a portion of the lands for development of residential housing is contemplated by both of them within the term of Sylvan's tenancy. Such portion of the lands is: one hundred ten (110 ft) feet in width east to west and approximately four hundred eighty (480 yds) yards in length north to south, and abutted by the eastern border of the lands along its entire length. The parties agree that, if they are presented with an appropriate offer, those lands will be sold to a third party developer. It is agreed that such appropriate offer will offer the sum of at least four hundred thousand ($400,000) dollars cash for those lands and provide for the continued, uninterrupted existence of the golf course consisting of no less than six thousand two hundred fifty (6250 yds) yards in length with all eighteen fairways well divided, defined and reasonably wide (for reference sake the parties agree that the fairways of the golf course are, at the date of this agreement, for the most part well divided, defined and reasonably wide). [Emphasis added.]

14 On December 21, 1989, O'Connor and Bell signed the Joint Venture Agreement as well as the documentation to finance the purchase of all of the land. The documents were then delivered to the solicitor for Sylvan, who reviewed it, and suggested revisions, which led to the signing of an amended Joint Venture Agreement on December 27, 1989. Sylvan's solicitor testified at trial that he did not terrains visés par la convention comme étant « cent dix pieds (110 pi.) de largeur dans une orientation est-ouest », alors que la largeur des terrains du 18e trou était d'environ 110 verges dans une orientation est-ouest. [En italique dans l'original.]

Bell envisageait la construction d'environ 58 maisons, sur à peu près 11 acres. Le projet de convention établi par O'Connor ne prévoyait que 3,6 acres. Le juge de première instance a ajouté foi à l'affirmation de Bell selon laquelle il avait expressément dit à O'Connor, au cours des négociations, que la construction d'une seule rangée de maisons (qui était tout ce que la clause 18 permettait) serait [TRADUCTION] « un gaspillage de terrain et une utilisation non rentable du 18e trou » (par. 42).

Voici le texte de la clause 18 de la Convention de coentreprise, telle qu'elle avait été rédigée par l'avocat d'O'Connor :

[TRADUCTION]

18. Les deux parties reconnaissent qu'elles envisagent la vente d'une partie des terrains aux fins de construction d'un complexe domiciliaire pendant la durée de la tenance à bail de Sylvan. Cette parcelle est décrite ainsi : cent dix (110) pieds de largeur dans une orientation est-ouest et environ quatre cent quatre-vingt (480) verges de longueur dans une orientation nord-sud, et contiguë à la limite est du terrain sur toute sa longueur. Les parties conviennent que, si elles reçoivent une offre convenable, ces terrains seront vendus à un tiers promoteur. Il est convenu que constituerait une offre convenable le paiement d'une somme d'au moins quatre cent mille dollars (400 000 $) en espèces pour ces terrains, en plus de l'engagement d'assurer sans interruption l'existence du terrain de golf, qui doit avoir une superficie minimale de six mille deux cent cinquante (6250) verges de longueur et compter dix-huit trous bien divisés, bien définis et raisonnablement larges (à titre d'information, les parties reconnaissent que, à la date de la présente convention, les trous du terrain de golf sont pour la plupart bien divisés, bien définis et raisonnablement larges). [Je souligne.]

Le 21 décembre 1989, O'Connor et Bell ont signé la Convention de coentreprise de même que la documentation relative au financement de l'achat de l'ensemble de la propriété. Les documents ont alors été communiqués à l'avocat de Sylvan, qui les a examinés et a suggéré quelques modifications, ce qui a eu pour effet de retarder au 27 décembre 1989 la signature de la Convention de coentreprise discuss the optioned property dimensions with Bell, and Bell said he never read the option clause. All copies of the documents had been left with his lawyer. O'Connor's solicitor was not called to testify, an omission that caused the trial judge to draw the adverse inference that if the lawyer had testified, it would not have assisted O'Connor.

O'Connor knew from Bell's comment during the negotiations that he would not sign an agreement without the option for sufficient land to create the "Bayview" layout development with two rows of housing. Anything less would be "a waste". O'Connor therefore knew when Bell signed the document that he had not detected the substitution of 110 feet for 110 yards.

In 1990, Bell experienced some "cash flow difficulties" that led to a modification to the financial terms of the Agreement, but pressed ahead with plans for the potential development. For a time in 1992, he worked with UMA Engineering Ltd. He subsequently retained Norman Trouth, a development consultant, who produced alternative plans and sketches for developments of 50 and 58 houses along the 18th fairway. Trouth estimated the 58-house project on or about 10.9 acres would net $820,100. In some respects, Bell was looking for more land than O'Connor had verbally agreed to. The proposals would, as contemplated from the outset, involve a measure of realignment of the 18th fairway. Bell therefore left these development proposals with O'Connor, who said he would review them. In the meantime, the lands in the golf course had been annexed to the Town of Sylvan Lake and there was potential for development of the entire 171.5 acres, much to O'Connor's benefit.

modifiée. Au procès, l'avocat de Sylvan a témoigné ne pas avoir discuté avec Bell des dimensions de la parcelle visée par l'option, et Bell a déclaré ne jamais avoir lu la clause relative à l'option. Tous les exemplaires des documents avaient été remis à son avocat. L'avocat d'O'Connor n'a pas été appelé à témoigner, omission qui a amené le juge du procès à tirer la conclusion défavorable à O'Connor selon laquelle la déposition de l'avocat n'aurait pas aidé la cause d'O'Connor.

16 En 1990, Bell a connu quelques [TRADUCTION] « problèmes de trésorerie » qui ont entraîné une modification des modalités financières de la Convention, mais il n'en a pas moins poursuivi l'élaboration des plans de l'éventuel complexe. Pendant un certain temps en 1992, il y a travaillé avec la société UMA Engineering Ltd. Il a subséquemment retenu les services de Norman Trouth, consultant en aménagement, qui a préparé d'autres plans et croquis proposant la construction de 50 et 58 maisons le long du 18e trou. M. Trouth estimait que le projet de construction de 58 maisons sur une parcelle d'environ 10,9 acres pourrait rapporter 820 100 $. À certains égards, Bell envisageait une superficie plus vaste que celle dont avait convenu verbalement O'Connor. Conformément à ce qui avait été envisagé dès le départ, ces propositions impliquaient un certain réaménagement du tracé du 18e trou. Bell a donc remis ces propositions d'aménagement à O'Connor, qui a dit qu'il les examinerait. Entre-temps, les terrains du parcours de golf avaient été annexés à la ville de Sylvan Lake et il était devenu possible d'aménager l'ensemble des 171,5 acres, situation très avantageuse pour O'Connor.

17 Time went by. In May 1993, Bell again contacted O'Connor, who promised to review the proposal, but did not respond either then or even after a later meeting arranged by Bell's wife. The clock was running because the option required the development to be completed by December 31, 1994. Finally, by letter dated June 8, 1993, O'Connor's lawyer advised Bell that "[i]t is very unlikely that Performance Industries Ltd. will approve of any development plan which is not strictly in line with the Agreement".

18 Bell testified that at that point, for the first time, he read clause 18 and realized that it did not conform to the oral agreement. O'Connor, he concluded, had slipped in a change of dimensions that turned a viable project into "a waste of land". Bell says he was incensed. He attended at O'Connor's office for what he described as a heated meeting.

19 Attempts were made to resolve the dispute, but O'Connor continued to insist that Bell's right to develop the property was limited under clause 18 of the Agreement to a strip of land 110 feet wide on the easterly boundary of the golf course adjacent to the 18th hole. Bell continued to insist that O'Connor live up to the verbal agreement, which would require 110 feet being read as 110 yards.

20 In December 1994, the 5-year duration of the joint venture coming up for expiry, O'Connor tendered the funds required to buy out Sylvan's interest. Bell refused to allow Sylvan to relinquish possession of the land, and O'Connor commenced an action for specific performance. The Alberta Court of Queen's Bench granted an order for specific performance and O'Connor assumed possession of the property and built a clubhouse at the 18th hole. Also in late 1994, Sylvan commenced the present action against Performance and O'Connor for rectification of the Agreement or damages in lieu thereof, punitive damages and solicitor-client costs.

Puis le temps a passé. En mai 1993, Bell a de nouveau communiqué avec O'Connor, qui a promis d'examiner la proposition mais n'y a pas répondu, ni à ce moment ni après une rencontre subséquente organisée par l'épouse de Bell. Le temps continuait cependant de courir, car l'option exigeait que l'aménagement soit complété au plus tard le 31 décembre 1994. Finalement, dans une lettre datée du 8 juin 1993, l'avocat d'O'Connor a avisé Bell qu'[TRADUCTION] « [i]l [était] très peu probable que Performance Industries Ltd. approuve tout projet d'aménagement qui ne soit pas strictement conforme à la Convention ».

Bell a témoigné qu'à ce moment, pour la première fois, il a lu la clause 18 et constaté qu'elle ne correspondait pas à l'entente verbale. O'Connor, a-t-il conclu, avait introduit un changement de dimension qui avait transformé un projet viable en [TRADUCTION] « un gaspillage de terrain ». Il était furieux, a-t-il dit. Il s'est rendu au bureau d'O'Connor, où ils ont eu une discussion qu'il a qualifiée de très animée.

Des efforts ont été déployés afin de résoudre le différend, mais O'Connor continuait à maintenir que, aux termes de la clause 18 de la Convention, Bell n'avait le droit d'aménager la propriété que sur une bande de terrain de 110 pieds de largeur, contiguë au 18e trou, du côté est du terrain de golf. Bell, pour sa part, continuait d'exiger qu'O'Connor respecte l'entente verbale, ce qui impliquait qu'on considère que la mention 110 pieds signifiait plutôt 110 verges.

En décembre 1994, avant l'expiration de la période de validité de cinq ans de la coentreprise, O'Connor a offert les sommes nécessaires pour racheter la participation de Sylvan. Bell a refusé de permettre à Sylvan de se départir de la possession du terrain et O'Connor a engagé une action demandant l'exécution forcée de la Convention. La Cour du Banc de la Reine de l'Alberta a fait droit à l'action et O'Connor a pris possession de la propriété et construit un pavillon au 18e trou. Également à la fin de 1994, Sylvan a entamé contre Performance et O'Connor la présente action sollicitant soit la rectification de la Convention soit des dommages-intérêts en tenant lieu, des dommages-intérêts punitifs et les dépens sur la base procureur-client.

II. Judicial History

A. Alberta Court of Queen's Bench (1999), 246 A.R. 272

Wilkins J. noted that the onus was on the plaintiff "to establish both that Bell was mistaken as to the description of the development property when he signed the Agreement and that O'Connor knew of his mistake" (para. 66).

In the view of Wilkins J., "O'Connor's conduct in attempting to take advantage of the mistake he knew Bell to have made in signing the Agreement is equivalent to a fraud or a misrepresentation amounting [to] fraud or sharp practice" (para. 87). He concluded that "[i]t would be unjust, inequitable and unconscionable for this court not to offer redress to Bell in the face of that conduct" (para. 87). Accordingly, it was "clear from the evidence" that Bell is entitled to rectification of clause 18 of the Agreement. Sylvan was awarded damages in lieu of specific performance of the rectified Joint Venture Agreement.

The compensatory damages were assessed on the basis of "the amount of money that Bell would have been entitled to [receive] had he been permitted to complete the residential development of the 18th hole in accordance with the terms of the rectified clause 18" (para. 92). Wilkins J. was satisfied that a development of 58 houses could have "been constructed and substantially marketed prior to December 31, 1994" (para. 93). In the result, he assessed damages on the basis of the 58-lot development on the 480-yard 18th fairway in the amount of $820,100. From this he subtracted $200,000 (being the amount Sylvan (Bell) would have had to pay Performance (O'Connor) to exercise the $400,000 option) for a net of $620,100.

With respect to punitive damages, Wilkins J. reiterated that he found "the actions of O'Connor to be tantamount to fraud, equivalent to a misrepresentation in the nature of fraud, and sharp practice" (para. 109). O'Connor's "actions demand an award which will stand as an example to others

II. L'historique des procédures judiciaires

A. Cour du Banc de la Reine de l'Alberta (1999), 246 A.R. 272

21 Le juge Wilkins a souligné qu'il incombait au demandeur [TRADUCTION] « d'établir à la fois que Bell se trompait quant à la description du bien-fonds à aménager lorsqu'il a signé la Convention et qu'O'Connor savait qu'il se trompait » (par. 66).

22 Selon le juge Wilkins, [TRADUCTION] « [l]a façon dont O'Connor s'est comporté en tentant de tirer avantage de l'erreur qu'il savait que Bell avait commise en signant la Convention équivaut à une fraude ou à une assertion inexacte assimilable à fraude ou à dol » (par. 87). Il a conclu qu'[TRADUCTION] « [i]l serait injuste, inéquitable et abusif que la cour n'accorde pas réparation à Bell devant une telle conduite » (par. 87). En conséquence, il ressortait [TRADUCTION] « clairement de la preuve » que Bell avait droit à la rectification de la clause 18 de la Convention. Sylvan a obtenu des dommages-intérêts au lieu de l'exécution forcée de la Convention de coentreprise rectifiée.

24 Relativement aux dommages-intérêts punitifs, le juge Wilkins a réitéré sa conclusion que les [TRADUCTION] « actions d'O'Connor étaient assimilables à une fraude ou à une assertion inexacte participant de la fraude et du dol » (par. 109). Les « actions [d'O'Connor] commandent [sa] condamnation and at the same time assure that [he] does not unduly profit from his conduct" (para. 109). Wilkins J. stated that "[this] latter statement is the only proper basis for an award of punitive damages" (para. 109) in this case. Accordingly, O'Connor's punitive damages should be awarded "at least to the extent of disgorging the base profit he has realized by his improper conduct" (para. 110). Punitive damages were assessed at $200,000. For their misbehaviour in the conduct of the action, the defendants (now appellants) were required to pay solicitor-client costs.

25 O'Connor argued that he should not be personally liable for any judgment against Performance in favour of the plaintiff, but Wilkins J. rejected this argument "in its entirety" (para. 119). He said that every step taken in furtherance of this joint venture was directed by O'Connor, as was every attempt to defeat Bell's legitimate interests in the protracted litigation. "Surely there could never be a clearer case in which the court must pierce the corporate veil and attribute" (para. 119) liability personally to O'Connor. And so he did.

B. Alberta Court of Appeal (2000), 255 A.R. 329, 2000 ABCA 116

26 In a per curiam decision, the Court of Appeal upheld Wilkins J.'s rulings that the Agreement could be rectified and that the corporate veil could be lifted. It also upheld the damages award, with the exception of the award for punitive damages, which it set aside. The order for solicitor-client costs was similarly upheld.

27 With respect to compensatory damages, the Court of Appeal was "not prepared to interfere with the award of damages in this case" (para. 27). It à une somme qui aura valeur d'exemple et en même temps fera en sorte qu'[il] ne profite pas indûment de sa conduite » (par. 109). Le juge Wilkins a dit que [TRADUCTION] « [l]a seconde partie de l'affirmation qui précède est le seul fondement justifiant d'accorder des dommages-intérêts punitifs » (par. 109) en l'espèce. Par conséquent, O'Connor devrait être condamné, au titre des dommages-intérêts punitifs, au paiement d'une somme [TRADUCTION] « à tout le moins suffisante pour lui faire remettre le profit indigne qu'il a réalisé par sa conduite répréhensible » (par. 110). Les dommages-intérêts punitifs ont été établis à 200 000 $. En raison de leur comportement abusif pendant le déroulement de l'action, les défendeurs (appelants au présent pourvoi) ont été condamnés aux dépens sur la base procureur-client.

O'Connor a prétendu qu'il ne devait pas être tenu personnellement responsable à l'égard de tout jugement prononcé contre Performance en faveur de la demanderesse, mais le juge Wilkins a « complètement » (par. 119) rejeté cet argument. Le juge a dit que chaque mesure prise pour appuyer cette coentreprise l'avait été à l'instigation d'O'Connor, comme toutes les tentatives visant à miner les intérêts légitimes de Bell dans cet interminable litige. [TRADUCTION] « Il ne saurait certes y avoir de cas plus clair où la cour doit écarter le bénéfice de la personnalité juridique et tenir » (par. 119) O'Connor personnellement responsable. Et c'est ce qu'a fait le juge Wilkins.

Dans un arrêt per curiam, la Cour d'appel a confirmé la décision du juge Wilkins indiquant que la Convention pouvait être rectifiée et que le bénéfice de la personnalité juridique pouvait être écarté. Elle a aussi confirmé les décisions de ce dernier relativement aux dommages-intérêts, sauf celle concernant les dommages-intérêts punitifs, qu'elle a annulée. Elle a également confirmé l'ordonnance accordant les dépens sur la base procureur-client.

En ce qui a trait aux dommages-intérêts compensatoires, la Cour d'appel a dit [TRADUCTION] « ne pas être disposée à modifier les did, however, describe the trial judge's award as "generous" (para. 27).

The Court of Appeal agreed with the trial judge that "the misconduct of the defendants was so outrageous that punishment and deterrence [were] required" (para. 28), but that punitive damages "should be awarded only if they achieve some rational purpose" (para. 28). In the Court of Appeal's view, the "substantial and generous compensatory damages awarded" (para. 29) by the trial judge satisfy both the punishment and deterrence objectives in this case. The Court of Appeal was also of the view that this was not a case where it was necessary to award punitive damages to ensure that the defendant does not profit from his misconduct. O'Connor would have profited under the Agreement even if he had not misbehaved. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal set aside the punitive damages award. In all other respects, the appeal was dismissed.

III. Analysis

When reasonably sophisticated businesspeople reduce their oral agreements to written form, which are prepared and reviewed by lawyers, and changes made, and the documents are then executed, there is usually little scope for rectification. Nor does a falling out between business partners usually attract an award of punitive damages. This case is unusual because of the findings of fraud and deceit made against the appellant O'Connor by the trial judge. The appellants are therefore obliged to try to make their case, if at all, out of the mouth of Bell, with such help as they can find in the law books for their position.

Counsel for the appellants (who was not counsel at trial) seeks to raise three issues, which he describes as follows: (1) the relationship between the plea of dommages-intérêts en l'espèce» (par. 27). Elle a toutefois qualifié de « généreux » (par. 27) le quantum accordé par le juge de première instance.

28 La Cour d'appel a souscrit à la conclusion du juge de première instance que [TRADUCTION] « la conduite répréhensible des défendeurs était à ce point inacceptable que des mesures de punition et de dissuasion s'imposaient » (par. 28), mais elle a ajouté que des dommages-intérêts punitifs « ne doivent être accordés que s'ils servent un objectif rationnel » (par. 28). De l'avis de la Cour d'appel, les [TRADUCTION] « dommages-intérêts compensatoires substantiels et généreux accordés » (par. 29) par le juge de première instance satisfaisaient à la fois aux objectifs de punition et de dissuasion en l'espèce. La Cour d'appel estimait également ne pas être en présence d'une affaire où des dommages-intérêts punitifs étaient requis pour faire en sorte que le défendeur ne profite pas de sa conduite répréhensible. O'Connor aurait tiré des bénéfices de l'exécution de la Convention, même s'il ne s'était pas comporté de façon répréhensible. La Cour d'appel a donc annulé la décision accordant les dommages-intérêts punitifs. L'appel a toutefois été rejeté sur tous les autres points.

III. L'analyse

29 Lorsque des gens d'affaires raisonnablement avertis couchent par écrit leurs ententes verbales, dans des documents qui sont préparés et revus par des avocats puis modifiés avant d'être signés, il y a généralement peu de chances qu'il y ait lieu à rectification. Pas plus d'ailleurs qu'une mésentente entre associés commerciaux n'entraîne ordinairement une condamnation à des dommages-intérêts punitifs. La présente affaire est inhabituelle en ce que le juge de première instance a conclu à l'existence de fraude et de dol de la part de l'appelant O'Connor. Les appelants doivent par conséquent tenter d'établir le bienfondé de leurs prétentions, pour peu que cela soit possible, à partir des assertions mêmes de Bell et en s'appuyant sur tout ce qu'ils peuvent trouver dans la jurisprudence au soutien de leur thèse.

30 L'avocat des appelants (qui ne les représentait pas en première instance) soulève trois points, qu'il énonce ainsi : (1) le rapport entre l'allégation unilateral mistake and the remedy of rectification (particularly where the mistake is the product of the plaintiff's own negligence); (2) the kind of pleading and proof that a plaintiff who seeks rectification must offer, as well as the proper standard of proof to apply in rectification cases; and, (3) the proper method of quantifying damages ordered in lieu of rectification in cases where the subject matter of the rectified contract is an option for the sale of land. The respondent, as stated, cross-appeals against the quashing of the award of punitive damages.

d'erreur unilatérale et la réparation que constitue la rectification (particulièrement lorsque l'erreur est le fruit de la propre négligence du demandeur); (2) le type d'allégations et de preuve que doit présenter le demandeur qui sollicite la rectification, de même que la norme de preuve applicable en pareil cas; (3) la méthode appropriée pour quantifier les dommages-intérêts accordés à la place de la rectification lorsque l'objet du contrat rectifié est une option portant sur la vente de terrains. Comme il a été mentionné plus tôt, l'intimée se pourvoit de façon incidente contre l'annulation de la décision accordant les dommages-intérêts punitifs.

A. Rectification of the Contract

A. Rectification du contrat

31 Rectification is an equitable remedy whose purpose is to prevent a written document from being used as an engine of fraud or misconduct "equivalent to fraud". The traditional rule was to permit rectification only for mutual mistake, but rectification is now available for unilateral mistake (as here), provided certain demanding preconditions are met. Insofar as they are relevant to this appeal, these preconditions can be summarized as follows. Rectification is predicated on the existence of a prior oral contract whose terms are definite and ascertainable. The plaintiff must establish that the terms agreed to orally were not written down properly. The error may be fraudulent, or it may be innocent. What is essential is that at the time of execution of the written document the defendant knew or ought to have known of the error and the plaintiff did not. Moreover, the attempt of the defendant to rely on the erroneous written document must amount to "fraud or the equivalent of fraud". The court's task in a rectification case is corrective, not speculative. It is to restore the parties to their original bargain, not to rectify a belatedly recognized error of judgment by one party or the other: Hart v. Boutilier (1916), 56 D.L.R. 620 (S.C.C.), at p. 630; Ship M. F. Whalen v. Pointe Anne Quarries Ltd. (1921), 63 S.C.R. 109, at pp. 126-27; Downtown King West Development Corp. v. Massey Ferguson Industries Ltd. (1996), 133 D.L.R. (4th) 550 (Ont. C.A.), at p. 558; G. H. L. Fridman, The Law of Contract in Canada (4th ed. 1999), at p. 867; S. M. Waddams, The Law of Contracts (4th

La rectification est une réparation en equity visant à empêcher qu'un écrit soit utilisé comme moyen de commettre une fraude ou de se livrer à une conduite répréhensible [TRADUCTION] « équivalant à fraude ». La règle traditionnelle ne permettait la rectification qu'en cas d'erreur mutuelle, mais il y a maintenant ouverture à rectification en cas d'erreur unilatérale (comme dans la présente affaire), pourvu que certains préalables rigoureux soient réunis. Dans la mesure où ils sont pertinents en l'espèce, ces préalables peuvent être résumés ainsi. La rectification est fondée sur l'existence d'un contrat verbal préalable dont les conditions sont déterminées et déterminables. Le demandeur doit établir que les conditions convenues verbalement n'ont pas été couchées adéquatement par écrit. L'erreur peut être frauduleuse ou innocente. L'exigence essentielle est que, au moment de la signature de l'écrit, le défendeur connaissait l'erreur ou aurait dû la connaître, et que le demandeur n'en connaissait pas l'existence. De plus, la tentative du défendeur d'utiliser l'écrit erroné doit constituer « une fraude ou l'équivalent d'une fraude ». La tâche des tribunaux dans une affaire de rectification est de corriger et non de faire des supputations. Elle consiste à reconstituer le marché original conclu par les parties, et non à rectifier une erreur de jugement qu'une partie aurait reconnue tardivement : Hart c. Boutilier (1916), 56 D.L.R. 620 (C.S.C.), p. 630; Ship M. F. Whalen c. Pointe Anne Quarries Ltd. (1921), 63 R.C.S. 109, p. 126-127; Downtown King West Development Corp. c. Massey

ed. 1999), at para. 336. In Hart, supra, at p. 630, Duff J. (as he then was) stressed that "[t]he power of rectification must be used with great caution". Apart from everything else, a relaxed approach to rectification as a substitute for due diligence at the time a document is signed would undermine the confidence of the commercial world in written contracts.

B. Preliminary Objection

The respondent says the appellants ought not to be allowed to argue various objections to rectification that were not raised at trial. The alleged uncertainty about the terms of the prior oral agreement, for example, is an issue that did not come into bloom until after the appellants had lost in the Alberta Court of Appeal. There is some merit in this objection. Unless the parties have fully addressed a factual issue at trial in the evidence, and preferably in argument for the benefit of the trial judge, there is always the very real danger that the appellate record will not contain all of the relevant facts, or the trial judge's view on some critical factual issue, or that an explanation that might have been offered in testimony by a party or one or more of its witnesses was never elicited. As Duff J. put it in Lamb v. Kincaid (1907), 38 S.C.R. 516, at p. 539:

A court of appeal, I think, should not give effect to such a point taken for the first time in appeal, unless it be clear that, had the question been raised at the proper time, no further light could have been thrown upon it.

In my view, the appellants' contentions on the rectification issues are fact-based, but are manageable on the evidentiary record and raise important issues of law and equity. The Court is free to consider a new issue of law on the appeal where it is able to do so without procedural prejudice to the Ferguson Industries Ltd. (1996), 133 D.L.R. (4th) 550 (C.A. Ont.), p. 558; G. H. L. Fridman, The Law of Contract in Canada (4e éd. 1999), p. 867; S. M. Waddams, The Law of Contracts (4e éd. 1999), par. 336. Dans l'arrêt Hart, précité, p. 630, le juge Duff (plus tard Juge en chef du Canada) a souligné que [TRADUCTION] « [l]e pouvoir de rectification ne doit être utilisé qu'avec grande prudence ». Tout assouplissement de l'application de la rectification qui en ferait un substitut à l'exercice de diligence raisonnable lors de la signature d'un document aurait pour effet d'ébranler la confiance du monde des affaires à l'égard des contrats écrits.

B. Objection préliminaire

32 L'intimée prétend que les appelants ne devraient pas être admis à plaider des objections à la rectification qui n'ont pas été soulevées au procès. Par exemple, l'incertitude qui caractériserait les conditions de l'entente verbale antérieure est une question que n'ont soulevée les appelants qu'après avoir été déboutés par la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta. Cette objection n'est pas sans fondement. À moins que les parties n'aient traité de façon exhaustive une question de fait au procès en présentant leur preuve, et de préférence au cours des plaidoiries devant le juge, il y a toujours un risque très réel que le dossier d'appel ne comporte pas tous les faits pertinents ou l'opinion du juge de première instance sur quelque question de fait cruciale, ou encore que n'ait jamais été obtenue une explication qui aurait pu être donnée par une partie ou par un ou plusieurs de ses témoins en déposant. Comme l'a dit le juge Duff dans l'arrêt Lamb c. Kincaid (1907), 38 R.C.S. 516, p. 539 :

[TRADUCTION] Selon moi, un tribunal d'appel ne devrait pas recevoir un tel argument soulevé pour la première fois en appel, à moins qu'il ne soit clair que, même si la question avait été soulevée en temps opportun, elle n'aurait pas été éclaircie davantage.

33 À mon avis, les prétentions des appelants au sujet des questions touchant à la rectification reposent sur des faits, mais elles peuvent être examinées à la lumière de la preuve au dossier et elles soulèvent d'importantes questions de droit et d'equity. Il est loisible à la Cour, dans le cadre d'un pourvoi, opposing party and where the refusal to do so would risk an injustice.

34 Here the respondent sought and obtained an equitable remedy to rectify a situation which need never have arisen had Bell properly read the draft document in December 1989. He who seeks equity must do equity. If equitable relief had been wrongfully granted, we should not close our eyes to a fatal objection because of counsel's oversight at trial. The facts vital to the appellants' new legal position are readily ascertainable in the evidence and the necessary findings are implicit, if not always explicit, in the trial judge's reasons.

C. The Conditions Precedent to Rectification

35 As stated, high hurdles are placed in the way of a businessperson who relies on his or her own unilateral mistake to resile from the written terms of a document which he or she has signed and which, on its face, seems perfectly clear. The law is determined not to open the proverbial floodgates to dissatisfied contract makers who want to extricate themselves from a poor bargain.

36 I referred earlier to the four conditions precedent, or "hurdles" that a plaintiff must overcome. To these the appellants wish to add a fifth. Rectification, they say, should not be available to a plaintiff who is negligent in reviewing the documentation of a commercial agreement. To the extent the appellants' argument is that in such circumstances the Court may exercise its discretion to refuse the equitable remedy to such a plaintiff, I agree with them. To the extent they say the want of due diligence (or negligence) on the plaintiff's part is an absolute bar, I think their proposition is inconsistent with principle and authority and should be rejected.

d'examiner une nouvelle question de droit dans les cas où elle peut le faire sans qu'il en résulte de préjudice d'ordre procédural pour la partie adverse et où son refus de le faire risquerait d'entraîner une injustice.

En l'espèce, l'intimée a demandé et obtenu une réparation en equity pour faire rectifier une situation qui n'aurait jamais dû se produire si Bell avait lu adéquatement le projet de convention en décembre 1989. Qui sollicite l'équité doit lui-même agir avec équité. Si la réparation en equity a été accordée à tort, nous ne devrions pas faire abstraction d'une objection fatale parce que l'avocat a omis de la soulever au procès. Les faits essentiels à la nouvelle thèse juridique avancée par les appelants sont faciles à dégager de la preuve et les conclusions nécessaires sont implicites, sinon toujours explicites, dans les motifs du juge de première instance.

C. Les préalables à la rectification

Comme il a été indiqué précédemment, la personne en affaires qui invoque sa propre erreur unilatérale pour se soustraire aux conditions — couchées par écrit — d'un document qu'elle a signé et qui, à première vue, semble parfaitement clair, doit surmonter de sérieux obstacles. Le droit est résolu à prévenir la proverbiale avalanche de poursuites que pourraient vouloir engager des contractants insatisfaits, qui veulent se délier d'un marché peu avantageux.

J'ai évoqué plus tôt les quatre préalables, ou « obstacles », que le demandeur doit surmonter. Les appelants cherchent à en ajouter un cinquième. La rectification ne devrait pas, affirment-ils, être ouverte à un demandeur qui a été négligent dans l'examen de la documentation relative à un contrat commercial. Dans la mesure où leur argument signifie que, en pareils cas, la Cour peut exercer son pouvoir discrétionnaire de refuser d'accorder la réparation en equity à un tel demandeur, je suis d'accord avec eux. Dans la mesure où ils affirment que l'absence de diligence raisonnable (ou la négligence) d'un demandeur constitue un empêchement absolu, je crois que leur thèse est incompatible avec les principes et les autorités, et qu'elle devrait être rejetée.

The first of the traditional hurdles is that Sylvan (Bell) must show the existence and content of the inconsistent prior oral agreement. Rectification is "[t]he most venerable breach in the parol evidence rule" (Waddams, supra, at para. 336). The requirement of a prior oral agreement closes the "floodgate" to unhappy contract makers who simply failed to read the contractual documents, or who now have misgivings about the merits of what they have signed.

37 Selon le premier des obstacles traditionnels, il incombe à Sylvan (Bell) d'établir l'existence et la teneur de l'entente verbale antérieure incompatible. La rectification est [TRADUCTION] « [l']entorse la plus consacrée à la règle de l'exclusion de la preuve extrinsèque » (Waddams, op. cit., par. 336). La condition exigeant une entente verbale antérieure prévient « l'avalanche de poursuites » de la part de contractants insatisfaits qui ont tout simplement omis de lire les documents contractuels, ou qui éprouvent maintenant des réserves sur le bien-fondé de ce qu'ils ont signé.

The second hurdle is that not only must Sylvan (Bell) show that the written document does not correspond with the prior oral agreement, but that O'Connor either knew or ought to have known of the mistake in reducing the oral terms to writing. It is only where permitting O'Connor to take advantage of the error would amount to "fraud or the equivalent of fraud" that rectification is available. This requirement closes the "floodgate" to unhappy contract makers who simply made a mistake. Equity acts on the conscience of a defendant who seeks to take advantage of an error which he or she either knew or ought reasonably to have known about at the time the document was signed. Mere unilateral mistake alone is not sufficient to support rectification but if permitting the non-mistaken party to take advantage of the document would be fraud or equivalent to fraud, rectification may be available: Hart, supra, at p. 630; Ship M. F. Whalen, supra, at pp. 126-27.

38 Pour franchir le deuxième obstacle, Sylvan (Bell) doit démontrer non seulement que l'écrit ne correspond pas à l'entente verbale antérieure, mais également qu'O'Connor connaissait ou aurait dû connaître l'existence de l'erreur lorsque les conditions convenues verbalement ont été couchées par écrit. Ce n'est que lorsque le fait de permettre à O'Connor de tirer profit de l'erreur constituerait « une fraude ou l'équivalent d'une fraude » qu'il y a ouverture à rectification. Cette exigence prévient l'avalanche de poursuites de la part de contractants insatisfaits qui ont simplement fait une erreur. L'equity agit sur la conscience du défendeur qui cherche à tirer profit d'une erreur dont il connaissait ou aurait raisonnablement dû connaître l'existence au moment où le document a été signé. À elle seule, une erreur unilatérale ne peut justifier la rectification d'un document, mais il peut y avoir ouverture à cette réparation si le fait de permettre à la partie qui n'était pas dans l'erreur de tirer profit du document constitue une fraude ou l'équivalent d'une fraude : Hart, précité, p. 630; Ship M. F. Whalen, précité, p. 126-127.

What amounts to "fraud or the equivalent of fraud" is, of course, a crucial question. In First City Capital Ltd. v. British Columbia Building Corp. (1989), 43 B.L.R. 29 (B.C.S.C.), McLachlin C.J.S.C. (as she then was) observed that "in this context 'fraud or the equivalent of fraud' refers not to the tort of deceit or strict fraud in the legal sense, but rather to the broader category of equitable fraud or constructive fraud. . . . Fraud in this wider sense refers to transactions falling short of deceit but where the Court is of the opinion that it is unconscientious for a person to avail himself of the advantage obtained" (p. 37). Fraud in the "wider sense" of a ground for equitable relief "is so infinite in its varieties that the Courts have not attempted to define it", but "all kinds of unfair dealing and unconscionable conduct in matters of contract come within its ken": McMaster University v. Wilchar Construction Ltd. (1971), 22 D.L.R. (3d) 9 (Ont. H.C.), at p. 19. See also Montreal Trust Co. v. Maley (1992), 99 D.L.R. (4th) 257 (Sask. C.A.), per Wakeling J.A.; Alampi v. Swartz (1964), 43 D.L.R. (2d) 11 (Ont. C.A.); Stepps Investments Ltd. v. Security Capital Corp. (1976), 73 D.L.R. (3d) 351 (Ont. H.C.), per Grange J. (as he then was), at pp. 362-63; and Waddams, supra, at para. 342.

reconnues en equity [. . .] Dans ce sens plus large, la fraude s'entend également d'opérations qui ne sont pas dolosives, mais à l'égard desquelles le tribunal estime qu'il serait abusif de laisser une personne profiter de l'avantage obtenu » (p. 37). Au « sens plus large » de fraude donnant ouverture à une réparation en equity, la fraude se présente sous [TRADUCTION] « un nombre tellement infini de formes que les tribunaux n'ont pas tenté de la définir », mais « elle vise toutes sortes de manœuvres déloyales et de conduites abusives en matière contractuelle » : McMaster University c. Wilchar Construction Ltd. (1971), 22 D.L.R. (3d) 9 (H.C. Ont.), p. 19. Voir également Montreal Trust Co. c. Maley (1992), 99 D.L.R. (4th) 257 (C.A. Sask.), le juge Wakeling; Alampi c. Swartz (1964), 43 D.L.R. (2d) 11 (C.A. Ont.); Stepps Investments Ltd. c. Security Capital Corp. (1976), 73 D.L.R. (3d) 351 (H.C. Ont.), le juge Grange (plus tard juge à la Cour d'appel), p. 362-363, et Waddams, op. cit., par. 342.

40 The third hurdle is that Sylvan (Bell) must show "the precise form" in which the written instrument can be made to express the prior intention (Hart, supra, per Duff J., at p. 630). This requirement closes the "floodgates" to those who would invite the court to speculate about the parties' unexpressed intentions, or impose what in hindsight seems to be a sensible arrangement that the parties might have made but did not. The court's equitable jurisdiction is limited to putting into words that — and only that — which the parties had already orally agreed to.

Suivant le troisième obstacle, Sylvan (Bell) doit démontrer [TRADUCTION] « de façon précise » comment l'écrit peut être formulé pour exprimer l'intention antérieure (Hart, précité, le juge Duff, p. 630). Cette exigence prévient « l'avalanche de poursuites » de la part de ceux qui inviteraient les tribunaux à spéculer sur les intentions inexprimées des parties ou à imposer ce qui, a posteriori, semble être un arrangement judicieux, qu'auraient pu conclure les parties mais qu'elles n'ont par ailleurs pas choisi. La compétence des tribunaux en equity se limite à exprimer en mots ce sur quoi — et uniquement ce sur quoi — les parties s'étaient déjà entendues verbalement.

41 The fourth hurdle is that all of the foregoing must be established by proof which this Court has variously described as "beyond reasonable doubt" (Ship M. F. Whalen, supra, at p. 127), or "evidence which leaves no 'fair and reasonable doubt'" (Hart, supra, at p. 630), or "convincing proof" or "more than sufficient evidence" (Augdome Corp. v. Gray, [1975] 2 S.C.R. 354, at pp. 371-72). The modern approach, I think, is captured by the expression "convincing proof", i.e., proof that may fall well short of the criminal standard, but which goes beyond the sort of proof that only reluctantly and with hesitation scrapes over the low end of the civil "more probable than not" standard.

Le quatrième obstacle oblige à établir tous les éléments susmentionnés en apportant, conformément aux diverses façons dont notre Cour l'a décrite, une preuve [TRADUCTION] « au-delà de tout doute raisonnable » (Ship M. F. Whalen, précité, p. 127), une preuve [TRADUCTION] « qui ne laisse aucun "doute juste et raisonnable" » (Hart, précité, p. 630), une « preuve convaincante » ou une « preuve [. . .] plus que suffisante » (Augdome Corp. c. Gray, [1975] 2 R.C.S. 354, p. 371-372). Selon moi, l'approche moderne est bien décrite par l'expression « preuve convaincante », c.-à-d. une preuve qui peut être bien

Some critics argue that anything more demanding than the ordinary civil standard of proof is unnecessary (e.g., Waddams, supra, at para. 343), but, again, the objective is to promote the utility of written agreements by closing the "floodgate" against marginal cases that dilute what are rightly seen to be demanding preconditions to rectification.

It was formerly held that it was not sufficient if the evidence merely comes from the party seeking rectification. In Ship M. F. Whalen, supra, Duff J. (as he then was) said, at p. 127, "[s]uch parol evidence must be adequately supported by documentary evidence and by considerations arising from the conduct of the parties". Modern practice has moved away from insistence on documentary corroboration (Waddams, supra, at para. 337; Fridman, supra, at p. 879). In some situations, documentary corroboration is simply not available, but if the parol evidence is corroborated by the conduct of the parties or other proof, rectification may, in the discretion of the court, be available.

It is convenient at this point to deal with the trial judge's findings in relation to these traditional requirements. I will then turn to the appellants' proposed fifth precondition — due diligence on the part of the plaintiff.

(1) The Existence and Content of the Prior Oral Agreement

The appellants' principal argument against rectification is that the alleged prior oral agreement is void for uncertainty. Reliance is placed on I.C.R.V. Holdings Ltd. v. Tri-Par Holdings Ltd. (1994), 53 B.C.A.C. 72, where rectification of an agreement to purchase a recreational vehicle park was refused because, per Finch J.A. (now C.J.B.C.), at para. 7, the parties never agreed on "the precise location of inférieure à la norme applicable en matière criminelle, mais qui excède toutefois la preuve qui satisfait péniblement à la norme de la « prépondérance des probabilités » applicable en matière civile.

42 Certains critiques avancent qu'il est inutile de recourir à une norme de preuve plus exigeante que celle ordinairement applicable en droit civil (par exemple, Waddams, op. cit., par. 343), mais une fois de plus, l'objectif est de renforcer l'utilité des ententes écrites en prévenant une « avalanche » d'affaires limites qui affaibliraient des exigences perçues à juste titre comme de rigoureux préalables à la rectification.

44 Il convient maintenant d'examiner les constatations du juge de première instance au sujet de ces exigences traditionnelles. Je me pencherai ensuite sur le cinquième préalable proposé par les appelants, à savoir l'exercice de diligence raisonnable par l'auteur de la demande.

(1) L'existence et la teneur de l'entente verbale antérieure

45 L'argument principal des appelants à l'encontre de la rectification est que l'entente verbale antérieure est nulle pour cause d'incertitude. Ils invoquent l'arrêt I.C.R.V. Holdings Ltd. c. Tri-Par Holdings Ltd. (1994), 53 B.C.A.C. 72, dans lequel la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique a refusé d'accorder la rectification d'une convention d'achat d'un terrain de caravaning parce que, de

the eastern boundary", and Gordeyko v. Edmonton (1986), 45 Alta. L.R. (2d) 201 (Q.B.), where Stratton J. (as he then was) found the evidence uncertain about a notice period envisaged by the prior oral agreement. See also Kerr v. Cunard (1914), 16 D.L.R. 662 (N.B.S.C.). Appellants' counsel quotes Lord Denning's "pithy" observation that: "[a] mistake made by one party to the knowledge of the other is a ground for avoiding a contract, but not for making one" (Byrnlea Property Investments Ltd. v. Ramsay, [1969] 2 Q.B. 253 (C.A.), at p. 265).

46 I agree with the appellants that on this point the trial judge's reasons are somewhat unsatisfactory, but this appears to be because the "uncertainty" argument now made against rectification was not before him. The issue of uncertainty of subject matter was raised neither in the pleadings nor at trial. The trial judge directed his reasons to the points that he believed were in controversy. As to the appellants' new arguments, one may echo the words of James, V.C., in Rumble v. Heygate (1870), 18 W.R. 749 (Ch.), who said, at p. 750, that the objections to the agreement in that case on the basis of uncertainty of quantity of land and of its site "are mere shadows which vanish when examined by the light of common sense".

l'avis du juge Finch (maintenant Juge en chef de la Colombie-Britannique), les parties ne s'étaient jamais entendues sur [TRADUCTION] « l'emplacement précis de la limite est » (par. 7), et l'arrêt Gordeyko c. Edmonton (1986), 45 Alta. L.R. (2d) 201 (B.R.), où le juge Stratton (plus tard juge à la Cour d'appel) a conclu au caractère incertain de la preuve relative au délai de préavis envisagé par l'entente verbale antérieure. Voir également l'affaire Kerr c. Cunard (1914), 16 D.L.R. 662 (C.S.N.-B.). L'avocat des appelants a cité l'observation « lapidaire » suivante de lord Denning : [TRADUCTION] « [l]'erreur commise par une partie, au su de l'autre, est un motif justifiant de résoudre un contrat, non d'en conclure un » (Byrnlea Property Investments Ltd. c. Ramsay, [1969] 2 Q.B. 253 (C.A.), p. 265).

Je reconnais avec les appelants que, sur ce point, les motifs du juge de première instance sont quelque peu insatisfaisants, mais cela semble s'expliquer par le fait qu'on ne lui avait pas présenté l'argument fondé sur « l'incertitude » plaidé devant nous à l'encontre de la rectification. La question de l'incertitude concernant l'objet n'a été soulevée ni dans les actes de procédure, ni au procès. Dans ses motifs, le juge de première instance s'est attaché aux points qu'il estimait litigieux. Relativement aux nouveaux arguments des appelants, il convient de rappeler les propos du vice-chancelier James dans Rumble c. Heygate (1870), 18 W.R. 749 (Ch.), où ce dernier a dit, à la p. 750, à l'égard des objections formulées dans cette affaire à l'encontre de la validité de l'entente, sur le fondement de l'incertitude caractérisant l'emplacement et la superficie des terrains, elles [TRADUCTION] « ne sont rien d'autre que des ombres qui se dissipent sous la lumière du sens commun ».

La Cour doit tenter de maintenir la validité du marché conclu par les parties lorsqu'il est possible d'en dégager les conditions avec un degré de certitude raisonnable, c.-à-d. si on présente une preuve convaincante. En l'espèce, le juge de première instance a fondé sa décision accordant des dommages-intérêts compensatoires sur la conclusion que le terrain visé par l'option permettait la construction de 58 maisons unifamiliales situées le long des 480 verges du 18e trou. Personne ne conteste

Club score card. O'Connor's number for the width of the development (110) may also be accepted. The issue is whether the number was intended to express yards or feet. The trial judge appears to have concluded that the dispute about the depth of the residential development (which is all that divided the parties) came down to a simple choice between Bell's version (Plan A) and O'Connor's version (Plan B). Both plans were predicated on the length of the 18th fairway, namely 480 yards. Plan B, which O'Connor had described in the document, contemplated a single row of houses on a development plan 110 feet deep. Bell's Plan A was based on two rows of housing separated by a road allowance, in a configuration similar to that shown in the aerial photo of the Bayview development discussed by Bell and O'Connor at their December 16-17 meeting. Plan A called for a depth of about 110 yards. If Plan B's 110-foot depth is tripled to 110 yards, the acreage under option would be roughly tripled from about 3.6 acres (Plan B) to about 10.9 acres (Plan A), which accommodates the 58 lots plus the standard municipal road allowance. The problem in I.C.R.V. Holdings, supra, was that the parties never agreed on the boundary. Here the trial judge concluded that there was agreement even though the parties did not express themselves to each other in lawyerly language. This not infrequently happens: Bloom v. Averbach, [1927] S.C.R. 615, per Lamont J., at p. 621:

> It is suggested that had the letters been handed to a lawyer to prepare a formal contract therefrom, he would not have been able to determine what assets were to be included in the term "building, machinery and fixtures," or what were to be covered by "stock, etc." It may be that he would not, but that is not the test. The test is, did the parties themselves clearly understand what was comprised in each. In other words were their minds ad idem as to these expressions? [Emphasis added.]

la longueur de 480 verges. O'Connor lui-même a tiré le chiffre 480 de la distance indiquée sur la carte de pointage utilisée au terrain de golf de Sylvan Lake. Le chiffre mentionné par O'Connor quant à la largeur du complexe (110) peut aussi être accepté. Il s'agit de décider si ce chiffre exprimait une profondeur en verges ou en pieds. Le juge de première instance semble avoir conclu que le différend au sujet de la profondeur du complexe domiciliaire (unique objet de désaccord entre les parties) se résumait à un simple choix entre la version de Bell (le « plan A ») et celle d'O'Connor (le « plan B »). Les deux plans étaient basés sur la longueur du 18e trou, soit 480 verges. Le plan B, qu'O'Connor avait décrit dans le document, envisageait une seule rangée de maisons selon un plan d'aménagement de 110 pieds de profondeur. Le plan A de Bell envisageait deux rangées de maisons séparées par une emprise routière, selon un aménagement analogue à celui illustré par la photographie aérienne du complexe de Bayview dont Bell et O'Connor avaient discuté au cours de leur rencontre des 16 et 17 décembre. Suivant le plan A, la profondeur était d'environ 110 verges. Si la profondeur de 110 pieds du plan B était triplée, passant à 110 verges, le bien-fonds visé par l'option triplerait grosso modo de superficie, passant d'environ 3,6 acres (plan B) à environ 10,9 acres (plan A), et pourrait accueillir les 58 lots plus l'emprise routière municipale standard. Dans l'affaire I.C.R.V. Holdings, précitée, le problème était que les parties ne s'étaient jamais entendues sur les limites du bien-fonds. En l'espèce, le juge de première instance a conclu qu'il y avait eu accord, même si les parties ne s'étaient pas exprimées en jargon juridique. C'est une situation qui n'est pas rare : Bloom c. Averbach, [1927] R.C.S. 615, le juge Lamont, p. 621 :

48 The trial judge thus found that the parties had made a verbal agreement with reference to a residential development along the 18th hole. It was more than an agreement to agree. He concluded that there was a definite project in a definite location to which O'Connor and Bell had given their definite assent.

49 Although the parties did not discuss a metes and bounds description, they were working on a defined development proposal. O'Connor cannot complain if the numbers he inserted in clause 18 (110 x 480) are accepted and confirmed. The issue, then, is the error created by his apparently duplicitous substitution of feet for yards in one dimension. We know the 480 must be yards because it measures the 18th fairway. If the 110 is converted from feet to yards, symmetry is achieved, certainty is preserved and Bell's position is vindicated.

(2) Fraud or Conduct Equivalent to Fraud

50 The notion of "equivalent to fraud" as distinguished from fraud itself, is often utilized where "the court is unwilling to go so far as to find actual knowledge on the side of the party seeking enforcement" (Waddams, supra, at para. 342). The trial judge had no such hesitation in this case. He characterized O'Connor's actions as "fraudulent, dishonest and deceitful" (para. 114).

51 The trial judge was persuaded not only of the terms of the prior oral agreement and of Bell's mistake but "beyond any reasonable doubt" of O'Connor's knowledge of that mistake. He states (at para. 79):

> This court is satisfied beyond any reasonable doubt that O'Connor knew of Bell's mistake and he chose to permit Bell to sign it in the mistaken belief that it represented the verbal agreement. He did so with the full intention that he would in the future rely on the terms of the Agreement to thwart or reduce any plan by

Le juge de première instance a donc estimé que les parties s'étaient entendues verbalement à l'égard d'un complexe domiciliaire le long du 18e trou. Il ne s'agissait pas d'un simple avant-contrat. Il a conclu à l'existence d'un projet défini et devant être réalisé à un endroit déterminé dont O'Connor et Bell avaient convenu précisément.

Bien que les parties n'aient pas discuté de la description technique des lieux, elles travaillaient à un projet d'aménagement défini. O'Connor ne saurait se plaindre du fait que les chiffres qu'il a inscrits à la clause 18 (110 x 480) sont acceptés et confirmés. La question, par conséquent, est l'erreur créée par sa substitution apparemment frauduleuse, relativement à une des dimensions, d'une mesure en pieds à une mesure en verges. Nous savons que le chiffre 480 désigne des verges puisqu'il correspond à la distance du 18e trou. Si le chiffre 110 désigne non pas des pieds mais des verges, il y a alors symétrie des unités de mesure, la certitude est maintenue et la thèse de Bell est confirmée.

(2) Fraude ou conduite équivalant à fraude

La notion de conduite « équivalant à fraude », par opposition à la fraude en soi, est souvent utilisée lorsque [TRADUCTION] « le tribunal n'est pas convaincu que la partie qui demande l'exécution a réellement eu connaissance de l'erreur » (Waddams, op. cit., par. 342). Le juge de première instance n'a aucunement hésité à conclure de la sorte en l'espèce. Il a qualifié les actions d'O'Connor de [TRADUCTION] « frauduleuses, malhonnêtes et dolosives » (par. 114).

Non seulement le juge de première instance était-il convaincu des conditions de l'entente verbale antérieure ainsi que de l'erreur de Bell, mais il était également convaincu « hors de tout doute raisonnable » qu'O'Connor connaissait l'existence de cette erreur. Il a dit ceci, au par. 79 :

Bell to develop an increased area of the golf course for residential development.

O'Connor thus fraudulently misrepresented the written document as accurately reflecting the terms of the prior oral contract. He knew that Bell would not sign an agreement without the option for sufficient land to create the "Bayview" layout development with two rows of housing as specified in the prior oral contract. O'Connor therefore knew when Bell signed the document that he had not detected the substitution of 110 feet for 110 yards. O'Connor knowingly snapped at Bell's mistake "to thwart or reduce any plan by Bell to develop an increased area of the golf course for residential development". Bell's loss would be O'Connor's gain, as O'Connor (Performance) would come into sole ownership of the optioned land as of December 31, 1994.

Although on occasion the trial judge describes O'Connor's conduct as "equivalent to a fraud", and elsewhere he describes it as actual fraud, his reasons taken as a whole can only be characterized as a finding of actual fraud.

(3) Precise Terms of Rectification

It follows from the foregoing that "the precise form" in which the written document can be made to conform to the oral agreement would be simply to change the word "feet" in the phrase "one hundred ten (110) feet in width" to "yards".

(4) Existence of "Convincing Proof"

The trial judge made his key findings in respect of the prior oral agreement, Bell's unilateral mistake and O'Connor's knowledge of that mistake to a standard of "beyond any reasonable doubt".

ultérieurement les conditions de la Convention pour contrecarrer ou limiter tout projet de Bell d'affecter une partie plus grande du terrain de golf à la construction résidentielle.

52 O'Connor a donc fait une assertion inexacte et frauduleuse en laissant croire que l'écrit reflétait fidèlement les conditions prévues par l'entente verbale antérieure. Il savait que Bell ne signerait pas un accord ne comportant pas l'option d'acquérir suffisamment de terrain pour réaliser l'aménagement de type « Bayview » comptant deux rangées de maisons qui avait été précisé dans le contrat verbal antérieur. Par conséquent, O'Connor savait que, au moment où il a signé le document, Bell n'avait pas décelé la substitution de la mesure 110 pieds à la mesure 110 verges. O'Connor a sciemment profité de l'erreur de Bell pour [TRADUCTION] « contrecarrer ou limiter tout projet de Bell d'affecter une partie plus grande du terrain de golf à la construction résidentielle ». La perte de Bell se traduirait par un gain pour O'Connor, puisque ce dernier (Performance) allait devenir seul propriétaire du terrain visé par l'option le 31 décembre 1994.

53 Bien que, à certains endroits, le juge de première instance ait décrit la conduite d'O'Connor comme « équivalant à une fraude » alors qu'ailleurs il l'a qualifiée de véritable fraude, considérés globalement, ses motifs ne peuvent être caractérisés que comme une constatation de véritable fraude.

(3) Formulation précise de la rectification

54 Il ressort de ce qui précède que la [TRADUCTION] « façon précise » dont peut être formulé l'écrit pour qu'il soit conforme à l'entente verbale antérieure consiste simplement à remplacer le mot « pieds » par le mot « verges » dans la phrase [TRADUCTION] « cent dix (110) pieds de largeur ».

(4) Existence d'une « preuve convaincante »

55 C'est au regard de la norme de la preuve « hors de tout doute raisonnable » que le juge de première instance a tiré ses conclusions clés à l'égard de l'entente verbale antérieure, de l'erreur unilatérale de Bell et de la connaissance par O'Connor de cette erreur.

56 He also found that Bell's version of the verbal agreement was sufficiently corroborated on significant points by other witnesses (including his wife, his former partner, his lawyer and, subsequently, the development consultants), and documents (including his lawyer's notes and the plan of the Bayview Golf Course development discussed in mid-December 1989).

Il a aussi conclu que la version donnée par Bell de l'entente verbale était suffisamment corroborée sur des aspects importants par d'autres témoins (dont son épouse, son ancien associé, son avocat et, par la suite, les consultants en aménagement) ainsi que par des documents (notamment les notes de son avocat et le plan du complexe du terrain de golf Bayview discuté vers la mi-décembre 1989).

D. Bell's Lack of Due Diligence

D. Le défaut de diligence raisonnable de Bell

57 The appellants seek, in effect, to add a fifth hurdle (or condition precedent) to the availability of rectification. A plaintiff, they say, should be denied such a remedy unless the error in the written document could not have been discovered with due diligence.

Dans les faits, les appelants cherchent à subordonner la rectification à un cinquième obstacle (ou préalable). Selon eux, cette réparation doit être refusée, sauf dans les cas où l'erreur que comporte l'écrit n'aurait pu être décelée même si l'intéressé avait fait preuve de diligence raisonnable.

58 O'Connor says that Bell's failure to read clause 18 and note the mixture of yards and feet should be fatal to his claim because the Court ought not to assist businesspersons who are negligent in protecting their own interests. Alternatively, the effective cause of Bell's loss is not the fraudulent document but Bell's failure to detect the fraud when he had an opportunity to do so.

O'Connor prétend que le fait que Bell n'ait pas lu la clause 18 et constaté qu'on y utilisait une mesure en verges et une autre en pieds devrait être fatal à sa demande, parce que la Cour ne devrait pas venir en aide aux gens d'affaires qui se montrent négligents dans la protection de leurs intérêts. Par ailleurs, il affirme que la cause réelle de la perte de Bell n'est pas le document frauduleux, mais l'omission de ce dernier de déceler la fraude quand il en a eu l'occasion.

59 I agree that Bell, an experienced businessman, ought to have examined the text of clause 18 before signing the document. The terms of clause 18 were clear on their face (even though many readers might have misread a description of land that mixed units of measurement as clause 18 did here). He had time to review the document with his lawyer. He did so. Changes were requested. He did not catch the substitution of 110 feet for 110 yards; indeed, he says he did not read clause 18 at all.

Je reconnais que Bell, homme d'affaires expérimenté, aurait dû examiner le texte de la clause 18 avant de signer le document. Les termes de la clause 18 étaient clairs à première vue (encore que bien des gens auraient pu mal interpréter une description technique où sont utilisées diverses unités de mesure, comme c'est le cas à la clause 18 en l'espèce). Il a eu le temps d'examiner le document avec son avocat. Il l'a fait. Des modifications ont été demandées. Il n'a pas remarqué qu'on avait substitué 110 pieds à 110 verges; de fait, il dit ne pas avoir lu du tout la clause 18.

60 The trial judge, at para. 76, accepted the evidence of Bell's lawyer who admitted that he had not directed his mind to the limitations of the size of the development parcel found in clause 18, nor had he made any note of bringing those to

Au paragraphe 76 de ses motifs, le juge de première instance a accepté le témoignage de l'avocat de Bell, qui a admis ne pas s'être attardé aux limites prévues à la clause 18 relativement à l'étendue de la parcelle devant être aménagée, ni s'être mis une Bell's attention which would have been his normal practice.

He could offer no explanation for why he had not done so other than the fact that his focus on receipt of the Agreement signed by Bell was to ensure the completion and registration of documentation to facilitate the closing of [the purchase] on or before December 31, 1989. This court accepts the evidence offered by Mr. Hancock and that of Bell that they at no time discussed the description of property contained in clause 18.

It is undoubtedly true that courts ought to hold commercial entities to a reasonable level of due diligence in documenting their transactions. Otherwise, written agreements will lose their utility and commercial life will suffer. Rectification should not become a belated substitute for due diligence.

On the other hand, most cases of unilateral mistake involve a degree of carelessness on the part of the plaintiff. A diligent reading of the written document would generally have disclosed the error that the plaintiff, after the fact, seeks to have corrected. The mistaken party will often have failed to read the document entirely, or may have read it too hastily or without parsing each word. As the American Restatement of the Law, Second: Contracts (2d) (1981) points out in its commentary under s. 157 ("Effect of Fault of Party Seeking Relief"), "since a party can often avoid a mistake by the exercise of such care, the availability of relief would be severely circumscribed if he were to be barred by his negligence". Comment B discusses "[f]ailure to read writing". "Generally, one who assents to a writing is presumed to know its contents and cannot escape being bound by its terms merely by contending that he did not read them; his assent is deemed to cover unknown as well as known terms." But this proposition is qualified by that Comment's further statement that the "exceptional rule" in s. 157 (which permits rectification or "reformation" of the contract) applies only where there has been an agreement that preceded the writing. "In such a case, a party's negligence in failing to read the writing note lui rappelant de les porter à l'attention de M. Bell, comme il l'aurait fait normalement :

[TRADUCTION] Il n'a pu expliquer son omission de le faire autrement que par le fait que, après avoir reçu la Convention signée par Bell, il s'était concentré sur le parachèvement et l'enregistrement de la documentation pour faciliter la clôture de [l'acquisition] au plus tard le 31 décembre 1989. La cour accepte le témoignage de M. Hancock et celui de Bell portant qu'ils n'ont à aucun moment parlé de la description technique de la propriété figurant à la clause 18.

62 Par ailleurs, la plupart des affaires d'erreur unilatérale impliquent un certain manque de diligence de la part du demandeur. Une lecture attentive du texte du contrat aurait normalement permis de déceler l'erreur dont le demandeur sollicite, après coup, la correction. La partie invoquant l'erreur aura souvent omis de lire le document en entier ou bien elle l'aura lu trop rapidement ou sans en avoir bien pesé chaque mot. Comme on le souligne dans l'ouvrage américain Restatement of the Law, Second : Contracts (2d) (1981), au commentaire accompagnant l'art. 157 (« Effect of Fault of Party Seeking Relief »), [TRADUCTION] « étant donné qu'une partie peut souvent éviter une erreur en faisant preuve d'une telle diligence, l'ouverture du recours serait gravement restreinte si la négligence de la partie l'empêchait d'exercer ce recours ». Le commentaire B traite de l'[TRADUCTION] « [o]mission de lire un écrit ». [TRADUCTION] « En règle générale, quiconque donne son assentiment à un écrit est présumé en connaître la teneur et ne peut se soustraire aux obligations qui lui incombent aux termes de ce document simplement en prétendant ne pas les avoir lus; son assentiment est réputé couvrir autant les clauses inconnues que les clauses connues. » Cette proposition est toutefois assortie de la réserve suivante, précisant que la [TRADUCTION] « règle does not preclude reformation if the writing does not correctly express the prior agreement".

63 One reason why the defence of contributory negligence or want of due diligence is not persuasive in a rectification case is because the plaintiff seeks no more than enforcement of the prior oral agreement to which the defendant has already bound itself.

64 The commentary in the American Restatement is consistent with the Canadian case law. For example, in Beverly Motel (1972) Ltd. v. Klyne Properties Ltd. (1981), 126 D.L.R. (3d) 757 (B.C.S.C.), the vendor signed documents, already signed by the purchaser, in the office of the purchaser's solicitor that conveyed two lots, the single lot (with a motel) that the vendor had offered for sale and the adjacent residentially zoned vacant lot. Of that group of individuals, only the purchaser noted the error (on the day of signing) and he was "pleased and surprised" another lot had been included. He snapped at the offer but he had played no role in inducing the mistake. Gould J. conceded (at pp. 758-59), "[i]t is quite true that if they [the three shareholders of the vendor] had read the legal description in the documents with any care, they would have caught the error. Obviously they did not so read the legal description, and that is understandable, although careless, because they were with their own solicitor, present in the purchaser's solicitor's office, and both solicitors were obviously giving the impression that the final documents were in order and ready for signature". Gould J. ordered that the second lot be conveyed back to the original vendor because it was "unfair, unjust or unconscionable" (p. 760) for the purchaser "to hold the legal advantage he ha[d] gained" (p. 759). Gould J. acknowledged that the presence of a solicitor can help explain why a party might not himself read the written document. In the present case, Bell left the documentation up to the lawyers without appreciating that he had given his lawyer exceptionnelle » de l'art. 157 (laquelle permet la rectification ou la « réformation » du contrat) ne s'applique que lorsqu'une entente a précédé l'écrit. [TRADUCTION] « Dans un tel cas, la négligence dont a fait montre une partie en ne lisant pas l'écrit ne fait pas obstacle à la réformation de ce document s'il n'exprime pas adéquatement l'entente préalable ».

L'une des raisons pour lesquelles, dans les affaires de rectification, le moyen de défense fondé sur la négligence contributive ou le défaut de diligence raisonnable n'est pas convainquant est le fait que le demandeur ne réclame rien de plus que l'exécution de l'entente verbale antérieure par laquelle le défendeur était déjà lié.

Le commentaire formulé dans l'ouvrage américain Restatement est compatible avec la jurisprudence canadienne. Par exemple, dans Beverly Motel (1972) Ltd. c. Klyne Properties Ltd. (1981), 126 D.L.R. (3d) 757 (C.S.C.-B.), le vendeur a signé, dans le bureau de l'avocat de l'acquéreur, des documents que ce dernier avait déjà signés et qui transféraient la propriété de deux lots, le lot particulier (avec un motel) que le vendeur avait offert en vente et le lot adjacent, qui était vacant et zoné résidentiel. De toutes ces personnes, seul l'acquéreur a (le jour de la signature) remarqué l'erreur et il était [TRADUCTION] « heureux et étonné » de voir qu'un autre lot avait été inclus dans l'opération. L'acquéreur, qui n'a pas manqué de saisir l'occasion, n'avait toutefois joué aucun rôle dans la création de cette erreur. Le juge Gould a reconnu (aux p. 758-759) qu'[TRADUCTION] « [i]l était vrai que s'ils [les trois actionnaires du vendeur] avaient fait un peu attention en lisant la description officielle dans les documents, ils auraient décelé l'erreur. Ils ne l'ont manifestement pas lue avec attention et, quoique leur omission témoigne d'un manque de la diligence, elle est compréhensible puisqu'ils étaient accompagnés de leur propre avocat, qui était présent dans le bureau de l'avocat de l'acquéreur, et que les deux avocats donnaient clairement l'impression que les documents définitifs étaient en règle et prêts à être signés ». Le juge Gould a ordonné la restitution du deuxième lot au vendeur original, car il était [TRADUCTION] « injuste, inéquitable ou abusif » (p. 760) de permettre « à insufficient information to check O'Connor's figures. He had, at that time, no reason to question O'Connor's integrity.

If want of due diligence had been a good defence to rectification, relief would likely have been refused in Big Quill Resources Inc. v. Potash Corp. of Saskatchewan (2001), 203 Sask. R. 298, 2001 SKCA 31; Stepps Investments, supra, per Grange J., at p. 362; Prince Albert Credit Union v. Diehl, [1987] 4 W.W.R. 419 (Sask. Q.B.); Montreal Trust, supra, at p. 262; Windjammer Homes Inc. v. Generation Enterprises (1989), 43 B.L.R. 315 (B.C.S.C.).

E. Discretionary Relief

I conclude, therefore that due diligence on the part of the plaintiff is not a condition precedent to rectification. However, it should be added at once that rectification is an equitable remedy and its award is in the discretion of the court. The conduct of the plaintiff is relevant to the exercise of that discretion. In a case where the court concludes that it would be unjust to impose on a defendant a liability that ought more properly to be attributed to the plaintiff's negligence, rectification may be denied. That was not the case here.

F. Fraud

There is, on the facts of this case, a more fundamental reason why the appellants' complaint about Bell's lack of due diligence provides no defence. O'Connor did more than "snap" at a business partner's mistake. O'Connor undertook as part of the verbal agreement to have a document prepared that set out its terms. According to the l'acquéreur » de conserver l'avantage juridique qu'il venait de recevoir » (p. 759). Le juge Gould a reconnu que la présence d'un avocat pourrait permettre d'expliquer pourquoi une partie peut ne pas avoir lu elle-même le texte d'un document. En l'espèce, Bell a laissé aux avocats le soin de s'occuper des documents, sans s'apercevoir qu'il n'avait pas donné suffisamment d'information à son propre avocat pour lui permettre de vérifier les chiffres d'O'Connor. Il n'avait, à l'époque, aucune raison de mettre en doute l'intégrité d'O'Connor.

F. Fraude

trial judge, he not only breached that term, it became part of his fraudulent scheme to have the document wrongly state the terms of the option, to fraudulently misrepresent to Bell that it did accurately set out their verbal agreement, to allow Bell to sign it when O'Connor knew Bell was mistaken in doing so, then to delay any response to Bell's development proposals (and thus bring the error to Bell's attention) until it was almost too late for the development to proceed. O'Connor admitted providing his lawyer with the erroneous metes and bounds description in clause 18. It should not, I think, lie in his mouth to say that he should not be responsible for what followed because his fraud was so obvious that it ought to have been detected.

antérieure, O'Connor s'était engagé à faire préparer un document qui en énoncerait les modalités. Selon le juge de première instance, non seulement O'Connor a-t-il violé cet engagement, mais en outre, dans le cadre de son stratagème frauduleux, il a fait en sorte que le document énonce erronément les modalités de l'option, il a laissé croire à Bell, de manière inexacte et frauduleuse, que le document reflétait adéquatement leur entente verbale, il a laissé Bell le signer tout en sachant que ce dernier commettait une méprise en le signant, puis il a tardé à répondre aux propositions d'aménagement de celui-ci (et ainsi évité d'attirer l'attention de ce dernier sur l'erreur) jusqu'à ce qu'il soit devenu presque trop tard pour que le projet de construction puisse être réalisé. O'Connor a admis avoir donné à son avocat la description technique erronée qui figure à la clause 18. À mon avis, il ne devrait pas être autorisé à plaider qu'il ne doit pas être tenu responsable de ce qui est survenu par la suite parce que sa fraude était tellement évidente qu'elle aurait dû être décelée.

69 The appellants' concept of a due diligence defence in a fraud case was rejected over 125 years ago by Lord Chelmsford L.C. who said, "when once it is established that there has been any fraudulent misrepresentation or wilful concealment by which a person has been induced to enter into a contract, it is no answer to his claim to be relieved from it to tell him that he might have known the truth by proper inquiry. He has a right to retort upon his objector, 'You, at least, who have stated what is untrue, or have concealed the truth, for the purpose of drawing me into a contract, cannot accuse me of want of caution because I relied implicitly upon your fairness and honesty'": Central R. Co. of Venezuela v. Kisch (1867), L.R. 2 H.L. 99, at pp. 120-21.

Le type de moyen de défense fondé sur la diligence raisonnable que préconisent les appelants dans les affaires de fraude été rejeté dans les termes suivants, il y a plus de 125 ans, par le lord chancelier Chelmsford : [TRADUCTION] « dès qu'il est établi qu'il y a eu assertion inexacte et frauduleuse ou dissimulation intentionnelle ayant induit une personne à conclure un contrat, ne peut alors être opposé à la demande présentée par cette personne en vue d'être déliée du contrat l'argument que celle-ci aurait pu découvrir la vérité par un examen adéquat. Cette personne a le droit de répondre à son adversaire : "Vous, en particulier, qui avez déclaré des faussetés, ou avez caché la vérité, dans le but de m'inciter à conclure le contrat, ne pouvez m'accuser d'avoir manqué de prudence parce que je me suis fondé implicitement sur votre intégrité et votre honnêteté" » : Central R. Co. of Venezuela c. Kisch (1867), L.R. 2 H.L. 99, p. 120-121.

Lord Chelmsford's strictures were quoted and applied by Southin J. (as she then was) in United Services Funds (Trustees of) v. Richardson Greenshields of Canada Ltd. (1988), 22 B.C.L.R. (2d) 322 (S.C.), where she observed that "[c]arelessness on the part of the victim has never been a defence to an action for fraud" (p. 335).

Once the plaintiff knows of the fraud, he must mitigate his loss but, until he knows of it, in my view, no issue of reasonable care or anything resembling it arises at law.

And, in my opinion, a good thing, too. There may be greater dangers to civilized society than endemic dishonesty. But I can think of nothing which will contribute to dishonesty more than a rule of law which requires us all to be on perpetual guard against rogues lest we be faced with a defence of "Ha, ha, your own fault, I fool you". Such a defence should not be countenanced from a rogue. [p. 336]

A man who has told even an innocent untruth, by which he has induced another to alter his position, — much more one who has fraudulently lied with that object and result, — has debarred himself from ever complaining in a court of justice, any more than he could in a court of morals, that the representee acted on the faith of his misstatement in the manner in which he, the representor, intended that he should. He can never be heard to resent the fact that another believed the lie that was told for the very purpose of inspiring that belief, or plead as an excuse that, if the representee had not been such a fool as to trust such a knave, no harm would have been done.

The appellants having failed to establish that due diligence on the part of the plaintiff is a precondition to rectification, or to shake the trial judge's findings with respect to the traditional preconditions

Les restrictions énoncées par lord Chelmsford ont été citées et appliquées par madame le juge Southin (maintenant juge à la Cour d'appel) dans United Services Funds (Trustee of) c. Richardson Greenshields of Canada Ltd. (1988), 22 B.C.L.R. (2d) 322 (C.S.), où elle a fait remarquer que [TRADUCTION] « [l]a négligence de la victime ne constitue jamais un moyen de défense dans une action pour fraude » (p. 355).

Et, à mon avis, il s'agit aussi d'une bonne chose. Il est bien possible que la société civilisée soit menacée par des périls beaucoup plus grands que la malhonnêteté endémique. Mais je ne vois rien qui contribuerait davantage à la malhonnêteté qu'une règle de droit qui exigerait que nous soyons continuellement sur nos gardes contre les escrocs, au risque de nous faire répondre, en défense : « Ah! Ah! c'est de votre faute si je vous ai trompé ». Un tel moyen de défense ne devrait pas pouvoir être invoqué par un escroc. [p. 336]

Comme les appelants n'ont pas réussi à établir que la diligence raisonnable de la part de la demanderesse constitue un préalable à la rectification, ni à ébranler le bien-fondé des conclusions du juge de discussed above, their appeal on the rectification issues must be rejected.

G. Damages in Lieu of Rectification

72 The trial judge awarded $620,100 in compensatory damages representing the loss of profit on a fully built residential development on the 18th fairway. The appellants argue that damages should be limited to the difference between the market value of the land and the option price of $400,000. They say compensatory damages should not include the "reasonably expected profit" from a 58-lot housing development.

73 The finding of fact is, however, that the parties specifically contemplated (even on O'Connor's evidence) that the optioned land would be put to the use of residential housing. Damages for breach of the contract, as rectified, therefore must include losses flowing from the special circumstances known to the parties at the time they made their contract: Brown & Root Ltd. v. Chimo Shipping Ltd., [1967] S.C.R. 642, at p. 648; General Securities Ltd. v. Don Ingram Ltd., [1940] S.C.R. 670; Burrard Drydock Co. v. Canadian Union Line Ltd., [1954] S.C.R. 307; Corbin v. Thompson (1907), 39 S.C.R. 575; Asamera Oil Corp. v. Sea Oil & General Corp., [1979] 1 S.C.R. 633, at p. 655. In New Horizon Investments Ltd. v. Montroyal Estates Ltd. (1982), 26 R.P.R. 268 (B.C.S.C.), Nemetz C.J.B.C. observed, at pp. 272-73:

> [T]he plaintiff's damages should be assessed by reference to the profits which both parties contemplated the plaintiff would make but for the breach. It is not necessary that this contemplation include a precise pre-estimate or calculation of these losses, only a ". . . contemplation of circumstances which embrace the head or type of damage in question".

première instance à l'égard des préalables traditionnels examinés précédemment, leur pourvoi doit être rejeté relativement aux questions touchant à la rectification.

G. Dommages-intérêts accordés en lieu et place de la rectification

Le juge de première instance a accordé, au titre des dommages-intérêts compensatoires, une somme de 620 100 $ représentant la perte des profits qu'aurait permis de réaliser la construction complète d'un complexe domiciliaire au 18e trou. Les appelants prétendent que les dommages-intérêts devraient se limiter à la différence entre la valeur marchande du terrain et le prix de l'option, prix établi à 400 000 $. Ils font valoir que les dommages-intérêts compensatoires ne devraient pas comprendre [TRADUCTION] « le profit qu'on pouvait raisonnablement s'attendre à tirer » d'un ensemble résidentiel de 58 lots.

La conclusion de fait est toutefois que les parties ont expressément envisagé (même le témoignage d'O'Connor en fait foi) que les terrains visées par l'option seraient affectés à la construction domiciliaire. Les dommages-intérêts accordés pour la rupture du contrat rectifié doivent par conséquent inclure les pertes découlant des circonstances particulières connues des parties au moment où elles ont conclu le contrat : Brown & Root Ltd. c. Chimo Shipping Ltd., [1967] R.C.S. 642, p. 648; General Securities Ltd. c. Don Ingram Ltd., [1940] R.C.S. 670; Burrard Drydock Co. c. Canadian Union Ligne Ltd., [1954] R.C.S. 307; Corbin c. Thompson (1907), 39 R.C.S. 575; Asamera Oil Corp. c. Sea Oil & General Corp., [1979] 1 R.C.S. 633, p. 655. Dans New Horizon Investments Ltd. c. Montroyal Estates Ltd. (1982), 26 R.P.R. 268 (C.S.C.-B.), le juge en chef Nemetz a dit ceci, aux p. 272-273 :

The appellants then contend that even if the trial judge selected the correct measure of damages, he ought to have applied a higher discount for contingencies, particularly the contingencies that (1) Sylvan (Bell) lacked the financial resources to exercise the option and fund the project, and (2) the project could not in any event have been completed by the end of 1994, as required. In essence, they argue that in assessing damages, the court must discount the value of the chance of profit by the improbability of its occurrence, and call in aid the observation of Crocket J. in Kinkel v. Hyman, [1939] S.C.R. 364, at p. 383:

> For my part, I can find no authority . . . justifying any court in awarding any more than a nominal sum as damages for the loss of a mere chance of possible benefit except upon evidence proving that there was some reasonable probability of the plaintiff realizing therefrom an advantage of some real substantial monetary value.

It is at this point, I think, that the appellants' argument runs afoul of the rule against raising new fact-based issues on appeal. The trial judge has found as a fact that the respondent contracted for the opportunity to build a residential development on about 10.9 acres of prime land. It was wrongfully deprived of that opportunity. The trial judge set out to assess the value of that lost opportunity (which was, of course, potentially worth considerably less than a certainty). The appellants' trial counsel took little issue with the damages claim as advanced by Sylvan, and did not adduce much of an evidentiary record to the contrary, whether by calling his own witnesses, or through cross-examination of the respondent's witnesses, to challenge significantly the expert evidence of Trouth and others. Trouth may have been overly optimistic and his figures generous, but his evidence was uncontradicted.

75 C'est ici, selon moi, que l'argument des appelants va à l'encontre de la règle qui interdit de soulever, en appel, de nouvelles questions basées sur les faits. Le juge de première instance a tiré la conclusion de fait que l'intimée avait contracté en vue d'obtenir la possibilité de construire un complexe domiciliaire sur environ 10,9 acres de terrain de premier ordre. Elle a été injustement privée de cette possibilité. Le juge de première instance a entrepris de déterminer la valeur de cette possibilité perdue (qui, bien sûr, valait considérablement moins qu'une certitude). L'avocat ayant occupé pour les appelants en première instance ne s'est pas vraiment opposé à la demande de dommages-intérêts présentée par Sylvan, et il n'a pas présenté beaucoup d'éléments de preuve tendant à en réfuter le bien-fondé, soit en appelant ses propres témoins soit en contre-interrogeant ceux de l'intimée afin de contester vigoureusement le témoignage d'expert donné par M. Trouth et d'autres témoins. Il est bien possible que M. Trouth ait été excessivement optimiste et ses chiffres généreux, mais son témoignage n'a pas été contredit.

76 The Alberta Court of Appeal characterized the compensatory award as "substantial and generous" (para. 29) but concluded that: "Despite our reservations, we are not prepared to interfere with the award of damages in this case" (para. 27). In the absence of an error of principle, or a factual record that supports the appellants' criticisms, this Court ought not to interfere with the concurrent findings in the Alberta courts on the amount of compensatory damages.

H. Should the Award of Punitive Damages Be Restored?

77 The respondent in its cross-appeal seeks restoration of the $200,000 award of punitive damages disallowed by the Alberta Court of Appeal. Principles concerning the award and assessment of punitive damages were canvassed at the hearing of this appeal, heard the same day as Whiten, supra, reasons in which are released concurrently.

78 It is sufficient to apply the principles developed in Whiten without repeating the underlying analysis.

79 Punitive damages are awarded against a defendant in exceptional cases for "malicious, oppressive and high-handed" misconduct that "offends the court's sense of decency". The test thus limits the award to misconduct that represents a marked departure from ordinary standards of decent behaviour: Whiten, supra, at para. 36, and Hill v. Church of Scientology of Toronto, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 1130, at para. 196.

80 The misconduct found against O'Connor was his contemptuous disregard for Bell's rights under the verbal agreement of December 1989, together with his subsequent use of the written document (which he knew misstated their verbal agreement) leading up to and including court proceedings filed January 4, 1995, to obtain possession of the golf

La Cour d'appel de l'Alberta a qualifié de [TRADUCTION] « substantiels et généreux » (par. 29) les dommages-intérêts compensatoires accordés en l'espèce, mais elle a conclu ainsi, à cet égard : [TRADUCTION] « [m]algré nos réserves, nous ne sommes pas disposés à modifier les dommages-intérêts en l'espèce » (par. 27). En l'absence d'erreur de principe ou d'éléments factuels qui appuieraient les critiques formulées par les appelants, notre Cour ne devrait pas modifier les conclusions concordantes des tribunaux de l'Alberta sur le montant des dommages-intérêts compensatoires.

H. Y a-t-il lieu de rétablir la décision accordant les dommages-intérêts punitifs?

Dans son pourvoi incident, l'intimée demande le rétablissement de la décision lui accordant des dommages-intérêts punitifs de 200 000 $ qu'a annulée la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta. Les principes régissant l'opportunité d'accorder de tels dommages-intérêts et la détermination de leur quantum ont été débattus à l'audition du présent pourvoi, qui a été entendu le même jour que l'affaire Whiten, précitée, dont les motifs ont été déposés en même temps que les présents motifs.

Il suffit d'appliquer les principes élaborés dans l'arrêt Whiten. Il n'est pas nécessaire de refaire l'analyse qui les sous-tend.

Exceptionnellement, des dommages-intérêts punitifs sont accordés lorsqu'une conduite « malveillante, opprimante et abusive [. . .] choque le sens de la dignité de la cour ». Ce critère limite en conséquence de tels dommages-intérêts aux seules conduites répréhensibles représentant un écart marqué par rapport aux normes ordinaires en matière de comportement acceptable : Whiten, précité, par. 36, et Hill c. Église de scientologie de Toronto, [1995] 2 R.C.S. 1130, par. 196.

La conduite répréhensible reprochée à O'Connor fut l'indifférence éhontée qu'il a manifestée à l'égard des droits accordés à Bell par l'entente verbale de décembre 1989, et l'utilisation qu'il a faite ultérieurement de l'écrit (qui, savait-il, ne reflétait pas fidèlement leur entente verbale) jusqu'au dépôt de l'action en justice le 4 janvier 1995, en vue course property and thereby to destroy the value of Bell's option to develop the agreed-upon residential project.

de s'approprier le terrain de golf et ainsi réduire à néant la valeur de l'option accordant à Bell la faculté de construire le complexe domiciliaire convenu.

Torts such as deceit or fraud already incorporate a type of misconduct that to some extent "offends the court's sense of decency" and which "represents a marked departure from ordinary standards of decent behaviour", yet not all fraud cases lead to an award of punitive damages.

81 Les délits comme le dol ou la fraude intègrent déjà un type de conduite répréhensible qui, jusqu'à un certain point, « choque le sens de la dignité de la cour » et « représent[e] un écart marqué par rapport aux normes ordinaires en matière de comportement acceptable ». Pourtant les affaires de fraude ne donnent pas toutes lieu à une condamnation au paiement de dommages-intérêts punitifs.

O'Connor's fraud was a condition precedent to Bell's successful claim to rectification, for which his company will now receive compensatory damages of $620,100. Payment of $620,100 hurts. The question is whether more punishment is rationally required by way of retribution, deterrence or denunciation (Whiten, supra, at para. 43).

82 La fraude d'O'Connor était un préalable au succès de la demande en rectification de Bell, dont la société recevra maintenant la somme de 620 100 $ en dommages-intérêts compensatoires. Le fait de devoir payer 620 100 $ est une punition qui fait mal. Il reste à se demander si une punition additionnelle est rationnellement requise pour satisfaire aux objectifs de châtiment, de dissuasion ou de dénonciation (Whiten, précité, par. 43).

Whiten emphasizes that defendants should have "advance notice of the charge sufficient to allow them to consider the scope of their jeopardy as well as the opportunity to respond to it" (Whiten, supra, at para. 86). Here, punitive damages in the sum of $1,020,100 were expressly sought in the Amended Amended Statement of Claim and the basis for the claim was "disgorgement of the profits the Defendants will enjoy as a result of the [plaintiff's] unilateral mistake". The trial judge, as stated, awarded $200,000 in punitive damages.

The applicable standard of appellate review for "rationality" was articulated by Cory J. in Hill, supra, at para. 197:

84 Dans l'arrêt Hill, précité, par. 197, le juge Cory a décrit ainsi la norme de contrôle applicable pour l'appréciation de la « rationalité » :

> Unlike compensatory damages, punitive damages are not at large. Consequently, courts have a much greater scope and discretion on appeal. The appellate review should be based upon the court's estimation as to whether the punitive damages serve a rational purpose. In other words, was the misconduct of the defendant

> Contrairement aux dommages-intérêts compensatoires, les dommages-intérêts punitifs ne sont pas généralisés. En conséquence, les tribunaux disposent d'une latitude et d'une discrétion beaucoup plus grandes en appel. Le contrôle en appel devrait consister à déterminer si les dommages-intérêts punitifs servent un objectif so outrageous that punitive damages were rationally required to act as deterrence?

85 Whiten affirms that "[t]he 'rationality' test applies both to the question of whether an award of punitive damages should be made at all, as well as to the question of its quantum" (para. 101).

86 I agree with the Alberta Court of Appeal that the award of punitive damages in this case does not serve a rational purpose.

87 O'Connor's fraud was, of course, reprehensible. Indeed, fraud is generally reprehensible, but only in exceptional cases does it attract punitive damages. In this case, the trial judge, at para. 109, thought punishment above and beyond the payment of generous compensatory damages was required for two reasons, namely that O'Connor's actions (1) "demand an award which will stand as an example to others" and (2) "at the same time assure that O'Connor does not unduly profit from his conduct". These are both legitimate objectives for the award of punitive damages (Whiten, supra, at paras. 43 and 111). However, it must be kept in mind that an award of punitive damages is rational "if, but only if" compensatory damages do not adequately achieve the objectives of retribution, deterrence and denunciation.

88 This was a commercial relationship between two businessmen. One tried to pull a fast one on the other. There was no abuse of a dominant position. O'Connor's misconduct was planned and deliberate and he persisted in it over a period of four and a half years, but in the end the courts did their work and Bell obtained full compensation plus costs on a solicitor-client basis, all of which undoubtedly had a punitive effect on O'Connor. In addition, O'Connor is stigmatized with a judicial finding (now upheld by two appellate courts) that he acted in a way that rationnel. En d'autres termes, la mauvaise conduite du défendeur était-elle si outrageante qu'il était rationnellement nécessaire d'accorder des dommages-intérêts punitifs dans un but de dissuasion?

L'arrêt Whiten confirme que « [l]e critère de la "rationalité" s'applique tant pour statuer sur l'opportunité des dommages-intérêts punitifs que sur leur quantum » (par. 101).

Je souscris à la conclusion de la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta selon laquelle la décision d'accorder des dommages-intérêts punitifs en l'espèce ne sert aucun objectif rationnel.

La fraude commise par O'Connor était, bien sûr, répréhensible. D'ailleurs, la fraude est généralement une conduite répréhensible, mais ce n'est que dans des circonstances exceptionnelles qu'elle commande des dommages-intérêts punitifs. En l'espèce, le juge de première instance a estimé qu'une punition additionnelle s'imposait en sus du paiement de dommages-intérêts compensatoires généreux, et ce pour deux raisons, à savoir que les actions d'O'Connor (1) [TRADUCTION] « commandent une condamnation à une somme qui aura valeur d'exemple » et (2) « en même temps fera en sorte qu'O'Connor ne profite pas indûment de sa conduite » (par. 109). Il s'agit là de deux objectifs légitimes d'une condamnation au paiement de dommages-intérêts punitifs (Whiten, précité, par. 43 et 111). Il faut toutefois se rappeler qu'une décision accordant des dommages-intérêts punitifs n'est rationnelle que « si, mais seulement si » les dommages-intérêts compensatoires ne permettent pas de donner effet adéquatement aux objectifs de châtiment, de dissuasion et de dénonciation.

En l'espèce, il s'agissait de relations commerciales entre deux hommes d'affaires, dont l'un a tenté de rouler l'autre. Il n'y a pas eu abus de position dominante. La conduite d'O'Connor était préméditée et délibérée, et elle a persisté pendant une période de quatre ans et demi. En fin de compte, les tribunaux ont rempli leur rôle et Bell a été pleinement indemnisé, en plus de se voir adjuger les dépens sur la base procureur-client, décisions qui, globalement, ont sans aucun doute eu un effet punitif sur O'Connor. De plus, ce dernier est stigmatisé was "fraudulent, dishonest and deceitful". His conduct has been soundly denounced and he has been required personally to pay a large amount of money in compensation. The respondent is unable to identify any aggravating circumstances that would not be present in almost any case of business fraud except that O'Connor was found to have behaved abominably in the conduct of the litigation. However, as stated, the trial judge excluded this consideration from the award of punitive damages because he identified it as the basis for his award of solicitor-client costs.

d'une décision judiciaire (maintenant confirmée par deux tribunaux d'appel) ayant qualifié ses actions de [TRADUCTION] « frauduleuses, malhonnêtes et dolosives ». Sa conduite a été sévèrement dénoncée et il a été condamné personnellement à verser une indemnité considérable. L'intimée est incapable de mentionner quelque circonstance aggravante qu'on ne retrouve pas dans la plupart des affaires de fraude commerciale, outre le fait qu'il a été jugé qu'O'Connor s'était comporté de façon abominable pendant le déroulement de l'instance. Toutefois, comme il a été indiqué précédemment, le juge de première instance n'a pas tenu compte de cette considération dans sa décision accordant les dommages-intérêts punitifs, puisqu'elle avait servi de fondement à sa décision adjugeant les dépens sur la base procureur-client.

89 The trial judge's second reason for punitive damages was to ensure that O'Connor "[did] not unduly profit from his conduct" (para. 109). But in fact O'Connor did not profit at all from his misconduct. The source of his development profits was the prior oral contract. Whatever Performance (O'Connor) made after paying $620,100 compensatory damages to the respondent rightfully belonged to them under the terms of the (rectified) agreement. As discussed earlier, the verbal agreement of December 1989 contemplated that after five years, O'Connor's company, Performance, would acquire the golf club lands (minus the optioned lands if the option had been exercised) to develop as it wished for its own account. While on the whole O'Connor's conduct in this matter was found to be reprehensible, his behaviour also had some redeeming qualities. Early on in the project, for example, O'Connor picked up Bell's share of mortgage interest when Bell was not able to afford to contribute the amount that he had agreed to pay. The conflict between Bell and O'Connor should not be caricatured as a battle between good and evil.

89 La deuxième raison invoquée par le juge de première instance pour justifier les dommages-intérêts punitifs était de faire en sorte qu'O'Connor « ne profite pas indûment de sa conduite » (par. 109). Mais en fait, O'Connor n'a aucunement profité de sa conduite répréhensible. La source de ses profits liés au projet d'aménagement était le contrat verbal. Tout profit réalisé par les appelants Performance et O'Connor après paiement à l'intimée de la somme de 620 100 $ au titre des dommages-intérêts compensatoires leur revenait de plein droit en vertu des conditions de la Convention (rectifiée). Comme on l'a vu plus tôt, l'entente verbale de décembre 1989 prévoyait que, au terme d'une période de cinq ans, la société d'O'Connor, Performance, acquérerait les terrains formant le club de golf (moins ceux visés par l'option si celle-ci était levée), qu'elle pourrait alors aménager à son gré pour son propre compte. Bien que, dans l'ensemble, la conduite d'O'Connor en l'espèce ait été jugée répréhensible, son comportement ne fut pas entièrement dénué d'aspects positifs. Au tout début du projet, par exemple, O'Connor a assumé la quote-part de Bell aux intérêts du prêt hypothécaire quand ce dernier a cessé d'être en mesure de contribuer la somme qu'il s'était engagé à payer. Le conflit opposant Bell et O'Connor ne devrait pas être dépeint caricaturalement comme une bataille entre le bien et le mal.

90 It may be true, as the trial judge found, that O'Connor's profits on the balance of lands not subject to the option will "recover all or more of the amount of damage for loss of profit awarded against him in favour of Bell" (para. 109), but, with respect, that is not a rational reason to punish O'Connor further. Those profits are not the fruit of misconduct directed at Bell.

91 Finally, the assessment of $200,000 coincides with the payment that Sylvan (Bell) was obliged to pay in order to exercise the option, and which the trial judge properly took into account in his assessment of compensatory damages. This figure has no rational relationship to the appellants' potential development profits on the balance of the golf course land, on which there was no evidence. Moreover, it is a payment that the appellants, under the rectified agreement, were entitled to keep.

92 As pointed out in Whiten, supra, at paras. 98 and 100, and Hill, supra, at para. 197, punitive damages are not "at large", and both the award and the assessment of quantum must meet the test of rationality. In this case, with respect, neither the punitive damages award nor the $200,000 assessment survives that test.

IV. Conclusion

93 I would therefore dismiss the appeal and cross-appeal both with costs on a party-and-party basis.

The following are the reasons delivered by

94 LeBel J. — Subject to my comments on punitive damages in Whiten v. Pilot Insurance Co., [2002] 1 S.C.R. 595, 2002 SCC 18, I agree with Binnie J.'s reasons. I would dispose of the appeal and cross-appeal as he suggests. Rectification of the contract was properly ordered, but punitive non visés par l'option lui permettent [TRADUCTION] « de recouvrer la totalité des dommages-intérêts qu'il a été condamné à payer à Bell au titre du manque à gagner, ou une somme plus grande encore » (par. 109) mais, en toute déférence, cela ne constitue pas une justification rationnelle pour punir O'Connor davantage. Ces profits ne sont pas le fruit d'une conduite répréhensible visant Bell.

Enfin, la somme de 200 000 $ coïncide avec celle que Sylvan (Bell) était tenue de verser pour lever l'option et dont le juge de première instance a à juste titre tenu compte dans la détermination des dommages-intérêts compensatoires. Ce chiffre n'a aucun lien rationnel avec les profits susceptibles d'être tirés par les appelants de la réalisation d'activités d'aménagement sur le reste des terrains du parcours de golf, profits au sujet desquels aucune preuve n'a été produite. De plus, il s'agissait d'un paiement que les appelants avaient le droit de conserver en vertu de la Convention rectifiée.

Comme il a été mentionné dans l'arrêt Whiten, précité, par. 98 et 100, ainsi que dans l'arrêt Hill, précité, par. 197, les dommages-intérêts punitifs ne sont pas des dommages-intérêts « généraux », et l'opportunité d'accorder de tels dommages-intérêts ainsi que la détermination de leur quantum doivent satisfaire au critère de la rationalité. En toute déférence, en l'espèce ni la décision accordant des dommages-intérêts punitifs ni la somme de 200 000 $ ne satisfont à ce critère.

IV. Conclusion

Par conséquent, je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi principal et le pourvoi incident, avec dépens sur la base partie-partie dans les deux cas.

Heard: March 20, 2023

On appeal from the judgment of Justice Kendra D. Coats of the Superior Court of Justice dated January 24, 2022, with reasons reported at 2022 ONSC 486.

Zarnett J.A.:

Overview

[1] When a vendor breaches an agreement to sell real estate, the normal measure of the innocent purchaser's damages is the difference between the purchase price and the market value of the property on the date the sale was to be completed. Among other issues, this appeal raises the question of whether a departure from the normal measure of damages is appropriate because the subject of the sale was land the purchaser intended to develop.

[2] The respondent ("Rosseau Group") was the purchaser, and the appellant ("252") was the vendor, under an agreement for the sale of development lands (the "APS"). The purchase price was $350,000 per acre based on the number of developable acres within the property, and was ultimately set, subject to final adjustment at about $6.6 million.

[3] The purchase did not close. Rosseau Group brought an action alleging that 252 breached the agreement. Rosseau Group did not, however, seek the normal measure of damages for that breach, and led no expert appraisal evidence that the property was worth more on the closing date than the contractual purchase price. Instead, it sought the profits it claimed it would have earned had it acquired the property and developed it into serviced residential lots over a period of about six years after closing.

[4] The trial judge found that 252 had breached the APS. She held that this was an appropriate case to depart from the normal measure of damages and awarded Rosseau Group over $11 million as a "reasonable estimate" of its "lost expected profit".

[5] 252 appeals. It argues that the trial judge erred in finding that 252 breached the APS. And it argues that the trial judge erred by awarding an “exceptional measure of damages”.

[6] For the reasons that follow, I would allow the appeal in part. I reject the argument that the trial judge erred in concluding that 252 breached the APS. But in my view, the trial judge did err in departing from the normal measure of damages. A new hearing to assess the damages on the proper measure is required.

Factual Background

[7] On January 20, 2017, the parties entered into the APS. Under it, Rosseau Group was to purchase property of about 45.71 acres in Caledon, Ontario from 252. At the time of the APS, the property was undeveloped and consisted of a residential house, wetlands, and vacant farmland. It was zoned for agricultural and conservation uses.

[8] The APS initially contemplated a purchase price of $10.5 million, but provided that the ultimate purchase price was tied to the number of “developable acres”. It stated that the $10.5 million purchase price was “based on…approximately 30 ac[res] be[i]n[g] [d]evelopable and designated for [r]esidential development, allowing [t]ownhouses, [s]emis and [s]ingle homes”. The purchase price was to be adjusted in the event the “number of developable ac[r]es is changed…based on a price of $350,000.00 per developable acre”.

[9] The APS provided for an initial deposit of $50,000. It was conditional, for a period of 90 days, during which Rosseau Group was to satisfy itself on a number of issues, including the economic feasibility of the development of the site. If the conditions were not waived during the due diligence period, the APS would be null and void and the deposit of $50,000 would be returned in full. On waiver of the conditions, a further deposit of $400,000 was to be paid by Rosseau Group. The closing was to be 60 days after the removal of all conditions set out in Schedule A of the APS.

[10] After signing the APS, 252 was advised by its consultants that the net developable area was 18.9 acres, over 10 acres less than initially thought. 252 relayed this information to Rosseau Group, which prompted discussions between both parties including about changes to the payment terms. One of the changes discussed was 252’s request that Rosseau Group assume the first mortgage on the property in favour of Bank of Montreal (the “BMO Mortgage”). The trial judge found that a representative of Rosseau Group told a representative of 252 that Rosseau Group would agree to that request if the requirement for the $400,000 further deposit was deleted.

[11] The APS was amended by a document in writing dated March 10, 2017 that addressed the reduced number of developable acres and changes in the payment terms. The amending provisions, which were "inserted" into the APS, stipulated that (i) the purchase price was reduced to $6,615,000 to reflect the reduced net developable acres[1] and (ii) Rosseau Group agreed to assume "subject to approval" the BMO Mortgage in the amount of $1,660,000, give a mortgage back to 252 (a "VTB" mortgage) in the amount of $3,115,000, and pay a balance on closing of $1,790,000. The amending provisions noted that these three amounts, plus the $50,000 initial deposit, totalled the purchase price of $6,615,000[2]. The document amending the APS did not expressly refer to the $400,000 further deposit, and although it deleted certain paragraphs of the original APS, it did not expressly delete the schedule to the original APS that had provided for the $400,000 further deposit.

[12] On June 7, 2017, Rosseau Group waived all conditions, but did not provide a $400,000 further deposit. On June 13, 2017, 252 communicated to Rosseau Group that it was treating the failure to provide a further deposit as a repudiation of the APS. 252 later sent a certified cheque purporting to return the $50,000 initial deposit.

[1] 18.9 developable acres x $350,000. The price remained subject to change upon the final determination of "natural net Developable Acres…when final studies are completed and confirmed by … the Toronto and Region Conservation Authority …and [the] Town of Caledon…the final price shall be adjusted accordingly based on more or less at $350,000 … per Natural net developable acre".

[13] Rosseau Group took the position that the APS was not at an end. In August 2017, Rosseau Group's lawyer indicated that it was "ready, willing and able to complete the purchase." It set closing dates of September 4, and then September 19, 2017.

[14] No closing took place. Neither side tendered, 252 taking the position that it had no obligation to close as the APS was at an end, and Rosseau Group taking the position that it was relieved of any obligation to tender because 252 had clearly indicated it would not close the APS.

[15] The trial judge found that when 252 took the position that the APS was at an end, its principal knew the value of the property had increased from January 2017 when the original APS was agreed to. She referred to the fact that 252 received an offer for the property of $11 million in April 2017. It also received a Letter of Intent at $640,000 per developable acre in September 2017, and an offer for the property that same month of $14 million.

[16] Rosseau Group commenced an action in August 2017 claiming specific performance and, in the alternative, damages. It obtained a Certificate of Pending Litigation ("CPL") and registered it against the property.

[17] 252 moved successfully to vacate the CPL. In his decision vacating the CPL dated December 14, 2017, Trimble J. found that the property was not unique as Rosseau Group intended to resell, not develop, and that Rosseau Group was not ready, willing, and able to close as it had taken no steps to assume the BMO Mortgage.

[18] Rosseau Group subsequently abandoned the claim for specific performance.

The Trial Judge's Decision

[19] The trial judge found that 252 breached the APS by refusing to complete the transaction because the $400,000 further deposit had not been paid. She found that there was no provision for the $400,000 further deposit in the amended APS, which was consistent with the negotiation that led up to the amendments to the APS, as Rosseau Group had indicated it would agree to assume the BMO Mortgage if the requirement to post a further $400,000 deposit was dispensed with.

[20] The trial judge also found that Rosseau Group was ready, willing, and able to carry out the APS. Despite the reduction in developable acreage, Rosseau Group wanted to close the transaction – it conducted due diligence, was prepared to assume the BMO Mortgage and had, or could acquire, the required funds to pay the balance due on closing. She considered that 252's conduct relieved Rosseau Group of any obligation to tender.

[21] The trial judge rejected 252's argument that Rosseau Group was estopped from asserting the "uniqueness" of the property and that it was ready, willing, and able to close because those points were determined against Rosseau Group on the motion to vacate the CPL. She held that Trimble J.'s determinations were not binding at trial.

[22] Turning to the question of damages, the trial judge considered this a proper case to depart from the normal measure of damages, namely the difference between the market value of the property on the date of closing and the contractual purchase price. She found that Rosseau Group was entitled to damages based on the estimated profit it would have earned had the transaction closed. She noted that it had acquired the property with the intention of earning a profit by developing it; these were special circumstances known to the parties at the time the APS was made.

[23] The trial judge accepted the expert evidence of Martin Quarcoopome. Although not an appraiser or business valuator, he was a development consultant with experience in helping landowners determine the financial cost and profit of real estate development. She rejected an objection that he was not impartial, and found him qualified to give opinion evidence in the areas of planning approvals; land use planning, development, and their costs; as well as estimated profits of proposed developments.

[24] Mr. Quarcoopome estimated the profits that Rosseau Group would have earned, if it had developed the property over a six-year period following the closing date, including rezoning the property to permit residential uses and creating 49 serviced lots, to be between $10,141,345.27 and $12,103,345.27. No expert evidence on damages was called by 252.

[25] The trial judge selected the midpoint of Mr. Quarcoopome's range as a reasonable estimate of the lost expected profit. She rejected the argument that Rosseau Group failed to mitigate its losses by purchasing and developing another property, finding that 252 had not satisfied her that it had been possible for Rosseau Group to purchase a similar property.

[26] The trial judge gave judgment in favour of Rosseau Group for $11,122,345.27 and dismissed 252's counterclaim which was premised on Rosseau Group having had, and breached, an obligation to post a further $400,000 deposit.

Analysis

(a) The Liability Appeal

[27] 252 makes three arguments in relation to its appeal from the trial judge's finding that it breached the APS rendering it liable for damages. First, it submits that the trial judge erred in finding that the amendments to the APS removed the requirement that Rosseau Group post a further $400,000 deposit. Second, it argues that the trial judge erred in finding that Rosseau Group was not required to tender. Third, it argues that the trial judge erred in finding that Rosseau Group was ready, willing, and able to tender and in any event erred by not considering herself bound by the finding on the motion to vacate the CPL that Rosseau Group was not ready, willing, and able to close the transaction on the closing date.

[28] I reject these grounds of appeal. I agree with trial judge's liability finding.

(i) The Further Deposit Issue

[29] Whether the amended APS did away with the requirement for a $400,000 further deposit is an issue of contractual interpretation. Absent an extricable legal error, the trial judge's interpretation is entitled to deference on appeal: Sattva Capital Corp. v. Creston Moly Corp., 2014 SCC 53, [2014] 2 S.C.R. 633, at paras. 50, 52. In my view, the trial judge did not make an extricable legal error.

[30] 252 contends the trial judge misunderstood the legal nature of a deposit as something that is credited against the purchase price. According to 252, this led her to the erroneous conclusion that "there was a practical difficulty with the $400,000 deposit and the amended APS co-existing". It submits the trial judge mistakenly thought that because the amended APS said that the initial $50,000 deposit was to be credited against the balance due on closing, but made no such provision relating to a further deposit, payment of a further deposit would increase the total that Rosseau Group had to pay, which could not have been the parties' intention.

[31] In my view, the trial judge did not make this error. She was not construing the legal effect of a deposit in a situation where the parties had not specified what that effect would be. She was deciding what effect should be given to the language the parties used in the amendment to the APS. In the amendment, the parties set out the precise components of the purchase price − the assumption of the BMO Mortgage, the VTB mortgage, the initial deposit and the balance to be paid on closing. These four amounts were expressly described in the amendment as totalling the full purchase price. The initial deposit was referred to in the amendment as being credited against the balance payable on closing, and future changes to net developable acres were to be adjusted from the VTB mortgage. It was thus significant that the amendment did not refer to the further deposit as a component of the purchase price at all, let alone state how, or against what component of the purchase price, the further deposit was to be credited.

[32] Although the amendment did not expressly say that the Schedule to the original APS that provided for the further deposit was deleted, the trial judge was required to construe the APS as a whole, post-amendment, including reconciling apparently inconsistent terms. In doing so she was entitled to consider whether the express language of the amendment should be given priority over a Schedule to the original APS that was inconsistent with it. The trial judge was entitled to conclude that the parties' express treatment, in the amendment, about the components of the purchase price including the initial deposit, without any reference to the further deposit, was tantamount to deleting any continuing requirement for the further deposit. In other words, she was entitled to conclude that the parties deleted the requirement for the further deposit by the language of the amendment.

[33] 252 also submits that the trial judge's interpretation is tainted by her reference to Rosseau Group's communicated position that it would agree to assume the BMO Mortgage if the further deposit requirement were dropped, and by her failure to advert to the entire agreement clause in the APS.

[35] The genesis of the amendment, in the sense of the identification of points the parties were expecting it to address, was relevant objective evidence of "background facts at the time of the execution of the contract". The trial judge used those facts properlyto deepen her understanding of the language of the amended APS, not to overwhelm that language. She reached an interpretation that was grounded in the text: Sattva, at paras. 57-8.

(2008) Limited Partnership v. Ontario Lottery and Gaming Corporation, 2021 ONCA 592, at para. 62.

(ii) No Requirement to Tender

[37] 252 argues that although it indicated on June 13, 2017 that it was taking the position the APS was at an end, Rosseau Group did not accept the repudiation, and demanded a closing date of September 19, 2017. It submits that Rosseau Group was therefore required not only to be ready, willing, and able to close on that date, but to demonstrate that by tendering the closing funds and other required documents. 252 argues that the trial judge should have treated the failure to tender as fatal to Rosseau Group's claim.

[38] I disagree.

[39] Because Rosseau Group did not accept 252's anticipatory repudiation of the APS, but instead rejected it, it kept the APS alive, and both parties remained bound to perform their obligations on the closing date. In order to rely on 252's failure to close on September 19, 2017, Rosseau Group had to be ready, willing, and able to close on that date: Domicile Developments Inc. v. MacTavish (1999), 45 O.R. (3d) 302, 175 D.L.R. (4th) 334 (C.A.), at paras. 14-15. But that obligation was satisfied if Rosseau Group was (as the trial judge found) actually ready, willing, and able to close. For 252's argument to be correct, Rosseau Group's obligation had to extend to include a requirement to tender on a party who had unequivocally indicated that the tender would be useless because it would not close.

[40] I see no error in the trial judge's conclusion that a tender was not required. Although tendering is one way of showing that a party is ready, willing, and able to close, it is not the only way. "While tender is the best evidence that a party is ready, willing and able to close, tender is not required from an innocent party enforcing his or her contractual rights when the other party has clearly repudiated the agreement or has made it clear that they have no intention of closing the deal" (emphasis added): Di Millo v. 2099232 Ontario Inc., 2018 ONCA 1051, 430 D.L.R. (4th) 296, at para. 45, leave to appeal refused, [2019] S.C.C.A. No. 55 The rationale for this is clear: "the law does not require what would be a meaningless or futile gesture": Time Development Group Inc. (In trust) v. Bitton, 2018 ONSC 4384, at paras. 56-7.

[42] In 1179 Hunt Club, the vendor rejected the purchaser's anticipatory repudiation of the agreement, insisted that the transaction close on a specific date, and indicated that there would be immediate pursuit of legal remedies if the purchaser did not perform. The application judge found, and this court agreed, that the vendor was not in fact ready, willing, and able to close on the date it insisted upon, because it was unable to transfer title to the purchaser: at paras. 2, 17, 20, 21, 22 and 27. It was in that context − a party who was in fact not ready to perform insisting on strict performance from the other party − that Lauwers J.A. referred to the failure to tender as being "fatal" to the vendor's position that it could "render perfection in its own performance": at para. 23. Later in his reasons, Lauwers J.A. brought those two key aspects together when he explained: "[h]aving set the date, here the vendor did not trouble itself to tender, and in fact could not have tendered because on that day it was incapable of transferring title" (emphasis added): at para. 27.

[43] Accordingly, 1179 Hunt Club does not assist 252, because it does not stand for the proposition that a failure to tender by a party who is ready, willing and able to close precludes their claim.

(iii) The Trial Judge Did Not Err in Finding Rosseau Group Was Ready, Willing, and Able to Close

[44] 252 goes on to argue that the trial judge erred in finding that Rosseau Group was in fact ready, willing, and able to close. It argues that although the trial judge found that Rosseau Group had sufficient funds available from related entities to close the transaction, this was insufficient as it had not taken possession of those funds itself. It also argues that although the trial judge found Rosseau Group could assume the BMO Mortgage, this too was insufficient because it took no steps to do so. And it argues that the trial judge should have considered herself bound by the findings about readiness to close made on the CPL motion.

[46] On the question of funds for closing, the trial judge's finding that the funds required to close were available to Rosseau Group was sufficient. With that availability, it was ready, willing, and able to close. The added step of symbolically depositing the funds in its own account for a transaction that 252 would not complete would have been "a meaningless or futile gesture" of the type the law does not insist upon.

[47] The obligation of Rosseau Group to assume the BMO Mortgage was an obligation in favour of 252. To perform it, if the transaction were completed, Rosseau Group would have had to make the mortgage payments that 252 had committed to − it would be in breach of that obligation and would have to indemnify 252 if it did not[3].

[3] The mortgagee would have had a direct right of action against Rosseau Group for payment under these circumstances: Mortgages Act, R.S.O. 1990. c. M. 40, s. 20.

[48] The trial judge found Rosseau Group could have assumed the BMO Mortgage, in other words, that it could have performed the BMO Mortgage obligations it agreed to assume. That finding was sufficient. It was not germane whether the parties had contacted the mortgagee about the assumption—whatever rights would accrue to the mortgagee on the sale were rights under the BMO Mortgage that Rosseau Group would have had to ensure (and on the trial judge's finding could have ensured) were honoured.

[49] Nor did the reasons given on the motion to vacate the CPL, that Rosseau Group was not ready, willing, and able to close because it took no steps to assume the BMO Mortgage, preclude the trial judge from reaching a different conclusion on this point.

[50] 252 relies on the principle accepted in Earley-Kendall v. Sirard, 2007 ONCA 468, 225 O.A.C. 246, at para. 43, that a decision on an interlocutory motion is binding on the parties with respect to other proceedings in the same action. In Earley-Kendall, a defence motion seeking to adjourn the trial to allow for a medical examination of the plaintiff was dismissed. This was held to preclude a second defence motion compelling the plaintiff to attend a defence medical examination. The two defence motions were found to have been for substantially the same relief; the decision on the first motion therefore barred the second motion under the doctrine of issue estoppel: at paras. 44, 45, and 47.

[51] 252 argues that this principle has been applied to preclude a party, on a motion for summary judgment, from arguing a point decided against them on a CPL motion, and that the same approach should follow at trial. It points to Lamba v. Mitchell, 2021 ONSC 1612, where one of the issues on a summary judgment motion was whether there had been a material misrepresentation in pre-contractual information about the house that was to be purchased. The summary judgment motion judge noted, as one of the reasons for rejecting the claim of material misrepresentation, that there was a finding about this issue on an earlier motion for leave to issue a CPL: at paras. 31-35. He used this as an alternative ground for rejecting the argument of material misrepresentation, having also found on the record before him that there was no material misrepresentation: at para. 30.

[52] I do not accept the argument of 252 that the trial judge was, in this case, bound by the reasons given when the CPL was vacated. To the extent that the decision in Lamba suggests otherwise, it is inconsistent with the jurisprudence of this court and should not be followed.

[53] The principle in Earley-Kendall applies to prevent a party from relitigating a decision. When the question is whether a trial judge is bound by something that occurred on an interlocutory motion, the distinction between what was decided and the reasons why that decision was made is important.

[54] A CPL confers no rights − it gives notice that there is a claim in the action to an interest in land. The decision as to whether a CPL should be granted or vacated is only a decision about whether notice of the claim should be registered or removed from title. The claim itself is only determined by the final decision in the action: G.P.I. Greenfield Pioneer Inc. v. Moore, [2002] 58 O.R. (3d) 87 (C.A.), at para. 26. A decision about the CPL does not determine the validity of the claim one way or the other. Litigating the claim, and issues in the claim, at trial is not relitigating anything decided in a motion about the CPL.

[55] This court has held that an order granting or lifting a CPL is, for appeal purposes, an interlocutory, not a final, order. This is precisely because it "does not finally determine the litigation" or "any issue in the litigation, which remains ongoing": 1476335 Ontario Inc. v. Frezza, 2021 ONCA 822, at para. 9.

[56] As the decision about the CPL in this case did not finally determine any issue in the litigation, comments in the reasons given on the CPL motion have no effect on those issues. In Frezza, this court held that the reasons of a motion judge for denying a CPL (for example, reasons about whether the claim was statute barred) are not binding on the trial judge, because they do not constitute the final determination of any issue relating to the validity of the claim for the purpose of granting or denying judgment on the claim: at paras. 10, 14.

[57] Accordingly, the trial judge was correct not to consider herself bound by the reasons given on the motion to vacate the CPL. Adopting the language in Frezza, the "full record for finally determining the issue [of whether Rosseau Group was ready, willing, and able to close] may or may not have been placed before the motion judge, but only enough to allow the motion judge to make or deny the discretionary order that was sought. In any event, the court [on the CPL motion] was not asked to make a final determination of [that] issue": at para. 14.

(iv) Conclusion on the Liability Appeal

[58] I would therefore uphold the trial judge's determination that 252 breached the amended APS, and therefore her finding that it was liable for damages, and her dismissal of the counterclaim.

(b) The Damages Appeal

[59] A trial judge's assessment of damages attracts considerable deference on appeal. However, an assessment made on the basis of an error of principle or law may be interfered with on appeal: SFC Litigation Trust v. Chan, 2019 ONCA 525, 147 O.R. (3d) 145, at para. 112, leave to appeal refused [2019] S.C.C.A. No. 314.

[60] 252 submits that the trial judge erred in departing from the normal measure of damages, awarded damages that violated the remoteness principle, did not use the proper date for assessment of damages, and made an award that failed to address contingencies.

[61] I do not agree with 252 that an award that takes into account the loss to Rosseau Group flowing from it being deprived of the opportunity to acquire developable property violates the remoteness principle. However, the question of remoteness − whether the type of loss is recoverable − is separate from the question of how to measure the loss. In my view, the trial judge erred in departing from the normal measure of damages in the absence of anything that suggested that that measure would not address Rosseau Group's recoverable loss. That conclusion is supported by the issues about the assessment date and contingencies that 252 raises in connection with the trial judge's approach.

(i) The Normal Measure of Damages

[62] The normal measure of damages for a failed real estate purchase is the difference between the contract price and the market value of the land on the "assessment date". The assessment date is usually the date on which the purchase was scheduled to close. Although the court may set a later date if the party seeking damages satisfies certain criteria, the presumption is that damages are to be assessed as of the date of the breach. That presumption is not easily displaced; any deviation from it must be based on legal principle: 100 Main Street Ltd. v. W.B. Sullivan Construction Ltd. (1978), 20 O.R. (2d) 401, 88 D.L.R. (3d) 1 (C.A.), at para. 55, leave to appeal refused (1978) 20 O.R. (2d) 401 (S.C.C.); 642947 Ontario Ltd. v. Fleischer (2001), 56 O.R. (3d) 417, 209 D.L.R. (4th) (C.A.), at paras. 41-43; Rougemount Capital Inc. v. Computer Associates International

[63] There are several reasons why the normal measure is the presumptive, measure of the innocent party's damages and is not to be easily displaced.

[64] First, when a purchase contract is performed, the purchaser pays the purchase price on closing and obtains, on the same date, ownership of an asset. Damages are awarded on the principle that the innocent party, as nearly as possible, should be put in the position it would have been in if the contract had been performed. Using, as the measure of damages, the difference between the purchase price and the land's market value on the closing date puts this principle into effect: 100 Main Street, at paras. 55-56. The market value represents the financial equivalent of the asset itself.

[65] Second, commercial certainty is enhanced by a predictable damages methodology. This court has stated that an early, and predictable, date on which the innocent party's damages are crystallized promotes efficient behaviour and reduces uncertainty and speculation: Kinbauri Gold Corp. v. Iamgold International African Mining Gold Corp. (2004), 246 D.L.R. (4th) 595 (Ont. C.A.), at para. 125, per Laskin J.A. (concurring), leave to appeal refused, [2000] S.C.C.A. No. 658.

Although made in the context of a sale of goods, the observation applies equally to the sale of land.

(ii) The Remoteness Test Does Not Determine the Measure of Damages

[66] The trial judge noted that Rosseau Group, in calculating its lost expected profit from the opportunity it would have had to develop the property, was not claiming damages according to the normal measure. She said that "there is a general discretion in the court to depart from that [measure] if circumstances warrant". She held the circumstances here justified the departure because the "parties in this case specifically contemplated that the [p]roperty would be developed into serviced lots…[t]hese were special circumstances known to the parties at the time they made the APS and amended [the] APS".

[67] In my view, it was an error to rely solely on the parties' contemplation of future development to justify a departure from the normal measure of damages in this case. The existence of what the trial judge referred to as special circumstances only meant that a type of loss was recoverable − in other words, it was not too remote. That conclusion is not the same as, let alone determinative of, the question of whether the normal measure is somehow inadequate to measure that loss.

[68] To explain, the term special circumstances known to the parties at the time of contracting, in the context of damages for breach of contract, is a reference to the second of the two branches of the remoteness limit on such damages. As this court stated in Saramia Crescent General Partner Inc. v. Delco Wire and Cable Limited, 2018 ONCA 519, at para. 36: "…there are two branches to the Hadley v. Baxendale remoteness test. Damages may be recovered if: (i) in the "usual course of things", they arise fairly, reasonably, and naturally as a result of the breach of contract; or (ii) they were within the reasonable contemplation of the parties at the time of contract". Damages that fall outside of either branch are not recoverable because they are too remote.

[69] The fact the property had known development potential, and therefore that if Rosseau Group acquired ownership it could benefit from having land with that potential, meant that damages for loss of the value of that potential (that is, the development value) would not be too remote. Indeed, even without the trial judge's finding of special circumstances the same result would follow. The APS, originally and as amended, provided for the sale of development lands. The price was a direct function of the net developable acres for residential purposes. The APS was conditional on Rosseau Group satisfying itself as to the economic feasibility of development. The loss, measured in money, of the ability to acquire development lands and the opportunity that provided would, on an objective basis, flow fairly, reasonably, and naturally from the breach of the APS. Loss of development value would not be too remote even on the first branch of the remoteness test.

[70] But, importantly, the remoteness test deals with the "type" of loss that is recoverable, while the measure is about how the loss is quantified. Regardless of the branch of the remoteness test into which the loss of an opportunity to acquire lands that can be developed falls, the normal measure of damages should not be departed from unless the party seeking damages shows that that measure does not address that type of loss. The trial judge made no such finding, nor, in my view, was it available on the record[4].

[71] The key driver of damages under the normal measure is the market value of the land on the assessment date. The normal measure of damages compensates the innocent purchaser for the loss of the market value of the lands on the closing date less the purchase price that had to be paid to acquire them. The concept of market value of the land takes into account the value the land has because it can be developed.

[4] The trial judge did not find that Rosseau Group could extract a special value from developing the land that other market participants could not because, for example, it owned adjacent land and could combine it in a unique way with the land to be acquired, or because it had special development techniques not known generally to the market. In those types of situations, the normal measure of damages may not be adequate because the key driver of damages according to the normal measure − the market value of the land − may not reflect the development value the disappointed purchaser has lost.

[74] Assessing market value for the purpose of damages for breach of a purchase agreement for the sale of land employs the same concepts. It generally requires appraisal evidence: DHMK Properties Inc. v. 2296608 Ontario Inc., 2017 ONSC 2432, at para. 56, rev'd on other grounds 2017 ONCA 961. Appraisal evidence can take into account the value of the property based on what would be its reasonable and probable highest and best use and that includes development: see for example 1427814 Ontario Limited v. 3697584 Canada Inc., 2012 ONSC 156, at paras. 511-17; WED Investments Limited v. Showcase Woodycrest Inc., 2021 ONSC 237, at paras. 149, 151, and 155. In other words, the market value of the land can take into account, as at the valuation date, the market's perspective of the value of the current and potential future uses and opportunities available to the land's owner, including development.

The APS, negotiated in January 2017 between arms' length market participants, attributed value to the property solely by reference to its potential development, as the price was $350,000 per developable acre for residential development. The trial judge found that 252 had knowledge that the value of the property had increased by the closing date based on market evidence − 252 received an offer to purchase the property of $11 million in April 2017, a Letter of Intent at $640,000 per developable acre (almost double that in the APS) in September 2017, and an additional offer to purchase the property that same month for $14 million.

[76] The trial judge referred to the decision in WED Investments Limited as support for her approach. In my view, it does not provide that support. In that case Schabas J., at paras. 93-97, considered it permissible for the plaintiff purchaser to "advance" two approaches to damages: "The first approach seeks the lost profits the plaintiff says it would have earned if it had acquired the properties and developed them, as was its intention when it signed the Agreements in 2016….[T]he second approach considers the increase in value of the properties as undeveloped land calculated on expected closing dates in July 2018." The first approach is similar to that of the trial judge. The second approach is the normal measure.

[77] Importantly, Schabas J. did not award damages under the first approach, which he found "to be quite speculative and uncertain": at para. 147. He did award damages based on the second approach, the difference between the purchase price and the market value of the property on the closing date. To determine the latter amount, he relied on appraisal evidence that "treated the property as vacant land available for redevelopment for a highest and best use of medium or higher density residential development….": at paras. 149, 151, and 155. In other words, he used the normal measure, and that measure took into account the development value of the land.

[78] The trial judge also referred to Performance Industries Ltd. v. Sylvan Lake Golf & Tennis Club Ltd., 2002 SCC 19, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 678. In that case, the parties had agreed to jointly own golf course lands, and that an area around the 18th hole could be developed either by a third party or by one of the parties to the joint venture. Bell, the joint venturer who wished to develop was later prevented from proceeding with development by the other joint venturer's insistence on the terms of their written agreement which did not reflect the terms that had been orally agreed to. The trial judge found the written agreement should be rectified and granted damages in lieu of rectification equal to "the amount of money that Bell would have been entitled to have received had he been permitted to complete the residential development of the 18th hole in accordance with the terms of the rectified [agreement]": 1999 ABQB 479, 246 A.R. 272, at para. 92. Although the award was considered generous by the Alberta Court of Appeal due to the failure of the trial judge to fully consider contingencies, the award was upheld: 2000 ABCA 116, 185 D.L.R. (4th) 269, at paras. 27-29.

[79] The Supreme Court of Canada also upheld the award. Binnie J. rejected the argument that damages should not include the "reasonably expected profit from a 58-lot housing development" and should instead be limited to the difference between the market value of the land and the option price (which presumably would not include any of that housing development value). He noted that the parties had specifically contemplated "the optioned land would be put to the use of residential housing", therefore the damages should include the losses flowing from those circumstances: at paras. 72-73.

[80] The normal measure will not be appropriate where it will not address the type of loss suffered by the innocent party. In Performance Industries, one joint venturer was denied a promised opportunity to engage in a specific development. It is implicit in the argument that Binnie J. rejected that for those lands, in those circumstances, the market value would not take into account expected profit from the residential development. I do not take Performance Industries to stand for the proposition that the normal measure of damages is not to be used for a failed arms' length sale of development lands, such as occurred in this case, simply because the parties had an awareness that the lands could be developed, where there is no suggestion that development value is ignored or excluded by the normal measure.

[81] Rosseau Group's compensation for breach of the APS should take into account development value of the lands. That loss is not too remote. But absent anything that suggests the normal measure of damages would not address development value, Performance Industries did not require departure from the normal measure in this case.

(iii) Assessment Date Concerns and Contingencies Support the Use of the Normal Measure

[82] Two additional issues that 252 raises about the trial judge's approach to damages reinforce the conclusion that use of the normal measure of damages is appropriate.

[83] The first issue has to do with calculating damages as of an assessment date. The assessment date is presumptively the date of closing. It can be moved, in the discretion of the court, where to do so is fair, which usually has to do with when the innocent party should re-enter the market so they can engage in mitigating transactions. As this court stated in Akelius: "the date of breach remains a starting point for the assessment of loss, modified only to the extent that the innocent party satisfies the court that a later date is appropriate on the grounds that it is the first date upon which the party could reasonably have been expected to re-enter the market and mitigate its damages": at para. 27.

[84] The trial judge did not use the date of closing as the assessment date. She was of the view that for a calculation of damages based on an estimate of lost profits, no date of assessment was necessary. Nor does it appear that she used a later date (in the sense of a specific date). Instead, she stated that if a date was required, she considered it to be fair in the circumstances “to start the assessment at the date of closing and estimate the expenses and revenue over the period over which the land would be developed − in this case, six years from the closing date”.

[85] The trial judge did not otherwise explain why no date of assessment was required. Her alternative approach does not identify an assessment date but instead a period of six years. Other than a statement that this is fair, the trial judge does not explain why using a six-year period instead of a date is appropriate. Although when she came to consider mitigation, the trial judge found that 252 had not satisfied its onus of showing Rosseau Group did not take reasonable efforts to mitigate, she did not expressly link that conclusion to the lack of a specific assessment date or the use of a six year period, or specifically equate it to Rosseau Group having satisfied its onus to depart from the presumptive date, or to use a later specific date.

[86] The lack of a specific date of assessment of damages is problematic. First, the expected profit is inherent in the value of the land at the date of closing. Second, because the normal measure of damages compares the purchase price to the market value at the date of closing, it compares outflows and inflows of value at the same date. When a later date of assessment is used, expected inflows and outflows of value may have to be adjusted so they are measured consistently, given considerations of interest, the time value of money, inflation, etc. But if no date, or multiple dates over a period are used, there can be concerns about what is being measured, and whether amounts are being measured and treated consistently.

[87] The second concern raised by 252 with the trial judge's approach has to do with contingencies. When damages are assessed on the basis that an opportunity to make a profit in a certain way was lost, the question arises as to whether a discount is appropriate to reflect the contingency that the opportunity may not be realized, perfectly or at all: Eastwalsh Homes Ltd. v. Anatal Developments Ltd., [1993] 12 O.R. (3d) 675, at para. 38. 252 argues that the trial judge failed to apply any discount notwithstanding what it argues was Mr. Quarcoopome's concession that there were risks that the project might not proceed as he envisaged it.

[88] I need not decide whether or what contingency discount should have been applied to Mr. Quarcoopome's calculations, as the trial judge erred in using them as she did. But I note that the normal measure of damages accounts for contingencies through its use of market value, which represents the price at which knowledgeable arms' length parties are prepared to transact given their assessment of the opportunity the property provides and the chance of realizing on it successfully.

(iv) Conclusion on Damages

[89] The trial judge erred in not using the normal measure of damages. Her award must be set aside.

[90] I do not consider that it would be appropriate to substitute an award of nominal damages. The trial judge found that the property had increased in value by the closing date (meaning there were damages according to the normal measure), but she did not make a specific finding as to what that value was, and this court is not in a position to determine that value. A new hearing on the issue of damages according to the normal measure is therefore required.

Disposition

[91] I would dismiss the appeal as to liability.

[92] I would allow the appeal on damages, set aside the damages award, and direct a new hearing on damages to be assessed according to the normal measure, namely, the difference between the purchase price and the market value of the lands on the date set for closing.

[93] Because of this disposition, it is unnecessary to address 252's argument that the trial judge erred in rejecting its mitigation arguments. On the measure of damages to be used, mitigation is not an issue, as Rosseau Group had suffered the loss of the difference between the purchase price and the market value on the closing date, regardless of any activities it undertook, or could have undertaken, following that date.

[94] It is also unnecessary to consider the argument that the trial judge erred in qualifying Mr. Quarcoopome as an expert. The issue of what expert(s) are qualified to testify on the issue to be determined at the new damages hearing will be for the judge presiding over that hearing.

[95] Success on the appeal is divided. If the parties are unable to agree on the costs of the appeal given this disposition (which was not contemplated by their agreement on costs at the time of the hearing), they may make written submissions not exceeding three double spaced pages each, within ten days of the release of these reasons.

On appeal from the judgment of Justice G. Gordon Sedgwick of the Superior Court of Justice, sitting without a jury, dated December 23, 2002 and August 27, 2003, reported at [2002] O.J. No. 5028.

CRONK J.A.:

I. OVERVIEW

[1] This appeal and cross-appeal arise out of a failed reverse take-over transaction contemplated under an amalgamation agreement made in 1990 (the "Agreement") by the appellant, Kinbauri Gold Corporation, and the shareholders of International African Mining Gold Inc., the predecessors in interest under the Agreement to the respondent, Iamgold International African Mining Gold Corporation (now known as "IAMGOLD Corporation").

[2] At the time of the Agreement, Kinbauri was a Canadian mining company whose shares were listed for sale on the Alberta Stock Exchange (the "ASE"). Its main asset was its ASE listing. Iamgold was a private Canadian mining exploration and development company. Its primary asset was a 90% interest in the right to mine gold and other minerals on a property in Mali, West Africa, known as the 'Sadiola Concession'. This included an area called the 'Sadiola Hill' that was thought to contain potentially significant gold deposits (the "Sadiola Hill Deposit").

[3] Under the Agreement, Iamgold was to control the amalgamated corporation ("Amalco"): the shareholders of Iamgold would own 97.96%, and the shareholders of Kinbauri would own 2.04%, of the issued and outstanding shares in Amalco at the end of the transaction. Amalco would succeed to Iamgold's interest in the Sadiola Concession and its shares would be listed for sale on the ASE in the summer or fall of 1991.

[4] However, in early 1991, Iamgold unilaterally terminated the Agreement, claiming that the ASE's 'public float' requirement – the obligation to ensure a specific minimum percentage of public shareholdings in Amalco – could not be satisfied.

[5] Kinbauri then sued Iamgold, seeking specific performance of the Agreement or, in the alternative, damages for breach of contract, amongst other relief. Iamgold counter-claimed against Kinbauri, claiming damages for various causes of action.

[6] In the fall of 1992, while the litigation was pending, Iamgold entered into an options agreement with Anglo American Corporation of South Africa Ltd., one of the world's largest mining concerns. Under this agreement, Anglo American obtained options, exercisable on certain conditions, to acquire an interest in the Sadiola Concession equal to Iamgold's interest. Anglo American subsequently exercised its options, assumed responsibility for the financing and development of the Sadiola Hill Deposit and became the operator of the development project.

[7] On February 28, 1996, Iamgold 'went public', making an initial public offering under applicable securities legislation (the "IPO"). A value of $5.75 (Cdn.) per share was placed on Iamgold's common shares under the IPO. Within the next three months, this share price rose to $6.25 per common share. The IPO had a market value of $404 million (Cdn.) and Iamgold's shares became listed for sale on the Toronto Stock Exchange (the "TSX").

[8] Kinbauri's action was tried in two phases before Sedgwick J. of the Superior Court of Justice. The first phase concerned liability issues. By judgment dated May 28, 1999, the trial judge held that Iamgold was bound by and had unjustifiably terminated the Agreement. Iamgold's counterclaim was dismissed. Its subsequent efforts to appeal the liability judgment were unsuccessful.

[9] The remedies phase of the trial was conducted over 15 days in early 2002. By reasons for judgment dated December 23, 2002, Iamgold was ordered to pay Kinbauri compensatory damages for breach of the Agreement in the sum of $1.7 million (Cdn.), plus pre-judgment interest at the rate of 10% per annum from the date of Iamgold's breach of the Agreement. A claim by Kinbauri for punitive damages was dismissed.

[10] The main issue in this proceeding relates to the manner in which the trial judge assessed damages. The trial judge rejected Kinbauri's assertion that its damages should be assessed according to the value of Iamgold's shares during the period from late 1993 to March 1996, holding that the critical date for the damages assessment was the date of Iamgold's breach of the Agreement. He also held that to compute Kinbauri's damages, it was necessary to consider the value of the underlying assets of Iamgold.

[11] The trial judge relied on an assets valuation report prepared by Watts, Griffis, and McOuat Limited ("WGM"), Canadian consulting geologists and engineers, in assessing Kinbauri's damages. This report, prepared in February 1993, addressed the value of Iamgold's interests in the Sadiola Concession as at December 15, 1992. Based on this report, the trial judge concluded that the value of the Kinbauri shareholders' 2.04% interest in Amalco at the breach date was $1.79 million (Cdn.). He then reduced these damages to the net sum of $1.7 million (Cdn.) on account of contingencies.

[12] Kinbauri appeals from the trial judge's damages assessment, arguing that he erred in failing to apply the principles established in Asamera Oil Corp. Ltd. v. Sea Oil & General Corp., [1979] 1 S.C.R. 633 or, in the alternative, in failing to apply an appropriate multiplier to the value of Iamgold's assets in determining Iamgold's market value. Kinbauri also asserts that the trial judge erred in reducing its damages on account of contingencies.

[13] Iamgold cross-appeals from part of the damages assessment. It claims that the trial judge erred in his calculation of an appropriate contingency allowance by failing to allow for the possibility that approval of the amalgamation by Iamgold's shareholders would have been withheld. It also challenges the rate of pre-judgment interest awarded to Kinbauri.

[14] For the reasons that follow, I conclude that the trial judge did not err in his assessment of Kinbauri's damages or in fixing the rate of awarded pre-judgment interest. Accordingly, I would dismiss both the appeal and the cross-appeal.

II. FACTUAL BACKGROUND

(1) Parties and the Agreement

[15] Kinbauri was incorporated in 1984 under the Canada Business Corporations Act, R.S.C. 1974-75-76, c. 33 (the "CBCA") (now R.S.C. 1985, c. C-44, S.C. 1994, c. 24). By the late 1980s, it was essentially inactive and its main asset was its ASE listing. It entered into the Agreement with International's shareholders on February 21, 1990.

[16] Iamgold was incorporated under the CBCA on March 27, 1990. Iamgold and International's shareholders were identical, comprising a syndicate controlled by William Pugliese and Mark Nathanson, either personally or through holding corporations controlled by them. By the spring of 1990, Iamgold had assumed the rights and obligations of International's shareholders under the Agreement and had acquired their interest in the Sadiola Concession.

[17] The Agreement provided for the following share structure for Amalco: (i) 2,088,109 outstanding common shares in Kinbauri would be converted into a like number of common shares in Amalco; (ii) 100,000,000 common shares in Iamgold, to be issued at the time of the amalgamation, would be converted into a like number of common shares in Amalco; and (iii) 10,000,000 options in Iamgold, also to be issued at the time of the amalgamation, would be converted into a like number of options in Amalco. This structure, once implemented, would effect the reverse take-over of Kinbauri (the public company) by Iamgold (the private company).

[18] The amalgamation transaction was conditional on the approval of the amalgamation by the directors of Iamgold, the shareholders of Kinbauri and Iamgold, the ASE and the Alberta and Ontario Securities Commissions.

(2) Post-Agreement Events

[19] Kinbauri notified the ASE of the proposed amalgamation shortly after the execution of the Agreement. As a result, trading in Kinbauri's shares was halted by the ASE in late February 1990 and suspended the following month pending review of the amalgamation transaction.

[20] Following Iamgold's incorporation, Pugliese and Nathanson tightened their control of Iamgold and, prospectively, of Amalco. This was accomplished in several ways:

> (a) Pugliese and Nathanson were both officers and directors of Iamgold and companies controlled by them were Iamgold shareholders. On March 27, 1990, the Iamgold shareholders entered into a shareholders agreement (the "Shareholder Agreement"), under which Pugliese and Nathanson were authorized to exercise each of the other Iamgold shareholder's voting rights at all Iamgold shareholder meetings, including the right to "vote in favour of the proposed amalgamation of [Iamgold] with a publicly listed corporation";

(b) in May 1990, the Iamgold shareholders entered into a management group agreement (the "Management Agreement") under which, effectively, voting control on behalf of Iamgold's shareholders concerning Amalco was transferred to Pugliese and Nathanson, as trustees. The Management Agreement also restricted the ability of Iamgold shareholders to convey to or otherwise deal in their Amalco shares with any persons outside the then existing group of Iamgold shareholders; and

(c) Pugliese and Nathanson increased their personal beneficial shareholdings in Iamgold through a series of share acquisitions. By January 1991, Pugliese and Nathanson beneficially owned or controlled more than 76% of the voting shares of Iamgold.

[21] In mid-February 1991, the ASE notified Kinbauri that the share structure for Amalco proposed under the Agreement might not meet the ASE's public float requirement, which required that 10% to 15% (or another percentage agreed upon by the ASE) of the total number of issued and outstanding shares of Amalco be freely tradeable and held by public shareholders. On February 26, 1991, Iamgold unilaterally terminated the Agreement, claiming that the ASE's minimum public float requirement could not be satisfied.

[22] On July 11, 1991, Kinbauri's shares were delisted by the ASE. Despite subsequent efforts, Kinbauri was unsuccessful in regaining a listing on the ASE, although it became listed on CDMX, TSX Venture as a Tier 3 company.

(3) Liability Phase of the Trial

[23] In August 1991, Kinbauri sued Iamgold, seeking a declaration that Iamgold had breached the Agreement and specific performance of the Agreement or, in the alternative, damages in the aggregate amount of $3,050,000. Kinbauri's pleading was subsequently amended to increase the claimed compensatory damages to $10 million and to include a claim for punitive damages. Iamgold counterclaimed against Kinbauri, seeking the sum of $500,000 as damages for alleged misrepresentation and injurious reliance or, in the alternative, for negligence.

[24] By judgment dated May 28, 1999, the trial judge granted declarations that the Agreement was binding on and enforceable against Iamgold and that Iamgold had unjustifiably terminated the Agreement. He held that Iamgold had failed to perform its contractual obligation to use its best efforts to comply with the ASE's public float requirement and that it had used the ASE's February 1991 non-compliance notice as a pretext upon which to terminate the Agreement, in which it had lost interest. In so doing, Iamgold had acted towards Kinbauri "in questionable good faith". The trial judge also dismissed Iamgold's counterclaim and directed that the remedies phase of the trial be conducted following discoveries on the issue of damages. By order dated January 17, 2000, he awarded Kinbauri the costs of the liability phase of the trial, including the costs of the counterclaim proceeding.

[25] Iamgold's appeal from this liability judgment was dismissed by this court on November 2, 2000: [2000] O.J. No. 4207. The court also set aside the costs order of the trial judge and directed that the issue of the costs of the liability phase of the trial be deferred until completion of the entire trial. Iamgold's subsequent leave to appeal application to the Supreme Court of Canada from the liability judgment was dismissed: [2000] S.C.C.A. No. 658.

(4) Entry of Anglo American

[26] Both prior to and following its termination of the Agreement, Iamgold investigated various means of financing the exploration and development of the Sadiola Hill Deposit, including equity, debt and joint venture opportunities. By 1992, it had been in contact with several major mining companies regarding a possible exploration and development joint venture.

[27] On October 19, 1992, Anglo American entered into an options agreement with Iamgold under which Anglo American agreed to conduct exploration and evaluation work and to prepare a feasibility study concerning the development of the Sadiola Hill Deposit.

[28] Anglo American's feasibility study was completed in December 1993. Thereafter, Anglo American exercised its options and acquired an interest in the Sadiola Concession equal to Iamgold's interest. It also agreed to finance the Sadiola Hill Deposit development project and to build and operate the mine site.

[29] The trial judge found that Anglo American's entry into the project was unforeseeable and outside the expectations of the parties when they entered into the Agreement. Kinbauri does not challenge these key findings.

[30] The involvement of Anglo American brought a seasoned and sophisticated mining company into the evolving Sadiola Concession development project. The trial judge held (at para. 82):

> With the entry of Anglo American, an experienced gold mining operator knowledgeable about the African environment, the development of the Sadiola Concession turned the corner.

This finding is also uncontested by Kinbauri.

(5) Iamgold's IPO

[31] Iamgold continued to grow its business in the years following the termination of the Agreement. By early 1996, either alone or in combination with others and in addition to its interest in the Sadiola Concession, Iamgold held prospecting licences or interests in mineral exploration rights for gold and other substances on properties in Senegal, Ghana, Guinea and Ecuador. It had also entered into a mineral exploration and development joint venture regarding other properties in West Africa.

[32] Iamgold made its IPO on February 28, 1996, under which a total of 10.4 million of its common shares were offered for sale, either from treasury or existing shareholders, at a price of $5.75 per share. Iamgold's prospectus indicated that the TSX had approved the listing of Iamgold's shares, subject to certain conditions. The IPO established a $404 million (Cdn.) market capitalization cap for Iamgold. In the 90 days following the IPO, Iamgold's share price increased to $6.25 per share.

(6) Damages Phase of the Trial

(i) Valuation Evidence

[33] Neither party led evidence at trial concerning the value of Amalco or Iamgold's assets or shares in 1991, the year in which Amalco's shares would have been listed for sale on the ASE had the amalgamation proceeded. The valuation evidence that was led at trial is critical to the main issues on Kinbauri's appeal. It may be briefly summarized as follows.

(a) Klöckner Industrie

[34] In January 1990, International's shareholders retained a German company, Klöckner Industrie – Anlagen GmbH, to carry out a gold exploration programme on the Sadiola Concession. Klöckner suggested that the Sadiola Hill Deposit contained approximately 5.4 million tonnes of open-pittable mineable reserves in the 'probable' category. In November 1990, Klöckner estimated the value of the Sadiola Concession at $60 to $70 million (U.S.).

(b) WGM

[35] WGM was retained by Iamgold in April 1991 to prepare a preliminary economic assessment of the Sadiola Hill Deposit. It recommended a large mineral exploration programme on the Sadiola Concession. Subsequently, based on 1991-1992 field exploration results, WGM confirmed "the presence of a major and rich gold deposit" and estimated that the area contained a total of 45.8 million tonnes of 'probable' and 'possible' ore reserves.

[36] In a report dated February 2, 1993 that was prepared for Iamgold's "internal corporate planning purposes", WGM assessed the fair market value of Iamgold's interest in the Sadiola Concession on December 15, 1992 at $33 to $39 million (Cdn.). This valuation was based on an assumed total tonnage of 45.8 million tonnes of ore and 'probable' and 'possible' gold reserves of 4.289 million ounces. It also assumed that Anglo American would exercise its options to acquire an interest in the Sadiola Concession, thereby reducing Iamgold's interest to 40% net of an interest obtained by the government of Mali. However, at the date of the valuation, Iamgold continued to hold a 90% interest in the right to develop the Sadiola Concession. WGM's calculations, adjusted to account for this 90% interest, produced a value of $74.25 to $87.75 million (Cdn.) for Iamgold's interest in the Sadiola Concession as at December 1992.

(c) Anglo American

[37] In its December 1993 feasibility study, Anglo American estimated the net present value of Iamgold's interest in the Sadiola Hill Deposit at $133.4 million (Cdn.). This was based on projections of 3.7 million ounces of gold, a constant gold price of $350 (U.S.) per ounce and direct cash operating costs of $123 (U.S.) per ounce during the proposed 13 year lifetime of the development project.

(d) Carter

[38] Kinbauri called Geoffrey S. Carter of Broad Oak Associates as an expert valuation witness at trial. In his valuation report dated December 19, 2001, Carter used five inter-related and overlapping valuation methods to ascertain the fair market value of Iamgold. One of these methods was based on a valuation of Iamgold's assets, while others focused on the value of Iamgold's shares.

[39] Carter testified that he placed the most weight on a 'market capitalization' valuation method, which produced a value of $400 million (Cdn.) for Iamgold from late 1993 to mid-1996. This was based on the IPO price of $5.75 per share for Iamgold's common shares and subsequent trading in those shares at $6.25 per share. Carter also used a 'discounted cash flow - net present value' valuation method to estimate Iamgold's fair market value, which was based on the data and asset valuation contained in Anglo American's feasibility study. Under this method, Carter placed a value of $333 million (Cdn.) on Iamgold's interest in the Sadiola Concession in late 1993.

[40] Carter testified that he valued both the assets and the shares of Iamgold and that "[T]hey effectively are the same in value". However, he did not undertake a valuation of Iamgold for any of the years 1990 to 1992.

(e) Bogden

[41] Gordon J. Bogden, a former employee of CIBC Wood Gundy Securities, testified at trial on behalf of Iamgold. He was qualified as an expert witness on international mining finance and related investment banking. Neither Wood Gundy nor Bogden undertook a formal 'valuation' of Iamgold or Amalco.

[42] In his evidence, Bogden outlined numerous risks associated with the proposed development of the Sadiola Concession that caused Wood Gundy to conclude in July 1994 that it was not prepared to act as lead underwriter on an Iamgold public offering. Bogden also testified that in May 1994, gold companies were trading in the Canadian capital markets at a 2.5 times multiple to their net asset value. Wood Gundy applied this multiple in conducting a net present value analysis of the Sadiola Hill Deposit in 1994, which produced a value of $455 million (Cdn.) for Iamgold's assets as at May 1994.

(ii) Positions of the Parties at Trial

[43] At trial, Kinbauri claimed compensatory damages for Iamgold's breach of the Agreement in an amount equal to the 2.04% equity interest in Amalco to which it was entitled under the Agreement. In reliance on Carter's valuation report, Kinbauri argued that its damages should be calculated on the basis of Iamgold's $400 million (Cdn.) market capitalization value during the period from late 1993 to mid-1996, rather than at the date of Iamgold's breach of the Agreement in 1991. Under this approach, Kinbauri's damages totalled $8.16 million (Cdn.) (2.04% x $400 million (Cdn.)). Kinbauri also claimed the approximate amount of $416,098 for costs and expenses allegedly incurred in connection with the failed amalgamation.

[44] In contrast, Iamgold maintained that Kinbauri's damages should be assessed according to the common law relating to the loss of chance, that is, on the basis of Kinbauri's loss of the chance to complete the amalgamation transaction, calculated at the date of the breach of the Agreement.

(iii) Trial Judge's Findings

[45] The trial judge accepted Iamgold's argument that the calculation of Kinbauri's damages should be based on the 'breach date' – the date when Iamgold wrongfully terminated the Agreement. In assessing Kinbauri's damages, the trial judge took into account the value of Iamgold's underlying assets, the reasonable expectations of the parties and the reasonably foreseeable consequences of entering into the Agreement. He concluded (at para. 84):

> In my view, it is appropriate in this case to base the assessment of compensatory damages on the fair market value of Iamgold's interests in the Sadiola Concession according to the WGM valuation [dated February 2, 1993]. Adjusting the WGM valuation to reflect a 90% interest (instead of 40%), the value of the 2.04% interest of the Kinbauri shareholders in Amalco at the date of the breach of [the Agreement] is calculated at $1,790,100.

[46] Having assessed Kinbauri's compensatory damages at $1.79 million (Cdn.), the trial judge then applied a 10% contingency allowance to reduce these damages to account for the possible denial of the regulatory approvals of the amalgamation that were required under the Agreement. Consequently, Kinbauri was awarded compensatory damages in the net amount of $1.7 million (Cdn.).

III. ISSUES

[47] Before this court, both parties challenge aspects of the trial judge's damages assessment. Kinbauri argues that the trial judge erred: (i) in assessing Kinbauri's damages at the date of the breach of the Agreement and in using an asset value, instead of a share value approach to the assessment, contrary to the principles established in Asamera, supra; (ii) in the alternative, in basing his damages assessment on WGM's asset valuation report without applying an appropriate multiplier to determine the market value of Iamgold; and (iii) in reducing Kinbauri's damages on account of contingencies.

[48] On its cross-appeal, Iamgold asserts that the trial judge erred: (i) in his calculation of an appropriate contingency allowance by declining to reduce Kinbauri's damages on account of the possibility that Iamgold shareholder approval of the amalgamation, required under the Agreement, would have been withheld; and (ii) in awarding Kinbauri pre-judgment interest at the rate of 10% per annum without regard to market interest rate fluctuations between 1991 and the date of the damages judgment.

IV. ANALYSIS

(1) Appeal

[49] Kinbauri's primary claim is that it is entitled, on a proper assessment, to damages in the sum of $8.16 million (Cdn.) based on the principles enunciated in Asamera, supra, and Carter's valuation of Iamgold's fair market value during the period from late 1993 to mid-1996 ($400 million (Cdn.)). In the alternative, it seeks damages in the sum of approximately $6.14 million (Cdn.), calculated on the basis of Anglo American's December 1993 valuation of Iamgold's interest in the Sadiola Hill Deposit ($133.4 million (Cdn.)). In the further alternative, it submits that if its damages are to be based on WGM's asset valuation report, a multiplier of 2.5 should be applied, resulting in a damages award of $4.13 million (Cdn.). These calculations are all subject to Kinbauri's additional assertion that no contingency allowance should apply in this case. As Kinbauri's primary damages claim rests on its argument that the trial judge was obliged to follow Asamera in assessing damages, I will consider this argument first.

(i) Asamera Argument

[50] Asamera involved the failure of a bailee of shares to return the shares to their rightful owner. The value of the shares fluctuated dramatically between the dates of the breach of the bailment contract and trial. The owner of the shares obtained an injunction to restrain the bailee from disposing of the shares and sued the bailee for the return of the shares, as well as damages. Significantly, it also agreed to a request from the bailee that it refrain from pressing its litigation for several years. The Supreme Court of Canada held that the measure of damages was presumptively the value of the shares on the breach date. The court then undertook an analysis of the owner's duty to mitigate its damages, including whether this duty obliged the owner to 'crystallize' its damages by purchasing replacement shares in the market.

[51] The Supreme Court held that the owner of the shares had a specific duty to crystallize its damages by the acquisition of replacement shares in the market so as to minimize the avoidable losses flowing from the bailee's deprivation of the owner's opportunity to market the unreturned shares. The court concluded that, "Such share purchases should have taken place within a reasonable time after the date of breach" (at p. 674). In the circumstances, a reasonable time for the purchase of the replacement shares was approximately 6 years after the breach date, when the owner was free from its agreement not to press its claims against the bailee and when Asamera's share price had begun to show improvement in the market.

[52] The trial judge undertook a detailed consideration of Asamera. He concluded that it was of little assistance in this case. He reasoned as follows (at paras. 66 and 67):

> The main point of law in Asamera is the application to that case of the proposition…that the owner of shares which a bailee wrongfully fails to return, is not entitled to recover damages based on the value of the shares after a date at which he could reasonably have replaced them in the market. The analysis in Asamera lends itself to a situation in which shares of a publicly traded corporation are involved at every stage. The availability of a market price at all times facilitates the assessment by a court of a plaintiff's reasonable foreseeable losses for breach of a contract to deliver or redeliver shares and to determine the point in time at which the plaintiff, acting reasonably, could and should have purchased replacement shares. …There was a market price [for Asamera shares]…during the entire course of the litigation between the parties.
> I am not persuaded by the submissions of counsel for Kinbauri, however, that a rigid application of the method used to assess damages in Asamera is the appropriate way to assess the compensatory damages of Kinbauri in this case. This case results from an amalgamation transaction which did not proceed because the [Agreement] under which the parties agreed to amalgamation was wrongfully terminated by IAMGOLD. As a consequence, no shares of Amalco were ever issued or listed for public trading as had been the > intention of the parties as expressed in the [Agreement]. Prior to the date of repudiation of the [Agreement], there was no discussion between the parties about a price for Amalco shares…There was a relative paucity of evidence led by either party, however, to establish the value of the shares or of the underlying assets of Kinbauri and IAMGOLD at the date of the [Agreement] or of its breach. The analysis followed by the court in Asamera, in which shares of a publicly traded corporation are involved at every stage, simply does not lend itself to this case, in which there is no reliable evidence of the market price of the shares of either Kinbauri or IAMGOLD at the date of the [Agreement] or of its breach [emphasis added].

> Compensatory damages for breach of contract are normally measured by the value of the performance of the contract by the defaulting party. The objective is to place the innocent party, insofar as it can be done by money, in the same position as it would have been in if the contract had been performed.

[54] He was also alive to the limitations on damages recoverable in contract cases, as endorsed by the Supreme Court of Canada in Asamera (at para. 62):

> The plaintiff is only entitled to recover that part of its loss that was reasonably foreseeable as a result of the breach at the time the contract was made. The plaintiff is not entitled to recover losses resulting from the breach that were "improbable" or "unpredictable" at the time the contract was made.

[55] Kinbauri acknowledges that the trial judge correctly identified these fundamental principles, as discussed in Asamera. It argues, however, that the trial judge erred in their application to the facts of this case by failing to follow the approach to the assessment of damages employed in Asamera. In particular, it asserts that the trial judge erred in concluding that damages should be assessed at the date of Iamgold's breach of the Agreement and in basing his assessment on WGM's asset valuation report rather than on Amalco's notional share value.

[56] Kinbauri makes three main submissions in support of this argument. First, it submits that the trial judge erred in distinguishing Asamera. It claims that the only difference between the facts here and those in Asamera is that Asamera was a public company at the date of the contract and at the date of the contract breach. In this case, but for Iamgold's wrongful breach of the Agreement, Amalco would have been created and, thereafter, its shares would have had a demonstrable market value. Thus, Kinbauri argues that the Asamera approach to the assessment of damages governs here.

[57] Next, Kinbauri asserts that the controlling date for the assessment of its damages was not the date of Iamgold's breach of the Agreement; rather, it was the date when Kinbauri was entitled to the delivery of shares in a publicly traded company that held an interest in the Sadiola Concession, as contemplated under the Agreement. It submits that the first possible date for the delivery of such shares was when the shares came into existence in March 1996, following Iamgold's IPO. Accordingly, to put Kinbauri back in the position it would have been in but for Iamgold's breach of the Agreement, Kinbauri submits that the 1996 value of Iamgold's shares ($400 million according to Carter) is the minimum value on which to calculate Kinbauri's damages.

[58] Finally, under the mitigation of damages principles established in Asamera, Kinbauri contends that it had a reasonable time after the breach date within which to mitigate its damages. In the circumstances of this case, Kinbauri's first opportunity to discharge its mitigation duty, by 'crystallizing' its damages through the purchase of replacement shares for its lost Amalco shares, arose in March 1996 when Iamgold's shares first became available on the public market.

[59] I am unable to accept these submissions, for the following reasons.

[60] First, I agree with the trial judge that there are important differences between this case and Asamera. In Asamera, the shares at issue were listed for sale on a public stock exchange at all relevant times. The bailment contract was entered into between two Asamera shareholders. The fact that Asamera was a public company at the date of the breach of the bailment contract and at the time when the owner of the shares was obliged to crystallize its damages, established a foundation for a damages assessment based on share value. In Asamera, regardless of the date at which the damages were to be assessed, this share value was established by evidence of the price for Asamera's shares as reflected in the trading history of its shares.

[61] In contrast, in this case, there is no evidentiary footing upon which to calculate contract damages based on share value – for either Amalco or Iamgold – prior to March 1996. Kinbauri led no evidence concerning the value of Amalco's shares at any time; nor did it lead evidence concerning the value of Iamgold's shares that was not dependant, under Carter's preferred valuation method, on the share price established by Iamgold's 1996 IPO.

[62] However, the share value established by Iamgold's IPO pertains to a commercially transformed Iamgold. By 1996, with the committed involvement of Anglo American in the development of the gold deposits in the Sadiola Concession, Iamgold was effectively 'a different company' than it was in 1991. The trial judge found that the development project for the Sadiola Concession "turned the corner" once Anglo American became involved. Its involvement with the development project, in a real sense, signalled a sea change in the prospects for gold production in the Sadiola Concession and, hence, in Iamgold's fortunes. As well, by 1996, Iamgold's business had grown and it was involved in several commercial ventures in various countries.

[63] There was also evidence at trial of considerable investor interest in the shares of gold companies in 1996, with the result that the shares of such companies were then trading at a significant premium to their underlying asset value. In contrast, the trial judge accepted Bogden's uncontradicted evidence that the equity capital markets in Canada in 1990 and 1991 were "virtually moribund" for mining financing proposals.

[64] The value of Iamgold's shares in 1996, therefore, cannot be equated with the value of its shares in 1991, the time when the parties agree that Amalco's shares, but for the breach of the Agreement, would have been available for public trading.

[65] In addition, and importantly, the Supreme Court of Canada confirmed in Asamera that, as a general rule, in the computation of contract damages the value of the loss is to be determined at the date of the breach of the contract.

[66] The trial judge in this case recognized that the presumptive date for the assessment of contract damages (the date of the contract breach), may be displaced in appropriate circumstances. He stated (at para. 63): "The normal date of assessment of damages for a breach of contract is the date of the breach. This date is not invariable. In some circumstances a later date is chosen, although the merit of crystallizing damages at an early date is recognized."

[67] The trial judge concluded that the court's departure in Asamera from the general rule for the assessment of contract damages was driven by the special circumstances of that case. I agree. As this court observed in Hunt v. TD Securities Inc. (2003), 229 D.L.R. (4th) 609 at 629, the postponement in Asamera of the date of mitigation from the date of the contract breach was occasioned by several special circumstances, including the owner's litigation forbearance agreement with the bailee, the number of shares in issue, market fluctuations and the time required to arrange the financing and acquisition of replacement shares.

> Some classes of property, including shares, whose value is subject to sudden and constant fluctuations of unpredictable amplitude, and whose purchase is not lightly entered into, call for a modification of the general rule that the value of the property on the "date of breach" be taken as the starting point for the calculation of damages.
>
> We therefore approach the matter of the proper appraisal of the damages assessable in the peculiar circumstances of this case on the following basis:…that [the owner of the shares] was under the general duty to mitigate its losses and may not escape this duty by relying on the 1960 injunction interminably; that the specific duty to mitigate and to crystallize its claim for damages within a reasonable time of the breach of contract by bringing action seeking appropriate remedies and to prosecute such action with due diligence, was qualified or postponed by [the bailee's] request of [the owner] sometime prior to 1966 to refrain from enforcing its claims; that any postponement of such requirement to prosecute and to acquire replacement shares had come to an end at the latest on the awareness of [the owner] that the defaulting party was not only in breach of the duty to return the shares but had disposed of shares at least equal in number to those loaned by [the owner]…
> The application of these principles and determinations to the particular circumstances in this case requires in my respectful view a determination of the damages payable by [the bailee] on the assumption that [the owner] ought to have crystallized these damages by the acquisition of replacement shares so as to minimize the avoidable losses flowing from the deprivation by [the bailee] of [the owner's] opportunity to market the 125,000 shares. Such share purchases should have taken place within a reasonable time after the date of breach. Having regard to all the above-noted special circumstances, the time for purchase in my opinion was the fall of 1966 when [the owner] was by its own admission free from any agreed restraint not to press its claims against [the bailee]. It > would be unreasonable to impose on [the owner] the burden of going into the market and acquiring replacement shares at a time when the litigation of its claims was in a dormant state at [the bailee's] request. Furthermore [the owner] acknowledged that by the fall of 1966 the fortunes of Asamera had improved and this had begun to be reflected in the market price of its shares. In short, [the owner] is not in my view entitled in law to any compensation for the loss of opportunity to sell its shares after that date. Thereafter its loss of this opportunity is of its own making [emphasis added].

[69] The type of special circumstances engaged in Asamera are not in play here. To the contrary, in my view, Kinbauri's damages crystallized when its loss became clear. It knew by February 1991 that Iamgold did not intend to perform its obligations under the Agreement. It also knew, by November 1991 at the latest, that no public company with shares listed for sale on a stock exchange was in existence. In the event, Amalco was never created. Accordingly, no opportunity to purchase replacement shares of the type envisaged by the Agreement existed at any time.

[70] Kinbauri's submission that the assessment of its damages should be based on Iamgold's value during the period from late 1993 to mid-1996 is flawed for an additional, compelling reason. Kinbauri is not entitled to recover damages for losses that were not within the reasonable contemplation of the parties at the time of the execution of the Agreement. The trial judge found as a fact, and Kinbauri concedes in this proceeding, that the entry of Anglo American into the Sadiola Concession development project was unforeseeable. With the involvement of Anglo American, the value of Iamgold's assets and, ultimately, its shares was materially and unpredictably enhanced.

[71] In my view, this is fatal to an assessment of damages calculated at any date after October 1992, whether based on the Anglo American study or Carter's valuation. Simply put, the quantification of Kinbauri's losses occasioned by Iamgold's breach cannot reasonably encompass the loss of the opportunity to enjoy an equity interest in a mining company that had unpredictably secured a financing and development joint venture agreement with Anglo American in respect of its major asset.

[73] Kinbauri attacks the trial judge's reliance on WGM's December 15, 1992 asset valuation on the ground that a damages assessment based on it cannot "come anywhere close" to placing Kinbauri in the position that it would have enjoyed had the Agreement not been breached. Although it is true that no party requested an asset value assessment of damages at trial, neither party led any evidence to establish Amalco or Iamgold's share value prior to October 1992.

[74] The 'share value' evidence most heavily relied upon by Kinbauri was established by Carter's testimony at trial and his valuation report. Carter's opinion of Iamgold's fair market value was primarily based on his market capitalization analysis. This valuation was driven by the IPO value of Iamgold's shares in the spring of 1996. However, Bogden pointed out the weaknesses of this approach. He said that, "The market [capitalization] value of a public company does not necessarily reflect its fundamental value, it is a proxy for value…a company can trade at a premium or a discount to its fundamental value, and the purpose of a valuation is to establish that fundamental value or fair market value." Bogden explained that the market capitalization of a public company may vary "quite dramatically" from the value of the company's underlying assets.

[75] Thus, the trial judge was placed in the unenviable position of assessing Kinbauri's damages in the absence of evidence concerning the value of Iamgold or Amalco's shares in 1991. Rather, he was faced with share value evidence pertaining to Iamgold, not Amalco, dating from some 5 years after the date of the breach of the Agreement, when Iamgold was fundamentally a different company, that was derived from a share valuation method of questionable reliability. On the record before him, therefore, how was the trial judge reasonably to assess damages?

[76] Counsel for Kinbauri argues that difficulties in quantifying damages in breach of contract cases do not free a court from the obligation to assess damages to the extent possible on the existing evidentiary record; nor do they justify the denial of damages or the award of only nominal damages unless otherwise warranted: see Eastwalsh Homes Ltd. v. Anatal Developments Ltd. (1993), 100 D.L.R. (4th) 469 (Ont. C.A.), leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada refused, 104 D.L.R. (4th) vii and Webb & Knapp (Canada) Ltd. v. City of Edmonton (1970), 11 D.L.R. (3d) 544 (S.C.C.).

[77] I agree. However, as this court observed in Eastwalsh, where it is clear that the defendant's breach has caused loss to the plaintiff (at pp. 483-84):

> [I]t is no answer to the claim that the loss is difficult to assess or calculate. The concept of the loss of a chance then begins to operate and the court will estimate the plaintiff's chance of obtaining a benefit had the contract been performed. But even in this situation, the Supreme Court of Canada has said in Kinkel v. Hyman [[1939] 4 D.L.R. 1, [1939] S.C.R. 364] that proof of the loss of a mere chance is not enough; the plaintiff must prove that the chance constitutes "some > reasonable probability" of realizing "an advantage of some real substantial monetary value".

[78] Kinbauri bore the burden of establishing the value of the loss of what it had bargained for – the opportunity to enjoy a 2.04% equity position in a public company that enjoyed an interest in the Sadiola Concession. It lost that opportunity in February 1991, when Iamgold breached the Agreement. Thereafter, there was no market value for Amalco, or any opportunity for Kinbauri to replace its lost shares in Amalco, because Amalco was never created. In these circumstances, in my view, it was incumbent on Kinbauri to demonstrate that there was a reasonable probability that the lost opportunity to enjoy shares in Amalco would have generated "an advantage of some real substantial monetary value" prior to Anglo American's commitment to the Sadiola Concession development project.

[79] Kinbauri failed to discharge this burden. The evidence established that there was no market for Iamgold's shares in 1991. If Amalco had been created, it would have succeeded to Iamgold's interest in the Sadiola Concession. The trial judge found that, in 1991, the Sadiola Concession was still at an exploratory stage; its ore reserves were classified as 'probable', not proven; no feasibility study had been undertaken; there were serious management, development, political and financial risks associated with the project; and the equity capital markets in Canada for mining financing proposals were "virtually moribund". These findings are unchallenged and amply supported by the evidence.

[80] Consequently, the value of Amalco's shares and, indeed, the value of Iamgold's shares prior to October 1992, was unknown on the record before the trial judge. This court is in no better position than the trial judge to determine the value of such shares in 1991. In contrast, the earliest valuation of Iamgold's assets was the February 1993 WGM report, which provided an asset valuation as at December 1992. In the absence of relevant share value evidence, the trial judge determined to assess Kinbauri's damages on the basis of the earliest available valuation evidence – WGM's asset valuation. In essence, he relied upon this evidence as a proxy for the notional share value of Iamgold or Amalco's shares prior to October 1992. On the record that confronted the trial judge, this was not unreasonable.

[81] I conclude that the trial judge's use of WGM's valuation of Iamgold's interest in the Sadiola Concession as at December 1992, and his finding that this evidence was the "best evidence" available concerning the value of Iamgold's underlying assets, were entirely reasonable, supported by the evidence and consistent with his obligation to assess Kinbauri's damages on the basis of the case as led before him. Indeed, in my view, no reliable alternative was open to the trial judge on the evidence.

(ii) Multiplier Claim

[82] Kinbauri argues that the trial judge erred in basing his damages assessment on WGM's asset valuation report without applying an appropriate multiplier to determine Iamgold's market value. It submits that the trial judge ignored evidence that the market value of a public company that owns a gold deposit, as reflected by its share price, is based on a multiple of the company's assets.

[83] Kinbauri asserts that the appropriate multiplier in this case is 2.5. If this multiplier is applied to WGM's valuation of Iamgold's interest in the Sadiola Concession as at December 15, 1992, as adjusted to account for Iamgold's 90% interest in the Sadiola Concession at that time, it results in a value of $185.63 to $219.38 million (Cdn.) for Iamgold, and a value of about $4.13 million (Cdn.) for Kinbauri's 2.04% interest.

[84] Similarly, if a 2.5 multiplier is applied to Anglo American's $133.4 million (Cdn.) estimate of Iamgold's net present value in December 1993, it produces a value of approximately $6.8 million (Cdn.) for Kinbauri's interest.

[85] In my view, Kinbauri's claim for the application of a multiplier must be rejected. I say this for several reasons.

[86] First, I have already concluded that the proper date for the assessment of Kinbauri's damages was the 1991 date of the breach or, at the latest, November 1991, when the parties agree that Amalco's shares would have been listed for trading on the ASE if the amalgamation transaction had been completed. However, there was no market for Iamgold's shares in 1991. Therefore, application of any multiplier has no effect on Iamgold's 1991 market value.

[87] Second, there was no evidence at trial concerning an appropriate multiplier for gold companies trading in Canada's capital markets in 1991 or 1992. Bogden, who confirmed in his testimony that Wood Gundy used a multiplier of 2.5 in arriving at its calculation of the net present value of Iamgold, was clear that this multiplier applied to the trading in securities of gold companies in 1994. He gave no evidence concerning an appropriate multiplier for such companies in 1991 or 1992.

[88] Similarly, Carter's testimony and the evidence concerning WGM's report are of no assistance on this issue. WGM did not utilize a multiplier in its February 1993 valuation report. Although Carter applied a 2.5 multiplier in some of his calculations of Iamgold's value, this was done to obtain a fair market value for Iamgold commencing in late 1993. Carter did not prepare a valuation of Iamgold for any of the years from 1990 to 1992, under any methodology; nor did he provide evidence of an appropriate multiplier in any of these years.

[89] Bogden testified that many factors affect whether the securities in a mining company trade at premiums beyond the assessed value of the company. He said that the value of such companies increases or falls at the various stages of initial resource exploration, feasibility studies, examination of financing sources, the obtaining of financing, production completion tests and, ultimately, at the production stage. As well, commodities values affect the trading values of mining securities. For example, according to Bogden, when Iamgold made its IPO in 1996, the market value of mining companies was established by trading at a factor of 3 times net asset value; however, thereafter, these trading premiums were either eliminated or decreased significantly. In effect, therefore, although the securities of mining companies may trade at a premium, it was Bogden's evidence that a premium or multiplier is neither constant nor assured.

[90] I agree with Iamgold that, absent evidence concerning an appropriate multiplier in 1991 or 1992, there was no evidentiary foundation for the application of a multiplier in the assessment of Kinbauri's damages. It was not open to the trial judge to speculate on an appropriate multiplier for 1991 or 1992; nor was it open to him to retrospectively set an appropriate multiplier by extrapolating from the evidence of multipliers used in 1993 or 1994, absent evidence that such multipliers were also appropriate for and in use in 1991 or 1992. Consequently, I am far from persuaded that the trial judge erred by failing to utilize a multiplier, at any level, in his assessment of Kinbauri's damages.

(iii) Kinbauri's Contingencies Claim

[91] The trial judge applied a 10% contingency allowance to reduce Kinbauri's compensatory damages in recognition of the possible denial of regulatory approvals of the amalgamation. He reasoned as follows (at paras. 69 and 78):

> Counsel for IAMGOLD submits that the compensatory damages of Kinbauri should be measured by the common law relating to loss of chance: Chaplin v. Hicks, [1911] 2 K.B. 786 (C.A.). This approach would require an evaluation of the chance of completing the amalgamation transaction upon which Kinbauri and IAMGOLD had agreed in the [Agreement]. This approach is taken where the loss can be shown to be more probable than not, but substantially less than certain. As a result of a breach of contract, a plaintiff may lose the chance of gaining a benefit. The plaintiff can recover damages for loss of the chance even though it is not certain that he would have received the benefit if the contract had been performed. In deciding how much the chance is worth, the court will consider: (1) the number of contingencies on which it depends; and (2) the likelihood of > their being satisfied in the plaintiff's favour. Quantifying the plaintiff's damages in such a case is necessarily a speculative exercise by the court.

> In my view, the only true third party approvals in this transaction were those of the ASE [and the securities commissions]. As to those approvals, the court received the videotape evidence of Gerald Romanzin, an official of the ASE, that the amalgamation would likely have been approved, if the public float requirement were complied with. …In its non-compliance letter dated February 13, 1991, the ASE recognized that the responsibility for resolving the issue of the public float lay in the shareholdings of IAMGOLD in Amalco. …The 2.04% of the shareholdings of Kinbauri's shareholders in Amalco would clearly constitute 2.04% of the requisite public float. Romanzin also testified that the approval of the ASE was the key regulatory approval. If obtained, the regulatory approvals of the [securities commissions] would have followed. His evidence on this point was confirmed by both expert legal witnesses at the damages segment of this trial. I would assess the likelihood of these third party regulatory approvals being obtained at 90%, if the [Agreement] had not been breached by IAMGOLD.

[92] Kinbauri argues that a finding of any risk of the denial of the requisite regulatory approvals is not supported by the evidence. It also contends that a contingency allowance for third party regulatory approvals for a securities exchange listing, "even if justified", has no application under the asset value approach to the assessment of damages utilized by the trial judge. I disagree.

[93] The courts have recognized the application of a contingency allowance to the calculation of damages in breach of contract cases where performance of the contract may have been prevented, notwithstanding the wrongdoer's breach, by some other intervening factor. Where the plaintiff establishes that its loss was caused by the defendant's breach of contract, but is unable to prove loss of a definite benefit, demonstrating only the 'chance' of receiving a benefit had the contract been performed, the courts will discount the value of the chance by the improbability of its occurrence: see Eastwalsh, supra; Chaplin, supra; Webb & Knapp (Canada) Ltd., supra; and Multi-Malls

[94] In this case, Iamgold's contract breach was established during the liability phase of the trial. Kinbauri bore the onus of demonstrating its loss. The trial judge found that the amalgamation was conditional upon approval by the ASE and the applicable securities commissions. On these facts, unless it can be said that there was virtually no realistic chance that the requisite regulatory approvals would be denied, the application of a contingency allowance cannot be said to be inappropriate.

[95] The trial judge was clearly of the view that there was some material chance that the approval of the amalgamation by the ASE and, correspondingly, of the securities commissions, would not be forthcoming. He discounted Kinbauri's lost opportunity of enjoying an equity interest in Amalco by taking into account the improbability of ASE approval of the amalgamation. He found that this improbability was low (10%). I see no overriding and palpable error in this finding, as is required to support appellate intervention.

[96] The ASE's approval of the amalgamation was dependant upon satisfaction of its public float requirement. The evidence at trial indicated that this could have been achieved by Iamgold in several different ways. Compliance with the requirement was in the control of Iamgold and its shareholders. The manner of its compliance, however, still required ASE scrutiny and approval. It is not suggested that the ASE's approval of the amalgamation was guaranteed, regardless of the method by which Iamgold might have sought to achieve compliance with the public float requirement.

[97] Kinbauri's corporate solicitor testified that it "would probably take a couple of months" to satisfy the ASE, assuming that the necessary documentation was filed with the ASE as a package. She later clarified that a period of 4 to 6 months would have been required. However, Kinbauri's solicitor was not asked and did not suggest that ASE approval was a virtual certainty following the submission to the ASE of the necessary documentation.

[98] Nor did the evidence of Gerald Romanzin, a representative of the ASE, indicate that ASE approval would follow automatically if Iamgold sought to satisfy the public float requirement. He said that ASE approval "likely" would have been forthcoming if the public float requirement was met.

[99] Based on this evidence, the probability of obtaining ASE approval of the amalgamation was high – but not absolute. There remained some degree of uncertainty. This evidence supports the trial judge's application of a contingency allowance. Kinbauri does not challenge his selection of 10% as the appropriate contingency percentage.

[100] Finally, although Kinbauri also argues that the imposition of any contingency allowance was misplaced where the trial judge's damages assessment was based on Iamgold's underlying assets rather than on its share value, it advanced no authority in support of this proposition. In my view, there is no principled basis upon which to conclude that the application of the law relating to loss of chance in the assessment of contract damages should be so restricted.

(2) Cross-appeal

(i) Iamgold's Contingencies Claim

[101] Iamgold asserts that the trial judge erred in his calculation of the contingency allowance in failing to include a discount to reflect the possibility that approval of the amalgamation by Iamgold's shareholders would have been withheld and in concluding that the only "true third party approvals" required in the reverse take-over transaction were those of the ASE and the involved securities commissions. In essence, Iamgold urges the application of a higher contingency allowance.

[102] In my view, on the record before the trial judge and in the face of his unchallenged factual findings, the trial judge's rejection of this claim is unassailable.

[103] The trial judge made the following findings in his reasons for judgment dated December 23, 2002 (at paras. 76 and 77):

> On the evidence at both segments of the trial, at all material times IAMGOLD was completely in the grip of its two major shareholders, Nathanson and Pugliese. Between them, they owned or controlled through their personal corporations Marzen and Fundeco, more than 76% of the voting shares of IAMGOLD on January 7, 1991. …Through the Shareholder Agreement and accompanying powers of attorney, they voted 100% of the shares of IAMGOLD. Those documents specifically empowered them "to vote in favour of the proposed amalgamation of the Corporation with a publicly listed corporation". …The Shareholders Agreement became effective as of the date of incorporation of IAMGOLD, on March 27, 1990. Under the Management Group Agreement dated as of May 31, 1990, and accompanying powers of attorney, Nathanson and Pugliese would have exercised similar rights to vote all of the shares of Amalco to be held by the former shareholders of IAMGOLD.

> Most items submitted to the court as "third party" approvals by IAMGOLD's counsel are standard legal requirements for approvals by the directors and shareholders of IAMGOLD and Kinbauri to carry out the amalgamation transaction in accordance with the [Agreement]. In some cases, the actions of directors and shareholders of a corporation may be unpredictable and lead to uncertainty about the result. This case is not one of them. It is not seriously questioned that the directors and shareholders of Kinbauri would have approved the amalgamation. At the damages segment of the trial, both Nathanson and Pugliese testified that they would have voted against the amalgamation. This is self-serving testimony after the fact. On August 14, 1990, on the letterhead of IAMGOLD, they gave formal written assurances to Rampton of "the intention of IAMGOLD to complete the amalgamation in accordance the [Agreement]". … At that time, they were specifically authorized under the Shareholder Agreement to vote all of the shares of the other shareholders of IAMGOLD in favour of the amalgamation. It was in their power to decide whether to go ahead with the amalgamation or not.

[104] These findings are fatal to Iamgold's contingencies claim. Although the trial judge did not expressly state that Pugliese and Nathanson were obliged to vote in favour of the amalgamation, Pugliese and Nathanson's conduct, in their capacities as both directors and shareholders of Iamgold, indicates that they were committed to vote to approve the amalgamation.

[105] Pugliese and Nathanson, on behalf of their respective holding companies through which they held shares in Iamgold, signed the Shareholder Agreement, under which each Iamgold shareholder appointed Pugliese and Nathanson as his or its attorney and expressly agreed that, "such powers of attorney shall be exercised to vote in favour of the proposed amalgamation of [Iamgold] with a publicly listed corporation [Kinbauri] [emphasis added]". In this manner, Pugliese and Nathanson committed to exercise their powers of attorney and the other shareholders of Iamgold directed that their voting rights attaching to their Iamgold shares be cast in favour of the amalgamation.

[106] The trial judge held that the Shareholder Agreement and accompanying powers of attorney "empowered" Pugliese and Nathanson to vote in favour of the amalgamation. In fact, these documents required them so to do. Moreover, little purpose would be achieved in obtaining this direction from the other Iamgold shareholders if Pugliese and Nathanson, the controlling shareholders of Iamgold, were not themselves intent on approving the amalgamation.

[107] As well, the May 1990 Management Agreement entered into by all the shareholders of Iamgold provided Pugliese and Nathanson with powers of attorney to exercise the voting rights attaching to Amalco shares at all Amalco shareholders' meetings after the amalgamation took place. This grant of authority effectively placed control of 98% of the voting shares of Amalco with Pugliese and Nathanson. Once again, if any real possibility existed that the amalgamation would not be approved by Iamgold's shareholders, these authorizations, which followed on the voting direction and authorization contained in the Shareholder Agreement, would serve little meaningful purpose.

[108] Thereafter, by written resolution dated June 22, 1990, the directors of Iamgold approved the amalgamation in principle. This resolution was accompanied by a confirmation from the Iamgold shareholders, including Pugliese and Nathanson through their respective holding companies, by which the shareholders "confirmed, ratified and approved" the directors' resolution.

[109] On August 14, 1990, Pugliese and Nathanson wrote to the president of Kinbauri confirming Iamgold's intention to complete the amalgamation in accordance with the Agreement and indicating that "time shall be of the essence". There was no indication in this letter that Pugliese and Nathanson were offering this assurance only in their capacities as directors of Iamgold and that they were reserving the right, as the controlling shareholders of Iamgold, to effect a diametrically different result.

[110] By this conduct, Pugliese and Nathanson both indicated their intent to proceed with the amalgamation and took steps to ensure their legal ability to effect the approval of the amalgamation by the other Iamgold shareholders. All these activities took place before the delivery of the ASE's preliminary non-compliance notice in February 1991. Thus, any possibility that Pugliese and Nathanson would not approve the amalgamation flowed from the implications of the public float requirement referenced in the ASE's non-compliance notice. This court, in dismissing Iamgold's appeal from the liability judgment, stated:

> The trial judge made two crucial findings, based on credibility. First, several principals of the appellant were aware of the public float requirement at the time the [Agreement] was signed. Second, compliance with the public float requirement was not a difficult problem and the appellant could have done so in a number of possible ways.

> The trial judge further found that the appellant made no effort to satisfy its contractual obligation and that by its own actions (the Shareholders Agreement and the Management Group Agreement which it failed to disclose) the appellant made compliance with the public float requirement impossible.
> We see no merit in the appellant's argument that there was no contract until the shareholders' approval had been given. The directors controlled 98% of the shares. In the end, the trial judge concluded that the appellant was not justified in unilaterally terminating the [Agreement] which, for other business reasons, was no longer in its corporate interests. The appellant had acted towards the respondent in questionable good faith [emphasis added].

The same reasoning applies to Iamgold's contingencies claim.

[111] Finally, Iamgold maintains that Pugliese and Nathanson's only obligation to vote in favour of the amalgamation arose from their role as directors, rather than as shareholders of Iamgold and that, in the latter capacity, they were free to vote as they wished.

[112] On the record before this court, these submissions cannot succeed. The only evidence at trial that Iamgold shareholder approval would not have been forthcoming was the testimony of Pugliese and Nathanson, both of whom asserted that they would have withheld their approval of the amalgamation after learning of the ASE's public float requirement. The trial judge considered and rejected this evidence, as he was entitled to do, describing it as "self-serving testimony after the fact". He found, essentially, that these assertions were claims made to advance Pugliese and Nathanson's litigation interests. This finding flowed from his assessment of Pugliese and Nathanson's credibility on this issue and was open to the trial judge on the evidence. Accordingly, it attracts considerable deference from this court.

[113] On the findings of the trial judge, shareholder approval of the amalgamation was anticipated and assured, but for Iamgold's wrongful termination of the Agreement. It is not open to Iamgold to seek to reduce Kinbauri's damages in reliance on the possibility of non-compliance with a condition to the amalgamation, the satisfaction of which, throughout, was entirely within Pugliese and Nathanson's control and authority.

(ii) Pre-judgment Interest Rate

[114] The trial judge's reasons in support of his award of pre-judgment interest to Kinbauri are briefly set out (at para. 89):

> Kinbauri is entitled to prejudgment interest on the amount of its compensatory damages…calculated in accordance with sections 127 and 128 of the Courts of Justice Act. This action was commenced on August 27, 1991. Under ss. 127(1), the applicable annual rate of prejudgment [sic] interest appears to be 10%. I see no reason to vary the applicable annual rate of interest.

[115] Kinbauri's action against Iamgold was commenced on August 27, 1991. Iamgold's breach of the Agreement occurred in February 1991. The trial judge's reasons for judgment concerning the damages phase of the trial were released more than ten years later, on December 23, 2002. It is not contested that 10% was the highest rate of annual interest during the 10-year period between the date of the commencement of Kinbauri's action and the date of the trial judge's decision. Indeed, the applicable interest rate during this 10-year period was volatile, reaching as low as 2.3%. The average interest rate during this period was 5.6%.

[116] Iamgold argues that the trial judge erred in failing to consider the fluctuations in the applicable market interest rates during the 10 years following the commencement of Kinbauri's action. It submits that the award of pre-judgment interest at the rate of 10% per annum, notwithstanding these fluctuations, is punitive and not rationally connected to the actual interest rates that prevailed over the relevant period. Kinbauri, in turn, asserts that the awarded rate of pre-judgment interest is a matter of discretion for the trial judge and that, absent any demonstration that the trial judge proceeded on an erroneous principle of law, there is no basis for appellate intervention. I agree with Kinbauri's submission.

[117] Section 128(1) of the Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.43 (the "CJA") provides that a person who is entitled to an order for the payment of money is also entitled to an award of interest thereon at the pre-judgment interest rate, "calculated from the date the cause of action arose to the date of the order". The applicable pre-judgment interest rate is established by s. 127 of the CJA. In February 1991, the applicable rate was 10% per annum.

[118] Section 130(1) of the CJA authorizes a court, in its discretion and where it considers it just, to disallow pre-judgment interest, to allow pre-judgment interest at a rate higher or lower than that provided in s. 128, or to allow interest for a period other than that provided in s. 128. By s. 130(2) of the CJA, the court is obliged to consider various enumerated factors, including "changes in market interest rates", when exercising its discretion under s. 130(1).

[119] Although the trial judge did not expressly refer to s. 130 of the CJA, he stated: "I see no reason to vary the applicable annual rate of interest." Thus, he explicitly recognized his authority to vary the pre-judgment interest rate that applied under ss. 127 and 128 of the CJA. Trial judges are presumed to know the law. It cannot be inferred, therefore, that the trial judge failed to direct himself to the factors outlined in s. 130(2) when exercising his discretion under s. 130(1).

[120] This court has recognized that the legislature's policy in providing for the payment of pre-judgment interest is intended to encourage early settlements and the timely compromise of litigation: see, for example, Spencer v. Rosati (1985), 50 O.R. (2d) 661 (C.A.) at 665 and Borland v. Muttersbach, [1986] 53 O.R. (2d) 129 (C.A.) at 145. In this case, the awarded rate of interest of 10% was 4.4% higher than the average rate of interest that prevailed during the relevant period. The possibility that the trial judge would award pre-judgment interest in accordance with s. 128 at the rate applicable at the time of Iamgold's breach of the Agreement was a risk of the damages assessment litigation from the outset, especially where, as here, the trial judge had already concluded that Iamgold had wrongfully breached the Agreement and that it had acted in questionable good faith.

[121] In the result, I see no error in the trial judge's discretionary award of the rate of pre-judgment interest and would not interfere with it.

V. DISPOSITION

[122] Accordingly, for the reasons given, I would dismiss the appeal and the cross-appeal. As success in this proceeding has been divided, I would make no award of costs.

RELEASED:

"NOV 10 2004"

"JL" "E.A. Cronk J.A."

"I agree Janet Simmons J.A."

LASKIN J.A. (Concurring):

[123] I have had the benefit of reading Cronk J.A.'s reasons. I, too, would dismiss Kinbauri's appeal and IAMGOLD's cross-appeal. I agree with my colleague's analysis of the issues on the cross-appeal. I write these brief concurring reasons because I take a different approach to the issues on Kinbauri's appeal.

[124] Kinbauri's appeal rests on two related submissions: the trial judge erred by choosing both the wrong date and the wrong yardstick to assess Kinbauri's damages. The trial judge assessed Kinbauri's damages at the date its contract was breached (February 1991); Kinbauri contends that its damages should have been assessed at a later date, ideally in March 1996 when IAMGOLD's shares were publicly listed on the TSX. Furthermore, the trial judge measured Kinbauri's damages in an amount equal to 2.04 per cent of the value of IAMGOLD's interest in the Sadiola Concession. Kinbauri contends that its damages should have been measured in an amount equal to what it bargained for: 2.04 per cent of the value of the shares of Amalco.

i. Date for assessment

[125] As Cronk J.A. points out, damages for breach of contract are generally assessed at the date of breach. An early crystallization of the plaintiff's damages promotes efficient behaviour: the litigants become as free as possible to conduct their affairs as they see fit. Early crystallization also avoids speculation: the plaintiff is precluded from speculating at the defendant's expense by reaping the benefits of an increase in the value of the goods in question without bearing any risk of loss. See S.M. Waddams, The Law of Damages 4th ed. (Toronto: Canada Law Book Inc., 2004) at paras. 1.670-1.680.

[126] A court may, however, depart from the general rule when it is in the interests of justice to do so. See Johnson v. Agnew, [1980] A.C. 367 (H.L.) and Asamera, supra. This case presents one example where departing from the general rule may be in the interests of justice because no market existed to replace the undelivered shares at the date of breach. It is on the significance of the absence of a market that I differ from my colleague. Cronk J.A. suggests that the absence of a market is a reason why damages should be assessed at the date of breach or shortly afterwards. In my view, the absence of a market is a reason why the date of assessment may be postponed for a reasonable period after the date of breach.

existed at the date of breach, special circumstances may justify postponing the date of assessment for several years beyond the date of breach. See Waddams, supra, at paras. 1.760-1.840; J. & E. Hall v. Barclay, [1937] 3 All E.R. 620 (C.A.); and Bwllfa and Merthyr Dare Steam Collieries (1891), Ltd. v. Pontypridd Waterworks Co., [1903] A.C. 426 (H.L.).

[128] Where, however, on the date of breach, no market to replace the shares existed at all, I see a greater justification for postponing the date of assessment. Here, where IAMGOLD defaulted on its promise to amalgamate and, therefore, on its promise to deliver to Kinbauri 2.04 per cent of the shares of Amalco, no market existed for Kinbauri to replace those shares or to purchase a reasonable substitute. In my view, Kinbauri was entitled to wait a reasonable period before crystallizing its damages. It was just in all of the circumstances that it be permitted to do so. I would fix two years as the outside limit of a reasonable period. Therefore, if, for example, within two years of the date of breach IAMGOLD had effected a similar reverse takeover of another dormant public company, Kinbauri may have been entitled to measure its damages by the share value of this new public company.

[129] However, in this appeal, Kinbauri seeks to extend the date for assessment into the period from 1993-1996 and to quantify its damages either by reference to the value of IAMGOLD's shares on the TSX in 1996 or by the use of a multiplier. My problem with Kinbauri's position is threefold. First, extending the date for assessment beyond two years from the date of breach does not seem to be reasonable. Second, as Cronk J.A. points out, Kinbauri led no evidence of an appropriate multiplier for gold mining companies during the period of February 1991 to February 1993. Third, as Cronk J.A. also points out, on the findings of the trial judge, Anglo-American's participation – which led to IAMGOLD's initial public offering in early 1996 – was not contemplated by Kinbauri and IAMGOLD when they signed their amalgamation agreement. Therefore, in my opinion, at most Kinbauri was entitled to postpone the date for assessment of its damages until February 1993, two years after the date of breach.

ii. The yardstick

[130] Kinbauri also takes issue with the trial judge's use of asset values to assess its damages. As it did for a later period, Kinbauri could have led evidence of the notional value of Amalco or of an appropriate multiplier in February 1993. But it did not do so. Therefore, even if I am justified in postponing the date of assessment until February 1993 I have no better evidence to measure Kinbauri's damages than did the trial judge. The only relevant evidence up to that date was WGM's December 15, 1992, asset evaluation. Thus, the trial judge cannot be faulted for relying on this evaluation for assessing Kinbauri's damages.

[131] The trial judge appreciated that Kinbauri bargained for 2.04 per cent of the equity of a public company holding IAMGOLD's interest in the Sadiola Concession, not merely 2.04 per cent of IAMGOLD's interest in the Concession itself. However, as he had no expert evidence of the value of Kinbauri's notional equity interest, he used 2.04 per cent of the value of the underlying asset as a proxy for the equity interest. That he did so is evident from para. 67 of his reasons.

> From the evidence at both segments of this trial, it is clear that the main contribution which Kinbauri was making to the intended amalgamation was the intangible asset of its status as a public company and its listing on the ASE. The main asset which IAMGOLD was bringing, was its interest in the Sadiola Concession. There was a relative paucity of evidence led by either party, however, to establish the value of the shares or of the underlying assets of Kinbauri and IAMGOLD at the date of the value of the shares or of the underlying assets of Kinbauri and IAMGOLD at the date of the Contract or of its breach. The analysis followed by the court in Asamera, in which shares of a publicly traded corporation are involved at every stage, simply does not lend itself to this case, in which there is no reliable evidence of the market price of the shares of either Kinbauri or IAMGOLD at the date of the Contract or of its breach. In this case, it will be necessary to consider the value of the underlying assets on the material available, for the purpose of determining any compensatory damages for Kinbauri.

[132] In the light of the limited evidence available to measure Kinbauri's damages at the date of breach (February 1991) or at the date Amalco was to be listed on the ASE (November 1991) or even two years after the date of breach (February 1993), the trial judge did not err in relying on the WGM report to assess Kinbauri's damages.

iii. The ten per cent contingency discount

[133] As Cronk J.A. notes, the issue here is not the amount of the discount but whether the trial judge should have applied any discount at all. The trial judge reduced Kinbauri's damages by ten per cent to account for the possibility that the ASE would not approve the amalgamation.

[134] At first blush it seems anomalous to discount Kinbauri's damages because of the possibility IAMGOLD would not obtain regulatory approval. The trial judge measured Kinbauri's damages not on the basis of an equity interest in a public company, but on the basis of an asset valuation report. The contingency discount is acceptable, however, because the asset valuation stood as a proxy for Kinbauri's equity interest.

[135] I would dismiss the appeal and the cross-appeal.

COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO

Goudge, Cronk and LaForme JJ.A.

BETWEEN:

Kipfinch Developments Ltd.

Plaintiff (Appellant)

and

Westwood Mall (Mississauga) Limited

Defendant (Respondent)

Harvin D. Pitch, for the appellant

Geoff R. Hall and Adam Ship for the respondent

Heard: December 14, 2009

On appeal from the judgment of Justice Herman Wilton-Siegel of the Superior Court of Justice, dated September 3, 2008, with reasons reported at (2008), 50 B.L.R. (4th) 233.

By the Court:

[1] The appellant Kipfinch Developments Ltd. (“Kipfinch”) entered into an agreement on April 16, 2004 to purchase the Westwood Mall from the respondent Westwood Mall (Mississauga) Limited (“Westwood”). Thirty percent of the Mall was empty, presenting the appellant with the opportunity to revitalize and lease-up an additional 90,000 square feet. The agreement entitled Kipfinch to carry out environmental testing as part of its due diligence. It also provided that unless Kipfinch gave notice that its due diligence entitlement was satisfied or waived by June 15, 2004(later extended to June 16, 2004), the agreement would terminate at that point.

[2] In May 2004, Westwood declined to permit Kipfinch to carry out its environmental testing and as a result the agreement came to an end on June 16, 2004. Kipfinch then sued Westwood for breach of contract.

[3] Wilton-Siegel J. concluded that Westwood breached its contractual obligation by refusing to allow Kipfinch to conduct its environmental testing. On appeal, Westwood does not challenge this finding, and the appeal proceeded on the basis of Westwood’s liability for damages for breach of the agreement.

[4] The trial judge determined damages by applying the principle of lost chance. He found that the breach caused Kipfinch the loss of the contractual opportunity to close the transaction. He determined that had the breach not occurred, Kipfinch would have had a 50 per cent probability of closing the transaction.

[5] The trial judge then quantified the damages Kipfinch suffered. He did so as of the date the agreement terminated, using a discounted cash flow methodology, but he excluded the recovery of certain management expenses that Kipfinch argued it would have been able to pass on to the tenants. He concluded that if the transaction had closed, Kipfinch would have realized the profit or gain of approximately $660,000. Given the 50 per cent probability of closing, he awarded damages to Kipfinch in the amount of $330,000.

[7] The appellant's first challenge is to the finding that, had the breach not occurred, there was a 50 per cent chance that the transaction would have closed. It argues that this conclusion constitutes a palpable and overriding error of fact.

[8] In reaching this conclusion, the trial judge examined three separate contingencies that each constituted a risk to the successful conclusion of the transaction: the risk that Kipfinch's environmental testing could not be successfully completed due to physical conditions; the risk that this testing would not delineate environmental contamination sufficiently to allow a satisfactory report to Kipfinch's lenders; and the risk that the testing would reveal contamination that exceeded the threshold considered acceptable by the lenders. On the basis of expert evidence, the trial judge evaluated each risk to be not merely speculative, but instead a real, although not significant, possibility.

[9] The appellant does not contest these individual findings, nor is there any basis to do so. Rather, the appellant submits that, taken together, they do not justify the conclusion that the transaction had a 50 per cent chance of closing.

[10] We do not agree. The trial judge simply took three small but separate risks that the transaction would fail and accumulated them to reach his conclusion that there was a 50 per cent chance of failure, which he then expressed in positive terms as a 50 per cent possibility that the transaction would close. He did not err in proceeding in this way. His conclusion of a 50 per cent possibility of closing is not a palpable and overriding error.

[11] The appellant also attacks this conclusion by saying that the trial judge should have applied the principle of omnia praesumuntur contra spoliatorem (i.e., everything is presumed against the wrongdoer) where the nature of the wrong makes it difficult for a plaintiff to establish a loss. The appellant states that this principle required the trial judge to discount Westwood's expert evidence on the three risks to the transaction, because Westwood prevented Kipfinch from establishing the facts with certainty when it prevented Kipfinch from conducting environmental testing.

[12] Again we disagree. The issue addressed here was causation: was the lost chance caused by the appellant's breach of contract? On this issue, the appellant can get no assistance from the above legal principle. The appellant could not rely on any presumption, but was required to prove on a balance of probabilities that its projections of risk were a close approximation of what would have occurred had the contract been

[13] While, in an appropriate case, the principle can be relied on by a plaintiff when the issue is the quantification of damages, that is not what the appellant seeks here. The respondent's refusal to permit the appellant to do environmental testing is simply irrelevant to the task of quantifying the value of the 50 per cent chance that the transaction would close. The principle has no application to the quantification of damages in this case.

[14] The appellant's second challenge is to the trial judge's assessment of damages as of the date the transaction terminated, rather than a date two years later when the leasing-up of the empty space would have been completed. Use of the later date would encompass the general increase in property values that occurred over those two years.

[15] We see no error in the way the trial judge proceeded. The general rule is that contract damages are assessed at the date of breach: see: Kinbauri Gold Corp. v. IAMGOLD International African Mining Gold Corp. (2004), 246 D.L.R. (4th) 595 (Ont. C.A.). Moreover, the trial judge found as a fact that the general increase in property values was not in the contemplation of the parties when they made the agreement. There is no basis to interfere with the trial judge's use of the June 2004 date.

[16] The appellant's third challenge is to the trial judge's assessment of damages based on a discounted cash flow methodology. However, there was ample expert evidence to support his conclusion that this most accurately quantified the loss. There is no basis to interfere with this finding of fact.

[17] Finally, the appellant submits that the trial judge erred in excluding the recovery of certain management expenses from the quantification of damages. The trial judge did so because he found that the capital expenditures contemplated by the appellant were to be amortized and charged to the tenants over the first five years of the project, thereby creating tenant resistance to also paying certain management expenses that Kipfinch sought to pass on to them.

[18] We agree with the appellant that the trial judge based his conclusion on a misapprehension of the evidence, although it is fair to say that this evidence was presented less clearly than it might have been. The capital expenditures were in fact to be amortized and charged to the tenants over nine years, not five years. In at least some of those nine years, these amounts were projected to be considerably lower than would have resulted from the five-year period used by the trial judge. Arguably this would reduce tenant resistance to paying for additional management expenses, and possibly allow recovery by Kipfinch of expenses excluded by the trial judge.

[19] We would therefore set aside the trial judge's decision to exclude the recovery of certain management expenses from the quantification of damages, since it was based on a misapprehension of the evidence. We would direct a new trial on the issue of the recovery of management expenses, as both parties suggested we should if we reached this conclusion.

[20] In the result, the appeal is allowed on this issue, but is otherwise dismissed.

[21] The respondent has succeeded on three issues, and the appellant on one. In these circumstances, we would award the respondent half of its partial indemnity costs which we would fix at $12,500 all inclusive. We would leave the trial costs unaltered, but leave to the new trial judge the costs of the issue that we have ordered to be tried.

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF ALBERTA, APPELLATE DIVISION

Damages — Agreements concerning shares and operations of oil exploration company — Breach of contract by company's chief officer to return shares loaned to him by another company — Appraisal of damages — Applicable principles.

These appeals arose out of a long series of agreements concerning the shares and operations of the appellant, Asamera Oil Corporation Ltd., which company was in one way or another involved in exploration for oil in Indonesia. Three separate actions were commenced by the parties.

1. Baud Corporation, N.V. v. Thomas L. Brook, (commenced on July 26, 1960) wherein Baud, a wholly owned subsidiary of Sea Oil & General Corporation (SOG), sought the return of 125,000 Asamera shares from Brook, the president and chief officer of Asamera. Baud alleged that 125,000 Asamera shares were loaned

EN APPEL DE LA DIVISION D'APPEL DE LA COUR SUPRÊME DE L'ALBERTA

Dommages-intérêts — Accords concernant les actions et les opérations d'une corporation d'exploration pétrolière — Rupture d'un contrat en raison du défaut du directeur général de restituer les actions que lui avait prêtées une autre compagnie — Évaluation des dommages-intérêts — Principes applicables.

Ces pourvois résultent d'une longue série d'accords concernant les actions et les opérations de l'appelante, Asamera Oil Corporation Ltd., une compagnie engagée de diverses façons dans l'exploitation pétrolière en Indonésie. Les parties ont intenté trois actions distinctes.

1. Baud Corporation, N.V. c. Thomas L. Brook, intentée le 26 juillet 1960, dans laquelle Baud, une filiale en propriété exclusive de Sea Oil & General Corporation (SOG), demande que l'intimé Brook (qui, à toutes les époques en cause, était le président directeur général d'Asamera) lui rende 125,000 actions d'Asa-by it in October and November of 1957 to Brook under an agreement dated November 10, 1958, requiring their return by the end of 1959. In addition, Baud claimed damages in the sum of $150,750 representing the difference in the market value of the 125,000 shares between the date upon which they were to have been returned and the date of the writ.

2. Asamera Oil Corporation Ltd. v. Sea Oil & General Corporation and Baud Corporation, N.V., (commenced July 27, 1960) wherein Asamera sought rescission of the basic agreement between the two groups of entrepreneurs represented by Baud on the one hand, and Brook on the other. Under the basic agreement, entered into on June 18, 1957, Baud was to receive 3,500,000 shares of Asamera, and SOG was to receive 500,000 shares in that company. In return Asamera was to receive $250,000 together with 196 shares in an Indonesian corporation known as Nusantara, which shares represented a 49 per cent interest therein.

3. Baud Corporation, N.V. v. Thomas L. Brook, (commenced December 6, 1966) wherein Baud repeated its allegations as asserted in Action No. 1, and claimed the return of 125,000 Asamera shares, which Brook was required to return under the agreements mentioned in Action No. 1. The third action arose out of the allegation by Brook that the first action was premature since the date for the return of the shares had been extended by the parties until December 31, 1960. In addition to its claim for the return of the shares, Baud claimed damages in the sum of $400,000. An amendment to the statement of claim whereby the damage claim was raised to $6,000,000 was allowed at trial. In this action, Brook counterclaimed for substantially the same relief sought by him in Action No. 2.

Held: 1. The appeal of Baud from the judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Alberta affirming the dismissal at trial, because premature, of its action of July 26, 1960, against Brook should be dismissed. 2. The appeal of Asamera from the judgment of the Appellate Division affirming dismissal of its action of July 27, 1960, against SOG and Baud should be dismissed. 3. The appeal of Baud from the judgment of the Appellate Division affirming the judgment of the trial judge awarding it damages of $250,000 against Brook should be allowed and there should be substituted an award of damages to the appellant of $812,500.

The first action was dismissed by the trial judge when he found that there was indeed an agreement extending the loan of the 125,000 Asamera shares beyond the mera. Baud prétend avoir prêté à l'intimé, Brook, en octobre et novembre 1957, 125,000 actions d'Asamera en conformité d'un accord daté du 10 novembre 1958, qui prévoyait leur restitution avant la fin de 1959. En outre, Baud réclame des dommages-intérêts au montant de $150,750, au titre de la variation de la valeur marchande des 125,000 actions entre la date où elles devaient être rendues et la date du bref.

2. Asamera Oil Corporation Ltd. c. Sea Oil & General Corporation et Baud Corporation, N.V., intentée le 27 juillet 1960. Asamera y réclame la rescision de l'accord principal conclu entre les deux groupes d'entrepreneurs, représentés respectivement par Baud et par Brook. En vertu de cet accord (conclu le 18 juin 1957), Baud et SOG devaient respectivement recevoir 3,500,000 et 500,000 actions d'Asamera. En contrepartie, Asamera devait recevoir $250,000 et 196 actions de Nusantara, une compagnie indonésienne, soit une participation de 49 pour cent.

3. Baud Corporation, N.V. c. Thomas L. Brook, intentée le 6 décembre 1966. Dans cette action, Baud reprend les allégations formulées dans l'action nº 1 et réclame la restitution des 125,000 actions d'Asamera que Brook devait rendre en vertu des accords mentionnés dans l'action nº 1. Cette troisième action résulte de ce que Brook affirme que l'action initiale était prématurée puisque les parties avaient convenu de proroger la date de restitution des actions jusqu'au 31 décembre 1960. En plus du recouvrement des actions, Baud réclame des dommages-intérêts au montant de $400,000. Sur autorisation du tribunal de première instance, la déclaration a été modifiée pour porter le montant des dommages-intérêts réclamés à $6,000,000. Dans cette action, Brook a fait une demande reconventionnelle pour obtenir à peu près le même redressement que dans l'action nº 2.

Arrêt: 1. Le pourvoi de Baud à l'encontre du jugement de la Division d'appel de la Cour suprême de l'Alberta confirmant le rejet de l'action intentée contre Brook le 26 juillet 1960 est, parce qu'elle était prématurée, rejeté. 2. Le pourvoi d'Asamera à l'encontre du jugement de la Division d'appel confirmant le rejet de l'action intentée contre SOG et Baud le 27 juillet 1960 est rejeté. 3. Le pourvoi de Baud à l'encontre du jugement de la Division d'appel confirmant le jugement de première instance condamnant Brook à payer $250,000 de dommages-intérêts est accueilli et le montant des dommages-intérêts payables à l'appelante est porté à $812,500.

Le savant juge de première instance a rejeté la première action au motif qu'une entente prorogeait effectivement le contrat de prêt des 125,000 actions d'Asamera original expiry date, December 31, 1959, until December 31, 1960. The record included considerable evidence in support of such a finding which was confirmed on appeal. There being no demonstration of any error in law in the Courts below in so disposing of Action No. 1, the appeal with reference to that action should be dismissed.

The trial judge dismissed the second action, finding that the parties had settled their differences in respect of this action by an agreement dated October 28, 1958. The evidence amply supported the finding of the trial judge relating to the scope and effect of the settlement agreement. This finding was confirmed on appeal. Accordingly, the appeal to this Court with respect to the second action and the counterclaim by the respondent in Action No. 3 should be dismissed.

As to Action No. 3, the trial judge dismissed Baud's claims in detinue and conversion and assessed damages on the basis that Brook's failure to deliver constituted a breach of contract. The action in substance was a simple case of breach of contract to return 125,000 Asamera shares and the claims made and the issues arising in this action should be disposed of on that basis. The circumstances were such that damages constituted an adequate remedy.

The Court approached the matter of the proper appraisal of the damages assessable in the peculiar circumstances of this case on the following basis: that the same principles of remoteness will apply to the claims made whether they sound in tort or contract subject only to special knowledge, understanding or relationship of the contracting parties or to any terms express or implied of the contractual arrangement relating to damages recoverable on breach; that Baud was under the general duty to mitigate its losses and may not escape this duty by relying interminably on an injunction obtained by it in 1960, restraining the sale of 125,000 Asamera shares held by Brook; that the specific duty to mitigate and to crystallize its claim for damages within a reasonable time of the breach of contract by bringing action seeking appropriate remedies and to prosecute such action with due diligence, was qualified or postponed by Brook's request of Baud sometime prior to 1966 to refrain from enforcing its claims; that any postponement of such requirement to prosecute and to acquire replacement shares had come to an end at the latest on the awareness of Baud that the defaulting party was not only in breach of the duty to return the shares but had disposed of shares at least equal in au-delà de la date initiale d'expiration, soit le 31 décembre 1959, jusqu'au 31 décembre 1960. Le dossier contient une preuve volumineuse à l'appui de cette conclusion, confirmée en appel. La preuve ne révélant aucune erreur de droit dans la façon dont les tribunaux d'instance inférieure sont arrivés à cette conclusion quant à l'action nº 1, le pourvoi relatif à cette action est rejeté.

Le savant juge de première instance a rejeté la deuxième action, concluant que les parties avaient réglé leurs différends relatifs à l'action nº 2 dans un règlement daté du 28 octobre 1958. La preuve étayait amplement cette conclusion du juge de première instance quant à la portée et à l'effet du règlement, conclusion qui a été confirmée en appel. En conséquence, le pourvoi interjeté devant cette Cour relativement à la deuxième action ainsi que la demande reconventionnelle de l'intimé dans l'action nº 3 sont rejetés.

En ce qui concerne l'action nº 3, le savant juge de première instance a rejeté les réclamations de Baud en restitution et pour appropriation illégale, et a évalué les dommages-intérêts en tenant pour acquis que l'omission de Brook de rendre les actiors constituait une rupture de contrat. En fait, l'action est un cas de simple rupture de contrat, savoir de l'engagement de rendre 125,000 actions d'Asamera, et les réclamations et les questions soulevées dans cette affaire doivent être tranchées sur cette base. Dans ces circonstances, l'adjudication de dommages-intérêts est un redressement approprié.

La Cour a abordé comme suit la question de l'évaluation des dommages exigibles dans les circonstances particulières de cette affaire: les principes relatifs au caractère prévisible s'appliquent également que la réclamation soit fondée sur la responsabilité délictuelle ou contractuelle, sous réserve cependant de connaissances, ententes ou relations particulières entre les parties contractantes ou de toute disposition expresse ou implicite dans le contrat au sujet des dommages recouvrables en cas d'inexécution; Baud avait l'obligation générale de limiter le préjudice et ne peut s'en dégager en invoquant indéfiniment l'injonction de 1960 interdisant à Brook de vendre 125,000 actions d'Asamera; l'obligation spécifique de Baud de limiter le préjudice et d'établir sa demande de dommages-intérêts en intentant l'action appropriée dans un délai raisonnable après la rupture et en procédant avec diligence a été repoussée dans le temps parce que Brook lui avait demandé, avant 1966, de ne pas poursuivre l'affaire; Baud aurait dû corriger son manque de diligence à poursuivre son action et à acheter des actions de remplacement dès qu'elle a appris que la partie contrevenante refusait non seulement de lui rendre les actions, mais en avait vendu un nombre identique; le retard apporté par Baud à l'achat d'actions number to those loaned by Baud; that any postponement of the duty to acquire replacement shares which may have been due to the sharp reduction in the value of the shares which occurred during the loan, was ended with the revival in values on the public market at least by the end of 1966; that a plaintiff in the position of Baud may not successfully assert throughout the years of litigation a right to specific performance of the contract to redeliver the subject-matter of the contract and at the same time seek to avoid or reduce his losses on the grounds that to do so by buying replacement shares would involve him in investing his funds in the shares of a company managed or dominated by his adversary, Brook; that having regard to the nature of a common share neither the terms of the injunction or the loan contract, nor the action by Brook in disposing of shares in number equal to those loaned, have any effect on the characterization of the rights of Baud or the obligation of Brook throughout this long and tortuous transaction; that damages are an adequate remedy and that a court in these complex and particular circumstances will not invoke the extraordinary remedies of equity.

The application of these principles and determinations to the particular circumstances in this case requires a determination of the damages payable by Brook on the assumption that Baud ought to have crystallized these damages by the acquisition of replacement shares so as to minimize the avoidable losses flowing from the deprivation by Brook of Baud's opportunity to market the 125,000 shares. Such share purchases should have taken place within a reasonable time after the date of breach. Having regard to all the special circumstances, the time for purchase was the fall of 1966 when Baud was by its own admission free from any agreed restraint not to press its claims against Brook. It would be unreasonable to impose on Baud the burden of going into the market and acquiring replacement shares at a time when the litigation of its claims was in a dormant state at Brook's request. Furthermore Baud acknowledged that by the fall of 1966 the fortunes of Asamera had improved and this had begun to be reflected in the market price of its shares. In short, the appellant is not entitled in law to any compensation for the loss of opportunity to sell its shares after that date. Thereafter its loss of this opportunity is of its own making. The theory of such a damage award is to provide the funds needed to replace the shares at the time the law required it to do so in order to avoid an accumulating claim. There should be an allowance of a reasonable time to permit the organization of the finances and the mechanics required for the careful acquisition of 125,000 shares either by a series of relatively small purchases or by negotiated block purchases. This would carry the matter into the fall of 1967. By de remplacement justifié par la baisse importante de la valeur des actions à l'époque du prêt ne tient plus après la fin de 1966, les actions ayant dès lors repris de la valeur; un demandeur dans la situation de Baud ne peut pendant toutes ces années à la fois prétendre avoir droit à l'exécution intégrale du contrat de restitution des biens et tenter d'éviter de limiter le préjudice en invoquant le fait que l'achat d'actions de remplacement l'obligerait à investir dans une compagnie gérée ou contrôlée par son adversaire, Brook; compte tenu de la nature d'une action ordinaire, ni des dispositions de l'injonction ni celles du contrat de prêt, ni le fait que Brook ait vendu le même nombre d'actions que celles prêtées, n'ont d'effet sur le caractère des droits de Baud ou sur les obligations de Brook aux termes d'une opération aussi complexe; l'adjudication de dommages-intérêts est une solution adéquate et, dans des circonstances aussi particulières que complexes, la Cour ne doit pas recourir aux redressements extraordinaires prévus en equity.

L'application de ces principes et solutions aux circonstances particulières de l'espèce exige une évaluation des dommages-intérêts payables par Brook fondée sur la supposition que Baud aurait dû établir les dommages en achetant des actions de remplacement de façon à limiter les pertes évitables résultant de l'impossibilité pour Baud, du fait de Brook, de mettre les 125,000 actions sur le marché. Cet achat d'actions aurait dû être effectué dans un délai raisonnable après la rupture du contrat. Compte tenu de toutes les circonstances particulières susmentionnées, cet achat aurait dû être effectué à l'automne de 1966 alors que Baud, de son propre aveu, n'était plus assujettie à l'entente conclue avec Brook de ne pas poursuivre l'affaire. Il ne serait pas raisonnable en effet de s'attendre à ce que Baud ait acheté des actions de remplacement alors que les procédures judiciaires étaient en veilleuse, à la demande même de Brook. En outre, Baud a reconnu qu'à l'automne de 1966, la situation d'Asamera s'était améliorée, résultant en une augmentation de la valeur marchande de ses actions. Bref l'appelante n'a aucun droit à une indemnisation pour la perte de la possibilité de vendre les actions après cette date. Elle est alors devenue l'auteur du préjudice qu'elle a subi. Le principe sous-jacent à l'adjudication des dommages-intérêts est d'accorder une indemnisation correspondant au prix de remplacement des actions à leurs cours au moment où la demanderesse était tenue en droit de les remplacer afin d'éviter l'accroissement de sa réclamation. On doit laisser à la demanderesse un délai raisonnable pour procéder de façon ordonnée au financement et à l'acquisition des this time the price had risen to a range of $5 to $6. Making allowance for the upward pressure on the market price which would be generated by the purchase of such a large number of shares on a relatively low volume stock, the purchase price would surely have exceeded the $6 price reached in mid-1967 without any market intervention by Baud. For this factor an allowance of $1 per share should be made. Taking into account the effect of market intervention by Baud, the median price during the period from late 1966 to mid-1967, adjusted accordingly, would be about $6.50, and the damages should be awarded to Baud on that basis; that is, the total damages for breach of agreement to return the Asamera shares should amount to $812,500. In weighing the magnitude of this award one should not lose sight of the essential fact that Brook at any time right down to trial could, if he had remained in compliance with the injunction of July 1960, have avoided this result or the risk of this award by delivering from any source 125,000 Asamera shares.

As held by the Courts below, Brook's claim for damages in respect of the undertaking given by Baud upon the issuance of the interim injunction in July 1960 should be dismissed.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

ESTEY J.—These appeals arise out of a long series of agreements concerning the shares and operations of the appellant, Asamera Oil Corporation Ltd. (hereinafter referred to as Asamera), which company was in one way or another involved in exploration for oil in Indonesia. Three separate actions were commenced by the parties.

125,000 actions d'Asamera, soit par de petits achats soit en bloc. Ceci nous mène à l'automne de 1967. A ce moment-là, la valeur des actions était de $5 à $6. Compte tenu de la tendance à la hausse qu'aurait entraîné l'achat d'un aussi grand nombre d'actions dans un marché restreint, le prix des actions aurait certainement dépassé les $6 l'unité atteints vers la mi-1967, sans que Baud intervienne sur le marché. En conséquence, la somme d'un dollar est ajoutée à la valeur des actions à cette date. Prenant en considération l'effet d'une intervention de Baud sur le marché, la valeur moyenne des actions entre la fin de l'année 1966 et le milieu de l'année 1967 serait d'environ $6.50 et c'est ce chiffre qui doit fonder les dommages-intérêts dus à Baud; en conséquence, le montant total des dommages-intérêts dus pour la nonrestitution des actions d'Asamera est de $812,500. Devant ce chiffre important, il ne faut pas oublier que jusqu'au procès, Brook aurait pu, s'il avait respecté l'injonction prononcée en juillet 1960, éviter le risque et les effets d'une telle décision en procédant à la remise de 125,000 actions d'Asamera, sans égard à leur provenance.

Comme l'ont décidé les tribunaux d'instance inférieure, la réclamation de Brook en dommages-intérêts relativement à l'engagement pris par Baud lors de la délivrance de l'injonction interlocutoire de juillet 1960 doit être rejetée.

POURVOIS interjetés à l'encontre d'un arrêt de la Division d'appel de la Cour suprême de l'Alberta[1] rejetant des appels d'un jugement du juge Kirby relativement à trois actions entendues ensemble. Pourvois rejetés relativement à deux actions; pourvoi accueilli relativement à la troisième action et pourvoi incident rejeté.

P. B. C. Pepper, c.r., et J. L. McDougall, pour les demanderesses, appelantes.

Le jugement de la Cour a été rendu par

1. Baud Corporation, N.V. (Plaintiff) v. Thomas L. Brook (Defendant), (commenced on July 26, 1960) wherein Baud, as it shall hereinafter be called, (which is a wholly owned subsidiary of the Sea Oil & General Corporation) sought the return of 125,000 Asamera shares from the respondent, Brook (who at all material times was the president and chief officer of Asamera). Baud alleged that 125,000 Asamera shares were loaned by it in October and November of 1957 to the respondent, Brook, under an agreement dated November 10, 1958, requiring their return by the end of 1959. In addition, Baud claimed damages in the sum of $150,750 representing the difference in the market value of the 125,000 shares between the date upon which they were to have been returned and the date of the writ.

2. Asamera Oil Corporation Ltd. (Plaintiff) v. Sea Oil & General Corporation and Baud Corporation, N.V. (Defendants), (commenced on July 27, 1960). This action was instituted the day after Action No. 1. In it Asamera sought rescission of the basic agreement between the two groups of entrepreneurs represented by Baud on the one hand, and Brook on the other. The effect of rescission, if granted, would be the cancellation of treasury shares issued by Asamera to Baud and Sea Oil & General Corporation Ltd. pursuant to this agreement.

3. Baud Corporation, N.V. (Plaintiff) v. Thomas L. Brook (Defendant), (commenced on December 6, 1966). In this action, Baud repeated its allegations as asserted in Action No. 1, and claimed the return of 125,000 Asamera shares, which the respondent, Brook, was required to return under the agreements mentioned in Action No. 1. The third action arose out of the allegation by the respondent in Action No. 1 that the first action was premature since the date for the return of the shares had been extended by the parties until December 31, 1960. In addition to its claim for the return of the shares, Baud claimed damages in the sum of $400,000. An amendment of the statement of claim whereby the damage claim was raised to $6,000,000 was allowed at trial. In this action, the respondent, Brook, counterclaimed for

1. Baud Corporation, N.V. (Demanderesse) c. Thomas L. Brook (Défendeur), intentée le 26 juillet 1960, dans laquelle Baud (comme elle sera ci-après désignée) une filiale en propriété exclusive de Sea Oil & General Corporation, demande que l'intimé Brook (qui, à toutes les époques en cause, était le président directeur général d'Asamera) lui rende 125,000 actions d'Asamera. Baud prétend avoir prêté à l'intimé, Brook, en octobre et novembre 1957, 125,000 actions d'Asamera en conformité d'un accord daté du 10 novembre 1958, qui prévoyait leur restitution avant la fin de 1959. En outre, Baud réclame des dommages-intérêts au montant de $150,750, au titre de la variation de la valeur marchande des 125,000 actions entre la date où elles devaient être rendues et la date du bref.

2. Asamera Oil Corporation Ltd. (Demanderesse) c. Sea Oil & General Corporation et Baud Corporation, N.V. (Défenderesses), intentée le 27 juillet 1960. Cette action fut introduite le lendemain de l'action nº 1. Asamera y réclame la rescision de l'accord principal conclu entre les deux groupes d'entrepreneurs, représentés respectivement par Baud et par Brook. Si elle était accordée, la rescision aurait pour effet d'annuler les actions de trésorerie émises par Asamera en faveur de Baud et de Sea Oil & General Corporation Ltd. en vertu de l'accord.

3. Baud Corporation, N.V. (Demanderesse) c. Thomas L. Brook (Défendeur), intentée le 6 décembre 1966. Dans cette action, Baud reprend les allégations formulées dans l'action nº 1 et réclame la restitution des 125,000 actions d'Asamera que l'intimé Brook devait rendre en vertu des accords mentionnés dans l'action nº 1. Cette troisième action résulte de ce que l'intimé dans l'action nº 1 affirme que l'action initiale était prématurée puisque les parties avaient convenu de proroger la date de restitution des actions jusqu'au 31 décembre 1960. En plus du recouvrement des actions, Baud réclame des dommages-intérêts au montant de $400,000. Sur autorisation du tribunal de première instance, la déclaration a été modifiée pour porter le montant des dommages-intérêts réclamés à $6,000,000. Dans cette action, l'intimé substantially the same relief sought by him in Action No. 2.

It is convenient to deal first with the issues raised in Action No. 2. Under the formative agreement, of which rescission is sought by Asamera in the second action, entered into on June 18, 1957 (hereafter called the basic agreement), Baud was to receive 3,500,000 shares of Asamera, and Sea Oil & General Corporation (hereafter referred to as SOG) was to receive 500,000 shares in that company. In return, Asamera was to receive $250,000 together with 196 shares in an Indonesian corporation known as Nusantara, which shares represented a 49 per cent interest therein. The transaction was closed on September 9, 1957, when the 4,000,000 shares were issued from the treasury of Asamera and, thereafter, the sum of $250,000 was advanced to Asamera and action was taken to deposit the 196 shares in Nusantara in a repository subject to Asamera's control. 500,000 shares were issued to SOG. 2,000,000 of the 3,500,000 shares issued by Asamera to Baud were subject to an escrow agreement for a period of six months from September 9, 1957. On February 5, 1958, the time for holding these shares in escrow was extended to November 1958.

In Action No. 2, Asamera alleged a total failure of consideration under the basic agreement, and accordingly, claimed that the agreement was null and void ab initio. In the alternative Asamera claimed that the performance of the agreement had been frustrated, and thus that the contract was voidable at its option. The learned trial judge dismissed this action, finding that the parties had settled their differences in respect of Action No. 2 by an agreement dated October 28, 1958. The Court of Appeal of Alberta reached the same conclusion.

Counsel for Brook in this Court reasserted his submissions that there was an entire failure of consideration under the basic agreement and that Asamera "received nothing whatever of any value from Baud in exchange for ..." the 1,500,000 shares which remained outstanding in Baud's hands after the aforementioned settlement agreement of October 28, 1958. As explained earlier, Brook a fait une demande reconventionnelle pour obtenir à peu près le même redressement que dans l'action nº 2.

Il convient de traiter d'abord des questions soulevées dans l'action nº 2. L'accord initial dont Asamera demande la rescision dans la deuxième action a été conclu le 18 juin 1957. En vertu de cet accord (ci-après appelé l'accord principal), Baud et Sea & Oil General Corporation (ci-après appelée SOG) devaient respectivement recevoir 3,500,000 et 500,000 actions d'Asamera. En contrepartie, Asamera devait recevoir $250,000 et 196 actions de Nusantara, une compagnie indonésienne, soit une participation de 49 pour cent. L'affaire a été conclue le 9 septembre 1957, alors que Asamera a délivré les 4,000,000 d'actions. Par la suite, Asamera reçut $250,000 et les dispositions nécessaires furent prisent pour placer les 196 actions de Nusantara en dépôt sous le contrôle d'Asamera. 500,000 actions furent émises au profit de SOG. Des 3,500,000 actions émises par Asamera au profit de Baud, 2,000,000 étaient assujetties à un contrat d'entiercement pour une période de 6 mois commençant le 9 septembre 1957. Le 5 février 1958, cette période fut prorogée jusqu'en novembre 1958.

Dans l'action nº 2, Asamera prétend que le contrat principal est nul ab initio pour absence totale de contrepartie. Subsidiairement, elle prétend que puisque le contrat n'a pas été intégralement exécuté, il est susceptible d'annulation à sa demande. Le savant juge de première instance a rejeté cette action, concluant que les parties avaient réglé leurs différends relatifs à l'action nº 2 dans un règlement daté du 28 octobre 1958. La Cour d'appel de l'Alberta est parvenue à la même conclusion.

Devant cette Cour, l'avocat de Brook a de nouveau prétendu qu'il y avait eu absence totale de contrepartie à l'accord principal et que Asamera [TRADUCTION] «n'avait rien reçu de valeur de Baud en contrepartie des ...» 1,500,000 actions qui étaient demeurées en circulation et que Baud avait toujours en sa possession après le règlement du 28 octobre 1958, susmentionné. Comme je l'ai the parties had agreed to escrow 2,000,000 of the 3,500,000 Asamera shares in order to ensure the performance by Baud of the transfer of the Nusantara shares which could not apparently be completed on September 9, 1957. Under the settlement agreement, the 2,000,000 escrowed shares were cancelled, leaving outstanding in the hands of SOG 500,000 Asamera shares, and in the hands of Baud, 1,500,000 shares.

Counsel for Brook bases his plea of total failure of consideration on two points:

(a) The Nusantara shares were never transferred to Asamera as required by the agreement of 1957; and,

(b) Baud did not deliver to Asamera, either through Nusantara or otherwise, any exploration permits for Indonesia.

The first item relating to the failure to deliver the 49 per cent interest in Nusantara is founded on what transpired after the closing under the 1957 agreement on September 9. At that time Baud delivered an irrevocable direction to the holder of the 196 shares of Nusantara to hold them thereafter for the exclusive account, and subject to the order of Asamera only. The trial judge found that the deposit of the Nusantara shares in the bank in Djakarta, which resulted in the acquisition by Asamera of an interest in four exploration licences held by Nusantara, was good consideration for Asamera's promise to issue treasury shares to Baud and SOG. In any event it is unnecessary to determine this issue. The learned trial judge determined that any and all claims outstanding between these parties on October 28, 1958, including any claims with reference to the Nusantara shares and escrow arrangements, were mutually released pursuant to the aforementioned settlement agreement. The evidence in the record amply supports, in my respectful view, this finding of the learned trial judge relating to the scope and effect of the settlement agreement. This finding was confirmed on appeal. I would dismiss the appeal to this Court with respect to the second action and the counterclaim by the respondent in Action No. 3.

déjà indiqué, les parties avaient convenu de l'entiercement de 2,000,000 des 3,500,000 actions d'Asamera afin de garantir le transfert des actions de Nusantara par Baud, qui ne semblait pas pouvoir se faire le 9 septembre 1957. Aux termes du règlement, les 2,000,000 d'actions entiercées étaient annulées, ce qui laissait en circulation les 500,000 actions d'Asamera appartenant à SOG et les 1,500,000 actions appartenant à Baud.

L'avocat de Brook fonde sa défense d'absence totale de contrepartie sur deux points:

a) Les actions de Nusantara n'ont jamais été transférées à Asamera comme l'exigeait l'accord de 1957; et

b) Baud n'a pas remis à Asamera les permis d'exploration en Indonésie, ni par l'intermédiaire de Nusantara ni autrement.

Le premier point relatif au défaut de transférer la participation de 49 pour cent dans Nusantara est fondé sur ce qui s'est produit après la conclusion de l'accord du 9 septembre 1957. A cette époque, Baud a donné des instructions irrévocables au détenteur des 196 actions de Nusantara, lui demandant de détenir les actions pour le compte exclusif et à l'entière disposition d'Asamera. Le juge de première instance a conclu que le dépôt des actions de Nusantara à une banque de Djakarta, qui a assuré à Asamera une participation dans quatre licences d'exploration détenues par Nusantara, constituait une contrepartie valable pour la promesse d'Asamera d'émettre des actions de trésorerie en faveur de Baud et SOG. Quoi qu'il en soit, il n'est pas nécessaire de trancher cette question. Le savant juge de première instance a décidé que le 28 octobre 1958, toutes les réclamations en litige entre les parties, y compris les réclamations relatives aux actions de Nusantara et à leur entiercement, avaient été résolues par le règlement susmentionné. Avec égards, je considère que la preuve au dossier étaye amplement cette conclusion du juge de première instance quant à la portée et à l'effet du règlement, conclusion qui a été confirmée en appel. Je suis donc d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi interjeté devant cette Cour relativement à la deuxième action ainsi que la demande reconventionnelle de l'intimé dans l'action nº 3.

The first action was dismissed by the learned trial judge when he found that there was indeed an agreement extending the loan of the 125,000 Asamera shares beyond the original expiry date, December 31, 1959, until December 31, 1960. The record includes considerable evidence in support of such a finding which was confirmed on appeal. There being no demonstration of any error in law in the Courts below in so disposing of Action No. 1, I would dismiss the appeal with reference to that action.

This leaves outstanding before this Court only the appeal from the disposition of Action No. 3. The issue in this action, despite the elaborate record, is very narrow. Brook raised several defences to the claim by Baud for the return of 125,000 Asamera shares. Brook took the position at trial that Baud had waived the return of the shares. The learned trial judge rejected this defence and I have discovered no error in principle which would justify appellate interference in what is a clear finding of fact on the evidence. Brook alleged also that the shares were not loaned to him by Baud but by its chief executive officer, Diamantidi, and therefore no action for recovery can be brought by Baud. The simple and short answer is that if the loan was mechanically made by Diamantidi, he did so as the agent of Baud. The option agreement itself and a prior letter agreement states that upon the expiry of the term of the option on December 31, 1959, the shares will be returned to Baud. The option agreement is signed on behalf of Baud by Diamantidi. In any event there was evidence, oral and written, of the fact that the loan of the shares had first been made by Baud to Diamantidi and then by Diamantidi to Brook. Such an arrangement (expressed to be for tax considerations) affords no defence to Brook to a demand by Baud for their return and, consequently, this defence must fail.

Le savant juge de première instance a rejeté la première action au motif qu'une entente prorogeait effectivement le contrat de prêt des 125,000 actions d'Asamera au-delà de la date initiale d'expiration, soit le 31 décembre 1959, jusqu'au 31 décembre 1960. Le dossier contient une preuve volumineuse à l'appui de cette conclusion, confirmée en appel. La preuve ne révélant aucune erreur de droit dans la façon dont les tribunaux d'instance inférieure sont arrivés à cette conclusion quant à l'action nº 1, je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi relatif à cette action.

Ceci ne laisse devant cette Cour que le pourvoi interjeté à l'encontre du jugement relatif à l'action nº 3. Malgré l'épaisseur du dossier, la question soumise à la Cour dans cette action est très limitée. Brook a invoqué plusieurs moyens de défense contre la demande de restitution des 125,000 actions d'Asamera présentée par Baud. En première instance, il a prétendu que Baud l'avait relevé de l'obligation de lui rendre ces actions. Le savant juge de première instance a rejeté ce moyen et je n'ai trouvé dans ce jugement aucune erreur de principe pouvant justifier la modification par une juridiction d'appel d'une conclusion de fait clairement fondée sur la preuve. Brook a également prétendu que les actions ne lui avaient pas été prêtées par Baud, mais par son directeur général, Diamantidi, et qu'en conséquence, Baud n'avait pas qualité pour intenter l'action en restitution. La réponse à cette prétention est vite trouvée: même s'il est matériellement exact que Diamantidi a fait le prêt, il agissait comme mandataire de Baud. L'option et une lettre d'entente antérieure à celle-ci précisent d'ailleurs qu'à la date de la levée de l'option, soit le 31 décembre 1959, les actions devaient être rendues à Baud. L'option est signée par Diamantidi au nom de Baud. Quoi qu'il en soit, la preuve orale et écrite établit que Baud a d'abord prêté les actions à Diamantidi qui les a à son tour prêtées à Brook. Cette façon de procéder (supposément fondée sur des considérations fiscales) ne permet pas à Brook d'opposer une défense valable à l'action en restitution des actions intentée par Baud et, en conséquence, ce moyen ne peut être retenu.

The learned trial judge appears to have found that Brook was in breach of his agreement when he failed to return the shares to Diamantidi; the Court of Appeal on the other hand found the breach to be the failure by Brook to return the shares to Baud. There is ample evidence to support the conclusion reached by the Court of Appeal. Indeed all the written evidence accords with this result and I respectfully agree with that Court on this point.

This leaves outstanding only the question of the remedy or remedies open to Baud. The action apparently proceeded on the basis that Brook, by his wrongful retention of the shares, was open to an action by Baud in detinue, or alternatively, in conversion because Brook had wrongfully disposed of the shares loaned to him. Brook admitted in his statement of defence, filed on July 6, 1967, that these shares had been sold, and further admitted on examination for discovery in May of 1968 that the sale had occurred in 1958. The trial judge found that the brokers, in an effort to protect their position, had sold shares of Asamera from the Brook account in December of 1957 and in January and February of 1958.

This phase of the matter is somewhat complicated by the fact that an injunction was issued by McLaurin C.J.T.D. in the Supreme Court of Alberta on July 27, 1960, which might be construed as restraining Brook from selling the 125,000 shares loaned to him by Baud. Brook's interpretation of his position under the injunction order was that he remained in compliance therewith so long as he held not less than 125,000 shares. There is nothing to indicate that on this interpretation he was in breach of the injunction. Baud, on the other hand, took the position that, as regards the action of detinue or conversion, it had the right to insist that Brook make whatever arrangements may have been necessary with the broker to retain the actual certificates forwarded to him by Baud. The order itself is ambiguous as to whether some retention in specie or a mere credit balance is required for compliance by Brook. The injunction issued by Chief Justice McLaurin in 1960 enjoins Brook from voting, or disposing of or dealing with "the Le juge de première instance semble avoir conclu que Brook avait violé l'accord en ne rendant pas les actions à Diamantidi; par contre, la Cour d'appel a jugé que Brook avait violé l'accord parce qu'il n'avait pas remis les actions à Baud. Une preuve considérable, en fait toute la preuve écrite, appuie la conclusion de la Cour d'appel et, avec égards, je partage son opinion sur cette question.

Il ne reste donc qu'à établir de quels recours Baud disposait. L'action a apparemment été instituée en tenant pour acquis qu'en détenant illégalement les actions, Brook s'exposait à une action en restitution ou, subsidiairement, à une action pour appropriation illégale, puisqu'il s'était départi sans droit des actions qui lui avaient été prêtées. Dans sa défense, déposée le 6 juillet 1967, Brook a admis que lesdites actions avaient été vendues et il a en outre admis, lors d'un interrogatoire préalable, en mai 1968, que la vente avait eu lieu en 1958. Le juge de première instance a conclu que les courtiers, cherchant à se protéger, avaient vendu des actions d'Asamera détenues au compte de Brook, en décembre 1957 et en janvier et février 1958.

La question se complique encore du fait que le 27 juillet 1960, le juge en chef McLaurin de la Division d'instruction de la Cour suprême de l'Alberta a délivré une injonction qu'on pourrait interpréter comme une interdiction à Brook de vendre les 125,000 actions prêtées par Baud. Brook prétend qu'il respectait l'injonction tant qu'il restait en possession d'au moins 125,000 actions. Si l'on adopte cette interprétation, rien n'indique qu'il ait violé l'injonction. En revanche, Baud soutient, relativement à l'action en restitution ou à l'action pour appropriation illégale, qu'elle avait le droit d'exiger de Brook qu'il prenne les mesures nécessaires avec son courtier afin de conserver les certificats qu'elle lui avait remis. L'injonction est ambiguë quant à savoir si Brook devait demeurer en possession de certificats déterminés ou si un simple solde créditeur suffisait. L'injonction délivrée par le juge en chef McLaurin en 1960 interdit à Brook de prendre part à un vote concernant [TRADUCTION] «les 125,000 actions ... mentionnées aux 125,000 shares . . . referred to in paragraphs 2 and 3 of the Statement of Claim . . .". Baud's reference in its statement of claim is directed to the 125,000 shares loaned to Brook in 1957. The injunction therefore may be construed as restraining dealing by Brook with those specific 125,000 shares. But this relation of the history of the transaction does not dispose of the matter. In the course of the trial the appellant moved for an order that the shares be deposited in court by Brook. This application was dismissed by the trial judge apparently on the basis that the retention of 125,000 shares by Brook would be sufficient compliance with the order. Since all the shares of Asamera are identical in class and conditions attaching thereto, no practical consideration arises which requires retention in specie, if that be technically possible, of the actual 125,000 shares loaned to Brook. The background against which the loan of the shares was made and the subsequent option granted for their purchase lead one to the view that should a determination of this issue become necessary, Baud is protected by the order and Brook from its contravention by the retention by Brook of a like number of shares of Asamera. To other aspects of this issue I will return later.

paragraphes 2 et 3 de la déclaration . . .» , de les vendre ou de les aliéner. Dans sa déclaration, Baud parle des 125,000 actions prêtées à Brook en 1957. L'injonction peut donc être interprétée comme interdisant à Brook d'aliéner ces 125,000 actions en particulier. Mais cet historique ne rend pas compte de toute la réalité. En première instance, l'appelante a demandé une ordonnance enjoignant à Brook de consigner les actions à la cour. Le juge de première instance a rejeté cette requête, au motif semble-t-il qu'en demeurant en possession de 125,000 actions, Brook se conformait suffisamment à l'ordonnance. Comme toutes les actions d'Asamera sont de même classe et son assujetties aux mêmes conditions, aucune considération pratique ne justifie la conservation des actions mêmes prêtées à Brook, à supposer que la chose soit matériellement possible. Les circonstances dans lesquelles on a d'abord consenti le prêt des actions et ensuite accordé une option d'achat à leur égard nous amènent à conclure, s'il devenait nécessaire de trancher cette question, que Baud est protégée par l'ordonnance et que Brook est à l'abri de tout reproche de violation en retenant le nombre spécifié d'actions d'Asamera. Je reviendrai aux autres aspects de cette question ultérieurement.

It is trite law that under the applicable statutes and common law a certificate is not in itself a share or shares of the corporation but only evidence thereof. (Vide Solloway v. Blumberger[2], per Rinfret J. at p. 167.) These shares are intangible, incorporeal property rights represented or evidenced by share certificates. They are not in themselves capable of individual identification and isolation from all other shares of the corporation of the same class. Therefore, once these shares were pledged by Brook in fully negotiable form and placed in the name of the broker, as was the evidence here, it was not possible to determine whether some or all of these 125,000 shares had been sold even presuming that at any time a specific share of a corporation as distinct from the certificate representing the share can be isolated and given an existence separate and apart from all other shares of the same class. In any case, it seems almost academic to argue that Baud could assert such a position in this regard when the shares were delivered through Diamantidi in fully negotiable form to Brook after Brook had announced that the purpose of the loan was to pledge the shares with his broker as security for his marginal transactions in other Asamera shares, and this apart altogether from the fact that redelivery of 125,000 Asamera shares free of encumbrance by Brook from any source would meet his obligation of redelivery.

Il est constant en droit qu'en vertu des lois applicables et de la common law, un certificat d'action ne constitue pas en lui-même une action de la compagnie, mais en est seulement la preuve. (Voir Solloway c. Blumberger[2], le juge Rinfret, à la p. 167.) Les actions sont des droits de propriété incorporels et les certificats en constituent une attestation ou une preuve. Elles ne peuvent être identifiées séparément ni isolées des autres actions de même classe de la compagnie. En conséquence, dès que Brook a mis les actions en gage au nom du courtier, sous une forme entièrement négociable, comme le révèle la preuve présentée en l'espèce, il est devenu impossible de déterminer si une partie ou la totalité des 125,000 actions avaient été vendues, à supposer même qu'on puisse, à un moment donné, isoler une action (et non le certificat qui en constitue la représentation tangible) et la considérer séparément des autres actions de même classe.

The learned trial judge dismissed Baud's claims in detinue and conversion and assessed damages on the basis that Brook's failure to deliver constituted a breach of contract. The action in substance is a simple case of breach of contract to return 125,000 Asamera shares and in my view the claims made and the issues arising in this action should be disposed of on that basis. That being so, we come to the only real issue in this appeal, namely, to what recovery is the appellant, Baud, in these circumstances entitled and, if the appropriate relief be a monetary award, the quantum of damages.

Baud has asked this Court to award specific performance of the agreement to return 125,000 Asamera shares, and in particular, in its statement of claim has requested an order directing the return or replacement of the shares. The jurisdiction to award specific performance of contractual obligations is ordinarily exercised only where damages would be inadequate to compensate a plaintiff for his losses. As the original 125,000 shares are indistinguishable from all other Asamera shares, and since there has been no suggestion that corporate control is at issue in this case, or that shares were not readily available in the stock market, an order for delivery of shares would merely be another method or form for the payment of any judgment awarded. Asamera shares are listed on the public stock exchanges and consequently some estimate of their market value can be readily ascertained from day to day. The parties themselves therefore throughout the 21 years since Quoi qu'il en soit, l'argument de Baud à ce sujet semble purement théorique puisque Baud a remis les actions à Brook, par l'intermédiaire de Diamantidi, sous une forme entièrement négociable, quand Brook a indiqué que les actions prêtées seraient mises en garde auprès de son courtier afin de garantir ses opérations sur marge visant ses autres actions d'Asamera et ce, mis à part le fait que pour remplir son obligation, Brook n'avait qu'à remettre 125,000 actions d'Asamera, sans indication de provenance, à condition qu'elles soient libres de toute charge.

Le savant juge de première instance a rejeté l'action de Baud en restitution et l'action pour appropriation illégale, et a évalué les dommages-intérêts en tenant pour acquis que l'omission de Brook de rendre les actions constituait une rupture de contrat. En fait, l'action est une affaire de simple rupture de contrat, savoir de l'engagement de rendre 125,000 actions d'Asamera et, à mon avis, les réclamations et les questions soulevées dans cette affaire doivent être tranchées sur cette base. Nous en venons donc à la véritable question en litige dans ce pourvoi: à quel dédommagement l'appelante Baud a-t-elle droit en l'instance et, si ce redressement est pécuniaire, quel doit être le montant des dommages-intérêts?

Baud demande à cette Cour d'ordonner l'exécution intégrale de l'accord pour la restitution des 125,000 actions d'Asamera et, plus précisément, elle demande dans sa déclaration une ordonnance exigeant la restitution ou le remplacement des actions. Habituellement, le pouvoir d'ordonner l'exécution intégrale d'une obligation contractuelle n'est exercé que dans les cas où des dommages-intérêts ne sauraient indemniser le demandeur du préjudice subi. Comme les 125,000 actions en cause ne peuvent être différenciées des autres actions d'Asamera et comme il n'est pas question que le contrôle de la compagnie soit en cause ou qu'il y ait eu un problème de disponibilité des actions sur le marché des valeurs, une ordonnance de restitution des actions ne serait qu'une façon d'exiger le paiement de tout montant accordé par jugement. Les actions d'Asamera sont cotées en bourse et il est en conséquence facile d'obtenir une estimation quotidienne de leur valeur marchande.

these transactions began have had the benefit of the daily assessment by the stock market of the value of these shares. It is obvious that damages are an adequate remedy and that the courts in such circumstances do not resort to the equitable remedy of specific performance.

The assessment of the quantum of damages for this breach of contract is somewhat complex. The calculation of damages relating to a breach of contract is, of course, governed by well-established principles of common law. Losses recoverable in an action arising out of the non-performance of a contractual obligation are limited to those which will put the injured party in the same position as he would have been in had the wrongdoer performed what he promised.

Not all kinds of losses are recoverable in actions for breach of contract. The limitations on damages recoverable in contract were discussed in Victoria Laundry (Windsor) LD. v. Newman Industries LD.[3], wherein Asquith L.J. at p. 539 went to great lengths to explain such limits:

(1) It is well settled that the governing purpose of damages is to put the party whose rights have been violated in the same position, so far as money can do so, as if his rights had been observed: (Sally Wertheim v. Chicoutimi Pulp Company). This purpose, if relentlessly pursued, would provide him with a complete indemnity for all loss de facto resulting from a particular breach, however improbable, however unpredictable. This, in contract at least, is recognized as too harsh a rule. Hence,

(2) In cases of breach of contract the aggrieved party is only entitled to recover such part of the loss actually resulting as was at the time of the contract reasonably forseeable as liable to result from the breach.

(3) What was at that time reasonably so foreseeable depends on the knowledge then possessed by the parties or, at all events, by the party who later commits the breach.

[3] [1949] 2 K.B. 528.

Les parties ont donc, pendant les 21 années écoulées depuis le début de ces opérations, bénéficié d'une évaluation boursière quotidienne de ces actions. Il est évident que des dommages-intérêts sont un redressement approprié et qu'il n'est pas question, dans un tel cas, que les tribunaux aient recours au redressement en equity que constitue l'exécution intégrale.

L'évaluation des dommages-intérêts pour cette rupture de contrat est assez complexe. Bien sûr, le calcul des dommages-intérêts pour rupture de contrat est régi par des principes de common law bien établis. Les pertes recouvrables dans une action fondée sur l'inexécution d'une obligation contractuelle sont limitées au montant qui placera la partie lésée dans la situation qui aurait existé si le contrevenant avait respecté son engagement.

Dans une action fondée sur une rupture de contrat, les pertes ne donnent pas toutes lieu à une indemnisation. Les restrictions applicables aux dommages-intérêts recouvrables en matière de contrat ont été analysées en profondeur dans l'arrêt Victoria Laundry (Windsor) LD. v. Newman Industries LD.[3], par le lord juge Asquith (à la p. 539):

(2) En cas de rupture de contrat, la partie lésée n'a droit à une indemnité que pour la perte qui en découle effectivement et qui était, à la date du contrat, susceptible d'en découler d'après ce qu'on pouvait raisonnablement prévoir.

(3) On apprécie les faits raisonnablement prévisibles à cette date en fonction des renseignements que possédaient alors les parties, ou du moins la partie qui rompt par la suite le contrat.

[3] [1949] 2 K.B. 528.

Three additional rules or refinements of the above rules are thereupon enumerated by Asquith L.J. but these are not here relevant. The principle set out in paragraph 2 above was thereafter modified somewhat by the House of Lords in Koufos v. C. Czarnikow (The Heron II)[4], where it was determined that the proper test for remoteness was not the 'reasonable foreseeability' of the head of damages claimed as in an action in tort, but whether the probability of the occurrence of the damage in the event of breach should have been within the reasonable contemplation of the contracting parties at the time of the entry into the contract. (Vide Brown & Root Ltd. v. Chimo Shipping Ltd.[5], per Ritchie J., at p. 648.)

These principles were most recently discussed in Parsons (Livestock) Ltd. v. Uttley Ingham & Co. Ltd.[6], where subject to qualifications raised in the judgment, it was concluded by all members of the Court of Appeal that the appropriate legal rules relating to remoteness will not depend upon the classification of the action as being one of contract or tort. The case has already been the subject of comment, vide Note, (1978) 94 L.Q.R. 171. Scarman L.J. at p. 529 stated:

> As to the first problem, I agree with Lord Denning M.R., in thinking that the law must be such that, in a factual situation where all have the same actual or imputed knowledge and the contract contains no term limiting the damages recoverable for breach, the amount of damages recoverable does not depend upon whether, as a matter of legal classification, the plaintiffs' cause of action is breach of contract or tort. It may be that the necessary reconciliation is to be found, notwithstanding the strictures of Lord Reid at pp. 446 and 389-390, in holding that the difference between "reasonably foreseeable" (the test in tort) and "reasonably contemplated", (the test in contract) is semantic, not substantial. Certainly Lord Justice Asquith in Victoria Laundry v. Newman [1949] 2 K.B. 528 at p. 535 and Lord Pearce in Czarnikow v. Koufos thought so: and I confess I think so too.

Le lord juge Asquith a ensuite formulé trois autres règles ou corollaires, qui ne sont pas pertinents en l'espèce. Le principe énoncé au paragraphe (2) a été un peu modifié par la suite dans l'arrêt Koufos v. C. Czarnikow (The Heron II)[4], où la Chambre des lords a jugé que le véritable critère du caractère prévisible ne consistait pas à étudier la «prévisibilité raisonnable» comme dans le cas d'une action en responsabilité délictuelle, mais plutôt à se demander si, à l'époque de la conclusion du contrat, les parties contractantes pouvaient raisonnablement prévoir la probabilité que des dommages résultent de la rupture du contrat. (Voir Brown & Root Ltd. c. Chimo Shipping Ltd.[5], le juge Ritchie, à la p. 648.)

L'examen le plus récent de ces principes se trouve dans l'arrêt Parsons (Livestock) Ltd. v. Uttley Ingham & Co. Ltd.[6], où la Cour d'appel, avec les réserves formulées dans le jugement, a jugé à l'unanimité que les principes juridiques régissant l'appréciation du caractère prévisible ne devaient pas dépendre de ce que l'action intentée est en responsabilité contractuelle ou en responsabilité délictuelle. L'arrêt a déjé fait l'objet d'un commentaire (voir Note, (1978) 94 L.Q.R. 171). Dans cette affaire, le lord juge Scarman a écrit (à la p. 529):

> [TRADUCTION] En ce qui concerne la première question, je pense, comme le maître des rôles lord Denning, que le droit doit être tel que dans un cas donné, quand tous ont les mêmes connaissances, réelles ou supposées, et que le contrat ne contient aucune disposition limitant les dommages recouvrables en cas de rupture, le montant des dommages-intérêts recouvrables ne dépend pas de la nature juridique de l'action, c.-à-d. de ce qu'elle soit fondée sur un contrat plutôt que sur un délit. On pourrait fort bien résoudre cette question, nonobstant les distinctions de lord Reid aux pp. 466 et 389 et 390, entre le critère applicable en matière délictuelle, «ce qui est raisonnablement prévisible», et le critère applicable en matière contractuelle, «ce qui est raisonnablement envisagé», en considérant qu'il s'agit d'une distinction sémantique et non de fond. C'est d'ailleurs ce qu'ont conclu lord Asquith dans Victoria Laundry v. Newman [1949] 2 K.B. 528, à la p. 535 et lord Pearce dans Czarnikow v. Koufos et j'avoue être aussi de cet avis. . . . ;

or more succinctly at p. 528:

> . . . the law is not so absurd as to differentiate between contract and tort save in situations where the agreement, or the factual relationship, of the parties with each other requires it in the interests of justice.

(Leave to appeal to the House of Lords was granted by the Court of Appeal.)

In any event the damage flowing from the wrongful act of the respondent in this case, that is the loss of the opportunity to resell the shares at a profit, is recoverable under any of the tests set out above.

In cases dealing with the measure of damages for non-delivery of goods under contracts for sale, the application over the years of the above-mentioned principles has given the law some certainty, and it is now accepted that damages will be recoverable in an amount representing what the purchaser would have had to pay for the goods in the market, less the contract price, at the time of the breach. This rule which was authoritatively stated in Barrow v. Arnaud[7] may be seen as a combination of two principles. The first, as stated earlier, is the right of the plaintiff to recover all of his losses which are reasonably contemplated by the parties as liable to result from the breach. The second is the responsibility imposed on a party who has suffered from a breach of contract to take all reasonable steps to avoid losses flowing from the breach. This responsibility to mitigate was explained by Laskin C.J.C. in Red Deer College v. Michaels and Finn[8], at pp. 330-1:

> It is, of course, for a wronged plaintiff to prove his damages, and there is therefore a burden upon him to establish on a balance of probabilities what his loss is. The parameters of loss are governed by legal principle. The primary rule in breach of contract cases, that a wronged plaintiff is entitled to be put in as good a position as he would have been in if there had been proper performance by the defendant, is subject to the qualification that the defendant cannot be called upon to pay for avoidable losses which would result in an increase in the quantum of damages payable to the

Quoi qu'il en soit, une indemnité pour les dommages résultant des agissements de l'intimé en l'espèce, c.-à-d. l'impossibilité de revendre les actions à profit, peut être recouvrée en vertu de n'importe lequel des critères énoncés plus haut.

Dans les affaires relatives à l'évaluation des dommages résultant du défaut de livrer des marchandises en violation d'un contrat de vente, l'application répétée des principes susmentionnés a clarifié le droit et il est maintenant établi que le montant des dommages-intérêts doit correspondre au montant que l'acheteur aurait dû dépenser pour se procurer les marchandises sur le marché à l'époque de la rupture du contrat, moins le prix fixé au contrat. Cette règle, fermement énoncée dans l'arrêt Barrow v. Arnaud[7] ressort de l'effet conjugué de deux principes. Le premier, déjà exposé, est le droit du demandeur d'être indemnisé des pertes que les parties pouvaient raisonnablement envisager en cas d'inexécution du contrat. Le deuxième est l'obligation pour la partie lésée par l'inexécution d'un contrat de prendre toutes les mesures raisonnables afin de limiter le préjudice en résultant. Voici en quels termes le juge en chef Laskin explique, dans l'arrêt Red Deer College c. Michaels et Finn[8], cette obligation de limiter le préjudice (aux pp. 330 et 331):

> Naturellement, il incombe au demandeur lésé de prouver le dommage subi et, par conséquent, de prouver par la prépondérance des probabilités la perte qu'il a essuyée. Des principes juridiques régissent les paramètres d'une perte. Dans une affaire d'inexécution contractuelle, la règle fondamentale qu'un demandeur lésé a le droit d'être mis dans une position aussi favorable que s'il y avait eu exécution régulière de la part du défendeur, est sujette à la réserve que le défendeur ne peut être appelé à défrayer toute perte évitable qui résulterait en une augmentation du quantum des dommages-intérêts plaintiff. The reference in the case law to a "duty" to mitigate should be understood in this sense.

In short, a wronged plaintiff is entitled to recover damages for the losses he has suffered but the extent of those losses may depend on whether he has taken reasonable steps to avoid their unreasonable accumulation.

and later in the judgment at p. 331:

If it is the defendant's position that the plaintiff could reasonably have avoided some part of the loss claimed, it is for the defendant to carry the burden of that issue, subject to the defendant being content to allow the matter to be disposed of on the trial judge's assessment of the plaintiff's evidence on avoidable consequences.

Thus, if one were to adopt, without reservation, in the settlement of Baud's damage claims, the rules governing recovery for non-delivery of goods in sales contracts, the prima facie measure of damages in the case at bar would be the value of the shares on the date of breach, that is, December 31, 1960. The learned trial judge found the market price on December 31, 1960, to be 29 cents per share. The value of the 125,000 shares wrongfully retained by Brook, and thus the loss to Baud by reason of its not being in possession of those shares, on that date therefore was $36,250 assuming, for the purposes of discussion only, the market price to be constant throughout the purchase or sale of such a number of shares. To this must be added other expenses which could reasonably be said to be incidental to steps taken to mitigate the damages flowing from the breach. The most obvious of these are brokerage and commission fees which would have been incurred by Baud in purchasing replacement shares. Of greater importance is the inevitable upward pressure the purchase on the open market of such a large number of Asamera shares would exert on the market price. The impact of forced sales or purchases of shares on market prices has been the subject of judicial comment in the past (vide Crown Reserve Consolidated Mines Ltd. v. Mackay[9]) and must be taken into account in determining the weight to be accorded to mitigation factors in an assessment of damages in circumstances such as exist here. Unhappily, Baud has led no evidence on this probpayables au demandeur. C'est dans ce sens que doit être interprétée l'expression «obligation» de minimiser dont fait état la jurisprudence.

En deux mots, un demandeur lésé a droit de recouvrer des dommages-intérêts pour les pertes qu'il a subies, mais l'étendue de ces pertes peut dépendre de la question de savoir s'il a ou non pris des mesures raisonnables pour éviter qu'elles s'accroissent immodérément.

Puis, un peu plus loin à la p. 331:

Si le défendeur prétend que le demandeur aurait pu raisonnablement minimiser la perte alléguée, il incombe au défendeur d'en faire la preuve, à moins que ce dernier ne se contente de laisser au juge de première instance le soin de trancher cette question à la lumière de son évaluation de la preuve des conséquences évitables fournie par le demandeur.

Par conséquent, si aux fins du règlement des réclamations en dommages-intérêts de Baud on appliquait intégralement les règles régissant les dommages-intérêts pour défaut de livrer des marchandises en violation d'un contrat de vente, l'évaluation des dommages subis en l'espèce devrait, à première vue, s'aligner sur la valeur des actions le jour de la rupture du contrat, soit le 31 décembre 1960. Le savant juge de première instance a conclu qu'à cette date, les actions avaient une valeur marchande de 29 cents chacune. La valeur des 125,000 actions illégalement détenues par Brook et, en conséquence, la perte subie par Baud parce qu'elle n'était pas en possession de ces actions, était donc, au 31 décembre 1960, de $36,250, en supposant aux fins de la discussion que la valeur marchande demeure constante pendant l'achat et la vente d'un tel nombre d'actions. Il faut ajouter à cela d'autres dépenses qu'on pourrait raisonnablement qualifier d'accessoires aux mesures prises pour limiter le préjudice résultant de la rupture du contrat, les plus évidentes étant les frais de courtage et de commission que Baud aurait eu à payer pour acheter d'autres actions. Encore plus importante est la tendance à la hausse des cours qu'aurait entraînée l'achat sur le marché libre d'un aussi grand nombre d'actions d'Asamera. L'effet des ventes ou achats d'actions accélérés sur les cours a déjà été étudié dans la jurisprudence (voir Crown Reserve Consolidated Mines Ltd. v. Mackay[9]) et doit entrer en ligne de compte pour déterminer l'importance à accorder aux facteurs de limitation lem and one is left to take note of the presence of this factor without being able precisely to quantify it. This point requires more detailed discussion at a later stage.

Assuming for the moment that the breach of contract occurred on December 31, 1960, and that the appellant's right to damages came into being at that time; and assuming that it should then have acted to forestall the accumulation of avoidable losses, what action did the law then require of the appellant by way of mitigation of damages? A plaintiff need not take all possible steps to reduce his loss, and accordingly, it is necessary to examine some of the special circumstances here present. The appellant argues that there exist in this case clear circumstances which render the duty to purchase 125,000 Asamera shares an unreasonable one. The first of these has its foundations in the established principle that a plaintiff need not put his money to an unreasonable risk including a risk not present in the initial transaction in endeavouring to mitigate his losses. This principle was demonstrated in Lesters Leather and Skin Co. v. Home and Overseas Brokers[10] and in Jewelowski v. Propp[11], as well as in Pilkington v. Wood[12]. The appellant here was placed in the unusual position where mitigative action would require that it purchase as replacement property, shares of a company engaged in a speculative undertaking under the effective control and under the promotional management of a person in breach of contract, the respondent, Brook, who thereafter was in an adversarial position in relation to the appellant.

On the evidence adduced at trial, the market value of shares in Asamera had fallen from $3 shortly before the dates on which Baud first loaned the two blocs of shares to Brook, to between $1.62 and $1.87 in November 1958, and to 29 cents per share on December 31, 1960. Evidence of share des dommages aux fins de l'évaluation du préjudice dans les circonstances de l'espèce. Malheureusement, Baud n'a présenté aucune preuve sur cet aspect du problème, dont il faut néanmoins tenir compte sans être en mesure de l'évaluer avec précision. Je reviendrai sur ce sujet plus en détail à une étape ultérieure.

Supposons pour le moment que la rupture du contrat et le droit de l'appelante à des dommages-intérêts remontent au 31 décembre 1960 et supposons également qu'elle aurait dû prendre à ce moment-là les mesures nécessaires pour limiter les pertes évitables, quelles étaient alors, en droit, les choses que l'appelante était tenue de faire pour limiter le préjudice? Un demandeur n'étant pas tenu de prendre toutes les mesures possibles pour réduire ses pertes, il est nécessaire d'examiner certains facteurs particuliers en l'espèce. L'appelante soutient que lesdits facteurs rendaient déraisonnable l'obligation d'acheter 125,000 actions d'Asamera. Un premier facteur découle du principe bien établi qu'un demandeur n'est pas tenu, pour limiter le préjudice, de courir un risque financier déraisonnable, y compris un risque inexistant dans l'opération initiale. C'est d'ailleurs le sens des arrêts Lesters Leather and Skin Co. v. Home and Overseas Brokers[10]; Jewelowski v. Propp[11]; et Pilkington v. Wood[12]. L'appelante se trouvait donc dans une situation inhabituelle en ce que, pour limiter le préjudice, il lui aurait fallu acheter en remplacement des actions d'une compagnie engagée dans une entreprise de nature spéculative, gérée et contrôlée par l'intimé, Brook, qui avait violé son contrat et qui se trouvait de ce fait un adversaire de l'appelante.

La preuve présentée en première instance révèle que, peu de temps avant le prêt par Baud des deux blocs d'actions à Brook, la valeur marchande des actions d'Asamera est passée de $3 l'action à un montant situé entre $1.62 et $1.87 en novembre 1958, pour tomber à 29 cents au 31 décembre values after that date indicates only that there was a relatively small recovery in value to about $1.21 a share by March 1965, when the fortunes of the company improved. The appellant argues that it could not have been expected in December of 1960 to purchase shares in mitigation of its losses where the value of these shares had fallen as rapidly as is indicated in the evidence.

1960. La preuve relative à la valeur des actions après cette date indique une faible remontée de leur valeur à $1.21 chacune en mars 1965, avec le rétablissement de la situation économique de la compagnie. L'appelante soutient qu'on ne peut lui reprocher de ne pas avoir acheté des actions en décembre 1960, dans le but de limiter le préjudice, eu égard à la diminution rapide de leur valeur démontrée par la preuve.

A more important circumstance which might render unreasonable any requirement that Baud purchase shares in the market was the existence of the aforementioned injunction issued on July 27, 1960, restraining the respondent from selling 125,-000 Asamera shares. The appellant contends that it is inconceivable that the law should require a party, who has suffered a misappropriation of his property and who has requested and been afforded the considerable protection of an injunction granted by a Court of Equity, to ignore the force and effect of that injunction and to go out and acquire the same number of shares as Brook was required to retain, however the terms of the injunction be construed.

Un autre facteur plus important pouvait également rendre déraisonnable toute obligation pour Baud d'acheter des actions sur le marché: il s'agit de l'injonction susmentionnée du 27 juillet 1960, qui interdisait à l'intimé de vendre 125,000 actions d'Asamera. L'appelante prétend qu'il est inconcevable qu'une partie dont les biens sont illégalement détenus par une autre personne, et qui a réclamé et obtenu la protection considérable qu'offre une injonction délivrée par une cour d'equity, soit tenue en droit d'ignorer la force obligatoire et l'effet de cette injonction et donc d'acheter le même nombre d'actions que celles que Brook devait conserver en sa possession, quelle que soit l'interprétation donnée aux termes de l'injonction.

Even if one accepts that submission, it must be acknowledged that the right of Baud to rely on the injunction as a shield against an obligation to minimize its losses is not absolute. In the first place, Baud was informed by Brook in his pleadings of July 6, 1967, that shares which were subject to the injunction had been sold. As of that date the shares were selling at $4.30 to $4.35 and had been rising in value since April of 1965 and at a median price of $4.33 would have cost Baud $541,250. Accordingly, at least by July of 1967 it could not be said that Baud would reasonably be discouraged from replacing the 125,000 shares in the open market because of the low price of an inactive company, nor could it be said that thereafter it could reasonably refrain from prosecuting its claim for damages because of the order enjoining the disposition of the shares by Brook. It remains the case, however, that the market price for such speculative shares as those of an oil-exploration company was subject to wide price fluctuations sometimes inspired by management which itself

Même si l'on accepte cet argument, il faut noter que le droit de Baud d'invoquer l'injonction pour se dégager de son obligation de limiter ses pertes n'est pas absolu. Tout d'abord, la défense produite par Brook le 6 juillet 1967 a fait savoir à Baud que les actions visées par l'injonction avaient été vendues. A cette époque, les actions se vendaient entre $4.30 et $4.35 chacune et étaient à la hausse depuis avril 1965; à un prix moyen de $4.33, le tout aurait coûté $541,250 à Baud. En conséquence, au moins à partir du mois de juillet 1967, on ne peut s'appuyer sur le prix peu élevé des actions d'une compagnie inactive pour dire que le remplacement des 125,000 actions sur le marché libre pouvait raisonnablement décourager Baud; on ne peut pas dire non plus que Baud aurait raisonnablement été empêchée de poursuivre son action en dommages-intérêts en se fondant sur l'injonction interdisant à Brook de vendre les actions. Il n'en demeure pas moins, cependant, que dans le cas de valeurs aussi spéculatives que celles d'une compagnie d'exploration pétrolière, le cours held, as did Brook, a considerable number of shares.

The learned trial judge referred to a number of English authorities in support of the proposition that in the case of a loan of shares a plaintiff need not mitigate his losses either by purchasing shares on the market, or even by bringing a suit for recovery of damages within a reasonable time. The result under these authorities where the market value of the shares has risen or fallen between breach and trial, has been an award of damages representing the value of the shares at the time of the breach or of the trial at the election of the plaintiff. (Vide Harrison v. Harrison[13]; Shepherd v. Johnson[14]; McArthur v. Seaforth[15]; Sanders v. Kentish[16].) These cases were adopted in Canada and other jurisdictions (vide Vicary v. Foley[17]; Galigher v. Jones[18] and cases cited therein). These authorities raise no responsibility in the plaintiff to mitigate his losses. Shepherd v. Johnson, supra, per Grose J. at p. 211. The application of the principle developed in these early cases would produce damages calculated at the end of the trial or perhaps at the highest point prior to that date. The trial proceeded intermittently from June 1969 to December 1971, and final judgment was pronounced in May 1972. The latter price would be about $21 a share and the highest price attained was about $46.50 per share, allowing recovery of approximately $2,625,000 and $5,812,500 respectively.

A proper analysis of these cases is made difficult by reason of their antiquity and after serious consideration, I have concluded that they ought not to be followed by this Court. In the first place, they were decided long before modern principles of contractual remedies had been developed. Second-du marché fait l'objet de fluctuations considérables, quelquefois suscitées par la direction de l'entreprise lorsque celle-ci détient, comme Brook, un nombre considérable d'actions.

Le savant juge de première instance a cité plusieurs arrêts anglais étayant la thèse selon laquelle dans le cas d'un prêt d'actions, la personne lésée n'est pas tenue de limiter le préjudice en achetant des actions sur le marché ni d'intenter une action en dommages-intérêts dans un délai raisonnable. Selon cette jurisprudence, lorsque la valeur marchande des actions a fluctué entre la date de la rupture du contrat et celle du procès, le montant des dommages-intérêts correspond à la valeur marchande des actions soit au moment de la rupture soit à celui du procès, au choix du demandeur. Voir Harrison v. Harrison[13]; Shepherd v. Johnson[14]; McArthur v. Seaforth[15]; Sanders v. Kentish[16].) Ces arrêts ont été suivis au Canada et dans d'autres pays (voir Vicary v. Foley[17]; Galigher v. Jones[18] et la jurisprudence y citée). Ces arrêts n'imposent aucune obligation au demandeur de limiter le préjudice. Shepherd v. Johnson, précité, le juge Grose à la p. 211. L'application du principe élaboré dans ces anciennes affaires donnerait lieu à des dommages-intérêts calculés selon la valeur marchande des actions à la fin du procès ou, dans certains cas, selon leur cote maximale avant cette date. En l'espèce, le procès s'est déroulé de façon intermittente de juin 1969 à décembre 1971 et le jugement a été finalement rendu en mai 1972. En gros, la valeur des actions à cette dernière date était de $21 et leur cote maximale de $46.50, ce qui donnerait des dommages-intérêts approximatifs de $2,625,000 et de $5,812,500 respectivement.

L'ancienneté de ces arrêts en rend toute analyse pertinente presque impossible et, après mûre réflexion, je conclus que cette Cour ne devrait pas les suivre. Premièrement, ils ont été prononcés longtemps avant l'élaboration des principes modernes relatifs aux recours en matière contractuelle.

ly, they are not in accord with recent decisions of this Court. Thirdly, they ignore the all-important and overriding considerations which have led to the judicial recognition of the desirability and indeed the necessity that a plaintiff mitigate his losses arising on a breach of contract. There is a fourth consideration. This old principle produces an arbitrary, albeit a readily ascertainable result because it lacks the flexibility needed to take into account the infinite range of possible circumstances in which the parties may find themselves at the time of the breach and before a trial can in practice take place. The pace of the market place and the complexities of business have changed radically since this rule or principle was developed in the early nineteenth century.

Deuxièmement, ils sont en contradiction avec des arrêts récents de cette Cour. Troisièmement, ils ne tiennent pas compte des considérations extrêmement importantes et capitales qui sont à l'origine de la reconnaissance judiciaire de l'opportunité et même de la nécessité pour le demandeur de limiter le préjudice dû à la rupture du contrat. Quatrièmement, cet ancien principe mène à un résultat arbitraire, quoique facilement calculable, parce qu'il n'est pas suffisamment flexible pour permettre de prendre en considération l'énorme éventail de circonstances dans lesquelles les parties peuvent se trouver au moment de la rupture du contrat et avant que le procès puisse être mis en train. Le rythme du marché des valeurs et la complexité des opérations financières ont radicalement changé depuis l'élaboration de cette règle, ou principe, qui remonte au début du dix-neuvième siècle.

Before proceeding further with the analysis of the nature and extent of damages in the field of contract law, it will be helpful to examine briefly the principles which have evolved in analogous situations in the law of torts. In conversion, the measure of damages has been said to be the value of the shares at the date of conversion, and in addition, consequential damages represented by the loss of the opportunity to dispose of the shares at the highest price attained prior to the end of trial. (Vide McNeil v. Fultz et al.[19] per Duff J. at p. 205; The Queen in right of Alberta v. Arnold[20], per Spence J. at p. 230.) I am aware of course that these cases were for the most part dealing with the wrongful refusal of a person under the liability of a trustee to deliver property to a beneficiary, but on principle the result would be the same in simple cases of conversion. (Vide McGregor on Damages (13th ed. 1972) at p. 671.)

In detinue, the measure of damages has been said to be the value of the shares at the end of the trial, and in addition, damages for the detention. The value of the shares at the end of the trial must be awarded on the basis that the action in detinue is, in fact, a quasi-proprietary action for return of the plaintiff's goods. If that cannot be done, then the clearest approximation of the plaintiff's loss is

Avant de passer à l'analyse de la nature et de l'étendue des dommages-intérêts en droit des contrats, il convient d'examiner rapidement les principes qui ont cours dans des situations analogues en matière délictuelle. En cas d'appropriation illégale, les dommages-intérêts correspondent à la valeur des actions au moment de l'appropriation illégale, plus le montant accordé pour la perte de la possibilité de vendre les actions à leur cote maximale avant la fin du procès. (Voir McNeil c. Fultz et autres[19], le juge Duff à la p. 205, et La Reine du chef de l'Alberta c. Arnold[20], le juge Spence à la p. 230.) Je sais bien que ces arrêts traitent en grande partie du refus illégal d'une personne ayant des responsabilités de fiduciaire de rendre certains biens à un bénéficiaire, mais le résultat serait en principe le même dans les cas de simple appropriation illégale. (Voir McGregor on Damages (13e éd. 1972) à la p. 671.)

Dans l'action en restitution, les dommages-intérêts correspondraient à la valeur des actions à la fin du procès plus le montant accordé à titre de dommages-intérêts pour la détention des biens. Si le dédommagement est égal à la valeur des actions à la fin du procès, c'est que l'action en restitution est, en fait, pratiquement une action en revendication dans laquelle le demandeur réclame que ses the value of those goods when they would have been recovered, that is, at the end of trial. In addition, an award must compensate the plaintiff for damages flowing from the wrongful detention of his property, which it seems must be assessed on the basis of the highest value of the goods between the date at which the plaintiff ought to have recovered possession and the end of trial. In McGregor on Damages, supra, at p. 699, the case is put this way:

As with conversion there is no clear case of a market rise followed by a market fall between the time of the initial detention and the time of judgment. Although in Williams v. Peel River Co. the market appears to have risen and then fallen, it seems that the plaintiff was only claiming, as damages for detention, the value at initial default less the value at judgment. In Archer v. Williams, in detinue for scrip certificates, Cresswell J. directed the jury that "the measure of damages is the highest sum the scrip could have been sold for from the time of the detention till the time when it was returned," but on appeal the case was argued only on whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount by which the market value of the scrip certificates had fallen between the defendant's refusal to deliver and his actual delivery. It is submitted that the highest price which the market had attained before the time when the plaintiff ought to have sued, should control here also.

One should pause here to point out that I have advisedly referred to the cut-off time as being the end of the trial. In some cases and texts, reference is made to 'judgment'. No authority has come to my attention where a significant factual change has occurred during the gap between end of trial and judgment. Protracted difficulties could arise if the books must be kept open for a last value measurement after trial and before settlement of the final judgment. Therefore I would apply the principle as closing off valuation considerations at the end of the trial. Holland J. in Metropolitan Trust Co. of Canada et al. v. Pressure Concrete biens lui soient rendus. Si c'est impossible, l'estimation la plus exacte du préjudice subi par le demandeur correspond alors à la valeur qu'auraient eue les biens à leur restitution, soit à la fin du procès. Un montant supplémentaire est ajouté pour indemniser le demandeur du préjudice résultant de la détention illégale de ses biens; ce montant est fonction de la valeur maximale des biens entre la date à laquelle le demandeur aurait dû en reprendre possession et la fin du procès. Voici en quels termes McGregor on Damages, précité, en explique le principe à la p. 699:

[TRADUCTION] Comme dans les cas d'appropriation illégale, il n'existe aucune preuve précise de hausse puis de fléchissement des valeurs entre les dates de la détention initiale et du jugement. Même s'il paraît y avoir eu des fluctuations semblables dans l'affaire Williams v. Peel River Co., il semble que le demandeur ne réclamait, à titre de dommages-intérêts pour la détention, que la valeur des biens au moment du refus de les remettre moins leur valeur lors du jugement. Dans l'affaire Archer v. Williams, une action en restitution de titres provisoires, le juge Cresswell a indiqué au jury que «les dommages-intérêts correspondaient au montant maximal pour lesquels les titres auraient pu être vendus entre la date de la détention et celle à laquelle ils ont été rendus»; mais en appel, la seule question en litige concernait le droit du demandeur de recevoir la différence entre la valeur des titres au moment du refus de les rendre et leur valeur moindre au moment où ils ont été rendus. Nous croyons qu'il faut également en ce cas retenir la cote maximale atteinte par les titres avant l'époque où le demandeur aurait dû intenter son recours.

Je m'arrête un instant pour souligner que c'est à dessein que j'ai pris la fin du procès comme date limite. On a déjà parlé, en doctrine et en jurisprudence, de la date du «jugement». Je ne connais aucun cas précis de différence importante survenue entre la date de la fin du procès et celle du jugement. De nouvelles difficultés pourraient surgir s'il fallait attendre, pour fermer les livres, d'être en mesure d'établir la valeur des biens juste avant le prononcé du jugement. En conséquence, je retiendrais donc la date de la fin du procès comme date finale aux fins de l'évaluation. Dans l'affaire Metropolitan Trust Co. of Canada et al. v. Pres-

Services Ltd. et al.[21] directed the assessment officer to take into account damages incurred beyond the end of trial to the date reserved judgment was delivered. In the course I propose to follow herein, this point need not be determined.

The application of the basic principles of remoteness and causality enunciated in the leading cases mentioned earlier points to the conclusion that Baud may have, in the absence of a duty to mitigate, a right of recovery in damages for breach of contract represented by the highest value attained by the shares between the date of breach and the end of trial, that is, $46.50 or $5,812,500. That is the high-water mark attainable under the doctrines which can be gleaned from the older authorities, but as we shall see is not now properly attainable. Such authorities as I have been able to discover suggest that this highest intermediate value is the proper starting point in assessing damages arising on the wrongful detention of another's shares, although the basis therefor is not clearly founded in the concepts of either tort or contract discussed above. (Vide Archer v. Williams[22].) Before the courts made a conscious effort to remove the distinctions between recovery in tort and recovery in contract it had been held in the case of a breach of contract that the loss of an opportunity to sell shares at the highest intervening market price was too remote to support recovery (Simmons v. London Joint Stock Bank[23], at p. 284, reversed on other grounds sub nom. London Joint Stock Bank v. Simmons[24]). The editors of Halsbury's Laws of England (4th ed. 1975) vol. 12 at p. 467 comment on this authority:

> It is not to be assumed that the plaintiff would necessarily have sold at such a value and that the loss of such a speculative increase in value is the natural or probable result of the breach of contract.

sure Concrete Services Ltd. et al.[21], le juge Holland a ordonné au fonctionnaire responsable d'évaluer les dommages survenus entre la date de la fin du procès et celle du prononcé du jugement pris en délibéré. Étant donné mes conclusions en l'espèce, je n'ai pas à trancher cette question.

L'application des principes de base concernant le caractère prévisible et les rapports de cause à effet énoncés dans la jurisprudence précitée mène à la conclusion qu'en l'absence de toute obligation de limiter le préjudice, Baud aurait droit à des dommages-intérêts pour violation du contrat correspondant à la cote maximale des actions entre la date de la violation et la fin du procès, c.-à-d. $46.50 l'action ou $5,812,500. C'est l'indemnité maximale que permettent les thèses fondées sur l'ancienne jurisprudence mais, comme nous le verrons, elle ne convient pas. Il semble, selon la jurisprudence que j'ai pu relever, que cette cote intermédiaire maximale doive servir de point de départ aux fins de l'évaluation des dommages-intérêts résultant de la détention illégale d'actions appartenant à autrui; on ne peut cependant en retrouver le fondement dans les concepts susmentionnés qui prévalent en matière délictuelle et contractuelle. (Voir Archer v. Williams[22].) Avant la tentative consciente des tribunaux pour éliminer les distinctions entre les dommages-intérêts en matière délictuelle et ceux en matière contractuelle, on avait jugé, dans le cas d'une violation de contrat, que la perte de la possibilité de vendre les actions à leur cote maximale était trop peu prévisible pour pouvoir servir de fondement aux dommages-intérêts (Simmons v. London Joint Stock Bank[23], à la p. 284, infirmé pour d'autres motifs sous le nom London Joint Stock Bank v. Simmons[24]). Voici en quels termes les rédacteurs de Halsbury's Laws of England (4e éd. 1975) t. 12, à la p. 467, ont commenté cet arrêt:

> [TRADUCTION] Il ne faut pas présumer que le demandeur aurait nécessairement vendu à ce prix et que l'impossibilité de profiter d'une augmentation de valeur de nature spéculative résulte naturellement ou probablement de la rupture du contrat.

Once a foreseeable or contemplated consequence occurs, in this case the loss of opportunity to sell the shares, all of the damages of that kind are recoverable in assessing the quantum of damages on proper principles. (Vide Cheshire & Fifoot's Law of Contract (9th ed. 1976) at p. 593; Wroth v. Tyler[25], at pp. 60-62.)

It is very likely that Brook would have foreseen the probable loss to be suffered by Baud on the non-return of its property; particularly bearing in mind his activity as a stock broker and his own dealings in Asamera shares. In the absence of a contrary indication he may be taken to have assumed the risk of its occurrence. Such a loss is not speculative, neither is it so improbable nor so remote as to remove it from the kind of damages recoverable in an action in contract. As to quantum of damages it is not unreasonable to scale the recovery for the loss suffered by Baud by virtue of its loss of the opportunity to sell the shares to a price or prices at least approaching the median point between breach and trial, subject to the varying influences of the many relevant factors to be discussed below.

The application of another basic principle relating to the computation of contract damages, namely that the plaintiff should be, so far as money may do so, placed in the same position as he would have enjoyed had the breach not occurred, produces a like result. Had Brook returned the shares when the contract provided, Baud would then have been in a position to dispose of those shares during the period of market appreciation. The range of damages on such a basis would be from 29 cents or more realistically $2 per share to $46.50 per share. The $2 per share is more properly the baseline for computation of value because that is the option price agreed upon between the parties for the period ending at the time the breach of contract occurred. Since it is entirely unrealistic to assume that the peak price was attainable for a block sale of 125,000 Asamera shares, and as it is most unlikely that Baud or anyone else would enjoy such perspicacity, a median range of $20 to $25 for the period from mid-1967 to the end of trial is more appropriate.

Lorsqu'une conséquence prévisible ou prévue se produit, en l'espèce la perte d'une possibilité de vendre les actions, tout préjudice subi est inclus dans le montant global des dommages-intérêts calculé selon les principes appropriés. (Voir Cheshire & Fifoot's Law of Contract (9e éd. 1976) à la p. 593 et Wroth v. Tyler[25], aux pp. 60-62.)

Étant lui-même un courtier en valeurs et ayant lui-même négocié des actions d'Asamera, Brook pouvait très vraisemblablement prévoir le préjudice causé à Baud en ne lui rendant pas ses actions. En l'absence de preuve contraire, on peut présumer que Brook a assumé ce risque. Ce genre de préjudice n'est pas de nature spéculative, ni suffisamment improbable ou imprévisible qu'il doive être négligé dans le calcul des dommages-intérêts pour rupture de contrat. Quant au montant de ces derniers, il n'est pas déraisonnable de l'établir en tenant compte du préjudice qu'a subi Baud en perdant la possibilité de vendre les actions à un prix voisin de la valeur médiane atteinte entre la date de la rupture du contrat et celle du procès, sous réserve des répercussions des nombreux facteurs pertinents étudiés ci-après.

Un autre principe fondamental dans le calcul des dommages-intérêts en matière contractuelle, savoir que le demandeur devrait, financièrement du moins, être placé dans la même situation que si le contrat avait été exécuté, donne un résultat semblable. Si Brook avait rendu les actions conformément au contrat, Baud aurait pu les vendre pendant que le marché était à la hausse. Suivant ce principe, les dommages s'échelonnent de 29 cents ou, pour être plus réaliste, de $2 à $46.50 l'action. La valeur de $2 l'action est plus appropriée parce que c'est le prix de l'option d'achat dont les parties avaient convenu pour la période venant à échéance lorsqu'est survenue la violation du contrat. Puisqu'il est irréaliste de penser qu'un bloc de 125,000 actions d'Asamera atteindrait cette cote maximale en une seule vente et que Baud, pas plus que les autres, n'est douée d'une telle perspicacité, la valeur médiane de $20 à $25 l'action pour la période commençant vers la moitié de l'année 1967 et se terminant à la fin du procès me semble plus appropriée. (Voir Fales et autres c.

(Vide Fales et al. v. Canada Permanent Trust Company[26], per Dickson J. at p. 322.) This would produce damages of about $3,000,000 before any consideration is given to the required mitigation.

It must be noted at once that the authorities which deny a responsibility to avoid losses in the case of the non-return of shares have been viewed somewhat harshly. (Vide Dawson v. Helicopter Exploration Co. Ltd.[27], per Sydney Smith J.A. at pp. 103, 104. The appeal to this Court was allowed for reasons not here relevant and without any comment on this point. ((1958), 12 D.L.R. (2d) 1.)

The cases which establish the exceedingly technical rules relating to recovery of damages for the non-return of shares turn on the theory that only where a breach of contract gives rise to an asset in the hands of the plaintiff will the law require him to mitigate his losses by employing that asset in a reasonable manner. Thus if an employer wrongfully dismisses an employee the breach results in the employee obtaining an asset, an ability to work for another employer, or at least the opportunity to offer his services to that end, which he did not enjoy prior to the dismissal. This is no more than a philosophical explanation of the simple test of fairness and reasonableness in establishing the presence and extent of the burden to mitigate in varying circumstances.

This approach was adopted by Rand J. in Karas et al. v. Rowlett[28], at p. 8, where he said, in a case of fraud resulting in a loss of profits:

> . . . by the default or wrong there is released a capacity to work or to earn. That capacity becomes an asset in the hands of the injured party, and he is held to a reasonable employment of it in the course of events flowing from the breach.

An analogous situation arises in the breach of a contract for the sale of goods where on the failure Canada Permanent Trust Company[26], le juge Dickson, à la p. 322.) Ce calcul donne un montant de dommages-intérêts de $3,000,000, mais il reste encore à étudier l'obligation de limiter le préjudice.

Il faut noter d'emblée que la jurisprudence qui ne reconnaît pas l'obligation de limiter le préjudice dans un cas de non-restitution d'actions a été passablement critiquée. (Voir Dawson v. Helicopter Exploration Co. Ltd.[27], le juge Sydney Smith de la Cour d'appel, aux pp. 103 et 104. Le pourvoi interjeté devant cette Cour a été accueilli pour des motifs non pertinents en l'espèce et sans qu'il y ait le moindre commentaire sur cette question, (1958), 12 D.L.R. (2d) 1.)

Les arrêts qui établissent les règles très rigoureuses relatives au recouvrement de dommages-intérêts en cas de non-restitution d'actions sont fondés sur le principe suivant: l'obligation légale de limiter le préjudice n'existe que lorsque la violation du contrat met un bien entre les mains du demandeur, ce dernier devant alors l'utiliser d'une manière raisonnable. Ainsi, lorsqu'un employeur congédie illégalement un employé, la rupture du contrat donne à ce dernier la possibilité de travailler pour un autre employeur ou tout au moins de lui offrir ses services, une possibilité qu'il n'avait pas avant son congédiement. Cette théorie n'est qu'une explication philosophique du simple critère d'équité et de raison qui détermine l'existence et l'étendue, selon les circonstances, de l'obligation de limiter le préjudice.

Le juge Rand a adopté ce raisonnement dans l'arrêt Karas et autres c. Rowlett[28], une affaire de fraude qui avait causé une perte de bénéfices, en déclarant, à la p. 8:

L'inexécution par un fournisseur d'un contrat de vente de marchandises entraîne une situation ana-of a supplier to deliver goods, the purchaser because he is relieved of the obligation to pay, has an asset (the financial resource represented by the sums previously committed to the purchase) of which he did not have the free use prior to the breach. This is not the situation of Baud who might in mitigation of the damage suffered on the non-return of its shares of Asamera, be called upon to lay out substantial assets to replace the shares retained by Brook. Because there is no evidence of lack of funds for these purposes we need not be concerned with the relevance of the judgment in Liesbosch Dredger v. S.S. "Edison"[29]. There is of course no asset created by the breach of the contract to return shares and if that theory be the law and the creation of an asset be a necessary prerequisite of a duty to mitigate, no such duty arose in the case at hand.

It follows that a contrary result should arise where damages are recoverable for a breach of contract by a vendor on a sale of shares. There the breach would normally allow a buyer the use of his funds formerly committed to the purchase, and consequently damages should be calculated on the basis that he ought to have taken steps to avoid his losses by the purchase of shares on the market at the time of the breach. This, in fact, appears to be the law at present. (Vide Dawson v. Helicopter Exploration Co. Ltd., supra; Pitfield & Co. Ltd. v. Jomac Gold Syndicate Ltd. et al.[30], at p. 165 (Ont. C.A.); Williams and Cameron v. Keyes and Pyramid Mining Co. Ltd.[31], at p. 568 (B.C.S.C.); Shaw v. Holland[32].)

A different consideration arises where the plaintiff-buyer has prepaid the contract price and has not received delivery. As in the case of non-return of shares, the breach does not give rise to any asset in the hands of the plaintiff since he has already parted with his funds and on that basis some courts have held that the injured party need not purchase like goods in the market. This view received indirect support in Gainsford v. Carroll et logue car, étant libéré de l'obligation de payer, l'acheteur détient un bien (en l'occurrence l'argent réservé au paiement des marchandises) dont il ne disposait pas avant. Ce n'est pas le cas de Baud qui, pour limiter le préjudice résultant de la détention de ses actions d'Asamera, aurait pu être appelée à débourser une somme considérable pour remplacer les actions que Brook refusait de lui rendre. Puisque le preuve ne révèle aucun manque de fonds pour ce faire, l'arrêt Liesbosch Dredger v. S.S. «Edison»[29] n'est pas pertinent. Il est évident que la non-restitution des actions ne procurait aucun bien. Si cette théorie reflète l'état du droit et la survenance d'un bien est une condition essentielle à l'existence de l'obligation de limiter le préjudice, cette obligation n'existe pas en l'espèce.

Le résultat contraire surviendrait donc dans le cas de dommages-intérêts découlant de l'inexécution par le vendeur d'un contrat de vente d'actions. Dans ce cas, l'inexécution permettrait à l'acheteur d'utiliser l'argent réservé à l'achat et, en conséquence, le montant des dommages-intérêts devrait être évalué en tenant compte de l'obligation de l'acheteur de prendre des mesures pour limiter le préjudice, savoir l'achat d'actions sur le marché au moment de la violation du contrat. C'est actuellement l'état du droit. (Voir Dawson v. Helicopter Exploration Co. Ltd., précité; Pitfield & Co. Ltd. v. Jomac Gold Syndicate Ltd. et al.[30], à la p. 165 (C.A. de l'Ont.); Williams and Cameron v. Keyes and Pyramid Mining Co. Ltd.[31], à la p. 568 (C.S. de la C.-B.); Shaw v. Holland[32].)

La situation est différente lorsque le demandeur-acheteur a payé d'avance le prix et n'a pas reçu la contrepartie. Comme dans le cas de la non-restitution des actions, la violation du contrat ne met aucun bien dans les mains du demandeur puisqu'il a déjà payé. Pour cette raison, certains tribunaux ont jugé que la partie lésée n'est pas tenue d'acheter des marchandises équivalentes sur le marché. Les arrêts Gainsford v. Carroll et al.[33]

al.[33] and in Shaw v. Holland, supra, but was rejected in Startup et al. v. Cortazzi[34]. However, when the point was raised in the Court of Appeal of England in Aronson v. Mologa Holzindustrie A/G Leningrad[35], Atkin L.J. after considering American authority, left the point open. In Peebles v. Pfeifer[36], Bigelow J. held that a purchaser of wheat who had paid for delivery was entitled to recover the market price of the wheat not at the time of breach when the price was 76 cents a bushel but at the time of trial when the price was $1.68. The same reasoning was applied by the Privy Council in Robertson v. Dumaresq[37], in assessing damages on the non-conveyance of land where the purchaser had already supplied the consideration. (Per Lord Chelmsford at p. 95; referred to in Horsnail v. Shute[38], at p. 200.)

et Shaw v. Holland, précité, appuient indirectement cette opinion alors que l'arrêt Startup et al. v. Cortazzi[34] la rejette. Lorsque la question a été soulevée devant la Cour d'appel d'Angleterre dans l'affaire Aronson v. Mologa Holzindustrie A/G Leningrad[35], après avoir étudié la jurisprudence américaine, le lord juge Atkin n'a pas tranché ce point. Dans l'arrêt Peebles v. Pfeifer[36], le juge Bigelow a statué qu'un acheteur de blé qui avait payé d'avance avait le droit d'être indemnisé en fonction de la valeur marchande du blé au moment du procès, soit $1.68 le boisseau même s'il ne valait que 76 cents au moment de la rupture du contrat. Le Conseil privé a suivi le même raisonnement dans l'arrêt Robertson v. Dumaresq[37], en évaluant les dommages-intérêts pour refus de céder le titre d'un terrain pour lequel l'acheteur avait déjà fourni la contrepartie. (Lord Chelmsford à la p. 95; mentionné dans l'arrêt Horsnail v. Shute[38], à la p. 200.)

In Hoefle v. Bongard & Company[39], this Court had to contend with facts which bear a remarkable similarity to the facts in the case at bar. Rand J. adopted the English test and denied a duty to mitigate after a breach involving the non-return of shares. The facts were simple. Hoefle had authorized the transfer of 500 shares which were held on his account by his brokers, to the account of a close friend, a Mrs. Hazel Weeks, to secure the deficit in Mrs. Weeks' account. The brokers sold the shares to liquidate the deficit, and Hoefle sued for damages arising on the alleged unauthorized disposition of the shares. Four members of a Court of five found that the sale had in fact been authorized under the terms of the transfer, dismissed the action, and thus did not consider the damage issue.

Dans l'arrêt Hoefle c. Bongard & Company[39], cette Cour avait à considérer des faits d'une ressemblance frappante avec ceux de la présente affaire. Le juge Rand a adopté le critère anglais et jugé que l'obligation de limiter le préjudice n'existe pas dans le cas de non-restitution d'actions. Les faits sont simples. Hoefle avait autorisé le transfert de 500 actions détenues par ses courtiers en son nom pour garantir le déficit au compte d'une amie intime, une nommée Hazel Weeks. Les courtiers ont vendu les actions pour combler le déficit et Hoefle les a poursuivis en dommages-intérêts en alléguant que la vente n'était pas autorisée. Quatre juges sur cinq ont jugé que la vente était effectivement autorisée par le transfert et ont rejeté l'action sans étudier la question des dommages-intérêts.

Rand J. concluded that the sale of the shares constituted a breach of contract and had this to say regarding the assessment of damages (at p. 373):

Le juge Rand ayant conclu que la vente des actions constituait une violation de contrat, a écrit ce qui suit au sujet de l'évaluation des dommages-intérêts (p. 373):

[39] [1945] R.C.S. 360.

One consideration may be cleared away. It is not a case for any rule of mitigation. The broker is in as good a position as the owner to redeem the situation or to mitigate the consequences: Grose, J. in Shepherd v. Johnson.

The object of damages is to restore the owner as nearly as possible to the same position as if the terms of the bailment had been respected. What he would have done in the intervening time, if the security had remained, is the speculative basis from which the inferences must be drawn. We cannot say that he would have sold at the highest or at the lowest price or that he would have sold at all. But so far as the circumstances permit, they are to be the ground of conclusions of probability: Williams v. Peel River Land and Mineral Company Ltd. The case is analogous to that of a breach of covenant to re-deliver shares and prima facie the defendants are held to have prevented the shares from remaining the property of the plaintiff up to the trial: Best C.J., in Harrison v. Harrison:

> I think the fair rule is, to take the damages at the price of yesterday or to-day. When you had the money, you promised to restore the stock. Justice is not done, if you do not place the plaintiff in the same situation in which he would have been if the stock had been replaced at the stipulated time. We cannot act on the possibility of the plaintiff's not keeping it there. All we can say is,—you have effectually prevented him from doing so.

Owen v. Routh treats the rule as absolute.

Accordingly, although the shares at the date of breach were trading at $1.80 per share, Rand J. calculated Hoefle's damages on the basis of a share value of $4 that being the value at the time of trial.

This view was not shared by the majority of the Court who in the event found it unnecessary to settle the point. The creation of an 'asset' on a breach of contract cannot be an invariable prerequisite to the operation of the principle that a party injured by a breach of contract must respond in mitigation to avoid an unconscionable accumulation of losses. Nor should the absence of such an 'asset' invariably exonerate a plaintiff from taking mitigative action. The presence or absence of such an 'asset' is but one of many factors which bear on the task of determining in a particular case what is [TRADUCTION] Une question peut être tranchée immédiatement. L'obligation de limiter le préjudice n'existe pas en l'espèce. Le courtier était autant en mesure que le propriétaire de corriger la situation ou d'en limiter les conséquences: le juge Grose, dans Shepherd v. Johnson.

L'adjudication de dommages-intérêts vise à remettre le propriétaire dans la même situation, autant que faire se peut, que si le contrat de dépôt avait été respecté. Pour fonder notre raisonnnement, il faut se demander ce qu'il aurait fait des valeurs pendant la période en cause. On ne peut pas dire qu'il les aurait vendues à leur cote maximale ou minimale, ni même s'il les aurait vendues. Mais ce sont ces considérations qu'il faut peser, compte tenu des circonstances, pour déterminer les probabilités: Williams v. Peel River Land and Mineral Company Ltd. Il s'agit d'un cas analogue au défaut de rendre des actions et, dans un tel cas, les défendeurs sont à première vue présumés avoir empêché le demandeur de conserver la propriété de ses actions jusqu'au procès: le juge en chef Best dans Harrison v. Harrison:

> A mon avis, pour être juste, il faut établir les dommages-intérêts en fonction des cours d'hier ou d'aujourd'hui. L'engagement de rendre les actions a été pris alors que le défendeur avait l'argent. Justice n'est faite que lorsque le demandeur est remis dans la même situation que si les actions lui avaient été rendues à la date convenue. On ne peut présumer que le demandeur s'en serait départi. Tout ce qu'on peut dire, c'est que vous l'en avez empêché.

L'arrêt Owen v. Routh considère cette règle comme absolue.

En conséquence, même si les actions valaient $1.80 chacune au moment de la violation du contrat, le juge Rand a pris la valeur au moment du procès, soit $4 l'action, pour calculer les dommages-intérêts dus à Hoefle.

Ne parvenant pas à la même conclusion, la majorité en cette Cour n'a pas jugé nécessaire de trancher cette question. La survenance d'un «bien» lors de la rupture du contrat ne peut pas constituer dans tous les cas une condition préalable à l'existence de l'obligation pour la partie lésée de limiter le préjudice en empêchant une accumulation indue de pertes pouvant résulter de la violation. Et on ne peut dire non plus qu'à défaut d'un tel «bien», le demandeur soit automatiquement libéré de l'obligation de limiter le préjudice. La présence ou l'absence d'un «bien» n'est qu'un des nombreux or is not reasonable on the part of the injured party in all the circumstances. The decisions which purport to allow recovery on the basis of the increased value of the res of the action between the date of breach and the end of trial have been denied authority by the learned editors of Halsbury's Laws of England (3rd ed. 1960) vol. 34, at p. 155. After noting the old cases, some of which are reviewed above, the editors conclude that "the measures [of damages] must vary according to the facts".

In short it would appear that the principles of mitigation in respect of contracts for the sale of goods generally may not be applied without reservation to the determination of the duty to mitigate arising in respect of contracts for the sale of shares; and in any case differ fundamentally from the case of a breach of a contract for the return of shares. It is inappropriate in my view simply to extend the old principles applied in the detinue and conversion authorities to the non-return of shares with the result that a party whose property has not been returned to him, could sit by and await an opportune moment to institute legal proceedings, all the while imposing on a defendant the substantial risk of market fluctuations between breach and trial which might very well drive him into bankruptcy. Damages which could have been avoided by the taking of reasonable steps in all the circumstances should not, and indeed in the interests of commercial enterprise, must not be thrown onto the shoulders of a defendant by an arbitrary although neatly universal rule for the recovery of damages on breach of the contract for redelivery of property.

We start of course with the fundamental principle of mitigation authoritatively stated by Viscount Haldane L.C. in British Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company, Limited v. Underground Electric Railways Company of facteurs à prendre en considération pour déterminer si, dans une affaire donnée, l'attitude de la partie lésée est raisonnable compte tenu des circonstances. D'après les savants rédacteurs de Halsbury's Laws of England, (3e éd. 1960) t. 34, à la p. 155, les jugements qui accordent des dommages-intérêts calculés d'après l'augmentation de la valeur du bien faisant l'objet du litige entre la date de la rupture du contrat et celle de la fin du procès ne font pas jurisprudence. Après avoir pris note des anciennes causes, dont certaines sont étudiées plus haut, ils concluent que [TRADUCTION] «l'évaluation [des dommages-intérêts] doit dépendre des circonstances».

Il ressort donc que les principes concernant l'obligation de limiter le préjudice dans le cas des contrats de vente de marchandises en général ne s'appliquent pas intégralement aux fins de l'évaluation de cette obligation dans le cas des contrats de vente d'actions et diffèrent fondamentalement des cas d'inexécution de contrat par défaut de rendre des actions. A mon avis, les anciens principes régissant l'action en restitution et l'action pour appropriation illégale ne s'appliquent pas en cas de défaut de rendre des actions en conformité d'un contrat, car ils permettraient à la partie lésée d'attendre le moment opportun pour intenter son recours, tout en faisant subir au défendeur le risque de fluctuations considérables du marché entre la date de la rupture du contrat et celle du procès, qui pourraient le pousser à la faillite. Les pertes qui auraient pu être évitées si l'on avait pris des mesures raisonnables dans les circonstances pour limiter le préjudice ne doivent pas, dans l'intérêt même du monde des affaires, être uniquement supportées par le défendeur en vertu d'une règle d'application universelle, mais arbitraire, pour le calcul des dommages-intérêts en cas de défaut de rendre des biens conformément à un contrat.

Il importe d'abord de voir en quels termes le lord chancelier vicomte Haldane a énoncé de façon non équivoque le principe de base en matière d'obligation de limiter le préjudice dans l'arrêt British Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company, Limited v. Underground Electric Rail-

London, Limited[40], at p. 689:

The fundamental basis is thus compensation for pecuniary loss naturally flowing from the breach; but this first principle is qualified by a second, which imposes on a plaintiff the duty of taking all reasonable steps to mitigate the loss consequent on the breach, and debars him from claiming any part of the damage which is due to his neglect to take such steps. In the words of James L.J. in Dunkirk Colliery Co. v. Lever, "The person who has broken the contract is not to be exposed to additional cost by reason of the plaintiffs not doing what they ought to have done as reasonable men, and the plaintiffs not being under any obligation to do anything otherwise that in the ordinary course of business."

As James L.J. indicates, this second principle does not impose on the plaintiff an obligation to take any step which a reasonable and prudent man would not ordinarily take in the course of his business. But when in the course of his business he has taken action arising out of the transaction, which action has diminished his loss, the effect in actual diminution of the loss he has suffered may be taken into account even though there was no duty on him to act.

That principle has been applied in the case of conversion of shares, as well as in the case of breach of contract to sell shares, and should for the reasons developed above, be applied according to the circumstances to the case of a breach of contract to return shares.

It is interesting that in the United States, rules essentially the same as those advanced towards the end of the nineteenth century in England were jettisoned in 1899 through the adoption of what is now commonly referred to as the "New York rule". This rule has been applied in a variety of situations encompassing both contractual and tortious wrongs, and its justification is not easily disputed.

The leading authority for the "New York rule" is Galigher v. Jones[41], where the Supreme Court of the United States laid to rest the proposition that a plaintiff wronged by the unauthorized sale of his shares, or by the failure to purchase shares ways Company of London, Limited[40], à la p. 689:

[TRADUCTION] Le principe fondamental est donc la compensation des pertes pécuniaires découlant naturellement de l'inexécution; mais ce principe est mitigé par un autre qui veut que le demandeur ait l'obligation de prendre toutes mesures raisonnables pour limiter le préjudice résultant de la rupture du contrat et ne puisse être indemnisé pour la partie du préjudice qu'il aurait ainsi pu éviter. Comme l'a écrit le lord juge James dans Dunkirk Colliery Co. v. Lever, «Celui qui ne respecte pas un contrat n'est pas responsable des dommages supplémentaires attribuables à l'inaction des demandeurs, ces derniers étant tenus d'agir en hommes raisonnables sans toutefois être obligés de prendre d'autres mesures que celles se situant dans le cours normal des affaires».

Comme le précise le lord juge James, ce second principe n'impose pas au demandeur l'obligation de prendre des mesures différentes de celles que prendrait un homme raisonnable et prudent dans le cours normal de ses affaires. Cependant, lorsque dans le cours de ses affaires il prend une mesure liée à la transaction qui a pour effet de réduire les pertes, la diminution du préjudice peut être prise en considération même s'il n'était pas tenu d'agir ainsi.

Ce principe a été appliqué dans les cas d'appropriation illégale d'actions et de rupture de contrats de vente d'actions et, pour les motifs susmentionnés, il devrait également s'appliquer, selon les circonstances, aux cas de violation d'un engagement de rendre des actions.

Il est intéressant de noter qu'aux États-Unis, des règles semblables aux règles élaborées en Angleterre vers la fin du dix-neuvième siècle ont été mises au rancart en 1899 en faveur de ce que l'on appelle communément la «règle de New York». Cette règle a été appliquée autant en matière contractuelle que délictuelle et ses assises sont difficilement contestables.

L'arrêt clé en ce qui concerne la «règle de New York» est Galigher v. Jones[41], où la Cour suprême des États-Unis a rejeté définitivement la thèse selon laquelle un demandeur lésé par la vente non autorisée de ses actions ou par l'omission d'acheter at his direction, may recover losses which he might have avoided. The Court was critical of the old rules which would arbitrarily award the highest intermediate value of the stock between the date of the wrong and the date of trial. The remarks of Mr. Justice Bradley at pp. 200-202 are apt to the resolution of the issues in this case:

The rule of highest intermediate value as applied to stock transactions has been adopted in England and in several of the States in this country whilst in some others it has not obtained. The form and extent of the rule have been the subject of much discussion and conflict of opinion. The cases will be found collected in Sedgwick on the Measure of Damages [479], Vol. 2, 7th ed. p. 379, note (b); Mayne, Damages, 83 (92 Law Lib.); 1 Sm. Lead. Cas. 7th Am. ed. 367. The English cases usually referred to are Cud v. Rutter, 1 P. Wms. 572, 4th ed. note (3); Owen v. Routh, 14 C.B. 327; Loder v. Kekulé, 3 C.B.N.S. 128; France v. Gaudet, L.R. 6 Q.B. 199. It is laid down in these cases that where there has been a loan of stock and a breach of the agreement to replace it, the measure of damages will be the value of the stock at its highest price on or before the day of trial.

Perhaps more transactions of this kind arise in the State of New York than in all other parts of the country. The rule of highest intermediate value up to the time of trial formerly prevailed in that State, and may be found laid down in Romaine v. Van Allen, 26 N.Y. 309, and Markham v. Jaudon, 41 N.Y. 235, and other cases,—although the rigid application of the rule was deprecated by the New York Superior Court in an able opinion by Judge Duer, in Suydam v. Jenkins, 3 Sandf. 614. The hardship which arose from estimating the damages by the highest price up to the time of trial, which might be years after the transaction occurred, was often so great that the Court of Appeals of New York was constrained to introduce a material modification in the form of the rule, and to hold the true and just measure of damages in these cases to be the highest intermediate value of the stock between the time of its conversion and a reasonable time after the owner has received notice of it to enable him to replace the stock. This modification of the rule was very ably enforced in an opinion of the court of appeals delivered by Judge Rapallo, in the case of Baker v. Drake, 53 N.Y. 211 .... It would be a herculean task to review all the various and conflicting opinions that have been delivered on this subject. On the whole, it seems to us that the New York rule, as finally settled by the court of appeals, des actions selon ses directives pourrait recouvrer des dommages-intérêts qu'il aurait pu éviter. La Cour a critiqué l'ancienne règle qui accordait arbitrairement la cote intermédiaire maximale atteinte par les actions entre la date de la violation et celle du procès. Les commentaires suivants du juge Bradley sont pertinents (pp. 200 à 202):

[TRADUCTION] La règle de la cote intermédiaire maximale relative aux opérations de bourse a été adoptée en Angleterre et dans plusieurs États américains, alors qu'elle était rejetée dans d'autres. Sa nature et sa portée ont fait l'objet de nombreuses discussions et divergences d'opinion. Les arrêts pertinents sont étudiés dans Sedgwick on the Measure of Damages [479], t. 2, 7e éd. p. 379, note (b); Mayne, Damages, 83 (92 Law Lib.); 1 Sm. Lead. Cas. 7e éd. mod. 367. Les arrêts anglais auxquels on se réfère le plus souvent sont: Cud v. Rutter, 1 P. Wms. 572, 4e éd. note (3); Owen v. Routh, 14 C.B. 327; Loder v. Kekulé, 3 C.B.N.S. 128; France v. Gaudet, L.R. 6 Q.B. 199. Ces arrêts établissent que dans le cas d'un prêt d'actions et de la violation de l'engagement prévoyant leur remplacement, les dommages-intérêts sont fondés sur le cote maximale atteinte par les actions à la date du procès ou avant.

Il y a probablement plus d'opérations de ce genre dans l'État de New York que dans tout le reste du pays. La règle de la cote intermédiaire maximale des actions y a déjà prévalu, comme le démontrent certains arrêts, notamment Romaine v. Van Allen, 26 N.Y. 309 et Markham v. Jaudon, 41 N.Y. 235,—mais son application rigoureuse a été désapprouvée par la Cour supérieure de New York: voir le jugement du juge Duer dans Suydam v. Jenkins, 3 Sandf. 614. Les difficultés qu'entraînait l'évaluation des dommages-intérêts à partir de la cote maximale atteinte avant le procès, qui pouvait avoir lieu plusieurs années après l'opération, étaient telles que la Cour d'appel de New York s'est vue obligée de modifier considérablement la règle et de statuer que la seule façon équitable d'évaluer les dommages était de considérer la cote intermédiaire maximale atteinte par les actions entre le moment de leur appropriation illégale et un temps raisonnable après que leur propriétaire en eut été informé afin de lui permettre de les remplacer. Cette règle modifiée a été très habilement appliquée dans une décision de la Cour d'appel rendue par le juge Rapallo dans l'affaire Baker v. Drake, 53 N.Y. 211 ... Ce serait un travail énorme de revoir toutes les opinions, souvent divergentes, rédigées sur le sujet. Tout bien considéré, nous concluons que la règle de New York, qu'a entérinée la Cour d'appel, doit l'emporter parce has the most reasons in its favour, and we adopt it as a correct view of the law. (Emphasis added.)

(Vide Annot. 31 ALR 3d 1286; Mitchell v. Texas Gulf Sulphur Company[42].)

While the circumstances of the case prompted the Court to direct if not to confine its direction to conversion of the shares and its consequences, the broader principle is simply the right to damages arising on the breach of contract to redeliver whatever the reason for breach might have been, that is with or without a conversion. The application of such a principle to the circumstances arising herein following the breach to redeliver raises some additional considerations.

This Court in The Queen v. Arnold, supra, considered in some detail the limitations to be placed on the damages recoverable in conversion upon a failure to return securities. The majority dismissed the plaintiff's claim for reasons not here relevant. Spence J. would have allowed the claim in part and in doing so stated at p. 230:

> Surely a plaintiff whose securities have been converted, cannot wait to issue process for their recovery or damages for the conversion until just before the period of limitation lapses, then be entitled to claim damages fixed at the highest value of those securities within the six-year limitation term.

Spence J. concluded that the plaintiff could not recover losses which might have been avoided by the purchase of alternate shares. The majority judgment by Martland J. as I have noted did not have to deal with damages but concluded at p. 221:

> . . . but, if I had had to deal with that issue, I would have concurred in the views expressed by my brother Spence.

The result is in accord with the so-called New York rule in so far as it abrogates the "highest intermediate point" doctrine. The same principle was applied in assessing damages for conversion of personal property other than corporate securities qu'à notre avis, elle énonce correctement l'état du droit. (C'est moi qui souligne.)

Même si les circonstances de cette affaire ont fait que la Cour s'est en pratique limitée à la question de l'appropriation illégale d'actions et à ses conséquences, le principe général qui se dégage est le droit de recouvrer les dommages-intérêts résultant de la rupture d'un contrat prévoyant la restitution d'un bien, peu importe la cause de la rupture et qu'il y ait eu ou non appropriation illégale. L'application de ce principe en l'espèce, savoir la rupture du contrat prévoyant la restitution et ce qui s'ensuit, soulève d'autres questions.

Dans l'affaire La Reine c. Arnold, précitée, cette Cour a analysé les restrictions à appliquer à l'évaluation des dommages-intérêts pour défaut de restitution des actions par suite d'une appropriation illégale. A la majorité, la Cour a rejeté l'action pour des motifs non pertinents en l'espèce. Le juge Spence aurait accueilli la demande en partie, et a déclaré ce faisant (à la p. 230):

> Il va sans dire qu'un demandeur dont les valeurs ont été réalisées illégalement ne peut attendre que le délai de prescription soit presque écoulé pour intenter des procédures en recouvrement ou en dommages pour l'appropriation, et ensuite avoir le droit de réclamer des dommages correspondant à la cote maximale atteinte par ces valeurs pendant le délai de prescription de six ans.

Le juge Spence a conclu que le demandeur n'avait pas le droit d'être indemnisé pour un préjudice qu'il aurait pu éviter en achetant des actions de remplacement. Comme je l'ai indiqué, le jugement de la majorité, rédigé par le juge Martland, n'avait pas à trancher la question des dommages-intérêts, mais précise quand même (à la p. 221):

> . . . cependant, si j'avais eu à décider de cette question, je me serais rangé à l'avis de mon collègue le juge Spence.

Le résultat est conforme à la règle dite de New York, dans la mesure où il rejette la doctrine de la «cote intermédiaire maximale». Le même principe a été retenu aux fins de l'évaluation des dommages résultant de l'appropriation illégale de biens per-in Sachs v. Miklos[43]. There may, as already discussed, be instances where mitigation will not require a plaintiff to incur the significant risk and expense of purchasing replacement property, but in any case the plaintiff must crystallize his claim either by replacement acquisition or in some circumstances by prompt litigation expeditiously prosecuted which will enable the court to establish the damage with reference to the mitigative measures imposed by law. The failure of the appellant either to mitigate or litigate promptly makes difficult the task of applying these principles to the circumstances of this case.

In the light of the enormous hardships sometimes occasioned by the application of the old doctrine of damage assessment, and in view of the massive distortion which may follow when the principles of mitigation are, as in the older authorities, made inapplicable to non-delivery of shares, I have come to the conclusion that the authorities cited from the early 1800's principally from the courts of England, which in effect allow recovery of "avoidable losses" ought not to be followed. Rather the lead furnished by The Queen v. Arnold, supra, should be taken. Subject always to the precise circumstances of each case, this will impose on the injured party the obligation to purchase like shares in the market on the date of breach (or knowledge thereof in the plaintiff) or more frequently within a period thereafter which is reasonable in all the circumstances. The implementation of this principle must take cognizance of the realities of market operations including the nature of the shares in question, the strength of the market when called upon to digest large orders to buy or sell, the number of shares qualified for public trading, the recent volatility of the price, the recent volume of trading, the general state of the market at the time, the susceptibility of the price of the shares to the current operation of the corporation, and similar considerations.

Some classes of property, including shares, whose value is subject to sudden and constant fluctuations of unpredictable amplitude, and sonnels autres que des valeurs mobilières dans l'arrêt Sachs v. Miklos[43]. Comme je l'ai déjà noté, il peut y avoir des cas où le devoir de limiter le préjudice n'oblige pas le demandeur à s'exposer aux risques et aux dépenses considérables d'un achat de biens de remplacement, mais il n'en demeure pas moins que le demandeur doit dans tous les cas établir sa réclamation soit en achetant des biens de remplacement soit en intentant rapidement une action et en procédant avec diligence afin de permettre à la cour d'évaluer le montant des dommages compte tenu des mesures qu'il est tenu de prendre, en droit, pour limiter le préjudice. L'appelante n'ayant fait ni l'un ni l'autre, il est difficile d'appliquer ces principes en l'espèce.

Compte tenu des difficultés considérables que peut entraîner l'application de l'ancienne jurisprudence en matière d'évaluation des dommages-intérêts et des différences importantes qui résultent de ce que cette jurisprudence n'impose aucune obligation de limiter le préjudice dans les cas de non-restitution d'actions, je conclus que la jurisprudence constituée depuis le début du dix-neuvième siècle, en grande partie devant les tribunaux anglais, et selon laquelle des «pertes évitables» sont sujettes à indemnisation, ne doit pas être suivie. C'est plutôt le principe énoncé dans La Reine c. Arnold, précité, qu'il faut retenir. Sous réserve des circonstances propres à chaque cas, la partie lésée sera donc dans l'obligation d'acheter des actions semblables sur le marché, au moment de la rupture du contrat (ou au moment où elle en prend connaissance), ou bien, ce qui sera plus souvent le cas, dans un délai raisonnable dans les circonstances. L'application de ce principe doit tenir compte des aléas du marché des valeurs, savoir la nature des actions en cause, la résistance du marché lors de transactions importantes, le nombre d'actions en vente libre, les fluctuations récentes de prix, le volume des transactions récentes, le climat général du marché à ce moment-là, l'influence des opérations courantes de la compagnie sur le prix des actions et d'autres considérations de ce genre.

Pour certains biens, comme les actions, dont la valeur est constamment exposée à des fluctuations soudaines et d'une ampleur imprévisible, et dont whose purchase is not lightly entered into, call for a modification of the general rule that the value of the property on the "date of breach" be taken as the starting point for the calculation of damages. There is some authority for this view in English law as well. In Atiyah, Sale of Goods, (4th ed. 1974), at p. 294, the learned author has this to say:

> Although the market price rule is now firmly established in English law it may be observed that there are cases in which it does not do full justice to the buyer. In particular it is unrealistic to suppose that a buyer will in practice be able to buy goods on the market on the very day on which the seller fails to deliver. The buyer will often wish to consider his position, or to negotiate with the seller on breach and some delay before he buys substitute goods is likely to be the rule rather than the exception.

This principle has been discussed and at least partially adopted in Hooper v. Herts[44], per Romer L.J. at p. 564; Sharpe & Co., Ltd[45]; Stewart v. Cauty[46], per Alderson B. at p. 162; Pitfield & Co. Ltd. v. Jomac Gold Syndicate Ltd. et al., supra.

It is contended by the appellant, Baud, however, that the peculiar circumstances of this case rendered the purchase of highly speculative shares in a company controlled by its adversary unreasonable in all of the circumstances, particularly the injunction obtained by the appellant restraining the sale of 125,000 Asamera shares held by Brook. Nonetheless, it remains the case that at least some of the losses claimed by the appellant could have been avoided by the taking of other reasonable steps. The most obvious of these would have been to move with reasonable speed to institute and proceed with legal action in an effort either to recover the shares, and if that was not possible, then to recover damages. It is, of course, exceedingly difficult to establish in this Court the precise point in time at which the trial in this action would have been held had the appellant moved with reasonable dispatch. The case has slowly wended its way through interlocutory stages and eventually reached trial which in turn was spread over 1½ l'achat exige une certaine expérience, il faut modifier la règle générale selon laquelle la valeur du bien à la «date de la rupture» constitue la base de calcul des dommages-intérêts. La jurisprudence anglaise semble aussi appuyer cette thèse. On trouve à la p. 294 de Atiyah, Sale of Goods (4e éd. 1974):

Cette thèse a été analysée et adoptée, du moins en partie, dans les arrêts suivants: Hooper v. Herts[44], le lord juge Romer, à la p. 564; Sharpe & Co., Ltd.[45]; Stewart v. Cauty[46], le baron Alderson, à la p. 162; Pitfield & Co. Ltd. v. Jomac Gold Syndicate Ltd. et al., précité.

L'appelante Baud soutient cependant que les circonstances particulières de l'espèce rendaient tout à fait déraisonnable l'achat d'actions hautement spéculatives d'une compagnie contrôlée par son adversaire, notamment parce qu'elle avait obtenu une injonction interdisant à Brook de vendre 125,000 actions d'Asamera qu'il détenait. Il n'en demeure pas moins que l'appelante aurait pu éviter certaines pertes à l'égard desquelles elle réclame un dédommagement en prenant d'autres mesures raisonnables. Il est évident qu'elle aurait dû faire preuve d'une diligence raisonnable pour intenter des poursuites en vue de récupérer les actions et, subsidiairement, obtenir des dommages-intérêts. Il est bien sûr extrêmement difficile en cette Cour d'établir le moment précis auquel le procès aurait eu lieu si l'appelante avait fait preuve de diligence raisonnable. L'affaire a lentement suivi son cours au gré des procédures interlocutoires, pour finalement atteindre l'étape du procès qui a duré un an et demi. Le premier recours ayant été years. The litigation has been in the Courts now some 18 years having commenced in July 1960.

There are numerous explanations given by the appellant and indeed not seriously disputed in this Court by the respondent for these protracted proceedings. At one stage for example Brook asked Baud sometime prior to 1966 to "abstain from following up the law suit". Baud on the other hand expressed no desire for very practical reasons either to press its suit until the end of 1966, when Asamera finally managed to produce its first oil in Sumatra, ". . . and the shares began to slowly get up in value," and as the appellant put it, "we had to renew the case against him . . .". In my view the law required more of Baud. It placed upon Baud the duty in the sense referred to in Red Deer College v. Michaels and Finn, supra, to mitigate its losses by acquiring shares in a company known by Baud to be far from financially sound. It might therefore be said that Baud would have hung back from any action (either the purchase of shares or the pressing of its claims in court) until Asamera struck oil, whether or not Brook had requested it to do so.

One must not become so lost in the technicalities of damages in the law of contract as to lose sight of the practical consideration of the cost of money and of the reality of the risks to be imposed on a plaintiff by a requirement of complete mitigating measures. In this case the magnitude of the operation, in the range of $800,000 to $1,000,000 if the shares were to cost $7 to $8 each, leads one to conclude that a 'reasonable' time for mitigative action must be allowed after the appropriate point of time in law has been isolated.

The appellant bases its contention that it has no obligation to purchase shares in the market in part on the ground that it ought to be allowed to seek specific performance of the contract to return the shares, and while relying on an injunction restraining their disposition it need not have any concern with losses occasioned by its inaction. Counsel for the appellant did not refer this Court to any cases introduit en juillet 1960, les tribunaux sont saisis de ce litige depuis maintenant 18 ans.

L'appelante a donné plusieurs raisons, que l'intimé n'a pas vraiment contestées devant cette Cour, pour expliquer cette prolongation des procédures. Par exemple, à un moment donné (avant 1966), Brook aurait demandé à Baud de [TRADUCTION] «laisser tomber les procédures judiciaires». Par contre, Baud, pour des raisons bien pratiques, n'a rien fait pour accélérer les procédures avant la fin de 1966, époque à laquelle Asamera s'est finalement mise à extraire du pétrole à Sumatra; [TRADUCTION] «les actions ont alors lentement pris de la valeur» et il a fallu, pour citer l'appelante, [TRADUCTION] «intenter une nouvelle action contre lui . . .» . A mon avis, en droit, Baud devait aller plus loin. Elle avait l'obligation, au sens de l'arrêt Red Deer College c. Michaels et Finn, précité, de limiter le préjudice en achetant des actions dans une compagnie qu'elle savait loin d'être dans une situation financière solide. On peut donc dire que Baud n'aurait rien fait (ni en achetant des actions, ni en accélérant les procédures judiciaires) avant qu'Asamera n'ait commencé à extraire du pétrole, que Brook lui ait demandé ou non de s'abstenir.

L'analyse rigoureuse de la théorie des dommages-intérêts en matière contractuelle ne doit pas nous faire perdre de vue l'aspect pratique de la valeur de l'argent et des risques financiers auxquels on expose un demandeur en l'obligeant à prendre toutes les mesures possibles pour limiter le préjudice. En l'espèce, l'importance de l'opération, qui porte sur une somme de $800,000 à $1,000,000 de dollars—si les actions atteignent une valeur de $7 à $8 l'unité—nous amène à conclure qu'il faut accorder, après avoir identifié en droit la période clé, un délai «raisonnable» pour prendre lesdites mesures.

L'appelante soutient qu'elle n'était pas obligée d'acheter des actions sur le marché parce qu'elle avait le droit d'exiger l'exécution intégrale de l'engagement de rendre les actions et que, puisqu'une injonction en interdisait la vente, elle n'avait pas à se préoccuper des dommages qui pouvaient résulter de son inaction. Son avocat n'a cité devant nous aucune jurisprudence où les principes de limitation in which the principle of mitigation has interacted and conflicted with recovery by way of specific performance, and such authority as I have been able to discover supports the common sense view that the principle of mitigation should, unless there is a substantial and legitimate interest represented by specific performance, prevail in such a case.

This conflict sometimes occurs on the interaction of the principle of mitigation and an award of damages in lieu of or in addition to specific performance in equity. In decisions relating to damages, the Courts of Equity have acted on the authority of Lord Cairns' Act (more properly cited as the Chancery Amendment Act, 1858, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27, s. 2), which empowers a Court of Equity to award damages "either in addition to or in substitution for ... specific performance". Accordingly, in a number of cases concerning contracts for the sale of land, damages calculated on the value of the land as of the date of judgment, as opposed to the date of breach, have been awarded. (Vide Wroth v. Tyler, supra; Metropolitan Trust Co. of Canada et al. v. Pressure Concrete Services Ltd. et al., supra; Calgary Hardwood & Veneer Ltd. and Foreign and Domestic Wood Ltd. v. Canadian National Railway Company[47].) The Supreme Court of New Zealand in Hickey v. Bruhns[48], had occasion to review Wroth v. Tyler, supra, and the earlier authorities and after concluding that specific performance was inappropriate, held that an award of damages in substitution for specific performance must take into account the conduct of the parties, particularly when inordinate delay has occurred thereby making critical the date selected for the computation of damages. Vide Kaunas v. Smyth et al.[49]

On principle it is clear that a plaintiff may not merely by instituting proceedings in which a request is made for specific performance and/or damages, thereby shield himself and block the du préjudice entrent en conflit avec ceux de l'exécution intégrale du contrat. D'après la jurisprudence que j'ai consultée, c'est le bon sens qui l'emporte, savoir que le principe de la limitation du préjudice prévaut sauf si des intérêts primordiaux et légitimes justifient l'exécution intégrale du contrat.

En equity, ce conflit peut survenir lors de l'interaction du principe de limitation du préjudice et de celui de l'adjudication de dommages-intérêts au lieu ou en sus de l'exécution intégrale du contrat. Les décisions en matière de dommages-intérêts rendues par des tribunaux d'equity sont fondées sur la Lord Cairns' Act (dont la référence exacte est la Chancery Amendment Act, 1858, 21 & 22 Vict. chap. 27, art. 2), qui habilite les tribunaux d'equity à accorder des dommages-intérêts [TRADUCTION] «en sus ou au lieu de ... l'exécution intégrale». En conséquence, dans plusieurs affaires de contrats de vente de terrains, les dommages-intérêts ont été accordés sur la base de la valeur du terrain au moment du jugement plutôt qu'au moment de la rupture du contrat. (Voir Wroth v. Tyler, précité; Metropolitan Trust Co. of Canada et al. v. Pressure Concrete Services Ltd. et al., précité; Calgary Hardwood & Veneer Ltd. and Foreign and Domestic Wood Ltd. c. La Compagnie de chemins de fer nationaux du Canada[47].) Dans l'arrêt Hickey v. Bruhns[48], la Cour suprême de la Nouvelle-Zélande a eu l'occasion d'examiner l'arrêt Wroth v. Tyler, précité, de même que la jurisprudence antérieure et, après en être venue à la conclusion qu'une ordonnance d'exécution intégrale n'était pas appropriée, elle a statué que l'adjudication de dommages-intérêts au lieu d'une ordonnance d'exécution intégrale devait tenir compte de la conduite des parties, particulièrement dans un cas de retard excessif où la détermination de la date aux fins du calcul des dommages-intérêts est cruciale. Voir Kaunas v. Smyth et al.[49] court from taking into account the accumulation of losses which the plaintiff by acting with reasonable promptness in processing his claim could have avoided. Similarly, the bare institution of judicial process in circumstances where a reasonable response by the injured plaintiff would include mitigative replacement of property, will not entitle the plaintiff to the relief which would be achieved by such replacement purchase and prompt prosecution of the claim. Before a plaintiff can rely on a claim to specific performance so as to insulate himself from the consequences of failing to procure alternate property in mitigation of his losses, some fair, real, and substantial justification for his claim to performance must be found. Otherwise its effect will be to cast upon the defendant all the risk of aggravated loss by reason of delay in bringing the issue to trial. The appellant in this case contends that it ought to be allowed to rely on its claim for specific performance and the injunction issued in support of it, and thus recover avoidable losses. After serious consideration, I have concluded that this argument must fail.

cher la Cour de tenir compte de l'accumulation des pertes qu'il aurait pu éviter en procédant avec une diligence raisonnable. De même, la simple introduction de procédures judiciaires, quand le demandeur aurait dû aussi acheter des biens de remplacement en vue de limiter le préjudice, ne donne pas à ce dernier droit au même redressement que celui qu'il aurait obtenu en achetant des biens de remplacement et en faisant preuve de diligence à instituer son action. Pour qu'un demandeur puisse invoquer une action en exécution intégrale pour justifier son omission d'acheter des biens de remplacement pour limiter le préjudice, son action en exécution intégrale doit être fondée sur des motifs équitables, réels et importants. Sinon, le défendeur se trouve à supporter seul les risques d'une augmentation des pertes dues au retard dans l'institution du procès. En l'espèce, l'appelante soutient qu'on devrait lui reconnaître le droit d'invoquer son action en exécution intégrale et l'injonction décernée à cet égard de façon à lui permettre de recouvrer des pertes inévitables. Après mûre réflexion, je suis d'avis que cet argument n'est pas fondé.

It is, of course, an eminently reasonable position to take if, as Lord Reid suggests in White and Carter (Councils) Ltd. v. McGregor[50], in the case of anticipatory breach, there is a substantial and legitimate interest in looking to performance of a contractual obligation. So a plaintiff who has agreed to purchase a particular piece of real estate, or a block of shares which represent control of a company, or has entered into performance of his own obligations and where to discontinue performance might aggravate his losses, might well have sustained the position that the issuance of a writ for specific performance would hold in abeyance the obligation to avoid or reduce losses by acquisition of replacement property. Yet, even in these cases, the action for performance must be instituted and carried on with due diligence. This is but another application of the ordinary rule of mitigation which insists that the injured party act reasonably in all of the circumstances. Where those circumstances reveal a substantial and legiti-

Cet argument serait très raisonnable si, pour reprendre l'exemple de lord Reid dans White and Carter (Councils) Ltd. v. McGregor[50], une affaire d'intention arrêtée de ne pas exécuter un engagement, un intérêt important et légitime justifiait l'exécution intégrale de l'obligation. Prenons l'hypothèse d'un demandeur qui aurait convenu d'acheter un immeuble, ou une tranche d'actions lui donnant le contrôle d'une compagnie, ou qui aurait entrepris l'exécution de ses propres obligations et risquerait d'aggraver le préjudice s'il arrêtait ladite exécution. Un tel demandeur pourrait faire valoir qu'une ordonnance d'exécution intégrale de l'engagement suspend l'obligation d'éviter et de limiter le préjudice par l'achat d'un bien de remplacement. Mais même dans de tels cas, l'action en exécution intégrale doit être intentée et poursuivie avec une diligence raisonnable. Il s'agit ici de l'application de la règle en matière de limitation du préjudice, selon laquelle la partie lésée doit agir raisonnablement dans les circonstances. Le mate interest in seeking performance as opposed to damages, then a plaintiff will be able to justify his inaction and on failing in his plea for specific performance might then recover losses which in other circumstances might be classified as avoidable and thus unrecoverable; but such is not the case here.

All such principles lead back to the law enunciated in British Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company, Limited v. Underground Electric Railways Company of London, Limited, supra, and in fact are merely instances of the application of the principles set out therein to unusual circumstances or unusual combinations of conditions surrounding the parties after the breach.

Counsel for the appellant, Baud, faced with the argument that Baud's failure to mitigate its losses by the purchase of shares on the open market has exposed Brook to unreasonable claims for compensation for losses consequent upon Brook's failure to return the Asamera shares, asserted in this Court the proposition that mitigation in such circumstances would be unreasonable in that it would require the purchase of 125,000 Asamera shares by an investment by Baud in its adversary in these proceedings at the very time when Baud was asserting that Asamera was dominated and controlled by Brook. The answer to this proposition is simply that the appellant cannot have it both ways. On the one hand, it seeks recovery of certain shares which it alleges have been and are of substantial value to it. Yet it argues that it cannot reasonably have been expected to purchase replacement shares identical in all regards. If it is correct and sincere in its submission regarding the importance and inherent value of the shares, it ought to have instructed its brokers to acquire replacement shares within a reasonable time after the breach of contract. There is no suggestion that the appellant would not have been able to do so at that time.

Apparently at some stage in this transaction the Securities Exchange Commission of the United States limited or prohibited the sale of these and seul cas où un demandeur peut justifier son inaction est celui où l'action en exécution intégrale, par opposition à une action en dommages-intérêts, est fondée sur un intérêt important et légitime; dans ce cas, s'il n'obtient pas l'exécution intégrale, il peut obtenir des dommages-intérêts pour des pertes qui, en d'autres circonstances, auraient pu être évitées et pour lesquelles il n'aurait donc pas pu se faire indemniser. Ce n'est pas le cas en l'espèce.

Ces principes sont fondés sur l'arrêt British Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company, Limited v. Underground Electric Railways Company of London, Limited, précité, et ne sont en fait que des exemples d'application des principes contenus dans cet arrêt à des circonstances, ou à des combinaisons de circonstances, plutôt inhabituelles dans lesquelles les parties peuvent se trouver après la rupture du contrat.

En réponse à l'argument selon lequel le fait que Baud n'ait pas tenté de limiter le préjudice en achetant des actions sur le marché libre exposait Brook à des réclamations de dommages-intérêts excessifs pour son refus de rendre les actions d'Asamera, l'avocat de Baud soutient que l'application des principes de limitation du préjudice est déraisonnable en l'espèce car l'investissement de Baud en achetant 125,000 actions d'Asamera aurait été à l'avantage de son adversaire en l'espèce, alors qu'Asamera était, aux dires de Baud, dirigée et contrôlée par Brook. Ma réponse à cet argument est que l'appelante ne peut pas tout avoir à la fois. D'une part, elle demande qu'on lui rende des actions qui, selon elle, ont eu et ont encore beaucoup de valeur à ses yeux. D'autre part, elle prétend qu'il n'est pas raisonnable de dire qu'elle aurait dû acheter des actions de remplacement, identiques en tous points. Si elle croyait réellement à la valeur des actions, elle aurait dû demander à ses courtiers d'acheter des actions de remplacement dans un délai raisonnable après la rupture du contrat. Rien n'indique que l'appelante n'aurait pas pu le faire.

Il semble qu'à un stade de cette opération, la Commission américaine des valeurs mobilières ait restreint ou interdit la vente de ces actions et perhaps other Asamera holdings of the parties. By 1959 and 1960 when Brook sold the shares in question or a like number there appeared to be no prohibition either by S.E.C. order or regulation and so that element may be disregarded in the damage assessment process.

It was argued by counsel for Brook that failure by Baud to bring its claim for damages arising from the non-return of the Asamera shares before a trial court with promptness exposed Brook improperly to a magnified claim for damages. It is said by Baud on the other hand that by reason of the geographical spread of the adversaries, their witnesses and advisors, ranging as it did from Indonesia to New York, the Netherlands and Calgary, the staging of the legal proceedings including the examination for discovery was difficult and prolonged and this is no doubt true. For example, in May 1968 Brook revealed during examination for discovery that the sale of 125,000 shares had been carried out by Brook even before the date of expiry of the initial term of his option to purchase. He did not, however, at that time, know the precise dates and prices of the sale or sales and despite an undertaking to do so these were not communicated to Baud until April 1970 when Brook gave testimony at trial to the effect that these sales took place in December of 1957 and January-February 1958. Furthermore, as already observed, Brook asked Baud some time in the interval between the institution of action in 1961 and 1966 not to press the pending court actions. As we have seen, even the trial itself went with interruptions from June 1969 to December 1970 and judgment was ultimately entered in May 1972. The learned trial judge gave his reasons for judgment in April 1971 but by reason of issues thereupon brought to the attention of the Court further submissions were made by counsel and additional reasons were issued in May 1972. What then in all these circumstances is a 'reasonable' period of time within which to litigate these claims? Fortunately, the outcome of these proceedings does not depend directly on the determination of what in all these circumstances was a reasonable time within which to litigate these claims. The damages as already concluded are not peut-être d'autres valeurs d'Asamera détenues par les parties. Mais lorsqu'en 1959 et 1960 Brook a vendu les actions en question (ou le même nombre), aucune ordonnance ni aucun règlement de ladite Commission ne l'interdisait; nous n'avons donc pas à tenir compte de cet élément aux fins du calcul des dommages-intérêts.

L'avocat de Brook soutient que le manque de diligence de Baud dans la poursuite de son action en dommages-intérêts après le refus de Brook de lui rendre les actions d'Asamera exposait injustement ce dernier à des réclamations excessives. Baud prétend en revanche que la distance séparant les parties, leurs témoins et leurs conseillers, de l'Indonésie à New York en passant par la Hollande et Calgary, explique la lenteur des procédures et de l'interrogatoire préalable. C'est sans doute vrai. Par exemple, en mai 1968, Brook a révélé, à l'interrogatoire préalable, qu'il avait vendu 125,000 actions avant la date initiale d'expiration de son option d'achat. Il ne connaissait cependant pas, à cette époque, les dates et les prix de vente précis et, malgré les engagements pris, ces renseignements n'ont été communiqués à Baud qu'en avril 1970, au cours du témoignage de Brook qui a alors déclaré que les ventes avaient eu lieu en décembre 1957 et en janvier et février 1958. En outre, comme on l'a déjà noté, Brook avait demandé à Baud, entre l'institution de l'action en 1961 et 1966, de ne pas poursuivre l'affaire. Comme nous l'avons vu, même le procès (de juin 1969 à décembre 1970) a connu des interruptions et le jugement final date de mai 1972. Le savant juge de première instance avait rendu jugement en avril 1971, mais il restait des questions en litige. Les avocats ont donc présenté de nouveaux mémoires et des motifs supplémentaires ont été exposés en mai 1972. Dans ces circonstances, quelle période peut-on considérer «raisonnable» pour la poursuite de l'action? Fort heureusement, la solution du présent litige ne dépend pas directement de savoir quelle aurait pu être cette période raisonnable pour obtenir un jugement. Comme je l'ai déjà dit, les dommages-intérêts ne doivent pas être évalués en fonction de la cote maximale des actions entre la date de la rupture du contrat et la date du procès. L'obligation en droit de l'appelante de limiter le préjudice ne dépend pas de la date du to be assessed on the basis of the highest price of the shares between breach and trial. The mitigation required of the appellant in law is not dependent on the date of judgment. Litigation may be an alternate procedure leading to the crystallization of losses in circumstances where actual replacement of the property would be unreasonable. In this proceeding, the damage due to delay was suffered by the appellant which thereby has deprived itself of the use of its money. In any case the damage assessment technique is derived from substantive law and not procedural law and the result should be consistent and not subject to the vagaries of litigation delays.

Having regard to the complex issues raised in all three actions (and the period devoted to this litigation must take into account more than the simple action for the recovery of shares loaned to Brook) and taking into account the other circumstances mentioned it would be unreasonable to hold the appellant to any timetable which contemplated the trial of these many issues prior to the end of 1966 or early in 1967. If litigation may represent an alternative to the investment by a plaintiff of substantial funds to avoid the accumulation of losses, the courts cannot apply in the computation of damages a principle recognizing some relevance of the fluctuating value of the res of the contract between breach and trial and not at the same time maintain a strict surveillance on the assiduity of a plaintiff in bringing his claim to judgment.

The price of these shares on the Toronto Stock Exchange was the subject of much testimony and before this Court Baud, without any objection from counsel for Brook, reduced such evidence to a series of graphs which records prices and volumes of trade on the Exchange during each year from 1955 to 1977. When Brook pleaded (on July 6, 1967) (a) his right to refuse return of the shares, and (b) the previous sale of shares by Brook, the shares were trading from $4.30 to $4.35 per share. The volume of trading was very low. By the end of 1967 the price had climbed to $7.25 but the volume of trading remained low. Unfortunately there is no evidence of the depth or strength of the market but it is reasonable to conclude from the small volume of trade over a lengthy period of jugement. L'introduction d'une procédure judiciaire est une façon d'établir les pertes lorsqu'il n'est pas raisonnable d'exiger l'achat d'un bien de remplacement. En l'espèce, l'appelante est responsable des pertes résultant de son manque de diligence et elle s'est donc elle-même privée de l'utilisation de son argent. Quoi qu'il en soit, la méthode d'évaluation du préjudice est une question de fond et non de procédure et le résultat doit être constant, indépendamment des aléas d'une poursuite en justice.

Compte tenu de la complexité des questions soulevées dans les trois actions (il ne faut pas considérer seulement la durée de l'action en restitution des actions prêtées à Brook) et des circonstances de l'affaire, il serait déraisonnable d'astreindre l'appelante à un calendrier pour la poursuite de ces actions qui situerait l'instruction avant la fin de 1966 ou le début de 1967. Si l'institution d'une action peut permettre au demandeur d'éviter d'investir une somme considérable en vue de limiter le préjudice, les tribunaux ne peuvent calculer les dommages en fonction de l'impact des fluctuations de la valeur du bien faisant l'objet du contrat entre la date de la rupture et celle du procès sans exiger du demandeur qu'il ait fait preuve de diligence dans la poursuite de son action.

Le prix de ces actions à la Bourse de Toronto a fait l'objet de nombreux témoignages. Devant cette Cour, Baud, sans aucune objection de l'avocat de Brook, a résumé cette preuve par une série de graphiques indiquant le prix et le volume annuel des transactions entre 1955 et 1977. Lorsque Brook a plaidé (le 6 juillet 1967) a) le droit de refuser de rendre les actions, et b) la vente des actions, elles valaient entre $4.30 et $4.35 chacune. Le volume des transactions était très faible. Vers la fin de 1967, le prix des actions a atteint $7.25, mais le volume des transactions était encore faible. Il n'existe malheureusement aucune preuve sur la solidité du marché, mais il est raisonnable de conclure, d'après le faible volume des transactions sur une période aussi longue, que le marché était time that the market was thin and probably could not have absorbed large purchases or sustained the quoted prices in the face of large sales. By the time of the examination for discovery in May 1968 the price per share had reached a range from $7.60 to $8.20. The volume of trading had increased markedly over the preceding year but was sporadic. By the end of the year the price quoted on the Exchange was $27 in comparatively active trading. The price of Asamera shares peaked at $46.50 in 1969 during the opening session of the trial. By the time of the issuance of the reasons for judgment in April 1971 as mentioned above, the price had declined to $22 per share and when final issues were disposed of and formal judgment entered in May 1972, the price of Asamera shares on the Stock Exchange was about $21.

médiocre et n'aurait probablement pas été capable d'absorber des achats massifs ou de maintenir le prix coté en cas de ventes massives. A l'époque de l'interrogatoire préalable, en mai 1968, les actions avaient atteint une valeur de $7.60 à $8.20 chacune. Les transactions avaient considérablement augmenté l'année précédente, mais restaient sporadiques. A la fin de l'année, le prix coté à la Bourse était de $27 et, en comparaison, le marché était animé. Les actions d'Asamera ont atteint un prix maximum de $46.50 l'unité en 1969, époque du début du procès. En avril 1971, date du dépôt des motifs de jugement, le prix des actions était descendu à $22 l'unité et, en mai 1972, époque à laquelle les questions supplémentaires furent tranchées et le jugement formel enregistré, les actions d'Asamera étaient cotées approximativement $21 en Bourse.

The Courts below determined from different approaches that the critical date for assessment of damages was the date of the breach of the contract to return the shares on December 31, 1960. The price was then 29 cents on the open market. Each Court observed as well that the parties had agreed that the purchase price (if the option be exercised) on that date was $2 and accordingly damages could not be assessed at less. Furthermore, the evidence indicated that Brook on the sale of a like number of shares in 1957 and 1958 had realized prices ranging from $1.50 to $1.80 so that an award based on the market price on the date of breach would allow Brook to profit from his wrongdoing. It would appear from the judgments in the Courts below that Brook's enrichment through his breach of contract played an important role in the assessment of damages. Accordingly damages were assessed at $2 per share or $250,000 in gross.

Les tribunaux d'instance inférieure ont conclu, en suivant des méthodes différentes, que la date pertinente aux fins de l'évaluation des dommages était celle de la rupture du contrat prévoyant la restitution des actions, en l'occurrence le 31 décembre 1960. Les actions valaient alors 29 cents sur le marché libre. Les mêmes tribunaux ont également fait remarquer que les parties avaient convenu que le prix d'achat à cette date serait de $2 (si l'option d'achat était exercée) et que les dommages ne pouvaient donc être évalués à moins. La preuve révélait en outre qu'en vendant le même nombre d'actions en 1957 et 1958, Brook avait obtenu de $1.50 à $1.80 l'action. Des dommages fondés sur le prix du marché à la date de la rupture du contrat permettraient à Brook de tirer profit de son acte illégal. Les jugements des tribunaux d'instance inférieure donnent à penser que cet enrichissement de Brook moyennant la rupture du contrat a joué un rôle important dans l'évaluation des dommages. En conséquence, les dommages ont été fixés à $2 l'action, soit une somme globale de $250,000.

It seems to me that the motives or unjust enrichment of the defendant on breach are generally of no concern in the assessment of contractual damages. Vide Treitel, The Law of Contract, (4th ed., 1975), at p. 618:

Il me semble que les motifs du défendeur ou son enrichissement injuste par la rupture ne doivent normalement pas entrer en ligne de compte dans l'évaluation des dommages. Voir Treitel, The Law of Contract, (4e éd., 1975), à la p. 618:

In general, damages are based on loss to the plaintiff and not on gain to the defendant. They are not, in other words, based on any profit which the defendant may have made out of the breach.

An appellate tribunal in such an appeal as this is in an invidious position. The record at trial is deficient. In the result precise evidence as to market conditions, credit facilities, rates of interest, borrowing power of the appellant, effect on market price of mitigative action by it, the time reasonably required to acquire by purchase such a volume of shares on the open market, and other evidence relevant to the assessment of damages is not before this Court. On the other hand the transaction occurred 20 years ago, and the trial which was extensive and no doubt expensive, was completed 7 years ago. To direct a re-assessment of the damages would be time consuming, difficult to carry out after such a lapse of time, and expensive for the parties. Faced with these unsatisfactory alternatives, an appellate court must discern if at all possible from the record the elements necessary to permit the completion of the assessment process.

We therefore approach the matter of the proper appraisal of the damages assessable in the peculiar circumstances of this case on the following basis: that the same principles of remoteness will apply to the claims made whether they sound in tort or contract subject only to special knowledge, understanding or relationship of the contracting parties or to any terms express or implied of the contractual arrangement relating to damages recoverable on breach; that Baud was under the general duty to mitigate its losses and may not escape this duty by relying on the 1960 injunction interminably; that the specific duty to mitigate and to crystallize its claim for damages within a reasonable time of the breach of contract by bringing action seeking appropriate remedies and to prosecute such action with due diligence, was qualified or postponed by Brook's request of Baud sometime prior to 1966 to refrain from enforcing its claims; that any postponement of such requirement to prosecute and to acquire replacement shares had come to an end at the latest on the awareness of Baud that the defaulting party was not only in breach of the duty to return the shares but had disposed of shares at least equal in number to those loaned by Baud; that any postponement of the duty to acquire replacement shares which may have been due to the sharp reduction in the value of the shares which occurred during the loan, was ended with the revival in values on the public market at least by the end of 1966; that a plaintiff in the position of Baud may not successfully assert throughout the years of litigation a right to specific performance of the contract to redeliver the subject-matter of the contract and at the same time seek to avoid or reduce his losses on the grounds that to do so by buying replacement shares would involve him in investing his funds in the shares of a company managed or dominated by his adversary, Brook; that having regard to the nature of a common share neither the terms of the injunction or the loan contract, nor the action by Brook in disposing of shares in number equal to those loaned, have any effect on the characterization of the rights of Baud or the obligation of Brook throughout this long and tortuous transaction; that damages are an adequate remedy and that a court in these complex and particular circumstances will not invoke the extraordinary remedies of equity.

Placée devant une telle situation, une cour d'appel n'a pas la tâche facile. Le dossier du procès est déficient. Cette Cour n'a devant elle aucune preuve précise des conditions du marché, des facilités de crédit, des taux d'intérêt, de la capacité d'emprunt de l'appelante, de l'effet de mesures qu'elle aurait prises pour limiter le préjudice sur les cours du marché, de la période de temps raisonnable pour acheter un tel volume d'actions sur le marché libre, et d'autres questions pertinentes aux fins de l'évaluation des dommages. En revanche, l'opération remonte à vingt ans et ce procès, long et sans nul doute onéreux, est terminé depuis sept ans. Ordonner une nouvelle évaluation des dommages entraînerait d'autres retards, comporterait de nombreuses difficultés après aussi longtemps et serait onéreux pour les parties. Devant un choix aussi peu satisfaisant, une cour d'appel doit, si la chose est possible, trouver dans le dossier soumis les éléments nécessaires à l'évaluation définitive des dommages-intérêts.

Il convient donc d'aborder comme suit la question de l'évaluation des dommages exigibles dans les circonstances particulières de cette affaire: les principes relatifs au caractère prévisible s'appliquent également que la réclamation soit fondée sur la responsabilité délictuelle ou contractuelle, sous réserve cependant des connaissances, ententes ou relations particulières entre les parties contractantes ou de toute disposition expresse ou implicite dans le contrat au sujet des dommages recouvrables en cas d'inexécution; Baud avait l'obligation générale de limiter le préjudice et ne peut s'en dégager en invoquant indéfiniment l'injonction de 1960; l'obligation spécifique de Baud de limiter le préjudice et d'établir sa demande de dommages-intérêts en intentant l'action appropriée dans un délai raisonnable après la rupture et en procédant avec diligence a été repoussée dans le temps parce que Brook lui avait demandé, avant 1966, de ne pas poursuivre l'affaire; Baud aurait dû corriger son manque de diligence à poursuivre son action et à acheter des actions de remplacement dès qu'elle

The application of these principles and determinations to the particular circumstances in this case requires in my respectful view a determination of the damages payable by Brook on the assumption that Baud ought to have crystallized these damages by the acquisition of replacement shares so as to minimize the avoidable losses flowing from the deprivation by Brook of Baud's opportunity to market the 125,000 shares. Such share purchases should have taken place within a reasonable time after the date of breach. Having regard to all the above-noted special circumstances, the time for purchase in my opinion was the fall of 1966 when Baud was by its own admission free from any agreed restraint not to press its claims against Brook. It would be unreasonable to impose on Baud the burden of going into the market and acquiring replacement shares at a time when the litigation of its claims was in a dormant state at Brook's request. Furthermore Baud acknowledged that by the fall of 1966 the fortunes of Asamera a appris que la partie contrevenante refusait non seulement de lui rendre les actions mais en avait vendu un nombre identique; le retard apporté par Baud à l'achat d'actions de remplacement justifé par la baisse importante de la valeur des actions à l'époque du prêt ne tient plus après la fin de 1966, les actions ayant dès lors repris de la valeur; un demandeur dans la situation de Baud ne peut pendant toutes ces années à la fois prétendre avoir droit à l'exécution intégrale du contrat de restitution des biens et tenter d'éviter de limiter le préjudice en invoquant le fait que l'achat d'actions de remplacement l'obligerait à investir dans une compagnie gérée ou contrôlée par son adversaire, Brook; compte tenu de la nature d'une action ordinaire, ni les dispositions de l'injonction ni celles du contrat de prêt, ni le fait que Brook ait vendu le même nombre d'actions que celles prêtées, n'ont d'effet sur le caractère des droits de Baud ou sur les obligations de Brook aux termes d'une opération aussi complexe; l'adjudication de dommages-intérêts est une solution adéquate et, dans des circonstances aussi particulières que complexes, la Cour ne doit pas recourir aux redressements extraordinaires prévus en equity.

L'application de ces principes et solutions aux circonstances particulières de l'espèce exige, à mon avis, une évaluation des dommages-intérêts payables par Brook fondée sur la supposition que Baud aurait dû établir les dommages en achetant des actions de remplacement de façon à limiter les pertes évitables résultant de l'impossibilité pour Baud, du fait de Brook, de mettre les 125,000 actions sur le marché. Cet achat d'actions aurait dû être effectué dans un délai raisonnable après la rupture du contrat. Compte tenu de toutes les circonstances particulières susmentionnées, cet achat aurait dû, à mon avis, être effectué à l'automne de 1966 alors que Baud, de son propre aveu, n'était plus assujettie à l'entente conclue avec Brook de ne pas poursuivre l'affaire. Il ne serait pas raisonnable en effet de s'attendre à ce que Baud ait acheté des actions de remplacement alors que les procédures judiciaires étaient en veilleuse, à la demande même de Brook. En outre, Baud a reconnu qu'à l'automne de 1966, la situation had improved and this had begun to be reflected in the market price of its shares. In short, the appellant is not in my view entitled in law to any compensation for the loss of opportunity to sell its shares after that date. Thereafter its loss of this opportunity is of its own making. The theory of such a damage award is to provide the funds needed to replace the shares at the time the law required it to do so in order to avoid an accumulating claim. There should be an allowance of a reasonable time to permit the organization of the finances and the mechanics required for the careful acquisition of 125,000 shares either by a series of relatively small purchases or by negotiated block purchases. This would carry the matter into the fall of 1967. By this time the price had risen to a range of $5 to $6. Making allowance for the upward pressure on the market price which would be generated by the purchase of such a large number of shares on a relatively low volume stock, the purchase price would surely have exceeded the $6 price reached in mid-1967 without any market intervention by Baud. For this factor in my best consideration an allowance of $1 per share should be made. Taking into account the effect of market intervention by Baud, the median price during the period from late 1966 to mid-1967, adjusted accordingly, would be about $6.50, and in my view, the damages should be awarded to Baud on that basis; that is, the total damages for breach of agreement to return the Asamera shares should amount to $812,500. In weighing the magnitude of this award one should not lose sight of the essential fact that Brook at any time right down to trial could, if he had remained in compliance with the injunction of July 1960, have avoided this result or the risk of this award by delivering from any source 125,000 Asamera shares.

Brook has below and before this Court asserted a claim for damages in respect of the undertaking given by Baud upon the issuance of the interim injunction in July 1960. This claim was dismissed by the learned trial judge and in this dismissal the Court of Appeal of Alberta concurred. Nothing has been advanced in this Court to indicate error below and I therefore would dismiss this cross-appeal by Brook.

d'Asamera s'était améliorée, résultant en une augmentation de la valeur marchande de ses actions. Bref, à mon avis, l'appelante n'a aucun droit à une indemnisation pour la perte de la possibilité de vendre les actions après cette date. Elle est alors devenue l'auteur du préjudice qu'elle a subi. Le principe sous-jacent à l'adjudication des dommages-intérêts est d'accorder une indemnisation correspondant au prix de remplacement des actions à leur cours au moment où la demanderesse était tenue en droit de les remplacer afin d'éviter l'accroissement de sa réclamation. On doit laisser à la demanderesse un délai raisonnable pour procéder de façon ordonnée au financement et à l'acquisition des 125,000 actions d'Asamera, soit par de petits achats soit en bloc. Ceci nous mène à l'automne de 1967. A ce moment-là, la valeur des actions était de $5 à $6. Compte tenu de la tendance à la hausse qu'aurait entraînée l'achat d'un aussi grand nombre d'actions dans un marché restreint, le prix des actions aurait certainement dépassé les $6 l'unité atteints vers la mi-1967, sans que Baud intervienne sur le marché. Tout bien pesé, j'ajouterais un dollar à la valeur des actions à cette date. Prenant en considération l'effet d'une intervention de Baud sur le marché, la valeur moyenne des actions entre la fin de l'année 1966 et le milieu de l'année 1967 serait d'environ $6.50 et, à mon avis, c'est ce chiffre qui doit fonder les dommages-intérêts dus à Baud; en conséquence, le montant total des dommages-intérêts dus pour la non-restitution des actions d'Asamera est de $812,500. Devant ce chiffre important, il ne faut pas oublier que jusqu'au procès, Brook aurait pu, s'il avait respecté l'injonction prononcée en juillet 1960, éviter le risque et les effets d'une telle décision en procédant à la remise de 125,000 actions d'Asamera, sans égard à leur provenance.

Tant devant les tribunaux d'instance inférieure que devant cette Cour, Brook a fait valoir une réclamation en dommages-intérêts relativement à l'engagement pris par Baud lors de la délivrance de l'injonction interlocutoire de juillet 1960. Le savant juge de première instance a rejeté cette demande et la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta a confirmé son jugement. Rien d'allégué devant cette Cour ne démontre que les tribunaux d'instance inférieure ont commis une erreur. Je conclus donc au rejet de l'appel incident de Brook.

I would therefore allow the appeal, and vary the judgment below by awarding damages payable by Brook to Baud in the amount of $812,500 together with costs to Baud throughout.

Judgment accordingly.

Solicitors for Baud Corporation, N.V. and Sea Oil & General Corporation: Fenerty, McGillivray, Robertson, Prowse, Brennan, Fraser, Bell & Hatch, Calgary.

Solicitors for Asamera Oil Corporation Ltd. and Thomas L. Brook: MacKimmie, Matthews, Calgary.

Je suis donc d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi et de modifier le jugement porté en appel en condamnant Brook à payer $812,500 à Baud à titre de dommages-intérêts, avec dépens en faveur de Baud dans toutes les cours.

Jugement en conséquence.

Corporations -- Piercing the corporate veil -- Corporation having right of first refusal to purchase land -- Corporation suing to enjoin sale of land to third party purchaser -- Corporation giving undertaking as to damages -- Corporation failing to disclose that it did not have assets to honour undertaking as to damages -- Shareholder alter ego for corporation -- Shareholder personally liable for corporation's undertaking as to damages.

Injunctions -- Interlocutory injunction -- Undertaking as to damages -- Party giving undertaking as to damages obliged to disclose whether its assets are adequate to honour undertaking.

Injunctions -- Interlocutory injunction -- Undertaking as to damages -- Corporation having right of first refusal to purchase land -- Corporation suing to enjoin sale to third party purchaser -- Corporation giving undertaking as to damages -- Third party purchaser enjoined on terms that closing of its agreement be extended until resolution of claim by corporation to enforce right of first refusal -- Corporation abandoning action and injunction dissolved -- Third party purchaser refusing to complete its purchase and found liable to vendor for damages for breach of contract -- Corporation not liable under its undertaking as to damages to indemnify third party purchaser for damages it had to pay vendor -- Granting of injunction not causing damages suffered by third party purchaser.

Sale of land -- Breach of contract -- Damages -- Date of assessment -- Corporation having right of first refusal to purchase land -- Corporation suing to enjoin sale to third party purchaser -- Third party enjoined on terms that closing of its agreement be extended until resolution of claim by corporation to enforce right of first refusal -- Corporation abandoning action and injunction dissolved -- Market values for land having declined and third party refusing to complete its purchase -- Third party liable to vendor for damages for breach of contract -- Vendor retaining property in anticipation that value would return -- Damages to be assessed as at around time of failure to close.

F and N owned a property that they leased to S Inc., which was owned by H and K. The lease had a right of first refusal. In August 1989, 642947 Ontario Ltd. ("642947"), a nominee of B Corp. under a bare trust that required 642947 to act on the instructions of B Corp., offered to purchase the property. This offer triggered the right of first refusal, but S Inc. did not complete a purchase and, in September 1989, 642947 resubmitted its offer, which was to buy the property for $2 million. F and N accepted the resubmitted offer and took the position that the right of first refusal had been extinguished. S Inc., however, took the position that the right remained available.

S Inc. sued, and it moved for an interlocutory injunction to restrain the sale to 642947. In the motion for the injunction, B Corp., which previously had been an undisclosed principal, filed an affidavit stating it would suffer great harm if the injunction were granted. Isaac J. granted the injunction on terms, which were requested by 642947 and B Corp., that the closing of the sale to 642947 be extended. S Inc. gave an undertaking to pay any damages caused by the injunction in the language prescribed by rule 40.03 of the Rules of Civil Procedure.

In 1990, the real estate market collapsed, and S Inc. abandoned its action. The injunction was dissolved, and December 7, 1990 was set for the closing of the sale to 642947, but it now refused to close because of the effect of the injunction and the market downturn. It sued for its deposit. F and N counterclaimed. The counterclaim was against 642947 and B Corp., which brought a third party claim against S Inc., H and K.

The trial was heard in July of 1995 and 1996 and, at the time of the trial, F and N still owned the property, which was still leased but not to S Inc. Greer J. held that 642947 was the agent of B Corp. and that it and B Corp. were liable for breach of contract or for inducing breach of contract. She held that the deposit was forfeit and damages were to be assessed as at December 7, 1990, when the property was worth $1,130,000, yielding a judgment of $870,000 (the difference between the purchase price and the value of the property) plus pre-judgment interest as provided by the Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.43. She held that the right of first refusal had been extinguished and S Inc. was liable to indemnify 642947 and B Corp. under the undertaking as to damages. Greer J., piercing the corporate veil, held that H and K were jointly and severally liable because they were the alter ego of S Inc. and had defrauded the court by offering the undertaking when they knew that S Inc. had no assets to satisfy it. All parties appealed.

The following were the grounds for the appeal by 642947 and B Corp.: (1) B Corp. as an undisclosed principal was entitled to rely on the sealed contract rule; (2) F and N were precluded from suing B Corp., having elected to contract with 642947; (3) 642947 and B Corp. were not liable because F and N acted in bad faith; and (4) 642947 and B Corp. were not liable because F and N could not give vacant possession on closing. On their appeal, F and N contended that they had not been fully compensated for their loss and that damages should have been assessed at or near the date of the trial. (The evidence was that the value of the land had declined to only $410,000 as of November 1994.)

They also contended that pre-judgment and post-judgment interest should have been awarded at commercial rates of interest. On their appeal, S Inc., H and K submitted that S Inc. was not liable to indemnify 642947 and B Corp. under the undertaking as to damages because the injunction had not caused damages to them and that even if S Inc. was liable, there were no grounds to pierce the corporate veil.

Held, The appeals of F and N, and 642947 and B Corp. should be dismissed; the appeal of S Inc., H and K should be allowed.

There was no merit to any of the grounds of appeal advanced by 642947 and B Corp., and their appeal should be dismissed. The subject of the litigation was not a contract under seal and, therefore, the sealed contract rule, which holds that where a contract is made under seal, only the parties to the contract may sue or be sued on it, did not apply. There was no merit to the arguments that effect should be given to 642947's intention to execute the offer under seal and that the Land Registration Reform Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. L.4 made the contract under seal. Further, there was no bad faith and no basis to preclude F and N from suing B Corp. as the principal of the contract negotiated by its agent 642947, and the inability to give vacant possession on closing was never an impediment to closing the transaction.

The appeal of F and N should be dismissed. Greer J. did not err in selecting the date for the assessment of damages or in her award of interest on the judgment. As a general rule, in a falling market, the court should award an innocent vendor damages equal to the difference between the contract price and the highest price obtainable within a reasonable time after the contractual date for completion following the making of reasonable efforts to sell the property commencing on that date. Where, however, the vendor retains the property in order to speculate on the market, damages will be assessed as at the date of closing. In the immediate case, F and N decided to retain the property, speculating that the value would return. They alone had to assume the burden or the benefit of changes in the market after the closing date.

The appeal of S Inc. should be allowed. It was not liable under its undertaking as to damages. Under its undertaking, which tracked the wording of rule 40.03, S Inc. undertook "to abide by any Order concerning damages that the Court may make if it ultimately appears that the granting of the order has caused damage to the responding party for which the applicant ought to compensate it". The trial judge erred by finding a causal connection between the injunction and any damages suffered by 642947 and B Corp. The injunction did not cause or materially contribute to the damages 642947 and B Corp. were obliged to pay F and N. Those damages were caused by the fall in the market and by B Corp.'s refusal to close after having asked the motions judge to extend the closing date to preserve its interest in the property.

Assuming, however, that S. Inc. was liable under the undertaking as to damages, H and K would have been jointly and severally liable. Contrary to their submission, there was ample evidence to support the finding that S Inc. did not have sufficient assets to honour the undertaking. Contrary to their submission, it was not necessary for B Corp. to raise the issue of the adequacy of the assets on the injunction application. S Inc. had the primary obligation to disclose that its assets were inadequate. Its undertaking was to the court. It implicitly represented that it had sufficient assets and both the court and B Corp. were entitled to rely on that representation without making inquiries. After disclosure, it could have asked to be relieved of its undertaking or could have been asked to post security. Finally, contrary to their submissions, the trial judge made no error in piercing the corporate veil. It was open on the evidence to find that H and K were the alter egos of S Inc. and it was appropriate to make them personally liable for trying to use S Inc. as a shield for improper conduct.

LASKIN J.A.: --

INTRODUCTION

[1] These appeals raise three main questions:

1. On what date should damages for breach of an agreement to buy land be assessed?

2. When should a party who obtains an interlocutory injunction be liable on its undertaking to pay damages?

3. Where the party tendering the undertaking is a corporation, when should the corporation's principals be liable?

[2] The litigation arises out of a fight between two sophisticated developers -- Burnac Corporation and George Halasi -- to acquire a property in North York (the "Property") considered key to the development of the North York corridor. The Property was owned by Jules Fleischer and Melvin Newton and leased to Sweet Dreams Delights Inc., a company controlled by Halasi and his partner Larry Krauss, a lawyer. Sweet Dreams' lease contained a right of first refusal on any offer to buy the Property.

[3] In August 1989, 642947 Ontario Limited ("642947"), a nominee of Burnac, agreed to buy the Property for $2,000,000. Sweet Dreams exercised its right of first refusal, but later terminated the agreement. Then, in late September 1989, 642947 resubmitted its original offer to Fleischer and Newton, who accepted it and took the position that Sweet Dreams' right of first refusal was spent. Sweet Dreams, however, obtained an interlocutory injunction restraining the sale. It gave the usual undertaking to pay any damages caused by the injunction. On the injunction application, 642947 and Burnac requested and were granted an extension of the closing date until after the injunction proceedings had concluded. In 1990, the real estate market in Metropolitan Toronto collapsed. The Property fell in value, and both Burnac and Halasi lost interest in it. Sweet Dreams' injunction was dissolved in November 1990 and a new closing date for the sale to 642947 was fixed for December 1990. But 642947 refused to close, citing th e downturn in the real estate market.

[4] 642947 sued for a declaration that its agreement with Fleischer and Newton had been terminated and for a return of its deposit. Fleischer and Newton counterclaimed for damages for breach of the agreement, and 642947 and Burnac sought to be indemnified by Sweet Dreams, Halasi and Krauss on the undertaking to pay damages.

[5] After a long trial heard in July of 1995 and 1996, Greer J. held 642947 and Burnac liable for breach of the agreement of purchase and sale. She assessed damages at the date of closing in December 1990, though the Property fell in value afterwards. She also held that Sweet Dreams' undertaking required it to indemnify 642947 and Burnac for their loss and she found Halasi and Krauss jointly and severally liable on the undertaking because Sweet Dreams had no assets and was simply their alter

[6] All parties appealed the trial judgment. Burnac and 642947 raised several technical grounds why they were not liable to Fleischer and Newton. In turn, Fleischer and Newton contended that the trial judge erred in assessing damages at the date of closing instead of at or near the date of trial and, alternatively, that she erred in failing to order pre-judgment interest and post-judgment interest at the commercial rate instead of the statutory rate. Sweet Dreams, Halasi and Krauss submitted that they were not liable on the undertaking because 642947 and Burnac's damages were not caused by the injunction. Finally, Halasi and Krauss submitted that even if Sweet Dreams was liable on the undertaking, the trial judge erred by piercing the corporate veil and making them liable as well.

[7] We found no merit in the appeal by 642947 and Burnac and did not call on Fleischer and Newton to respond to it. I would dismiss the appeal by Fleischer and Newton on damages. I would, however, allow the appeal by Sweet Dreams, Halasi and Krauss because, in my view, the damages awarded against 642947 and Burnac were not caused by the injunction but by the fall in the real estate market and by their deliberate refusal to close the transaction. Had I, however, found Sweet Dreams liable on its undertaking, I would have upheld the trial judge's conclusion that Sweet Dreams' principals, Halasi and Krauss, were also liable.

FACTUAL BACKGROUND

A. The Agreements of Purchase and Sale Between 642947 and Fleischer and Newton

[8] The Property that has been the subject of all this litigation is on a municipal block bounded by Yonge Street, Empress Avenue, Doris Avenue and Kingsdale Avenue in the former City of North York. It is next to a block of land owned by the City. Developers interested in assembling land in the North York corridor knew that the City would only sell its block to a party that owned neighbouring land. Therefore, acquiring the Property was key to developing the corridor.

[9] The Property was bought by Fleischer, a lawyer and a developer, and Newton in 1985. In 1986 they leased it to Sweet Dreams, a company controlled by Halasi and Krauss, each of whom was a 40 [per cent] shareholder through corporations owned or controlled by them. Sweet Dream's lease was for five years with several renewal options to 2006. The lease also contained a right of first refusal, which provided that if the landlord received a bona fide offer to purchase the property, Sweet Dreams had the right to purchase it on the same terms:

> In the event any Landlord hereunder receives a bona fide offer (the "Offer") to purchase the building and land during the Term or the Renewal Periods from an arm's length third party purchaser as defined under the Income Tax Act, the Landlord shall send a copy of the Offer to the Tenant (the "Notice") and the Tenant shall have a first right of refusal to purchase the building and land at a purchase price and upon terms and conditions equal and similar to those contained in the Offer. Upon receipt of the Notice, the Tenant shall have seven (7) business days to reply to the Landlord in writing of its intent to exercise or not exercise its right of first refusal as the case may be. Should the Tenant elect to exercise its right of first refusal as set out hereunder, there shall be a binding agreement of purchase and sale of the Landlord's freehold estate in the building and the land upon which is situated the Leased Premises between the Landlord and Tenant and the parties agree to execute all additional documen tation to give effect thereto. . . .

This right of first refusal gave Sweet Dreams control over the development of the Property.

[10] In the late 1980s, the real estate market in Metropolitan Toronto was booming. Burnac became interested in the Property and used a nominee or shelf company, 642947, to try to buy it. 642947 was a bare trustee under a trust agreement with Burnac dated August 28, 1989. The sole shareholder, director and officer of 642947 was John Handiak, a solicitor who had done work for Burnac for about 15 years. 642947, however, had no assets, no employees and no independent authority. Under the trust agreement, 642947 was to act "solely and entirely on the instructions" of Burnac. Burnac's Vice-Chairman Theodore Burnett testified that the company typically used trust agreements to acquire real property in order to hide the identity of the true purchaser and to limit Burnac's liability.

[11] On August 31, 1989, 642947 entered into an agreement with Fleischer and Newton (the "first agreement") to buy the Property for $2,000,000, made up of a $100,000 deposit and the balance due on closing, fixed for November 24, 1989. The agreement was conditional on Sweet Dreams' right of first refusal.

[12] Fleischer and Newton submitted the first agreement to Sweet Dreams and on September 13, 1989, Sweet Dreams exercised its right of first refusal. By doing so, Sweet Dreams took over 642947's position as purchaser. It then turned around and offered to sell the property to 642947 for $2,050,000, an increase of $50,000 over the original purchase price. 642947 declined the offer. Later, Sweet Dreams used an unrelated condition in the first agreement to get out of the deal.

[13] On September 25, 1989, 642947 made an identical offer of $2,000,000 to purchase the Property, which Fleischer and Newton accepted (the "second agreement"). Fleischer and Newton, and Handiak, representing 642947, then signed a waiver notice dispensing with the right of first refusal condition in the second agreement. They took the position that once Sweet Dreams had exercised its right of first refusal in connection with the first agreement that right was extinguished. The trial judge agreed. She found that 642947's first offer was a bona fide offer, and that "once Sweet Dreams exercised its option, even though it then declined to purchase prior to the inspection period being concluded, its right of first refusal was extinguished and it then no longer became necessary for Fleischer and Newton to submit 642[947]'s identical second Offer to Sweet Dreams": (1997), 9 R.P.R. (3d) 261 at p. 292 (Ont. Gen. Div.). In this court, neither Sweet Dreams nor its principals Halasi and Krauss challenged thes e findings.

B. The Injunction Proceedings

[14] The second agreement was scheduled to close on Friday, November 24, 1989. In mid-November, Sweet Dreams sought to enjoin the closing on the ground that it had not been given an opportunity to exercise its right of first refusal. The application for the injunction was supported by the affidavit of Halasi, who gave an undertaking on behalf of Sweet Dreams in the standard form prescribed by rule 40.03 of the Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194:

> The Applicant undertakes to abide by any Order concerning damages that the Court may make if it ultimately appears that the granting of the Order has caused damage to the responding party for which the Applicant ought to compensate it.

Acting on Burnett's instructions, Andrew Federer, a lawyer and president of a Burnac subsidiary, filed a responding affidavit stating that Burnac would suffer great harm if the injunction were granted.

[15] The application for the injunction was argued on Thursday, November 23, the day before the scheduled closing date. Both Krauss and Fleischer attended the hearing. Krauss offered to buy the Property for $2,000,000 if the motions judge, Isaac J., restrained 642947 and Fleischer and Newton from closing the second agreement. Fleischer said that he was indifferent and would sell to whichever party the court found was entitled to buy. After a full day of argument, Isaac J. reserved his decision until Monday, November 27. To avoid being prejudiced while the decision was under reserve, 642947 and Burnac asked the motions judge to extend the closing date until Monday, which he did. On Monday the 27th, Isaac J. released his decision, in which he enjoined 642947 and Fleischer and Newton from completing their agreement of purchase and sale until trial or other order of the court. To preserve their interest in the Property while the injunction was outstanding, 642947 and Burnac again asked the motions judge to extend the closing date of the second agreement. In Federer's words, 642947 and Burnac were "betting that the market would stay the same or go up". Isaac J. ordered an extension until the disposition of the action or further order of the court.

[16] Before the injunction proceedings, Burnac had been an undisclosed principal but during the injunction it participated openly and actively and thus became a disclosed principal. Burnac was later added as a defendant in the action.

C. Subsequent Events

[17] In 1990, the real estate market in Metropolitan Toronto collapsed. Property values in the North York area fell dramatically, by as much as 50 to 70 per cent. Halasi and Krauss lost interest in buying the property. Therefore, in November 1990, Sweet Dreams moved to discontinue the action. On November 22, 1990, Dunnet J. granted Sweet Dreams leave to discontinue, dissolved the injunction and fixed December 7, 1990 for closing the second agreement. She also ordered that the question whether the undertaking of Sweet Dreams could be imposed on Halasi and Krauss could be considered on an inquiry into damages or in another proceeding.

[18] Burnac, too, lost interest in buying the Property. The day after Dunnet J.'s order, 642947 wrote to Fleischer and Newton waiving tender and stating that it would not close the second agreement because of "the effect of the injunction granted by Mr. Justice Isaac dated November 27, 1989 and the downturn in the real estate market since that date". As Burnett testified at trial, Burnac did not complete the transaction because "I didn't think I was getting what I had bargaining for".

[19] After the injunction was dissolved, Fleischer and Newton let it be known that the Property was back on the market, though they did not list it for sale. When Sweet Dreams' lease expired in 1991, Fleischer and Newton leased the Property to a new tenant, Sonic Temple Music Store. The litigation began in April 1991. When the trial ended in July 1996, Fleischer and Newton still owned the Property and the music store remained a tenant with an option to renew its lease until 2006.

D. The Reasons of the Trial Judge

[20] The trial judge gave detailed reasons [reported at 9 R.P.R. (3d) 261] in what turned out to be a difficult case. She held that both 642947 and Burnac were liable to Fleischer and Newton for breaching the second agreement. And because it had repudiated the agreement, 642947 was not entitled to the return of its deposit.

[21] The trial judge dismissed the "technical" real property issues raised by 642947 and Burnac -- for example, the inability of the vendors to give vacant possession on closing -- by concluding that these issues did not impede the closing. She found that the trust agreement between 642947 and Burnac applied to the second agreement, that 642947 acted as agent on the transaction, and that, therefore, Burnac was liable as an undisclosed principal. Alternatively, she held that Burnac was liable for inducing breach of contract.

[22] The trial judge then turned to assess Fleischer and Newton's damages. She made findings of fact on the value of the Property and on mitigation, which are not challenged on this appeal. She found that the Property was worth $1,130,000 on the date scheduled for closing, December 7, 1990, and that by November 1994, the last time it was appraised before trial, it had a value of only $410,000. She also found that the vendors had mitigated their loss by re-leasing the Property at a reasonable rate and by advising the developer community it was back on the market. As well, in her view, 642947 and Burnac had not shown that the vendors had breached their duty to mitigate. Having made these factual findings, the trial judge chose the date of closing to assess Fleischer and Newton's damages. She therefore awarded them $870,000 (the difference between the purchase price and the value of the Property on December 7, 1990) plus pre-judgment interest on that amount at 8.8 per cent, the rate provided by the Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.43. She rejected Fleischer and Newton's request for compound interest, holding that they did not satisfy the requirements in Claiborne Industries Ltd. v. National Bank of Canada (1989), 69 O.R. (2d) 65, 59 D.L.R. (4th) 533 (C.A.) or

[23] Finally, the trial judge dealt with 642947 and Burnac's third party claim for indemnity based on Sweet Dream's undertaking. She held that the undertaking should be enforced because its non-performance is a contempt of court. She concluded, at p. 297 R.P.R., that the damages she assessed, $870,000, "flow from the undertaking given by Sweet Dreams". She also concluded that Halasi and Krauss were liable on Sweet Dreams' undertaking because they "were the alter ego of Sweet Dreams and knew when the undertaking was given that Sweet Dreams had no assets from which to pay damages". In her view, the undertaking was fraudulent and Halasi and Krauss misconducted themselves by offering it to the court. She thus considered it appropriate to pierce the corporate veil and hold Halasi, Krauss and Sweet Dreams jointly and severally liable both to 642947 and to Burnac, which she found was a party to the injunction. She fixed their liability at $770,000 (the amount of damages awarded to Fleischer and Newton less the deposit) together with pre-judgment interest.

[ANALYSIS]

[24] I turn now to the three sets of appeals.

I. The Appeal by 642947 and Burnac

[25] On their appeal, 642947 and Burnac sought to avoid their liability to the vendors Fleischer and Newton. Their counsel, Mr. Carr, advanced two arguments why Burnac should not be liable and two arguments why neither Burnac nor 642947 should be liable. These arguments were:

1. Burnac was entitled to rely on the sealed contract rule that an undisclosed principal cannot be sued on a contract made under seal.

2. Fleischer and Newton elected to contract with the agent 642947 and are therefore precluded from suing the principal Burnac;

3. 642947 and Burnac are not liable because Fleischer and Newton acted in bad faith; and

4. 642947 and Burnac are not liable because Fleischer and Newton could not give vacant possession on closing, as required by the second agreement.

[26] We found no merit in any of these arguments and therefore did not ask counsel for Fleischer and Newton to respond to them. I will briefly give my reasons for dismissing 642947 and Burnac's appeal.

1. The sealed contract argument

[27] In Friedmann Equity Developments Inc. v. Final Note Ltd., [2000] 1 S.C.R. 842, 188 D.L.R. (4th) 269, the Supreme Court of Canada affirmed the continuing validity of the sealed contract rule. This rule holds that where a contract is made under seal, only the parties to the contract may sue or be sued on it. Therefore, an undisclosed principal is not liable on a sealed contract. This rule is an exception to the general rule that a principal, whether disclosed or not, may sue or be sued on a contract made on its behalf by the principal's agent.

[28] The trial judge found that when it entered into both agreements with Fleischer and Newton, 642947 acted as Burnac's agent. And Burnac was an undisclosed principal when the agreements were signed. Although the first agreement was made under seal, the second agreement was not. Yet the second agreement was the subject of the litigation.

[29] Burnac still contends that it is entitled to invoke the sealed contract rule for the second agreement for two reasons: 642947 intended to execute it under seal and the court should give effect to that intention; and s. 13(1) of the Land Registration Reform Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. L.4. Neither contention has merit.

[30] Mr. Handiak, the sole director and shareholder of 642947, testified that his standard practice was to seal all agreements of purchase and sale. He did seal the first agreement and, though he intended to seal the second, he failed to do so. In my view, Mr. Handiak's mere intention, unaccompanied by any act of sealing, is insufficient to bring the sealed contract rule into play. The rule, at once historical and technical, should not be given any wider effect than necessary. To invoke it, more than an agent's intention is required. That intention must be accompanied by the deliberate application of the seal. See Friedmann Equity at p. 867 S.C.R.

[31] Section 13(1) of the Land Registration Reform Act treats all conveyances and charges (or mortgages) as sealed documents for all purposes, including the application of the sealed contract rule. Section 13(1) reads:

> 13(1) Despite any statute or rule of law, a transfer or other document transferring an interest in land, a charge or discharge need not be executed under seal by any person, and such a document that is not executed under seal has the same effect for all purposes as if executed under seal.

Burnac submits that the second agreement of purchase and sale is a "charge" under s. 13(1) because 642947 was entitled to a purchaser's lien to the extent of the $100,000 deposit. To come under s. 13(1), however, the charge must be created by a document. That is consistent with the wording of the subsection and its purpose, which "is to preserve the common law substantive consequences associated with traditional forms of conveyancing and mortgages". See Friedmann Equity at p. 869 S.C.R. The purchaser's lien for deposit money is not a charge created by a document but a charge created by equity. It is an equitable charge on land, not included in s. 13(1). And even if it was, in this case any existing purchaser's lien ended when 642947 and Burnac wrongfully repudiated the agreement. For these reasons, the second agreement was not made or deemed to be made under seal and Burnac could be sued on it. This first ground of appeal fails.

2. Fleischer and Newton's election

[32] Assuming the second agreement of purchase and sale was not sealed, Burnac advanced an alternative reason why it was not liable. It submitted that Fleischer and Newton chose to contract with 642947 knowing that it was a nominee for an undisclosed principal. Having elected to so contract, Fleischer and Newton cannot now look to hold the principal Burnac liable.

[33] This submission has an air of unreality to it. At trial, Burnac's main contention was that the trust agreement between it and 642947 applied only to the first agreement but not the second and, therefore, 642947 entered into the second agreement as principal, not agent. The trial judge rejected that contention, finding that the trust agreement applied to both agreements of purchase and sale. That finding is not challenged on appeal.

[34] Instead, Burnac now tries to mount an estoppel or election argument. But I see no basis for precluding Fleischer and Newton from suing Burnac simply because they contracted with 642947. To the contrary, had Burnac wished to limit its liability it could have insisted on a clause to that effect in the agreements of purchase and sale.

[35] 642947 was a bare trustee under its trust agreement with Burnac. But as Morden J.A. pointed out in Trident Holdings Ltd. v. Danand Investments Ltd. (1988), 64 O.R. (2d) 65, 49 D.L.R. (4th) 1 (C.A.), in many cases, a bare trustee will also be an agent, and when it contracts on behalf of a principal, the principal may be liable for breach of the contract. Here, 642947 was undoubtedly an agent for Burnac in executing the second agreement of purchase and sale. Under the trust agreement, 642947 had no independent power, responsibility or discretion; it acted only on the instructions of Burnac. It was not so much carrying out the terms of the trust as it was doing Burnac's bidding. In short, 642947 was an agent for Burnac and the agency relationship predominated over the trust relationship. Because the agency relationship predominated, the agent's principal Burnac, though not disclosed and not a party to the second agreement, is still liable for the agreement's breach. Holding Burnac liable simply gives effect to the proposition that though an agent negotiates and signs a contract with a third party, the contract remains one between the principal and the third party. Fleischer and Newton were therefore not estopped from suing Burnac for breach of the second agreement of purchase and sale.

3. Bad faith

[36] 642947 and Burnac argued that the vendors Fleischer and Newton should not be allowed to enforce the second agreement because they acted in bad faith. 642947 and Burnac gave two examples of the vendors' alleged bad faith: failing to submit the second agreement to Sweet Dreams under its right of first refusal, and then negotiating to sell the Property to Sweet Dreams while contractually obligated to 642947. Neither example evidences bad faith.

[37] The trial judge held correctly that Sweet Dreams' right of first refusal was spent once it was exercised in connection with the first agreement. Therefore, Fleischer and Newton were not obliged to give Sweet Dreams an opportunity to exercise the right of first refusal in connection with the second agreement. Moreover, it hardly lies in the mouth of 642947 or Burnac to complain about the vendors' failure to submit the right of first refusal to Sweet Dreams, because 642947 signed the waiver notice.

[38] Burnac and 642947 argued that Fleischer and Newton exhibited bad faith at the injunction proceedings by offering to sell the Property to Sweet Dreams despite their agreement with 642947. Both the motions judge and the trial judge implicitly rejected this argument by concluding that Fleischer and Newton took a neutral position. The vendors were willing to sell the Property to whichever party was entitled to buy it. Their stance does not show bad faith.

4. Inability to give vacant possession on closing

[39] 642947 and Burnac also claimed that Fleischer and Newton could not give vacant possession on closing because of Sweet Dreams' lease. Two obvious answers to this claim are: first, 642947 waived tender, thus making it unnecessary for the vendors to show their ability to complete the transaction in accordance with its terms; and second, on the injunction application Burnac, though aware of the lease, represented that it was ready, willing and able to close and asked for an extension of time to do so. The existence of the lease was never an impediment to closing the transaction.

II. The Cross-Appeal by Fleischer and Newton

[40] On their cross-appeal, Fleischer and Newton contended that the trial judge's damages award did not fully compensate them for their loss. Their main submission was that the trial judge erred by assessing damages in a falling market at the date of closing instead of at or near the date of trial. Their other submission was that the trial judge erred in awarding pre-judgment interest and post-judgment interest at the statutory rate instead of at the commercial rate.

1. The date for assessment of damages

[41] The judgment of Morden J.A. in 100 Main Street Ltd. v. W.B. Sullivan Construction Ltd. (1978), 20 O.R. (2d) 401, 88 D.L.R. (3d) 1 (C.A.) is the principal authority in this court on the assessment of damages for breach of an agreement of purchase and sale. In that case, the purchaser agreed to buy an apartment building but repudiated the contract before closing. The vendor sued for damages and both the trial judge and this court held the purchaser liable. The main issue in this court was when the damages should have been assessed. At the risk of doing a disservice to the thorough and thoughtful reasons of my colleague, I summarize what he wrote about the choice of the date for assessing damages for breach of an agreement to buy land in the following six propositions, which are relevant to this appeal:

(1) The basic principle for assessing damages for breach of contract applies: the award of damages should put the injured party as nearly as possible in the position it would have been in had the contract been performed.

(2) Ordinarily courts give effect to this principle by assessing damages at the date the contract was to be performed, the date of closing. [See Note 1 at end of document]

(3) The court, however, may choose a date different from the date of closing depending on the context. Three important contextual considerations are the plaintiff's duty to take reasonable steps to avoid its loss, the nature of the property and the nature of the market.

(4) Assessing damages at the date of closing may not fairly compensate an innocent vendor who makes reasonable efforts to resell in a falling market. In some cases, the nature of the property -- for example an apartment building -- hampers the vendor's ability to resell quickly. Thus, if the vendor takes reasonable steps to sell from the date of breach and resells the property in some reasonable time after the breach, the court may award the vendor damages equal to the difference between the contract price and the resale price, instead of the difference between the contract price and the fair market value on the date of closing.

(5) Therefore, as a general rule, in a falling market the court should award the vendor damages equal to the difference between the contract price and the "highest price obtainable within a reasonable time after the contractual date for completion following the making of reasonable efforts to sell the property commencing on that date" (at p. 421 O.R.).

(6) Where, however, the vendor retains the property in order to speculate on the market, damages will be assessed at the date of closing.

[42] Underlying these propositions is the simple notion of fairness. As Professor S.M. Waddams wrote in his text, The Law of Contracts, 4th ed. (Toronto: Canada Law Book, 1999), at p. 518, "[i]t is on general considerations of justice, therefore, that the choice of date must depend." The date for the assessment of damages is determined by what is fair on the facts of each case. See Rice v. Rawluk (1992), 8 O.R. (3d) 696

(Gen. Div.); Bitton v. Jakovljevic (1990), 75 O.R. (2d) 143, 13 R.P.R. (2d) 48 (H.C.J.).

[43] With these propositions in mind, I turn to Fleischer and Newton's submission that on the trial judge's factual findings, she should have chosen November 1994 instead of December 7, 1990, the date of closing, to assess the vendors' damages. The trial judge found that the Property was worth $1,130,000 on December 7, 1990 but only $410,000 in November 1994. She also found that Fleischer and Newton had fulfilled their duty to mitigate by re-leasing the Property and by letting the development community know that it was again on the market. Having made these findings, the trial judge still chose the date of closing to assess the vendors' damages. In my view, she was correct to do so.

[44] The vendors led no evidence about the "highest price obtainable in a reasonable time" after the closing date. They cannot pick a date at random, nearly four years after the closing date, when the market was likely at its lowest, and reasonably expect the court to choose that date to measure their loss. Even the trial judge's finding that Fleischer and Newton initially met their duty to mitigate must be viewed in the context of what occurred subsequently. The trial was ongoing in July 1996, five and one-half years after the scheduled closing date, yet Fleischer and Newton still owned the Property. Although they may not have been able to sell the Property immediately after 642947 repudiated the second agreement, one might reasonably have expected them to have sold it by the time of trial if they seriously intended to do so. Indeed, they leased the Property to a new tenant for a period that could extend to 2006, a period that even they acknowledged was an impediment to a resale. I think the irresistible i nference is that, at some point after the fall of the market in 1990, Fleischer and Newton decided to retain the Property, speculating that eventually the real estate market would go back up. Having decided to do so, they alone must assume the burden or the benefit of changes in the market after the closing date. Fairness dictated that the vendors' damages be assessed at December 1990. I therefore do not accept Fleischer and Newton's main submission that the trial judge erred by failing to assess damages as of November 1994.

[45] Their alternative submission that the trial judge should have awarded both pre-judgment interest and post-judgment interest at the commercial rate of interest instead of the rate under the Courts of Justice Act was not pressed in oral argument. I see no error in the trial judge's award of interest. Indeed, the pre-judgment interest rate of 8.8 per cent awarded by the trial judge seems reasonable. For these reasons, I would dismiss the cross-appeal of Fleischer and Newton.

III. The Appeal by Sweet Dreams, Halasi and Krauss

[46] The trial judge found that Sweet Dreams was liable on its undertaking for the loss sustained by 642947 and Burnac, and she then found that Sweet Dreams' principals, Halasi and Krauss, were jointly and severally liable for the loss because Sweet Dreams had no assets and was simply their alter ego. Sweet Dreams, Halasi and Krauss each appealed these findings. Sweet Dreams argued that it cannot be held responsible principally because the injunction did not cause 642947 and Burnac's loss. Halasi and Krauss argued that even if Sweet Dreams is held responsible, they cannot be held liable personally because no grounds existed to pierce the corporate veil.

1. Is Sweet Dreams liable on its undertaking?

[47] The trial judge conducted an inquiry into the liability of Sweet Dreams and its principals Halasi and Krauss under paras. 3 and 4 of Dunnet J.'s order, which provided:

> 3. THIS COURT ORDERS that the inquiry as to the entitlement of the Defendants, 642947 Ontario Limited, Jules Fleischer and Melvin Newton to damages pursuant to the undertaking of the Plaintiff, Sweet Dreams Delights Inc., made in the Order of The Honourable Mr. Justice Isaac is adjourned sine die.
> 4. THIS COURT ORDERS that the issue as to whether or not the undertaking of the Plaintiff Sweet Dreams Delights Inc.

> may be imposed on the Plaintiff Paradox Developments Inc. and the principals of Sweet Dreams Delights Inc. may be considered on the inquiry as to damages, if any, or other proceedings. The issue as to whether or not the undertaking can be extended to the Defendants, Andrew Federer, Lakeburn Land Capital Corporation and Burnac Corporation was not raised when the motion was argued on November 22, 1990. This issue may also be considered on the inquiry as to damages, if any, or other proceedings.

An inquiry was unquestionably called for. The basis for Sweet Dreams' injunction -- that it was denied an opportunity to exercise its right of first refusal under the second agreement -- was, as the trial judge found, devoid of merit. Having obtained the injunction, Sweet Dreams sought its dissolution only when the market fell and the Property was no longer attractive.

[48] Sweet Dreams, however, argued two grounds why it should not be liable on its undertaking. First, it submitted that it can be liable only if the injunction caused 642947 and Burnac's loss and it contended that the injunction did not do so. Second, Sweet Dreams submitted that 642947 and Burnac cannot look to the undertaking when they voluntarily relinquished a valid ground not to complete the transaction, the inability of the vendors to give vacant possession on closing.

[49] This latter submission has no merit. Admittedly, one of the conditions of closing required Fleischer and Newton to give vacant possession. But no party to the dispute ever took this condition seriously, and the trial judge rightly found that the failure to satisfy this condition would not have prevented the closing.

[50] I therefore turn to the question whether the damages that 642947 and Burnac have to pay Fleischer and Newton flow from the injunction. Many cases have stated the principle that damages for an injunction wrongly granted should be assessed on the same basis as damages for breach of contract. This principle was affirmed by the House of Lords in F. Hoffmann-LaRoche & Co. A.G. v. Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, [1975] A.C. 295 at p. 361, [1974] 2 All E.R. 1128 (H.L.), where Lord Diplock said:

> The court has no power to compel an applicant for an interim injunction to furnish an undertaking as to damages. All it can do is to refuse the application if he declines to do so. The undertaking is not given to the defendant but to the court itself. Non-performance of it is contempt of court, not breach of contract, and attracts the remedies available for contempts, but the court exacts the undertaking for the defendant's benefit. It retains a discretion not to enforce the undertaking if it considers that the conduct of the defendant in relation to the obtaining or continuing of the injunction or the enforcement of the undertaking makes it inequitable to do so, but if the undertaking is enforced the measure of the damages payable under it is not discretionary. It is assessed on an inquiry into damages at which principles to be applied are fixed and clear. The assessment is made upon the same basis as that upon which damages for breach of contract would be assessed if the undertaking had been a contra ct between the plaintiff and the defendant that the plaintiff would not prevent the defendant from doing that which he was restrained from doing by the terms of the injunction: see Smith v. Day (1882), 21 Ch.D. 421, per Brett L.J., at p. 427.

(Emphasis added)

[51] I accept that contract principles apply to the assessment of damages, but it seems to me that, in Ontario, the wording of rule 40.03 focuses more precisely on causation. Rule 40.03 provides:

> 40.03 On a motion for an interlocutory injunction or mandatory order, the moving party shall, unless the court orders otherwise, undertake to abide by any order concerning > damages that the court may make if it ultimately appears that the granting of the order has caused damage to the responding party for which the moving party ought to compensate the responding party.

The undertaking by Halasi for Sweet Dreams tracks the wording of rule 40.03. Thus, Sweet Dreams undertook "to abide by any Order concerning damages that the Court may make if it ultimately appears that the granting of the Order has caused damage to the responding party for which the Applicant ought to compensate it".

[52] Sweet Dreams is liable on its undertaking if the injunction caused the damages that 642947 and Burnac must pay to the vendors, or, assuming more than one cause, if the injunction materially contributed to these damages. In my view, the trial judge erred in finding a causal connection. Although I think little of the conduct of Sweet Dreams and its principals, I cannot see how the injunction caused or materially contributed to the damages 642947 and Burnac must pay to Fleischer and Newton. These damages were caused by the fall in the real estate market and by Burnac's deliberate refusal to close the transaction, after having asked the motions judge to extend the closing date to preserve its interest in the Property.

[53] The injunction and its later dissolution gave rise to at least three possible scenarios. First, whether asked to or not, the motions judge could have refused to extend the closing date. On this scenario, the injunction would have caused the loss of 642947's bargain with Fleischer and Newton, and Sweet Dreams could have been liable on its undertaking for that loss. A second possibility is that the motions judge could have extended the closing date as requested by Burnac, and 642947 could then have closed the transaction on the extended date. On this scenario, Fleischer and Newton would not have suffered any damages and Burnac would have acquired the Property it agreed to buy at the price it agreed to pay. But the injunction would have caused an approximately one-year delay in the closing (from November 24, 1989 to December 7, 1990). Sweet Dreams would therefore be liable to 642947 and Burnac for any damages attributable to the delay. These damages could have included increased carrying costs, loss of re ntal income or even loss of profits.

[54] The third scenario is the one that occurred. The motions judge extended the closing as requested by Burnac but then 642947 refused to close. On this scenario, the injunction caused none of the damages that 642947 and Burnac have been ordered to pay. Instead, these damages were caused by the combination of the fall in the real estate market and 642947's refusal to close. That this must be so can be seen by considering the position of 642947 and Burnac had the injunction not been granted. In that case, 642947 would have paid Fleischer and Newton $2,000,000 for the Property in 1989 and a year later would have been left with a Property worth only $1,130,000. Although Fleischer and Newton would have been paid the contract price, Burnac would still have suffered the same loss, a loss caused solely by the fall in the market.

[55] I therefore conclude that, on causation principles, 642947 and Burnac's claim to be indemnified by Sweet Dreams must fail. Some authorities, however, have suggested that in assessing damages for the wrongful granting of an injunction, a court is not limited by contract law principles but has a wider equitable discretion to do what is "fair and reasonable" or what is "just" in all the circumstances. See Air Express Ltd. v. Ansett Transportation Industries (Operations) Pty Ltd. (1979 to 1981), 146 C.L.R. 249, 33 A.L.R. 578; Village Gate Resorts, supra; I.C.F. Spry, The Principles of Equitable Remedies, 5th ed. (Toronto: Carswell, 1997) at p. 660.

[56] These other authorities address the extent to which damages under an undertaking must conform to the general law applicable to contract damages. They suggest that a judge awarding damages under an undertaking has some discretion to depart from contract damages principles, particularly on the issue of remoteness. None of these authorities states that damages may be awarded when a causal link between the undertaking and the loss is entirely absent. Indeed, each affirms the necessity of establishing factual causation to obtain damages under an undertaking.

[57] Even assuming that a wide discretion to order damages in the absence of a causal connection does exist in some jurisdictions, I doubt that an Ontario court could invoke it in the face of the wording of rule 40.03, which focuses the inquiry on causation. And even if an Ontario court could award damages that seem fair or just, I am not persuaded that this is the right case to do so. In asking for an extension of the closing date, Burnac gambled that the value of the Property would stay the same or go up. When its gamble did not pay off, Burnac reneged on its bargain. It cannot now look to Sweet Dreams to relieve it from the consequences of its own default. That would not be a just result. Therefore, I would set aside the trial judge's order that Sweet Dreams indemnify 642947 and Burnac for their loss.

2. Are Halasi and Krauss personally liable?

[58] Halasi and Krauss' liability depended on finding Sweet Dreams liable on its undertaking. Because 642947 and Burnac's claim against Sweet Dreams failed, so must their claim against the two principals of Sweet Dreams. Nonetheless, I propose to discuss the liability of Halasi and Krauss on the footing that Sweet Dreams was responsible for Burnac's loss. I do so because the issue was fully argued before us and because I consider it relevant to the question of costs.

[59] Halasi and Krauss put forward three reasons why they should not have been held jointly and severally responsible for the damages Burnac and 642947 were ordered to pay Fleischer and Newton. First, they submitted that the trial judge erred in finding Sweet Dreams had insufficient assets to honour its undertaking if called on to pay. Second, they submitted that the adequacy of Sweet Dreams' assets should have been raised by 642947 and Burnac on the injunction application. And, third, they submitted that the trial judge erred in piercing the corporate veil to hold them responsible.

[60] The trial judge found that, when its undertaking was given, Sweet Dreams had no assets from which to pay damages. Halasi and Krauss submitted that this finding cannot be supported on the evidence. I disagree. Sweet Dreams was used by Halasi and Krauss solely to hold their interest and their investors' interest in the property. It had no other purpose. It had no income other than the rent it received on a sublease, a rent that was insufficient to pay its own rent to Fleischer and Newton. It had no assets other than the lease itself. Some evidence of the value of the lease, including the right of first refusal, is found in the offer made by Halasi and Krauss to sell the Property to Burnac for $50,000 more than the contract price. Even if that figure is not an accurate estimate of the lease's value, the lease alone was inadequate to protect 642947 and Burnac from any damages they may have sustained because of the injunction. Sweet Deams simply had no cash or liquid assets to honour its undertaking.

[61] Thus, the trial judge's finding that Sweet Dreams did not have sufficient assets to pay a damages award is amply supported by the evidence. Indeed, Halasi admitted as much when cross-examined on his affidavit in support of the injunction. Hard cases may arise where the ability of a party to pay damages for an injunction wrongly granted may not be obvious. This is not one of those cases.

[62] Even if Sweet Dreams did not have any assets to pay a damages award, Halasi and Krauss contended that the adequacy of its assets should have been raised by Burnac on the injunction application, and that Burnac cannot, after the fact, extract what amounted to personal guarantees. Halasi and Krauss say that the adequacy of Sweet Dreams' assets was relevant to the balance of convenience. If [it was] raised during the hearing, Sweet Dreams could have decided whether to proceed with its injunction application and, if it did, the court could have decided whether to require security or personal guarantees as a condition of granting the injunction. In substance, Halasi and Krauss' submission puts the onus on the party seeking the undertaking -- here 642947 and Burnac -- to raise the adequacy of the assets of the party giving the undertaking.

[63] I do not accept this submission. I agree that on the injunction application Burnac could have questioned the sufficiency of Sweet Dreams' assets. But Sweet Dreams itself had the primary obligation to disclose that its assets were inadequate to satisfy its undertaking if called on to pay. The undertaking was not given to 642947 and Burnac. It was given to the court. By undertaking to "abide by any Order concerning damages that the Court may make", Sweet Dreams implicitly represented that it had sufficient assets to honour that undertaking. Both the court and Burnac were entitled to rely on that representation without making inquiries into its accuracy. If, as was the case here, Sweet Dreams did not have sufficient assets to honour its undertaking, it had an obligation to disclose that fact to the court. Sweet Dreams could then have asked to be relieved of its undertaking, or could have been asked to post security.

[64] Even so, Halasi and Krauss argued that the trial judge erred in law in going behind Sweet Dreams to hold them personally liable. In piercing the corporate veil and imposing personal liability, the trial judge held that Halasi and Krauss used Sweet Dreams as their alter ego and knew when the undertaking was given that Sweet Dreams had no assets from which to pay damages. She therefore concluded, at p. 297 R.P.R., that "the undertaking was fraudulent and it was misconduct on the part of Krauss and Halasi as officers of Sweet Dreams to offer it to the Court."

[65] Halasi and Krauss argued that the trial judge's reasoning reflects two errors: Sweet Dreams was not their alter ego, indeed, they were not even shareholders of Sweet Dreams; and the corporate veil should not have been pierced because Halasi and Krauss incorporated Sweet Dreams for a valid purpose -- to hold property -- and did not use the company as a sham to perpetrate a fraud.

[66] The first argument is specious. Halasi and Krauss, through companies they owned or controlled, each held 40 per cent of the shares of Sweet Dreams. They described themselves as "partners" in trying to assemble land in the North York corridor. Whatever the legal form, they controlled Sweet Dreams and the interest it held in the property. The trial judge's finding (at p. 298 R.P.R.) that "Sweet Dreams was merely the alter ego of both Halasi and Krauss" was open to her on this evidence and I would not interfere with it.

[67] Halasi and Krauss' second argument is that the trial judge disregarded well-known principles of corporate law in holding them personally liable. In my opinion, however, the trial judge took the correct view in concluding (at p. 298 R.P.R.) that "Krauss and Halasi cannot hide behind the corporate veil." To pierce the corporate veil is to disregard the separate legal personality of a corporation, a fundamental principle of corporate law recognized in Salomon v. Salomon & Co., [1897] A.C. 22, [1895-9] All E.R. Rep. 33. Only exceptional cases -- cases where applying the Salomon principle would be "flagrantly" unjust -- warrant going behind the company and imposing personal liability. Thus, in Clarkson Co. v. Zhelka, [1967] 2 O.R. 565 at p. 578, 64 D.L.R. (2d) 457 (H.C.J.), Thompson J. held that instances in which the corporate veil has been pierced "represent refusals to apply the logic of the Salomon case where it would be flagrantly opposed to justice". Similar ly, Wilson J. observed in Kosmopoulos v. Constitution Insurance Co., [1987] 1 S.C.R. 2 at p. 10, 34 D.L.R. (4th) 208, that the law on when the corporate veil can be pierced "follows no consistent principle. The best that can be said is that the 'separate entities' principle is not enforced when it would yield a result 'too flagrantly opposed to justice, convenience or the intersts of the Revenue': L.C.B. Gower, Modern Company Law (4th ed. 1979), at p. 112".

[68] Typically, the corporate veil is pierced when the company is incorporated for an illegal, fraudulent or improper purpose. But it can also be pierced if when incorporated "those in control expressly direct a wrongful thing to be done": Clarkson Co. v. Zhelka at p. 578. Sharpe J. set out a useful statement of the guiding principle in Transamerica Life Insurance Co. of Canada v. Canada Life Assurance Co. (1996), 28 O.R. (3d) 423 at pp. 433-34 (Gen. Div.), affd [1997] O.J. No. 3754 (C.A.): "the courts will disregard the separate legal personality of a corporate entity where it is completely dominated and controlled and being used as a shield for fraudulent or improper conduct."

[69] These authorities indicate that the decision to pierce the corporate veil will depend on the context. They also indicate that the separate legal personality of the corporation cannot be lightly set aside. Yet, however restrictive corporate law principles for piercing the corporate veil may be, in the context of an undertaking to the court, the trial judge's findings support going behind Sweet Dreams and imposing personal liability.

[70] She found that Sweet Dreams had no assets to honour its undertaking, that Halasi and Krauss controlled Sweet Dreams and that when Halasi and Krauss tendered the undertaking for Sweet Dreams they knew it had no assets. All of these findings are reasonably supported by the evidence. Moreover, Halasi was a sophisticated developer and Krauss was a lawyer. They tendered an undertaking to the court, which they knew was worthless, to gain an advantage. When called on to honour the undertaking, they tried to hide behind a shell company, which they controlled, to escape liability. In the words of Sharpe J. in Transamerica Life, Sweet Dreams was "completely dominated and controlled" by Halasi and Krauss, and used by them "as a shield for . . . improper conduct". The trial judge put it this way (at p. 298 R.P.R.), in a passage that I endorse:

> Undertakings cannot be lightly given to the Court to selfishly protect the self-interest of the parties giving the undertaking. It would be a mockery of injunction proceedings if that were so. It would effectively mean that worthless hollow undertakings could be given to the Court, leaving the Court powerless to grant effective sanctions by way of damages which, in the final analysis, could never be collected by the injured party.

Had I upheld the trial judge's finding that Sweet Dreams was liable on its undertaking, I would have also upheld her finding that Halasi and Krauss were liable.

[71] But as I said at the outset of this discussion, Halasi and Krauss could be held liable only if Sweet Dreams were liable. Because Burnac and 642947 could not show a causal connection between the injunction and the damages they suffered, they cannot look to Sweet Dreams and therefore to Halasi and Krauss for indemnification. I would therefore allow the appeal by Sweet Dreams, Halasi and Krauss and dismiss the third party claim against them.

[72] I would, however, deprive them of their costs both at trial and on appeal. The trial judge took a dim view of their conduct and so do I. Indeed, in the dispute between 642947 and Burnac on the one side, and Sweet Dreams, Halasi and Krauss on the other, neither occupies the moral high ground. 642947 and Burnac refused to honour their bargain; Sweet Dreams, Halasi and Krauss exercised a right -- the right of first refusal -- that was spent after the first agreement in order to obtain the injunction. At the hearing of the injunction, they told the motions judge that they were willing to buy the Property for $2,000,000. Then they too abandoned the Property and the injunction when the market fell. Burnac and 642947 must bear full responsibility for the vendors' loss. Although Sweet Dreams, Halasi and Krauss have been successful, because of their conduct I would not award them any costs.

DISPOSITION

[73] For the reasons I have given, I would dismiss both the appeal by Burnac and 642947 and the cross-appeal by Fleischer and Newton with costs. I would allow the appeal by Sweet Dreams, Halasi and Krauss without costs. I would therefore set aside paras. 5 and 6 of the judgment of Greer J. and in their place would order that the claim of 642947 and Burnac against Sweet Dreams, Halasi and Krauss be dismissed but without costs. I am grateful to all counsel for their assistance on these appeals.

Order accordingly.

Notes

Note 1: These damages may be reduced in a case where the plaintiff accepts the defendant's repudiation before closing and the defendant shows that the plaintiff failed to mitigate its loss in the period between the acceptance of the repudiation and the scheduled closing date.

Heard: March 8-9, 2016

On appeal from the judgment of Justice Mary A. Sanderson of the Superior Court of Justice, dated December 17, 2014, with reasons reported at 2014 ONSC 7070.

By the Court:

INTRODUCTION

[1] Sixdion Inc. (“Sixdion”) describes itself as an Aboriginal IT company. Its goal was to market comprehensive IT systems to Aboriginal communities. Computer Associates International Inc. (“CA”)[1] carries on the business of developing, manufacturing and licensing proprietary computer software programs in the U.S. and elsewhere. It has a subsidiary that markets and sells CA’s products in Canada.

[2] In 2004, Sixdion believed that it had a contract with CA. Sixdion claimed that CA breached the contract, resulting in Sixdion's filing for bankruptcy in 2005. Rougemount Capital Inc. (“Rougemount”), a former Sixdion creditor, purchased the action against CA from Sixdion’s trustee for $5,000. It is common ground that this entitles Rougemount to 60% of any damages assessed to have been incurred by Sixdion as a result of CA’s breach of their agreement. Rougemount claimed damages suffered by Sixdion of $20 million - $54 million as a result.

[3] The trial judge found that there was a contract that CA breached and awarded $11 million in damages. CA appeals and argues that the trial judge made fatal errors in reaching her decision on both the issue of the validity and nature of the contract and in her assessment of damages.

[1] We refer to CA as one entity for the purpose of these reasons. The company’s corporate structure is not explained in the trial judge’s reasons for decision or the parties’ factums; however, it seems there was some division. Where appropriate, we refer to CA-Canada and CA-International.

[4] Rougemount, on the other hand, stresses that this action is not just about the destruction of Sixdion, which flowed from CA's breach of contract. Rather, it argues that it is also about the loss of a formidable opportunity for both Sixdion and CA, as a direct result of CA's failure to fulfill its agreement.

BACKGROUND

(a) Sixdion's business and development

[5] Sixdion was incorporated on February 22, 1996. At all material times it had three primary shareholders: Murray Dion ("M. Dion"), Lewis Staats ("Staats"), and Leo Dion ("L. Dion"). Sixdion was an Aboriginal company[2] involved in the information and communications technology business. Initially Sixdion provided "low-tech" services. However, Sixdion's principals testified (and the trial judge accepted) that the company was constantly developing its business model and trying to provide more sophisticated services and products.

[6] In 2004, Sixdion was at a crossroads. Its principals believed that it could achieve commercial success by capitalizing on the company's status as an Aboriginal company (in relation to government procurement contracts) and by providing technology services for Canadian (and eventually international) indigenous populations. However, in order to exploit that potential, it needed capital investment and partnership with more established companies. It is in this context that Sixdion began to interact with CA.

[2] The trial judge at para. 3 describes an Aboriginal company as a company with at least 51% Aboriginal ownership and control.

(b) Negotiations and contract between Sixdion and CA

[7] Representatives of CA-Canada approached Sixdion in March 2004. They were interested in Sixdion because working with an Aboriginal company would make it easier for CA to benefit from government projects and procurement. Initially, CA wanted a marketing agreement wherein Sixdion would re-sell CA products. However, Sixdion insisted on an agreement in which CA would purchase some equity in Sixdion and be an active partner in its business.

[8] The trial judge provided a lot of detail about the negotiations between the two companies over the summer of 2004. We highlight the following salient details:

- CA-Canada was enthusiastic about the deal but CA-International (specifically the head office in New York) was not;
- Chris Devlin ("Devlin") was a significant actor in these negotiations and CA's main representative to Sixdion;
- Devlin told Sixdion's principals that Gary Quinn ("Quinn"), Executive Vice-President at CA-International, had the authority to approve the deal;
- Quinn approved the deal and, on July 30, 2004, Devlin told M. Dion that Quinn had approved the deal; and,
- Devlin sent a letter dated August 11, 2004, which stated: "I am pleased to commit our partnership based on your Term Sheet delivered to me on May 6 of this year. In addition to capital we will invest technical and architectural > resources to ensure that Sixdion can deliver the industries [sic] best practices in infrastructure management".

[9] The deal comprised the following elements: Sixdion would receive $1.5 million from CA; CA would get share warrants that would provide the option to obtain up to ten percent of Sixdion's shares; Sixdion would cooperate in selling CA products to the federal government, allowing CA to benefit from Aboriginal procurement initiatives; and CA would become a partner of Sixdion, finding other investors and businesses, and helping Sixdion develop the capacity to achieve its business objectives.

(c) Breach of agreement

[10] CA did not honour its agreement with Sixdion. It never made the payments that it had promised. Officials at CA-International began to question Quinn's decision to approve the transaction and in October 2004, Jeff Clarke, Chief Operating Officer at CA-International, told Quinn to "kill" the deal. CA then informed Sixdion that it would not be continuing with their arrangement.

[11] The trial judge made a number of findings about the period between July 2004 (when Quinn approved the proposed deal) and November 2004 (when the deal was killed). We note the following:

- Sixdion hired additional staff and incurred additional expenses on the understanding that it would be receiving $1.5 million from CA and would be expanding its business;

- People from CA worked with Sixdion, acting as if they had reached a deal. Devlin volunteered to look for other investors. A CA employee worked with Sixdion to create and implement a business plan for the partnership; and,
- Quinn and Devlin believed that they had the authority to commit to the deal and believed that their agreement was sufficient to commit CA to the contract.

[12] As noted, CA-International decided to "kill" the deal. Sixdion, which had been facing financial difficulties this entire time, collapsed. It filed an assignment into bankruptcy in February 2005.

TRIAL JUDGE'S DECISION

[13] As mentioned earlier, Rougemount commenced the action, alleging breach of contract and seeking damages suffered by Sixdion of $20 million to $54 million as a result.

[14] CA defended Rougemount's claim and argued that: (a) there was no binding contract between CA and Sixdion; (b) CA could rescind any contract because it was obtained through misrepresentations; and (c) Sixdion did not suffer any damages. The trial judge rejected CA's position. She concluded that there was a valid contract and that Sixdion had not made any misrepresentations. She awarded $11 million in damages, along with prejudgment interest.

(a) Sixdion and CA entered into a binding contract

(i) Quinn had the authority to approve the proposed contract

[15] CA argued that Quinn and Devlin did not have the requisite authority to approve the proposed contract. They primarily relied on the evidence of George Cox ("Cox"), an employee at CA's business development group, who stated that any "equity" transaction needed the approval of CA-International's business development team and that Quinn could not approve an "equity" transaction.

[16] On the other hand, Rougemount relied on the fact that Devlin (who testified) believed that Quinn had the authority, and communications from the time of the negotiation showed that both Devlin and Quinn thought that the latter could approve the deal as a "marketing expense" or a "marketing transaction".

[17] The trial judge concluded that Quinn had the requisite authority. She concluded that the proposed deal was a marketing deal and that, therefore, Quinn had the authority to pay the $1.5 million price out of his marketing budget. Furthermore, she concluded that Devlin and Quinn had obtained the requisite approvals.

[18] In the alternative, the trial judge concluded that Quinn and Devlin had apparent authority to bind CA. CA held out Devlin and Quinn as having the requisite authority and did nothing to suggest to Sixdion that they were not authorized to make the deal. She found that the principals of Sixdion reasonably relied on what Devlin told them in regard to Quinn and Devlin's authority.

(ii) Remaining issues regarding the contract

[19] The remaining issues regarding the validity of the contract are not relevant on appeal. We summarize them briefly. The trial judge concluded that the parties had settled all essential terms of the contract by August 11, 2004, and the contract was not conditional on any due diligence, obtaining a second investor, or amalgamation. The trial judge also rejected CA's argument that Sixdion had induced it to enter into the agreement through misrepresentations. Therefore, the contract could not be rescinded.

(b) Sixdion's damages

[20] The trial judge held that CA had breached its contract with Sixdion by (a) failing to pay the $1.5 million promised and (b) failing to provide the promised assistance, training and services business. The trial judge further found that CA had contributed to Sixdion's losses in several ways: (i) CA wrongly informed one of Sixdion's service providers (Telesat) that there was no contract, due to which Telesat insisted on more rigorous repayment terms, contributing to Sixdion's demise; (ii) Devlin discouraged Sixdion from pursuing certain other investors, particularly competitors of CA; and (iii) in reliance on the promised business relationship, Sixdion incurred additional expenses and worsened its precarious financial situation.

Sixdion's failure to achieve its business plan. Rougemount was seeking damages on the basis that, had CA kept to its bargain, Sixdion would have achieved all of the goals set out in the five-year business plan Sixdion had developed with CA. Therefore, the issue ended up being whether Rougemount was entitled to damages on the basis that CA deprived Sixdion of the opportunity to achieve this potential business plan (the "Business Plan").

[22] The trial judge first addressed a number of preliminary issues regarding whether the Business Plan was a proper basis for quantifying damages:

- Would Sixdion have survived: the trial judge concluded that if CA had honoured its commitment, Sixdion would have survived through the critical period of 2004-2006 and would have become a profitable enterprise.
- Was Sixdion's demise foreseeable: CA knew of Sixdion's precarious financial circumstances and its need for cash. Therefore, Sixdion's demise was a foreseeable result of CA's breach of contract.
- Date of assessment of damages: the trial judge recognized that damages for a breach of contract are presumptively quantified with reference to the date of the breach. However, in this case, doing that would not fairly reflect Sixdion's actual loss. The trial judge concluded that damages should be assessed as of January 31, 2010, the end of the period reflected on the Business Plan.

The quantum of damages

[23] As noted, the trial judge concluded that a fair assessment of Sixdion's damages would be to quantify its losses based on its five-year business plan as of January 31, 2010. The trial judge concluded that there was sufficient evidence in support of this business plan. Therefore, Rougemount's assertions were supported by evidence sufficient to discharge its onus.

[24] The parties mostly relied on two expert witnesses in support of their respective positions regarding damages. The plaintiff relied on the testimony and expert report of Stephen Pittman ("Pittman"), a chartered professional accountant and chartered business valuator. The defendant relied on Domenic Marino ("Marino"), also an accountant and business valuator. Marino, however, did not present an independent report or valuation; he only provided a "limited critique" of Pittman's methodology.

[25] After reviewing the parties' evidence, the trial judge concluded that it was reasonable for Pittman to rely on the assumptions contained in the Business Plan. Then, she reviewed the competing methodologies presented by Pittman and Marino, and concluded that she preferred Pittman's.

[26] As noted, the trial judge concluded that damages should be assessed as of January 31, 2010. However, Pittman's report was premised on damages being assessed as of 2012. The trial judge tweaked Pittman's assessment and calculated damages as of January 31, 2010. She also made some additional adjustments to reflect the risk that she found that Sixdion would have been facing between October 2004 and January 31, 2010. Based on this, she concluded that the plaintiff was entitled to $11 million in damages.

THE ISSUES

[27] There are two questions that need to be answered on this appeal. First, did the trial judge err by concluding that Quinn or Devlin had the authority to enter into the contract with Sixdion? Second, did the trial judge err in her award of damages?

[28] As we will explain, we conclude that Quinn and Devlin did have authority to enter into the contract and that CA breached the contract. However, we also conclude that the trial judge erred in assessing damages as of 2010, rather than as of 2004, when the breach of contract occurred. Accordingly, the appeal is allowed in part with respect to damages.

DISCUSSION

(a) Did the trial judge err by concluding that Quinn or Devlin had the authority to enter into the contract with Sixdion?

[29] CA makes two submissions regarding this ground of appeal. First, it argues the trial judge wrongly concluded that the proposed deal was a “marketing deal” and not an “equity transaction”. It points out that, as a result of the contract, CA would have acquired ten percent of Sixdion's shares. Thus, it says, it was an equity transaction, which Quinn had no authority to approve.

[30] Second, CA argues that neither Quinn nor Devlin had apparent authority. It says that there is no evidence that anyone from CA with actual authority ever represented that either Devlin or Quinn had authority. Moreover, CA asserts, Sixdion never made any attempt to inquire into their authority.

(i) Nature of the contract

[31] CA argues that the trial judge made a palpable and overriding error by disregarding the equity component of this transaction in her findings in deciding Quinn's authority. It contends, as it did at trial, that the transaction was an acquisition of ten percent of the equity interest in Sixdion. Thus, it required a process of approval that did not include Quinn. We reject this argument.

[32] The trial judge specifically identified and fully addressed CA's view of the deal. She thoroughly reviewed the evidence related to it and, at para. 379 of her reasons, summarized her conclusion:

> From the exhibits and Devlin's evidence, I infer and I find that Quinn had actual authority to authorize and incur a $1.5 million marketing expense. In essence Quinn authorized a marketing deal that gave CA the additional option of exercising the warrants if it so chose. Quinn and Devlin considered that aspect to be an additional peripheral benefit, not the essence of the deal.

[33] The contract included a purchase of share warrants that could lead to a ten percent equity interest in Sixdion only if CA chose to exercise the warrants. In other words, the trial judge did not disregard the equity component; rather, she put it in proper perspective in the larger scheme of the deal.

(ii) Actual authority

[34] CA argues that the trial judge made a palpable and overriding error in finding that Quinn had authority to approve the deal with Sixdion. We disagree.

[35] As recently noted by Weiler J.A. in 1196303 Inc. v. Glen Grove Suites Inc., 2015 ONCA 580, 337 O.A.C. 85, at para. 71:

> While agency is often created by an express contract, setting out the scope of the agent's authority, the creation of an agency relationship may be implied from the conduct or situation of the parties. Whether an agency relationship exists is ultimately a question of fact, to be determined in the light of the surrounding circumstances. [Citations omitted.]

[36] In our opinion, there is no reason for taking a different approach to determining the scope of an agent's authority. It is a question of fact to be determined in light of the circumstances, including the conduct or situation of the parties.

[37] In this case, it is important to note that the trial judge did not receive any direct evidence about the scope of Quinn's authority. CA did not provide any written record of its policies and did not call any senior officers or directors to testify. Rather, it called Cox, a relatively junior employee, who was the only witness who testified that Quinn did not have actual authority to approve the deal.

[38] On the other hand, Devlin testified that Quinn did have actual authority and there was support for that position in the documentary evidence from the relevant time period.

[39] The trial judge had to decide this issue on the basis of competing circumstantial evidence. Her conclusion, as quoted above, is reasonable and supported by the evidence. CA has not provided any reason why we should interfere.

[40] Given this conclusion, it is not necessary to address CA's arguments on apparent, as opposed to actual, authority.

(iii) Did the trial judge err in her award of damages?

Standard of review

[41] Damages awards attract considerable deference. The limited scope for appellate interference was noted in Naylor Group Inc. v. Ellis-Don Construction Ltd., 2001 SCC 58, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 943, at para. 80:

> It is common ground that the Court of Appeal was not entitled to substitute its own view of a proper award unless it could be shown that the trial judge had made an error of principle of law, or misapprehended the evidence, or it could be shown there was no evidence on which the trial judge could have reached his or her conclusion, or the trial judge failed to consider relevant factors in the assessment of damages, or considered > irrelevant factors, or otherwise, in the result, made "a palpably incorrect" or "wholly erroneous" assessment of the damages. Where one or more of these conditions are met, however, the appellate court is obliged to interfere. [Citations omitted.]

[42] Moreover, as recently observed by this court in Livent Inc. v. Deloitte & Touche, 2016 ONCA 11, 128 O.R. (3d) 225, at para. 388, quantifying damages is not an exact science and trial judges are obliged to do the best they can on the evidence, short of failing to analyze the evidence at all or simply guessing.

What is the appropriate date for the assessment of damages?

[43] The appellant submits that the trial judge erred in following the approach offered by Rougemount's expert, thereby rejecting the date of the breach and using the date at the end of the Business Plan as the date for the assessment of damages. We agree.

[44] It is well established that the general measure of damages for breach of contract is the amount of damages that will, so far as money can, place the aggrieved party in the same position as if the wrong had not been done: Ticketnet Corp. v. Air Canada (1997), 154 D.L.R. (4th) 271 (Ont. C.A.), at para. 97. The focus is on the injured party's loss and on the measure of compensation required to restore it to the position that it would have been in had the contract been performed: 642947 Ontario Ltd. v. Fleischer (2001), 56 O.R. (3d) 417 (C.A.) , at para. 41; Kinbauri Gold Corp. v. Iamgold International African Mining Gold Corp. (2004), 246 D.L.R. (4th) 595 (Ont. C.A.), at para. 53.

[45] With respect to the appropriate date for the assessment of damages, the presumption is that damages, including those for loss of a business or opportunity, should generally be assessed as of the date of breach: Johnson v. Agnew, [1980] A.C. 367 (H.L.), at pp. 400-401.

[46] The trial judge correctly noted that the presumptive rule for assessing damages is that damages for breach of contract are to be quantified at the time of breach. However, she accepted Rougemount's submission that she could choose a date other than the date of the breach if an assessment as of that date would not fairly reflect Sixdion's actual loss.

[47] The trial judge found that an assessment of damages at the date of breach would not fairly reflect Sixdion's actual loss or put it in the position it would have been in but for CA's breach. She concluded that had the contract been honoured, Sixdion's earnings from the contract would have started shortly after July 30, 2004 and continued until at least January 31, 2010. As a result, she found that it would be unfair to assess damages as of the date of breach in 2004 and to fail to reflect the benefits Sixdion would have derived after 2004 from the CA contract. Instead, she assessed damages as of the end of the Business Plan, on January 31, 2010.

[48] The trial judge appears to have based her conclusion largely on the opinion of Rougemount's expert, which she modified. Mr. Pittman did not assess Sixdion's damages as of the date of breach in 2004. Rather, he valued Sixdion as it would have been in 2012 or 2014. In response to the trial judge's question as to why he did not choose the date of breach, Mr. Pittman testified that it would not have properly reflected the "upside" of executing the Business Plan. Specifically, he opined that the discounted valuation at the date of breach was not appropriate because it would apply all of the weight to the early years when there were losses anticipated and very little weight to the latter years when all of the upside of the Business Plan would be realized. As a result, he felt it did not fairly reflect the true damages sustained by Sixdion.

[49] Rougemount submits that the presumptive rule that damages are assessed at the date of breach can be displaced where fairness requires it: Kinbauri, at paras. 66-68. Moreover, Rougemount submits that the trial judge's determination that fairness required damages to be assessed at a later date in this case was an exercise of her discretion, based on the all of the circumstances, which should not be disturbed on appeal.

[50] We agree that the general presumption that damages will be assessed as of the date of breach may be subject to exceptions where fairness requires it. However, this presumption should not be easily displaced; any deviation from it must be based on legal principle. As the British Columbia Court of Appeal recently noted in Dosanjh v. Liang, 2015 BCCA 18, 380 D.L.R. (4th) 137, at para. 55:

> [T]he presumption that contract damages are to be assessed as of the date of the breach is not so easily displaced. It is important that the law in this area be predictable, and such predictability is not served by allowing judges unbounded discretion as to the date for assessment of damages.

[51] The rationale for this general presumption was articulated by Laskin J.A., concurring in Kinbauri, at para. 125:

> As Cronk J.A. points out, damages for breach of contract are generally assessed at the date of breach. An early crystallization of the plaintiff's damages promotes efficient behaviour: the litigants become as free as possible to conduct their affairs as they see fit. Early crystallization also avoids speculation: the plaintiff is precluded from speculating at the defendant's expense by reaping the benefits of an increase in the value of the goods in question without bearing any risk of loss.

[52] Indeed, this general presumption should only be displaced in special circumstances, such as, for example, where no market exists to replace undelivered shares at the date of breach: Kinbauri, at para. 126; or in relation to "[s]ome classes of property, including shares, whose value is subject to sudden and constant fluctuations of unpredictable amplitude, and whose purchase is not lightly entered into": Asamera Oil Corp. Ltd. v. Sea Oil & General Corp., [1979] 1 S.C.R. 663, at pp. 664-65.

[53] The kind of special circumstances alluded to in Kinbauri and Asamera were not present in this case. The trial judge did not reference any. The circumstances of this case were no different than any other case where damages for future loss have to be determined. In concluding that the circumstances of the present case constituted the kind of unfairness that would allow an exception to the calculation of damages as at the date of breach, the trial judge erred.

[54] First, by assessing damages starting in the future in 2010, the trial judge erroneously focused solely on maximizing the potential benefits to Sixdion under the contract with CA. The trial judge failed to take into account Sixdion's deeply troubled financial history and uncertain status going into the contract with CA and the fact that Sixdion was embarking on a new line of business.

[55] The evidence clearly established that Sixdion was in a very precarious financial position in October 2004. Its financial statements show a company on the brink of insolvency, with its liabilities well exceeding its assets and its revenues not covering its expenses. Moreover, Sixdion's correspondence with CA during this time period is replete with references to its desperate need for financing simply to allow it to meet ordinary expenses as they came due, such as its payroll. Other than CA, Sixdion was unable to attract other investors. Sixdion voluntarily wound up its operations on October 27, 2004 and filed for bankruptcy in February 2005, with liabilities outweighing its assets by nearly $2.7 million.

[56] While her evaluation of damages was based on her findings that Sixdion would have survived and avoided bankruptcy, the trial judge could not ignore the unchallenged evidence that Sixdion was in an insecure financial position with significant liabilities that it had to satisfy, even if it managed to become profitable in the future.

[57] Further, the trial judge erred by not applying the discounted cash flow analysis prepared by the appellant's expert. The appellant's expert, Mr. Marino, opined that if the trial judge were to conclude that the forecasts were sufficiently reliable, the correct valuation methodology would involve a discounted cash flow analysis as set out in his calculations. Using a discounted cash flow approach and applying a venture capital discount rate of between 40% and 70% to Mr. Pittman's averages, Mr. Marino estimated that Rougemount's resulting share of Sixdion's losses as at August 1, 2004, would be in a range of approximately between $0 and $2.6 milliion.

[58] The respondent's expert, Mr. Pittman, confirmed that had he used August 2004, the date of breach, for the assessment of damages, the discounted cash flow approach applied by Mr. Marino would have been correct. He also testified in cross-examination that when venture capitalists are looking at a business with no prior history of revenue and are basing their assessment of a forecast, they would be looking at discount rates in the range of 40% to 100%.

[59] In our view, although there were some obvious issues concerning the reliability estimates contained in the Business Plan, it was open to the trial judge, in the absence of better or other evidence, to use the Business Plan as a basis for her assessment of damages. The trial judge's reasons demonstrate that she was well aware of the Business Plan's deficiencies.

[60] We agree that the Business Plan was subject to some inflationary puffery, given that it was an optimistic presentation of what the parties hoped would happen in the future in order to obtain CA head office's agreement to the investment. However, we also agree with the trial judge's observation that it was the product of Sixdion and CA and, subject to appropriate tweaking and discounts, was the only solid financial information that was available for the purposes of estimating Sixdion's future loss of opportunity.

[61] That said, we are also of the view that the trial judge erred in failing to apply a discounted cash flow analysis as of the date of the breach. This meant that the risk and unpredictability of Sixdion's future cash flows were ignored until a point many years after the date of breach and resulted in an artificial inflation of the damages. The approach followed by the trial judge failed to take into account the cumulative risk that the profits set out in the Business Plan might not materialize.

[62] As such, even had CA fulfilled its contractual obligations, the new business would have had significant start-up costs, including the payment of significant past liabilities to Sixdion's creditors, and the enormous revenues predicted towards the end of the Business Plan would have taken some time to generate. Accordingly, placing Sixdion in the position that it would have occupied had the contract been performed meant taking into account the costs as well as the benefits of the new business venture. The trial judge's approach failed to do this.

[63] We conclude that the discounted cash flow analysis prepared by the appellant's expert, calculating damages as of the date of breach in 2004, would be the fairest method to assess Sixdion's damages. We also agree that Sixdion's unstable financial past and condition, as well as the uncertainty of the new venture, justifies a substantial discount.

[64] Having regard to the fact that the calculation of these damages is not an exact science, we are of the view that the mid-range of Mr. Marino's calculation would allow for the fairest assessment of damages in all the particular circumstances of the present case. This would result in damages of $1,300,000.

DISPOSITION

[65] For these reasons, we would allow the appeal with respect to damages and order that CA pay damages of $1,300,000 to the respondent, as a result of CA's breach of its agreement with Sixdion.

[66] The parties' costs submissions on appeal and at trial were premised on one party being entirely successful on all issues. Given the disposition of this appeal, if the parties cannot agree on the disposition of costs, we believe that the fairest approach to both parties is that further brief written submissions be delivered.

[67] Accordingly, the parties shall deliver costs submissions of no more than five pages, not including a costs outline, concerning the disposition of the costs at trial and on appeal, as follows: the appellant shall deliver its submissions by November 14, 2016; the respondent shall deliver its submissions by November 28, 2016. There shall be no reply submissions.

Summary:

The plaintiff agreed to purchase residential property from the defendant. The defendant refused to complete the transaction because she considered the purchase price to be too low. After initially insisting on completion, the plaintiff wrote to the defendant, accepted her repudiation and sued for damages. The trial judge found that the purchaser had not unequivocally affirmed the contract, and that he was entitled to accept the repudiation and sue for damages. Over the objection of the vendor, the judge accepted a property assessment under the Assessment Act as evidence of the market value of the property. The vendor appealed. Held: Appeal allowed to the extent of remitting the assessment of damages to the trial court. While the purchaser had unequivocally affirmed the contract, the vendor's conduct amounted to a continuing repudiation, and the purchaser was entitled to accept the repudiation when he did. The property assessment was not admissible evidence to establish the market value, and it should not have been considered by the judge. The court acknowledges that property assessments are sometimes used as evidence of value in family law cases; whether or not that is proper practice, it does not extend to other types of civil litigation.

Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Mr. Justice Groberman:

[1] This appeal arises out of a residential real estate sale that failed to close. Mr. Dosanjh, the purchaser, alleges that Ms. Liang, the vendor, repudiated the contract, and that she is liable to him in damages. While Ms. Liang accepts the trial judge's finding that her actions constituted a repudiation of the contract, she says that Mr. Dosanjh thereafter elected to affirm the contract rather than accept the repudiation. She says that he cannot, therefore, claim damages for her breach. She also argues that Mr. Dosanjh himself breached the agreement by failing to pay a deposit in a timely manner, and that that breach bars him from recovery.

[2] The trial judge found that Mr. Dosanjh did not affirm the contract, and that he was entitled to accept the repudiation and sue for damages. She awarded Mr. Dosanjh $37,400, which she found to be the difference between the contract price and the market value of the property on a date three months after the closing date. She found that it was reasonable to expect that Mr. Dosanjh would have found another suitable house by that time. The appellant appeals the judgment, both in respect of liability and damages.

[3] I am of the view that the judge was correct in finding the appellant liable for breach of contract. Her assessment of damages, however, was based on inadmissible evidence, and cannot stand. In the course of the appeal, both parties agreed that, in the event that the appeal is allowed on the issue of damages alone, the matter should be returned to the trial court for a new hearing to assess the quantum of damages.

The Agreement for Purchase and Sale

[4] The appellant owned residential property in Burnaby, which she rented to tenants. In August 2011, the RCMP informed her that her tenants had been using the property to grow marijuana. Ms. Liang was upset by this news, and immediately contacted a realtor for the purpose of putting the property up for sale.

[5] The realtor arranged for an advertisement on Craigslist, which first appeared on August 26, 2011. It listed the property for sale for $629,000. The realtor also arranged for the property to be listed on the Multiple Listing Service ("MLS"), but the listing was not to take effect until the following Monday, August 29.

[6] Mr. Dosanjh saw the Craigslist listing on the day that it was published, and contacted the realtor to express interest in the property. He was given the address of the property, and arranged to meet with the realtor the following day.

[7] Mr. Dosanjh viewed the exterior of the house on August 27, but did not have access to the interior. He then met with the realtor, as planned, and made an offer to purchase the property. After some negotiations, the parties reached an agreement that same day, under which Mr. Dosanjh would purchase the property for $605,000, with an October 1, 2011 completion date.

[8] Mr. Dosanjh's offer was subject to three conditions inserted for his sole benefit. First, he was entitled to inspect the property for the presence of asbestos products, and was entitled to demand that Ms. Liang arrange for the removal of any such products. Second, he was entitled to have any oil storage tanks on the property removed by Ms. Liang prior to the completion date. Finally, the agreement was conditional upon Mr. Dosanjh obtaining a building permit and municipal approvals by September 15, 2011.

[9] The deposit clause in the contract read as follows:

> DEPOSIT: A deposit of $30,000.00 which will form part of the Purchase Price, will be paid on the following terms:
>
> Deposit to be paid after subjects are removed.
>
> All monies paid pursuant to this section (Deposit) will … be delivered to [the realtor] and held in trust….

[10] By August 29, Ms. Liang had second thoughts about the deal. Late that evening, Ms. Liang's realtor sent an e-mail to Mr. Dosanjh as follows:

> I wanted to let you know right away of a situation that has developed. The owner of 7849 18th Ave has contacted me and advised me she will not proceed with this contract. She explained to me that she was under great duress in making a decision. She was contacted by the police about the grow [o]p the previous day and then felt so much pressure in having to make a major decision within a few hours. I tried to contact her today but her family told me she is being treated by her doctor at the hospital for anxiety and depression and has not called me back. Her family told me they have an appointment with the lawyer on Thursday to discuss this situation. It's all I know at this point. I am gathering from what I know that the family feels that the price was unreasonable in the current market place.
> I don't know what else I can do at this point.

[11] Mr. Dosanjh attempted to contact the realtor by telephone, but was not immediately successful. On August 30, he sent an e-mail indicating that he had not observed Ms. Liang to be under stress on August 27, and stating that he wished to proceed to have an inspector check the property for asbestos and for oil tanks. Mr. Dosanjh also spoke with the realtor after sending the e-mail, and told him that he wanted to remove the conditions and to proceed to complete the purchase.

[12] The MLS listing resulted in considerable interest in the property, and on August 30, Ms. Liang increased the asking price on the MLS listing to $669,000.

[13] On September 6, 2011, Mr. Dosanjh sent another e-mail to the realtor, which read, in part:

> Although the subject removal date is September 15, 2011 … on August 31st we … told you that we are ready to remove all subjects. We tried several > times but you don't pick up the phone so we are removing the subjects and sending it to your office. As soon as the seller signs the subject removal form, we are ready to send the $30,000 deposit cheque.

[14] On September 8, 2011, Mr. Dosanjh sent a fax to the realtor in the same terms. Attached to the fax was a copy of the addendum to the contract that contained the conditions, upon which he wrote "Removal of following 'subjects to clauses'". On the same day, Mr. Dosanjh's lawyer sent a letter to Ms. Liang and to the realtor which included the following:

> We advise that the Buyer is ready, willing and able to complete this transaction on the completion date, October 1, 2011.
>
> With respect to the email letter of August 28, 2011 in which [the realtor] says "[t]he owner... has contacted me and advised me she will not proceed with this contract" we ask that you, Ms. Liang, immediately contact the writer to confirm whether that statement should be viewed as any anticipatory breach of Contract by the Seller.
> We advise that should you fail to complete the transaction on October 1, 2011 our client will take immediate proceedings to pursue any and all remedies available … under the Contract including, but not limited to, the specific performance of the Contract and damages, or alternatively, damages.

[15] Ms. Liang received the letter, but did not respond to it. It is not clear whether the realtor also received the letter; in any event, he did not respond to it.

[16] Mr. Dosanjh went to the realtor's office with the intention of dropping off a cheque for the deposit. The receptionist advised him that the realtor was not in. Mr. Dosanjh did not leave the cheque at the office, but attempted, unsuccessfully, to contact the realtor by telephone. It appears that the realtor was, in fact, away from British Columbia between September 4 and September 11, 2011.

[17] On September 14, Mr. Dosanjh's lawyer couriered a cheque for the deposit amount to the realtor's office during business hours. The courier was unable to deliver it because the office was closed. On September 15, the lawyer wrote to Ms. Liang as follows:

> We confirm that the deposit of $30,000.00 was sent via courier in the form of a certified cheque to the offices of [your realtor]. Our courier advises that the office was closed and that no one was present to accept the deposit ….
> Coupled with the letter by the Realtor … of August 29, 2011 in which [he] advised our client that you did not intend to complete this transaction, and given that you have not responded to our letter of September 8, 2011 which was sent to you by registered mail and because the deposit was not accepted today, please be advised that our client regards this conduct as amounting to an anticipatory breach of the contract of purchase and sale and our client will pursue all available remedies.
> This is clear and unequivocal notice to you that we accept your repudiation of said contract and that this acceptance ends any obligation on our client to tender the purchase price on the date stipulated in the contract as a precondition to seeking enforcement in this action.

[18] Ms. Liang received the letter on September 19, and did not respond to it. Mr. Dosanjh immediately commenced an action. Neither party took any steps to close the transaction on the scheduled completion date.

The Trial Judge's Decision

[19] At trial, Mr. Dosanjh contended that Ms. Liang's realtor's e-mail of August 29, 2011 constituted a repudiation of the contract. Ms. Liang, on the other hand, argued that the e-mail merely outlined concerns that she had, and was not a statement that she was refusing to proceed with the contract.

[20] The judge found that the e-mail did constitute a repudiation of the contract. She noted that the realtor's e-mail unequivocally stated: "The owner … has advised me she will not proceed with this contract." At para. 47 of her reasons, she accepted that "Mr. Dosanjh was entitled to conclude, from reading the whole of the e-mail, that Ms. Liang did not intend to proceed." She also noted that the realtor's subsequent telephone conversations with Mr. Dosanjh confirmed that Ms. Liang would not proceed with the sale.

[21] The next issue was whether Mr. Dosanjh accepted the repudiation or, instead, affirmed the contract. Mr. Dosanjh took the position that he accepted the repudiation in his lawyer's letter of September 15, 2011. Ms. Liang's position was that Mr. Dosanjh had unequivocally and irrevocably affirmed the contract prior to September 15, and could, as of that date, no longer choose to accept the repudiation. In support of her position, she relied on Mr. Dosanjh's e-mail of August 30 and his telephone conversations with the realtor around that time. She also points to his September 6 e-mail, his September 8 fax, and his attempts to deliver the deposit cheque to the realtor's office.

[22] Ms. Liang argued that, having affirmed the contract, Mr. Dosanjh was no longer in a position, on September 15, 2011, to accept the repudiation. Further, she argued that Mr. Dosanjh had himself breached the contract by failing to tender the deposit when he waived the "subject to" conditions. She contended that a party, while himself in breach of a contract, cannot purport to accept the other side's repudiation and sue for damages.

[23] The trial judge noted, at para. 55, that "the court should be careful not to find that a party has affirmed a contract without very clear evidence that he or she has irrevocably chosen to go with the contract." At para. 64, she characterized Mr. Dosanjh's actions between August 29, 2011 and September 15, 2011 as "assessing the circumstances, considering his options, attempting to resolve the situation, and trying to ensure that he did what he had to do to complete the Contract in the event he was able to convince Ms. Liang to recognize her obligations." She concluded that he did not affirm the Contract, and that he was still entitled, at the time he communicated his intentions by his lawyer's letter of September 15, 2011, to accept Ms. Liang's repudiation.

[24] The judge found it unnecessary to resolve the issue of whether Mr. Dosanjh was in breach of the contract by failing to pay the deposit on time. She said:

> [72] Mr. Dosanjh did not succeed in delivering the deposit prior to accepting Ms. Liang's earlier repudiation. However, even if this amounted to a breach of the deposit clause in the Contract, Ms. Liang did not do anything to exercise her right to terminate the Contract pursuant to the terms of the deposit clause or under the common law. Accordingly, even if Mr. Dosanjh breached the Contract by failing to pay the deposit when it was due, his repudiation remained unaccepted and the Contract continued in existence until Mr. Dosanjh accepted Ms. Liang's earlier repudiation by his letter dated September 15.

> [73] For these reasons, I find that the Contract was not discharged by Mr. Dosanjh's failure to pay the deposit.

[25] With respect to remedy, the judge accepted Ms. Liang's argument that Mr. Dosanjh could not claim specific performance because he had accepted the repudiation of the contract. She also found that, as specific performance was not an available remedy, damages in lieu of specific performance were also unavailable. In the result, Mr. Dosanjh was not entitled to damages based on the value of the property at the date of trial.

[26] The judge recognized that, ordinarily, damages are to be assessed on the date of the breach, but noted that circumstances may, in some instances, justify a court in choosing a different date. The judge chose January 2012, based on her view that Mr. Dosanjh should have located another residential property to purchase by that time, some three months after the closing date.

[27] The judge noted that there was evidence to suggest that the $605,000.00 purchase price was materially less than the market value of the property. She found that Ms. Liang's primary reason for refusing to proceed with the deal was that she considered the purchase price to be below market value. She also noted that there was considerable interest in the property as soon as the MLS listing appeared, and that Ms. Liang increased the list price to $669,000. The judge concluded, at para. 90, that the increase was motivated by the fact that "the market value [of the property] materially exceeded the Contract price."

[28] With respect to the quantification of damages, the judge mentioned that the plaintiff had obtained an appraisal of the property (as of November 8, 2012). The appraisal did not comply with the requirements for expert evidence, and it was not tendered as evidence of the value of the property, though it was, apparently, tendered for the limited purpose of showing that an appraisal had been obtained. The judge did not use the appraisal as evidence of the value of the property.

[29] Instead, over the objections of Ms. Liang, she used the 2013 assessment by the BC Assessment Authority (prepared under s. 2 of the Assessment Act, R.S.B.C.

1996, c. 20) as evidence of the value of the property. That assessment report attributed values to the property as of July 1 of each of 2011, 2012 and 2013. The trial judge took the arithmetic mean of the 2011 and 2012 values as the appropriate market value of the property in January 2012.

Issues on this Appeal

[30] On this appeal, Ms. Liang accepts the judge's finding that her real estate agent's letter of August 29, 2011 constituted a repudiation of the contract. She says, however, that Mr. Dosanjh unequivocally and irrevocably affirmed the contract in his subsequent communications and actions. She says that it was no longer open to him to accept the repudiation when he purported to do so in his letter of September 15, 2011.

[31] She also argues that, whether or not Mr. Dosanjh affirmed the contract, it was not open to him to accept the repudiation by his letter of September 15, 2011, because he was, by then, himself in breach of the contract, having failed to deliver the required $30,000 deposit to her. She also says that the judge erred in finding that Ms. Liang did not, by her actions, show that she was accepting Mr. Dosanjh's breach as a repudiation of the contract.

[32] Finally, Ms. Liang argues that the judge erred in her assessment of damages, both by using inadmissible evidence to determine the market value of the property and by inappropriately choosing January 2012 as the date for assessment of damages.

Did Mr. Dosanjh Unequivocally Affirm the Contract?

[33] The trial judge summarized the general law with respect to a party's right to accept a repudiation of a contract at para. 50 of her judgment:

> The consequences of a repudiation, whether by anticipatory breach or breach of a fundamental term, are well established. They are referred to in Sethna v. 350 Kingsway Development Ltd., 2011 BCCA 434, at para. 24, and Homestar Industrial Properties Ltd. v. Philps (1992), 72 B.C.L.R. (2d) 69 (C.A.), at para. 13, and may be summarized as follows:

- A party to a contract has two alternatives if the other party repudiates the contract: the innocent party may accept the repudiation or affirm the contract.
- If the innocent party accepts the repudiation, the contract is at an end, both parties are relieved of their obligations under it, and the innocent party may sue for damages immediately without waiting for the time that the contract should have been performed.
- If the innocent party affirms the contract, the contract remains alive in all respects for both parties, and the risk exists that the party beginning as the innocent party will subsequently commit a breach of its own.
- If the innocent party wishes to accept the repudiation, he or she must make his or her election known.
- Once made, the election is irrevocable.

[34] Neither party quarrels with these general propositions, which are well-supported in the case law. As I will indicate, however, the last proposition – that an election, once made, is irrevocable – requires some qualification to ensure that it is not inappropriately applied in cases of repeated or continuing repudiation.

[35] A court will not find that an innocent party has affirmed a contract in the absence of clear evidence leading it to that conclusion. The trial judge expressed the proposition as follows:

> [55] Affirmation may be express or implied, but the court should be careful not to find that a party has affirmed a contract without very clear evidence that he or she has irrevocably chosen to go on with the contract. This is explained in Chitty [Chitty on Contracts, 31st ed (London, UK: Sweet & Maxwell Ltd., 2012) vol 1] at 1696-97 as follows:
> > [The innocent party] will not be held to have elected to affirm the contract unless, first, he has knowledge of the facts giving rise to the breach, and, secondly, he has knowledge of his legal right to choose between the alternatives open to him. Affirmation may be express or implied. It will be implied if, with knowledge of the breach and of his right to choose, he does some unequivocal act from which it may be inferred that he intends to go on with the contract regardless of the breach or from which it may be inferred that he will not exercise his right to treat the contract as repudiated. … Mere inactivity after breach does not of itself amount to affirmation, nor (it seems) does the commencement of an action claiming damages for breach. The mere fact that the innocent party has called on the party in breach to change his mind, accept his obligations and perform the contract will not generally, of itself, amount to an affirmation …

[36] The judge then cited Yukong Line Ltd. of Korea v. Rendsburg Investments Corporation of Liberia, [1996] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 604. She also referred to the following passage from Abraham v. Coblenz Holdings Ltd., 2013 BCCA 512:

> [28] In my view, an innocent party is not required to communicate its acceptance of a repudiation immediately. An innocent party must have a reasonable opportunity to assess the circumstances it finds itself in, to assess its options, and to explore the possibility of resolving the situation. That is particularly so where, as here, the tenants had invested a substantial amount of money in the premises and were not willing to walk away without trying to negotiate a workable arrangement. What matters is whether, in all of the circumstances, the tenants acted reasonably in communicating their course of action so as not to prejudice the other party by inducing it to act as if its repudiation of the agreement had not been accepted: Allen v. Robles, [1969] 3 All E.R. 154 (C.A.).

[37] I accept that, where a party has repudiated a contract, the opposite party is entitled to a reasonable period of time in which to decide whether to affirm the contract or accept the repudiation. I also accept that, at least until that reasonable period of time has elapsed, a court should be slow to treat equivocal statements or acts as affirmations of the contract. The court's solicitude toward the innocent party, however, must not extend to ignoring unequivocal acts or statements of affirmation made by a party that is aware of its legal rights.

[38] In the case before us, I am not persuaded that Mr. Dosanjh's statements and actions in the aftermath of Ms. Liang's repudiation of the contract can be interpreted as anything other than an affirmation of the contract. Immediately after being advised of Ms. Liang's intentions not to complete the contract, Mr. Dosanjh indicated that it was his intention to proceed with the purchase. All of his subsequent actions up to September 15, 2011 were consistent only with an intention to treat the contract as an ongoing one.

[39] Of particular importance is the lawyer's letter of September 8, 2011, which affirmed that Mr. Dosanjh was "ready, willing and able to complete this transaction on the completion date, October 1, 2011" and indicated that if Ms. Liang failed to complete, he would pursue remedies including specific performance. The letter is not consistent with an acceptance of the repudiation. Further, and most importantly, it is a letter sent at a time when Mr. Dosanjh had had some time to reflect on the situation, and had obtained legal advice as to his position.

[40] Mr. Dosanjh's communications and actions (up until the letter of September 15, 2011) unequivocally demonstrated an intention to affirm the contract. There was no evidentiary basis for the judge's finding to the contrary. The evidence establishes that by September 8, 2011 Mr. Dosanjh made an election to affirm the contract rather than accept Ms. Liang's repudiation of it.

To What Extent was the Affirmation of the Contract Irrevocable?

[41] Normally, after a party has repudiated a contract, the opposite party must elect whether to affirm the contract or accept the repudiation. If it affirms the contract, it cannot, later on, re-elect, and choose to accept the repudiation.

[42] That does not mean, however, that a party that repudiates a contract is free to commit fundamental breaches without fear that the contract will be terminated, nor does it mean that a party guilty of a fundamental breach may continue to refuse to perform with impunity. Each time a party commits an act amounting to a repudiation, the opposite party is entitled to elect to affirm the contract or accept the repudiation. The fact that the innocent party has previously affirmed a contract does not disentitle it from accepting a new repudiation of it by the guilty party.

[43] Equally, a party that has affirmed a contract after a repudiation by the other party may, if the repudiation is continuing, choose to accept it and treat the contract as at an end. The issue was explored by Lowry J.A. (Prowse J.A. concurring) in Doman Forest Products Ltd. v. GMAC Commercial Credit Corp. – Canada, 2007 BCCA 88. After discussing a number of authorities, including Fletton Ltd. v. Peat Marwick Ltd. (1988), 27 B.C.L.R. (2d) 209 (C.A.) leave refused [1988] 2 S.C.R. vi; Elderfield v. Aetna Life Insurance Co. of Canada (1996), 27 B.C.L.R. (3d) 1 (C.A.); and Bridgesoft Systems Corp. v. British Columbia, 2000 BCCA 313, he summarized the law as follows:

> [109] Where a party to an agreement commits a fundamental breach of its terms, the agreement is repudiated. There has been what amounts to a refusal to perform. If the repudiation is not accepted, the agreement is affirmed. Where the breach is ongoing, as distinct from one instance of fundamental non-performance, there is a continuing repudiation which may, in the absence of subsequent affirmation, be accepted as long as the repudiation continues. What in my view is important is that, in order to establish the existence of a continuing repudiation, particularly when an extended period of time has elapsed following the affirmation of an agreement, it must be clear beyond question that there is a continued (Elderfield) or repeated (Bridgesoft) refusal to perform. The refusal may be manifest in different ways, which may include silence in response to a request for performance at the time the request is made, but the refusal must be clear for it is that refusal which is the repudiation to be accepted.

[44] In my opinion, the current case is one of continuing repudiation by Ms. Liang. Mr. Dosanjh and his lawyer undertook extensive communications with Ms. Liang and her realtor, attempting to ascertain whether Ms. Liang would complete the transaction. Ms. Liang was unresponsive. Her own silence, combined with the silence or indifference of her real estate agent, clearly communicated to Mr. Dosanjh that she would not complete the sale.

[45] While it became apparent, at trial, that the real estate agent was not actually avoiding receipt of the deposit, Mr. Dosanjh and his lawyer reasonably believed that he was doing so. The failure of the realtor to communicate with them, and his failure to make arrangements for receipt of the deposit, played a significant role in leaving them with the impression that he was trying to ensure that the deposit could not be paid.

[46] In all the circumstances, it is my view that Ms. Liang's repudiation of the contract was not a single incident, but rather a continuing fundamental breach of contract. Mr. Dosanjh was, in the circumstances, entitled to affirm the contract after the initial repudiation on August 29, 2011, and then later, in response to Ms. Liang's continued repudiation, to treat the contract as at an end.

[47] In the result, while I differ from the trial judge somewhat in my analysis of the events, I find that she did not err in finding that Mr. Dosanjh was in a position, on September 15, 2011, to accept Ms. Liang's repudiation of the contract.

Was Mr. Dosanjh in Breach of the Contract?

[48] Ms. Liang contends that Mr. Dosanjh breached the contract by failing to pay the $30,000 deposit at the time he waived the conditions that had been inserted in the contract for his benefit. She argues that this, itself, constituted a fundamental breach of the agreement, and that she accepted the breach, thus terminating the contract. In the alternative, she argues that Mr. Dosanjh was not entitled to accept her repudiation of the contract at a time when he, himself, was in breach.

[49] In my view, the issue is simply resolved with reference to the contractual provisions concerning the deposit. Nothing in the contract required Mr. Dosanjh to pay the deposit at the time he waived the conditions. Rather, the deposit was to be paid after the conditions were removed. It can be inferred that the deposit was to be paid before the closing date. Beyond that, there is little in the contract that sheds light on precisely when the deposit was to be tendered.

[50] In my view, the best that can be done with the contractual language is to interpret it as requiring Mr. Dosanjh to tender the deposit within a reasonable period once the conditions were waived. Given the unavailability of the real estate agent, his failure to keep his office open during office hours, the absence of any communications from Ms. Liang or her realtor on the issue of the deposit, and Mr. Dosanjh's attempts to tender the deposit, it is my view that Mr. Dosanjh did not fail to tender the deposit within a reasonable time period after waiving the conditions. He was, on September 15, 2011, when he gave notice of his decision to accept Ms. Liang's repudiation of the contract, not in breach of the term requiring him to deposit funds. The same situation subsisted on September 19, 2011 when Ms. Liang received his letter.

[51] I am, therefore, not persuaded that the judge erred in finding that Mr. Dosanjh was entitled to accept Ms. Liang's repudiation of the contract and sue for damages. I also agree with her conclusion that he did accept the repudiation, and did so in a timely manner.

Damages

[52] Ms. Liang says that the trial judge erred in two respects in assessing damages. First, she says that the damages crystallized on the date of the breach, and that the judge erred in awarding damages assessed at a date three months after the closing. Second, she says that the judge erred in relying on an assessment by the BC Assessment Authority, which was prepared for the purposes of municipal taxation, as evidence of the value of the property.

[53] Ms. Liang points out that the normal rule for damages in breach of contract is that damages are assessed as of the date of the breach. There are exceptions to the rule. In particular, where a party is entitled to specific performance and is awarded damages in lieu thereof, there will be a basis to assess damages as of the date of trial rather than as of the date of the breach: Semelhago v. Paramadevan, [1996] 2 S.C.R. 415.

[54] In the case before us, Mr. Dosanjh accepted Ms. Liang's repudiation of the contract on September 15, 2011. As a matter of law, he was not entitled, thereafter, to seek specific performance. The trial judge, nonetheless, held that it would be fair to assess damages as of January 2012, because Mr. Dosanjh could not be expected to find another residence immediately.

[55] In my view, the presumption that contract damages are to be assessed as of the date of the breach is not so easily displaced. It is important that the law in this area be predictable, and such predictability is not served by allowing judges unbounded discretion as to the date for assessment of damages.

[56] In the case before us, there was no evidence of an unusual rise in real estate prices in Burnaby between September 19, 2011 (the date that acceptance of the repudiation was communicated) and January 2012. There was also very limited evidence of any efforts made by Mr. Dosanjh to find an appropriate residence in Burnaby. In the circumstances, it cannot be said that the ordinary rule that damages are assessed at the date of breach was displaced.

[57] A more serious difficulty with the assessment of damages was the trial judge's reliance on the assessment to determine the property value.

[58] In deciding to admit the assessment as evidence, the trial judge referred to a number of family law cases in which assessments had been used by the trial court to determine the value of real property. She purported to rely on the opening words of Rule 11-7 of the Supreme Court Civil Rules, B.C. Reg. 168/2009, as providing her discretion to admit the evidence.

[59] There is some difficulty in relying on family law cases for the proposition that assessments should be admissible evidence to determine the value of real property. While the rules of evidence are applicable to family law proceedings, they are often applied in a relaxed manner. I agree with the recent observations of Kent J. in Walker v. Maxwell, 2014 BCSC 2357:

> [64] Of course, one of the stark realities of family law litigation is that the parties are often unrepresented by counsel and/or are unable to afford the substantial cost of experts and the procuring of expert evidence.
> [65] Evidence in family law cases is subject to the same rules applicable to any other area of civil law. In reality, however, the technical yields to the practical and the strict rules of evidence are often ignored or accorded only slight deference.

[60] While trial courts have, with some frequency, admitted property assessments as evidence of property value in family law cases, they have generally done so either with the agreement of the parties, or, alternatively, where no other evidence of value has been tendered (e.g. Chung v. La, 2011 BCSC 1547). Where proper expert evidence of value has been tendered, the courts have been reluctant to consider property assessments as evidence (see, for example, Hall v. Mougan, 2009 BCSC 645).

[61] In family law cases, a court is often faced with having to assess the value of real property in a situation where neither side is clearly subject to any burden of proof. Rather, the court is simply required to estimate the value of property for the purpose of dividing a family asset. It is not surprising, in such situations, that a court may "grasp at straws" in an attempt to reach a just result. It is simply a matter of doing the best job possible with limited evidence.

[62] It seems to me that different considerations arise in non-family cases, where one party or the other will generally bear the onus of producing evidence of property value.

[63] It is not necessary, in this case, to make any pronouncement as to the scope for admission of property assessments as evidence of property value in family law cases, and I will refrain from doing so. In my view, however, there is, absent agreement, no scope for using assessments in place of expert opinion evidence in cases such as the present one.

[64] The trial judge erred in her reliance on the opening words of Rule 11-7. The relevant provisions of the rule are as follows:

> 11-7 (1) Unless the court otherwise orders, opinion evidence of an expert, other than an expert appointed by the court under Rule 11-5, must not be tendered at trial unless
>
> > (a) that evidence is included in a report of that expert that has been prepared and served in accordance with Rule 11-6, and
> > (b) any supplementary reports required under Rule 11-5 (11) or 11-6 (5) or (6) have been prepared and served in accordance with Rule 11-6 (5) to (7).
>
>
> (6)At trial, the court may allow an expert to provide evidence, on terms and conditions, if any, even though one or more of the requirements of this Part have not been complied with, if
>
> > (a) facts have come to the knowledge of one or more of the parties and those facts could not, with due diligence, have been learned in time to be included in a report or supplementary report and served within the time required by this Part,
> >
> > (b) the non-compliance is unlikely to cause prejudice
> >
> > > (i) by reason of an inability to prepare for cross-examination, or
> > >
> > > (ii) by depriving the party against whom the evidence is tendered of a reasonable opportunity to tender evidence in response, or
> > (c) the interests of justice require it.

[65] Rules 11-6 sets out special requirements for expert opinion evidence. It is designed to ensure that adequate notice is given of the intention to adduce expert evidence, and to ensure that expert reports are presented in a particular form. Rule 11-7 allows the court to dispense with the requirements of Rule 11-6 in certain limited circumstances (see Perry v. Vargas, 2012 BCSC 1537 and XY, LLC v. Zhu, 2013 BCCA 352).

[66] In those limited circumstances, Rule 11-7 allows a judge to admit opinion evidence at trial where the evidence, though otherwise admissible, fails to meet the requirements of Rule 11-6. Nothing in Rule 11-7 purports to allow a judge to admit into evidence an expert opinion that does not meet the requirements of R. v. Mohan, [1994] 2 S.C.R. 9.

[67] The basic difficulty with the property assessment as evidence of property value is that the court had no basis on which to evaluate its cogency. The court was not able to determine how the assessor went about making the assessment, and had no basis for determining what weight to give it. This was a particular problem in this case, as the court had no basis for determining the effect of the recent use of the property to grow marijuana on the property value.

[68] I acknowledge, again, that these sorts of difficulties have not always been seen as precluding the admission of assessments as evidence of value in family law cases (see, for example, Dykman v. Dykman, 2011 BCSC 883). Whatever discretion a court may have to admit such evidence in a family law case, however, it did not have that discretion in the case before us.

[69] As the trial judge observed, there was some evidence before her to the effect that the market value of the property in September 2011 was substantially higher than the contract price. The evidence of how much higher, however, was minimal. Given that the assessment report was not admissible, the trial judge was faced with a formidable (perhaps impossible) task in trying to determine the quantum of damages.

[70] Fortunately, the parties, recognizing the problem, agree that if the assessment is found to be inadmissible, it is appropriate for this Court to remit the matter to the trial court for a new hearing on the issue of quantum of damages. Given the agreement of the parties on this issue, I would remit the matter of quantum of damages for a new hearing.

Conclusion

[71] In my view, the judge was correct in finding that Mr. Dosanjh was entitled to accept Ms. Liang's repudiation of the contract, and that he did so in a timely manner. I would not disturb her finding that Ms. Liang is liable in damages.

[72] I am, however, of the view that this case did not present a basis for assessing the damages on a date other than the date of breach. I am also of the view that the judge erred in relying on contested evidence of property value in the form of a property assessment.

[73] Given the position taken by the parties, I would allow the appeal to the extent of returning the matter to the trial court for an assessment of the amount of damages suffered by Mr. Dosanjh.

COLONIAL FASTENER COMPANY, LTD., AND G. E. PRENTICE MANUFACTURING COMPANY (DEFENDANTS) ..... APPELLANTS;

AND

LIGHTNING FASTENER COMPANY, LTD. (PLAINTIFF) ..... RESPONDENT.

ON APPEAL FROM THE EXCHEQUER COURT OF CANADA

Patent—Damages for infringement—Matters and items of damages—Sale of product of infringing machine—Invention for manufacturing stringers to be used in fasteners—Loss caused from sales of completed articles (fasteners) made from stringers made on infringing machines—Damages for loss of profit on sales lost—Damages by way of royalty—Damages for loss from reduction in sale price—Pleadings—Raising question of right under s. 47 (6) of Patent Act (R.S.C. 1927, c. 150) on assessment of damages after judgment, when facts relied on not pleaded and proved in the action for infringement.

The sale of the product of an infringing machine is not too remote upon which to found a claim in damages, under s. 32 of the Patent Act (R.S.C. 1927, c. 150), by the owner of the patent of the machine infringed.

The object of the patented invention was to manufacture stringers to be used in fasteners.

Held: Plaintiff (owner of the patent) could not be properly compensated for infringement by reference only to the manufacturer's cost and sale price of the stringers and without regard to the cost and sale price of the completed articles (fasteners); the stringers were of importance only in their use in fasteners and what plaintiff lost was sales of fasteners; the principle set forth in Meters Ld. v. Metropolitan Gas Meters Ld., 28 R.P.C. 157, should be applied; plaintiff was entitled to damages for loss sustained by reason of defendant's sales of fasteners from stringers made on infringing machines.

Held, further: On the evidence (and applying the "broad axe" referred to by Lord Shaw in Watson v. Pott, 31 R.P.C. 104), had defendant not sold such fasteners, plaintiff would have sold 60 per cent. of the number actually sold by defendant; and plaintiff was entitled by way of damages to the profit it would have made on what it would have sold as aforesaid. It was so entitled, even were it shown that in the period of infringement it did not manufacture stringers on its patented machine; it was deprived of the opportunity of using its patented machine to produce stringers for the said 60 per cent. As to the 40 per cent. of defendant's sales which plaintiff would not have made, plaintiff was entitled to damages by way of royalty (Watson v. Pott, 31 R.P.C. 104, at 120; United Horse Shoe & Nail Co. v. Stewart, 5 R.P.C. 260, at 267).

*Present at the hearing:—Rinfret, Cannon, Crocket, Kerwin and Hudson JJ. Cannon J., through illness, took no part in the judgment.

Damages were awarded also for loss to plaintiff by reason of reduction by defendant in the sale price of such fasteners (forcing reduction by plaintiff) (American Braided Wire Co. v. Thomson, 7 R.P.C. 152); but not where plaintiff was the first to act, even were plaintiff induced to act by its representatives having been told, falsely, by prospective or actual customers that they could purchase more cheaply from defendant—a claim for damages in such a case was too remote.

In the interval between lapse of plaintiff's patent for non-payment of fees and publication of notice of application to restore it, defendant shipped into Canada fasteners (not taken into account in plaintiff's statement of damages) made in the United States on machines identical with machines held to constitute infringement of the patent. On an assessment of damages, after judgment had been given for plaintiff in an action for infringement, defendant claimed that by virtue of the operation of s. 47 (6) of the Patent Act, it obtained the right to use the invention in Canada. Held, that the facts should have been pleaded and proved in the patent action as a defence, and it was now too late to raise the question on the assessment of damages.

APPEAL by the defendants, and cross-appeal by the plaintiff, from the judgment of Maclean J., President of the Exchequer Court of Canada (1), confirming, subject to a certain reduction in the amount of damages, the report of the Registrar of that Court (2) as to the damages which the plaintiff was entitled to recover from the defendants by reason of infringement of patent.

The action was for damages and other relief for alleged infringement of the plaintiff's patent, which was for machines and methods for producing straight and curved fastener stringers. By the judgment of the Exchequer Court of Canada (Maclean J. (3)), it was adjudged that the plaintiff's letters patent were valid, and infringed by the defendants; and (besides injunction, etc.) a reference was directed to the Registrar of the Court as to the damages recoverable by reason of the infringements, or as to the profits made by the defendants by reason of the infringements, as the plaintiff might elect before the Registrar. (The plaintiff subsequently elected to take damages.) This judgment was reversed by the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada (4); but was restored by the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (5), subject to a variation that the declaration of validity made and the injunction and other relief granted be limited to certain claims.

COLONIAL FASTENER CO. LTD. ET AL. v. LIGHTNING FASTENER CO. LTD.

By the report of the Registrar of the Exchequer Court of Canada as to damages (1), he recommended that judgment be rendered for the plaintiff in the sum of $50,663.26. The report of the Registrar was confirmed by the judgment of Maclean J., President of the Exchequer Court of Canada (2), subject to the variation that the amount of damages which the plaintiff should recover be reduced by the sum of $3,117.56 allowed by the Registrar as damage due to forced reduction in plaintiff's selling price.

The defendants appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada; and the plaintiff cross-appealed (against said disallowance of $3,117.56, and for increased damages).

By the judgment of this Court, now reported, the defendants' appeal was dismissed with costs; the cross-appeal was allowed to the extent of the said sum of $3,117.56, also with costs; the order of the President of the Exchequer Court in respect of the costs of the reference and of the costs of the appeals to him to stand.

S. A. Hayden K.C. and James Woods Walker for the appellants.

O. M. Biggar K.C. for the respondent.

The judgment of Rinfret, Crocket, Kerwin and Hudson JJ. (Cannon J., through illness, took no part in the judgment) was delivered by KERWIN, J.—This is an appeal by the defendants and cross-appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of the Exchequer Court (2) which, with one deduction, affirmed the report of the Registrar of that Court as to the damages suffered by the plaintiff by reason of the defendants' infringement of claims 1, 2, 3, 7, 8, 10 and 19 of the plaintiff's patent of invention. By an order of His Majesty in Council, approving the report of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the original judgment of the Exchequer Court in this action (which had been reversed in this Court) was restored, subject to the variation that the declaration of validity made and injunction and other relief granted were limited to these claims.

The patent was for a new and useful improvement in a machine and method for producing fastener stringers.

(1) [1936] Ex. C.R. 1, at 12-38. (2) [1936] Ex. C.R. 1.

Claim 1 may be taken as representative of the machine claims held valid and is as follows:

A machine for making fasteners having means for feeding a tape step by step, means for feeding fastener members into position to be compressed on to said tape, and means for compressing the fastener members thereon.

Claim 19, dealing with the method, reads:

19. The method of making fasteners consisting in affixing jaw members in spaced groups on a continuous stringer in predetermined number and spacing, and cutting the stringer so that pairs of said groups co-operate in forming a fastener.

While the terminology used is not always exact throughout, it will be noted that the patent was granted for a machine and method for making fastener stringers. A fastener stringer consists of a row (of predetermined length) of metal elements fastened to the edge of a tape. Later the tape is cut between each row, two rows are connected by a sliding member, top and bottom stops are attached, and the other edge of each of the two lengths of tape is sewn to each side of an opening which is desired to be closed. The completed article is known as a fastener and its commercial importance lies in the uses to which it may be adapted. The patent is not on the fastener.

One of the defendants, G. E. Prentice Manufacturing Company, is a manufacturer of fasteners in the United States of America. It made stringers for some of these fasteners on machines of the type held in this action to be an infringement, and in 1927 commenced shipping its product to Canada. In 1930 it shipped to Canada three infringing machines and leased them to its co-defendant, Colonial Fastener Company, Limited. Since then the Prentice Company has continued to ship fasteners into Canada, but in greatly reduced quantities, and the Colonial Company has manufactured fastener stringers on the infringing machines leased by them from the Prentice Company and for which they paid the latter a rental, and a royalty based upon the sale of the total number of fasteners in which were incorporated the fastener stringers so made. No claim is made in this action against the Prentice Company in connection with any stringers that may have been made on similar machines in the United States and used in fasteners shipped by it into Canada.

After securing particulars of the number and output of the three infringing machines, the plaintiff elected to claim damages. The plaintiff has its head office at St. Catharines, Ontario, and has been manufacturing and selling fasteners since 1925. It claims that every sale by defendants of a completed fastener, the stringers for which had been made on the infringing machines, meant a loss to it for which it is entitled to compensation, while the defendants contend:

(a) That by the law of Canada the sale of the product of an infringing machine is not a wrongful act and that it is too remote upon which to found a claim in damages;

(b) That even if that be not so, the stringers are the only product and that the sale price of the completed fasteners should not be considered;

(c) That in any event the plaintiff, in fact, would not have sold all the fasteners that the defendants did and, in law, is not entitled to claim damages for any proportion of the defendants' sales.

It appears convenient to dispose now of (a) and (b), leaving (c) for consideration later.

(a) Admittedly the law in England is quite clear that the sale of the product of an infringing machine entitles the owner of the patent to damages for such sale. United Horse Shoe and Nail Co. v. Stewart (1). But it is urged that in England the Patent Act does not define the extent of the patent monopoly or the acts constituting infringement: that these continue according to the common law and that by the grant, "Our subjects" are commanded "that they do not at any time during the continuance of the said term of fourteen years either directly or indirectly make use of or put in practice the said invention, or any part of the same." Emphasis is placed on the words "directly or indirectly" and it is pointed out that they do not appear in section 32 of the Patent Act, R.S.C. 1927, c. 150. Section 32 is as follows:

32. Every person who, without the consent in writing of the patentee, makes, constructs or puts in practice any invention for which a patent has been obtained under this Act or any previous Act, or who procures such invention from any person not authorized by the patentee or his legal representatives to make or use it, and who uses it, shall be liable to the patentee or his legal representatives in an action of damages for so doing; and the judgment shall be enforced, and the damages and costs that are adjudged shall be recoverable, in like manner as in other cases in the court in which the action is brought.

(1) (1888) 5 R.P.C. 260, at 267.

I cannot find any difference in meaning between that wording and the phraseology of the English form of grant. If the damages claimed are not too remote, the wrongdoers must, as in every case of tort, compensate the injured party for such damages as he may have suffered. In my view the sale of the product of an infringing machine is not too remote.

Collette v. Lasnier (1), cited by counsel for the defendants, has no application. In that case there was no allegation or proof that the plaintiff suffered any loss or damage. He claimed baldly that defendants had realized a profit over and above the profits that would have been made without using the patented machine and demanded that extra profit as his damages. The Superior Court of Quebec granted the plaintiff as damages what the Court deemed to be the amount of such extra profit and the Court of Appeal affirmed that award. In this Court the lack of evidence of any loss or damage suffered by the plaintiff was pointed out, but rather than send the case back for a new assessment, the Court fixed the sum of one hundred dollars as the amount which the plaintiff should recover. This decision is not contrary to the views I have expressed.

(b) As to this branch of the defendants' contention, it suffices to remark that when one bears in mind that the object of the patentee's invention was, as expressed in his claims and specifications, to manufacture stringers to be used in fasteners, the plaintiff could not properly be compensated by reference only to the manufacturer's cost and sale price of stringers and without regard to the cost and sale price of the completed article. As has been pointed out previously, the stringers are of importance only in their use in fasteners and what the plaintiff lost was sales of fasteners. The principle set forth in Meters Ld. v. Metropolitan Gas Meters Ld. (2) should be applied. There the Court of Appeal had to consider the amount of damages the plaintiff was entitled to where the defendant infringed plaintiff's patents, one of which related to a particular kind of cam and spindle for opening the gas valve in a prepayment gas meter, and the other of which was for a particular kind of crown wheel in a like meter. It had been shewn before the Master and Eve J., to whom an appeal had been taken, that the plaintiff would have sold many more meters but for the defendant's intervention, and it was, therefore, awarded 13s. 4d. for the loss of profit on each of such meters. The Court of Appeal confirmed the judgment and made it clear that they agreed with the Master and with Eve J. that the proper method of assessing the damages was to take the profit on the sale price of the meters and not merely to consider the parts upon which the plaintiff held patents. Adopting this principle, the defendants' contention fails.

One other general defence raised by the defendant G. E. Prentice Manufacturing Company may be mentioned. The patent had been allowed to lapse for non-payment of fees on April 5th, 1927, and notice of the application to restore it was not published until June 11th of the same year. During the interval the defendant G. E. Prentice Manufacturing Company shipped into Canada fasteners made in the United States on machines identical with the machines held to constitute infringements of the patent. That defendant continued to make similar shipments from time to time, and it was urged that by virtue of the operation of subs. 6 of s. 47 of the Patent Act, R.S.C. 1927, c. 150, the Company obtained the right to use the invention in Canada. Subsection 6 is as follows:

> 6. In any case where a patent which has become void is restored and revived as aforesaid and during the period when such patent was void and before publication of notice of hearing on an application for its restoration and revival as aforesaid, any person has commenced lawfully to construct, manufacture, use or sell in Canada the invention covered by such patent, such person may continue to construct, manufacture, use or sell such invention in as full and ample a manner as if such patent had not been restored and revived.

None of the fasteners included in any of these shipments so made by the Company from the United States were taken into account in the plaintiff's statement of damages. Without dealing with the plaintiff's submission that this defendant cannot rely on the manufacture in the United States as giving it the right to manufacture in Canada, I agree with the Registrar and President of the Exchequer Court that the facts should have been pleaded and proved in the patent action as a defence, and that it is now too late to raise the question on the assessment of damages.

Before referring to the items in the plaintiff's statement of damages, it should be mentioned that included therein is a claim for loss in connection with stringers made by defendants on two machines, or as they are called in the statement, " divided machines "; that is, instead of all the operations required to produce a stringer being on one machine the operations were divided between two machines. However, it is clear that what the Privy Council held the defendants had infringed was " the general mechanical idea of combining in this class of work all the necessary operations in one machine " (1), and not a method carried out by two machines. The plaintiff points to Claim 19 and to the following remarks of Lord Tomlin (2):

> There remains for consideration Claim 19. This is a method claim. It is said to be anticipated by Aaronson's Patent; but, even if the method is limited to fixing members on to stringers, the claim is for something which had never been done before, namely, producing stringers fitted with identical members so that a pair of stringers can co-operate to form a complete fastener. Their Lordships think that this is a novel claim with ample subject-matter and is valid and has been infringed.

But this language must not be divorced from the remainder of the judgment. This shows that the monopoly the plaintiff secured was on a machine of the type indicated; with means for producing the results mentioned,—but always on one machine (1). Read thus, Lord Tomlin's remarks as to Claim 19 are clear and unambiguous and the plaintiff's cross-appeal on this branch of the case fails.

Omitting all reference to the " divided machines " and the figures relating thereto used by the plaintiff in its statement, this summary so far as pertinent to the case at bar would now appear as follows:

(1)	Loss due to sales made by defendant of fasteners made in Canada on machines calculated on the price actually obtained by the plaintiff.....	$87,593 72
(2)	Loss due to first cut in minimum price calculated on defendant's sales.....	15,161 32
(3)	Loss due to second cut in minimum price calculated on defendant's sales...	5,042 44
(4)	Loss due to elimination of 5c. flat charge calculated on fasteners over 7½" lengths sold by defendant	1,210 50

Item 1. The defendants admitted making and selling 742,901 fasteners from stringers made on infringing machines. I have already pointed out that the plaintiff is entitled to damages for any loss it sustained by reason of these sales. The first problem is to determine whether the plaintiff would have made all these sales and even a cursory examination of the evidence would indicate that this is clearly a case where the broad axe referred to by Lord Shaw in Watson v. Pott (1) should be applied. I have read all the evidence and, without attempting to analyse it, which the Registrar has done with great ability and in detail, I cannot find that he omitted to take into consideration all proper elements and I agree with his conclusion, affirmed by the President, that the plaintiff would have sold sixty per cent. of the total number. It is contended that in the period during which infringement is shown the plaintiff did not manufacture stringers on its patented machine, but even if that were taken as proved, it does not operate in ease of the defendants. The plaintiff was deprived of the opportunity of using its patented machine to produce stringers for the 445,740 fasteners (i.e., 60 per cent. of 742,901), and, as I conclude it would have sold that number, it is entitled by way of damages to that profit on the sale of each of such fasteners that the evidence discloses. This disposes of defendants' contention (c) referred to above.

The Registrar found the plaintiff's loss of profit to be 10 cents per fastener. Not only did the defendants appeal, alleging that there was no basis upon which the allowance could be justified, but the plaintiff cross-appealed, alleging in turn that its calculation of its loss of profit was 11·79 cents per fastener; that the Registrar had found no fault with the correctness of its figures, and that the President, beyond adopting the Registrar's figure, had made no reference to the point. Even if the mathematical accuracy of the plaintiff's statement of costs of manufacture be admitted, one must not lose sight of the contents of the plaintiff's letter to the Minister of Finance and of the methods of manufacture actually in use by it when its costs were compiled. These considerations serve to reduce the plaintiff's figures but at the same time leave them as a basis of computation. I might have adopted another figure, one probably a little lower in view of the matters mentioned, but I cannot say that there is sufficient to warrant interference with the Registrar's estimate, and the appeal and cross-appeal on this branch are dismissed.

As to the forty per cent. of the defendants' sales which the plaintiff would not have made, it is still entitled to damages by way of royalty. As Lord Watson points out in United Horse Shoe and Nail Company v. Stewart (1), "Every sale of goods manufactured, without licence, by patent machinery, is and must be treated as an illegal transaction in a question with the patentee." In Watson v. Pott (2), Lord Shaw said:

> If with regard to the general trade which was done, or would have been done by the respondents within their ordinary range of trade, damages be assessed, these ought, of course, to enter the account and to stand. But in addition there remains that class of business which the respondents would not have done; and in such cases it appears to me that the correct and full measure is only reached by adding that a patentee is also entitled, on the principle of price or hire, to a royalty for the unauthorized sale or use of every one of the infringing machines in a market which the infringer, if left to himself, might not have reached. Otherwise, that property which consists in the monopoly of the patented articles granted to the patentee has been invaded, and indeed abstracted, and the law, when appealed to, would be standing by and allowing the invader or abstractor to go free. In such cases a royalty is an excellent key to unlock the difficulty, and I am in entire accord with the principle laid down by Lord Moulton in Meters Ltd. v. Metropolitan Gas Meters Ld. (3). Each of the infringements was an actionable wrong, and although it may have been committed in a range of business or of territory which the patentee might not have reached, he is entitled to hire or royalty in respect of each unauthorized use of his property. Otherwise, the remedy might fall unjustly short of the wrong.

Under this subdivision the plaintiff has been allowed a royalty of 1 cent per fastener, i.e., 1 cent × 40 per cent. of 742,901 or a total of $2,971.60. Both parties have appealed as to this allowance, the plaintiff contending that it should be at least 2·3 cents per fastener, and the defendants contending that it was overly generous to the plaintiff.

COLONIAL FASTENER CO. LTD. ET AL. v. LIGHTNING FASTENER CO. LTD.

Kerwin J.

I agree that the Registrar was correct in disregarding, on the one hand, the evidence that a departmental store had paid a royalty of 5 cents, as the fasteners there had been used on rather expensive articles; and in disregarding, on the other hand, the evidence of Mr. Prentice that in the United States he had granted licences and had been offered licences at the rate of $\frac{2}{3}$ cent per fastener, as the purchasing power of the public is much greater in the United States than in Canada. The main contention on the part of the plaintiff is that the Registrar in that part of his report which appears at the top of p. 754 of the Appeal Case before this Court, erred in stating that the Colonial Fastener Company, Limited, had paid its co-defendant, G. E. Prentice Manufacturing Company, Limited, a royalty of $12,737.02 on 742,901 fastener stringers. It would appear that the Registrar did err in that respect. It is undoubted that a royalty was paid, and, according to the evidence, it was fifteen per cent. of the gross sales price for the greater part of the time and ten per cent. for the remainder; but these percentages were of the gross sale price of the completed fasteners and not merely of fastener stringers.

Appendix I to the plaintiff's factum shows, with references to the pages where the evidence is to be found, that the total sum received from the sale of the fastener stringers, as mentioned by the Registrar, $84,930.50, is practically correct. This figure is obtained from Appendix I by adding to the total under Column 3 under the heading " Unitary Machines " the sum of $5,557.21, which appears opposite Period VI in the third column under the heading " Divided Machines." Although nothing is being allowed in connection with the product of these " divided machines," in this instance it is necessary to accept the plaintiff's calculations with reference to Period VI in order to arrive at the Registrar's total. In any event this does not prejudice either party. References are also given under column 5 in Appendix I to the evidence which indicates the amount of royalty paid according to defendants' own figures and this shows a total of $17,194.33 or $18,746.78, depending upon whether the total figures for Period VI are separated or kept intact. Adopting the former the rate of royalty per fastener would figure out to about 2·3 cents and not $1\frac{3}{4}$ cents, which the Registrar's calculation showed.

It is suggested that, having estimated the royalty paid by the Colonial Company to the Prentice Company at $1\frac{3}{4}$ cents per fastener, the Registrar unconsciously allowed this figure to be a guide to his final estimate that a fair royalty for the defendants to pay the plaintiff would be 1 cent per fastener. However, it must be remembered that, for the rental and royalty received by it from its co-defendant, the Prentice Company gave certain other services; and that while patentees may endeavour to impose all that the traffic will bear, in the instant case, the plaintiff, if it had adopted a system of licensing by demanding a royalty on each fastener, would have been obliged to set a figure in proportion to the sale price of a completed fastener. The rate adopted is one I would have accepted if the matter had come before me in the first instance.

In the result, therefore, the allowance of $47,545.70 under Item I in the plaintiff's statement remains undisturbed.

The remaining items deal with alleged damages due to reductions at different times by the defendants in the sale price of fasteners. Such a claim, if made out, is valid. American Braided Wire Co. v. Thomson (1). The evidence, however, fully warrants the finding that, in connection with the first reduction, the plaintiff was the first to act. It is then contended that, granting this to be so, the plaintiff was induced to such a course by reason of its representatives having been told, falsely, by prospective or actual customers that they could purchase more cheaply from the defendants. This claim, however, is too remote and Items 2 and 5 must be disregarded.

The second reduction was first made by defendants and, as damages under the headings in plaintiff's statement referring thereto, the Registrar allowed the sum of $3,117.56. The President disallowed this, as he considered that no "safe deduction can be made, in this case, from the fact that the defendants at any time sold their product at prices below that of the plaintiff, and which compelled the plaintiff to meet the reduction." After anxious consideration I have concluded that the plaintiff is entitled to something under this heading,—and not merely a nominal sum. After making every allowance for the effect of competition from

COLONIAL FASTENER CO. LTD. ET AL. v. LIGHTNING FASTENER CO. LTD.

imported fasteners, it must be admitted that any domestic manufacturer was in a privileged position to fill quickly the requirements of customers. It is true that there was a third concern in Canada producing fasteners, but the Registrar has allowed for this and I think I cannot do better than quote his remarks:

> On the whole, the United Carr Manufacturing Co. being in the same locality as plaintiff and the importations being lower in price, I have decided to divide the total losses to plaintiff in the ratio of 25 per cent; 37½ per cent and 37½ per cent, and would charge the defendants with 25 per cent of the losses.
> Now the figures involved are those numbered 3, 4, 6 and 7 on pages 3 and 4 hereof, namely,
>
> (3) $5042·44; (4) $1210·50—$6252·94 and
> (6) $4636·54; (7) $4081·95—$8718·49.
> These must be divided into two; first, the losses based on defendant's sales, namely, Nos. 3 and 4, $6252·94; and second, those based on plaintiff's own sales, namely, Nos. 6 and 7, $8718·49, for the following reason:
> In reference to losses from forced reductions based on defendant's sales the 25 per cent thereof to be charged against defendant must be taken on 60 per cent of the said sales, because it is only on 60 per cent of defendant's sales that plaintiff is entitled to get loss of profit; as on 40 per cent it is to be paid a royalty which is not affected by the reduction in prices. Now 60 per cent of $6252·94 is $3751·76 and 25 per cent of $3751·76 is $937·94, for which defendant is responsible regarding its own sales, and 25 per cent of $8718·49 is $2179·62 re plaintiff's sales, making a total of $3117·56 which I find plaintiff is entitled to recover from the defendants as damages resulting from the said forced reduction in price.

I believe that the Registrar has correctly appreciated the evidence and has properly applied the relevant principles. I do not say that I would have necessarily divided the total losses to the plaintiff in the same proportions, but on the whole I think the sum allowed is fair and reasonable under all the circumstances and that it should stand. The plaintiff's cross-appeal in this connection should be allowed.

There remains for determination one claim not included in the itemized statement. Plaintiff's counsel described this as " the loss sustained by reason of the disturbance of the market consequent upon the defendants' intervention," and argued that in addition to the substantial sums claimed in the itemized statement, the plaintiff should receive a further large amount. The plaintiff company at the outset adopted a restrictive sales policy. It considered that in order to induce manufacturers of articles to which the fasteners might be attached, to experiment with something that was new and untried, a campaign of education and persuasion had first to be undertaken together with the offer of a special inducement. That inducement was that the plaintiff would supply only certain manufacturers with fasteners to be applied to specified purposes. In this way it was considered that the Company would be able to persuade some manufacturers not merely to try the new experiment but also to push the sales of their own product, which, of course, would result in additional sales of fasteners. It was argued that the effect of the defendants' intervention was to disrupt this scheme and that the plaintiff found it necessary to follow the defendants' example and sell to any manufacturer. However, the fact must not be lost sight of that there was no patent on fasteners and that stringers for them could be made in different ways. Besides the defendants' competition there was considerable importation from other countries and I am satisfied upon the evidence that without the defendants' intervention the plaintiff would not have been able to continue the policy it adopted at the outset. One of its own witnesses stated that the policy was deemed to be a satisfactory one at the outset, while two independent witnesses called by the defendants considered that the policy was not workable at any time. The plaintiff has been allowed all the damages to which it is fairly entitled in order to place it in the position it would have occupied if defendants had not infringed. There is nothing upon which to base any such claim as is here advanced and the plaintiff's cross-appeal on this point fails.

The net result is that the appeal is dismissed in toto and the cross-appeal allowed to the extent of $3,117.56. The Registrar recommended that the plaintiff be allowed the costs of the reference since it was entitled to damages and the defendants had contested each claim. That recommendation is adopted. Before the President the defendants succeeded in reducing the amount allowed by $3,117.56; the plaintiff failed to secure any higher amount, and no order was made as to the costs of the appeals to the President. The plaintiff was obliged to appeal from that judgment in order to recover its position before the Registrar, and the appeal to this Court should, therefore, be dismissed with costs and the cross-appeal (to the extent indicated) allowed with costs. But, in view of the many matters on which the plaintiff failed, the President's order as to the costs of the appeals to him might well stand.

I. INTRODUCTION

[1] This is the latest in a long saga of proceedings opposing generic drug producer Apotex Inc. and global pharmaceutical giant Eli Lilly and Company and its Canadian subsidiary, Eli Lilly Canada Inc. [together, Lilly]. Here, Apotex appeals the judgment of Zinn J. of the Federal Court (2014 FC 1254) [Damages Decision]. In that decision, the Federal Court was tasked with assessing the damages suffered by Lilly as a result of the infringement of eight Canadian patents for the processes relating to the making of a key intermediate compound (referred to as "7-ACCA") required to make cefaclor, a cephalosporin antibiotic used to treat certain bacterial infections.

[2] Liability for the infringement was attributed to Apotex in 2009 following a trial spanning 67 days between April and December 2008 (2009 FC 991) [Liability Decision]. The Federal Court found that the patents at issue were valid and that they had been infringed by Apotex as a result of its importation and use of cefaclor produced by South Korean drug maker Kyong Bo Chemical Ltd. [Kyong Bo] and Lupin Laboratories Ltd. of India [Lupin] before June 1998. That decision was later confirmed by this Court in 2010 (2010 FCA 240), and leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada was refused in May 2011.

[3] In the decision under appeal before us, the Federal Court ordered Apotex to pay Lilly $31,234,000.00 in damages pursuant to subsection 55(1) of the Patent Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. P-4 [Patent Act]. Lilly was also awarded $75,040,649.00 in prejudgment interest as damages for the time value of the money lost in the 17 years before the reference trial on damages took place, bringing the total award to $106,274,649.00.

[4] Though the parties raised many issues given the amounts involved, I do not agree with Apotex that new questions of law requiring the consideration of new policy concerns are at play.

The facts of this case are so unusual that it would be unwise to use them as a backdrop for stating general principles of law. As the adage goes, “hard facts” often make “bad law”.

[5] I realize that much time has been spent and resources deployed, including those of the judiciary, in these proceedings. Still, for the reasons that follow, I propose that the appeal be allowed, but solely on the question of interest granted as damages.

II. OVERVIEW AND BACKGROUND FACTS

A. General facts

[6] Four of the cefaclor process patents at issue during the liability phase of the proceedings were filed in 1979. They were subsequently issued to Lilly between October 1982 and July 1983. The first patent issued expired in October 1999, and the last in July 2000. The other four relevant patents were issued to Shionogi & Co. Ltd. [Shionogi], a Japanese pharmaceutical company, between February 1981 and April 1983. The first of these expired in February 1998, while the last expired in April 2000. Lilly became the owner of the Shionogi patents by way of assignment in 1995 (see Liability Decision at paras. 3-4).

[7] Litigation between Apotex and Lilly over the process patents began in 1993, when Apotex filed a Notice of Compliance [NOC] submission for its own generic version of cefaclor (known as “Apo-Cefaclor”) with Health Canada. Lilly subsequently commenced an application under the then recently enacted Patented Medicines (Notice of Compliance) Regulations, SOR/93-133 [PMNOC Regulations], seeking an order prohibiting Apotex from selling its cefaclor product in Canada.

[8] In a decision dated September 12, 1995, Simpson J. dismissed Lilly's application (see Eli Lilly and Co. v. Apotex Inc. (1995), 101 F.T.R. 33 (T.D.)). She held that the claims in the eight patents at issue did not relate to substances that were medicines in themselves as per the criteria set out in section 2 of the PMNOC Regulations at that time. It is in that context that Simpson J. made the following statement:

> 9 The uncontradicted expert evidence before me discloses that there is no commercially viable means of producing Cefaclor without using at least two of the Intermediates. Canadian Patents 1,097,611 and 1,146,536 contain the claims for those crucial intermediates. Apotex has not suggested that it has developed a non-infringing process. It is, therefore, reasonable to infer that Apotex plans to infringe the Patents by copying Lilly's production methodology if it is not prohibited from manufacturing the Intermediates by a prohibition order made in this application. In that event, it will be open to Lilly to seek remedies for infringement at common law.

[9] The decision was later confirmed on appeal: Eli Lilly and Co. v. Apotex Inc. (1996), 199 N.R. 4 (F.C.A.), leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused, 25477 (January 30, 1997).

[10] In light of the above, it was expected that Apotex would obtain an NOC with respect to cefaclor. As he indicated in an affidavit dated November 13, 2003, counsel for Apotex, Mr. Harry B. Radomski, advised Apotex in late 1996 to prepare to face an infringement action brought by Lilly should it enter the market with its generic version of cefaclor (Exhibit TX-641 at para. 4, Appeal Book, vol. 58, tab 256 at pp. 17191-204).

[11] On January 17, 1997, Apotex obtained its NOC for capsules of cefaclor, and another NOC was issued for the sale of cefaclor in oral suspension form on March 6, 1998. Promptly after obtaining the first NOC, Apotex began selling its various capsules of cefaclor on the Canadian market. As predicted, Lilly commenced an infringement action. Its first action was launched on January 23, 1997, but was subsequently discontinued. The action that eventually led to the liability trial in 2008 was commenced on June 18, 1997. That action specifically referred to the "Kyong Bo process" – the process used by the manufacturer Kyong Bo for the production of Apotex's generic cefaclor. This was the only process Lilly knew Apotex was using at the time. However, Apotex had in fact two suppliers of cefaclor: Kyong Bo and Lupin.

[12] Apotex received its first commercial batch of cefaclor from Kyong Bo on November 25, 1996, ordered its last batch on June 16, 1997, and received this last batch on September 9, 1997. This portion of the total cefaclor received by Apotex is referred to as "Kyong Bo cefaclor".

[13] Apotex received its first commercial batch of cefaclor produced by Lupin on May 23, 1997, ordered its last batch on April 3, 1997, and received this last batch on November 20, 1997. This portion is referred to as "Lupin 1 cefaclor".

[14] Both the Kyong Bo (Shionogi patents) and Lupin 1 (Lilly patents) portions of cefaclor were found to be infringing by the Federal Court in 2009 following the liability trial.

[15] In addition to the 9,126 kg of Kyong Bo and Lupin 1 cefaclor referred to above, Apotex imported a third portion. On March 13, 1998, Apotex entered into a contract with Lupin for the supply of an additional 7,500 kg of cefaclor [1998 Agreement]. Notably, the 1998 Agreement involved cefaclor made by a new process (referred to as Process "E" in the Liability Decision). This process was developed after exchanges with Apotex (particularly its in-house counsel, Ms. Brigitte Fouillade) in order to design around the processes patented by Lilly and Shionogi. As a result, Lupin undertook to "use only the teachings" of the purportedly expired patents detailed in Appendix A of the 1998 Agreement when producing these 7,500 kg of cefaclor (Exhibit TX-1656, Appeal Book, vol. 57, tab 246 at pp. 15290-91; Liability Decision at para. 788). The process detailed in Appendix A (hereinafter the "Lupin 2 process") was to be kept confidential, and was intended solely for the purposes of production for Apotex. This third portion is referred to as "Lupin 2 cefaclor".

[16] Apotex imported its first batch of Lupin 2 cefaclor in June 1998, and received all 7,500 kg by October 22, 1998.

[17] The Federal Court held that Lilly had not established infringement of the Lilly and Shionogi patents in regard to the Lupin 2 process (see Liability Decision at paras. 228-29). In that sense – and only for the purposes of the proceedings before the Court in 2008 –, the Lupin 2 process was described as a legal process in the reasons dealing with Apotex's counterclaim, which the Federal Court also dealt with in 2008. As will be discussed, it now appears that one of the patents listed in the 1998 Agreement, Canadian patent 1,218,646 [646 Patent] relating to Step VI of the Lupin 2 process, did not expire until 2004 (see Exhibit RX-207, Appeal Book, vol. 53, tab 220 at p. 15292).

[18] I also note that the initial NOC that Apotex received on January 17, 1997, was based on submissions which described Kyong Bo as its supplier and provided some detail regarding the Kyong Bo process. When Apotex decided to buy Lupin 1 cefaclor as well, it notified Health Canada through a Notifiable Change filed in April 1997 that it wanted to add Lupin as a supplier (Facts Agreed to by the Parties at p. 10, Appeal Book, vol. 2, tab I at p. 557). Health Canada requested details regarding the Lupin 1 process, which were duly provided. On June 25, 1997, Health Canada confirmed that it had no objection to the change (see Liability Decision at para. 227; see also Parra Direct Examination, Lilly's Day Book for Re-Hearing, vol. 1, tab 30, Appeal Book, vol. 76, tab 378 at pp. 22586-87). However, Apotex did not update its file with Health Canada after the Lupin 2 process was developed for use pursuant to the 1998 Agreement. Although Lilly argued emphatically that this omission was relevant to the issues to be determined at both the liability and reference stages, I do not intend to discuss the matter further; indeed, it was held to be irrelevant in the Liability Decision at paragraph 74. Considering my other conclusions, I find it unnecessary to address it in this appeal.

B. Liability Decision (2009 FC 991)

[19] Having found Kyong Bo and Lupin 1 cefaclor to be infringing, the Federal Court granted Lilly the right to elect either an accounting of Apotex's profits as a remedy, or an award of all damages sustained by reason of sales lost as a result of the infringement by Apotex of the eight Lilly and Shionogi patents (Liability Decision at p. 324). As per the bifurcation order dated November 29, 1999, such damages would be assessed by reference (i.e. after a separate trial).

[20] The Federal Court also awarded Lilly "pre-judgment interest on the award of damages (if elected), not compounded, at a rate to be calculated separately for each year since infringing activity began at the average annual bank rate established by the Bank of Canada" (Liability Decision at p. 325, para. 4; see also para. 674). Notably, under paragraph 36(4)(f) of the Federal Courts Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. F-7 [FC Act], this award would only apply if no interest was awarded by the reference judge as part of the damages (see para. 27 below).

C. Damages Decision (2014 FC 1254)

[21] The Damages Decision under appeal was issued on December 23, 2014, following an 18-day trial during the months of September and October 2014. What follows is meant to be a brief overview of the Federal Court's findings. They will be developed in greater detail in the analysis.

[22] First, a word on the form and length of the Federal Court's reasons, which span 48 pages. It appears that the structure of the Damages Decision follows that of the main issues as put forth by the parties before the Federal Court at trial. Considering the voluminous amount of evidence in the record, as well as the fact that the parties fought vigorously on almost every relevant factual issue, the reasons are comparatively brief. To my mind, the Damages Decision was drafted with only the parties as the intended audience, as it contains little reference to the many controversies regarding the evidence as a whole. Indeed, the reasons assume that the reader is particularly familiar with the evidentiary record.

[23] Second, the substance. Since Lilly elected an award of damages under subsection 55(1) of the Patent Act rather than an accounting of profits, the Federal Court applied the framework established by the Supreme Court in Clements v. Clements, 2012 SCC 32 [Clements], given that patent infringement is a statutory tort. The guiding question was thus: "But for the infringing product being on the market, what would the patentee's position have been?" (Damages Decision at para. 20). The Federal Court noted that, in this "but-for" world, Lilly had the burden of proving the causal connection between its lost sales and infringing ones made by Apotex. Lilly also had to prove on the balance of probabilities that, but for the sales of the infringing product, it would have made additional sales. Finally, it had to prove the volume of those additional sales and the profit that it would have realized on them (Damages Decision at para. 33).

[24] However, using the authorities available to it at the time, the Federal Court concluded that the defence of a "non-infringing alternative" (or NIA) raised by Apotex was not available to an infringer in Canada (Damages Decision at para. 57).

[25] Still, given the framework adopted, the Federal Court had to determine when Apotex would have entered the market in the "but-for" world. It found that Apotex would not have been in the cefaclor market prior to April 19, 2000, when the last of the Shionogi patents expired. In other words, the Federal Court found that it is only from that date forward that Apotex would have entered the market with non-infringing cefaclor (see Damages Decision at paras. 62-63, 70-71; see also paras. 27-35 for discussion on causation). In doing so, it accepted Lilly's position that there was a fundamental difference between the actions one takes to enter the market and those taken to remain in it. Apotex did not persuade the Federal Court that in the "but-for" world it would have had sufficient incentive to enter the market as opposed to remaining in it, as it in fact did when it ordered the Lupin 2 cefaclor (Damages Decision at para. 68).

[26] Next, the Federal Court awarded Lilly a royalty of $1,500.00 per kg for each sale made by Apotex in breach of the patents that Lilly could not have made (Damages Decision at paras. 101-03). The Federal Court thereby rejected Apotex's expert evidence which was based on the assumption that an NIA could have been available to Apotex at the relevant time – that is, when initial infringement occurred. It is in that context that the Federal Court ruled that such a premise was not supported by the evidence; in other words, Lupin 2 cefaclor could not have been available to Apotex. This had not been proven as a fact (Damages Decision at para. 100).

[27] Finally, in regard to prejudgment interest, the Federal Court held that Lilly was not required to prove exactly what use it would have made of the profit it lost as a result of Apotex's actions. The Federal Court also concluded that, "in today's world", there is a presumption that a plaintiff such as Lilly would have generated compound interest on the funds owed to it, and that Apotex also did so in the period during which it withheld the funds (Damages Decision at para. 118). The Federal Court found that Lilly would have invested in its business, and it was awarded prejudgment interest compounded annually at Lilly Canada's historical average annual profit margin on sales for the years 1997 through 2012 (Damages Decision at paras. 122, 125; Expert Report of Stephen Foerster, Exhibit RX-115, Appeal Book, vol. 34, tab 26 at p. 9862).

III. ISSUES

[28] The standards of review applicable to the issues raised in this appeal are as described by the Supreme Court in Housen v. Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33. The standard of review to be applied to questions of law is correctness, while findings of fact and inferences of fact are to be reviewed on the basis of palpable and overriding error. Findings of mixed fact and law are to be reviewed on the same deferential standard unless an extricable legal error can be demonstrated, in which event the correctness standard applies.

[29] As such, I will frame the issues in the analysis as follows:

1) Did the Federal Court err in finding that no NIA defence was available to Apotex?

2) Did the Federal Court err in finding that Apotex would not have entered the market until April 2000 in the "but-for" world (causation)?

3) Did the Federal Court err in determining the reasonable royalty rate?

4) Did the Federal Court err when it held that Lilly was entitled to interest as damages?

IV. ANALYSIS

A. Preliminary Comments

[30] Before tackling the analysis, it is opportune to lay some groundwork. Two issues need to be addressed from the get-go: 1) the importance of Lupin 2 cefaclor for the majority of the issues to be addressed; and 2) the relevance of certain additional facts relating to the actual world and evidence before the Federal Court.

(1) The relevance of Lupin 2 cefaclor

[31] Except for the last issue, all the questions before us to some extent involve evaluating the availability of Lupin 2 cefaclor. It is thus useful to recall the role the notion of an NIA plays in the various hypothetical scenarios that the Federal Court, as trier of fact, had to construct in order to assess damages.

[32] First, as noted by the Federal Court, Lilly had to prove that its damages were caused by the wrongful conduct, i.e. the infringement of the patents at issue (subsection 55(2) of the Patent Act). Using the principles it properly referred to, the Federal Court had to construct a fictional, hypothetical situation on the basis of all the evidence before it. The fiction in question concerned the landscape of the cefaclor market in Canada – and Lilly's position within it – had Apotex not infringed the patents. This exercise was necessary for assessing what sales Lilly effectively lost because of Apotex's wrongful conduct. As noted above, this is sometimes referred to as the "but-for" world (causation).

[33] The parties agreed that, in respect of cefaclor sold by Apotex that Lilly would not have sold in the "but-for" world (such as product exported by Apotex), the damages would be limited to a royalty at a rate to be determined by the Court.

[34] Regarding the sales actually lost in the "but-for" world, replicating a fictionalized version of the Canadian cefaclor market, the experts agreed on many of its components relevant to the calculation of the damages according to various scenarios. Many of the differences were identified and dealt with by the Federal Court. These are not at issue. Still, there remained three main issues for the Federal Court to determine. The first and second concerned whether Lilly would have had exclusivity in this market, and if so, until when. The third related to the actual size of the market, notably in regard to the level of demand for the product.

[35] Lilly asserted that it would indeed have had exclusivity until all its patents expired. It argued that, but for the use of infringing material and subsequent initiation of its legal proceedings, Apotex (or any other generic drug manufacturer) would not have entered the market before the expiry of all the patents at issue. Particularly, Apotex would not have sold the Lupin 2 cefaclor at all because it was not commercially viable to do so. Later on, Lilly admitted that once the last Shionogi patent expired in April 2000, the Shionogi process would have provided an NIA to make cefaclor. This NIA would have been available to Apotex and any other generic drug manufacturer as of April 19, 2000. It is in that context that the Federal Court had to also determine when Apotex would have been in a position to actually sell its products in the various provinces (the formulary issue will not require any comment to determine this appeal).

[36] Apotex strenuously contested the position of Dr. Iain Cockburn, Lilly's expert, to the effect that, in the particular circumstances of this case, it was unlikely that Apotex would have entered the cefaclor market with Lupin 2, given the nature of the product, including its economics. In Dr. Cockburn's view (also in that of Mr. Raymond Sims, another expert for Lilly), Lupin 2 cefaclor was not a viable option in an economic sense. To explain why Apotex nevertheless ordered such a commercially non-viable product in the actual world, Dr. Cockburn explained what, in his view, was an important distinction between entering this market and remaining in it (see Exhibit RX-88, Appeal Book, vol. 28, tab 93 at pp. 8380-84; Cockburn Direct Examination at pp. 70, 93, 97, 102, Lilly's Day-Book for Re-Hearing, vol. 1, tabs 20-22, 36, Appeal Book, vol. 54, tab 228 at pp. 15553, 15547, 15554-55; Sims Cross-Examination at pp. 78-79, Lilly Day-Book for Re-Hearing, vol. 1, tab 38, Appeal Bool, vol. 54, tab 234 at p. 15957).

[37] The availability of an NIA was also important to Apotex in relying on additional and different hypotheses in the "but-for" world. In doing so, Apotex advanced a positive defence: Apotex sought to establish that it could have entered the market with Lupin 2 cefaclor well before it actually did sell such product in 1999; it could thus have captured the sales that Lilly would have lost before Apotex's actual use of Lupin 2 cefaclor began. While this defence would not absolve Apotex of liability for the infringement that actually took place, it would reduce the quantum of damages to a reasonable royalty for the period at issue.

[38] Apotex suggested various dates at which such an NIA could and would have been available. However, I will only discuss the dates argued before us: October 1997 and July 1998. These are described in Apotex's relevant outline, which was filed at the beginning of the appeal hearing (Apotex's Outline of Argument – Part III at p. 4). I understand that this outline reflects Apotex's final position on this question.

[39] Finally, with respect to royalties, the Federal Court had to contemplate a hypothetical negotiation between the parties which would have taken place at the beginning of the infringing period. Here again, the Federal Court had to consider whether or not an NIA would have been available at the relevant time, since this would have an impact on the rate of royalty.

[40] Otherwise, the Federal Court did not find it necessary to expressly deal with some of the issues raised by the parties, such as whether a true NIA (i.e. an economically viable alternative or one that did not infringe patents other than those at issue in the Liability Decision) would have been available. Considering its finding that Apotex would not have used Lupin 2 cefaclor prior to April 2000, and that it was not established on the evidence that Lupin 2 cefaclor could have been available as of January 1997, one can understand how it was not readily apparent to the Federal Court to rule on the matter of the true NIA.

[41] While it would certainly have made our task easier had the Federal Court done so, at any rate, considering the parties' litigious behaviour, an appeal would have been unavoidable.

[42] The fact remains for this Court that many findings of fact and mixed fact and law relating to various hypothetical scenarios were effectively made by the Federal Court in this case, and we are in large part bound by them on appeal. And indeed, these findings address important issues that are relevant to the first question before us, especially as it is now well established in our Court's jurisprudence that an NIA defence can be raised by an infringer, provided that the infringer establishes that a true NIA could and would have been available to it (Apotex Inc. v. Merck & Co., Inc., 2015 FCA 171 [Lovastatin]; see also Pfizer Canada Inc. v. Teva Canada Limited, 2016 FCA 161; Apotex Inc. v. ADIR, 2017 FCA 23; AFD Petroleum Ltd. v. Frac Shack Inc., 2018 FCA 140).

[43] In other words, even though Apotex asks this Court to make the necessary inferences of fact to determine that an NIA could and would have been available to it as of October 1997, or at least by July 1998, we can only consider doing so if it also successfully establishes that the Federal Court's relevant findings of fact or mixed fact and law are tainted by a palpable and overriding error.

(2) Additional background relating to the actual world

[44] As mentioned, the reasons for the Damages Decision before us are not very detailed, and, in order to better understand them in the context of the arguments and evidence, it is important to summarize pertinent previously established or undisputed facts relating to the actual world, in addition to those listed at paragraphs 6-18 above. I thus take note of the following:

a) It is not disputed that, at all relevant times, there was no publicly known and viable alternative process to make 7-ACCA, the key intermediate compound necessary for producing cefaclor, other than the ones disclosed in the Lilly and Shionogi patents (see Liability Decision at paras. 709, 798; Liability Trial Transcript, vol. 39 at pp. 75-76, Appeal Book, vol. 80, tab 398 at p. 24227);

b) At the time that Apotex sought a compulsory licence for the patents covering cefaclor itself (1986-1988), Lilly filed an objection stating that, in order to make cefaclor, Apotex would also need a licence to make 7-ACCA. Apotex refused to seek that licence at that time – more than ten years before its entry in the market (Liability Decision at paras. 773-75);

c) In its Notice of Allegation pursuant to section 5 of the PMNOC Regulations served on Lilly on May 6, 1993, Apotex addressed all the patents listed in the form IV that was filed with Health Canada for cefaclor (this included the Lilly and the Shionogi Patents) (Liability Decision at para. 776). After the filing of Lilly's NOC application, Apotex knew that Lilly had presented expert evidence as to the importance or relevance of these patents before the Federal Court. Indeed, Simpson J.'s decision expressly references that fact (see paragraph 8 above);

d) Apotex presented expert evidence to the effect that there were no publicly known and commercially viable processes to make cefaclor other than the Lilly and Shionogi patents in the context of its own counterclaim before the Federal Court in 2008. This opinion was based on research first conducted on behalf of Apotex by Dr. Robert McClelland in 1997 or 1999 (probably 1997, considering the evidence he gave during direct examination: see Appeal Book, vol. 80, tab 401 at p. 24478, particularly the reference to the Shionogi process (Kyong-Bo cefaclor)) and again in 2003 (Liability Decision at paras. 709-10). Dr. McClelland acknowledged that anyone undertaking such research in 1985 would have come to the same conclusion;

e) Unbeknownst to the parties, Lupin had tried to design around the Lilly patents at some time in 1995, but discontinued its efforts, having concluded that the two avenues it tried would not be practically viable because of their inefficiencies and the resulting costs (see Exhibit Satpute-2, Appeal Book, vol. 69, tab 338 at pp. 20930-31);

f) In 1996, Apotex was advised by its own counsel that it would be sued for infringement if it entered the market with a cefaclor product (see para. 10 above);

g) Except for one letter in December 1996 addressed to Kyong Bo, which only dealt with the Lilly patents, Apotex did not inquire about the legality of the processes used by its suppliers before ordering and/or using the Kyong Bo and Lupin 1 cefaclor in the products it started to sell in January 1997 (see paras. 12, 13 above; Liability Decision at para. 828);

h) Before entering the market, Apotex knew that Lilly had entered into an agreement to supply Pharmascience Inc. [Pharmascience], another generic drug manufacturer and Apotex's competitor, with cefaclor products should any other generic drug manufacturer enter the market with infringing cefaclor (Exhibit TX-1684, Appeal Book, vol. 69, tab 343 at pp. 21033-86). Pharmascience, which had an NOC since 1995, did enter the market at about the same time as Apotex did in January 1997 (see Liability Trial Transcript, vol. 39 at pp. 37-39, Appeal Book, vol. 80, tab 398 at p. 24218; Facts Agreed to by the Parties at p. 3, Appeal Book, vol. 2, tab I at p. 550);

i) Apotex did not try to design around the patents at issue until years after having been advised that there were no other commercially viable processes for making cefaclor. Sometime in July 1997, Ms. Fouillade, Apotex's in-house counsel since 1996, was asked to look into the matter by Dr. Bernard Sherman, the then Chairman and Chief Executive Officer of Apotex. She concluded in September and October 1997 that both Lupin 1 and Kyong Bo cefaclor were made with processes which infringed the Lilly and Shionogi patents (Liability Decision at paras. 787-91, 831);

j) Despite Ms. Fouillade having concluded that Lupin 1 and Kyong Bo cefaclor were infringing, Apotex continued to forcefully deny any infringement of the patents before the Federal Court (Liability Decision at para. 710);

k) In her correspondence with Lupin and its representatives, Ms. Fouillade consistently noted that it was urgent to find a solution. Still, no order was placed for Lupin 2 cefaclor before March 1998 (see e.g. Exhibit Glopec-20 (Confidential), Appeal Book, vol. 57, tab 250 at p. 17173; Exhibit Glopec-23, Appeal Book, vol. 73, tab 353 at pp. 22171-73; Exhibit Glopec-26, Appeal Book, vol. 67, tab. 324 at pp. 20790-31; Exhibit Glopec-27, Appeal Book, vol. 67, tab 325 at pp. 20792-93).

l) Although Apotex had what it believed to be non-infringing cefaclor (Lupin 2 cefaclor) available to it as of June 1998, it continued to use infringing material until it had almost exhausted its stock of infringing material in 1999. No product was formulated with Lupin 2 cefaclor before December 1998;

m) Albeit in the context of Apotex's counterclaim against Lilly and Shionogi (where it alleged to have suffered damages because Shionogi had assigned its patents to Lilly in 1995), Dr. Sherman, who took all the important decisions regarding which products Apotex would put on the market, testified that in a "but-for" world where no such assignment had taken place, the "most likely scenario" would have been that Apotex would have used cefaclor made according to the Shionogi patents (like Kyong Bo) without first obtaining a licence. This assignment was served on Apotex in January 1997 (Liability Decision at para. 750);

n) As mentioned, Lupin and Apotex entered into the 1998 Agreement for the production of 7,500 kg of Lupin 2 cefaclor. Although the Agreement does not include cefaclor's price, it was made on the basis that Apotex was willing to pay a very high premium (at least a 40% increase on the cost of Kyong Bo and Lupin 1 cefaclor, the only active pharmaceutical ingredient (API) in its products; but see Lilly's Day-Book for Re-Hearing, tab 15, Exhibit RX-142, Appeal Book, vol. 36, tab 155 at p. 10742). The prices paid were as follows: Kyong Bo cefaclor was $860.00 U.S.; Lupin 1 cefaclor was $1,050.00 U.S.; and Lupin 2 cefaclor was $1,500.00 U.S.; o) In fact, the 646 Patent, whose teachings were among those which Lupin was bound to use at step VI of the process to produce 7-ACCA, did not expire until 2004. The infringement of this patent was not before the Federal Court in the liability phase, as this patent was not included in the action at the time of trial. Throughout this trial, Lilly's position was that the Lupin 2 process could not have been used because it was too inefficient to be commercially viable (Liability Decision at paras. 245-46);

p) During the liability phase, Dr. Sherman and Apotex always maintained that they were entitled to assume that Lupin had abided by the terms of the 1998 Agreement in using the new, allegedly non-infringing Lupin 2 process for the production of cefaclor (see e.g. Liability Decision at para. 234). Indeed, Dr. Sherman expressly said that it was not his practice to enter into a contract with a supplier, but that he found it appropriate to do so here;

q) It appears that Apotex maintained this position during the reference phase because, when cross-examined, Apotex's expert, Mr. Roy Weinstein (who was dealing with the rate of royalties), acknowledged that he was told to assume that Lupin 2 process was non-infringing (Damages Trial Transcript, vol. 82 at pp. 88-91, Appeal Book, vol. 54, tab 239 at p. 16361; Exhibit RX-207, Appeal Book, vol. 53, tab 220 at p. 15292; Damages Decision at para. 100);

r) Ultimately, for a variety of reasons (such as the higher price of Lupin 2 cefaclor, rate of exchange and amount of free goods granted by the competition, particularly Pharmascience), Apotex lost more than $5,000,000.00 on the sale of its products made using Lupin 2 cefaclor (Exhibit RX-142, Appeal Book, vol. 36, tab 155 at pp. 10739-43). There was contradictory evidence as to whether or not Apotex could have expected to incur such a loss at different points in time, including June 1998, January 1999 and April 1999. Apotex filed expert evidence to contest the calculations of Dr. Cockburn in regard to the commercial viability of products made with Lupin 2 cefaclor which were based on the actual results achieved on sales of products made with Lupin 2 cefaclor that did not start before 1999. Schedule 14 of the report of Apotex's expert included seven different scenarios (Expert Report of Andrew Harington, Appeal Book, vol. 41, tab 170, at pp. 12401-09); and

s) In any event, Apotex's main position was that such calculations would have been irrelevant to its decision to enter the market in January 1997, given that it never conducted a cost-profit analysis before entering. Dr. Sherman did not testify during the reference phase as to why it was important for Apotex to come to market with cefaclor. However, he had acknowledged at the liability phase in 2008 that in the mid and late 1990s the demand for cefaclor was in fact in decline and the drug was not a major product for Apotex (Damages Decision at paras. 12, 808). Apotex relied solely on the testimony of Mr. Gordon Fahner, who was Director of Finance at the relevant time and became Vice-President – Finance sometime in 2003, to establish that under the leadership of the late Dr. Sherman, Apotex as an organization did not conduct profit analysis for its individual products; rather, it made its business decisions (i.e. Dr. Sherman's decisions) with the objective of having the largest portfolio of products possible in mind (see Damages Trial Transcript, vol. 80 at pp. 194-96, Appeal Book, vol. 54, tab 237 at p. 16251; Damages Decision at para. 68: "as many pharmaceutical products in the marketplace as possible"). Various experts debated the application of concepts such as the "first mover effect" (timing of entry and known presence of Pharmascience) in this case as well as the economic value of the portfolio approach with respect to cefaclor.

[45] It is against this backdrop that I now turn to the issue of the NIA defence.

B. Did the Federal Court err in finding that no NIA defence was available to Apotex?

[46] As mentioned, the Federal Court did not have the benefit of this Court's most recent jurisprudence on the issue of the NIA defence before releasing its decision. Thus, as in Lovastatin, I find that the Federal Court erred when it concluded that the NIA defence was not available in Canada. However, as was also the case in Lovastatin, I conclude that this error is not determinative because, on the evidentiary record before it, the Federal Court could not but conclude that the defence was unavailable in this case.

(1) General principles regarding the NIA defence

[47] Lovastatin may well have been the first case where an NIA defence was accepted in the context of a claim for damages resulting from patent infringement (as opposed to an accounting of profit). But our Court's acceptance of the NIA defence was based on general principles of Canadian common law (see e.g. AlliedSignal Inc. v. Du Pont Canada Inc. (1998), 78 C.P.R. (3d) 129 at pp. 140-41 (F.C.T.D.) [AlliedSignal], aff'd (1999) 86 C.P.R. (3d) 324 (F.C.A.)), as they had been applied by the Supreme Court in Monsanto Canada Inc. v. Schmeiser, 2004 SCC 34 (see also for the discussion on the burden of proof: Rainbow Industrial Caterers Ltd. v. Canadian National Railway Co., [1991] 3 S.C.R. 3).

[48] I underline the roots of our conception of the NIA defence because it is important to understand that our Court did not simply import an American law concept in a wholesale fashion. The Court in Lovastatin may indeed have referred to American authorities in order to better ground the concept. But one must be careful not to construe references to American jurisprudence lending support for the NIA defence as a blind incorporation of, or strict adherence to, the reasoning adopted by American courts. American courts view the purpose of their patent legislation differently, and emphasize the promotion of strong competition. Further, American statutes provide for "treble damages" (as a punitive award) when, among other things, infringement is committed with knowledge of the existing patent (see 35 U.S.C. § 284). These factors may result in a more lenient approach in the application of the NIA defence. In effect, the threat of a treble damages award certainly curtails potential abuses.

[49] With this in mind, I underscore that the objective of the NIA "defence" is to help ascertain the real value of inventions for which a patentee such as Lilly was granted a monopoly.

Inasmuch as overcompensation is inappropriate in our law, so is undercompensation. Thus, the goal is not to enable an infringer to breach the bargain made on behalf of the Canadian public when a patent is issued. Nor is the defence a means by which one can infringe at the lowest possible cost. This is particularly important to keep in mind when one assesses the rate of royalty that would apply when this defence is accepted. In my view, it is only when an appropriate rate is set that one can consider that accepting such a defence does not amount to a compulsory licence system in disguise.

[50] The rationale of just compensation underpins why the infringer bears the burden of establishing all facts required before a court considers the effect of legitimate competition on the calculation of damages resulting from infringement.

[51] Some of the facts which the infringer must establish were identified in Lovastatin as follows:

> [73] When considering the effect of legitimate competition from a defendant marketing a non-infringing alternative, a court is required to consider at least the following questions of fact:
>
> i) Is the alleged non-infringing alternative a true substitute and thus a real alternative?
>
> ii) Is the alleged non-infringing alternative a true alternative in the sense of being economically viable?

[52] Notably in Lovastatin, Apotex, which sought to rely on the NIA defence, had conceded some principles that our Court found relevant to mention because of their general application, namely:

> 1) the real world informs our construction of the "but-for" world;
>
> 2) conduct in the real world is "very important" to what would have happened in the "but-for" world;
>
> 3) findings of fact from the liability decision are relevant to constructing the "but-for" world; and
>
> 4) "brazen" infringement in the real world makes it very difficult to prove that the defendant would have deployed the non-infringing alternative in the "but-for" world.
> (Lovastatin at para. 90)

[53] Interestingly, Apotex relied on these four principles to support its argument in the case at bar. Apotex also acknowledged at the hearing before us that the findings made by the Federal Court in the Liability Decision, including those made when rejecting its counterclaim, were relevant when constructing the "but-for" world.

(2) Application of the general principles to the case at bar

(a) Legitimate NIA

[54] Armed with these principles, I now turn to the very first issue to be considered by any court when determining whether an NIA defence is available: "Is the alleged NIA a true alternative to the inventions at issue?" In non-pharmaceutical cases, this is a very important question that usually turns on whether the product at issue would be considered a true substitute by the consumer. However, in pharmaceutical cases where generic products are bioequivalents of the original product, this aspect is not an issue.

[55] Until this appeal, the lawfulness of an NIA on which a defendant was relying had never been at issue at the reference stage. That is not to say, however, that it is not an issue that may be validly raised. It goes without saying that to be a real alternative, an NIA must be lawful, that is to say, non-infringing. This applies to more than just the patent(s) in suit in the proceedings.

[56] An unusual feature of this case is that, as mentioned, it was never argued at the liability phase that the Lupin 2 process infringed the patents in suit. Indeed, Lilly always maintained that such a process could not have been used as a matter of fact: because the process was so inefficient, it could not have been used by Lupin to make the 7-ACCA required to fulfil the 1998 Agreement. Thus, the only thing the Federal Court determined in the Liability Decision is that neither the Lupin 1 process nor the Kyong Bo process were in fact used to make the cefaclor supplied under the 1998 Agreement, and that Lilly had not established that the Lupin 2 process infringed on the patents in suit (Liability Decision at paras. 228-29).

[57] Still, at the reference phase of these proceedings, Lilly argued that Apotex had failed to establish that the Lupin 2 process was a lawful process. Its argument was two-fold:

> 1) Apotex had failed to establish that the Lupin 2 process was effectively used, and that it did not infringe the patents at issue; and
> 2) prima facie, the Lupin 2 process (at Step VI) infringed the 646 Patent referred to in Appendix A to the 1998 Agreement, which was incorrectly believed to have expired.

[58] The Federal Court dealt with only the first part of this two-part argument at paragraph 61 of the Damages Decision. I agree with the Federal Court that it was not open to Lilly to seek to reopen the question of whether the Lupin 2 process infringed on the patents in suit. Such an issue had to be raised and determined at the liability stage, and the burden to do so rested on Lilly.

[59] However, it appears that the Federal Court did not find it necessary to deal with the second part of the argument in light of its findings that the NIA defence was not available in law. It also did not have to do so in the "but-for" world (causation) in light of its factual finding as to when Apotex would have entered the market.

[60] Nor did the Federal Court at the liability phase in 2008-2009 ever have to address Lilly's argument regarding whether the Lupin 2 process infringed another patent (the 646 Patent), because it did not constitute part of the allegations underlying the action. The Federal Court then simply did not have jurisdiction to determine this issue.

[61] Now, at the hearing before us, Apotex failed to provide any meaningful response to the argument regarding the Lupin 2 process and the 646 Patent even though the matter was expressly raised. Yet, knowing that Apotex's counsel rarely leave any stone unturned, I carefully reviewed Apotex's Outline of Argument – Part III, as well as its memorandum of fact and law and the written submissions before the Federal Court, to see if it had been addressed therein. It was surprising to find that this issue – which is essential to the consideration of the Lupin 2 process as legitimate competition – is only mentioned at the last bullet on the last page of the aforementioned outline. It is worth reproducing the bullet in its entirety:

> […] Lilly presented no credible basis for this purported "infringement" – Lilly rests on the evidence of Apotex's expert economist, Mr. Weinstein, who was asked in cross-examination to assess infringement of an organic chemistry process patent.
> (Apotex's Outline of Augment – Part III at p. 7)

[62] I agree that Lilly could have done more to drive the issue home; the 646 Patent itself is not even in evidence except for the cover page showing the relevant date at which it was in force. However, I do not believe that it was incumbent upon it to do so insofar as the NIA defence is concerned. Lilly did not have the burden of establishing that a process, which it believed could not possibly have been used until Mr. Satpute's testimony was accepted by the Court in the Liability Decision, in fact infringed the 646 Patent.

[63] Furthermore, I do not accept that Lilly relied solely on the evidence of Mr. Weinstein as Apotex alleges in its outline quoted above. Lilly only used the opportunity of this witness's cross-examination to point out to the Federal Court that the factual assumption on which this expert opinion was based had not been established, and that this would undermine the value of his evidence. This point was in fact accepted by the Federal Court (Damages Decision at para. 100).

[64] That said, I agree that the process described in the 1998 Agreement (Lupin 2) does, on its face, appear to infringe the 646 Patent.

[65] Again, because of another unusual circumstance of this case (namely the terms of the 1998 Agreement), the issue of the legitimacy of the Lupin 2 process was clearly at play based on the evidentiary record before the Federal Court. Indeed, Apotex expressly dictated what process Lupin was bound to use by reference to patents which Ms. Fouillade appears to have incorrectly assumed to be all expired. Thus, as soon as it was established that the 646 Patent was still in force until 2004, the legitimacy of the process set out in Appendix A of the 1998 Agreement, which Apotex and its expert assumed to have been used, became an issue. Apotex had to explain or produce evidence explaining why, despite the reference to this unexpired patent, the NIA on which it sought to rely on was in fact lawful.

[66] Even though it appears that Apotex advised Lupin's representative that it had yet to be sued on October 1, 1997 (see Exhibit Glopec-27, Appeal Book, vol. 67, tab 325 at pp. 20792-93), it is clear from the correspondence that the 1998 Agreement was drafted by Apotex with knowledge that it would be used as part of its defence in the present proceedings. In effect, in her correspondence, Ms. Fouillade insisted that only processes covered by expired patents should be used. For example, even if the improvement patents referred to by Lupin would have increased the yield (Step III-B), she maintained in Appendix A that only the teachings of the main patent (Canadian Patent 1,056,372 or 372 Patent) could be used in the 1998 Agreement. Without cogent explanations from Apotex, it makes little sense to refer to a process patent such as the 372 Patent or 646 Patent (entitled "Deesterification to Acids") if the process covered by such patent(s) was not the one to be used.

[67] So, what exactly is meant by the reference to the "teachings" of the 646 Patent? Could it be referring to information that would not necessarily imply de facto infringement of the unexpired patent?

[68] Recall that Apotex strived to control precisely what steps would be used by Lupin to make 7-ACCA. It even named the reagents Lupin was authorized to use. In this context, the reference to the 646 Patent could not be considered as simply referring to unspecified general information mentioned in the said patent. The 646 Patent process covers the same chemical process that had to be performed at Step VI of the overall process leading to the 7-ACCA. Prima facie, this process would be infringing on this unexpired patent.

[69] Hence, in the absence of evidence as to how the reference to the 646 Patent in the Appendix would have been understood by Apotex and Lupin as referring to something other than the process covered by the said patent, the Federal Court would not have been in a position to conclude that the Lupin 2 process was established as a true alternative: a legitimate NIA.

[70] Before concluding on this issue, I ought to close the loop by noting that no inference could, in my view, be made from the fact that Lilly never sued Apotex over the 646 Patent. By the time the Liability Decision was issued, more than six years had elapsed since the Lupin 2 cefaclor was imported and used by Apotex. Before that date, Lilly believed – and probably still does – that the Lupin 2 process was not used as Apotex had alleged.

[71] Bearing this in mind, the unlawfulness of the Lupin 2 process was not Lilly's main argument. Both parties focused their efforts on the other aspects relevant to the availability of an NIA defence. I will now address those other aspects. I will first comment on the economic viability of an NIA, and then on whether, in October 1997 or July 1998, the Lupin 2 process, instead of the infringing Kyong Bo or Lupin 1, could and would have been used by Apotex to enter the market.

(b) Economic viability of the NIA

[72] The economic viability of the Lupin 2 process was the subject of much debate before the Federal Court and again before us. In my view, economic viability is not something that is assessed solely from the subjective perspective of an infringer such as Apotex. But obviously, the subjective perspective of the infringer may be relevant to the question of whether the infringer "would" have used the NIA.

[73] However, as I noted earlier, the court's goal is to assess the real value of the patented invention(s). Such value cannot be assessed on a purely subjective basis. Evidently, the court must be satisfied that the NIA invoked was objectively an economically viable substitute at the relevant time. To say otherwise would mean that the value of a patent could be artificially reduced by an infringer who behaves in an unorthodox manner, or whose adoption of a substitute is motivated by reasons other than economic ones.

[74] Such a consideration could not be relevant to the assessment of damages under subsection 55(1) of the Patent Act. If it were, a patent would have little value, and it would be an incentive to keep one's invention secret.

[75] In Grain Processing Corp. v. American Maize-Products Co., 185 F. 3d 1341 (Fed. Cir. 1999), a case on which Apotex relied heavily in Lovastatin and before us, the question of whether a substitute process was available was raised in respect of a process that increased the cost by only 2.3%. In the present matter, the increased costs were raised by at least 40%, if not more (see Exhibit RX-142, Appeal Book, vol. 36, tab 155 at p. 10742).

[76] As mentioned, at the reference phase, there was contradictory evidence before the Federal Court as to what Apotex could have "expected" in terms of profitability at various dates. The best scenarios were presented by Apotex's expert, Mr. Harington, in schedule 14 of his report (Exhibit RX-157, Appeal Book, vol. 41, tab 170 at pp. 12402-09; also summarized at p. 12085). For our purposes, the most relevant scenarios are scenarios 4 (June 4, 1998) and 5 (January 1, 1999) (at pp. 12405-06).

[77] In scenario 5, it is clear that Apotex would have expected losses on all of its cefaclor products, given that the price on entry at that time was 70%, and that it could not have broken even on any of its products. In scenario 4, Apotex would have expected to lose money on its 500 mg capsules and 375 mg suspensions, and pursuant to Mr. Harington's figures, it would barely have broken even on its 250 mg capsules and suspensions.

[78] I note, however, that, in this last scenario, the regulated price used by Mr. Harington was disputed. He used a price pegged at 75% of the original's price, whereas in May 1998, an amendment to the applicable regulations had been published in The Ontario Gazette setting the price of the first generic in the market at 60% and, later on, in November 1998, at 70%. Mr. Fahner and Apotex's experts testified that in June 1998 Apotex could nevertheless have expected to be allowed 75%. Importantly, none of these calculations included any free goods. Although there was a dispute as to the amount of free goods that could be expected versus those actually introduced into the market because of Pharmascience's aggressive marketing, Mr. Fahner did not specify what quantity of free goods would be customary. Thus, even on the best scenario, it is unlikely that products made with Lupin 2 cefaclor would have been viewed as commercially viable per se. I understand that most if not all the experts agreed that, unless there were other valid economic reasons to market this product, a rational generic drug manufacturer entering a market where this drug had not been genericized – and where another three years remained before one of the patented processes in suit could be used – would not view the Lupin 2 cefaclor as commercially viable.

[79] In effect, when its reasons are read in the context of the evidentiary record, it is implicit that the Federal Court was not satisfied that Apotex's decision could have been based on the economic viability of its products made with Lupin 2 cefaclor. It just was not an attractive substitute. Instead, the Federal Court referred to the explanation given by Mr. Fahner to determine if, in the "but-for" world, there would be enough incentive for Apotex to enter the market using Lupin 2 cefaclor. As mentioned earlier, the Federal Court found that this was not so, and found – as a fact – that Apotex would not have entered the market on that basis.

[80] Finally, the only thoroughly objective evidence regarding the commercial viability of the Lupin 2 process stems from Lupin itself. As a manufacturer and international supplier of cefaclor, Lupin had tried the routes which Ms. Fouillade included in the 1998 Agreement at Step V-A and B, and concluded that they were not "practical and feasible" (Exhibit Satpute-2, Appeal Book, vol. 57, tab 254 at p. 17183). I note that this was so even when Lupin did not include the additional 10% loss in yield at Step III, on which Ms. Fouillade insisted by referring to the 372 Patent in the 1998 Agreement.

[81] In these circumstances, I am not satisfied that there was sufficient evidence for the Federal Court to conclude that Lupin 2 cefaclor was an objectively commercially viable substitute. It follows that the Federal Court would not have been justified in considering its effects in the context of an NIA defence.

(3) Could a defence based on Lupin 2 be otherwise available as a matter of fact?

[82] Assuming for the purpose of this exercise that the Lupin 2 process was lawful as well as an economically viable substitute, I turn to the issue of whether an NIA could have been available in October 1997, the first date put forth by Apotex.

[83] The Federal Court found that when infringement first started, it was not established on the evidence that the Lupin 2 process "could" have been used to provide the amount of material necessary for Apotex to enter the market (Damages Decision para. 100). It also noted that, at the relevant time, Lupin 2 was not known to either party (Damages Decision at para. 102).

[84] First, Apotex has not persuaded me that the Federal Court made a palpable and overriding error in concluding as it did. Second, I am satisfied that the evidentiary record was also insufficient for the Federal Court to conclude that Lupin could have produced the Lupin 2 cefaclor required for Apotex to enter the market in October 1997.

[85] There was little, if any evidence that addressed the actual capacity of Lupin to produce the required amount of cefaclor in 1996 and 1997. There were only two witnesses from Lupin, the only supplier from which any evidence was adduced as to the ability of using a process other than the patented ones. Both were heard during the liability trial. Mr. Rejeev Patil worked in the regulatory department at Lupin, and had no knowledge or information with respect to this issue (Liability Decision at paras. 44-45). Mr. Vilas Satpute worked at the relevant time (1996 to 1999) at the Lupin facilities in Ankleshwai, where four compounds were produced – ethambutol, vitamin B-6 and two intermediate compounds known as 7-ADCA and 7-ACCA. As stated, 7-ACCA was the key intermediate compound to make cefaclor (Liability Decision at paras. 46-48).

[86] As Apotex included in its compendium some extracts of Mr. Satpute's testimony to support its position, I have re-read the transcripts of his testimony, which I had heard first-hand during the liability phase of this proceeding. My review confirms that Mr. Satpute had no real memory of what quantities of 7-ACCA were actually produced on-site between 1996 and 1999. He only remembered Apotex's order that required about 6,000 kg of 7-ACCA (to produce about 7,500 kg of Lupin 2 cefaclor) because it was one of the biggest orders Lupin had ever received, and because it required a change in the process for making 7-ACCA, before and after that order was completed. He only had some vague memory of some batches being made before March 13, 1998, either in January or February.

[87] It was thus open to the Federal Court to conclude that this evidence was insufficient to establish that Lupin could have produced Lupin 2 cefaclor much earlier than it actually did. There was no evidence as to the number of orders on hand at the time and the capacity of the plant to produce both for Apotex and for its other clients. This is especially a concern if a different process would have been required to produce the 7-ACCA on order for other customers (the Lupin 2 process was to be used only for Apotex; see also Liability Decision at para. 233).

[88] Furthermore, cefaclor itself was manufactured at a different Lupin plant: the Mandideep facility, where four APIs were manufactured. There was no evidence whatsoever as to this plant's level of occupation or its capacity to produce an additional 7500 kg in 1996 and 1997. A finding in favour of Apotex would require making an inference that the Federal Court did not appear to have been willing to make. It is certainly not one that I believe could be made on the basis of this record and the representations made before us.

[89] Apotex also argued that the NIA could and would have been available to it as of July 1998. This is essentially the same period that the Federal Court reviewed under the heading "V-When would Apotex have entered the Market" (see particularly Damages Decision at paras. 59, 63). Indeed, the reference to July 1998 is simply a refinement of Apotex's argument submitted before the Federal Court (June 1998). It takes into account that, in addition to having received some cefaclor at that time, Apotex would have required an additional three weeks to formulate its product in order to enter the market.

[90] That said, I agree that, based on the quantities of Lupin 2 cefaclor produced by Lupin in the actual world, it would have been open to the Federal Court, as the trier of fact, to conclude that Apotex had met its burden regarding its capacity to obtain Lupin 2 cefaclor to enter the market (i.e. "could" have done so by July 1998). However, as mentioned earlier, the Federal Court found as a fact that Apotex "would" not have entered the market at that time with Lupin 2 cefaclor (Damages Decision at para. 70).

[91] I have not been persuaded that this essential finding of fact, which will be discussed in more detail in the next section of my reasons, is tainted by a reviewable error. This is especially so considering that it was undisputed that Apotex had the burden to establish this preliminary fact in order to benefit from an NIA defence.

[92] In conclusion, I find that the Federal Court was ultimately correct to conclude that the NIA defence was not available to Apotex in this case.

C. Did the Federal Court err in determining when Apotex would have entered the market?

[93] As mentioned earlier, the Federal Court made it very clear that its task was to determine the amount of all the damages sustained by the patentee by reason of the infringement. This is in effect what subsection 55(1) of the Patent Act requires – no more, no less (Damages Decision at paras. 11, 16).

[94] To do so, the Federal Court used the approach set out by the Supreme Court in Clements and appropriately referred to the "but-for" world as a legal fiction. As noted by the Federal Court, it is in this fictional world that the Court had to determine the following question: "But for the infringing product being on the market, what would the patentee's position have been?" (Damages Decision at para. 20). The Federal Court made the most significant difference of opinion as to the specific characteristics of this "but-for" world equally clear: the debate centred on whether Apotex was entitled to raise an NIA defence in order to reduce the loss in respect of sales, even where the infringer had not employed the NIA in the actual world (Damages Decision at par. 21).

[95] As we know, the Court rejected that defence. Hence, it needed only to apply the general principles it had previously set out.

[96] In regard to the burden of proof and the approach to be taken in doing so, the Federal Court stated at paragraph 33:

> Apotex is correct in saying that Lilly must prove the causal connection between its lost sales and the infringing sales made by Apotex. It must prove on the balance of probabilities that but for the sales of the infringing product, it would have made additional sales; and it must prove the number of those additional sales and the profit that it would have realized on them. I also agree with the submission of Apotex that damages for lost profits have been denied where the causal link between the infringement and the lost sales has not been established…

[97] As I stated earlier, the Federal Court could have described in more detail all the evidence that was before it regarding the actual world, as well as the expert evidence produced in relation to the "but-for" world. Instead, the Federal Court focused its attention on what it considered to be more determinative issues. With this in mind, I find it appropriate to quote the following statements of our Court in Pfizer Canada Inc. v. Teva Canada Limited, 2016 FCA 161, which are particularly apposite:

> [68] Faced with an allegation that a first-instance court did not apply proper principles, an appellate court must assess what the first-instance court did by reviewing in a holistic, organic and fair way the reasons offered by the court against the record it was considering. Often first-instance courts do not describe the principles that bear upon a case in a perfectly precise or encyclopedic way. Yet, in many such cases, a holistic, organic and fair review of their reasons against the record shows they brought to bear all correct principles.

> [69] It must be remembered that judges' reasons—particularly after long complex trials involving many issues—are often the product of synthesis and distillation. When it comes time to draft reasons in a complex case, trial judges "are not trying to draft an encyclopedia memorializing every last [relevant] morsel." Rather, they are trying to "distill and synthesize masses of information, separating the wheat from the chaff," in the end "expressing only the most important…findings and justifications for them": Canada v. South Yukon Forest Corporation, 2012 FCA 165, 431 N.R. 286 at para. 50.

[98] With the objective of performing a holistic, organic and fair review of the Federal Court's reasons, my reading of the Damages Decision indicates that the Federal Court accepted Lilly's theory and expert evidence in deciding that entering a non-genericized market is not the same as deciding to remain in a market that has already been genericized (Damages Decision at para. 63).

[99] To my mind, it is also clear that, based on the weight it gave to the evidence in the record regarding Apotex's actual behaviour before it entered the market in January 1997, the Federal Court felt that more compelling evidence would have been required from Apotex to convince it that Apotex would have actually developed the Lupin 2 process before it entered into the market in June 1998, as opposed to January 1997.

[100] As noted by the Federal Court, when Apotex made the decision to enter the market in January 1997, it was aware, and indeed should have been mindful of the statement made by Simpson J. in her 1995 NOC decision (see para. 8 above). Furthermore, there was evidence that Apotex was not looking to secure a non-infringing supply source and that it was not really interested in doing so at that stage (Damages Decision at paras. 66-67).

[101] As referred to earlier, Apotex's argument relied on what did happen in the actual world, but only insofar as what happened after its infringement occurred. By then, the genericization of the cefaclor market was well underway and competition with Pharmascience was fierce. In this context, the Federal Court appears to have given little weight to what Apotex did between July 1997 (which marks the beginning of Ms. Fouillade's inquiries) and March 1998. This is so because it accepted that the steps taken toward the eventual decision to order Lupin 2 cefaclor in March 1998, as well as the decision itself, were not a proper proxy for what would have happened in the "but-for" world. Again, for the Federal Court, the decision to maintain one's place in this market was not the same as the decision to enter it. The Federal Court found, as a fact, that Apotex did have an incentive during this timeframe to find a non-infringing alternative, but that this incentive did not exist when it had actually entered the market in 1997 (Damages Decision at para. 64). It is in that context that the Federal Court was looking for persuasive evidence from Apotex to the effect that, had it not used the infringing process in 1997, it would have sought out a non-infringing process before June 1998 (Damages Decision at para. 65). The Federal Court found that there was no such persuasive evidence regarding whether Apotex had the desire to enter the market as opposed to remaining in it through lawful means (Damages Decision at para. 68).

[102] It is worth reproducing the part of paragraph 68 of the Damages Decision which deals with Apotex's evidence that it was not motivated by the profitability (and was thus not influenced by the non-profitability) of its cefaclor products:

> […] Apotex offered evidence that it does not conduct a profitability analysis on its individual products before marketing them, so entering the market with a legal cefaclor product could not have been motivated by any direct financial incentive. Other than its general desire to have as many pharmaceutical products in the > marketplace as possible, it offered no evidence that its wish to add cefaclor to its portfolio would have prompted it to seek out a non-infringing method prior to patent expiry.

[103] I ought to mention that, before us, Apotex argued that the Federal Court accepted Mr. Fahner's evidence (to the effect that Apotex simply sought to expand its portfolio of products) as evidence of Apotex's only motivation in January 1997 or anytime thereafter. I cannot agree that this is so. Mr. Fahner, who was Director of Finance at the relevant time, was not involved in the actual decision to enter the cefaclor market and later to remain in it. He testified as to the general business approach taken by Apotex as an organization. Surely, if the profitability of individual products was never a goal, Apotex's entire portfolio could be worth nothing. We know that this could not be the case. This raises the question as to why Apotex emphasized its cefaclor business, given that the product was at the end of its success cycle and that three years still remained before the patented processes could be (lawfully) used.

[104] In my view, the Federal Court does not speak to the weight it gave to the evidence presented in regard to Apotex's motivations or business rationale; nor does it say whether the evidence was even credible. Rather, I understand the Federal Court to simply say that, even if it were accepted, this evidence does not go to whether Apotex's general business approach would have prompted Apotex to seek out a non-infringing method.

[105] If one takes this evidence as establishing Dr. Sherman's actual motivation when he made the decision to enter the market in January 1997, it certainly was not sufficient to prompt him to seek a non-infringing method before doing so.

[106] Apotex, moreover, argued that the Federal Court made an extricable error by reversing and elevating the burden of proof. In its view, the Federal Court erred by incorrectly seeking persuasive evidence from Apotex when the burden should have rested on Lilly.

[107] Apotex also submitted that the Federal Court made palpable and overriding errors by: 1) giving insufficient weight to Apotex's conduct from September 1997 to June 1998; and 2) failing to properly consider all the evidence it presented. It states that the Federal Court had no basis in the evidence to support the distinction made between a decision to enter and a decision to remain in the market in the particular circumstances of this case. Relying mostly on the evidence of Mr. Fahner and Dr. Aidan Hollis, Apotex argues that, but for its fundamental error in respect of the burden of proof, the Federal Court could only have concluded that Apotex would have entered the market in June 1998 with Lupin 2 cefaclor.

[108] I have not been persuaded that the Federal Court made an extricable error of law. I agree that, when read on its own, the phrase "the burden remains on Apotex to prove on the balance of probability that it would have come to market with non-infringing cefaclor prior to the expiry of the patent" seems problematic (Damages Decision at para. 62). But these words have to be read together with the Federal Court's express mention that Lilly did in fact bear the burden of establishing its loss in the "but-for" world (causation). The problem lies with the structure of the relevant portion of these reasons rather than its substance. It would have been clearer for the Federal Court to restate that the burden rested on Lilly, and that it accepted Lilly's view and evidence regarding whether it would have been the sole player in the "but-for" world's cefaclor market (Damages Decision at paras. 63-64, 71). It is then that the burden shifted to Apotex to establish that it would have come to (entered) market in June 1998, a time at which it did not in fact enter the market with Lupin 2 cefaclor (in the actual world).

[109] Additionally, in my view, the issue of who had the burden in the "but-for" world's framework of causation could not have played any significant role once the Court accepted as a fact that the decision to enter the market was different from the one taken by Apotex when it entered into the 1998 Agreement and remained in the market with Lupin 2 cefaclor at some point in 1999. This is a fact that the Federal Court clearly accepted.

[110] I now turn to the next argument, which directly challenges this last finding. I have carefully considered all the arguments and evidence put forth by Apotex in the many pages of its outline (Part II) devoted to establishing palpable and overriding errors by the trier of fact. I have also considered the evidence referred to by Lilly. Of course, this evidence was considered while keeping in mind the factual background referred to in my reasons and reflected in the Liability Decision. I have come to the conclusion that Apotex is simply asking us to reweigh all the evidence and become the trier of fact. It is worth repeating that this is not our role, and I am fully satisfied that there was sufficient evidence supporting the Federal Court's findings of fact.

[111] I note that Apotex included in its outline an argument that it did not submit to the Federal Court. According to Apotex, the Federal Court should have considered that, when Apotex added its suspension products in 1998, it in fact made a decision akin to a decision to enter the market. One could hardly fault the Federal Court for not expressly engaging with this argument given that it had not been presented to it. As mentioned recently in another patent case, Bombardier Recreational Products Inc. v. Arctic Cat, Inc., 2018 FCA 172 at paragraph 94, a party must put their best foot forward before the trier of fact; it is inopportune to formulate fresh views of the evidence on appeal.

[112] I now come to Apotex's last argument, which it also did not make as such before the Federal Court, except for the portion grounded on the language of the Liability Decision. In Apotex's view, it is an error of law to award damages for sales displaced by non-infringing products because such sales are beyond the scope of the Patent Act, are too remote, and are not contemplated in the Liability Decision.

[113] I am unmoved by Apotex's attempt to characterize the damages granted in respect of certain sales as damages resulting from non-infringing acts. As mentioned above, the Federal Court correctly set out its task as identifying the loss suffered by the patentee by reason of the infringement, and its conclusions are meant to represent all the damages suffered by reason of the infringement within the meaning of subsection 55(1) of the Patent Act.

[114] I understand Apotex's strategy insofar as the characterization of this argument is concerned; i.e. it was meant to provoke the natural reaction of any patent law jurist to forcefully defend anyone's right to use non-infringing products before or after the expiry of a patent. But once the initial, almost emotional reaction wanes, all these jurists will agree (including those representing Apotex) that, in Canada, there are instances where legal sales are indeed captured by damages because they result from illegal sales. In effect, the loss of certain sales can be claimed as a loss within the meaning of subsection 55(1) of the Patent Act – even if they are sales of non-infringing products (the ramp-up or springboard effect) or sales of non-infringing components of products – where the court finds that, as a fact, those lost sales arose as a result of the sales of infringing products or because of infringing components (see e.g. Colonial Fastener Co. Ltd. v. Lighting Fastener Co. Ltd., [1937] S.C.R. 36 at p. 41; Beloit Canada Ltd. v. Valmet-Dominion Inc.(1997), 73 C.P.R. (3d) 321 at p. 366 (F.C.A.); Bourgault Industries Ltd. v. Flexi-Coil Ltd. (1998), 80 C.P.R. (3d) 1 at para. 183 (F.C.T.D.), aff'd (1999) 86 C.P.R. (3d) 221 (F.C.A.), leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused, 27273 (March 23, 2000); Jay-Lor International Inc. v. Penta Farm Systems Ltd., 2007 FC 358 at para. 198; Merck & Co., Inc. v. Apotex Inc., 2013 FC 751 at paras. 200-05 [Merck], aff'd 2015 FCA 171, leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused, 36655 (April 14, 2016)). There is no absolute bar in Canada with respect to damages for sales of non-infringing products or components.

[115] As mentioned, Apotex does not dispute that this is so, but it nonetheless seeks to distinguish the cases cited above by saying that they were consistent with the principle of remoteness, whereas the present case is not.

[116] At the hearing before us, Apotex focused particularly on an American case: DSU Med. Corp. v. JMS Co., Ltd., 296 F. Supp. 2d 1140 (N.D. Cal. 2003) [DSU], affirmed in the appellate decision affirming the final trial decision, including the evidentiary rulings, 471 F. 3d 1293 (C.A. Fed. Cir. 2006).

[117] I note that Apotex acknowledged that, despite its exhaustive search of American case law, DSU was the only piece of jurisprudence that it could find to support its view. It was agreed that this case had never been referred to or cited for the specific proposition advanced by Apotex.

[118] In DSU, the U.S. District Court declared inadmissible an expert opinion because the proffered methodology requiring inter alia "hypothesized terms in hypothesized contracts was not grounded on an established legal principle and was far too remote factually to be within the line drawn for legally compensable patent injury". It found that a future long-term contract, which expressly contemplated the purchase of a true non-infringing substitute (another type of injection needle), could not result in a compensable loss.

[119] In Apotex's view, the same line should be drawn here as a matter of policy. According to it, the Federal Court should have excluded all sales lost to sales of Lupin 2 cefaclor products on the basis of their being too remote to be compensable.

[120] But, as noted earlier at paragraph 112, Apotex never raised any issue relating to remoteness before the Federal Court. Instead, it relied on the fact that, in the Liability Decision, the Federal Court referred to sales directly lost as a result of Apotex's infringement. It underlined that, in a similar situation which prevailed in Merck, the Federal Court had set aside all non-infringing sales, stating that the matter had been dealt with at the liability stage (see Merck at para. 117).

[121] The Federal Court reviewed this argument at paragraph 15 of its reasons. I agree that the argument based on a literal interpretation of the wording used in the Liability Decision (see para. 652) has no merit. The Federal Court at the liability stage did not have jurisdiction to restrict the scope of the damages set out at subsection 55(1) of the Patent Act. It was simply not its task. The words used had to be construed in the context of what the Court had to decide and the fact that it was left to the reference stage to determine what sales were lost by reason of the infringement. I simply cannot accept the interpretation proposed by Apotex.

[122] That said, the Federal Court is presumed to be fully cognizant of the legal principles applicable to the assessment of damages in patent infringement actions. Indeed, here, it is evident that it was so cognizant. For example, the Federal Court expressly referred to page 452 of a leading British case, Gerber Garment Technology, Inc. v. Lectra Systems Ltd., [1997] R.P.C. 443 (C.A. Civ.) [Gerber], which sets out the principles that also apply in Canada, including that of remoteness. Gerber is a well-established authority that has been referred to in legal doctrine and case law. It expressly deals with convoyed goods (Gerber at pp. 453-55) which are also accepted in Canada as potential damages resulting from the infringement despite the fact that they are not per se within the monopoly granted by the patent.

[123] In patent cases, especially those in the pharmaceutical field, foreseeability and, more generally, remoteness, are rarely an issue. Thus, when remoteness is an issue, it should be raised as soon as possible. Otherwise, one could conclude that this was not a live issue or that the argument was waived.

[124] Furthermore, inasmuch as remoteness involves a question of law, it is informed by and intrinsically linked to the facts of each case. The legal conclusion is dependent on the court's findings of fact. It is those facts that help determine how close to the centre the claimed loss falls inside the ripple effects of the wrongful conduct.

[125] To my mind, the effect here (considering that no sale of Lupin 2 product would have occurred before July 2000) is direct and well within the bounds of the wrongful conduct's consequences.

[126] Again, I highlight that the circumstances of this case are quite singular. This is why I stated at the very beginning of my reasons that, in my view, it would be unwise to attempt to draw a line in the sand and define a policy more precise than that already developed by the Supreme Court. Therefore, I do not intend to comment further on DSU, for I do not think that this case should be relied on to solve the problem before us.

[127] In the unusual circumstances of this case, I cannot conclude that the Federal Court erred by granting damages that are too remote to be compensable. Considering the Federal Court's findings of fact, the granting of damages for those sales effectively lost by reason of the infringement was fair and proportionate with regard to the wrongful conduct.

D. Did the Federal Court err in determining the reasonable royalty rate?

[128] I now turn to the issue regarding the royalty rate.

[129] It appears from the post-trial computation provided to the Federal Court (Appeal Book, vol. 83, tab 418) that Lilly was granted royalties on 1,147 kg of bulk cefaclor at the rate of $1,500 CAN/kg, amounting to a total royalty award of $1,720,000.00. The total award was based on the Federal Court's acceptance of calculations by Mr. Harington, the forensic accounting expert presented by Apotex, regarding the amount of cefaclor which would be subject to a royalty. This amount was composed of the total volume of infringing material imported and accepted by Apotex prior to April 19, 2000, minus the deductions made by Mr. Harington in his report, such as product allotted to experimental use (187 kg) (see Exhibit RX-157, Appeal Book, vol. 41, tab 170 at p. 12068).

[130] Having reviewed Mr. Harington's report, it is not clear to me what the material subject to royalties would exactly encompass. According to Apotex's representations at the hearing before us, this amount would include 344 kg of cefaclor exported by Apotex, as well as cefaclor imported but somehow never accounted for as a lost sale because of wastage and other reasons, many of which remain unclear. Nonetheless, I do not find it relevant to comment any further on the debate that took place before us in that respect, as it is unnecessary for a determination of this appeal (Appeal Book, vol. 83, tab 418 at p. 25572 (confidential)).

[131] As mentioned, the parties were in agreement – and this was well understood by the Federal Court – that a patentee is entitled to a reasonable royalty in regard to sales made by the infringer that the patentee would not have made. In that respect, the statutory tort created pursuant to section 55 of the Patent Act is akin to the tort of trespass: even if the owner of the property (here the incorporeal intellectual property established by the granting of the patent) may not be able to establish that it actually suffered a loss, it is entitled to a form of compensation sometimes referred to as a user fee (see e.g. Stoke-on-Trent City Council v. W & J Wass Ltd., [1988] 3 All ER 394 at pp. 398-99 (C.A. Civ.)).

[132] It is in the context of determining the reasonable royalty rate that a court needs to contemplate fictional negotiations between the parties. The fictional licensing negotiation, which to some extent mimics the real world negotiations, is a one-time negotiation that takes place before the first act of infringement (Merck at para. 157).

[133] Apotex argued that, since the negotiation is meant to apply to infringing material that would not have resulted in sales by Lilly, the Court should consider the date of the first infringement to which such royalty would apply, as opposed to the date of the very first act of infringement. At the hearing before us, when asked to find and confirm what date was actually relevant in its view, Apotex acknowledged that the first sale to which the royalty should apply was in January 1997. This is also the period when Apotex first entered the market and made its first sale. There is thus no need to discuss the issue further.

[134] To construct the hypothetical one-time negotiation, it is usually necessary to consider licencing practices and methodologies that are commonly accepted and applied based on the evidence adduced. Though some methodologies have been preferred in different cases, there is no single correct methodology, and the choice of one in particular depends on the specific circumstances of the case and the evidence before the court (see e.g. General Tire and Rubber Co. v. Firestone Tyre and Rubber Co. Ltd., [1975] 2 All ER 173 at pp. 178-80 (H.L.); see also AlliedSignal at para. 203). It is for this reason that it is not persuasive to argue that the Federal Court erred in law because it did not adopt the same methodology used in another case.

[135] In the present matter, both sides presented expert evidence. Apotex relied on Mr. Roy Weinstein, and Lilly, on Mr. Raymond S. Sims. Mr. Harington's role was more limited, consisting mainly of applying the rate suggested by Mr. Weinstein to the quantities as well as the other calculations of the loss made in his report (see Exhibit RX-157, Appeal Book, vol. 41, tab 170 at p. 12067).

[136] Further, Apotex points to what it qualifies as a fundamental error in the Federal Court's analysis. It argues that the Federal Court did not imbue the parties to the hypothetical negotiations with the knowledge that they were negotiating over infringing sales which Lilly would never make (Apotex's Outline of Argument – Part IV at p. 4). In its view, the fictional negotiation should reflect the fact that an NIA was available to Apotex, such that Lilly would have understood that it was granting a licence to Apotex to make sales of cefaclor that Lilly would not have otherwise made.

[137] I do not agree that the Federal Court made an extricable legal error. Indeed, it is clear from paragraph 99 of the Federal Court's reasons that it knew that it had to consider all relevant facts and circumstances including "the availability of alternatives to the patented process".

[138] Conversely, the Federal Court's ultimate conclusions were based on its evaluation of the evidence before it, including that of Apotex's expert, Mr. Weinstein. At paragraphs 99 and 101 of its reasons, the Federal Court noted that Mr. Weinstein's approach was too simplistic and that it did not take into consideration all the relevant facts and circumstances of the situation at hand. It also rejected this expert opinion on the basis that its conclusion assumed that an NIA was available as of January 1997. As mentioned earlier, the Federal Court was not satisfied that it had been established that such an NIA "could" have been available at that time.

[139] In fact, on the evidentiary record before it, the Federal Court could not have found that Lupin could produce the required amount of Lupin 2 cefaclor at any time before Apotex entered the market. There was simply no evidence in that respect.

[140] Hence, there is nothing that would justify our Court interfering with the Federal Court's assessment of Mr. Weinstein's evidence. Here again, and for reasons already explained in paragraphs 84-91 above, Apotex has not established that the Federal Court made a palpable and overriding error in reaching its conclusion with respect to the capacity of Lupin to make Lupin 2 cefaclor as of January 1997.

[141] The other arguments raised by Apotex in regard to the royalty rate itself all concern the fact that, in Apotex's view, the amount of the royalty does not make economic sense. Essentially, Apotex invites us to reweigh the expert evidence as well as the other evidence that was before the Federal Court. Needless to say – yet again – it is certainly not our Court's role to do so.

[142] As said before, the exercise performed by the Federal Court in order to reconstruct a hypothetical negotiation does not need to be perfect. Indeed, damages in infringement cases are notoriously difficult to compute; this is particularly so in the formulation of "but-for" worlds which include more than one hypothetical scenario. It is in this context that, to quote a decision of the House of Lords in an early twentieth century patent case, achieving restoration by way of compensation through "the exercise of a sound imagination and the practice of the broad axe" becomes appropriate (Watson, Laidlaw & Co. Ltd. v. Pott, Cassels and Williamson (1914), 31 R.P.C. 104 at p. 118 (H.L.); see also this Court's endorsement of the "broad axe" principle in Teva Canada Limited v. Janssen Inc., 2018 FCA 33 at paras. 32-36, leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused, 38033 (November 11, 2018)).

[143] With this in mind, I have not been persuaded that it was not open to the Federal Court to reach the conclusion that it did in the special circumstances of this case. The rate chosen was indeed high, but there was no NIA available at the relevant time, and the premium Apotex appeared to be ready to pay when it ordered Lupin 2 cefaclor in the actual world was equally very high. There was no evidence that Apotex had even tried to negotiate in order to reduce the amount of this premium after it was first suggested by Lupin.

E. Did the Federal Court err when it held that Lilly was entitled to interest as damages?

[144] I now tackle the last issue, relating to the granting of interest as a head of damages. As I will explain, this issue was incorrectly decided by the Federal Court. In particular, the Federal Court erred by relying on a presumption that relieved Lilly from proving its loss regarding compound interest per se.

(1) Statutory framework

[145] Before dealing with the arguments before us, it is useful to recall the interplay of section 36 of the FC Act and subsection 55(1) of the Patent Act in order to understand the distinction between the findings relating to interest in the Liability Decision and those in the Damages Decision. Subsection 36(2) and paragraphs 36(4)(b) and (f) of the FC Act, as well as subsection 55(1) of the Patent Act are reproduced in the annex to these reasons.

[146] Section 36 of the FC Act deals with the awarding of prejudgment interest by the Federal Court. Subsection 36(2) governs prejudgment interest awarded for a cause of action arising, as in this case, in more than one province or outside a province. For its part, subsection 36(5) of the FC Act confers discretion on the Federal Court to, "if it considers it just to do so, having regard to changes in market interest rates, the conduct of the proceedings or any other relevant consideration, disallow interest or allow interest". However, subsection 36(4) sets out limitations and circumstances in which interest shall not be awarded under subsection 36(2). Particularly, paragraph 36(4)(b) provides that a party is entitled to simple rather than compound interest (Apotex Inc. v. Merck & Co., 2006 FCA 323 at paras. 137-144). Paragraph 36(4)(f) provides that "interest shall not be awarded […] where interest is payable by a right other than under this section".

[147] These provisions are not unusual. They are almost identical to those found in the various statutes applicable to other courts in Canada, the United Kingdom and Australia. Such provisions were at play in all the cases to which I will refer in my analysis, such as: Bank of America Canada v. Mutual Trust Co., 2002 SCC 43 [Bank of America]; Hungerfords v. Walker, [1989] HCA 8 [Hungerfords]; and Sempra Metals Ltd. (formerly Metallgesellschaft Ltd.) v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, [2007] UKHL 34 [Sempra]. As noted in this case law and in the Liability Decision, these provisions are not considered impediments to the granting of compound interest when faced with breach of contract or tort (see e.g. Sempra at para. 100; Parabola Investments Ltd. v. Browallia Cal Ltd., [2010] EWCA Civ 486 at para. 54). The interest thus becomes part of the total damages awarded under common law, or, as in this case, under subsection 55(1) of the Patent Act.

[148] At the liability phase of Lilly's action for infringement, the Federal Court was not tasked with assessing the damages; in effect, even Lilly's right to elect its form of compensation was contested. Rather, the arguments focused on Lilly's substantive right to seek compound interest per se. However, it was not disputed that interest, compound or otherwise, was available in the context of an accounting of profit (Liability Decision at p. 325, para. 5).

[149] In the context of a bifurcated proceeding, unless it is agreed that the discretion under subsection 36(2) is to be exercised at the reference stage, the Court must exercise this discretion at the liability stage without knowing whether paragraph 36(4)(b) applies, as the Court does not know if interest will be awarded as damages. Thus, the Federal Court in the Liability Decision had to at least determine if it was possible at law for interest as damages to be granted in this matter (paragraph 36(4)(f)). It was satisfied that, where full compensation requires an award of compound interest under subsection 55(1) (claim for damages), it was open to the Federal Court to include such an award in the Damages Decision.

[150] Thus, when the Federal Court exercised the discretion under subsection 36(2), the award of prejudgment interest on the award of damages (if elected) in the Liability Decision (at p. 325, para. 4) was expressly said not to apply if Lilly was awarded any other interest as part of its damages at the reference stage.

[151] The Liability Decision was not reversed on appeal and is final. In light of this, in my view, it was not open to Apotex to argue that subsection 55(1) of the Patent Act does not allow for the granting of compound interest.

[152] Thus, in the Damages Decision before us under appeal, the Federal Court had to assess whether full compensation required an award of interest as damages arising from the wrongful conduct at issue. Although the Federal Court could conclude that no further interest award was in fact necessary to fully compensate Lilly, it was not limited in any way to award any interest (simple or compound) it felt appropriate on the evidence before it.

(2) The award of interest

[153] To address the aforementioned issue, evidence was presented to the Federal Court in an attempt to justify the claim for interest as damages: two factual witnesses testified for Lilly and expert evidence on both sides (reports and testimonies) was presented, along with voluminous financial data (such as Form 10-Ks filed with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, as well as financial statements). Had the Federal Court granted compound interest as damages solely on the basis of its assessment of the above-mentioned evidence, Apotex may have had a difficult task to establish that our Court should intervene, as it would have had to persuade us that the Federal Court's assessment was tainted by a palpable and overriding error.

[154] However, this is not what happened.

[155] First, the Federal Court began by stating that, in order to establish Lilly's right to compound interest, it was not required to prove exactly what use it would have made of the profits lost as a result of the infringer's actions (Damages Decision at para. 118). But after adopting a passage from S.M. Waddams in The Law of Damages, 3rd ed. (Aurora, Ont.: Canada Law Book, 1997, as cited at paragraph 37 of Bank of America), which indicated that there is no reason why, in principle, compound interest should not be awarded, the Federal Court went on to say:

> I would go further and say that in today's world, there is a presumption that a plaintiff would have generated compound interest on the funds otherwise owed to it, and also that the defendant did so during the period in which it withheld the funds.

[156] I agree with Apotex: this is not the state of the law in Canada, or, for that matter, in other commonwealth countries such as the United Kingdom, Australia or New Zealand.

[157] There may well be a presumption in some cases where equity applies: see e.g. Whitefish Lake Band of Indians v. Canada (Attorney General), 2007 ONCA 744 at paragraph 49. But even if it were so, common law clearly differs from equity on this point. Neither Bank of America nor Sempra – nor any other case in Canada or elsewhere – has alluded to such a general presumption regarding compound interest. This is so whether such interest is simply reflecting the time value of money owed or intended to compensate a specific opportunity lost.

[158] On the contrary, it appears clearly from Bank of America at paragraphs 53-55 and Sempra at paragraphs 94-97, as well as in the jurisprudence before us applying those two cases, that a loss of interest must be proved in the same way as any other form of loss or damage.

[159] The Federal Court may have felt, in view of the numerous statements by courts – notably the highest courts in Canada, the United Kingdom and Australia – that it is unrealistic or even unfair not to grant compound interest in today's world (see Bank of America at para. 44; Sempra at paras. 51-52; Hungerfords (referred to in Bank of America) at paras. 36, 39, 41). It was indeed open to the Federal Court to explicitly say so. However, like our Court, the trier of fact cannot simply ignore the law as set out by the Supreme Court. There is no doubt: until the Supreme Court modifies the state of the common law on this question, Lilly has to prove its claimed loss in regards to the time value of the money.

[160] Even if our Court had, in this instance, the benefit of a more exhaustive and diverse body of jurisprudence on the issue than the Federal Court did at the time, the fact remains that, in the absence of any evaluation by the trier of fact of the evidence put forth by the parties, it would be unwise and inappropriate to decide this issue on appeal.

[161] Although the case law features various illustrations as to the type of evidence required in given cases, none of these are, to my mind, conclusive in the context of this case. It will be incumbent upon the Federal Court to evaluate if there is sufficient evidence to satisfy the burden of proof taking into account all the circumstances including among others the size and type of the companies involved, the relative size of the amount lost for such large corporations, the long delay involved, including its potential impact on the availability of more specific evidence, and what inferences can be drawn, etc. This exercise goes much beyond what an appellate court should do.

[162] I also note that the rate adopted by the Federal Court was challenged before us. The basis on which the Federal Court arrived at this rate, applicable to all damages on the basis of the annual rate of profit on sales of the Canadian plaintiff, is not readily apparent to me. Lilly did not find any clear precedent where a similar rate was used. I fail to understand why this scenario was the most appropriate. As the Federal Court will have to reconsider the portion of the claim relating to the time value of the money in this case, it will be important for it to explain in more detail its finding as to the rate applicable, if any. I note, furthermore, that Apotex has already paid the damages award in full to Lilly. Thus, should the new award be less than the last one, the Federal Court will need to determine the rate of interest applicable to the amount to be reimbursed by Lilly.

[163] Finally, with respect to the tax issue raised by Apotex, I understand that Lilly's position was that tax would be paid on the award. The Federal Court did not make any specific deduction to account for tax because it would have required it to speculate. It also found that failure to make such a deduction for tax would not result in overcompensation in this case (Damages Decision at para. 119). Apotex does not agree and argued that it was not its burden to establish the impact of taxation. I agree with Apotex that, logically, interest should only be earned on the net amount that could be used by Lilly. But I am not in a position to evaluate if this would effectively result in overcompensation in this case. Also, this may be a moot issue if the Federal Court on reconsideration is not satisfied with the evidence that compound interest should be awarded, absent the application of the presumption on which it relied. In short, the Federal Court, in its reconsideration of the award of interest as a whole, shall give this factor the weight it believes appropriate. I would also expect a fuller explanation as to the role of the burden of proof in this respect.

V. Conclusion

[164] In view of the foregoing, I propose that the appeal be dismissed except with respect to the portion of the award dealing with damages in the form of interest. The matter should be remitted to Zinn J. for reconsideration of this issue only. Considering the result of the appeal, I also propose that each party bear its own costs.

PUBLIC JUDGMENT AND REASONS

[1] This decision relates to the determination of damages and quantification thereof arising out of a Judgment of this Court in Action No. T-2175-04 dated October 17, 2006, in which I determined that Claim 4 of Canadian Patent No. 1,304,080 was valid and had been infringed by the Defendant, Novopharm Limited, now Teva Canada Limited. I granted an injunction and damages but not profits. That decision, Reasons cited at 2006 FC 1234, was affirmed by the Federal Court of Appeal on June 7, 2007 (Docket No. A-500-06, Reasons cited as 2007 FCA 217). Leave to appeal was refused by the Supreme Court of Canada on December 6, 2007 (Docket No. 32200).

[2] For the purposes of this decision, the operative part of my previous Judgment, following a declaration as to validity and infringement of Claim 4 and an award of damages (as subsequently affirmed aforesaid), is as follows:

> 3. The Defendant may, at its election, do one of the following in respect of levofloxacin containing products in its possession, custody or control as of the date of issue of this Judgment:
>
> a. Sell them in the normal course of business in accordance with paragraph 2 above, provided that all unsold product at the end of the thirty (30) day period shall be treated in the manner provided in one of b) or c) below;
>
> b. Destroy them and provide an appropriate affidavit of a responsible officer of the Defendant to that effect; or
>
> c. Deliver them up to the Plaintiffs at a place and manner as the Plaintiffs may direct provided that if such delivery is to take place outside of the Greater Toronto area it shall be at Plaintiffs' expense;

4. The Plaintiffs are entitled to receive from the Defendant all damages sustained by them by reason of the activities of the Defendant which infringe claim 4 of the Patent. A separate trial, preceded by discovery if requested, shall be held as to the quantum of damages and interest as awarded herein. Any monies paid as set out in paragraph 2 above shall be taken into consideration by way of set off or otherwise, in the final calculation of damages.

5. The Plaintiffs are entitled to pre-judgment interest on the award of damages, not compounded, at a rate to be calculated separately for each year since infringing activity began at the average annual bank rate established by the Bank of Canada as the minimum rate at which it makes short term advances to the banks listed in Schedule 1 of the Bank Act, RSC 1985, c. B-1;

6. The Plaintiffs are entitled to post judgment interest, not compounded, at the rate of five percent (5%) per annum. This interest shall commence upon the final assessment of the monetary damage amount, prior to that, pre-judgment interest shall prevail;

[3] The following is an Index to the topics covered in these Reasons, by paragraph number:

I. THE PARTIES

[4] The Plaintiff in Action No. T-2175-04 is Janssen Inc. (previously Janssen-Ortho Inc.) and is referred to herein as Janssen Canada. It was found, in my previous Reasons at paragraph 3, to be a Canadian Company which is licensee of the Plaintiff, Daiichi Sankyo Company, Limited, hence is a person claiming under the patent at issue.

[5] Daiichi Sankyo Company, Limited, referred to herein as Daiichi, was found in my previous Reasons at paragraph 2 to be a Japanese company and owner of the patent at issue. Daiichi, as an owner of that patent, is also a named Defendant in Action No. T-2056-11. By letter to the Court dated November 9, 2012, Daiichi's solicitors stated that it does not intend to participate in this proceeding, that it has settled its damage claim against Teva Canada Limited, and that Daiichi will abide by the outcome decided by the Court herein.

[6] The other Defendant in Action No. T-2056-11, and only Defendant in T-2175-04, is Teva Canada Limited. At the time of my earlier decision in T-2175-04, it was known as Novopharm Limited. I found in my previous Reasons at paragraph 4 that it was a Canadian-based corporation which had, since about December 2004, been marketing and selling levofloxacin products in Canada. I will generally refer to this party as Teva although sometimes it may be referred to as Novopharm.

[7] The Plaintiffs in Action No. T-2056-11, are three Janssen-related companies. Janssen-Ortho LLC is a Delaware limited liability company and is sometimes referred to in the evidence as JOLLC. Janssen Pharmaceuticals, Inc. is Pennsylvania corporation and is sometimes referred to in the evidence as JPI or Janssen US. OMJ Pharmaceuticals, Inc. is a Delaware corporation and is sometimes referred to in the evidence as OMJ. Collectively, JOLLC and OMJ are sometimes referred to as Janssen Puerto Rico.

II. PATENT AT ISSUE

[8] The patent at issue is Canadian Patent No. 1,304,080 which will be referred to as the 080 Patent. The application for that patent was filed in the Canadian Patent Office on June 19, 1986, thus the patent is governed by the provisions of the "old" (pre-October 1, 1989) Patent Act, RSC 1985, c. P-4. The patent was issued and granted to Daiichi on June 23, 1992, and expired seventeen (17) years from that date; that is, on June 23, 2009.

[9] Claim 4 of the 080 Patent was held by my previous Judgment to be valid and infringed by Teva by its sale, offering for sale, and other dealings in levofloxacin containing products in Canada. On October 17, 2006, I enjoined Teva from further sale and other dealings in levofloxacin containing products in Canada subject to a thirty (30) day sell-off period to permit it to dispose of such products subject to payment to Janssen. Teva took advantage of this sell-off period and has already paid Janssen in respect of such products. The expert witnesses have taken this payment into account in their calculations.

[10] After the patent expired on June 23, 2009, Teva as well as any other person, was able to sell and otherwise deal in levofloxacin containing products in Canada free from a claim for infringement of the 080 Patent.

III. JANSSEN'S PRODUCTS

[11] Janssen Inc. has sold and otherwise dealt with levofloxacin containing products in Canada since about 1998. They have been provided at various times in tablet form having strengths of 250 mg, 500 mg and 750 mg under the name LEVAQUIN.

[12] Janssen Inc. also sold and otherwise dealt with levofloxacin containing intravenous solution products in Canada but is not claiming damages in respect thereof in this action.

IV. TEVA / NOVOPHARM PRODUCTS

[13] The Defendant, Teva/Novopharm, introduced its generic levofloxacin containing tablets into the Canadian market in December 2004, and continued to sell and distribute them until the injunction was granted by this Court on October 17, 2006, subject to the thirty day sell-off period aforesaid. These tablets were sold in 250 mg and 500 mg strengths under the name Novo-levofloxacin.

V. THE EVIDENCE / WITNESSES

[14] The evidence adduced at trial is common to both actions, T-2175-04 and T-2056-11.

a) Agreed Evidence

[15] Counsel have done a commendable job in agreeing to many facts. These are set out in Exhibits A1, A2, A3, A40, and A43. They have also agreed as to several documents, the proof of which may be dispensed with, although the truth of the contents of some of them may be disputed. These documents are contained in seven volumes, each document is provided with a numbered tab; these volumes are collectively marked as Exhibit A4 supplemented by electronically recorded documents in a USB key, Exhibit A14. A booklet containing Notices to Admit and Responses thereto served by each party upon the other was entered as Exhibit A66.

b) Plaintiffs Janssen's Evidence

[16] Janssen called three expert witnesses all of whom submitted Reports which were deemed to have been read into the Record; they were:

1. Dr. Jerry Rosenblatt, Town of Mount Royal, Quebec. His Report and Reply were marked as Exhibits P5 and P6. The parties agreed that he could be called as an expert witness and agreed as to his qualifications as follows:

> He is an expert in the marketing of pharmaceutical products in Canada and the data analysis and forecasting of pharmaceutical sales and market share in Canada including the impact of generic entry.

I found him to be straightforward and professional in his evidence. Some of his opinions were based on what he was told by Dr. Chan as to the state of the marketplace in Canada.

2. Farley Cohen, Toronto, Ontario. His reports and schedules to those reports were marked as Exhibits P7, P8, P9, P10 and P11. The parties agreed that he could be called as an expert witness and agreed as to his qualifications as follows:

> ... expert chartered account and chartered business valuator with a specialist designation in investigative and forensic accounting and expertise in the quantification of economic damages, lost profits, and income determination.

Again, I found him to be straightforward and professional in his evidence. Some of his opinions were based on those of Dr. Rosenblatt and Dr. Chan.

3. Dr. Charles Chan, North York, Ontario. His Report and Reply report were marked as Exhibits P19 and P20. The parties agreed that he could be called as an expert witness but disagreed as to his qualifications. Janssen's Counsel proposed his expertise as follows:

> ...as an expert on the following basis: a medical doctor with a specialist certification in respiratory medicine and expertise regarding respiratory tract diseases, antiinfectives, and prescribing practice including expertise on the Canadian antibiotic guidelines.

Teva's Counsel did not agree as to his expertise respecting prescribing practice and expertise on Canadian antibiotic guidelines. Having heard Dr. Chan, I accept Janssen's statement as to his qualifications. I have some difficulties with respect to his evidence. While Dr. Chan has a depth of knowledge and years of experience with respect to many of the drugs at issue, he could not answer even simple questions from his own Counsel or cross-examining Counsel without going into long, complex, and often irrelevant answers. He is undoubtedly a person not used to being challenged as to his opinions as he frequently accused cross-examining Counsel as trying to deceive him or misstate the facts or his answers. I treat Dr. Chan's evidence with caution.

[17] Janssen called seven fact witnesses; they were:

1. Rod Curtis, Markham, Ontario. He is Chief Financial Officer of Janssen's medical operations in Canada. He gave evidence as to the corporate structure of Janssen in Canada and elsewhere in the Western Hemisphere.

2. Jeff Smith, Flemington, New Jersey. He is Vice President, Business Development of Janssen Pharmaceuticals Inc. He has been with Janssen and its predecessors for about three decades and gave evidence as to the evolution of its corporate structure. He provided a corporate chart, Exhibit P17. While I accept his evidence, for what it was, it was not backed up by any documents. I am not surprised that he could not identify documents such as invoices. However, he could not identify more "high level" documents such as apparent license agreements and letters of agreement.

3. John Stewart, Holland Landing, Ontario. He is Business Unit Director of Janssen Inc., and has been involved at the senior level in Janssen Inc. and its predecessors in marketing its levofloxacin products in Canada. He gave his evidence in a straightforward manner in dealing with the marketing strategy and decisions of Janssen in respect of its levofloxacin products in Canada.

4. Seth Fischer, Bridgewater, New Jersey. He was with the Johnson & Johnson organization including various Ortho-McNeil entities for many years in the 1990's and 2000's. He has left the Johnson & Johnson organization and is presently employed by a different organization in California. He gave evidence respecting the launch of levofloxacin products in the United States and Canada, and the relationship between various Johnson & Johnson entities and Daiichi. He identified several agreements between these entities and Daiichi and e-mail exchanges in respect thereof. He gave his evidence in a straightforward manner.

5. Lindsey Villacis, Flemington, New Jersey. She is a Senior Financial Analyst with the Johnson & Johnson group. She gave evidence as to the documents relating to manufacture and sale of the levofloxacin containing products within the Johnson & Johnson group of companies and, in particular, sales to the Canadian organization. She addressed many sales related documents found in Exhibit P37 but was unable to identify certain documents put to her in cross-examination. She was a straightforward, if careful, witness.

6. Carlos Fernandini, Bayamon, Puerto Rico. He is a Senior Finance Manager of Johnson-Ortho Puerto Rico. He gave evidence as to the shipment of levofloxacin (sometimes called the active pharmaceutical ingredient or API) from Daiichi to the Puerto Rico manufacturing facility and, from there, to Janssen Inc. in Canada. He identified several documents related to these transactions. His evidence was straightforward. He was unable to identify certain documents put to him in cross-examination.

7. Bob Roarty, Flemington, New Jersey. He is Director, Global Finance with the Janssen supply chain division of Johnson & Johnson, New Jersey. He gave evidence as to the physical flow of goods and related paperwork, from Daiichi through Puerto Rico, and then to Canada. This evidence is illustrated in charts entered as Exhibits P39 and P17. His evidence was straightforward; he identified certain documents in his evidence in chief but could not identify others put to him in cross-examination.

[18] At the conclusion of the evidence of the Plaintiffs' witnesses, Plaintiffs' Counsel tendered an affidavit of Cheewooi Lim, a Japanese resident, who is with the Business Development and Licensing Department at Daiichi. Defendant's Counsel objected to the filing of this affidavit since Lim was not presented for cross-examination and apparently, is precluded from giving sworn evidence in Japan in a non-Japanese proceeding. I entered the affidavit into evidence as Exhibit P41 but indicated that I would give it little, if any, weight.

[19] The Plaintiffs introduced a portion of their Examination for Discovery of the Defendant as Exhibit P42 which was deemed to have been read into the Record.

c) Defendant Teva's Evidence

[20] The Defendant Teva did not call any fact witnesses but did call four expert witnesses. The parties agreed that these four witnesses could be called as experts, and agreed as to the scope of their expertise (Exhibit A45). Their reports were marked as Exhibits and were deemed to be read into the Record. These experts were:

1. Alan Mak, Toronto, Ontario. The parties have agreed as to his expertise:

   ...an expert in litigation and forensic accounting.

   Mr. Mak was provided with a number of assumptions and data and asked to calculate Janssen's losses (gains) consequent upon Teva's entry into the levofloxacin market with a generic product. His reports were marked as Exhibits D46, D47, and D48.

Mr. Mak gave his evidence in a straightforward manner. The opinions and conclusions that he reached however are dependent upon the assumptions that he was asked to make.

2. Dr. Paul Grootendorst, Oakville, Ontario. The parties have agreed as to his expertise:

...an expert in health and pharmaceutical economics.

Dr. Grootendorst was provided with a number of assumptions and data and asked to provide his opinion as to the market share Janssen's levofloxacin products, LEVAQUIN, would have had in the "but for" world had Teva not entered with a generic. His reports were entered as Exhibits D52, D53, with corrections as D54.

His opinions are dependent upon the assumptions which he was given and others that he made. His evidence was given in a frank and straightforward manner.

3. Dr. Lea Katsanis, Westmount, Quebec. The parties have agreed as to her expertise:

...an expert in pharmaceutical marketing.

Her report was marked as Exhibit D55. She gave evidence as to the likely market share that Janssen's Levaquin would have received in the "but for" world had Teva not entered the marketplace concluding that it would have been a declining share. I accept that she was endeavouring to give reasonable opinions although, in cross-examination, she tended to be overly loquacious or confused. When I asked her to compare Dr.Grootendorst's conclusion with hers, she said that they were about the same but that Dr. Grootendorst may have been working with more data than she had.

4. Dr. Andrew Simor, Toronto, Ontario. . The parties have agreed as to his expertise:

> …an expert in medical microbiology and the treatment of infectious diseases.

He gave evidence as to the use and recommendations for use (guidelines) of anti-infection drugs including macrolides and quinolones. His reports are marked as Exhibits D58 (2 volumes) and D59. He gave his evidence in a straightforward and candid manner.

[21] The Defendant entered into evidence four volumes of excerpts from its discovery of the Plaintiff in Action No. T-2175-04 as Exhibit D61, and a supplemental volume in the same action as Exhibit D62. Documents referred to in those excerpts were marked as Exhibit D63.

[22] Excerpts from the Defendant's Examination for Discovery of the Plaintiffs in Action No. T-2056-11 were marked as Exhibit D64, and documents referred to as Exhibit D65.

[23] All of this discovery material was deemed to have been read into the Record and, in accordance with the understanding in both these actions, all of these discovery excerpts and documents are applicable equally to both actions.

VI. GLOSSARY

1. Fluoroquinolones were sometimes referred to in the evidence as quinolones. They include medications with generic names ending in –floxacin such as ciprofloxacin (CIPRO), levofloxacin (LEVAQUIN), moxifloxacin (AVELOX), and gatifloxacin (TEQUIN).

2. Respiratory fluoroquinolones are a subset of the fluoroquinolones. These are fluoroquinolones that may be used to treat a range of bacteria that cause Respiratory Tract Infections (RTI's) such as S. pneumoniae. Of the fluoroquinolones in the evidence, levofloxacin (LEVAQUIN), moxifloxacin (AVELOX), and gatifloxacin (TEQUIN) are respiratory fluoroquinolones. While ciprofloxacin (CIPRO) is not a respiratory fluoroquinolone, it was used to treat some RTI's in the 2000's.
3. Macrolides are a group of antibiotics also used in the treatment of RTI's. They have generic names ending in –omycin and include erythromycin, clarithromycin (BIAXIN BID or BIAXIN XL), and azithromycin (ZITHROMAX).
4. Beta-lactams or β-lactams are another class of antibiotics. An old example of a beta-lactam is penicillin. Of the drugs in this class, a common element is a molecular structure known as a beta-lactam ring. During the proceedings, mention was made of several of these antibiotics including amoxicillin, cefuroxime, and ceftriaxone.
5. Combination therapy with beta-lactam and a macrolide is a combination of one drug from each class that can be used together for the treatment of RTI's.
6. API or active pharmaceutical ingredient is the active medicinal ingredient in a drug. It is combined with other ingredients, often called excipients, to make the final product (e.g., a tablet). Levofloxacin is an API made by Daiichi and shipped to Puerto Rico where it is mixed with other ingredients (excipients) and made into tablets.
7. A respiratory tract infection (RTI) is an infection anywhere along the respiratory tract from the nose to the lungs. They are usually caused by a virus or bacteria and include colds, sinusitis, influenza, bronchitis, and pneumonia.

8. Community-acquired pneumonia or CAP is one of the more common RTI's. It is a pneumonia developed by someone who has not had contact with a hospital or other medical institution. Hospital-acquired pneumonia or HAP is a pneumonia developed by someone who has had contact with a hospital or other institution.

VII. ISSUES

[25] There are four issues that the Court must address in these proceedings; the first three are proposed by Janssen, and the fourth by Teva who agrees with the three proposed by Janssen. They are:

1. Does Janssen US have standing to claim damages as a result of Teva's infringement of the 080 Patent?
2. What is the quantum of damages suffered by each of Janssen Canada and Janssen US?
3. How is the pre-judgment interest, if any, awarded to Janssen US to be calculated?
4. Should Janssen Canada have taken steps to mitigate its damages and, if so, when and to what extent?

VIII. ISSUE NO. 1 – STANDING OF JANSSEN US

[26] The 080 Patent is owned by Daiichi and Daiichi has settled its claim against Teva. Janssen Inc., the Plaintiff in Action No. T-2175-04, has a claim for damages against Teva which claim is contested only as to the quantum of damages, and not its right to damages which right was settled in the earlier decision in this case.

[27] There are three Plaintiffs in Action No. T-2056-11; of these, two, Janssen-Ortho LLC and OMJ Pharmaceuticals Inc. (collectively known as Janssen Puerto Rico), make no claim for damages. That leaves only Janssen Pharmaceuticals, Inc. (JPI or Janssen US) as the entity making a claim for damages in that action.

[28] The claim by Janssen US for damages rests on the provisions of section 55(1) of the Patent Act (the provisions are the same in the pre- and post- October 1989 versions of that Act) which state that an infringer is liable for all damages sustained not only by a patentee, but also by all persons "claiming under" the patentee.

55 (1) A person who infringes a patent is liable to the patentee and to all persons claiming under the patentee for all damage sustained by the patentee or by any such person, after the grant of the patent, by reason of the infringement.	55 (1) Quiconque contrefait un brevet est responsable envers le breveté et toute personne se réclamant de celui-ci du dommage que cette contrefaçon leur a fait subir après l'octroi du brevet.

[29] Who constitutes a person "claiming under" a patentee has generated a good deal of jurisprudence in Canadian Courts. By way of contrast, the United Kingdom Patents Act 1977, c. 37, sections 33, 61, 67 and 68, give a right to take action for infringement and to claim remedies not only to the proprietor (owner) of a patent but also to an exclusive licensee provided that the licensee has, within six months, registered the particulars of the licence with the Patent Office. This brings a good deal of certainty to the situation.

[30] The leading case in Canada is the decision of the Supreme Court in Armstrong Cork Ltd. Canada v Domco Industries Ltd., [1982] 1 SCR 907. That case proceeded on an Agreed Statement of Facts. The patent owner (Congoleum) granted to Domco a restricted non-exclusive licence under a patent directed to etched pattern floor coverings. The licence provided that the patentee itself would not enter the Canadian market for three years and would not give a licence to anyone else for five years. The issue was whether Domco was a person "claiming under" the patentee. Martland J., for the Court, reviewed prior decisions including that of the Privy Council in Spun Rock Wools Ltd. v Fiberglas Canada Ltd., [1947] AC 313, and the Federal Court of Appeal in American Cyanamid Co. v Novopharm Ltd., [1972] FC 739. In Fiberglas, the Privy Council, at pages 320 to 321, stated that "licensees" were entitled to sue for damages under section 55 of the Patent Act. On the facts of that case, however, the "licensee" was an exclusive licence and Counsel sought to distinguish that decision on that basis. Martland J. rejected that submission and stated that there was no valid reason to exclude a non-exclusive licensee from the provisions of the Patent Act respecting persons "claiming under" the patentee. He wrote at pages 917 to 920:

> While it is true that the licensee actually under consideration in the Fiberglas case was said to be "the exclusive sub-licensee" (or "exclusive licensee") under the patent, no information is given in any of the judgments as to the precise nature of the licence, and nothing in the reasons for judgment on this point turned on the distinction between an exclusive licensee and a non-exclusive licensee or a bare licensee. Both Mr. Justice Davis in this Court delivering his and Mr. Justice Taschereau's judgment and Lord Simonds in the Judicial Committee used the general word "licensee" > in delivering their judgments. It cannot be supposed that they did so intending that only an exclusive licensee was being considered, particulary when Lord Simonds defined the issue of law as being: "Here the question is whether a licensee is a person claiming under the patentee" (p. 320).

Armstrong sought to distinguish an exclusive licence from a non-exclusive licence on the basis that the former was a grant of a part of the monopoly and that such a licensee was practically an assignee of the patent for the term of the licence with all the beneficial rights of the patentee. It is difficult to reconcile this reasoning with what was said in Heap v. Hartley (supra) (applied by this Court in the Electric Chain Co. case) in the passage which I have already quoted. I repeat from that passage the following portion which is apt in relation to Armstrong's submission:

> Now he puts his case in a two-fold manner. He says: "In the first place, as exclusive licensee, I am in the position of an assign of the letters patent for that district and for that term, and as an assign of letters patent, I have a right to restrain any person who is infringing within the district." That argument appears to be based on an entire error with regard to the nature of a license. An exclusive license is only a license in one sense; that is to say, the true nature of an exclusive license is this. It is a leave to do a thing, and a contract not to give leave to anybody else to do the same thing. But it confers like any other license, no interest or property in the thing.

In my opinion, the reasons which led this Court and the Privy Council to the conclusion reached in the Fiberglas case are as applicable to a nonexclusive licensee as to an exclusive licensee. If an exclusive licensee is a person claiming under the patentee within s. 57(1), and the Fiberglas case so holds, there is no valid basis, under the wording of the subsection, to exclude its application to a non-exclusive licensee, and there is no valid basis for interpreting the Fiberglas case as holding otherwise.

It was also contended on behalf of Armstrong that a non-exclusive licensee has no rights which can be infringed and therefore has no claim against the infringer of a patent. This was the view of Jackett C.J. in the American Cyanamid case. He was of the opinion that the non-exclusive licensee had only a right to use the patent, which right was not affected by its infringement.

This was the legal position, even in respect of an exclusive licensee, prior to the enactment of s. 55 of the 1935 Act. Section 55 was enacted to meet this difficulty and, in my opinion, it has overcome the problem. Section 55(1), by its terms, imposes a liability upon the infringer of a patent to the patentee and also to all persons claiming under him for all damages sustained by the > patentee or any such person by reason of such infringement. It is the infringement of the patent which gives rise to a liability. If that infringement causes damage to the patentee or to any person claiming under him, the infringer must compensate for the damage sustained by reason of the infringement of the patent. A licensee relying on this subsection is not claiming against the infringer for infringement of his rights under the licence, he is claiming for the damage he has sustained in consequence of the infringement of the patent.

>
> On this point, I adopt the reasons of Sweet D.J. in the American Cyanamid case which have already been quoted.
>
> Armstrong contended that the meaning of the word "damages" in s. 57(1) meant loss resulting from interference with the legal rights of the claimant. "Damages", it was said, refers to pecuniary recompense given by process of law to a person for an actionable wrong that another has done to him.
>
> The meaning of the word "damages" must be ascertained in respect of its use in this specific statutory provision. In section 57(1) it is provided in terms that an infringer of a patent is liable for all damages sustained by reason of his infringe- > ment by a patentee or by any person claiming under him. This is a statutory obligation to pay damages and it applies in favour of any person who comes within the provisions of the subsection. In my opinion, Domco does come within the terms of the subsection.

[31] The Federal Court of Appeal considered whether a party was a person "claiming under" a patentee in Signalisation de Montréal Inc. v Services de Béton Universels Ltée [1993] 1 FC 341(CA). In that case, the owner of a patent directed to machines that moved highway barriers granted an exclusive license to an entity known as Barrier. In turn, Barrier appointed the Plaintiff Signalisation as its exclusive representative in Quebec. Hugessen J.A. took a broad view as to who was a person "claiming under" the patentee. He wrote at paragraphs 24 and 25:

> 24 In my view, a person "claiming under" the patentee is a person who derives his rights to use the patented invention, at whatever degree, from the patentee. The right to use an invention is one the monopoly to which is conferred by a patent.9 When a breach of that right is asserted by a person who can trace his title in a direct line back to the patentee that person is "claiming under" the patentee. It matters not by what technical means the acquisition of the right to use may have taken place. It may be a straightforward assignment or a licence. It may, as I have indicated, be a sale of an article embodying the invention. It may also be a lease thereof. What matters is that the claimant asserts a right in the monopoly and that the source of that right may be traced back to the patentee. That is the case with the appellant here.

25 In my view, the appellant has the status to assert a claim for damages under section 55 of the Patent Act and has done so inter alia in the paragraphs in the statement of claim reproduced and summarized above. That statement of claim should not have been struck out.

[32] Décary J.A. disagreed, writing at paragraphs 44 to 46:

44 Nor is it impossible that the appellant may have some ground for bringing action itself against the respondent on the basis of some form of liability in tort.

45 Whether or not there is, or was, any possibility of a contractual remedy against Energy or Barrier or of a remedy in tort against the respondent, it is not for this Court to extend the statutory remedy provided by Parliament. As Judson J. pointed out in Commissioner of Patents v. Farbwerke Hoechst Aktiengesellschaft Vormals Meister Lucius & Bruning, [1964] S.C.R. 49, at page 57:

> There is no inherent common law right to a patent. An inventor gets his patent according to the terms of the Patent Act, no more and no less.

The same is true of a person who claims under the patentee. That person is the person whom the Patent Act recognizes as such, and no one else. To accept the appellant's arguments would, in my opinion, be to interpret subsection 55(1) of the Act as if the words "claiming under the patentee" did not appear, and as if it were sufficient for damages to have been incurred as a result of the infringement of a patent in order for the injured party to have a remedy under that subsection.

> 46 I therefore conclude that a mere contract of purchase of a patented product does not make the purchaser a person claiming under the patentee within the meaning of subsection 55(1) of the Act.

[33] Létourneau J.A. agreed with Hugessen J.A. and responded to Décary J.A. in writing at paragraph 51:

> 51 Nor do I believe as my colleague Décary J.A. suggests that the words "persons claiming under the patentee" in subsection 55(1) are more limited than the word "person" in subsections 60(1) and (2) of the Act. In subsection 60(1), it has to be an interested person and therefore it is not unqualified. In subsection 60(2), it has to be a person who uses or proposes to use a process or a person who makes, uses or sells an article that might constitute an infringement of a patent. Likewise in subsection 55(1), it has to be a person who claims under the patentee, that is to say a person who as a user, an assignee, a licensee or a lessee had a title or a right which may be traced back to the patentee.

[34] The final words used by Létourneau J.A. are instructive; a person "claiming under" who, as a user, an assignee, a licensee or lessee, had a title or a right that may be traced back to the patentee, thus can be a person claiming under the patentee.

[35] There have been a number of more recent decisions of the Courts where consideration was given to whether a person was one "claiming under" a patentee. Some of these decisions dealt with circumstances not unlike those of the present case where it was agreed that, despite the lack of a written agreement, the claimant was part of a family or group of entities all dealing in some way with the patented goods.

[36] In AstraZeneca Canada Inc. v Apotex Inc., 2014 FC 638 (aff'd 2015 FCA 158, leave to appeal to SCC granted March 10, 2016), Justice Rennie (as he then was) made a careful review of the evidence and concluded that one of the Plaintiffs, AstraZeneca Canada Inc., had standing as a person "claiming under". He wrote at paragraphs 10 and 23 to 24:

> [10] In my view, AstraZeneca Canada has standing. More specifically, AstraZeneca Canada qualifies as a person claiming under the patentee because there is an implied license between AstraZeneca and AstraZeneca Canada regarding the sale of Nexium. However, prior to elaborating on this finding, it is important to note the factual background underlying Apotex's surprisingly technical standing defence against its alleged infringement.
>
> [23] In this case, there is something more. Indeed, a number of facts support the finding that AstraZeneca Canada's right of use can be traced back to AstraZeneca Aktiebolag:
>
> > 1. AstraZeneca Canada and AstraZeneca Aktiebolag are both indirect subsidiaries of a common parent, AstraZeneca PLC, located in Sweden;
> >
> > 2. AstraZeneca Aktiebolag, the owner of the '653 patent, is the principal source of supply to AstraZeneca Canada and globally;
> >
> > 3. AstraZeneca Canada sought and obtained regulatory approval to sell Nexium in Canada. The information in support of the regulatory filing derived from AstraZeneca Aktiebolag – the holder of the master regulatory file for Nexium;
> >
> > 4. AstraZeneca Canada and AstraZeneca Aktiebolag entered into a Formulation, Packaging and Distribution Agreement (Distribution Agreement) in December 2000. In the Distribution Agreement, AstraZeneca Canada is defined as the "Distributor," and is granted non-exclusive rights to the "Products" which are defined to include Nexium. This agreement addresses intellectual property rights in articles 24.1 and 24.2:
> > 24 INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY RIGHTS

24.1 All intellectual property rights relating to the Products shall remain the property of ASTRAZENECA at all times. The Distributor shall not acquire any intellectual property rights relating to the Products and shall only have permission to use such rights granted to the Distributor under this Agreement.

24.2 The Distributor will inform ASTRAZENECA of any infringement or suspected infringement of any of ASTRAZENECA's intellectual property rights in the Market which comes to the notice of the Distributor. ASTRAZENECA will take all reasonable steps, at its own expense, to prosecute infringers. The Distributor will give ASTRAZENECA all reasonable assistance in such prosecution [emphasis added].

5. From 2001-2008 AstraZeneca Canada packaged Nexium which it received from AstraZeneca Aktiebolag in bulk tablets, prior to sale in Canada. In 2008, AstraZeneca Canada's packaging facility in Mississauga was closed. The letter agreement between AstraZeneca Canada and AstraZeneca Aktiebolag dated December 12, 2007 stated that after closure, Nexium would be supplied by AstraZeneca Aktiebolag to AstraZeneca Canada in finished packaged form, and that AstraZeneca Canada would continue to act as the distributor. Accordingly, after 2008, AstraZeneca Canada received pre-packaged Nexium from AstraZeneca Aktiebolag for sale in Canada. Thus, AstraZeneca Canada has always received its supply of Nexium (pre-packaged or in bulk) from AstraZeneca Aktiebolag, except for a three month period in 2001 and a six month period in 2012, during which AstraZeneca UK was the source of supply.

6. According to the evidence of Ms. Elaine Campbell, CEO of AstraZeneca Canada, AstraZeneca Canada has obtained the consent of AstraZeneca Aktiebolag to file Form IV patent lists under the PMNOC Regulations;

7. Ms. Campbell testified that all of AstraZeneca Canada's legal costs in respect of this litigation were being paid by AstraZeneca Aktiebolag.

> [24] When assessed against this factual landscape, AstraZeneca Canada's right to use the patent may be traced back to AstraZeneca Aktiebolag, the patentee. All rights of use of Nexium by AstraZeneca Canada are derivative, by an implied agreement, from AstraZeneca Aktiebolag. While there is no express licence and no plea of licence, the conduct of the parties is consistent with a finding of an implied licence granted by AstraZeneca Aktiebolag. The Distribution Agreement grants AstraZeneca Canada permission to use AstraZeneca Aktiebolag's intellectual property rights "insofar as is necessary to exercise the rights granted" under the Distribution Agreement. These rights include the right to sell Nexium and the obligation to assist AstraZeneca Aktiebolag in the civil prosecution of possible infringement by others. Commencement of an infringement action by AstraZeneca Canada falls within a reasonable interpretation of sections 24.1 and 24.2, and implicit to that is an acknowledgment of a right to recover damages on behalf of the patentee for infringement. Consequently, AstraZeneca Canada is a person claiming under the patentee as required by section 55(2) of the Patent Act and has standing in this trial.

[37] In Eli Lilly and Company v Apotex Inc., 2009 FC 991 (aff'd 2010 FCA 240), Justice Gauthier (was she then was) also reviewed the facts thoroughly and concluded that one of the Plaintiffs, Lilly Canada, had standing. She wrote at paragraphs 76 to 83:

> [76] Lilly Canada does not disagree with the above-noted statements, it simply says that in this case it has not only established, through the testimony of Mr. Pytynia (Transcript Volume 7, pp. 56-63; 83-84) that Lilly Canada is a wholly owned subsidiary, but also that it had an express licence to both the Lilly and Shionogi Patents at issue in this case. It has also been admitted that Lilly Canada has been selling Ceclor® (cefaclor) in Canada since 1980. Lilly Canada made specific references to various exhibits filed during the hearing to support its position, particularly an agreement executed and effective as of January 1, 1991 between Lilly U.S. and Lilly Canada (TX-109) where:
> > Lilly represents and warrants that for Canada, it has the exclusive right to grant licenses to enable the licensee to make, have made, use and sell certain products, including the right to use within Canada, certain patents, trademarks > relating to such products and to their preparation, manufacture, processing and packaging.

[77] In the said agreement, Lilly U.S. appoints Lilly Canada as its authorized distributor of all Lilly U.S. products in Canada (which includes Ceclor®) and at s. 1.2:

> Lilly further grants to Lilly Canada a non-exclusive sublicense (without right of further sublicense except as further granted in writing by Lilly) under the Canadian patent applications and patents listed in Schedule "A"
>
> […]
> to make, have made, use or sell, and/or import Lilly Products whose preparation is covered by the patent applications and patents.

[78] At pp. 8 and 9 of Schedule A, the four Lilly patents at issue here are listed. Normally, it should thus not be contentious that Lilly Canada has proper standing pursuant to subs. 55(1) of the Patent Act, at least in respect of those patents.

[79] Apotex, however, says that on January 1, 1995, the 1991 agreement was amended (TX-110) to delete the various schedules which, according to Mr. Pytynia, was done to avoid having to keep them up to date which was found to be difficult. According to Apotex, the result of this amendment is simply that licences to the Lilly or Shionogi patents were no longer granted to Lilly Canada.

[80] This, according to Apotex, makes particular sense[23] in respect of the Shionogi patents, given that none of the material purchased by Lilly Canada was made by the processes protected thereunder and that Lilly Canada never actually made, purchased or sold any of the actual compounds claimed in the patents in suit. Apotex also discards the impact of the General Supply and Distribution Agreement, filed as TX-112, on the basis that Lilly Canada's role as distributor appears to be based on an agreement that says nothing about patent rights, nor does it characterize Lilly Canada as an agent and expressly disclaims any other rights flowing between the parties.

[81] The Court agrees with the plaintiff that such an interpretation of the 1991 agreement as amended through time leads to an absurd result and is simply incorrect. The January 1, 1995 agreement expressly states:

> WHEREAS the parties desire to maintain the rights, licenses and sublicenses granted by the AGREEMENT while also recognizing that the parties will receive full compensation under the Master Supply and Distribution and Manufacturing or other Agreements.

[82] It is also worth noting that the 1991 agreement was further amended on April 9, 1998 (TX-113) giving Lilly Canada the right to further sub-licence a third party under some of the patents covered by the agreement, in conformity with s. 1.2 of the 1991 agreement. More particularly, the amendment refers to the licence granted under the 1991 agreement for cefaclor and:

> grants to Lilly Canada the right to sub-license the following licenses granted to it under the [1991] License Agreement (collectively, the "Licenses") for cefaclor: (i) licenses granted under patent rights of Lilly U.S. (including, without limitation, the patents listed in Schedule A hereto).

Said schedule made specific reference to three of the Lilly Patents in suit (the only ones missing are the '007 and '026, the latter having expired by that time).

[83] Having considered all of the evidence, the Court is satisfied that Lilly Canada has properly established its standing based on an express licence from the patentee.

[38] In Apotex Inc. v Sanofi-Aventis, 2011 FC 1486 (rev'd on other grounds, 2013 FCA 186), Justice Boivin (as he then was) reviewed the factual circumstances of the case and concluded that a "Partnership" had standing. He wrote at paragraphs 46 to 48 and 55 to 57:

> [46] Against this background, the Court now turns to the evidence put before it in connection with the rights conferred to the Partnership.
>
> D. The Evidence before the Court
>
> [47] During the trial, Dr. Thierry Saugier, Vice-President Alliance and Partnership at Sanofi-Aventis, was called by Sanofi to testify as to the standing of the Partnership. Dr. Saugier testified that, since April 2006, he has managed group of alliances for Sanofi-Aventis, including the alliance referred to the Territory B Partnership and the Territory A Partnership.

[48] In particular, Dr. Saugier testified that, in order to structure the alliance, Sanofi granted an exclusive licence for clopidogrel to the Partnership, as can be seen in the Partnership Agreements which are still in effect today. The various agreements produced into evidence indeed support Dr. Saugier's oral testimony as to the rights granted thereunder.

[55] The Court believes that such a list could not, on a practical point of view, be amended each time a development occurred in connection with products under research or in a process of a patent application. The terms and scope of the agreement at issue are such that [...] must be interpreted to encompass newly developed compounds. To conclude otherwise would fly in the face of the very purpose of the Partnership Agreements, which was to allow the Partnership to carry out all activities related to the development, manufacturing, sourcing and commercialization of clopidogrel in the specified territory known as Territory B, would otherwise be defeated.

[56] Finally, the Court recalls that counsel for Apotex questioned Dr. Saugier in connection with the absence of manufacturing facilities, employees and registered place of business in Canada in order to demonstrate the lack of standing. In light of the breadth of the Partnership Agreements, the Court finds this line of questioning to be of no assistance for the purposes of the standing issue.

E. Conclusion on Standing

[57] In sum, considering the broad meaning of "persons claiming under" a patentee as referred to under ss 55(1) of the Patent Act, and based on the Court's review of the Partnership Agreements and the testimony given in that regard, the Court finds that the Partnership has a "credible and legally sufficient basis" for claiming under a patentee in the circumstances. Indeed, the evidence clearly shows that the Partnership was granted an exclusive licence for clopidogrel products through the various Agreements as of 1997. It follows that the Partnership has standing to bring the action at issue for any infringement that it alleges to have occurred prior to December 6, 2007.

[39] In Apotex Inc. v Wellcome Foundation Ltd., [2001] 1 FC 495, the Federal Court of Appeal held that, since both the patentee and the person "claiming under" were before the Court and both were asserting that the person "claiming under" had standing, the Court would not deny that standing. Rothstein J.A. wrote at paragraph 99:

> [99] It is perhaps not uncalled for to observe that this is not a case in which the alleged licensee is alone in advancing its claim for patent infringement. Here, the patentee is also before the Court as a co-plaintiff supporting the claim of GWI. It is difficult to conceive of what more is necessary to prove the existence of a licence than to have the licensor and licensee both attesting to the validity of the licence. Where both the patentee and the person claiming under the patentee are before the Court, are affiliated as being owned by the same parent and have an identity of interest in the litigation--with the patentee supporting the person claiming under the patentee--it is, to say the least, surprising that technical questions of status to sue would be advanced as a defence to infringement.

[40] In circumstances involving parties who are very similar to those before the Court here, Justice Reed of this Court considered standing in Kirin-Amgen Inc. v Hoffmann-LaRoche Ltd. (1999), 87 C.P.R. (3d) 1 (aff'd 11 CPR(4th)78). She wrote at paragraphs 89 to 94:

> 89 Kirin-Amgen is the owner of the '047 patent. That patent issued on May 27, 1997, and as noted, was divided from a more comprehensive patent application that had been filed on December 12, 1984. On September 30, 1985, Kirin-Amgen licensed Ortho Pharmaceutical Corporation (now known as Ortho-McNeil Pharmaceutical Inc.) and its affiliates to use and sell in a number of countries, including Canada, products made in the United States of America that are within the scope of the broader patent application. A written agreement to that effect exists. The recombinant EPO used in the EPREX product that is sold in Canada is made in Puerto Rico, a commonwealth of the United States.
> 90 In 1986 Ortho Pharmaceutical Corporation gave Janssen-Ortho's predecessor a mandate to market and sell EPREX in Canada. No written licence documenting that agreement can be found. No written notice to Kirin-Amgen of that sub-licence has been found. Nevertheless, it appears that Kirin-Amgen has had notice that Janssen-Ortho's predecessor and now Janssen-Ortho had been sub-licensed to use and sell the EPREX product in Canada. The EPREX product was launched on the Canadian market in 1990. Since that time, Janssen-Ortho has been paying royalties, first to what was then the Ortho Pharmaceutical Corporation, and more recently to Ortho Biotech Inc. The royalties are then paid to Kirin-Amgen.

91 The rights acquired from Kirin-Amgen in 1985 were subsequently assigned by Ortho Pharmaceutical Corporation (renamed Ortho-McNeil Pharmaceutical Inc.) to Ortho Biotech Inc. under an Asset Transfer Agreement effective January 1, 1998. Kirin-Amgen consented to this assignment.

92 Since no written document could be found of the 1986 agreement between Ortho Pharmaceutical Corporation and Janssen-Ortho's predecessor, a written licence agreement was signed by Ortho Biotech, Ortho McNeil, and Janssen-Ortho on November 20, 1998 confirming that Janssen has been sub-licensed since 1986 by Ortho-McNeil's predecessor Ortho Pharmaceuticals to use and sell products containing erythropoietin in Canada. In the agreement, Ortho Biotech also grants to Janssen-Ortho a non-exclusive right to use and sell licensed products containing erythropoietin as provided in the product licence agreement signed between Kirin-Amgen and Ortho Pharmaceuticals on September 30, 1985. Written notice of this agreement was given to Kirin-Amgen (Exhibit D-6).[para93] It is also necessary to note that the Ortho companies are all affiliated. Johnson & Johnson a New Brunswick, New Jersey corporation owns 100% of the voting stock of Janssen-Ortho. It also owns either directly or indirectly 100% of the voting stock of Ortho-McNeil Pharmaceutical Inc. and Ortho Biotech Inc.

94 Counsel for the plaintiffs argues that applying the test articulated in Apotex Inc. v. Wellcome Foundation Ltd. (1998), 79 C.P.R. (3d) 193 (F.C.T.D.) at 300 - 301, (which test is: can the right asserted by the claimant be traced back to the patentee), leads to the conclusion that Janssen-Ortho is a person "claiming under" the patentee for the purpose of section 55 of the Patent Act. I agree.

[41] In Jay-Lor International Inc. v Penta Farms Systems Ltd., 2007 FC 358, Justice Snider of this Court reviewed the authorities and in particular, the Reasons of Justice Wetston of this Court, in Apotex Inc. v Wellcome Foundation Ltd. (1998), 79 C.P.R (3d) 193, and concluded that the ability of a person to claim under a patentee depends on whether the party can trace an interest under the patent; it does not necessarily require the existence of an express licensee. She wrote at paragraphs 32 to 38:

> [32] More recently, in Apotex Inc. v. Wellcome Foundation Ltd., 79 C.P.R. (3d) 193, 145 F.T.R. 161, [1998] F.C.J. No. 382 (F.C.T.D.) (QL), aff'd on this point 2000, 10 C.P.R. (4th) 65 (F.C.A.), 262 N.R. 137, (referred to as Wellcome), the court considered the relationship between the two related companies who had brought an action for infringement and provided some helpful analysis on the issue of the right to assert rights under s. 55(1) of the Patent Act. In that case, Glaxo Wellcome Inc. (GWI) claimed that it was entitled to bring an infringement action because it was exclusively licensed by the Wellcome Foundation Ltd. to import, manufacture, use and sell the invention described in the patent. Wellcome was listed as the owner of the patent. Although, no written licence was produced to establish GWI as a licensee, GWI maintained that the licence was implied.
> [33] The arguments of the plaintiffs in Wellcome were very similar to those made by the Defendants in this case. The plaintiffs asserted that GWI failed to meet its onus to establish that it had an entitlement to sue under s. 55(1) of the Patent Act. They argued that a licence, like any other contract, must be proven according to its terms and effects.
>
> [34] In Wellcome, at paras. 360-361, Justice Wetston provided the following comments on the interpretation of s. 55(1):
>
> > Canadian jurisprudence has provided a broad interpretation of "persons claiming under" the patentee. A range of interests is held to have been contemplated, including the exclusive licensee, the non-exclusive licensee, the purchaser of a patented articles and sales agents. This interpretation is embodied in Signalisation de Montréal Inc. v. Services de Béton Universels Ltée et al. (1992), 46 C.P.R. (3d) 199 (F.C.A.) per Hugessen J.A. at p. 211:
> >
> > > It matters not by what technical means the aquisition of the right to use might have taken place. It may be a straightforward assignment > of a licence. It may, as I have indicated, be a sale of an article embodying the invention. It may also be a lease thereof. What matters is that the claimant asserts a right in the monopoly and that the source of that right may be traced back to the patentee.

[35] In the Wellcome case, Justice Wetston did not find that a parent/subsidiary relationship exist between GWI and Wellcome. However, the two companies were under the ownership, common care and control of Glaxo Wellcome plc. The evidence was that licences were seldom written. Based upon his review of the facts of the case, Justice Wetston concluded, at para. 367, that "GWI is indeed able to trace an interest under the patent to the patentee in virtue of the corporate practices with respect to implied licensing within the group of companies under the care and control of Glaxo Wellcome plc".

[36] In sum, what I can take from the Wellcome case and other jurisprudence is that the ability of a party to claim under a patentee depends on whether the party can trace an interest under the patent to the patentee and does not necessarily require the existence of an express licence. Where no express licence exists, each case will be determined on its facts.

[37] In the case before me, I am satisfied, on a balance of probabilities, that JAY-LOR Fabricating has met the burden of demonstrating that it can trace an interest under the patent to JAY-LOR International. The key facts supporting this conclusion can be summarized as follows:

- Both JAY-LOR Fabricating and JAY-LOR International are under the same control of Mr. Tamminga;
- No other licence has been granted – either explicitly or by implication – to any third party; and
- The two companies have structured their affairs in a manner consistent with a licensee-licensor relationship.

[38] In conclusion, I am satisfied on this point that JAY-LOR Fabricating has standing to bring this action.

[42] Lastly, I turn to the decision of Justice Snider in Les Laboratories Servier v Apotex Inc., 2008 FC 825 (affirmed without discussion on this point, 2009 FCA 222). She determined that the mere existence of a corporate affiliation is not conclusive of a right as a person "claiming under" a patentee; there must be something more. She concluded that an entity which did not operate "in Canada" was not a person "claiming under" the patentee. She wrote at paragraphs 70, 81 and 82 and 88 to 91:

> [70] The test for who qualifies as a person claiming under a patentee is not simply whether the patentee has consented to the person being joined as a plaintiff in an action; nor is it enough to demonstrate that two parties are related. In each case, the facts must demonstrate a credible and legally sufficient basis for claiming under a patentee (Jay-Lor International Inc. v. Penta Farm Systems Ltd. (2007), 59 C.P.R. (4th) 228 at paras. 31, 36 (F.C.) [Jay-Lor]).
>
> [81] Mr. Langourieux confirmed that none of the non-ADIR Foreign Plaintiffs manufacture, offer for sale or import any of the compounds claimed in the '196 Patent into Canada. He also agreed that each local affiliate in a particular country has the focus of promoting, marketing, and registering the product in its specific jurisdiction. For example, Servier UK promotes, markets, sells and distributes the medicines of Groupe Servier in the U.K. market only. I have seen no evidence that Servier Canada sells perindopril in the United Kingdom. For that purpose, Servier UK exists. Servier Australia promotes, markets, sells and distributes the Servier products in the Australian and New Zealand markets. Manufacturing of the active ingredient (the API) in COVERSYL is done by Oril Industries in France. Thus the evidence shows that the affiliated companies within Groupe Servier do not operate as a single entity; each has its own sphere of operation and its own responsibilities within Groupe Servier. Nevertheless, the non-ADIR Foreign Plaintiffs may still be able to satisfy s. 55(1) of the Patent Act, through a licence or other such arrangement.
> [82] As noted above, the mere existence of a corporate affiliation is not conclusive evidence of a right under s. 55(1) of the Patent Act. There must be something more. That something more has consistently been described in the jurisprudence as a "licence" or some other arrangement (for example, a lease, an assignment, or a sale) that would give the affiliate the right to use the patent.

[88] As shown by the evidence, none of the non-ADIR Foreign Plaintiffs operates in Canada. In final argument, counsel for Servier tried to counter Apotex's arguments on the use of the patent by the non-ADIR Foreign Plaintiffs through the following hypothetical:

> It is wholly conceivable that if Servier Australia ran out of perindopril and Servier Canada had too much of it, that Servier Australia would purchase perindopril from Canada, or even in Canada.
>
> My friends' position would either prevent that situation from happening, because Servier Australia would not have a licence in Canada, or would make everybody stop, negotiate a sublicence under the '196 Patent, or bring in Adir to award Servier Australia a licence under the Canadian patent.
> That is nonsensical . . . when we view the manner in which the Servier group of companies views itself and operates.

[89] There are two problems with this line of reasoning. First, this argument is not based on any evidence that this has ever happened in the history of Groupe Servier; it is totally speculative. Secondly, it is not at all "nonsensical" to require affiliates to enter into some type of document to reflect legal rights.

[90] Further, none of these Plaintiffs has ever needed a licence in respect of the '196 Patent because none of their foreign activities relating to the manufacture, use or sale of perindopril can constitute an infringement of the '196 Patent.

[91] Quite clearly, the non-ADIR Foreign Plaintiffs do not use the '196 Patent in Canada or elsewhere. They do not need a licence from ADIR in respect of that patent. It is a stretch to say that the non-ADIR Foreign Plaintiffs are parties to an implied licence for the '196 Patent when no such licence is required.

[43] From all this jurisprudence, I determine that for a Court to conclude that a party is a person "claiming under" the patentee for the purposes of section 55(1) of the Patent Act:

- the person must be one who, as a user, an assignee, a licensee or lessee has a title or a right that can be traced back to the patentee (Signalisation);
- it does not matter whether a licensee is exclusive or non-exclusive (Domco);
- the licence must be proved but it need not exist in writing (Jay-Lor);
- the claim must be one in respect of a use in Canada and not elsewhere in the corporate chain (Servier).

[44] I will now review the evidence in this case.

[45] The parties agree that Daiichi, the patentee, has entered into a written license agreement with an entity called Johnson & Johnson, a New Jersey corporation [J&J], effective as of May 28, 1991 with respect to levofloxacin. That agreement is in evidence at Tab 298 of Exhibit 4. It is agreed that this agreement applies to the 080 Patent. That licence, Article 2.1, grants J&J a licence to manufacture finished products containing levofloxacin and to sell them in Canada, among other countries, in exchange for payment of certain royalties as set out in Article 6.00. Article 7 provided that Daiichi will supply all of J&J's requirements for levofloxacin [the API]. Article 11.00 provides that J&J shall notify Daiichi of any infringement, and Daiichi shall take action in respect thereof assisted by J&J. Article 21.00 provides that any modification to the agreement shall be confirmed in writing. Article 2.3 is important in this case and I reproduce it in full since it relates to sublicenses to J&J subsidiaries:

> 2.3 J&J has the right to sublicense to J&J's Subsidiaries in each country of the Territory any or all of the license herein > granted upon the terms and conditions of this Agreement, provided, however, that the right of sublicense to manufacture the Finished Preparation from the Compound shall be granted to one J&J's Subsidiaries in each country of the Territory. No sublicense agreement entered into pursuant to this paragraph shall be deemed to relieve J&J of its responsibility hereunder, including without limitation the responsibility of insuring that proper payment is made to DAIICHI of all amounts that may become due and owing under this Agreement. Furthermore, J&J shall have the right to appoint distributors and to sublicense such distributors in each of the countries in Territory B to sell the Finished Preparation subject to the terms and conditions of this Agreement. In the event that J&J intends to grant a sublicense pursuant to this paragraph, J & J shall obtain DAIICHI's prior written consent on the contents of such sublicense agreement, which consent shall not be withheld unreasonably.

[46] A number of written amendments and supplements to the licence agreement have been put in evidence. None of them directly relate to Janssen Pharmaceuticals, Inc. (or its predecessors) nor do any of them deal in any specific way with Canada.

[47] There is no written agreement in evidence directly between Daiichi and Janssen Pharmaceuticals, Inc., or any of its predecessors.

[48] Through the evidence of Seth Fischer there was introduced Exhibit P35 which included an e-mail from a Daiichi executive to Fischer who was at the time a senior executive at a Johnson & Johnson subsidiary. That e-mail, according to Fischer, was in response to a letter sent by Fischer to Daiichi, a draft of which was, according to Fischer, "something like" Exhibit P36. That draft said, in part:

> Changes in the U.S. Tax Laws affecting the tax status of our manufacturing operations for Levaquin in Puerto Rico became effective as of today, December 1. While highly technical in nature, those changes will have no substantive effect on the way we manufacture Levaquin. However, we have concluded that we should document a form of sub-license from Johnson & Johnson to our wholly owned Puerto Rican based subsidiary, Janssen Ortho LLC, so that we have a written record for its rights to manufacture Levaquin. Such sublicenses are contemplated by our License Agreement with you in Section 2.3 of the 1991 Agreement.

I enclose for your review a draft of the proposed manufacturing sub-license from Johnson & Johnson to Janssen Ortho LLC.

My people tell me that Section 2.3 is somewhat ambiguous as to whether a sub-license to our subsidiary requires consent from Daiichi, or whether the consent requirement in Section 2.3 is limited to agreements for the appointment of third party distributors.

I will very appreciate your confirming that you agree that the consent requirement in Section 2.3 does not apply to a sub-license to our subsidiary, or in any event confirm that you have no objection to the enclosed sub-license.

[49] The responding Daiichi e-mail, Exhibit 35, said in part:

Dear Seth,

I was forwarded your e-mail addressed to Dr. Une.

Our understanding of the Agreement Section 2.3 is that the consent requirement shall apply to both the sub-license to Johnson & Johnson's subsidiaries and third party distributers.

However, in view of the reality and our previous communication records, it is expressly understood that you have granted a manufacturing sub-license to your subsidiaries (in this case, Janssen Ortho LLC) of Levaquin in the Territory, and we have already agreed with you on such sub-license.

Therefore, notwithstanding Section 2.3, there is no need to give our written consent on a sub-license agreement for Janssen Ortho LLC.

Nevertheless, if Daiichi were to comment on the draft of sub-license agreement, I would like to share the same understanding with you that this sub-license agreement dose not seem to fit into the License Agreement (e.g. Article 1.6 or Article 2).

> I simply assume the reason being that this agreement was drafted as an "comprehensive contract" between Johnson & Johnson and its subsideries, in response to the changed Tax Laws, not limited to Levaquin.
> In short, as long as Johnson & Johnson's obligations stipulated in the License Agreement are fulfilled by Johnson & Johnson and its subsideries, we do not think this sub-license agreement should create any problems on our side.

[50] The evidence of Jeff Smith in that he, and others in the Ortho-McNeill branch of the J&J organization, had frequent meetings and communications with Daiichi in Japan and the United States, and that Daiichi was well aware as to how the J&J organization was making and selling levofloxacin finished products through one or more of its related companies.

[51] The affidavit of Lim, Exhibit P41, to which I attach little weight, is largely hearsay and of little assistance in any event.

[52] Addressed in evidence by the witnesses Smith and Roarty were charts, the first of which is Exhibit P17, showing the corporate history of Janssen US, and Exhibit P38, providing an overview of the Levaquin supply chain. The evidence, as far as it goes, as shown in those charts was not seriously challenged in cross-examination.

[53] Exhibit P17 shows that Janssen Pharmaceuticals, Inc. merged with Ortho-McNeil Inc. on December 31, 2007, with the merged corporation continuing under the name Ortho-McNeil-Janssen Pharmaceuticals, Inc. That entity changed its name on June 22, 2011 to Janssen Pharmaceuticals, Inc., the current Plaintiff that we call Janssen US.

[54] Exhibit P38 shows that Johnson & Johnson [J&J] is the parent company of Janssen Puerto Rico, Janssen U.S. and Janssen Canada. It shows that Daiichi supplies levofloxacin to Janssen Puerto Rico who manufactures finished levofloxacin tablets in Puerto Rico (Gurabo), and ships them directly to Janssen Canada. However, the paperwork flow showing the sales transactions is one wherein Janssen Puerto Rico sells these tablets to Janssen U.S. who then sells them to Janssen Canada. The price at which Janssen U.S. sells to Janssen Canada is sometimes referred to as the transfer price. Janssen US's claim for damages is based on alleged loss of sales to Janssen Canada at the transfer price less costs such as payments to Janssen Puerto Rico for the product and other expenses.

[55] In addition to the documents I have already referred to, there were introduced into evidence several business records reflecting transactions as to the levofloxacin products within the J&J companies as well as to Janssen Canada customers. Many of these were excerpted from a system called SAP which is a vast computerized programme into which data such as sales and transfer of products can be entered, stored and excerpted. This data does not reflect information such as where title to the product may pass.

[56] Copies of some invoices and the like were entered into evidence such as Exhibit P37 through the witness Lindsey Villacis, an executive with Janssen Supply Group in New Jersey. Neither she, nor any other fact or expert witness, could advise the Court as to when and where title passed in respect of the levofloxacin product. I provide an excerpt of Ms. Villacis' cross-examination at page 853 of the transcript:

> Q. When you speak of title passing in Gurabo, that is the title passing to Janssen Canada in Gurabo?

A. I can't speak to which specific legal entity that it passes at the point of shipping, but I can speak to the fact that financial ownership changes at the end of the month. At the time, Janssen-Ortho Inc. owns the product.

Q. It is just the finances you can speak to, not so much telling this court where title passes?

A. True. Yes.

Q. You can't tell me at what point in the process title moved from one party to another, from LEVAQUIN going from Puerto Rico to Canada?

A. I cannot tell you that. I can tell you that it starts in Gurabo, and at the end of the process, it ends with Janssen-Ortho Inc.

[57] Fernandini, an executive with Janssen Puerto Rico, at pages 886 to 888 of his cross-examination, said:

Q. You don't know who had title to the product at any point?

A. Title of the product, when this is Janssen-Ortho LLC, we have the burden of the risk of having that API in Gurabo. If material is rejected or damaged, Janssen-Ortho was responsible for the material.

Q. They also had title to the finished product there in Gurabo?

A. Once it is in Gurabo, it is Gurabo inventory.

Q. When they put it on the plane to ship it to Canada, the title-

A. Depending on the terms and conditions, I don't remember. We need to see the terms and conditions.

Q. You can't tell me who has title after?

A. No. It is in transit. It depends on the terms.

Q. You don't know if it had an impact on the title?

A. But the title was Janssen-Ortho. All the time, it was Janssen-Ortho LLC.

Q. When you told me that Janssen-Ortho LLC had title to the product in Puerto Rico, it had title at least until it was put on the plane to go to Canada?

A. Yes.

[58] Roarty, an executive with Johnson & Johnson, in cross-examination said at pages 910 to 911:

Q. At the time LEVAQUIN – you understand LEVAQUIN was manufactured in Puerto Rico?

A. Yes.

Q. At the time LEVAQUIN was shipped out the door and put on a plane, it was not owned by Janssen Pharmaceuticals Inc. or any previous incarnation of Janssen Pharmaceutical Inc.; right?

A. I don't believe so. It would have been owned by either OMJ Pharmaceuticals or Janssen-Ortho LLC, depending on when.

Q. They would have owned it as it got onto the plane, and at some point later possibly, the SAP entry is entered into the system?

A. I never was involved in those transaction[s]. I don't know the exact sequence or when title passed or things like that.

Q. It was owned by Janssen-Ortho LLC or OMJ Pharmaceuticals Inc. while it is in transit, and then it lands in Canada?

A. I am not sure who owned it while it is in transit.

Q. You can only tell me who owned it when it got on the plane?

A. I believe it would have been owned by the manufacturer.

Q. Who is Janssen-Ortho LLC?

A. Correct.

Q. That is true in the period of 2005 to 2006, etc.?

A. After 2006, I believe, it was Janssen-Ortho LLC. Prior to that, it was OMJ Pharmaceuticals.

Q. You wouldn't be able to tell me who owned the LEVAQUIN when the plane landed in Canada?

A. I am not sure if it was owned by Canada at that point or the U.S. or Puerto Rico.

Q. That is because you just don't know?

A. That is correct.

[59] Teva argues that Janssen US cannot be a person "claiming under" the patentee, Daiichi, since there is no clear evidence that Janssen US "used" the patented invention in Canada. Teva argues that Janssen US bears the burden of demonstrating that it had, even if for a moment, title to the levofloxacin containing tablets in Canada whereby, save for a licence from Daiichi, it would be infringing on the 080 Patent. Teva argues that the evidence falls far short of proving, even on a civil burden, that Janssen US had title to the tablets in Canada, hence "used" the invention in Canada.

[60] Janssen argues that it is unnecessary to show that Janssen US "used" the invention in Canada whether by having title to the tablets in Canada or otherwise. It is sufficient, Janssen argues, to demonstrate that Janssen US was part of the chain whereby the tablets flowed through the licence from Daiichi to J&J through unwritten licences, to Janssen Puerto Rico, then to Janssen US and finally, to Janssen Canada; it was part of a chain licensed, not in writing, but by implication and acquiescence, by Daiichi.

[61] In my determination, Janssen's argument is consistent with the state of the law as it exists in Canada, at least at the level of this Court, today. Janssen US has proven to my satisfaction that it has the licence or permission, by acquiescence, of Daiichi, to be involved in the chain of the sale of tablets made in Puerto Rico by Janssen Puerto Rico, through Janssen US to Janssen Canada. It is immaterial whether Janssen US had title, even momentarily, to the tablets in Canada.

[62] The matter was faced squarely by Polowin J. of the Ontario Superior Court in Roche Palo Alto LLC v Apotex Inc. (2005), 44 C.P.R. (4th) 431. She wrote at paragraph 37:

> 37 Subsection 55(1) of the Patent Act sets out no geographical restriction. Further, the Signalisation case, supra, supports that the court must view broadly those who can claim under a patent. The claim to damages on the part of Allergan Sales and Allergan Ireland arises from the alleged infringement by Apotex of the 614 Patent which is a Canadian patent. The elements of the cause of action of patent infringement are set out in the Statement of Claim. Allergan Ireland has been the exclusive manufacturer of ketorolac ophthalmic products under the 614 Patent sold to Allergan Canada for sale in Canada. Allergan Sales is the licensor of technical know-how to Allergan Ireland with respect to these products and has entered into a royalty agreement in this regard. As such, both Allergan Sales and Allergan Ireland allege that they have been damaged by the infringement of the 614 Patent.

[63] While not binding upon me, I agree with the interpretation given by that Court, of section 55(1) of the Patent Act and the Signalisation case.

[64] The case of AlliedSignal Inc. v DuPont Canada Inc. (1998), 78 C.P.R. (3d) 129 (FCTD) (aff'd 86 C.P.R. (3d) 324 (FCA)), demonstrates the Canadian Patent Act permits recovery of damages in respect of activity outside Canada. A United States patentee selling to customers in the United States could recover damages for loss of sales where a Canadian infringer sold Canadian made product to United States customers. Heald D.J., in determining a reference to damages, wrote at paragraph 33:

> 33 In conclusion, the right to claim lost profits is not circumscribed by the territorial limitations of the Patent Act to profits made on sales within Canada. The patentee has a right to be compensated for all damages flowing from the infringement of the patent within Canada, which may include profits lost on sales outside Canada. Furthermore, lost profits are merely a useful measure to help determine an appropriate and fair level of compensation. In the case at bar, the plaintiff is entitled to lost profits on those sales, whether in Canada or the United States, that it proves it would have made but for the presence of the defendant's DARTEK (R) film in the market.

[65] The decision of Justice Reed in Kirin Amgen, previously referred to, while not specifically addressing the point, came to the same result in allowing a US corporation that was part of the J&J chain of companies engaged in the manufacture and sale of goods, to participate in a claim for damages without specifically demonstrating that it had title to the product, even for a moment, in Canada.

[66] I also rely on the decision of the Federal Court of Appeal in Apotex Inc. v Wellcome Foundation Ltd., previously referred to, where Rothstein J.A. wrote that since the patentee and the person "claiming under" were before the Court both urging that the person had status, the Court would not deny that status. The present case is different in that the patentee, Daiichi, has not actually participated in this proceeding. Nonetheless, Daiichi clearly knows of this proceeding and has taken no steps to object to the status of Janssen US.

[67] I distinguish the decision of Justice Snider in Les Laboratories Servier, supra, in that she found particularly at paragraph 81 that each of the foreign entities had to own a sphere of operation and its own responsibilities within Group Servier, thus those entities not operating in a Canadian sphere could not be considered as persons "claiming under" the patentee. In the case before me, the J&J group of companies are operating as a team whereby licensed tablets ultimately found their way to Canada.

[68] Thus I conclude that, in the circumstances of this case, Janssen US is a person "claiming under" the patentee, Daiichi, for the purposes of having standing to claim damages for infringement by Teva of the 080 Patent in these proceedings.

IX. ISSUE NO. 2 – QUANTUM OF DAMAGES

a) Quantifying Damages Generally

[69] The quantification of general damages by a Court is said to be the exercise of a sound imagination and the practice of a broad axe in seeking to restore a plaintiff by monetary means to the condition that it would have been had the infringement not occurred. The words of Lord Shaw in Watson, Laidlaw & Co. Ltd. v Pott Cassels, and Williamson (1914), 31 R.P.C. 104 over a hundred years ago are still appropriate today. He wrote at pages 117 to 118:

> In my opinion, the case does raise sharply an important question as to the assessment of damages in patent cases, and with that question I proceed to deal. It is probably a mistake in language to treat the methods usually adopted in ascertaining the measure of damages in patent cases as principles. They are the practical working rules which have seemed helpful to Judges in arriving at a true estimate of the compensation which ought to be awarded > against an infringer to a patentee. In the case of damages in general, there is one principle which does underlie the assessment. It is what may be called that of restoration. The idea is to restore the person who has sustained injury and loss to the condition in which he would have been had he not so sustained it. In the cases of financial loss, injury to trade, and the like, caused either by breach of contract or by tort, the loss is capable of correct appreciation in stated figures. In a second class, of cases, restoration being in point of fact difficult, as in the case of loss of reputation, or impossible, as in the case of loss of life, faculty, or limb, the task of restoration under the name of compensation calls into play inference, conjecture, and the like. This is necessarily accompanied by those deficiencies which attach to the conversion into money of certain elements which are very real, which go to make up the happiness and usefulness of life, but which were never so converted or measured. The restoration by way of compensation is therefore accomplished to a large extent by the exercise of a sound imagination and the practice of the broad axe. It is in such cases, my Lords, whether the result has been attained by the verdict of a jury or the finding of a single Judge, that the greatest weight attaches to the decision of the Court of first instance. The reasons for this are not far to seek-such as the value of testimony at firsthand, down to even the nuances of its expression, and they include, of course, the attitude and demeanour of the witnesses themselves. In all these cases, however, the attempt which justice makes is to get back to the status quo ante in fact, or to reach imaginatively, by the process of compensation, a result in which the same principle is followed. In Patent cases the principle of restoration is in all instances to some extent, and in many instances to the entire extent dependent upon the same principle of restoration.

[70] Reference to the principle of a broad axe as expressed by Lord Shaw in Watson, Laidlaw was made by Kerwin J. of the Supreme Court of Canada in Colonial Fastener Co. Ltd. v Lightning Fastener Co. Ltd., [1937] SCR 36 at page 44.

[71] A similar thought was expressed by Lord Buckley in Meters Ltd. v Metropolitan Gas Meters Ltd (1911), 28 RPC 157 (Eng CA) at page 161:

> Therefore, in a case such as the present, where licences are not granted to anyone who asks for them for a fixed sum, it is a matter which is to be dealt with in the rough-doing the best one can, not attempting or professing to be minutely accurate-having regard to all the circumstances of the case, and saying what upon the whole is the fair thing to be done.

b) Facts, Assumptions and Fun with Numbers

[72] Many of the underlying facts including numbers have been agreed upon between the parties. The application of those facts in arriving at a reasonable calculation of damages by the parties creates a difference as much as tenfold. Janssen asserts that it is owed up to eight figures in dollars in damages; Teva argues that it saved Janssen seven figures in dollars. Much depends on the assumptions made and applied by the experts put forward by the parties.

[73] Given certain assumptions, the application to agreed facts and numbers can lead to remarkable differences. An illustration is given in Dr. Rosenblatt's Reply Report, Trial Exhibit P6 at paragraphs 7 and 8 where graphs are presented which illustrate, in Figure 1, how it can be seen that sales of levofloxacin were rising over a period whereas, in Figure 2, it seems that sales are declining. The difference is slight but the results are significantly different. The Figures each show a "trend line" generated by a computer for sales over a certain number of years. Figure 1 is for the period 1/2000 to 11/2004 whereas Figure 2 is for the period of 1/2001 to 11/2004; in other words, Figure 2 starts a year later than Figure 1.

c) Positions and Concessions

[74] Prior to and during trial, the parties took certain positions and made certain concessions worthy of note, some of which are mentioned elsewhere in these Reasons. The following are of note:

1. Janssen Puerto Rico, the Plaintiffs Janssen-Ortho LLC and OMJ collectively in Action No. T-2056-11, have withdrawn any claim for damages. They remain as Plaintiffs in that action only because, as the matter approached trial, it was too late to remove them. As a practical matter, Janssen US, that is Janssen Pharmaceuticals, Inc., is the only actively participating Plaintiff in that action;
2. Janssen US is not claiming damages for any period prior to December 19, 2005 but is claiming for a period up to December 31, 2010 notwithstanding that the 080 Patent expired June 23, 2009;
3. Janssen Canada, a Plaintiff in Action No. T-2175-04, is seeking damages for the period December 1, 2004 to December 31, 2010;
4. Teva sold 250 mg and 500 mg strength levofloxacin tablets in Canada. It never sold 750 mg strength;
5. Sales of Teva's 250 mg strength levofloxacin tablets are to be considered, for damage purposes, on a one-for-one substitution basis with Janssen's LEVAQUIN 250 mg strength tablets;
6. Daiichi's claim for damages has been satisfied and it played no active part in these proceedings;
7. Following the injunction that I granted on October 17, 2006, Teva took advantage of the thirty (30) day sell off period that I permitted, and made a payment to Janssen in that respect. The parties have all deducted that payment in the submissions in respect of damages.

d) The Marketplace as it Existed in Fact

[75] There was a debate between the experts as to how to define the relevant marketplace. I will begin by speaking in broad terms. We are speaking of drugs used as antibiotics in the treatment of infection, particularly respiratory tract infections (RTI's) and to some degree, urinary tract infections (UTI's).

[76] In the 1950's, a class of drugs known as macrolides were developed for the treatment of several bacterial infections. The quinolone class of macrolides developed in the 1950's was a particularly significant class which proved effective against bacteria defined as gram-negative; however, quinolones were not found to be effective against other types of bacteria known as gram-positive.

[77] In the 1980's, certain types of quinolones known as fluoroquinolones were developed; among the most popular was ciprofloxacin or CIPRO. This drug however proved to be effective only in respect of a particular group of patients infected with particular gram-negative bacteria. Nonetheless, CIPRO continues to be used by doctors in treating patients to this day including the use of a variant known as CIPRO XL.

[78] Also introduced in the 1990's for the treatment of RTI's, were drugs known as ZITHROMAX (azithromycin) and BIAXIN (clarithromycin), a later version of which was introduced as BAIXIN XL. These drugs, particularly BIAXIN XL, continue in use to this day.

[79] In the late 1990's, a particular group of fluoroquinolones were introduced known as respiratory fluoroquinolones. The first of these was levofloxacin (LEVAQUIN) which is the subject of these proceedings. Others coming later were moxifloxacin (AVELOX) and gatifloxacin (TEQUIN). Other fluoroquinolones were introduced into the marketplace but were short-lived and play no role in the considerations in these proceedings.

[80] Janssen Canada launched its LEVAQUIN in Canada in late 1997 or early 1998. It was available in tablets of 250 mg and 500 mg strength, as well as intravenous (IV) formulations which IV formulations form no part of these proceedings. The 500 mg tablets were used to treat RTI's and the 250 mg tablets were used to treat UTI's.

[81] AVELOX (moxifloxacin), a product competitive in the marketplace with LEVAQUIN, was introduced in late 2000 and continues in use to this day. In the period from 2000 to 2010, there were no generic versions of this drug in the Canadian marketplace.

[82] TEQUIN (gatifloxacin), another product competitive in the marketplace with LEVOQUIN, was introduced in late 2001. Concerns as to the safety of this product began to emerge in 2004, and it was ultimately withdrawn in June 2006. There was no generic version of this product.

[83] On or about November 29, 2004, Teva launched its generic version of LEVAQUIN under the name Novo-levofloxacin in 250 mg and 500 mg strength tablets. It withdrew from the market by reason of the injunction granted by this Court on October 17, 2006 subject to the thirty

(30) day sell-off previously discussed. This was the only generic levofloxacin product on the marketplace until after the expiry of the 080 Patent.

[84] In about early 2003, Janssen Canada introduced LEVAQUIN tablets in 750 mg strength which it continued to sell at least until the end of 2010. Teva did not market a tablet of that strength during the relevant period nor did any other competitor of Janssen.

[85] The customers of levofloxacin and other antibiotics have been gathered into two or perhaps three groups in the evidence. One group is direct sales to hospitals; another group is called retail that is sales directly or indirectly to drug stores and the like. A third group includes government and educational groups whose classification is subject to some dispute in these proceedings.

[86] I provide by way of illustration graphs prepared by experts from each of the parties showing the number of prescriptions written for some these drugs. The graph prepared by Rosenblatt, a Janssen expert, illustrates the total respiratory fluoroquinolone market and breaks out sales of levofloxacin (brand and generic), moxifloxacin (AVELOX) and gatifloxacin (TEQUIN) over the period from 2000 to 2010.

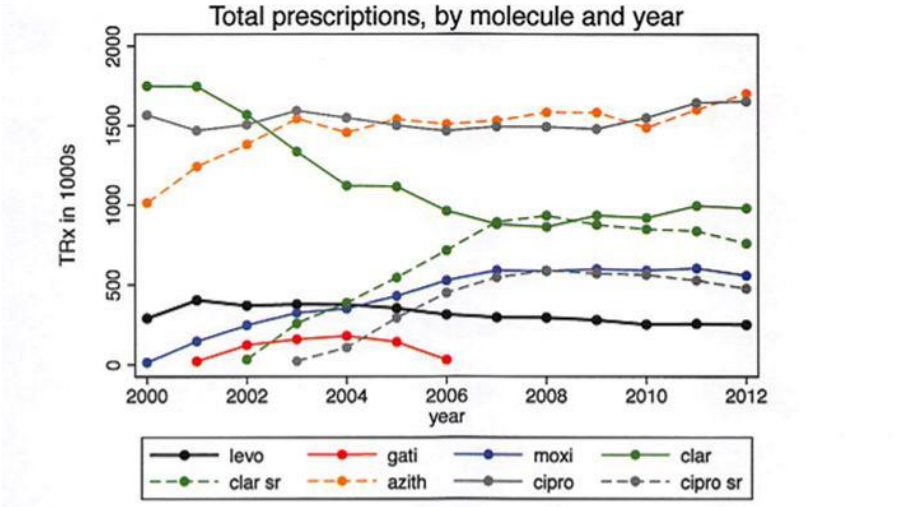
[87] The graph prepared by Dr. Grootendorst, a Teva expert, includes, in addition, other drugs including ciprofloxacin (CIPRO) and clarithromycin (BIAXIN) and extends the time period to 2012.



source IMS Compuscript
Note: levo = levofloxacin, gati = gatifloxacin, moxi = moxifloxacin, clar = regular release formulation of clarithromycin, clar sr = sustained release formulation of clarithromycin, azith = azithromycin, cipro = regular release formulation of ciprofloxacin, cipro sr = sustained release formulation of ciprofloxacin.

[88] While there were some disputes concerning these graphs, they are sufficient to illustrate that the number of prescriptions for levofloxacin (Janssen plus Teva) declined since about 2004, that gatifloxacin declined since 2004 and disappeared in 2006, and that moxifloxacin gained from 2000 to 2006, and then levelled off. The market for other drugs such ciprofloxacin and clarithromycin remained strong.

e) Scenarios

[89] Janssen, through its expert witness, Dr. Rosenblatt, presented two scenarios as to what might have happened in the marketplace "but for" the entry of Teva's generic levofloxacin product. He called them Scenario A and Scenario B which he described at paragraphs 51(a) of Report, Exhibit P5, as follows:

> 51. In the paragraphs that follow I provide But For prescription volume estimates based on two different market scenarios. The major assumption common to both scenarios is that the total number of prescriptions in the Damages Period in the Levofloxacin Competitive Market does not change from what actually occurred during this time period. The two scenarios are defined below:
>
> 51(a) The two "But For" Scenarios are:
> > 51a(i) Scenario A – For this scenario I have assumed that LEVAQUIN®, by virtue of having sales efforts at levels similar to those in the period immediately preceding the Damages Period, would have captured 51.8% of the actual combined levofloxacin (500mg and 750mg strength) and AVELOX® market. As of December 2004, at the start of the Damages Period, the LEVAQUIN® share of the combined levofloxacin (500mg & 750mg) and AVELOX® market was 51.8%. I believe this is the most likely scenario.

> 51a(ii) Scenario B – For this scenario I have been asked to assume that LEVAQUIN®, would have maintained pre-Damages Period selling efforts and all other market factors would have remained stable. In other words, I have been asked to ignore actual prescription data for TEQUIN® and AVELOX®. A statistical forecast model (exponential smoothing, detailed in Schedule E) estimates that the average level of prescription volume between 2000 and 2004 would have occurred between 2005 and 2010; this is a very conservative scenario and assumes no growth at all for the levofloxacin molecule, even with continued promotion. I do not believe this is a likely scenario.
> [Emphasis in the original]

[90] Teva, through its witness Mak, presented six different scenarios as set out in paragraph 7 of his Sur-Reply Report, Exhibit D47:

> 7. I have revised my calculations as explained herein. The results of the economic loss scenarios that I have considered are summarized as follows:
>
> Scenario 1: Lost volumes based upon Teva's ex factory sales, with alternative assumptions regarding advertising and promotion ("A&P") expenses and loss periods for price erosion. Estimated losses (net benefit), with prejudgment interest, range from $[redacted] to $[redacted], after deducting the $[redacted] that Teva has already paid to Janssen Canada.
>
> Scenario 2: Same as Scenario 1, but lost volumes for 500mg tablets are based on TRx (dispensed prescription) data. Estimated losses (net benefit), with prejudgment interest, range from $[redacted] to $[redacted], after deducting the $[redacted] that Teva has already paid to Janssen Canada.
>
> Scenario 2.1: Same as Scenario 2, but lost volumes for 500mg tablets are based on ex factory volumes recognized according to the months in which TRx is sold (dispensed prescription). Estimated losses (net benefit), with prejudgment interest, range from $[redacted] to $[redacted], after deducting the $[redacted] that Teva has already paid to Janssen Canada.
> Scenario 3: Based upon Scenario A of the CHS Report, but adjusted for corrected TRx volumes and with alternative > assumptions regarding A&P expenses and loss periods for price erosion. No permanent loss of market share is assumed for the LEVO 2 plaintiffs. Estimated losses (net benefit), with prejudgment interest, range from $[redacted] to $[redacted], after deducting the $[redacted] that Teva has already paid to Janssen Canada.

>
> Scenario 4: Same as Scenario 3, but permanent loss of market share is assumed for the LEVO 2 plaintiffs. Estimated losses (net benefit), with prejudgment interest, range from $[redacted] to $[redacted], after deducting the $[redacted] that Teva has already paid to Janssen Canada.
>
> Scenario 5: Based upon Scenario B of the CHS Report, with the same adjustments made in Scenario 3. Estimated losses (net benefit), with prejudgment interest, range from $[redacted] to $[redacted], after deducting the $[redacted] that Teva has already paid to Janssen Canada.
>
> Scenario 6: Same as Scenario 5, but permanent loss of market share is assumed for the LEVO 2 plaintiffs. Estimated losses (net benefit), with prejudgment interest, range from $[redacted] to $[redacted], after deducting the $[redacted] that Teva has already paid to Janssen Canada.

f) The "But for" Marketplace

[91] The Court must engage in an attempt to reconstruct what would have been the sales of Janssen's LEVAQUIN tablets in the Canadian marketplace "but for" the entry, for a period, by Teva with a generic Levaquin product.

[92] Janssen's expert, Cohen, considered the two scenarios presented by Dr. Rosenblatt; Scenario A and B, and endeavoured to recreate the marketplace in the "but for" world, and arrive at a calculation of damages suffered by each of Janssen Canada and Janssen US. He also prepared a Scenario C which served to illustrate some of his rebuttal to Teva's expert, Mak. Scenario C may be disregarded as any attempt by Janssen to put forth its damage claim; only Scenarios A and B need to be considered for that purpose. The following is a chart setting out these various scenarios and the claim made for damages:

[redacted]

[93] Teva's expert, Mak, presented six scenarios based on the assumptions he was given by a number of Teva witnesses including Dr. Simor, Dr. Grootendorst and Dr. Katsanis. He prepared charts setting out a number of scenarios based on several different assumptions. I set out his Scenario 1 as an illustration:

[redacted]

[94] The differences between the scenarios presented by the experts are greater than might have been expected. For instance, Janssen postulates damages of $[redacted] dollars in one of its scenarios whereas Teva postulates that Janssen actually saved some $[redacted] in one of its scenarios.

[95] At the end of his examination and cross-examination, I put the following questions to Teva's expert, Mak, and received the following answers at pages 1010 and 1011 of the trial transcript:

> JUSTICE HUGHES: I will ask some questions of the witness. Mr. Mak, I am looking at the various scenarios, but I take it that they culminate in Exhibit D-48 in terms of various adjustments you made, having a look at the opinions of others, and so forth.
>
> THE WITNESS: That is correct.
>
> JUSTICE HUGHES: Looking at tab C of Exhibit D-48, am I correct in concluding that, in terms of a grand total, you say that as a result of Teva being on the marketplace the plaintiffs, Janssen and others, are ahead by $4 million?

THE WITNESS: Yes. As a result of Teva being on the marketplace and not spending -

JUSTICE HUGHES: They would be better off if the generic came in even earlier. They would have more money in pocket. Is that what you are saying?

THE WITNESS: Possibly if they were able to avoid this additional spending.

JUSTICE HUGHES: When I take a look at Mr. Cohen's analysis, for instance, P-9. I don't know if you have it in front of you, but you may want to get P-9 in front of him. It is his reply report, and he takes into account various things.

If you turn to page 4, he has a chart. We will forget about pre-judgment interest. He has scenarios. The one he prefers is the one that results in a profit loss, that is Janssen is out of pocket almost $20 million. Is that right.

THE WITNESS: That is right.

JUSTICE HUGHES: I am having trouble getting my head around the fact that you say Janssen actually benefited by Teva being in the marketplace by over $4 million and Mr. Cohen saying there was a loss of almost $20 million. What is the biggest difference or differences between the two of you?

THE WITNESS: The lost volumes. The biggest difference or source difference in terms of dollars has to do with how we each defined lost volumes. Whether you accept that [h]as being Teva's volumes as in my scenarios or the levofloxacin competitive market as in Mr. Cohen and Dr. Rosenblatt's scenarios.

[96] In argument, Counsel addressed a number of factors that they said contributed to the differences in the scenarios presented by the experts as a quantification of damages.

i) What Would Have Been the Normal Course of Events

[97] In the ideal marketing world, a drug company would introduce a new product and promote it heavily, largely through visits by sales representatives to doctors, hospitals and others, in order to acquaint potential buyers and prescribers as to the benefits of the drug. This phase would be followed by a maintenance phase where promotion such as this would continue but at a more moderate pace. The last phase would be the harvest phase where the life of the patent protection would be nearing an end; promotion would lessen to reduce costs and maximize profits.

[98] John Stewart explained this marketing strategy in his direct examination:

> Q. I would like to move into a new area. I want to talk to you about a life cycle of a patented drug at Janssen. How does Janssen structure the promotional efforts for a patented product?
>
> A. How do we – over the life cycle?
>
>
> A. There are four phases typical to product development and promotion. It begins with the pre-launch phase where the workup is done to develop the overall strategy and tactics and complete understanding of the marketplace. Once we receive approval from Health Canada, we shift into the growth phase. This is where we apply a lot of investment to accelerate the growth of the brand.
>
> At a certain point in time – very individual to the brands – we hit what we call a peak share. Our share has been maximized and starts to level off. We shift into what we call a maintenance phase where the question we are answering is: What resources do we need to put against the brand to hold that level of market share or that level of sales?
>
> That carries through to the end of our patent life where we go into the harvest stage which is four to six months before the patent expires. We take all resources off it to maximize our profitability.

Q. Let me back up a little bit and have you explain in a little more detail. Tell me what happens during the pre-launch phase. When does it begin, and what work is done?

A. One year or two years in advance of the anticipated approval by Health Canada, we invest in a marketing director, sometimes a product director or sometimes a product manager as well. Their role is to completely dig into the marketplace and understand what is it had size of the market, who are the competitors, what are the issues in the marketplace, where will our brand fit in, develop the strategies and tactics, make recommendations on sales force size, what programs are needed, etc. – everything that is going to get us to the point that, at approval, we are ready to launch this product.

Q. On approval, what happens next?

A. At approval, we will launch the product at a sales meeting. The representatives have their goals objectives set and they go. It is a heavy invest on both the dollars and manpower to accelerate the growth. Oftentimes, those investments exceed the revenue coming in and that is by design to make sure we move up as fast as we can to that peak share.

Q. On approval, what is that phase of growth called?

A. That is the growth phase.

Q. How long does a growth phase typically last?

A. It can depend. It can be three years. It can be five years. It depends on the brand, the market circumstances, etc. There is no standard prediction as to what that might look like.

Q. How does Janssen decide when the growth phase is going to come to an end?

A. Essentially, it is when you look at the growth curve in terms of the sales revenue or the market share or both. When that starts to level out or slow down where the investment isn't driving incremental growth, the decision is made or the question is asked – we have spent a lot of money and lost a lot of money throughout that growth period. The question is asked: What resources can we apply against it, a reduced amount of resources to hold that level of revenue through to the end of the life cycle?

Q. What do you do with the human resources who were involved in promotion during the growth phase? Are they still necessarily in the maintenance phase?

A. There are resources necessarily in the maintenance phase. You need sales representatives and promotion dollars but to a lot smaller scale.

Q. What type of sales and marketing efforts are undertaken during the maintenance phase?

A. Essentially, in the maintenance phase, the physician are completely aware of your brand. They have utilized it. There isn't a lot of information they need to put in front to make them – to feel comfortable prescribing it. They have built these habits, and they are continuing to prescribe.

Essentially there are core selling materials just to reinforce the advantages of our brand. There are samples because clinicians like to have samples to trial the product with patients sometimes, patient support materials, that kind of thing.

Q. You mentioned earlier that the fourth phase was called the harvest phase. Can you tell us about the harvest phase?

A. It is quite straightforward. It is when the decision is made that we are going to pull all resources off the brand. As the word denotes, we are going to harvest the profit there. At the end of the day, we look at the brand over its entire life cycle, and hopefully, we have generated a positive ROI across the entire life cycle.

Q. When does the life cycle typically end?

A. It ends at your patent expiration.

Q. How is a decision made to move from maintenance to harvest?

A. General timing is maybe four to six months in advance.

Q. In advance of what?

A. Sorry. In advance of the patent expiration. If there are opportunity to move people to new opportunities, new growth opportunities, it may be six month or four months. Generally, as we approach the end of the patent life, we are making those decisions.

> Q. Still in a general sense, what effect, if any, does genericization have on the planned life cycle of a Janssen drug?
>
> A. It means you immediately go into the harvest phase since you are going to cut off all your investment in the brand.
>
> Q. Why do you do that?
>
> A. The erosion model of your business once a generic to launch is well established. Within 12 month, you may have 10 to 20 percent of your revenue left. Any incremental investment you are putting in during that phase is doing nothing but actually driving demand for the generic version.
>
> Q. Do you change the amount of human resources on a project?
>
> A. Absolutely. We cancel all the spending. We will redeploy people to other roles in the organization. Hopefully, we can do that versus the other which would be having to terminate people.

ii) Competition – Other Molecules

[99] Janssen's levofloxacin product LEVAQUIN was the first respiratory fluoroquinolone to be introduced into the Canadian market and for a period of time, had that particular market to itself subject to different existing non-respiratory fluoroquinolones such as CIPRO. A year or two later, other products, also respiratory fluoroquinolones but different molecules, came into the market, moxifloxacin (AVELOX) and gatifloxacin (TEQUIN). Janssen had to fight for market share of this particular market which it did on the terms of its "proven safety record".

[100] John Stewart explained this at pages 674 and 675 of the trial transcript:

> Q. When moxifloxacin and gatifloxacin entered the market, did that change the way that Janssen promoted LEVAQUIN?

> A. Yes, in terms of now we have two people vying for the fluoroquinolone decision, but it did not change our focus which was to display the macrolides in the treatments paradigm for those higher risk patients.
>
> Q. How did Janssen position LEVAQUIN versus the other fluoroquinolones?
>
> A. In the early going, it is not our position to immediately start attacking the other fluoroquinolones. It is their job to say why they are superior to LEVAQUIN. When the conversation came up, the products were more alike than they were different.
>
> They were all highly effective, but the two things that stood out for us was our safety record for LEVAQUIN – moxifloxacin had QT prolongation which is a heart-arrhythmia type side effect that is not a good thing, and gatifloxacin had issues with hyper- and hypoglycemia so glucose fluctuations which are not good either. We differentiated based on the proven safety record of LEVAQUIN.

iii) Disruptions in the Market

[101] In the time period of 2004 to 2006, there were two disruptions experienced in the fluoroquinolone market. One was the disappearance of gatifloxacin (TEQUIN) due to safety concerns. The other was the introduction by Teva of its generic levofloxacin and subsequent removal of that product by reason of this Court's injunction. The issue before the Court now is, if Teva's generic had not been in market, what would Janssen's sales, and therefore profits, have been.

[102] When Teva's generic levofloxacin entered the market, Janssen's promotion of its LEVAQUIN tablets essentially stopped, as explained by John Stewart, transcript pages 694 to 698; why promote a product when the competition will get the greatest share of the market?

[103] When TEQUIN was withdrawn, it is clear that AVELOX, which was being promoted by its drug company (Bayer), gained a share of the TEQUIN market. Would LEVAQUIN also have gained a share of that market and in which proportion? Would doctors or hospitals abandon the respiratory fluoroquinolone class of drugs entirely and go to other drugs such as CIPRO or BIAXIN?

g) Findings as to What the "But for" World Would have Been [104] There were a variety of different assumptions that help create the different Scenarios A and B of Rosenblatt and 1 through 6 of Mak, which I will consider in more detail.

[105] There were differences between Drs. Chan and Simor as to what doctors who wrote prescriptions for antibiotics such as LEVAQUIN would have been likely to have done in respect of prescribing that drug, or another in the "but for" world had Teva's generic product not entered the marketplace. Among the matters in controversy were:

- the effect of sales representatives (detail persons) in visiting doctors and promoting the product. Having considered all the evidence, I am satisfied that, in the initial stages of a launch of product, these visits have an effect. Once a product is established, such visits have a lesser effect;
- the habitual or persistence level whereby doctors tend to prescribe what they are familiar with and seems to work best for their patients. I am satisfied that there is a significant effect in this regard;

- the effect of guidelines published for hospitals or doctors as to what should or may be prescribed. I am satisfied that guidelines have an effect but do not create dictatorial terms as to what should be prescribed;
- switching once Tequin disappeared from the market. I am satisfied that most doctors would have switched to levofloxacin or moxifloxacin but some may have switched to other products such as CIPRO or one of the macrolides;
- the relevant comparator market is the respiratory fluoroquinolone class;
- spending on promotion, research and development by Janssen if Teva's generic product had not been present. I am satisfied that promotional spending would have continued but, given that the patent term was nearing an end, the spending would probably have diminished. As to research spending, I prefer Janssen's estimate as Teva puts too much emphasis on an abnormally large spending by Janssen in one year; and
- introduction of Janssen's 750 mg LEVAQUIN tablet probably took sales from its 500 mg tablet but also from AVELOX (moxifloxacin).

[106] Taking all the evidence presented by each of the parties, I am satisfied that Scenario A presented by Janssen's expert witness Rosenblatt best represents what would have happened in the "but for" world. However, I find that there are some changes to be made to some of the assumptions that underlie that scenario; they are changes to the damage period, to hospital sales percentage, and whether educational institute/government sales should be included as hospital sales. I will consider what those changes should be as well as set out what I find to be appropriate assumptions underlying Scenario A.

h) Damage Period

[107] The Plaintiffs Janssen calculated their losses over a period commencing when Teva entered the marketplace in December 2004, until December 2010. The patent expired on June 23, 2009.

[108] Teva, through its expert, Mak, calculated its numbers based on the period Teva was on the market but, in the case of hospital price suppression, included various options varying from the date Janssen regained exclusivity up to a few months after the expiry of the patent in order to deal with fulfillment of contracts.

[109] As Justice Snider held in Merck & Co., Inc. v Apotex Inc., 2013 FC 751 at paragraph in 183, a claimant is entitled to damages sustained after the grant of the patent has expired in respect of losses that were incurred as a result of the infringer's activity during the period when the patent was in force. She wrote:

> [183] There is nothing in the Patent Act that limits damages to those sustained during the life of the patent. Section 55(1) states that the infringer is liable "for all damages sustained by the patentee [or licensee] after the grant of the patent, by reason of the infringement". Merck is entitled to its damages for infringing sales even though those sales actually would take place during the post-expiry period.

[110] In this case, it would be reasonable to presume that some time would extend beyond the date that the patent expired. Prescriptions would have to be filled, contracts complied with, and other existing obligations incurred during a period of price suppression when the patent was in force would have to be fulfilled.

[111] However, I find no reasonable basis in the Record to support an extended date of damages up to December 2010, nor can I find any reasonable basis to find that damages cease upon expiry of the patent or one month thereafter.

[112] Under the circumstances, I must apply the "broad axe" principle and find that losses due to prescription (retail) sales would terminate about two months after the patent expires, that is August 31, 2009, and that hospital losses would terminate about a year after the patent expired, that is as of June 30, 2010.

[113] Teva's expert, Mak, made calculations that included a one-month lag at the beginning of the damages period in considering TRx data, that is, data relating to sales by pharmacies to patients, on the basis that pharmacies keep inventory on hand which would have been sold by Janssen to the pharmacy or wholesaler approximately one month before the pharmacy sold the product to the patient. Because Janssen's losses occur when they sell the tablet and not when the pharmacy sells the tablet, this lag was intended to compensate when using TRx data.

[114] Janssen's expert, Cohen, agrees that there is a lag when you follow the product, but says that prescription sales are a good surrogate for ex-factory sales because they match closely (see Chart 1 on page 11 of his Reply report, Exhibit P9). Even though the same physical tablet is not being sold immediately from the factory to the patient, the numbers match well enough that they can be used for economic modeling. Cohen says there is therefore no need to build this lag into the model even when TRx data is used.

[115] I am persuaded by Cohen's analysis for to say otherwise would be to create a one month window in the middle of Janssen's exclusivity period where they effectively have no sales. Further, because the TRx data matches ex-factory sales closely, it is a reasonable surrogate for the "broad axe" approach.

i) Hospital Sales - Price Suppression

[116] The law is clear that if, due to activities of an infringer, the patentee or person claiming under the patentee had to reduce prices because of the entry into the market of an infringer offering the product at a lower price, a claim for damages can be made for price suppression. As Heald D. J. wrote in AlliedSignal Inc. v Du Pont Canada Inc. (1998), 78 C.P.R. (3d) 129 (FCTD, aff'd 86 CPR (3d)324 (FCA)) at paragraph 23:

> 23 In addition to lost profits due to lost sales, the patentee may also claim lost profits due to price suppression if it can establish that it necessarily reduced its prices because of the competition of the infringer: Colonial Fastener Co. v. Lighting Fastener Co.,12 American Braided Wire Co. v. Thomson.

[117] The evidence is that Janssen Canada reduced its prices to hospitals by [redacted]% when Teva entered the marketplace with its generic levofloxacin, and could not raise them after Teva was forced to withdraw. As Janssen's witness John Stewart said at pages 698 to 699, 703 to 704 and 758 of the trial transcript:

> Q. Did the presence of Novopharm in the market have an effect on Janssen hospital pricing?
>
> A. Yes, to the extent that, once you have lost all your opportunity to partner with the hospitals and specialists, you don't have anything left except a generic strategy. The only thing you have left to try to leverage to try to hold on to your business is lower your price and compete on price.

In [redacted] of 20[redacted], we lowered our hospital prices another [redacted] percent universally across the board so all hospitals had an opportunity to save money because we also had no resources to go out and differentiate between the hospitals on a pricing standpoint. This was a blanket drop in the price as a result.

Q. Before Novo-levofloxacin came to the market, did Janssen intend to lower its hospital prices?

A. There was no plan to implement that 30 percent reduction across the board strategy.

Q. In the period after Novopharm left the market, did that have an effect on Janssen's hospital prices for LEVAQUIN?

A. There was no change to our hospital pricing.

Q. How come?

A. You have established relationships and listings based on the hospital prices that have been offered for the last two years plus. We are not going to rock that boat and change it on these customers. It is not the way we operate.

Q. Your told Mr. Wilcox when he was asking you about the price drops in the hospitals -- pardon me, Mr. Markwell -- that after you had lowered the hospital prices in 2006 when you regained the market, you didn't want to raise them because you didn't want to rock the boat, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. By that, you meant you could alienate customers and they would buy the product from someone else?

A. We were coming into the market with other hospital antiinfectives that was the future of our antiinfective franchise at the time. Why would you want to upset the customer by nickel and diming then on one when you want to come in later then asking them to list enough?

[118] The actual changes to the hospital prices are part of the agreed evidence.

j) Hospital Sales – Diamond, Non-Diamond and Educational Institution/Government

[119] Janssen's claim for damages for price suppression is in respect of "hospital sales". In answer to the question put to Janssen on discovery paraphrased as:

> Advise as to whether there is a claim for damages for price suppression and/or erosion for sales other than Hospital Sales as a result of the market entry of Novo-levofloxacin the answer provided by Counsel in writing was (Trial Exhibit D61):

> There is not. The only claim for damages for price suppression and/or erosion is for hospital sales.

[120] The question is what are "hospital sales"?

[121] The evidence shows that Janssen Canada divided its customers into groups including "Diamond" hospitals (which were the larger or more influential hospitals), "Non-Diamond" hospitals and "Education Institution/Government". The latter was explained by Janssen's representative on discovery, Park (Exhibit D61, questions 3331 to 3333) as follows:

> Q. Okay. And what about "Educational Institute…"
>
> Maybe I will pause.
>
> "Drug Wholesaler", that would not include any sales going to hospitals? Or it could?
>
> A. It could, if there were a smaller hospital that ---
>
> Hospitals can order directly through Janssen or they can go through a wholesaler.

So they can go through either.

Q. Okay.

The next line is "Educational Institution/Government"…

A. Yes. That could have been any Provincial Government or the National Government that make significant purchases for epidemics or for the concern over whatever it is: Anthrax, or whatever.

It looks like there is…

I think I saw something that lined up with that number, "53,722", before.

It was a large Government purchase.

Q. Okay. And then "Hospital".

A. "Hospital" would be those that order directly to Janssen for Levaquin.

[122] The evidence is that Cohen included Educational Institution/Government sales as Non-Diamond hospital sales when determining the hospital price suppression, thus excluding them when calculating the retail price. Mak did not. The difference in the two approaches would benefit Janssen Canada by about $[redacted].

[123] I am concerned that, on discovery, Janssen provided an answer that could be considered to be misleading. No correction or clarification was ever made in respect of that answer. While the answer could be interpreted as somewhat ambiguous, Janssen should have clarified the ambiguity. Even at trial, no effort was made to clarify the answer.

[124] I find that sales to Educational Institute/Government should be excluded from hospital sales with an apparent reduction to Janssen's damage claim of about $300,000.

k) Hospital Sales - Percentage

[125] The evidence shows that hospitals are demanding as to price and generally require, and receive, a discounted price on drugs. By way of example at page 93 of the trial transcript, Dr. Rosenblatt suggested that a tablet sold at five dollars ($5.00) at retail (meaning to wholesalers) would be sold at four dollars ($4.00) per tablet directly to hospitals. However, not all sales that ultimately end up in hospitals are direct sales to hospitals, some hospitals some of the time may purchase from retailers/wholesalers (Rosenblatt, Reply Exhibit P6 paragraph 35, Grootendorst, transcript page 1097, Stewart, transcript page 679). The higher the number of sales made indirectly to hospitals, e.g. through retailers/wholesales, the higher the profit margins to Janssen since the tablets involved would be those sold by Janssen at the higher price to retailers/wholesalers.

[126] Both Dr. Rosenblatt and Dr. Grootendorst, the experts for each of the parties who addressed this issue, agreed that there was no precise way in which to determine the percentage of indirect sales to hospitals. Dr. Rosenblatt used a figure of [redacted]%. Dr. Grootendorst used a figure of [redacted]%. The higher figure would favour Janssen.

[127] Dr. Rosenblatt explained and justified his selection of [redacted]% in his Report (Exhibit P5, paragraph 66) and his Reply (Exhibit P6, paragraph 35) as well as in his examination and cross-examination at trial (transcript pages 90 to 95 and 183). The facts were substantiated by the testimony of John Stewart (transcript page 679) and discovery read-ins (Exhibits D61 and D62).

[128] Dr. Grootendorst relied on a [redacted]% figure in his Report (Exhibit D52, paragraph 170). In cross-examination at trial (trial transcript pages 1096 to 1098), he agreed that he was given this figure by Counsel for Teva and that his own calculations, at least for the year 2004, would yield a figure of about [redacted]%.

[129] In closing argument, Janssen's Counsel agreed that the figure of [redacted]% was high estimate but argued that the [redacted]% estimate put forth by Teva was far too low.

[130] In respect of this issue, I must apply the "broad axe" approach. The median between [redacted]% and [redacted]% is [redacted]% but, on the evidence, a higher figure is more probable as I favour Dr. Rosenblatt's approach more than the approach of Dr. Grootendorst which finds its genesis on a figure given by Counsel.

[131] I find that an appropriate figure to use for these sales to hospitals is [redacted]%.

l) Royalty Paid to Janssen Puerto Rico

[132] Mak debited [redacted]% and [redacted]% royalty expenses paid to one of the Janssen Puerto Rico companies in respect of sales made in the 2006 to 2010 period. These royalties should only be applied when considering the year 2010 as there is no evidence that they were paid in any of the previous years.

X. ISSUE NO. 3 – PRE-JUDGMENT INTEREST

[133] In my previous Judgment in Court File No. T-2175-04 at paragraph 5, I awarded the Plaintiffs, Janssen Canada and Daiichi pre-judgement interest, not compounded, at the average established bank rate. That Judgment was not varied on appeal and is binding upon Janssen Canada.

[134] Janssen US argues that, if it can establish that it lost profits as a result of the infringement, and that those profits would have generated income on a regular basis over the period of deprivation, then it has also sustained the damage of that lost income on those profits; exact proof of how those lost profits would have been used is not required. It relies on the decision of Justice Zinn of this Court in Eli Lilly and Company v Apotex Inc., 2014 FC 1254, particularly at paragraphs 115 to 119 where he wrote:

> [115] In conclusion Apotex has taken a far too narrow view of the judgment in Bank of America. It is true that the Supreme Court of Canada stated that "equity has been recognized as one right by which interest may be awarded other than as specifically stated" in the relevant court's statute, and that "the common law right in contract law to be awarded expectation damages is another such right;" however, the Supreme Court did not state that these were the only other "rights" available to support an award of compound interest.
> [116] Interest may be payable by a right under another statutory provision. Justice Gauthier implicitly recognized this when she wrote that Lilly could be awarded compound prejudgment interest "as an element of compensation." The source for "compensation" is subsection 55(1) of the Patent Act which provides that the infringer is liable to the patentee "for all damage sustained" by reason of the infringement. If the patentee can establish that it lost profits as a result of the infringement and that those profits would have generated income on a regular basis over the period of deprivation of those profits, then the patentee has also sustained the damage of the lost income from those profits.

[117] Apotex submits that Lilly has failed to prove any such loss. It has failed to prove that it would have invested the lost profits and reinvested any income from it or that it would have paid down existing debt.

[118] In my view, the patentee is not required to prove exactly what use it would have made of the profit it has lost as a result of the infringer's actions. This is after all, a hypothetical scenario because it did not have the funds in hand. I subscribe to the view expressed by S. M. Waddams in The Law of Damages (3rd ed 1997), at 437, cited at para 37 of Bank of America:

> [T]here seems in principle no reason why compound interest should not be awarded. Had prompt recompense been made at the date of the wrong the plaintiff would have had a capital sum to invest; the plaintiff would have received interest on it at regular intervals and would have invested those sums also. By the same token the defendant will have had the benefit of compound interest.

I would go further and say that in today's world there is a presumption that a plaintiff would have generated compound interest on the funds otherwise owed to it and also that the defendant did so during the period in which it withheld the funds.

[119] Apotex argues that an award of compound interest will over compensate Lilly because it permits pre-tax dollars to be compounded rather than after-tax dollars. It says that "an award of simple interest obviates the need to take such tax considerations – which considerations may be quite complex – into account and permits a more facile calculation." The ease of calculation is not a relevant consideration in determining damages. Other than to state that the calculation may result in some windfall to the patentee, Apotex has offered no evidence to support any informed reduction in the award of compound interest over the 12 years period under consideration. Any discounting of compound interest by the court on this record would be nothing more than mere speculation. In any event, while the failure to consider that interest would have been earned on after-tax dollars may generate a higher award to Lilly, this is off-set in whole or part by the fact compound interest does not precisely account for the three factors the Supreme Court identified for the depreciation of the value of money: (i) opportunity cost, (ii) risk, and (iii) inflation.

[135] That decision is currently under appeal. I do note that the decision was that plaintiff in that case was awarded compound interest and not the profits that it alleged would have been generated.

[136] Janssen US relies on the evidence of Smith in direct examination at pages 448 to 449 of the transcript. I repeat that portion of his evidence:

> Q. I have a few questions to ask you. It is about financial issues at Ortho-McNeil. Did you have any financial accountability at Ortho-McNeil for Ortho-McNeil-Janssen Pharmaceuticals?
>
> A. Sure. I was accountable for the commercial profit and loss statement for the business. So yes.
>
> Q. If those companies had extra profits would you have left that extra profit to sit in a bank to earn interest at a bank rate?
>
> A. No. For sure not. It is still true today. It was true then. We never have enough resource to take advantage of all the opportunities that we have. We are always prioritizing things we invest in. We don't have enough money in all the things that are potentially there for us to invest in.
>
> As a company that has shareholders and publicly held, we are accountable to grow that business every year and hopefully increase profits every year. We are always challenged on making decisions on doing an extra clinical trial on a brand that might help it be more successful or be more available to patients, to doing more pure sales and marketing effort, to again licensing in another important molecule that could be of benefit to patients over the long haul. We are always making those trade-offs. If we had extra money, it wouldn't be in the bank. It would be reinvested in the business for sure.
>
> Q. Would that have been true for the time period starting in December 2005 and moving forward?
>
> A. Absolutely.
> Q. Would that be true for any additional profits you might have received in respect of LEVAQUIN?

> A. I don't think it is respected to the particular product the profits come from. Profits would have been reinvested no matter what product they came from. If there was extra profits from LEVAQUIN, we would have reinvested in the business for sure.

[137] Teva argues that, at least in this case, the terms of my previous Judgment applicable to Janssen Canada should apply equally to Janssen US; that Judgment was not altered on appeal nor did Janssen Canada even challenge that portion of the Judgment on appeal. In any event, Teva argues, the evidence of Smith is vague and inconclusive; the US income tax returns of Janssen US in evidence before me show a profit in some years and losses in other years; there is no evidence specific to the LEVAQUIN product.

[138] I agree with Teva. The terms of my previous Judgment respecting Janssen Canada and pre-judgment interest should apply equally to Janssen US. The decision of Zinn J. in Eli Lilly appears to consider lost profit arising from damages for lost sales is somehow reflected in an award of compound interest. Perhaps the Court of Appeal will clarify the situation. In any event, I am not satisfied that the evidence in this case, that of Smith and the tax returns, suggests that a claim for lost profits or compound interest in respect of damages is warranted.

XI. ISSUE NO. 4 - MITIGATION

[139] It is clear Canadian law that a party seeking to recover damages in a lawsuit bears the duty of taking all reasonable steps to mitigate those damages. Justice Estey of the Supreme Court of Canada wrote in Asamera Oil Corporation Ltd. v Sea Oil & General Corporation, [1979] 1 SCR 633 at page 661 in quoting Lord Haldane in British Westinghouse Electric and

Manufacturing Company, Limited v. Underground Electric Railways Company of London, Limited, [1912], AC 673 at page 689:

> The fundamental basis is thus compensation for pecuniary loss naturally flowing from the breach; but this first principle is qualified by a second, which imposes on a plaintiff the duty of taking all reasonable steps to mitigate the loss consequent on the breach, and debars him from claiming any part of the damage which is due to his neglect to take such steps. In the words of James L.J. in Dunkirk Colliery Co. v. Lever, "The person who has broken the contract is not to be exposed to additional cost by reason of the plaintiffs not doing what they ought to have done as reasonable men, and the plaintiffs not being under any obligation to do anything otherwise that in the ordinary course of business."

[140] Karakatsanis J. of the Supreme Court of Canada wrote in Southcott v Toronto Catholic School Board , 2012 SCC 51 at paragraph 24 that where it is alleged that a plaintiff failed to mitigate, the burden is on the defendant to prove that the plaintiff failed to make reasonable efforts to mitigate and that mitigation was possible.

[141] There are two evidentiary matters to consider. The first is to determine what was actually done. The second is to determine whether something more or different ought to have been done.

[142] First, as to what was actually done. My decision enjoining Teva from continuing to sell levofloxacin tablets, subject to the thirty day (30) day sell-off period, came out on October 17, 2006. The matter was appealed and affirmed by the Federal Court of Appeal on June 7, 2007. Leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada was sought and refused on December 6, 2007. Thus, the matter of validity and infringement was not finally determined until December 6, 2007.

[143] The evidence on discovery given by Janssen, as read into evidence at trial by Teva, is that, as far as the hospital group of customers was concerned, Janssen as a practical matter could not raise its prices as it was bound by an existing contract. I repeat pages 544 to 545 of Park's discovery:

> MR. KLEE: And then I would like to know the basis for the statement that the "price reductions must remain in place even after the Injunction has taken place, to avoid alienating customers…"
>
> THE WITNESS: It is a 3-Year Contract. Once we get the new (sic) Patent back, it wouldn't make any difference to a hospital. It is a 3-Year Deal. And then you would, at that point in time, renegotiate, after the Terms of the Contract were over, relative to what is going on in the new marketplace…

[144] This position was affirmed at trial during the examination-in-chief of John Stewart. I repeat part of what he said at pages 703 to 704 of the trial transcript:

> Q. In the period after Novopharm left the market, did that have an effect on Janssen's hospital prices for LEVAQUIN?
>
> A. There was no change to our hospital pricing.
>
> Q. How come?
> A. You have established relationships and listings based on the hospital prices that have been offered for the last two years plus. We are not going to rock that boat and change it on these customers. It is not the way we operate.

[145] As far as the so-called retail customers such as doctors, the evidence is that Janssen started to revise its marketing plans for LEVAQUIN in April 2006 but did not reassign its marketing team to LEVAQUIN until later in 2007. John Stewart explained the reason why at pages 702 to 703 of the trial transcript.

> Q. Do you know why Janssen didn't reassign people to LEVAQUIN until the third cycle in 2007?
>
> A. As stated previously, these things don't turn on a dime. You don't have the people in the organization and may have to hire them for the specialty role in particular. Then you have to retain absolutely everybody because there is turn over and change in our sales forces.
>
> You have to prepare all the selling materials. You have to get caught up on the issues in the marketplace. It is not a turnkey operation. There is a lot of work that goes into developing strategies and tactics. You tend don't do this in the middle of a cycle. It is in the beginning of cycle 1 or cycle 2. In this case, it is prepared for cycle 3. That is a reasonable amount of time.

[146] This is what was actually done. There is no evidence from Teva as to what ought to have been done. There are only assertions by Teva's lawyers in argument as to what ought to have been done and when. The Court has no evidence from any marketing person from Teva or any other evidence to suggest that the steps actually taken by Janssen were too late or inadequate.

[147] Given the evidence that I have, I cannot conclude that the steps taken by Janssen were insufficient to mitigate the damages incurred.

XII. COSTS

[148] The parties have asked for an opportunity to make submissions as to costs once they are apprised of my decision. Therefore, I ask that I receive submissions as to costs from the Plaintiffs within twenty (20) days from the release of this Judgment and from the Defendant within twenty (20) days thereafter.

XIII. CONCLUSIONS

[149] I have sent these Reasons in draft to Counsel for each of the parties and asked that they, working with their experts, Cohen and Mak, prepare an agreed upon set of figures that result from these changes to some of the assumptions underlying Scenario A. They have done so and have submitted an agreed set of numbers which include pre-Judgment interest calculated in accordance with the terms of these Reasons and my previous Judgment up to the last day of May, 2016. It is understood that, in agreeing to these numbers, the parties are reserving their rights to challenge any or all of my findings herein. The damages together with pre-Judgment interest are calculated individually for each of Janssen Canada and Janssen US.

[150] I have determined that Janssen Pharmaceuticals, Inc. (Janssen US) has standing as a person "claiming under" Daiichi, the patentee of the 080 Patent, to make a claim for damages herein.

[151] Janssen US is entitled to pre-Judgment interest on the same terms as expressed in paragraph 5 of my previous Judgment dated October 17, 2006, respecting Janssen Canada.

[152] It has not been shown that Janssen Canada failed to mitigate its damages.

[153] Janssen Canada is entitled to be paid damages by Teva in the sum of $5,498,270.00 inclusive of pre-Judgement interest as aforesaid and Janssen US is entitled to be paid damages in the sum of $13,342,949.00, inclusive of pre-Judgment interest.

JUDGMENT

FOR THE REASONS PROVIDED HEREIN:

THIS COURT'S JUDGMENT is that:

1. Teva Canada Limited shall pay Janssen Inc. damages, inclusive of pre-Judgment interest, in the sum of $ 5,498,270.00.
2. Teva Canada Limited shall pay Janssen Pharmaceuticals, Inc. damages, inclusive of pre-Judgment interest, in the sum of $ 13,342,949.00.
3. Costs will be the subject of a subsequent Judgment once the submissions of the parties have been received in accordance with the timetable set out in the Reasons, and considered.

EN APPEL DE LA COUR D'APPEL DU QUÉBEC

Faillite et insolvabilité — Réclamations prouvables — Réclamations éventuelles — Demande de protection contre l'insolvabilité par une société — Ordonnances environnementales émises par la province contre la société et demande, par la province, d'un jugement déclarant que les ordonnances ne constituent pas des « réclamations » aux termes de la Loi sur les arrangements avec les créanciers des compagnies, L.R.C. 1985, can be compromised in corporate restructuring under CCAA — Whether CCAA is ultra vires or constitutionally inapplicable by permitting court to determine whether environmental order is a monetary claim.

A was involved in industrial activity in Newfoundland and Labrador (the "Province"). In a period of general financial distress, it ended its last operation there, filed for insolvency protection in the United States and obtained a stay of proceedings under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 ("CCAA"). The Province subsequently issued five orders under the Environmental Protection Act, S.N.L. 2002, c. E-14.2, requiring A to submit remediation action plans for five industrial sites it had occupied, three of which had been expropriated by the Province, and to complete the remediation actions. The Province also brought a motion for a declaration that a claims procedure order issued under the CCAA in relation to A's proposed reorganization did not bar the Province from enforcing the environmental protection orders. The Province argued that the environmental protection orders were not "claims" under the CCAA and therefore could not be stayed and subject to a claims procedure order. It further argued that Parliament lacked the constitutional competence under its power to make laws in relation to bankruptcy and insolvency to stay orders that were validly made in the exercise of a provincial power. A contested the motion, arguing that the orders were monetary in nature and hence fell within the definition of the word "claim" in the claims procedure order. The CCAA court dismissed the Province's motion. The Court of Appeal denied the Province leave to appeal.

Held (McLachlin C.J. and LeBel J. dissenting): The appeal should be dismissed.

Per Deschamps, Fish, Abella, Rothstein, Cromwell, Moldaver and Karakatsanis JJ.: Not all orders issued by regulatory bodies are monetary in nature and thus provable claims in an insolvency proceeding, but some may be, even if the amounts involved are not quantified

ch. C-36 (« LACC »), et qu'elles ne sont pas assujetties à l'ordonnance relative à la procédure de réclamations — Les ordonnances environnementales constituent-elles des réclamations pécuniaires pouvant faire l'objet d'une transaction dans le cadre d'une restructuration sous le régime de la LACC? — La LACC est-elle ultra vires ou constitutionnellement inapplicable en permettant au tribunal de déterminer si une ordonnance environnementale constitue une réclamation pécuniaire?

A a poursuivi des activités industrielles à Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador (la « province »). Dans une période de grandes difficultés financières, elle a mis un terme à ses activités dans la province, elle a présenté une demande de protection contre l'insolvabilité aux États-Unis et elle a obtenu une suspension des procédures en vertu de la Loi sur les arrangements avec les créanciers des compagnies, L.R.C. 1985, ch. C-36 (« LACC »). La province a par la suite prononcé cinq ordonnances environnementales en vertu de l'Environmental Protection Act, S.N.L. 2002, ch. E-14.2, contraignant A à présenter des plans de restauration pour cinq sites industriels qu'elle avait occupés, dont trois avaient été expropriés par la province, et à réaliser les plans de restauration approuvés. La province a également demandé par requête un jugement déclarant qu'une ordonnance relative à la procédure de réclamations rendue aux termes de la LACC dans le cadre de la réorganisation proposée de A n'empêchait pas la province d'exécuter les ordonnances environnementales. La province a plaidé que les ordonnances environnementales ne constituent pas des « réclamations » au sens de la LACC et que leur exécution ne peut donc être suspendue ni être assujettie à une ordonnance relative à la procédure de réclamations. Elle a de plus fait valoir que le pouvoir du Parlement de légiférer en matière de faillite et d'insolvabilité ne lui confère pas la compétence constitutionnelle pour suspendre l'application des ordonnances prononcées dans l'exercice valide de pouvoirs provinciaux. A a contesté la requête et a soutenu que les ordonnances étaient de nature pécuniaire et qu'elles étaient donc visées par la définition du terme « réclamation » utilisé dans l'ordonnance relative à la procédure de réclamations. Le juge chargé d'appliquer la LACC a rejeté la requête de la province et la Cour d'appel a rejeté la demande d'autorisation d'appel de la province.

Arrêt (la juge en chef McLachlin et le juge LeBel sont dissidents) : Le pourvoi est rejeté.

Les juges Deschamps, Fish, Abella, Rothstein, Cromwell, Moldaver et Karakatsanis : Les ordonnances des organismes administratifs ne sont pas toutes de nature pécuniaire, et donc des réclamations prouvables dans le cadre de procédures d'insolvabilité, mais at the outset of the proceedings. In the environmental context, the CCAA court must determine whether there are sufficient facts indicating the existence of an environmental duty that will ripen into a financial liability owed to the regulatory body that issued the order. In such a case, the relevant question is not simply whether the body has formally exercised its power to claim a debt. A CCAA court does not assess claims or orders on the basis of form alone. If the order is not framed in monetary terms, the CCAA court must determine, in light of the factual matrix and the applicable statutory framework, whether it is a claim that will be subject to the claims process.

There are three requirements orders must meet in order to be considered claims that may be subject to the insolvency process in a case such as the one at bar. First, there must be a debt, a liability or an obligation to a creditor. In this case, the first criterion was met because the Province had identified itself as a creditor by resorting to environmental protection enforcement mechanisms. Second, the debt, liability or obligation must be incurred as of a specific time. This requirement was also met since the environmental damage had occurred before the time of the CCAA proceedings. Third, it must be possible to attach a monetary value to the debt, liability or obligation. The present case turns on this third requirement, and the question is whether orders that are not expressed in monetary terms can be translated into such terms.

A claim may be asserted in insolvency proceedings even if it is contingent on an event that has not yet occurred. The criterion used by courts to determine whether a contingent claim will be included in the insolvency process is whether the event that has not yet occurred is too remote or speculative. In the context of an environmental protection order, this means that there must be sufficient indications that the regulatory body that triggered the enforcement mechanism will ultimately perform remediation work and assert a monetary claim. If there is sufficient certainty in this regard, the court will conclude that the order can be subject to the insolvency process.

certaines peuvent l'être en dépit du fait qu'elles ne sont pas quantifiées dès le début des procédures. En matière environnementale, le tribunal chargé de l'application de la LACC doit déterminer s'il y a suffisamment de faits indiquant qu'il existe une obligation environnementale de laquelle résultera une dette envers l'organisme administratif qui a prononcé l'ordonnance. En pareil cas, la question pertinente ne se résume pas à déterminer si l'organisme a formellement exercé son pouvoir de réclamer une dette. Le tribunal qui évalue une réclamation ou une ordonnance ne se limite pas à un examen de sa forme. Si l'ordonnance n'est pas formulée en termes pécuniaires, le tribunal doit déterminer, en fonction des faits en cause et du cadre législatif applicable, si elle constitue une réclamation qui sera assujettie au processus de réclamation.

Pour qu'elles constituent des réclamations pouvant être assujetties au processus applicable en matière d'insolvabilité dans une affaire telle celle en l'espèce, les ordonnances doivent satisfaire à trois conditions. Premièrement, il doit s'agir d'une dette, d'un engagement ou d'une obligation envers un créancier. En l'espèce, il a été satisfait à la première condition puisque la province s'est présentée comme créancière en ayant recours aux mécanismes d'application en matière de protection de l'environnement. Deuxièmement, la dette, l'engagement ou l'obligation doit avoir pris naissance à un moment précis. Il a également été satisfait à cette condition puisque les dommages environnementaux sont survenus avant que les procédures en vertu de la LACC ne soient entamées. Troisièmement, il doit être possible d'attribuer une valeur pécuniaire à cette dette, cet engagement ou cette obligation. La présente affaire est centrée sur cette troisième condition, et la question est de savoir si des ordonnances qui ne sont pas formulées en termes pécuniaires peuvent être formulées en de tels termes.

Il est possible de faire valoir une réclamation dans le cadre de procédures d'insolvabilité même si elle dépend d'un événement non encore survenu. Le critère retenu par les tribunaux pour décider si une réclamation éventuelle sera incluse dans le processus d'insolvabilité est celui qui consiste à déterminer si l'événement non encore survenu est trop éloigné ou conjectural. Dans le contexte d'une ordonnance environnementale, cela signifie qu'il doit y avoir des indications suffisantes permettant de conclure que l'organisme administratif qui a eu recours aux mécanismes d'application de la loi effectuera en fin de compte des travaux de décontamination et présentera une réclamation pécuniaire. Si cela est suffisamment certain, le tribunal conclura que l'ordonnance peut être assujettie au processus d'insolvabilité.

Certain indicators can guide the CCAA court in this assessment, including whether the activities are ongoing, whether the debtor is in control of the property, and whether the debtor has the means to comply with the order. The court may also consider the effect that requiring the debtor to comply with the order would have on the insolvency process. The analysis is grounded in the facts of each case. In this case, the CCAA court's assessment of the facts, particularly its finding that the orders were the first step towards performance of the remediation work by the Province, leads to no conclusion other than that it was sufficiently certain that the Province would perform remediation work and therefore fall within the definition of a creditor with a monetary claim.

Subjecting such orders to the claims process does not extinguish the debtor's environmental obligations any more than subjecting any creditor's claim to that process extinguishes the debtor's obligation to pay a debt. It merely ensures that the Province's claim will be paid in accordance with insolvency legislation. Full compliance with orders that are found to be monetary in nature would shift the costs of remediation to third party creditors and replace the polluter-pay principle with a "third-party-pay" principle. Moreover, to subject environmental protection orders to the claims process is not to invite corporations to restructure in order to rid themselves of their environmental liabilities. Reorganization made necessary by insolvency is hardly ever a deliberate choice, and when the risks corporations engage in materialize, the dire costs are borne by almost all stakeholders.

Because the provisions on the assessment of claims in insolvency matters relate directly to Parliament's jurisdiction, the ancillary powers doctrine is not relevant to this case. The interjurisdictional immunity doctrine is also inapplicable, because a finding that a claim of an environmental creditor is monetary in nature does not interfere in any way with the creditor's activities; its claim is simply subject to the insolvency process.

Per McLachlin C.J. (dissenting): Remediation orders made under a province's environmental protection Certains indicateurs permettent de guider le tribunal dans cette analyse, notamment si les activités se poursuivent, si le débiteur exerce un contrôle sur le bien et s'il dispose des moyens de se conformer à l'ordonnance. Il est également possible pour le tribunal de prendre en compte les conséquences qu'entraînerait sur le processus d'insolvabilité le fait d'exiger du débiteur qu'il se conforme à l'ordonnance. L'analyse est fondée sur les faits propres à chaque cas. En l'espèce, l'appréciation des faits par le tribunal, plus particulièrement sa constatation que les ordonnances constituaient la première étape en vue de la décontamination des sites par la province, ne permet de tirer aucune conclusion autre que celle suivant laquelle il était suffisamment certain que la province exécuterait des travaux de décontamination et qu'elle était par conséquent visée par la définition d'un créancier ayant une réclamation pécuniaire.

Le fait d'assujettir ces ordonnances au processus de réclamations n'éteint pas les obligations environnementales qui incombent au débiteur, pas plus que le fait de soumettre à ce processus les réclamations des créanciers n'éteint l'obligation du débiteur de payer ses dettes. Le fait d'assujettir une ordonnance au processus de réclamation vise simplement à faire en sorte que le paiement au créancier sera fait conformément aux dispositions législatives applicables en matière d'insolvabilité. Le respect intégral des ordonnances dont la nature pécuniaire est reconnue transférerait le coût de la décontamination aux tiers créanciers et substituerait au principe du pollueur-payeur celui du « tiers-payeur ». En outre, l'assujettissement des ordonnances environnementales à la procédure de réclamations n'équivaut pas à convier les sociétés à se réorganiser dans le but d'échapper à leurs obligations environnementales. Une réorganisation rendue nécessaire par l'insolvabilité de la société peut difficilement être assimilée à un choix délibéré, et lorsque les risques auxquels s'exposent les sociétés se concrétisent, la quasi-totalité des personnes ayant des intérêts dans la société en supportent les terribles coûts.

L'application de la doctrine des pouvoirs accessoires n'est pas pertinente en l'espèce car les dispositions régissant l'évaluation des réclamations en matière d'insolvabilité sont directement reliées à la compétence du législateur fédéral. La doctrine de la protection des compétences exclusives ne s'applique pas non plus parce qu'une conclusion selon laquelle un créancier œuvrant dans le domaine de l'environnement détient une réclamation pécuniaire ne modifie en rien les activités de ce créancier; sa réclamation est simplement assujettie au processus d'insolvabilité.

La juge en chef McLachlin (dissidente) : Les ordonnances exigeant la décontamination émises aux termes legislation impose ongoing regulatory obligations on the corporation required to clean up the pollution. They may only be reduced to monetary claims which can be compromised under CCAA proceedings in narrow circumstances where a province has done the remediation work, or where it is "sufficiently certain" that it will do the work. This last situation is regulated by the provisions of the CCAA for contingent or future claims. The test is whether there is a likelihood approaching certainty that the province will do the work. "Likelihood approaching certainty" recognizes that the government's decision is discretionary and may be influenced by competing political and social considerations, which are not normally subject to judicial consideration. Insofar as this determination touches on the division of powers, I am in substantial agreement with Deschamps J.

Apart from the orders related to the work done or tendered for on the Buchans property, the orders for remediation in this case are not claims that can be compromised. The CCAA maintains the fundamental distinction between regulatory obligations under the general law aimed at the protection of the public and monetary claims that can be compromised in CCAA restructuring or bankruptcy. The CCAA judge never asked himself the critical question of whether it was "sufficiently certain" that the Province would do the work itself. His failure to consider that question requires this Court to answer it in his stead. There is nothing on the record to support the view that the Province will move to remediate the properties. It has not been shown that the contamination poses immediate health risks which must be addressed without delay. It has not been shown that the Province has taken any steps to do any work. And it has not been shown that the Province has set aside or even contemplated setting aside money for this work. The Province retained a number of options, including leaving the sites contaminated, or calling on Abitibi to remediate following its emergence from restructuring. There is nothing in the record that makes it more probable, much less establishes "sufficient certainty", that the Province will opt to do the work itself.

d'une loi provinciale sur la protection de l'environnement imposent des exigences réglementaires continues à la personne morale requise de remédier à la pollution. Ces ordonnances ne peuvent être converties en réclamations pécuniaires pouvant faire l'objet de transactions dans le cadre de procédures engagées aux termes de la LACC que dans certaines circonstances particulières, lorsqu'une province a exécuté les travaux ou lorsqu'il est « suffisamment certain » qu'elle exécutera les travaux. Cette deuxième situation est prévue par les dispositions de la LACC relatives aux réclamations éventuelles ou futures. Le critère consiste à déterminer s'il existe une probabilité proche de la certitude que la province exécutera les travaux. Une « probabilité proche de la certitude » reconnaît que la décision du gouvernement est discrétionnaire et peut être influencée par des considérations politiques et sociales concurrentes qui sont normalement soustraites à l'examen judiciaire. Dans la mesure où cette décision touche le partage des pouvoirs, je souscris pour l'essentiel à l'opinion exprimée par la juge Deschamps.

À l'exception des ordonnances relatives aux travaux sur le site de Buchans déjà exécutés ou à l'égard desquels des appels d'offres ont été lancés, les ordonnances exigeant la décontamination en l'espèce ne constituent pas des réclamations pouvant faire l'objet de transactions dans le cadre d'une restructuration. La LACC établit une distinction fondamentale entre les exigences réglementaires découlant d'une loi d'application générale visant la protection du public, d'une part, et les réclamations pécuniaires pouvant faire l'objet d'une transaction dans le cadre d'une restructuration engagée sous le régime de la LACC ou en matière de faillite, d'autre part. Le juge de première instance ne s'est jamais posé la question cruciale de savoir s'il était « suffisamment certain » que la province exécuterait elle-même les travaux. Le fait qu'il n'ait pas examiné cette question oblige notre Cour à y répondre à sa place. Aucune preuve au dossier ne laisse croire que la province entreprendra la décontamination des sites. Il n'a pas été démontré que la contamination pose pour la santé des risques immédiats exigeant la prise de mesures dans les plus brefs délais. Il n'a pas été démontré que la province a pris quelque mesure que ce soit pour réaliser des travaux. Et il n'a pas été démontré que la province a prévu des sommes d'argent pour ces travaux ou qu'elle a même songé à en prévoir. La province a conservé un certain nombre de choix, notamment laisser les sites contaminés, ou demander à Abitibi d'exécuter les travaux lorsqu'elle aura complété sa restructuration. Rien au dossier n'indique qu'il est plus probable, et encore moins qu'il est « suffisamment certain », que la province choisira d'exécuter elle-même la décontamination.

Per LeBel J. (dissenting): The test proposed by the Chief Justice according to which the evidence must show that there is a "likelihood approaching certainty" that the Province would remediate the contamination itself is not the established test for determining where and how a contingent claim can be liquidated in bankruptcy and insolvency law. The test of "sufficient certainty" described by Deschamps J. best reflects how both the common law and the civil law view and deal with contingent claims. Applying that test, the appeal should be allowed on the basis that there is no evidence that the Province intends to perform the remedial work itself.

Le juge LeBel (dissident) : Le critère que propose la Juge en chef, selon lequel la preuve doit démontrer une « probabilité proche de la certitude » que la province se chargerait de la décontamination, ne constitue pas le critère établi pour déterminer si, et de quelle façon, une réclamation éventuelle peut être liquidée en droit de la faillite et de l'insolvabilité. Le critère de ce qui est « suffisamment certain » qu'énonce la juge Deschamps reflète mieux la façon dont la common law et le droit civil envisagent et traitent les réclamations éventuelles. En appliquant ce critère, il y aurait lieu d'accueillir le pourvoi puisqu'aucune preuve ne confirme l'intention de la province d'exécuter elle-même les travaux de décontamination.

[1] DESCHAMPS J. — The question in this appeal is whether orders issued by a regulatory body with respect to environmental remediation work can be treated as monetary claims under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 ("CCAA").

[2] Regulatory bodies may become involved in reorganization proceedings when they order the debtor to comply with statutory rules. As a matter of principle, reorganization does not amount to a licence to disregard rules. Yet there are circumstances in which valid and enforceable orders will be subject to an arrangement under the CCAA. One such circumstance is where a regulatory body

[2] Un organisme administratif peut être appelé à intervenir dans le cadre de procédures de réorganisation lorsqu'il prononce une ordonnance intimant au débiteur de se conformer à une règle prescrite par la loi. En principe, une réorganisation ne permet pas à une personne d'ignorer ses obligations légales. Par ailleurs, en certaines circonstances, une ordonnance valable et exécutoire sera assujettie makes an environmental order that explicitly asserts a monetary claim.

[3] In other circumstances, it is less clear whether an order can be treated as a monetary claim. The appellant and a number of interveners posit that an order issued by an environmental body is not a claim under the CCAA if the order does not require the debtor to make a payment. I agree that not all orders issued by regulatory bodies are monetary in nature and thus provable claims in an insolvency proceeding, but some may be, even if the amounts involved are not quantified at the outset of the proceeding. In the environmental context, the CCAA court must determine whether there are sufficient facts indicating the existence of an environmental duty that will ripen into a financial liability owed to the regulatory body that issued the order. In such a case, the relevant question is not simply whether the body has formally exercised its power to claim a debt. A CCAA court does not assess claims — or orders — on the basis of form alone. If the order is not framed in monetary terms, the court must determine, in light of the factual matrix and the applicable statutory framework, whether it is a claim that will be subject to the claims process.

[4] The case at bar concerns contamination that occurred, prior to the CCAA proceedings, on property that is largely no longer under the debtor's possession and control. The CCAA court found on the facts of this case that the orders issued by Her Majesty the Queen in right of the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador ("Province") were simply a first step towards remediating the contaminated property and asserting a claim for the resulting costs. In the words of the CCAA court, "the intended, practical and realistic effect of the EPA Orders was to establish a basis for the Province to à un arrangement conclu en vertu de la LACC. C'est le cas notamment lorsqu'un organisme administratif prononce une ordonnance environnementale qui est explicitement formulée en termes pécuniaires.

[3] En d'autres circonstances, il est plus difficile de savoir si une ordonnance peut être traitée comme une réclamation pécuniaire. L'appelante et certains des intervenants affirment qu'une ordonnance émise par un organisme de protection de l'environnement ne constitue pas une réclamation au sens de la LACC si elle n'exige pas du débiteur qu'il lui paye un montant d'argent. Je conviens que les ordonnances des organismes administratifs ne constituent pas toutes des réclamations pécuniaires, et donc des réclamations prouvables dans le cadre de procédures d'insolvabilité, mais certaines peuvent l'être en dépit du fait qu'elles ne sont pas quantifiées dès le début des procédures. En matière environnementale, le tribunal chargé de l'application de la LACC doit déterminer s'il y a suffisamment de faits indiquant qu'il existe une obligation environnementale de laquelle résultera une dette envers l'organisme administratif qui a prononcé l'ordonnance. En pareil cas, la question pertinente ne se résume pas à déterminer si l'organisme a formellement exercé son pouvoir de réclamer une dette. Lorsque le tribunal évalue une réclamation (ou une ordonnance) il ne se limite pas à un examen de sa forme. Si l'ordonnance n'est pas formulée en termes pécuniaires, le tribunal doit déterminer, en fonction des faits en cause et du cadre législatif applicable, si elle constitue une réclamation qui sera assujettie au processus de réclamation.

[4] Le présent pourvoi a trait à des dommages environnementaux survenus avant que les procédures sous le régime de la LACC ne soient engagées, des dommages causés à des terrains qui, en majeure partie, ne sont plus en la possession du débiteur ni sous son contrôle. Le tribunal de première instance a conclu, selon les faits en l'espèce, que les ordonnances émises par Sa Majesté la Reine du chef de la province de Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador (« province ») ne constituaient que la première étape en vue de restaurer les sites contaminés et de réclamer les coûts engagés. Comme l'a exprimé le juge de recover amounts of money to be eventually used for the remediation of the properties in question" (2010 QCCS 1261, 68 C.B.R. (5th) 1, at para. 211). As a result, the CCAA court found that the orders were clearly monetary in nature. I see no error of law and no reason to interfere with this finding of fact. I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

I. Facts and Procedural History

[5] For over 100 years, AbitibiBowater Inc. and its affiliated or predecessor companies (together, "Abitibi") were involved in industrial activity in Newfoundland and Labrador. In 2008, Abitibi announced the closure of a mill that was its last operation in that province.

[6] Within two weeks of the announcement, the Province passed the Abitibi-Consolidated Rights and Assets Act, S.N.L. 2008, c. A-1.01 ("Abitibi Act"), which immediately transferred most of Abitibi's property in Newfoundland and Labrador to the Province and denied Abitibi any legal remedy for this expropriation.

[7] The closure of its mill in Newfoundland and Labrador was one of many decisions Abitibi made in a period of general financial distress affecting its activities both in the United States and in Canada. It filed for insolvency protection in the United States on April 16, 2009. It also sought a stay of proceedings under the CCAA in the Superior Court of Quebec, as its Canadian head office was located in Montréal. The CCAA stay was ordered on April 17, 2009.

[8] In the same month, Abitibi also filed a notice of intent to submit a claim to arbitration under NAFTA (the North American Free Trade Agreement Between the Government of Canada, the Government of the United Mexican States and the Government of the United States of America, première instance, [TRADUCTION] « les ordonnances avaient pour effet attendu, pratique et réaliste d'établir le fondement d'une réclamation permettant à la province de récupérer des sommes d'argent qui seraient utilisées pour procéder aux travaux de décontamination » (2010 QCCS 1261, 68 C.B.R. (5th) 1, par. 211). Par conséquent, pour le tribunal, les ordonnances étaient clairement de nature pécuniaire. Je ne vois aucune erreur de droit ni aucune raison de modifier ces conclusions de fait. Je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi avec dépens.

I. Faits et historique judiciaire

[5] Pendant plus d'une centaine d'années, AbitibiBowater Inc., et ses auteurs ou sociétés filiales (ensemble, « Abitibi ») ont poursuivi des activités industrielles à Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador. En 2008, Abitibi a annoncé la fermeture de la dernière des scieries qu'elle exploitait dans cette province.

[6] Dans les deux semaines qui ont suivi cette annonce, la province a adopté l'Abitibi-Consolidated Rights and Assets Act, S.N.L. 2008, ch. A-1.01 (« Abitibi Act »), qui transférait immédiatement à la province la plus grande partie des biens d'Abitibi situés à Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador et privait la société de tous recours judiciaires en relation avec cette expropriation.

[7] La fermeture de sa scierie à Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador est l'une des nombreuses décisions prises par Abitibi dans une période où de grandes difficultés financières touchaient ses activités au Canada et aux États-Unis. Le 16 avril 2009, elle a présenté une demande de protection contre l'insolvabilité aux États-Unis. Elle a également demandé à la Cour supérieure du Québec, à Montréal, où elle a son siège social au Canada, une suspension des procédures en vertu de la LACC. La suspension a été ordonnée le 17 avril 2009.

[8] Au cours du même mois, Abitibi a aussi déposé un avis d'intention de soumettre une plainte à l'arbitrage en vertu de l'ALENA (Accord de libre-échange nord-américain entre le gouvernement du Canada, le gouvernement des États-Unis d'Amérique et le gouvernement des États-Unis du Mexique, Can. T.S. 1994 No. 2) for losses resulting from the Abitibi Act, which, according to Abitibi, exceeded $300 million.

[9] On November 12, 2009, the Province's Minister of Environment and Conservation ("Minister") issued five orders (the "EPA Orders") under s. 99 of the Environmental Protection Act, S.N.L. 2002, c. E-14.2 ("EPA"). The EPA Orders required Abitibi to submit remediation action plans to the Minister for five industrial sites, three of which had been expropriated, and to complete the approved remediation actions. The CCAA judge estimated the cost of implementing these plans to be from "the mid-to-high eight figures" to "several times higher" (para. 81).

[10] On the day it issued the EPA Orders, the Province brought a motion for a declaration that a claims procedure order issued under the CCAA in relation to Abitibi's proposed reorganization did not bar the Province from enforcing the EPA Orders. The Province argued — and still argues — that non-monetary statutory obligations are not "claims" under the CCAA and hence cannot be stayed and be subject to a claims procedure order. It further submits that Parliament lacks the constitutional competence under its power to make laws in relation to bankruptcy and insolvency to stay orders that are validly made in the exercise of a provincial power.

[11] Abitibi contested the motion and sought a declaration that the EPA Orders were stayed and that they were subject to the claims procedure order. It argued that the EPA Orders were monetary in nature and hence fell within the definition of the word "claim" in the claims procedure order.

R.T. Can. 1994 n^{o} 2) relativement à des pertes découlant de l'application de l'Abitibi Act, lesquelles totalisaient, selon Abitibi, une somme supérieure à 300 millions de dollars.

[11] Abitibi a contesté la requête et a demandé un jugement déclarant que les ordonnances EPA avaient été suspendues et qu'elles étaient assujetties à l'ordonnance relative à la procédure de réclamations. Abitibi a soutenu que les ordonnances EPA étaient de nature pécuniaire et qu'elles étaient donc visées par la définition du terme « réclamation » utilisé dans l'ordonnance relative à la procédure de réclamations.

[12] Gascon J. of the Quebec Superior Court, sitting as a CCAA court, dismissed the Province's motion. He found that he had the authority to characterize the orders as "claims" if the underlying regulatory obligations "remain[ed], in a particular fact pattern, truly financial and monetary in nature" (para. 148). He declared that the EPA Orders were stayed by the initial stay order and were not subject to the exception found in that order. He also declared that the filing by the Province of any claim based on the EPA Orders was subject to the claims procedure order, and reserved to the Province the right to request an extension of time to assert a claim under the claims procedure order and to Abitibi the right to contest such a request.

[12] Le juge Gascon de la Cour supérieure du Québec, siégeant aux termes de la LACC, a rejeté la requête de la province. Il a statué qu'il avait le pouvoir de qualifier les ordonnances de « réclamations » si les obligations légales sous-jacentes [TRADUCTION] « demeur[aient], dans une situation factuelle particulière, de nature véritablement financière et pécuniaire » (par. 148). Il a déclaré que les ordonnances EPA avaient été suspendues en vertu de l'ordonnance de suspension initiale et qu'elles n'étaient pas visées par l'exception énoncée dans cette ordonnance. Il a également déclaré que la présentation, par la province, de toute réclamation fondée sur les ordonnances EPA était assujettie à l'ordonnance relative à la procédure de réclamations; il a réservé à la province le droit de demander par requête une prorogation du délai pour présenter une réclamation en vertu de la procédure de réclamations et a confirmé le droit d'Abitibi de contester une telle requête.

[13] In the Court of Appeal, Chamberland J.A. denied the Province leave to appeal (2010 QCCA 965, 68 C.B.R. (5th) 57). In his view, the appeal had no reasonable chance of success, because Gascon J. had found as a fact that the EPA Orders were financial or monetary in nature. Chamberland J.A. also found that no constitutional issue arose, given that the Superior Court judge had merely characterized the orders in the context of the restructuring process; the judgment did not "'immunise' Abitibi from compliance with the EPA Orders" (para. 33). Finally, he noted that Gascon J. had reserved the Province's right to request an extension of time to file a claim in the CCAA process.

[13] En Cour d'appel, le juge Chamberland a rejeté la demande d'autorisation d'appel présentée par la province (2010 QCCA 965, 68 C.B.R. (5th) 57). À son avis, l'appel n'avait aucune chance raisonnable de succès parce que le juge Gascon avait conclu, comme question de faits, que les ordonnances EPA étaient de nature financière ou pécuniaire. Le juge Chamberland a également estimé qu'aucune question constitutionnelle ne se posait, car le juge de la Cour supérieure n'avait fait que qualifier les ordonnances dans le contexte du processus de restructuration; le jugement ne [TRADUCTION] « "soustrayait" pas Abitibi à son obligation de se conformer aux ordonnances EPA » (par. 33). Enfin, il a fait remarquer que le juge Gascon avait réservé à la province le droit de demander la prorogation de délai pour produire une réclamation en vertu de la LACC.

II. Positions of the Parties

II. Thèses des parties

[14] The Province argues that the CCAA court erred in interpreting the relevant CCAA provisions in a way that nullified the EPA, and that the interpretation is inconsistent with both the ancillary powers doctrine and the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity. The Province further submits that, in any event, the EPA Orders are not "claims" within the meaning of the CCAA. It takes the position that "any plan of compromise and arrangement that Abitibi might submit for court approval must make provision for compliance with the EPA Orders" (A.F., at para. 32).

[14] La province soutient que le tribunal de première instance a commis l'erreur d'interpréter les dispositions applicables de la LACC de façon à invalider l'EPA et que cette interprétation est incompatible tant avec la doctrine des pouvoirs accessoires qu'avec celle de la protection des compétences

[15] Abitibi contends that the factual record does not provide a basis for applying the constitutional doctrines. It relies on the CCAA court's findings of fact, particularly the finding that the Province's intent was to establish the basis for a monetary claim. Abitibi submits that the true issue is whether a province that has a monetary claim against an insolvent company can obtain a preference against other unsecured creditors by exercising its regulatory power.

III. Constitutional Questions

1. Is the definition of "claim" in s. 2(1) of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36, ultra vires the Parliament of Canada or constitutionally inapplicable to the extent this definition includes statutory duties to which the debtor is subject pursuant to s. 99 of the Environmental Protection Act, S.N.L. 2002, c. E-14.2?

2. Is s. 11 of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36, ultra vires the Parliament of Canada or constitutionally inapplicable to the extent this section gives courts jurisdiction to bar or extinguish statutory duties to which the debtor is subject pursuant to s. 99 of the Environmental Protection Act, S.N.L. 2002, c. E-14.2?

3. Is s. 11 of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36, ultra vires the Parliament of Canada or constitutionally inapplicable to the extent this section gives courts jurisdiction to exclusives. La province fait de plus valoir que, de toute façon, les ordonnances EPA ne constituent pas des « réclamations » au sens de la LACC. Elle soutient que [TRADUCTION] « tout plan de transaction et d'arrangement qu'Abitibi pourrait soumettre à l'approbation du tribunal doit prévoir qu'[Abitibi] doit se conformer aux ordonnances EPA » (m.a., par. 32).

[15] Abitibi soutient que l'application des doctrines constitutionnelles ne trouve aucun fondement dans les faits du dossier. Elle appuie sa position sur les conclusions de fait tirées par le tribunal de première instance, plus particulièrement celles où le tribunal conclut que l'intention de la province était d'établir le fondement d'une réclamation pécuniaire. Abitibi plaide que la véritable question est de savoir si, par l'exercice de son pouvoir de réglementation, une province ayant une réclamation pécuniaire à faire valoir contre une entreprise insolvable peut obtenir une préférence à l'encontre d'autres créanciers non garantis.

III. Questions constitutionnelles

review the exercise of ministerial discretion under s. 99 of the Environmental Protection Act, S.N.L. 2002, c. E-14.2?

[17] I note that the question whether a CCAA court has constitutional jurisdiction to stay a provincial order that is not a monetary claim does not arise here, because the stay order in this case did not affect non-monetary orders. However, the question may arise in other cases. In 2007, Parliament expressly gave CCAA courts the power to stay regulatory orders that are not monetary claims by amending the CCAA to include the current version of s. 11.1(3) (An Act to amend the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, the Wage Earner Protection Program Act and chapter 47 of the Statutes of Canada, 2005, S.C. 2007, c. 36, s. 65) (the "2007 amendments"). Thus, future cases may give courts the opportunity to consider the question raised by the Province in an appropriate factual context. The only constitutional question that needs to be answered in this case concerns the jurisdiction of a CCAA court to determine whether an environmental order that is not framed in monetary terms is in fact a monetary claim.

[18] Processing creditors' claims against an insolvent debtor in an equitable and orderly manner is at the heart of insolvency legislation, which falls under a head of power attributed to Parliament. Rules concerning the assessment of creditors' claims, such as the determination of whether a creditor has a monetary claim, relate directly to the equitable and orderly treatment of creditors in an insolvency process. There is no need to perform a detailed analysis of the pith and substance of the provisions on the assessment of claims in insolvency matters to conclude that the federal legislation governing the characterization of an order as a monetary claim is valid. Because the provisions relate directly to Parliament's jurisdiction, où il confère aux tribunaux la compétence pour réviser l'exercice du pouvoir discrétionnaire conféré au ministre par l'art. 99 de l'Environmental Protection Act, S.N.L. 2002, ch. E-14.2?

[17] Je souligne que la question de savoir si, aux termes de la LACC, un tribunal a compétence constitutionnelle pour suspendre l'application d'une ordonnance provinciale qui ne constitue pas une réclamation pécuniaire ne se pose pas en l'espèce parce que l'ordonnance de suspension en cause ne visait pas ces ordonnances. La question pourrait toutefois se poser dans d'autres affaires. En 2007, par l'ajout du par. 11.1(3) de la LACC, le législateur fédéral a explicitement conféré aux tribunaux compétents aux termes de la LACC le pouvoir de suspendre l'application des ordonnances d'un organisme administratif qui ne constituent pas des réclamations pécuniaires (Loi modifiant la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité, la Loi sur les arrangements avec les créanciers des compagnies, la Loi sur le Programme de protection des salariés et le chapitre 47 des Lois du Canada (2005), L.C. 2007, ch. 36, art. 65) (les « modifications de 2007 »). Ainsi, les tribunaux auront l'occasion d'analyser la question soulevée par la province lorsque le contexte factuel s'y prêtera. La seule question constitutionnelle qui requiert une réponse en l'espèce a trait à la compétence d'un tribunal, aux termes de la LACC, de déterminer si une ordonnance environnementale qui n'est pas formulée en termes pécuniaires constitue, en fait, une réclamation pécuniaire.

[18] Le traitement équitable et ordonné des réclamations présentées par des créanciers contre un débiteur insolvable se situe au cœur même de la législation en matière d'insolvabilité, un domaine de compétence attribué au législateur fédéral. L'établissement de règles relatives à l'évaluation des réclamations des créanciers, comme celle permettant de déterminer si un créancier fait valoir une réclamation pécuniaire, concerne directement le traitement équitable et ordonné des créanciers dans le cadre d'un processus établi en matière d'insolvabilité. Il n'est pas nécessaire d'analyser en détail le caractère véritable des dispositions régissant l'évaluation des réclamations en matière d'insolvabilité pour conclure à la validité du texte législatif fédéral

the ancillary powers doctrine is not relevant to this case. I also find that the interjurisdictional immunity doctrine is not applicable. A finding that a claim of an environmental creditor is monetary in nature does not interfere in any way with the creditor's activities. Its claim is simply subjected to the insolvency process.

[19] What the Province is actually arguing is that courts should consider the form of an order rather than its substance. I see no reason why the Province's choice of order should not be scrutinized to determine whether the form chosen is consistent with the order's true purpose as revealed by the Province's own actions. If the Province's actions indicate that, in substance, it is asserting a provable claim within the meaning of federal legislation, then that claim can be subjected to the insolvency process. Environmental claims do not have a higher priority than is provided for in the CCAA. Considering substance over form prevents a regulatory body from artificially creating a priority higher than the one conferred on the claim by federal legislation. This Court recognized long ago that a province cannot disturb the priority scheme established by the federal insolvency legislation (Husky Oil Operations Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue, [1995] 3 S.C.R. 453). Environmental claims are given a specific, and limited, priority under the CCAA. To exempt orders which are in fact monetary claims from the CCAA proceedings would amount to conferring upon provinces a priority higher than the one provided for in the CCAA.

IV. Claims Under the CCAA

[20] Several provisions of the CCAA have been amended since Abitibi filed for insolvency

permettant d'établir qu'une ordonnance constitue une réclamation pécuniaire. L'application de la doctrine des pouvoirs accessoires n'est pas pertinente en l'espèce car les dispositions en cause sont directement reliées à la compétence du législateur fédéral. J'estime également que la doctrine de la protection des compétences exclusives ne s'applique pas en l'espèce. Une conclusion selon laquelle un créancier œuvrant dans le domaine de l'environnement détient une réclamation pécuniaire ne modifie en rien les activités de ce créancier. La réclamation de ce dernier est simplement assujettie au processus d'insolvabilité.

[19] Ce que soutient en fait la province, c'est que les tribunaux devraient examiner la forme des ordonnances plutôt que leur substance. Je ne vois aucune raison empêchant l'examen du choix par la province d'un type d'ordonnance donnée afin de déterminer si la forme choisie concorde avec l'objectif véritable qui se dégage des gestes qu'elle a posés. Si ces gestes indiquent qu'elle fait effectivement valoir une réclamation prouvable au sens de la législation fédérale, alors cette réclamation peut être assujettie au processus d'insolvabilité. Les réclamations en matière d'environnement ne bénéficient pas d'un rang supérieur à celui prévu par les dispositions de la LACC. Privilégier l'examen de la substance d'une ordonnance plutôt que de sa forme permet d'éviter qu'un organisme administratif obtienne de façon artificielle une priorité de rang supérieure à celle que la législation fédérale attribue à la réclamation. Notre Cour a depuis longtemps reconnu qu'une province ne pouvait perturber les priorités établies par le régime fédéral d'insolvabilité (Husky Oil Operations Ltd. c. Ministre du Revenu national, [1995] 3 R.C.S. 453). La LACC établit une priorité précise et limitée à l'égard des réclamations en matière environnementale. Le fait de soustraire aux procédures d'insolvabilité les ordonnances qui sont en fait des réclamations pécuniaires équivaudrait à accorder aux provinces une priorité d'un rang supérieur à celui prévu par la LACC.

IV. Réclamations sous le régime de la LACC

protection. Except where otherwise indicated, the provisions I refer to are those that were in force when the stay was ordered.

[21] One of the central features of the CCAA scheme is the single proceeding model, which ensures that most claims against a debtor are entertained in a single forum. Under this model, the court can stay the enforcement of most claims against the debtor's assets in order to maintain the status quo during negotiations with the creditors. When such negotiations are successful, the creditors typically accept less than the full amounts of their claims. Claims have not necessarily accrued or been liquidated at the outset of the insolvency proceeding, and they sometimes have to be assessed in order to determine the monetary value that will be subject to compromise.

[22] Section 12 of the CCAA establishes the basic rules for ascertaining whether an order is a claim that may be subjected to the insolvency process:

12. (1) [Definition of "claim"] For the purposes of this Act, "claim" means any indebtedness, liability or obligation of any kind that, if unsecured, would be a debt provable in bankruptcy within the meaning of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

(2) [Determination of amount of claim] For the purposes of this Act, the amount represented by a claim of any secured or unsecured creditor shall be determined as follows:

(a) the amount of an unsecured claim shall be the amount

(iii) in the case of any other company, proof of which might be made under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, but if the amount so provable is not admitted by the company, the amount shall be determined by the court on summary application by the company or by the creditor; . . .

de protection contre l'insolvabilité. À moins d'indication contraire de ma part, les dispositions que je cite sont celles qui étaient en vigueur lorsque la suspension des procédures a été ordonnée.

[22] L'article 12 de la LACC énonce les règles de base pour déterminer si une ordonnance constitue une réclamation pouvant être assujettie au processus applicable en matière d'insolvabilité :

12. (1) [Définition de « réclamation »] Pour l'application de la présente loi, « réclamation » s'entend de toute dette, tout engagement ou toute obligation d'un genre quelconque qui, s'il n'était pas garanti, constituerait une dette prouvable en matière de faillite au sens de la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité.

(2) [Détermination du montant de la réclamation] Pour l'application de la présente loi, le montant représenté par une réclamation d'un créancier garanti ou chirographaire est déterminé de la façon suivante :

a) le montant d'une réclamation non garantie est le montant :

(iii) dans le cas de toute autre compagnie, dont la preuve pourrait être établie en vertu de la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité, mais si le montant ainsi prouvable n'est pas admis par la compagnie, ce montant est déterminé par le tribunal sur demande sommaire par la compagnie ou le créancier;

[23] Section 12 of the CCAA refers to the rules of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA"). Section 2 of the BIA defines a claim provable in bankruptcy:

"claim provable in bankruptcy", "provable claim" or "claim provable" includes any claim or liability provable in proceedings under this Act by a creditor;

[24] This definition is completed by s. 121(1) of the BIA:

121. (1) All debts and liabilities, present or future, to which the bankrupt is subject on the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt or to which the bankrupt may become subject before the bankrupt's discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt shall be deemed to be claims provable in proceedings under this Act.

[25] Sections 121(2) and 135(1.1) of the BIA offer additional guidance for the determination of whether an order is a provable claim:

121. . . .

(2) The determination whether a contingent or unliquidated claim is a provable claim and the valuation of such a claim shall be made in accordance with section 135.

135. . . .

(1.1) The trustee shall determine whether any contingent claim or unliquidated claim is a provable claim, and, if a provable claim, the trustee shall value it, and the claim is thereafter, subject to this section, deemed a proved claim to the amount of its valuation.

[26] These provisions highlight three requirements that are relevant to the case at bar. First, there must be a debt, a liability or an obligation to a creditor. Second, the debt, liability or obligation must be incurred before the debtor becomes bankrupt. Third, it must be possible to attach a monetary value to the debt, liability or obligation. I will examine each of these requirements in turn.

[24] Cette définition est complétée par le par. 121(1) de la LFI :

121. (1) Toutes créances et tous engagements, présents ou futurs, auxquels le failli est assujetti à la date à laquelle il devient failli, ou auxquels il peut devenir assujetti avant sa libération, en raison d'une obligation contractée antérieurement à cette date, sont réputés des réclamations prouvables dans des procédures entamées en vertu de la présente loi.

[25] Les paragraphes 121(2) et 135(1.1) de la LFI donnent des indications additionnelles lorsqu'il s'agit de déterminer si une ordonnance constitue une réclamation prouvable :

121. . . .

(2) La question de savoir si une réclamation éventuelle ou non liquidée constitue une réclamation prouvable et, le cas échéant, son évaluation sont décidées en application de l'article 135.

135. . . .

(1.1) Le syndic décide si une réclamation éventuelle ou non liquidée est une réclamation prouvable et, le cas échéant, il l'évalue; sous réserve des autres dispositions du présent article, la réclamation est dès lors réputée prouvée pour le montant de l'évaluation.

[26] Ces dispositions font ressortir trois conditions pertinentes à la présente affaire. Premièrement, on doit être en présence d'une dette, d'un engagement ou d'une obligation envers un créancier. Deuxièmement, la dette, l'engagement ou l'obligation doit avoir pris naissance avant que le débiteur ne devienne failli. Troisièmement, il doit être possible d'attribuer une valeur pécuniaire à cette dette, cet engagement ou cette obligation. Je vais examiner chacune de ces conditions à tour de rôle.

[27] The BIA's definition of a provable claim, which is incorporated by reference into the CCAA, requires the identification of a creditor. Environmental statutes generally provide for the creation of regulatory bodies that are empowered to enforce the obligations the statutes impose. Most environmental regulatory bodies can be creditors in respect of monetary or non-monetary obligations imposed by the relevant statutes. At this first stage of determining whether the regulatory body is a creditor, the question whether the obligation can be translated into monetary terms is not yet relevant. This issue will be broached later. The only determination that has to be made at this point is whether the regulatory body has exercised its enforcement power against a debtor. When it does so, it identifies itself as a creditor, and the requirement of this stage of the analysis is satisfied.

[28] The enquiry into the second requirement is based on s. 121(1) of the BIA, which imposes a time limit on claims. A claim must be founded on an obligation that was "incurred before the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt". Because the date when environmental damage occurs is often difficult to ascertain, s. 11.8(9) of the CCAA provides more temporal flexibility for environmental claims:

11.8 . . .

(9) A claim against a debtor company for costs of remedying any environmental condition or environmental damage affecting real property of the company shall be a claim under this Act, whether the condition arose or the damage occurred before or after the date on which proceedings under this Act were commenced.

[29] The creditor's claim will be exempt from the single proceeding requirement if the debtor's corresponding obligation has not arisen as of the time limit for inclusion in the insolvency process. This could apply, for example, to a debtor's statutory obligations relating to polluting activities that continue after the reorganization, because in such cases,

[27] La définition de réclamation prouvable établie par la LFI et incorporée par renvoi à la LACC exige qu'une personne ait qualité de créancier. Les lois régissant l'environnement pourvoient généralement à la création d'un organisme chargé de voir au respect des obligations qui y sont prévues. La plupart des organismes administratifs peuvent agir à titre de créanciers en relation avec les obligations pécuniaires ou non pécuniaires imposées par ces lois. À cette première étape qui consiste à déterminer si un organisme administratif est un créancier, il n'est pas encore pertinent de décider si l'obligation peut être formulée en termes pécuniaires. Cette question sera abordée à un stade ultérieur. À cette étape, la seule question à trancher est de savoir si l'organisme administratif a exercé, à l'encontre d'un débiteur, son pouvoir de faire appliquer la loi. Lorsqu'il le fait, il s'identifie alors comme créancier et la condition de cette étape est espectée.

[28] L'examen de la seconde condition repose sur le par. 121(1) de la LFI qui impose que la réclamation ait pris naissance dans un délai donné. Celle-ci doit se fonder sur une obligation « contractée antérieurement à cette date [la date à laquelle le failli devient failli] ». Comme il est souvent difficile d'établir la date à laquelle un dommage lié à l'environnement est survenu, le par. 11.8(9) de la LACC prévoit une certaine flexibilité pour ce qui est des réclamations en matière d'environnement :

11.8 . . .

(9) La réclamation pour les frais de réparation du fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement et touchant un bien immeuble de la compagnie débitrice constitue une réclamation, que la date du fait ou dommage soit antérieure ou postérieure à celle où des procédures sont intentées au titre de la présente loi.

[29] La réclamation du créancier sera exemptée de l'exigence découlant de la procédure unique si l'obligation correspondante du débiteur n'a pas pris naissance dans le délai fixé pour que la réclamation soit incluse dans le processus d'insolvabilité. À titre d'exemple, cela pourrait s'appliquer aux obligations que la loi impose à un débiteur concernant the damage continues to be sustained after the reorganization has been completed.

[30] With respect to the third requirement, that it be possible to attach a monetary value to the obligation, the question is whether orders that are not expressed in monetary terms can be translated into such terms. I note that when a regulatory body claims an amount that is owed at the relevant date, that is, when it frames its order in monetary terms, the court does not need to make this determination, because what is being claimed is an "indebtedness" and therefore clearly falls within the meaning of "claim" as defined in s. 12(1) of the CCAA.

[31] However, orders, which are used to address various types of environmental challenges, may come in many forms, including stop, control, preventative, and clean-up orders (D. Saxe, "Trustees' and Receivers' Environmental Liability Update" (1998), 49 C.B.R. (3d) 138, at p. 141). When considering an order that is not framed in monetary terms, courts must look at its substance and apply the rules for the assessment of claims.

[32] Parliament recognized that regulatory bodies sometimes have to perform remediation work (see House of Commons, Evidence of the Standing Committee on Industry, No. 16, 2nd Sess., 35th Parl., June 11, 1996). When one does so, its claim with respect to remediation costs is subject to the insolvency process, but the claim is secured by a charge on the contaminated real property and certain other related property and benefits from a priority (s. 11.8(8) CCAA). Thus, Parliament struck a balance between the public's interest in enforcing environmental regulations and the interest of third-party creditors in being treated equitably.

ses activités polluantes qui se poursuivent après la réorganisation, parce qu'en pareilles circonstances, des dommages sont encore causés après que la réorganisation ait été complétée.

[30] En ce qui concerne la troisième condition, soit qu'il doit être possible d'attribuer à l'obligation une valeur pécuniaire, la question est de savoir si des ordonnances qui ne sont pas formulées en termes pécuniaires peuvent être formulées en de tels termes. Je souligne que lorsqu'un organisme administratif réclame une somme qui est due à la date pertinente, il formule ainsi son ordonnance en termes pécuniaires. Le tribunal n'a alors aucune détermination à faire à cette étape car ce qui est réclamé est une « dette » et est, par conséquent, clairement visé par la définition d'une « réclamation » prévue au par. 12(1) de la LACC.

[31] Toutefois, parce qu'elles sont utilisées pour traiter divers enjeux environnementaux, les ordonnances peuvent se présenter sous plusieurs formes et peuvent viser notamment la cessation ou le contrôle d'une activité, la prévention et la décontamination (D. Saxe, « Trustees' and Receivers' Environnmental Liability Update » (1998), 49 C.B.R. (3d) 138, p. 141). Lorsqu'ils analysent une ordonnance qui n'est pas formulée en des termes pécuniaires, les tribunaux doivent en examiner la substance et appliquer les règles régissant l'évaluation des réclamations.

[32] Le législateur fédéral reconnaît que les organismes administratifs doivent à l'occasion exécuter des travaux de décontamination (voir Chambre des communes, Témoignages du Comité permanent de l'industrie, nº 16, 2e sess., 35e lég., 11 juin 1996). En pareil cas, la réclamation relative aux frais de décontamination est assujettie à la procédure de réclamations en matière d'insolvabilité mais elle est garantie par une charge réelle grevant l'immeuble contaminé et certains immeubles connexes et bénéficie d'un rang prioritaire (par. 11.8(8) LACC). Ainsi, le législateur a établi un équilibre entre l'intérêt du public à l'égard de l'application de la réglementation environnementale et les intérêts des tiers créanciers qui doivent être traités de façon équitable.

[33] If Parliament had intended that the debtor always satisfy all remediation costs, it would have granted the Crown a priority with respect to the totality of the debtor's assets. In light of the legislative history and the purpose of the reorganization process, the fact that the Crown's priority under s. 11.8(8) of the CCAA is limited to the contaminated property and certain related property leads me to conclude that to exempt environmental orders would be inconsistent with the insolvency legislation. As deferential as courts may be to regulatory bodies' actions, they must apply the general rules.

[33] Si le législateur fédéral avait eu l'intention d'obliger le débiteur à supporter dans tous les cas tous les coûts des travaux de décontamination, il aurait accordé à l'État une priorité applicable à la totalité des actifs du débiteur. Compte tenu de l'historique des dispositions législatives et des objectifs du processus de réorganisation, le fait que la priorité de l'État aux termes du par. 11.8(8) de la LACC soit limitée au bien contaminé et à certains biens liés m'amène à conclure qu'une exemption à l'égard des ordonnances environnementales serait incompatible avec la législation en matière d'insolvabilité. Aussi respectueux soient-ils des mesures prises par les organismes administratifs, les tribunaux sont tenus d'appliquer les règles générales.

[34] Unlike in proceedings governed by the common law or the civil law, a claim may be asserted in insolvency proceedings even if it is contingent on an event that has not yet occurred (for the common law, see Canada v. McLarty, 2008 SCC 26, [2008] 2 S.C.R. 79, at paras. 17-18; for the civil law, see arts. 1497, 1508 and 1513 of the Civil Code of Québec, S.Q. 1991, c. 64). Thus, the broad definition of "claim" in the BIA includes contingent and future claims that would be unenforceable at common law or in the civil law. As for unliquidated claims, a CCAA court has the same power to assess their amounts as would a court hearing a case in a common law or civil law context.

[34] Contrairement à l'approche qui prévaut dans le contexte des procédures régies par la common law ou le droit civil, il est possible de faire valoir une réclamation dans le cadre de procédures d'insolvabilité même si elle dépend d'un événement non encore survenu (en common law, voir Canada c. McLarty, 2008 CSC 26, [2008] 2 R.C.S. 79, par. 17-18; en droit civil, voir les art. 1497, 1508 et 1513 du Code civil du Québec, L.Q. 1991, ch. 64). Ainsi, la définition générale de « réclamation » de la LFI englobe des réclamations éventuelles et futures qui seraient inexécutoires en common law ou en droit civil. En ce qui concerne les réclamations non liquidées, le tribunal chargé de l'application de la LACC a le même pouvoir d'évaluer leur montant qu'un tribunal saisi d'une affaire sous le régime de la common law ou du droit civil.

[35] The reason the BIA and the CCAA include a broad range of claims is to ensure fairness between creditors and finality in the insolvency proceeding for the debtor. In a corporate liquidation process, it is more equitable to allow as many creditors as possible to participate in the process and share in the liquidation proceeds. This makes it possible to include creditors whose claims have not yet matured when the corporate debtor files for bankruptcy, and thus avert a situation in which they would be faced with an inactive debtor that cannot satisfy a judgment. The rationale is slightly different in the context of a corporate proposal or reorganization. In such cases, the broad approach serves not only to ensure fairness between creditors, but also to allow the debtor to make as fresh a start as possible after a proposal or an arrangement is approved.

[36] The criterion used by courts to determine whether a contingent claim will be included in the insolvency process is whether the event that has not yet occurred is too remote or speculative (Confederation Treasury Services Ltd. (Bankrupt), Re (1997), 96 O.A.C. 75). In the context of an environmental order, this means that there must be sufficient indications that the regulatory body that triggered the enforcement mechanism will ultimately perform remediation work and assert a monetary claim to have its costs reimbursed. If there is sufficient certainty in this regard, the court will conclude that the order can be subjected to the insolvency process.

[37] The exercise by the CCAA court of its jurisdiction to determine whether an order is a provable claim entails a certain scrutiny of the regulatory body's actions. This scrutiny is in some ways similar to judicial review. There is a distinction, however, and it lies in the object of the assessment that the CCAA court must make. The CCAA court does not review the regulatory body's exercise of discretion. Rather, it inquires into whether the facts indicate that the conditions for inclusion in the claims process are met. For example, if activities at issue are ongoing, the CCAA court may well conclude that the order cannot be included in the insolvency process because the activities and resulting damages will continue after the reorganization is completed and hence exceed the time limit for a claim. If, on the other hand, the regulatory body, having no realistic alternative but to perform the remediation work itself, simply delays framing the order as a claim in order to improve its position in relation to other creditors, the CCAA court may conclude le contexte d'une proposition concordataire présentée par une société ou d'une réorganisation. Dans ces cas, l'objectif que sous-tend une interprétation large est non seulement de garantir l'équité entre créanciers, mais aussi de permettre au débiteur de prendre un nouveau départ dans les meilleures conditions possibles à la suite de l'approbation d'une proposition ou d'un arrangement.

[36] Le critère retenu par les tribunaux pour décider si une réclamation éventuelle sera incluse dans le processus d'insolvabilité est celui qui consiste à déterminer si l'événement non encore survenu est trop éloigné ou conjectural (Confederation Treasury Service Ltd. (Bankrupt), Re (1997), 96 O.A.C. 75). Dans le contexte d'une ordonnance environnementale, cela signifie qu'il doit y avoir des indications suffisantes permettant de conclure que l'organisme administratif qui a eu recours aux mécanismes d'application de la loi effectuera en fin de compte des travaux de décontamination et présentera une réclamation pécuniaire afin d'obtenir le remboursement de ses débours. Si cela est suffisamment certain, le tribunal conclura que l'ordonnance peut être assujettie au processus d'insolvabilité.

[37] Lorsqu'il détermine si une ordonnance constitue une réclamation prouvable, le tribunal chargé de l'application de la LACC doit, dans une certaine mesure, examiner les actes posés par l'organisme administratif. Cet examen se rapproche à certains égards de celui d'un contrôle judiciaire. La différence se situe, toutefois, au niveau de l'objet de l'évaluation que doit faire le tribunal. Son examen ne porte pas sur l'exercice du pouvoir discrétionnaire par l'organisme administratif. Il doit plutôt déterminer si le contexte factuel indique que les conditions requises pour que l'ordonnance soit incluse dans le processus de réclamations sont respectées. Par exemple, si le débiteur continue d'exercer les activités faisant l'objet de l'intervention de l'organisme administratif, il est fort possible que le tribunal conclue que l'ordonnance ne peut être incorporée au processus d'insolvabilité parce que ces activités et les dommages en découlant se poursuivront après la réorganisation et qu'elles excéderont donc le délai prescrit pour la production d'une that this course of action is inconsistent with the insolvency scheme and decide that the order has to be subject to the claims process. Similarly, if the property is not under the debtor's control and the debtor does not, and realistically will not, have the means to perform the remediation work, the CCAA court may conclude that it is sufficiently certain that the regulatory body will have to perform the work.

[38] Certain indicators can thus be identified from the text and the context of the provisions to guide the CCAA court in determining whether an order is a provable claim, including whether the activities are ongoing, whether the debtor is in control of the property, and whether the debtor has the means to comply with the order. The CCAA court may also consider the effect that requiring the debtor to comply with the order would have on the insolvency process. Since the appropriate analysis is grounded in the facts of each case, these indicators need not all apply, and others may also be relevant.

[39] Having highlighted three requirements for finding a claim to be provable in a CCAA process that need to be considered in the case at bar, I must now discuss certain policy arguments raised by the Province and some of the interveners.

[40] These parties argue that treating a regulatory order as a claim in an insolvency proceeding extinguishes the debtor's environmental obligations, thereby undermining the polluter-pay principle discussed by this Court in Imperial Oil Ltd. v. Quebec (Minister of the Environment), 2003 SCC 58, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 624, at para. 24. This objection réclamation. Par contre, si l'organisme administratif, n'ayant aucune solution réaliste autre que celle d'effectuer lui-même les travaux de décontamination, ne fait que retarder la production d'une réclamation pécuniaire dans le but d'améliorer sa position par rapport à celle des autres créanciers, le tribunal pourrait conclure que cette démarche n'est pas compatible avec le régime d'insolvabilité et décider que l'ordonnance doit être traitée dans le cadre du processus de réclamations. De même, si le débiteur n'exerce aucun contrôle sur le bien et ne dispose pas, ni ne disposera, de façon réaliste, des moyens pour effectuer les travaux de décontamination, le tribunal pourrait conclure de façon suffisamment certaine que l'organisme administratif devra exécuter les travaux.

[38] Il est ainsi possible de discerner, grâce au libellé des dispositions et à leur contexte, certains indicateurs qui permettent de guider le tribunal au moment de déterminer si l'ordonnance constitue une réclamation prouvable, notamment si les activités se poursuivent, si le débiteur exerce un contrôle sur le bien et s'il dispose des moyens de se conformer à l'ordonnance. Il est également possible pour le tribunal de prendre en compte les conséquences qu'entraînerait sur le processus d'insolvabilité le fait d'exiger du débiteur qu'il se conforme à l'ordonnance. Puisque l'analyse qu'il convient de réaliser est fondée sur les faits propres à chaque cas, il n'est pas nécessaire que tous ces indicateurs soient présents, et d'autres peuvent également devenir pertinents.

[39] Après avoir souligné les trois conditions qui permettent en l'espèce de conclure qu'une ordonnance constitue une réclamation prouvable dans le cadre d'un processus régi par la LACC, il me faut examiner certains arguments de principe que la province et certains intervenants ont fait valoir.

[40] Ils ont plaidé que le fait d'assimiler une ordonnance d'un organisme administratif à une réclamation dans le cadre de procédure en insolvabilité éteint les obligations environnementales auxquelles le débiteur est tenu, minant par le fait même le principe du pollueur-payeur examiné par notre Cour dans l'arrêt Cie pétrolière Impériale demonstrates a misunderstanding of the nature of insolvency proceedings. Subjecting an order to the claims process does not extinguish the debtor's environmental obligations any more than subjecting any creditor's claim to that process extinguishes the debtor's obligation to pay its debts. It merely ensures that the creditor's claim will be paid in accordance with insolvency legislation. Moreover, full compliance with orders that are found to be monetary in nature would shift the costs of remediation to third-party creditors, including involuntary creditors, such as those whose claims lie in tort or in the law of extra-contractual liability. In the insolvency context, the Province's position would result not only in a super-priority, but in the acceptance of a "third-party-pay" principle in place of the polluter-pay principle.

[41] Nor does subjecting the orders to the insolvency process amount to issuing a licence to pollute, since insolvency proceedings do not concern the debtor's future conduct. A debtor that is reorganized must comply with all environmental regulations going forward in the same way as any other person. To quote the colourful analogy of two American scholars, "Debtors in bankruptcy have — and should have — no greater license to pollute in violation of a statute than they have to sell cocaine in violation of a statute" (D. G. Baird and T. H. Jackson, "Comment: Kovacs and Toxic Wastes in Bankruptcy" (1984), 36 Stan. L. Rev. 1199, at p. 1200).

[42] Furthermore, corporations may engage in activities that carry risks. No matter what risks are at issue, reorganization made necessary by insolvency is hardly ever a deliberate choice. When the risks materialize, the dire costs are borne by almost all stakeholders. To subject orders to the claims process is not to invite corporations to restructure ltée c. Québec (Ministre de l'Environnement), 2003 CSC 58, [2003] 2 R.C.S. 624, par. 24. Cet argument démontre une mauvaise compréhension de la nature des procédures en matière d'insolvabilité. Le fait d'assujettir une ordonnance au processus de réclamations n'éteint pas les obligations environnementales qui incombent au débiteur, pas plus que le fait de soumettre à ce processus les réclamations des créanciers n'éteint l'obligation du débiteur de payer ses dettes. Le fait d'assujettir une ordonnance au processus de réclamation vise simplement à faire en sorte que le paiement au créancier sera fait conformément aux dispositions législatives applicables en matière d'insolvabilité. De plus, le respect intégral des ordonnances dont la nature pécuniaire est reconnue transférerait le coût de la décontamination aux tiers créanciers, y compris aux créanciers involontaires, par exemple les créanciers en responsabilité délictuelle ou extra-contractuelle. Dans un contexte d'insolvabilité, la position de la province aurait comme résultat de lui accorder non seulement une super-priorité, mais aussi de reconnaître l'application d'un principe du « tiers-payeur » plutôt que celui du pollueur-payeur.

[41] Par ailleurs, l'assujettissement des ordonnances au processus d'insolvabilité n'autorise pas une personne à polluer, car la procédure en insolvabilité ne touche pas les actes que le débiteur posera dans le futur. Le débiteur réorganisé doit se conformer pour l'avenir à la réglementation environnementale, comme le ferait toute autre personne. Pour citer une analogie haute en couleurs de deux universitaires américains, [TRADUCTION] « [l]es débiteurs en faillite n'ont pas — et ne devraient pas avoir — une autorisation plus étendue de polluer en violation d'une loi qu'ils n'en ont de vendre de la cocaïne » (D. G. Baird et T. H. Jackson, « Comment : Kovacs and Toxic Wastes in Bankruptcy » (1984), 36 Stan. L. Rev. 1199, p. 1200).

[42] En outre, il arrive que des sociétés exercent des activités comportant des risques. Peu importe les risques en cause, une réorganisation rendue nécessaire par l'insolvabilité de la société peut difficilement être assimilée à un choix délibéré. Lorsque les risques se concrétisent, la quasi-totalité des personnes ayant des intérêts dans la société en in order to rid themselves of their environmental liabilities.

[43] And the power to determine whether an order is a provable claim does not mean that the court will necessarily conclude that the order before it will be subject to the CCAA process. In fact, the CCAA court in the case at bar recognized that orders relating to the environment may or may not be considered provable claims. It stayed only those orders that were monetary in nature.

[44] The Province also argues that courts have in the past held that environmental orders cannot be interpreted as claims when the regulatory body has not yet exercised its power to assert a claim framed in monetary terms. The Province relies in particular on Panamericana de Bienes y Servicios S.A. v. Northern Badger Oil & Gas Ltd. (1991), 81 Alta. L.R. (2d) 45 (C.A.), and its progeny. In Panamericana, the Alberta Court of Appeal held that a receiver was personally liable for work under a remediation order and that the order was not a claim in insolvency proceedings. The court found that the duty to undertake remediation work is owed to the public at large until the regulator exercises its power to assert a monetary claim.

[45] The first answer to the Province's argument is that courts have never shied away from putting substance ahead of form. They can determine whether the order is in substance monetary.

[46] The second answer is that the provisions relating to the assessment of claims, particularly those governing contingent claims, contemplate instances in which the quantum is not yet established when the claims are filed. Whether, in the supportent les terribles coûts. L'assujettissement des ordonnances à la procédure de réclamations n'équivaut pas à convier les sociétés à se réorganiser dans le but d'échapper à leurs obligations environnementales.

[43] Et le pouvoir de déterminer si une ordonnance constitue une réclamation prouvable ne signifie pas que le tribunal jugera nécessairement que l'ordonnance sera soumise au processus de réorganisation. En fait, le tribunal en l'espèce a reconnu que les ordonnances environnementales pouvaient être ou ne pas être considérées comme des réclamations prouvables. Il n'a rendu une ordonnance de suspension qu'à l'égard des ordonnances de nature pécuniaire.

[44] La province plaide aussi que selon la jurisprudence, les ordonnances environnementales ne peuvent pas être assimilées à des réclamations lorsque l'organisme administratif n'a pas encore exercé son pouvoir de faire valoir une réclamation formulée en termes pécuniaires. La province s'appuie particulièrement sur l'arrêt Panamericana de Bienes y Servicios S.A. c. Northern Badger Oil & Gas Ltd. (1991), 81 Alta. L.R. (2d) 45 (C.A.), et les jugements rendus dans sa foulée. Dans l'arrêt Panamericana, la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta a tenu le séquestre personnellement responsable de l'exécution des travaux ordonnés et a statué que l'ordonnance ne constituait pas une réclamation visée par les procédures en insolvabilité. La cour a conclu que l'obligation d'entreprendre les travaux de décontamination est due au public en général jusqu'à ce que l'organisme administratif exerce son pouvoir de faire valoir une réclamation pécuniaire.

[45] La première réponse à cet argument de la province est que les tribunaux n'ont jamais hésité à privilégier le fond à la forme. Les tribunaux peuvent déterminer si, en substance, l'ordonnance est de nature pécuniaire.

[46] La seconde réponse est que les dispositions concernant l'évaluation des réclamations, en particulier celles régissant les réclamations éventuelles, n'exigent pas que la valeur pécuniaire soit établie au moment où elles sont produites. Un regulatory context, an obligation always entails the existence of a correlative right has been discussed by a number of scholars. Various theories of rights have been put forward (see W. N. Hohfeld, Fundamental Legal Conceptions as Applied in Judicial Reasoning (new ed. 2001); D. N. MacCormick, "Rights in Legislation", in P. M. S. Hacker and J. Raz, eds., Law, Morality, and Society: Essays in Honour of H. L. A. Hart (1977), 189). However, because the Province issued the orders in this case, it would be recognized as a creditor in respect of a right no matter which of these theories was applied. As interesting as the discussion may be, therefore, I do not need to consider which theory should prevail. The real question is not to whom the obligation is owed, as this question is answered by the statute, which determines who can require that it be discharged. Rather, the question is whether it is sufficiently certain that the regulatory body will perform the remediation work and, as a result, have a monetary claim.

[47] The third answer to the Province's argument is that insolvency legislation has evolved considerably over the two decades since Panamericana. At the time of Panamericana, none of the provisions relating to environmental liabilities were in force. Indeed, some of those provisions were enacted very soon after, and seemingly in response to, that case. In 1992, Parliament shielded trustees from the very liability imposed on the receiver in Panamericana (An Act to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend the Income Tax Act in consequence thereof, S.C. 1992, c. 27, s. 9, amending s. 14 of the BIA). The 1997 amendments provided additional protection to trustees and monitors (An Act to amend the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act and the Income Tax Act, S.C. 1997, c. 12). The 2007 amendments made it clear that a CCAA court has the power to determine that a regulatory order may be a claim and also provided criteria for staying regulatory orders (s. 65, amending the CCAA to include the current version of s. 11.1). The purpose of these amendments was to balance the creditor's certain nombre d'auteurs ont examiné la question de savoir si, dans un contexte réglementaire, l'existence d'une obligation implique toujours en corrélation celle d'un droit. Diverses théories relatives aux droits ont été avancées (voir W. N. Hohfeld, Fundamental Legal Conceptions as Applied in Judicial Reasoning (nouvelle éd. 2001); D. N. MacCormick, « Rights in Legislation », dans P. M. S. Hacker et J. Raz, dir., Law, Morality, and Society : Essays in Honour of H. L. A. Hart (1977), 189). Toutefois, comme en l'espèce la province a prononcé les ordonnances, elle serait reconnue comme créancière d'un droit en vertu de l'une ou l'autre de ces théories. Par conséquent, malgré l'intérêt que peut susciter ce débat, il n'est pas nécessaire de déterminer la théorie qui prévaut. La véritable question n'est pas de savoir à qui est due l'obligation, puisque la loi y répond en indiquant qui peut en exiger l'exécution. La question est plutôt de savoir s'il est suffisamment certain que l'organisme administratif effectuera les travaux de décontamination et pourra ainsi faire valoir une réclamation pécuniaire.

[47] La troisième réponse à l'argument soulevé par la province est que la législation en matière d'insolvabilité a considérablement évolué au cours des deux décennies écoulées depuis l'arrêt Panamericana. À l'époque où l'arrêt Panamericana a été prononcé, aucune des dispositions concernant les obligations liées à l'environnement n'était en vigueur. Certaines des dispositions ont été adoptées très peu de temps après cette décision et, semble-t-il, en réponse à celle-ci. En 1992, le législateur a permis aux syndics d'échapper à la responsabilité même que l'arrêt Panamericana avait retenue contre le séquestre (Loi modifiant la Loi sur la faillite et la Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu en conséquence, L.C. 1992, ch. 27, art. 9, modifiant l'art. 14 de la LFI). Une protection additionnelle a été accordée au syndic et au contrôleur avec les modifications adoptées en 1997 (Loi modifiant la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité, la Loi sur les arrangements avec les créanciers des compagnies et la Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu, L.C. 1997, ch. 12). Les modifications apportées en 2007 ont précisé que le tribunal chargé d'appliquer la LACC a need for fairness against the debtor's need to make a fresh start.

[48] Whether the regulatory body has a contingent claim is a determination that must be grounded in the facts of each case. Generally, a regulatory body has discretion under environmental legislation to decide how best to ensure that regulatory obligations are met. Although the court should take care to avoid interfering with that discretion, the action of a regulatory body is nevertheless subject to scrutiny in insolvency proceedings.

V. Application

[49] I now turn to the application of the principles discussed above to the case at bar. This case does not turn on whether the Province is the creditor of an obligation or whether damage had occurred as of the relevant date. Those requirements are easily satisfied, since the Province had identified itself as a creditor by resorting to EPA enforcement mechanisms and since the damage had occurred before the time of the CCAA proceedings. Rather, the issue centres on the third requirement: that the orders meet the criterion for admission as a pecuniary claim. The claim was contingent to the extent that the Province had not yet formally exercised its power to ask for the payment of money. The question is whether it was sufficiently certain that the orders would eventually result in a monetary claim. To the CCAA judge, there was no doubt that the answer was yes.

le pouvoir de décider qu'une ordonnance d'un organisme administratif peut constituer une réclamation; ces modifications ont de plus établi des critères applicables à la suspension de ces ordonnances (art. 65, modifiant la LACC par l'ajout de l'art. 11.1). Ces modifications visaient à établir un équilibre entre le besoin de traiter les créanciers de façon équitable et celui de permettre au débiteur de prendre un nouveau départ.

[48] La détermination qu'une ordonnance d'un organisme administratif constitue une réclamation éventuelle doit être fondée sur les faits de chaque affaire. La législation en matière d'environnement accorde généralement à un organisme administratif un pouvoir discrétionnaire de décider de la meilleure façon d'assurer le respect des obligations découlant de la réglementation. Quoique le tribunal doive se garder de s'ingérer dans l'exercice du pouvoir discrétionnaire de ces organismes, les mesures qu'ils prennent peuvent néanmoins faire l'objet d'un examen dans le cadre de procédures engagées sous le régime fédéral de l'insolvabilité.

V. Application

[49] J'aborde maintenant l'application des principes énoncés ci-dessus à l'affaire dont notre Cour est saisie. En l'espèce, le débat n'est pas centré sur la question de savoir si la province est créancière d'une obligation ou si des dommages étaient survenus à la date pertinente. Il est facile de répondre à ces questions étant donné que la province s'est elle-même présentée comme créancière en ayant recours aux mécanismes d'application de l'EPA et que les dommages sont survenus avant que les procédures en vertu de la LACC ne soient entamées. Le débat porte plutôt sur la troisième condition, celle qui consiste à savoir si les ordonnances satisfont au critère d'admissibilité à titre de réclamation pécuniaire. La réclamation était éventuelle dans la mesure où la province n'avait pas formellement exercé son pouvoir de demander paiement d'une somme d'argent. La question est de savoir s'il était suffisamment certain que l'ordonnance mènerait éventuellement à la production d'une réclamation pécuniaire. Pour le juge de première instance, une réponse affirmative ne faisait pas de doute.

[50] The Province's exercise of its legislative powers in enacting the Abitibi Act created a unique set of facts that led to the orders being issued. The seizure of Abitibi's assets by the Province, the cancellation of all outstanding water and hydroelectric contracts between Abitibi and the Province, the cancellation of pending legal proceedings by Abitibi in which it sought the reimbursement of several hundreds of thousands of dollars, and the denial of any compensation for the seized assets and of legal redress are inescapable background facts in the judge's review of the EPA Orders.

[51] The CCAA judge did not elaborate on whether it was sufficiently certain that the Minister would perform the remediation work and therefore make a monetary claim. However, most of his findings clearly rest on a positive answer to this question. For example, his finding that "[i]n all likelihood, the pith and substance of the EPA Orders is an attempt by the Province to lay the groundwork for monetary claims against Abitibi, to be used most probably as an offset in connection with Abitibi's own NAFTA claims for compensation" (para. 178), is necessarily based on the premise that the Province would most likely perform the remediation work. Indeed, since monetary claims must, both at common law and in civil law, be mutual for set-off or compensation to operate, the Province had to have incurred costs in doing the work in order to have a claim that could be set off against Abitibi's claims.

[52] That the judge relied on an implicit finding that the Province would most likely perform the work and make a claim to offset its costs is also shown by the confirmation he found in the declaration by the Premier that the Province was attempting to assess the cost of doing remediation work Abitibi had allegedly left undone and that in the Province's assessment, "at this point in time, there would not be a net payment to Abitibi" (para. 181).

[50] En adoptant l'Abitibi Act, ayant ainsi recours à son pouvoir législatif, la province mettait en place un contexte factuel unique qui menait à l'émission des ordonnances. La saisie par la province des actifs d'Abitibi, l'annulation de tous les contrats d'approvisionnement en eau et d'hydroélectricité conclus entre Abitibi et la province, l'annulation des recours intentés par Abitibi pour obtenir le remboursement de plusieurs centaines de milliers de dollars et le refus de toute indemnité et de tous recours en justice à l'égard des actifs saisis tissent un contexte factuel dont le juge ne peut faire abstraction dans son examen des ordonnances EPA.

[51] Le juge de première instance n'a pas fait une analyse distincte du critère suivant lequel le tribunal doit être suffisamment certain que le ministre exécuterait les travaux de décontamination et ferait, par conséquent, valoir une réclamation pécuniaire. Cependant, la plupart de ses conclusions reposent manifestement sur un constat positif à cet égard. Par exemple, le constat que [TRADUCTION] « [s]elon toute vraisemblance, le caractère véritable des ordonnances EPA [consiste] pour la province à tenter de jeter les bases de réclamations pécuniaires contre Abitibi, dans le but de les utiliser tout probablement à titre compensatoire au regard des demandes d'indemnisation d'Abitibi fondées sur l'ALÉNA » (par. 178) repose nécessairement sur la prémisse que la province allait fort probablement exécuter les travaux de décontamination. En effet, puisque les réclamations pécuniaires, en common law comme en droit civil, doivent être réciproques pour opérer compensation, la province devait avoir engagé des dépenses en exécutant des travaux, ce qui établissait la base de la réclamation qu'elle ferait valoir pour compenser celle d'Abitibi.

[52] Un autre fait illustre que le juge de première instance a implicitement conclu que la province allait fort probablement exécuter les travaux et produire une réclamation pour compenser ses coûts est qu'il en a trouvé une confirmation dans la déclaration du premier ministre selon laquelle la province tentait d'évaluer ce qu'il en coûterait pour réaliser les travaux de décontamination qu'Abitibi n'aurait

[53] The CCAA judge's reasons not only rest on an implicit finding that the Province would most likely perform the work, but refer explicitly to facts that support this finding. To reach his conclusion that the EPA Orders were monetary in nature, the CCAA judge relied on the fact that Abitibi's operations were funded through debtor-in-possession financing and its access to funds was limited to ongoing operations. Given that the EPA Orders targeted sites that were, for the most part, no longer in Abitibi's possession, this meant that Abitibi had no means to perform the remediation work during the reorganization process.

[54] In addition, because Abitibi lacked funds and no longer controlled the properties, the timetable set by the Province in the EPA Orders suggested that the Province never truly intended that Abitibi was to perform the remediation work required by the orders. The timetable was also unrealistic. For example, the orders were issued on November 12, 2009 and set a deadline of January 15, 2010 to perform a particular act, but the evidence revealed that compliance with this requirement would have taken close to a year.

[55] Furthermore, the judge relied on the fact that Abitibi was not simply designated a "person responsible" under the EPA, but was intentionally targeted by the Province. The finding that the Province had targeted Abitibi was drawn not only from the timing of the EPA Orders, but also from the fact that Abitibi was the only person designated in them, whereas others also appeared to be responsible — in some cases, primarily responsible — for the contamination. For example, Abitibi was ordered to do remediation work on a site it had surrendered more than 50 years before the orders were issued; the expert report upon which the orders were based made no distinction between Abitibi's activities on the property, on which its source of power had been horse power, and subsequent activities by others who had used fuel-powered vehicles pas exécutés, et que selon l'estimation de la province, [TRADUCTION] « à l'heure actuelle, aucun paiement net ne serait versé à Abitibi » (par. 181).

[55] En outre, le juge s'est appuyé sur le fait qu'Abitibi n'était pas simplement désignée comme [TRADUCTION] « personne responsable » aux termes de l'EPA, mais qu'elle était intentionnellement visée par la province. Il a fait cette constatation non seulement en raison du choix du moment où les ordonnances ont été prononcées, mais aussi parce qu'Abitibi y était la seule personne désignée alors que d'autres semblaient également responsables — et en certains cas, principalement responsables — de la contamination. Par exemple, la province a ordonné à Abitibi d'effectuer des travaux de décontamination d'un site qu'elle avait abandonné plus de 50 ans avant le prononcé des ordonnances alors que le rapport d'expert sur lequel les ordonnances étaient fondées ne distinguait aucunement les activités d'Abitibi, qui avait utilisé des chevaux, there. In the judge's opinion, this finding of fact went to the Province's intent to establish a basis for performing the work itself and asserting a claim against Abitibi.

[56] These reasons — and others — led the CCAA judge to conclude that the Province had not expected Abitibi to perform the remediation work and that the "intended, practical and realistic effect of the EPA Orders was to establish a basis for the Province to recover amounts of money to be eventually used for the remediation of the properties in question" (para. 211). He found that the Province appeared to have in fact taken some steps to liquidate the claims arising out of the EPA Orders.

[57] In the end, the judge found that there was definitely a claim that "might" be filed, and that it was not left to "the subjective choice of the creditor to hold the claim in its pocket for tactical reasons" (para. 227). In his words, the situation did not involve a "detached regulator or public enforcer issuing [an] order for the public good" (para. 175), and it was "the hat of a creditor that best fi[t] the Province, not that of a disinterested regulator" (para. 176).

[58] In sum, although the analytical framework used by Gascon J. was driven by the facts of the case, he reviewed all the legal principles and facts that needed to be considered in order to make the determination in the case at bar. He did at times rely on indicators that are unique and that do not appear in the analytical framework I propose above, but he did so because of the exceptional facts of this case. Yet, had he formulated the question in the same way as I have, his conclusion, based on his objective findings of fact, would have been the same. Earmarking money may be a strong indicator that a province will perform remediation work, and actually commencing the work is the first step towards the creation of a debt, but these are not the et les activités subséquentes d'autres personnes qui y avaient utilisé des véhicules alimentés au mazout. Ce fait, pour le juge, illustrait l'intention de la province d'établir un fondement pour exécuter elle-même les travaux et présenter une réclamation contre Abitibi.

[57] En fin de compte, le juge a conclu qu'il existait véritablement une réclamation qui « pourrait » être présentée, et qu'on ne pouvait laisser au bon vouloir du créancier [TRADUCTION] « le choix subjectif de la garder en réserve pour des raisons tactiques » (par. 227). Pour reprendre ses propres mots, il ne s'agissait pas d'un cas où « un organisme de réglementation ou d'application de la loi a émis de manière objective une ordonnance dans l'intérêt public » (par. 175), mais que « la province a agi plus comme un créancier que comme un organisme administratif désintéressé » (par. 176).

[58] En somme, bien que le cadre analytique utilisé par le juge Gascon a été dicté par les faits de l'affaire, il a examiné tous les principes juridiques et les faits qu'il était tenu de prendre en compte pour statuer sur la question qui se posait. À l'occasion, il s'est appuyé sur des indicateurs singuliers qui ne figurent pas dans le cadre analytique que j'ai déjà proposé, mais cela s'explique par les faits exceptionnels en l'espèce. Or, s'il avait formulé la question comme je l'ai posée, sa conclusion, appuyée sur ses constatations de fait objectives, aurait été la même. Le fait de prévoir un budget peut constituer un indicateur clair qu'une province exécutera des travaux de décontamination, et le fait que ces travaux soient entrepris constitue la première étape de only considerations that can lead to a finding that a creditor has a monetary claim. The CCAA judge's assessment of the facts, particularly his finding that the EPA Orders were the first step towards performance of the remediation work by the Province, leads to no conclusion other than that it was sufficiently certain that the Province would perform remediation work and therefore fall within the definition of a creditor with a monetary claim.

la constitution d'une dette, mais ces considérations ne sont pas les seules qui permettent de conclure qu'un créancier fait valoir une réclamation pécuniaire. L'appréciation des faits par le juge de première instance, plus particulièrement sa constatation que les ordonnances constituaient la première étape en vue de la décontamination des sites, ne permet de tirer aucune conclusion autre que celle suivant laquelle il était suffisamment certain que la province exécuterait des travaux de décontamination et qu'elle était par conséquent visée par la définition d'un créancier ayant une réclamation pécuniaire.

VI. Conclusion

VI. Conclusion

[59] In sum, I agree with the Chief Justice that, as a general proposition, an environmental order issued by a regulatory body can be treated as a contingent claim, and that such a claim can be included in the claims process if it is sufficiently certain that the regulatory body will make a monetary claim against the debtor. Our difference of views lies mainly in the applicable threshold for including contingent claims and in our understanding of the CCAA judge's findings of fact.

[59] En somme, je suis d'accord avec la Juge en chef pour dire qu'en règle générale, une ordonnance environnementale d'un organisme administratif peut être traitée comme une réclamation éventuelle et qu'une telle réclamation peut être incluse au processus de réclamation s'il est suffisamment certain que l'organisme administratif fera valoir une réclamation pécuniaire contre le débiteur. Nos divergences de vues portent principalement sur le critère applicable pour que les réclamations éventuelles soient incluses et sur la façon dont nous interprétons les constatations de fait tirées par le juge de première instance.

[60] With respect to the law, the Chief Justice would craft a standard specific to the context of environmental orders by requiring a "likelihood approaching certainty" that the regulatory body will perform the remediation work. She finds that this threshold is justified because "remediation may cost a great deal of money" (para. 86). I acknowledge that remediating pollution is often costly, but I am of the view that Parliament has borne this consideration in mind in enacting provisions specific to environmental claims. Moreover, I recall that in this case, the Premier announced that the remediation work would be performed at no net cost to the Province. It was clear to him that the Abitibi Act would make it possible to offset all the related costs.

[60] En ce qui concerne le droit, la Juge en chef établirait une norme propre au contexte des ordonnances environnementales qui exigerait une « probabilité proche de la certitude » que l'organisme administratif réalisera les travaux de restauration. Elle estime que ce critère s'impose parce que « les travaux de restauration peuvent être très coûteux » (par. 86). Je reconnais que les travaux de décontamination sont souvent coûteux, mais je crois que cette considération a été prise en compte par le législateur fédéral lors de l'adoption des dispositions particulières visant les réclamations en matière environnementale. De plus, je rappelle qu'en l'instance, le premier ministre a annoncé que les travaux de décontamination seraient réalisés sans coût net pour la province. Il était évident pour lui que l'adoption de l'Abitibi Act permettrait de compenser tous les coûts afférents.

[61] Thus, I prefer to take the approach generally taken for all contingent claims. In my view, the CCAA court is entitled to take all relevant facts into consideration in making the relevant determination. Under this approach, the contingency to be assessed in a case such as this is whether it is sufficiently certain that the regulatory body will perform remediation work and be in a position to assert a monetary claim.

[62] Finally, the Chief Justice would review the CCAA court's findings of fact. I would instead defer to them. On those findings, applying any legal standard, be it the one proposed by the Chief Justice or the one I propose, the Province's claim is monetary in nature and its motion for a declaration exempting the EPA Orders from the claims procedure order was properly dismissed.

[63] For these reasons, I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

The following are the reasons delivered by

THE CHIEF JUSTICE (dissenting) —

1. Overview

[64] The issue in this case is whether orders made under the Environmental Protection Act, S.N.L. 2002, c. E-14.2 ("EPA"), by the Newfoundland and Labrador Minister of Environment and Conservation ("Minister") requiring a polluter to clean up sites (the "EPA Orders") are monetary claims that can be compromised in corporate restructuring under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 ("CCAA"). If they are not claims that can be compromised in restructuring, the Abitibi respondents ("Abitibi") will still have a legal obligation to clean up the sites following their emergence from restructuring. If they are such claims, Abitibi will have emerged from restructuring free of the obligation, able to recommence business without remediating the [61] Par conséquent, je préfère retenir la méthode généralement suivie en matière de réclamations éventuelles. À mon avis, le tribunal chargé de l'application de la LACC peut prendre en compte l'ensemble des faits pertinents en vue de rendre la décision appropriée. Suivant cette approche, l'éventualité qu'il faut évaluer dans une affaire comme celle-ci est de savoir s'il est suffisamment certain que l'organisme administratif exécutera les travaux de décontamination et sera en mesure de faire valoir une réclamation pécuniaire.

[62] Enfin, la Juge en chef réviserait les conclusions de fait du juge de première instance. Pour ma part, je m'en remets à ces conclusions. Quelle que soit la norme juridique appliquée, soit celle proposée par la Juge en chef ou celle que je propose, au vu de ces conclusions, la réclamation de la province est de nature pécuniaire et sa requête demandant de déclarer que les ordonnances EPA n'étaient pas assujetties à l'ordonnance relative à la procédure de réclamations a été à juste titre rejetée.

[63] Pour ces motifs, je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi avec dépens

Version française des motifs rendus par

LA JUGE EN CHEF (dissidente) —

1. Aperçu

properties it polluted, the cost of which will fall on the Newfoundland and Labrador public.

restructuration sera terminée. Dans le cas contraire, Abitibi sera dégagée de cette obligation; elle pourra reprendre ses activités à l'issue de la restructuration sans avoir à décontaminer les sites qu'elle a pollués et la population de Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador devra supporter le coût de la décontamination.

[65] Remediation orders made under a province's environmental protection legislation impose ongoing regulatory obligations on the corporation required to clean up the pollution. They are not monetary claims. In narrow circumstances, specified by the CCAA, these ongoing regulatory obligations may be reduced to monetary claims, which can be compromised under CCAA proceedings. This occurs where a province has done the work, or where it is "sufficiently certain" that it will do the work. In these circumstances, the regulatory obligation would be extinguished and the province would have a monetary claim for the cost of remediation in the CCAA proceedings. Otherwise, the regulatory obligation survives the restructuring.

[66] In my view, the orders for remediation in this case, with a minor exception, are not claims that can be compromised in restructuring. On one of the properties, the Minister did emergency remedial work and put other work out to tender. These costs can be claimed in the CCAA proceedings. However, with respect to the other properties, on the evidence before us, the Minister has neither done the clean-up work, nor is it sufficiently certain that he or she will do so. The Province of Newfoundland and Labrador ("Province") retained a number of options, including requiring Abitibi to perform the remediation if it successfully emerged from the CCAA restructuring.

[66] À mon avis, les ordonnances exigeant la décontamination en l'espèce, à une exception près, ne constituent pas des réclamations pouvant faire l'objet de transactions dans le cadre d'une restructuration. Dans un des sites, la ministre de l'époque a effectué d'urgence la décontamination et a lancé un appel d'offres pour d'autres travaux. Le coût de ces travaux peut faire l'objet d'une réclamation dans les procédures engagées sous le régime de la LACC. Toutefois, en ce qui concerne les autres sites, selon les éléments de preuve dont nous disposons, le ministre en poste n'a pas effectué les travaux de décontamination et il n'est pas suffisamment certain qu'il le fera. La province de Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador (« province ») a conservé un certain nombre de solutions, dont celle d'obliger Abitibi à décontaminer les sites si elle réussit sa restructuration engagée sous le régime de la LACC.

[67] I would therefore allow the appeal and grant the Province the declaration it seeks that Abitibi is still subject to its obligations under the EPA following its emergence from restructuring, except for work done or tendered for on the Buchans site.

2. The Proceedings Below

[68] The CCAA judge took the view that the Province issued the EPA Orders, not in order to make Abitibi remediate, but as part of a money grab. He therefore concluded that the orders were monetary and financial in nature and should be considered claims that could be compromised under the CCAA (2010 QCCS 1261, 68 C.B.R. (5th) 1). The Quebec Court of Appeal denied leave to appeal on the ground that this "factual" conclusion could not be disturbed (2010 QCCA 965, 68 C.B.R. (5th) 57).

[69] The CCAA judge's stark view that an EPA obligation can be considered a monetary claim capable of being compromised simply because (as he saw it) the Province's motive was money, is no longer pressed. Whether an EPA order is a claim under the CCAA depends on whether it meets the requirements for a claim under that statute. That is the only issue to be resolved. Insofar as this determination touches on the division of powers, I am in substantial agreement with my colleague Deschamps J., at paras. 18-19.

3. The Distinction Between Regulatory Obligations and Claims Under the CCAA

[70] Orders to clean up polluted property under provincial environmental protection legislation are regulatory orders. They remain in effect until the [67] Je suis par conséquent d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi et d'accorder à la province le jugement déclaratoire sollicité portant qu'Abitibi reste assujettie à ses obligations en vertu de l'EPA au terme de cette période de restructuration, à l'exception des travaux sur le site de Buchans déjà exécutés ou à l'égard desquels des appels d'offres ont été lancés.

2. Les décisions des juridictions inférieures

[68] Le juge de première instance a adopté le point de vue selon lequel la province avait émis les ordonnances EPA, non pas pour obliger Abitibi à réparer les dommages causés, mais pour lui soutirer de l'argent. Il a donc conclu que les ordonnances étaient de nature pécuniaire et financière, et qu'elles devraient être considérées comme des réclamations pouvant faire l'objet de transactions sous le régime de la LACC (2010 QCCS 1261, 68 C.B.R. (5th) 1). La Cour d'appel du Québec a refusé l'autorisation d'interjeter appel de cette décision au motif que rien ne permettait de modifier cette conclusion « de fait » (2010 QCCA 965, 68 C.B.R. (5th) 57).

[69] Le point de vue peu nuancé du juge de première instance, selon lequel une obligation découlant de l'EPA peut être considérée comme une réclamation pécuniaire susceptible de faire l'objet d'une transaction du simple fait (à son avis) que la province n'était motivée que par l'argent, n'est plus en cause. Pour répondre à la question de savoir si une ordonnance émise sous le régime de l'EPA constitue une réclamation au sens de la LACC, il faut déterminer si elle satisfait aux conditions d'existence d'une réclamation établies par cette loi. Il s'agit de la seule question à trancher. Dans la mesure où la décision sur ce point touche le partage des pouvoirs, je souscris pour l'essentiel à l'opinion exprimée par ma collègue la juge Deschamps aux par. 18-19.

3. La distinction entre une exigence réglementaire et une réclamation au titre de la LACC

property has been cleaned up or the matter otherwise resolved.

[71] It is not unusual for corporations seeking to restructure under the CCAA to be subject to a variety of ongoing regulatory orders arising from statutory schemes governing matters like employment, energy conservation and the environment. The corporation remains subject to these obligations as it continues to carry on business during the restructuring period, and remains subject to them when it emerges from restructuring unless they have been compromised or liquidated.

[72] The CCAA, like the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA"), draws a fundamental distinction between ongoing regulatory obligations owed to the public, which generally survive the restructuring, and monetary claims that can be compromised.

[73] This distinction is also recognized in the jurisprudence, which has held that regulatory duties owed to the public are not "claims" under the BIA, nor, by extension, under the CCAA. In Panamericana de Bienes y Servicios S.A. v. Northern Badger Oil & Gas Ltd. (1991), 81 Alta. L.R. (2d) 45, the Alberta Court of Appeal held that a receiver in bankruptcy must comply with an order from the Energy Resources Conservation Board to comply with well abandonment requirements. Writing for the court, Laycraft C.J.A. said the question was whether the Bankruptcy Act "requires that the assets in the estate of an insolvent well licensee should be distributed to creditors leaving behind the duties respecting environmental safety . . . as a charge to the public" (para. 29). He answered the question in the negative:

The duty is owed as a public duty by all the citizens of the community to their fellow citizens. When the de nature réglementaire. Elles demeurent en vigueur jusqu'à ce que le site ait été décontaminé ou que l'affaire soit réglée d'une autre façon.

[71] Il n'est pas inhabituel pour les sociétés qui cherchent à se restructurer sous le régime de la LACC d'être assujetties à diverses ordonnances réglementaires continues découlant de régimes législatifs régissant des domaines tels que l'emploi, la conservation de l'énergie et l'environnement. La société demeure assujettie à ces exigences alors qu'elle continue d'exercer ses activités pendant la période de restructuration, et elle y demeure assujettie au terme de cette période de restructuration, à moins que ces exigences n'aient fait l'objet d'une transaction ou qu'elles n'aient été liquidées.

[TRADUCTION] L'obligation est établie comme une obligation à caractère public qui doit être respectée par citizen subject to the order complies, the result is not the recovery of money by the peace officer or public authority, or of a judgment for money, nor is that the object of the whole process. Rather, it is simply the enforcement of the general law. The enforcing authority does not become a "creditor" of the citizen on whom the duty is imposed. [Emphasis added; para. 33.]

l'ensemble des citoyens de la collectivité à l'égard de leurs concitoyens. Lorsque le citoyen visé par l'ordonnance s'y conforme, le résultat n'est pas perçu comme le recouvrement d'une somme d'argent par un agent de la paix ou l'autorité publique, ni comme l'exécution d'un jugement ordonnant le paiement d'une somme d'argent; d'ailleurs, cela ne constitue pas non plus l'objectif de l'ensemble du processus. Il faut plutôt y voir l'application d'une loi générale. L'organisme d'application de la loi ne devient pas un « créancier » du citoyen à qui incombe l'obligation. [Je souligne; par. 33.]

[74] The distinction between regulatory obligations under the general law aimed at the protection of the public and monetary claims that can be compromised in CCAA restructuring or bankruptcy is a fundamental plank of Canadian corporate law. It has been repeatedly acknowledged: Lamford Forest Products Ltd. (Re) (1991), 86 D.L.R. (4th) 534 (B.C.S.C.); Shirley (Re) (1995), 129 D.L.R. (4th) 105 (Ont. Ct. (Gen. Div.)), at p. 109; Husky Oil Operations Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue, [1995] 3 S.C.R. 453, at para. 146, per Iacobucci J. (dissenting). As Farley J. succinctly put it in Air Canada, Re [Regulators' motions] (2003), 28 C.B.R. (5th) 52 (Ont. S.C.J.), at para. 18: "Once [the company] emerges from these CCAA proceedings (successfully one would hope), then it will have to deal with each and every then unresolved [regulatory] matter."

[74] La distinction entre les exigences réglementaires découlant d'une loi d'application générale visant la protection du public, d'une part, et les réclamations pécuniaires pouvant faire l'objet d'une transaction dans le cadre d'une restructuration engagée sous le régime de la LACC ou en matière de faillite, d'autre part, constitue un élément important du droit canadien des sociétés. Cette distinction a maintes fois été reconnue : Lamford Forest Products Ltd. (Re) (1991), 86 D.L.R. (4th) 534 (C.S.C.-B.); Shirley (Re) (1995), 129 D.L.R. (4th) 105 (C. Ont. (Div. gén.)), p. 109; Husky Oil Operations Ltd. c. Ministre du Revenu national, [1995] 3 R.C.S. 453, par. 146, le juge Iacobucci (dissident). Comme l'a dit succinctement le juge Farley dans Air Canada, Re [Regulators' motions] (2003), 28 C.B.R. (5th) 52 (C.S.J. Ont.), par. 18 : [TRADUCTION] « À l'issue des procédures engagées en vertu de la LACC — souhaitons qu'elles soient couronnées de succès — [la société] aura alors à régler chacun des dossiers non résolus [en matière réglementaire]. »

[75] Recent amendments to the CCAA confirm this distinction. Section 11.1(2) now explicitly provides that, except to the extent a regulator is enforcing a payment obligation, a general stay does not affect a regulatory body's authority in relation to a corporation going through restructuring. The CCAA court may only stay specific actions or suits brought by a regulatory body, and only if such action is necessary for a viable compromise to be reached and it would not be contrary to the public interest to make such an order (s. 11.1(3)).

[75] Des modifications apportées récemment à la LACC confirment cette distinction. Le paragraphe 11.1(2) prévoit maintenant expressément que, sauf dans la mesure où un organisme de réglementation fait respecter une obligation de paiement, une suspension générale ne porte aucunement atteinte aux pouvoirs de celui-ci à l'égard d'une société en restructuration. Le tribunal chargé d'appliquer la LACC ne peut ordonner une suspension qu'à l'égard de certaines actions ou poursuites intentées par un organisme administratif, et seulement si cette mesure est nécessaire à la conclusion d'une transaction viable et si une telle ordonnance ne serait pas contraire à l'intérêt public (par. 11.1(3)).

[76] Abitibi argues that another amendment to the CCAA, s. 11.8(9), treats ongoing regulatory duties owed to the public as claims, and erases the distinction between the two types of obligation: see General Chemical Canada Ltd., Re, 2007 ONCA 600, 228 O.A.C. 385, per Goudge J.A., relying on s. 14.06(8) of the BIA (the equivalent of s. 11.8(9) of the CCAA). With respect, this reads too much into the provision. Section 11.8(9) of the CCAA refers only to the situation where a government has performed remediation, and provides that the costs of the remediation become a claim in the restructuring process even where the environmental damage arose after CCAA proceedings have begun. As stated in Strathcona (County) v. PriceWaterhouseCoopers Inc., 2005 ABQB 559, 47 Alta. L.R. (4th) 138, per Burrows J., the section "does not convert a statutorily imposed obligation owed to the public at large into a liability owed to the public body charged with enforcing it" (para. 42).

[76] Abitibi plaide qu'en vertu d'une autre modification apportée à la LACC, le par. 11.8(9), les exigences réglementaires continues établies en faveur du public sont considérées comme des réclamations, et que cette modification élimine la distinction entre les deux types d'obligations : voir General Chemical Canada Ltd., Re, 2007 ONCA 600, 228 O.A.C. 385, le juge Goudge, citant le par. 14.06(8) de la LFI (la disposition équivalente au par. 11.8(9) de la LACC). Avec égards, cette interprétation de la disposition est trop large. Le paragraphe 11.8(9) de la LACC vise uniquement la situation où un gouvernement a exécuté des travaux de réparation du dommage, et prévoit que les frais de réparation constituent une réclamation dans le cadre du processus de restructuration, même si les dommages ont été causés à l'environnement après l'introduction des procédures au titre de la LACC. Comme l'a déclaré le juge Burrows dans Strathcona (County) c. PriceWaterhouseCoopers Inc., 2005 ABQB 559, 47 Alta. L.R. (4th) 138, la disposition [TRADUCTION] « ne convertit pas une exigence imposée par la loi et établie en faveur du public en général en une dette envers l'organisme public chargé d'appliquer la loi » (par. 42).

4. When Does a Regulatory Obligation Become a Claim Under the CCAA?

[77] This brings us to the heart of the question before us: When does a regulatory obligation imposed on a corporation under environmental protection legislation become a "claim" provable and compromisable under the CCAA?

[78] Regulatory obligations are, as a general proposition, not compromisable claims. Only financial or monetary claims provable by a "creditor" fall within the definition of "claim" under the CCAA. A "creditor" is defined as "a person having a claim": s. 2, BIA. Thus, the identification of a "creditor" hangs on the existence of a "claim". Section 12(1) of the CCAA defines "claim" as "any indebtedness, liability or obligation . . . that . . . would be a debt provable in bankruptcy", which is

4. Quand une exigence réglementaire devient-elle une réclamation au titre de la LACC?

[77] Ceci nous amène au cœur de la question dont nous sommes saisis : quand une exigence réglementaire imposée à une société en vertu d'une loi sur la protection de l'environnement devient-elle une « réclamation » prouvable et pouvant faire l'objet d'une transaction aux termes de la LACC?

[78] En règle générale, les exigences réglementaires ne sont pas des réclamations pouvant faire l'objet d'une transaction. Seules les réclamations financières ou pécuniaires prouvables par un « créancier » correspondent à la définition de « réclamation » au sens de la LACC. Un « créancier » est défini comme étant une « [p]ersonne ayant une réclamation » : art. 2, LFI. Ainsi, l'identification d'un « créancier » repose sur l'existence d'une « réclamation ». Le paragraphe 12(1) de la LACC définit une « réclamation » accepted as confined to obligations of a financial or monetary nature.

[79] The CCAA does not depart from the proposition that a claim must be financial or monetary. However, it contains a scheme to deal with disputes over whether an obligation is a monetary obligation as opposed to some other kind of obligation.

[80] Such a dispute may arise with respect to environmental obligations of the corporation. The CCAA recognizes three situations that may arise when a corporation enters restructuring.

[81] The first situation is where the remedial work has not been done (and there is no "sufficient certainty" that the work will be done, unlike the third situation described below). In this situation, the government cannot claim the cost of remediation: see s. 102(3) of the EPA. The obligation of compliance falls in principle on the monitor who takes over the corporation's assets and operations. If the monitor remediates the property, he can claim the costs as costs of administration. If he does not wish to do so, he may obtain a court order staying the remediation obligation or abandon the property: s. 11.8(5) CCAA (in which case costs of remediation shall not rank as costs of administration: s. 11.8(7)). In this situation, the obligation cannot be compromised.

[82] The second situation is where the government that has issued the environmental protection order moves to clean up the pollution, as the legislation entitles it to do. In this situation, the government has a claim for the cost of remediation that is compromisable in the CCAA proceedings. This is because the government, by moving to clean up the pollution, has changed the outstanding regulatory comme étant « toute dette, tout engagement ou toute obligation [. . .] qui [. . .] constituerait une dette prouvable en matière de faillite », une définition dont la portée reconnue se limite aux obligations de nature financière ou pécuniaire.

[79] La LACC ne s'écarte pas du principe selon lequel une réclamation doit être financière ou pécuniaire. Elle prévoit cependant un régime permettant de régler les différends portant sur la question de savoir si une obligation est de nature pécuniaire, par opposition à une obligation d'une autre nature.

[80] Les obligations environnementales qui incombent à une personne morale peuvent engendrer un tel différend. La LACC reconnaît trois situations susceptibles de se présenter lorsqu'une personne morale s'engage dans un processus de restructuration.

[81] La première situation est celle où les travaux de restauration du site n'ont pas été exécutés (et il n'est pas « suffisamment certain » que les travaux seront exécutés, contrairement à la troisième situation exposée ci-après). En pareil cas, le gouvernement ne peut réclamer le coût de la restauration : voir le par. 102(3) de l'EPA. En principe, l'obligation de se conformer à la loi incombe au contrôleur qui prend en charge l'actif et les activités de la société. Si le contrôleur exécute les travaux de restauration du site, il peut réclamer les frais en tant que frais d'administration. S'il ne désire pas le faire, il peut obtenir de la cour une ordonnance suspendant l'exigence de restauration ou il peut abandonner l'immeuble : par. 11.8(5) de la LACC (dans ce cas, les frais de restauration ne font pas partie des frais d'administration : par. 11.8(7)). En pareil cas, l'obligation ne peut faire l'objet d'une transaction.

[82] La deuxième situation est celle où le gouvernement qui a émis l'ordonnance environnementale prend des mesures de décontamination, ce que la législation l'autorise à faire. En pareil cas, le gouvernement peut produire, pour le coût de la décontamination, une réclamation qui pourra faire l'objet d'une transaction dans le cadre des procédures engagées sous le régime de la LACC. Il en est ainsi obligation owed to the public into a financial or monetary obligation owed by the corporation to the government. Section 11.8(9), already discussed, makes it clear that this applies to damage after the CCAA proceedings commenced, which might otherwise not be claimable as a matter of timing.

parce que le gouvernement, en prenant des mesures pour décontaminer le site, a transformé l'exigence réglementaire non exécutée établie en faveur du public en une obligation financière ou pécuniaire à laquelle la société est tenue envers le gouvernement. Le paragraphe 11.8(9), examiné précédemment, prévoit clairement que cette situation s'applique aux dommages survenus après que les procédures ont été engagées au titre de la LACC; en l'absence d'une telle précision, ces dommages ne pourraient faire l'objet d'une réclamation compte tenu du moment choisi pour agir.

[83] A third situation may arise: the government has not yet performed the remediation at the time of restructuring, but there is "sufficient certainty" that it will do so. This situation is regulated by the provisions of the CCAA for contingent or future claims. Under the CCAA, a debt or liability that is contingent on a future event may be compromised.

[83] Une troisième situation peut se présenter : le gouvernement n'a pas encore exécuté des travaux de restauration au moment de la restructuration, mais il est « suffisamment certain » qu'il le fera. Cette situation est prévue par les dispositions de la LACC relatives aux réclamations éventuelles ou futures. Aux termes de la LACC, une dette ou un engagement qui dépend d'un événement futur peut faire l'objet d'une transaction.

[84] It is clear that a mere possibility that work will be done does not suffice to make a regulatory obligation a contingent claim under the CCAA. Rather, there must be "sufficient certainty" that the obligation will be converted into a financial or monetary claim to permit this. The impact of the obligation on the insolvency process is irrelevant to the analysis of contingency. The future liabilities must not be "so remote and speculative in nature that they could not properly be considered contingent claims": Confederation Treasury Services Ltd. (Bankrupt), Re (1997), 96 O.A.C. 75, at para. 4.

[84] Il est évident qu'une simple possibilité que les travaux soient exécutés ne suffit pas pour transformer une exigence réglementaire en une réclamation éventuelle au titre de la LACC. Pour en arriver à ce résultat, il faut plutôt qu'il soit « suffisamment certain » que l'exigence sera convertie en une réclamation financière ou pécuniaire. L'incidence de l'exigence sur le processus d'insolvabilité n'est pas pertinente pour l'analyse du caractère éventuel de la réclamation. Les engagements futurs ne doivent pas être [TRADUCTION] « si lointains et hypothétiques qu'ils ne puissent être considérés à bon droit comme des réclamations éventuelles » : Confederation Treasury Services Ltd. (Bankrupt), Re (1997), 96 O.A.C. 75, par. 4.

[85] Where environmental obligations are concerned, courts to date have relied on a high degree of probability verging on certainty that the government will in fact step in and remediate the property. In Anvil Range Mining Corp., Re (2001), 25 C.B.R. (4th) 1 (Ont. S.C.J.), Farley J. concluded that a contingent claim was established where the money had already been earmarked in the budget for the remediation project. He observed that

[85] Lorsque des exigences environnementales sont en cause, les tribunaux se sont jusqu'à ce jour fondés sur un haut degré de probabilité, proche de la certitude, que le gouvernement prendra réellement des mesures et exécutera les travaux de restauration. Dans Anvil Range Mining Corp., Re (2001), 25 C.B.R. (4th) 1 (C.S.J. Ont.), le juge Farley a conclu que la preuve d'une réclamation éventuelle était établie parce que les fonds avaient

"there appears to be every likelihood to a certainty that every dollar in the budget for the year ending March 31, 2002 earmarked for reclamation will be spent" (para. 15 (emphasis added)). Similarly, in Shirley (Re), Kennedy J. relied on the fact that the Ontario Minister of the Environment had already entered the property at issue and commenced remediation activities to conclude that "[a]ny doubt about the resolve of the [Ministry's] intent to realize upon its authority ended when it began to incur expense from operations" (p. 110).

déjà été dédiés au projet de restauration dans le budget. Il a fait remarquer qu'[TRADUCTION] « il semble fortement probable et presque certain que chaque dollar dédié aux réclamations figurant au budget établi pour l'année se terminant le 31 mars 2002 sera dépensé » (par. 15 (je souligne)). De même, dans Shirley (Re), le juge Kennedy s'est fondé sur le fait que les employés du ministère de l'Environnement de l'Ontario se trouvaient déjà sur le terrain en cause et avaient commencé les travaux de restauration pour conclure que [TRADUCTION] « [t]ous doutes quant à la détermination du [ministère] d'exercer son droit se sont estompés lorsque l'opération a commencé à lui occasionner des dépenses » (p. 110).

[86] There is good reason why "sufficient certainty" should be interpreted as requiring "likelihood approaching certainty" when the issue is whether ongoing environmental obligations owed to the public should be converted to contingent claims that can be expunged or compromised in the restructuring process. Courts should not overlook the obstacles governments may encounter in deciding to remediate environmental damage a corporation has caused. To begin with, the government's decision is discretionary and may be influenced by any number of competing political and social considerations. Furthermore, remediation may cost a great deal of money. For example, in this case, the CCAA court found that at a minimum the remediation would cost in the "mid-to-high eight figures", and could indeed cost several times that (para. 81). In concrete terms, the remediation at issue in this case may be expected to meet or exceed the entire budget of the Minister ($65 million) for 2009. Not only would this be a massive expenditure, but it would also likely require the specific approval of the legislature and thereby be subject to political uncertainties. To assess these factors and determine whether all this will occur would embroil the CCAA judge in social, economic and political considerations — matters which are not normally subject to judicial consideration: R. v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., 2011 SCC 42, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 45, at para. 74. It is small wonder, then, that courts assessing whether it is "sufficiently certain" that a government will clean up pollution created

[86] Une bonne raison explique pourquoi il convient d'interpréter l'expression « suffisamment certain » comme exigeant une « probabilité proche de la certitude » lorsqu'il s'agit de déterminer si des exigences environnementales continues établies en faveur du public devraient être converties en réclamations éventuelles qui peuvent être rayées ou faire l'objet d'une transaction dans le cadre du processus de restructuration. Les tribunaux ne devraient pas oublier les obstacles auxquels les gouvernements peuvent se heurter lorsqu'ils décident de réparer les dommages environnementaux causés par une société. D'abord, la décision du gouvernement est discrétionnaire, et elle peut être influencée par nombre de considérations politiques et sociales concurrentes. En outre, les travaux de restauration peuvent être très coûteux. En l'espèce, par exemple, le juge de première instance a conclu que ces travaux pourraient coûter au minimum [TRADUCTION] « entre cinquante et cent millions de dollars », et même plusieurs fois cette somme (par. 81). En termes concrets, le coût des travaux en cause en l'espèce pourrait atteindre ou dépasser le budget total du ministre (65 millions de dollars) pour l'exercice 2009. Il s'agirait non seulement d'une dépense énorme, mais il faudrait probablement aussi l'approbation explicite de l'assemblée législative, avec les incertitudes politiques que cela comporte. L'évaluation de ces facteurs et l'appréciation de la possibilité que tout ce qui précède se produise entraîneraient le juge chargé d'appliquer la LACC dans des considérations d'ordre by a corporation have insisted on proof of likelihood approaching certainty.

[87] In this case, as will be seen, apart from the Buchans property, the record is devoid of any evidence capable of establishing that it is "sufficiently certain" that the Province will itself remediate the properties. Even on a more relaxed standard than the one adopted in similar cases to date, the evidence in this case would fail to establish that remediation is "sufficiently certain".

5. The Result in This Case

[88] Five different sites are at issue in this case. The question in each case is whether the Minister has already remediated the property (making it to that extent an actual claim), or if not, whether it is "sufficiently certain" that he or she will remediate the property, permitting it to be considered a contingent claim.

[89] The Buchans site posed immediate risks to human health as a consequence of high levels of lead and other contaminants in the soil, groundwater, surface water and sediment. There was a risk that the wind would disperse the contamination, posing a threat to the surrounding population. Lead has been found in residential areas of Buchans and adults tested in the town had elevated levels of lead in their blood. In addition, a structurally unsound dam at the Buchans site raised the risk of contaminating silt entering the Exploits and Buchans rivers.

[90] The Minister quickly moved to address the immediate concern of the unsound dam and put social, économique et politique — des questions normalement soustraites à l'examen judiciaire : R. c. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltée, 2011 CSC 42, [2011] 3 R.C.S. 45, par. 74. Il n'est donc pas étonnant que les tribunaux, lorsqu'il s'agit d'apprécier s'il est « suffisamment certain » qu'un gouvernement procédera à la décontamination causée par une société, s'en soient tenus à la preuve d'une probabilité proche de la certitude.

[87] En l'espèce, comme nous le verrons, à l'exclusion du site de Buchans, le dossier est dénué d'éléments de preuve susceptibles d'établir qu'il est « suffisamment certain » que la province exécutera elle-même les travaux de décontamination. Même si l'on applique une norme plus souple que celle retenue jusqu'à ce jour dans des affaires semblables, la preuve en l'espèce n'établirait pas qu'il est « suffisamment certain » que les sites seront décontaminés.

5. L'issue du présent pourvoi

[88] En l'espèce, cinq sites différents sont en cause. La question dans chaque cas est de savoir si le ministre a déjà décontaminé les sites — il aurait alors une réclamation — ou, si tel n'est pas le cas, s'il est « suffisamment certain » qu'il exécutera les travaux de restauration, ce qui permettrait de considérer le coût de la décontamination comme une réclamation éventuelle.

[89] Le site de Buchans posait un risque immédiat à la santé pour les humains en raison de la forte concentration de plomb et d'autres contaminants présente dans le sol, l'eau souterraine et de surface ainsi que dans des sédiments. Il y avait un risque que le vent disperse la contamination, ce qui aurait représenté une menace pour la population environnante. On a trouvé du plomb dans des zones résidentielles de Buchans et les tests de sang ont révélé chez des adultes résidant dans la ville des concentrations élevées de plomb. De plus, un barrage en mauvais état situé sur le site de Buchans augmentait le risque de contamination du limon se déversant dans les rivières Exploits et Buchans.

[90] La ministre de l'époque a rapidement pris des mesures pour régler le problème immédiat du out a request for tenders for other measures that required immediate action at the Buchans site. Money expended is clearly a claim under the CCAA. I am also of the view that the work for which the request for tenders was put out meets the "sufficiently certain" standard and constitutes a contingent claim.

[91] Beyond this, it has not been shown that it is "sufficiently certain" that the Province will do the remediation work to permit Abitibi's ongoing regulatory obligations under the EPA Orders to be considered contingent debts. The same applies to the other properties, on which no work has been done and no requests for tender to do the work initiated.

[92] Far from being "sufficiently certain", there is simply nothing on the record to support the view that the Province will move to remediate the remaining properties. It has not been shown that the contamination poses immediate health risks, which must be addressed without delay. It has not been shown that the Province has taken any steps to do any work. And it has not been shown that the Province has set aside or even contemplated setting aside money for this work. Abitibi relies on a statement by the then-Premier in discussing the possibility that the Province would be obliged to compensate Abitibi for expropriation of some of the properties, to the effect that "there would not be a net payment to Abitibi": R.F., at para. 12. Apart from the fact that the Premier was not purporting to state government policy, the statement simply does not say that the Province would do the remediation. The Premier may have simply been suggesting that outstanding environmental liabilities made the properties worth little or nothing, obviating any net payment to Abitibi.

[93] My colleague Deschamps J. concludes that the findings of the CCAA court establish that it was barrage en mauvais état et a lancé un appel d'offres relatif aux autres mesures nécessitant une intervention immédiate sur le site de Buchans. Il est clair que les sommes d'argent dépensées constituent une réclamation au sens de la LACC. J'estime également que les travaux à l'égard desquels des appels d'offres ont été lancés satisfont à la norme de ce qui est « suffisamment certain » et qu'ils constituent une réclamation éventuelle.

[92] Il n'est pas « suffisamment certain » que la province entreprenne la décontamination des autres sites : aucune preuve au dossier ne laisse entrevoir cette possibilité. Il n'a pas été démontré que la contamination pose pour la santé des risques immédiats exigeant la prise de mesures dans les plus brefs délais. Il n'a pas été démontré que la province a pris quelque mesure que ce soit pour réaliser des travaux. Et il n'a pas été démontré que la province a prévu des sommes d'argent pour ces travaux ou qu'elle a même songé à en prévoir. Abitibi se fonde sur une déclaration du premier ministre de l'époque, qui examinait la possibilité que la province soit tenue de verser à Abitibi une indemnité pour l'expropriation de certains terrains, selon laquelle [TRADUCTION] « aucun montant net ne serait versé à Abitibi » : m.i., par. 12. Mis à part le fait que le premier ministre ne prétendait pas établir une politique gouvernementale, sa déclaration n'indique aucunement que la province exécuterait la décontamination. Le premier ministre indiquait peut-être simplement qu'en raison des exigences environnementales non respectées, les terrains ne valaient plus rien ou presque et qu'il serait inutile de verser quoi que ce soit à Abitibi.

[93] Ma collègue la juge Deschamps conclut que les constatations du juge de première instance "sufficiently certain" that the Province would remediate the land, converting Abitibi's regulatory obligations under the EPA Orders to contingent claims that can be compromised under the CCAA. With respect, I find myself unable to agree.

[94] The CCAA judge never asked himself the critical question of whether it was "sufficiently certain" that the Province would do the work itself. Essentially, he proceeded on the basis that the EPA Orders had not been put forward in a sincere effort to obtain remediation, but were simply a money grab. The CCAA judge buttressed his view that the Province's regulatory orders were not sincere by opining that the orders were unenforceable (which if true would not prevent new EPA orders) and by suggesting that the Province did not want to assert a contingent claim, since this might attract a counterclaim by Abitibi for the expropriation of the properties (something that may be impossible due to Abitibi's decision to take the expropriation issue to NAFTA (the North American Free Trade Agreement Between the Government of Canada, the Government of the United Mexican States and the Government of the United States of America, Can. T.S. 1994 No. 2), excluding Canadian courts). In any event, it is clear that the CCAA judge, on the reasoning he adopted, never considered the question of whether it was "sufficiently certain" that the Province would remediate the properties. It follows that the CCAA judge's conclusions cannot support the view that the outstanding obligations are contingent claims under the CCAA.

[95] My colleague concludes:

[The CCAA judge] did at times rely on indicators that are unique and that do not appear in the analytical framework I propose above, but he did so because of the exceptional facts of this case. Yet, had he formulated the établissent qu'il est « suffisamment certain » que la province décontaminerait les terrains, transformant ainsi les exigences réglementaires que les ordonnances EPA imposent à Abitibi en réclamations éventuelles pouvant faire l'objet d'une transaction sous le régime de la LACC. Avec égards, je ne puis souscrire à cette conclusion.

[94] Le juge de première instance ne s'est jamais posé la question cruciale de savoir s'il était « suffisamment certain » que la province exécuterait elle-même les travaux. Essentiellement, il a tenu pour acquis que les ordonnances EPA n'avaient pas été émises avec l'intention sincère d'obtenir la décontamination des sites, mais qu'il s'agissait simplement d'une manœuvre pour soutirer de l'argent. Le juge a renforcé son point de vue selon lequel les ordonnances réglementaires émises par la province étaient dépourvues de sincérité en exprimant l'avis qu'elles n'étaient pas susceptibles d'exécution (ce qui, si cela s'avérait exact, n'empêcherait pas que de nouvelles ordonnances soient émises). Le juge a également laissé entendre que la province ne voulait pas produire une réclamation éventuelle, ce qui aurait pu provoquer le dépôt d'une demande reconventionnelle d'Abitibi pour l'expropriation des propriétés (un résultat qui peut s'avérer impossible étant donné la décision d'Abitibi de soumettre la question de l'expropriation à l'ALÉNA (Accord de libre-échange nord-américain entre le gouvernement du Canada, le gouvernement des États-Unis d'Amérique et le gouvernement des États-Unis du Mexique, R.T. Can. 1994 n^{o} 2), en écartant la juridiction des tribunaux canadiens). Quoi qu'il en soit, il est évident que dans son raisonnement, le juge de première instance n'a jamais examiné la question de savoir s'il était « suffisamment certain » que la province décontaminerait les sites. Il s'ensuit que les conclusions du juge ne peuvent soutenir le point de vue selon lequel les obligations non exécutées constituent des réclamations éventuelles au sens de la LACC.

[95] Ma collègue conclut comme suit :

À l'occasion, [le juge] s'est appuyé sur des indicateurs singuliers qui ne figurent pas dans le cadre analytique que j'ai déjà proposé, mais cela s'explique par les faits exceptionnels en l'espèce. Or, s'il avait formulé la question question in the same way as I have, his conclusion, based on his objective findings of fact, would have been the same. . . . The CCAA judge's assessment of the facts . . . leads to no conclusion other than that it was sufficiently certain that the Province would perform remediation work and therefore fall within the definition of a creditor with a monetary claim. [Emphasis added; para. 58.]

[96] I must respectfully confess to a less sanguine view. First, I find myself unable to decide the case on what I think the CCAA judge would have done had he gotten the law right and considered the central question. In my view, his failure to consider that question requires this Court to answer it in his stead on the record before us: Housen v. Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235, at para. 35. But more to the point, I see no objective facts that support, much less compel, the conclusion that it is "sufficiently certain" that the Province will move to itself remediate any or all of the pollution Abitibi caused. The mood of the regulator in issuing remediation orders, be it disinterested or otherwise, has no bearing on the likelihood that the Province will undertake such a massive project itself. The Province has options. It could, to be sure, opt to do the work. Or it could await the result of Abitibi's restructuring and call on it to remediate once it resumed operations. It could even choose to leave the sites contaminated. There is nothing in the record that makes the first option more probable than the others, much less establishes "sufficient certainty" that the Province will itself clean up the pollution, converting it to a debt.

[97] I would allow the appeal and issue a declaration that Abitibi's remediation obligations under the EPA Orders do not constitute claims compromisable under the CCAA, except for work done or tendered for on the Buchans site.

comme je l'ai posée, sa conclusion, appuyée sur ses constatations de fait objectives, aurait été la même. [. . .] L'appréciation des faits par le juge [. . .] ne permet de tirer aucune conclusion autre que celle suivant laquelle il était suffisamment certain que la province exécuterait des travaux de décontamination et qu'elle était par conséquent visée par la définition d'un créancier ayant une réclamation pécuniaire. [Je souligne; par. 58.]

[96] Avec égards, je dois avouer que je ne partage pas la certitude de ma collègue à ce titre. Premièrement, j'estime ne pas pouvoir trancher le pourvoi en me fondant sur ce que je crois qu'aurait fait le juge de première instance s'il avait alors saisi correctement le droit et examiné la question réellement en jeu. À mon avis, le fait qu'il n'ait pas examiné cette question oblige notre Cour à y répondre à sa place au vu du dossier : Housen c. Nikolaisen, 2002 CSC 33, [2002] 2 R.C.S. 235, par. 35. Mais, plus précisément, je ne vois pas de faits objectifs qui appuient, et encore moins qui imposent, la conclusion selon laquelle il est « suffisamment certain » que la province entreprendra elle-même de décontaminer un site ou tous les sites pollués par Abitibi. L'humeur de l'organisme de réglementation qui ordonne la décontamination, qu'il soit ou non désintéressé, n'a aucune incidence sur la probabilité que la province entreprenne elle-même un projet d'une telle ampleur. Des choix s'offrent à la province. Elle pourrait certes choisir d'exécuter les travaux. Ou elle pourrait attendre le résultat de la restructuration d'Abitibi et lui demander d'exécuter les travaux d'assainissement une fois qu'elle aura repris ses activités. Elle pourrait même choisir de laisser les sites contaminés. Rien au dossier n'indique que le premier choix est plus susceptible d'être retenu que les autres, et encore moins qui établisse qu'il est « suffisamment certain » que la province exécutera elle-même la décontamination, convertissant ainsi l'opération en une créance.

[98] LeBel J. (dissenting) — I have read the reasons of the Chief Justice and Deschamps J. They agree that a court overseeing a proposed arrangement under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 ("CCAA"), cannot relieve debtors of their regulatory obligations. The only regulatory orders that can be subject to compromise are those which are monetary in nature. My colleagues also accept that contingent environmental claims can be liquidated and compromised if it is established that the regulatory body would remediate the environmental contamination itself, and hence turn the regulatory order into a monetary claim.

[99] At this point, my colleagues disagree on the proper evidentiary test with respect to whether the government would remediate the contamination. In the Chief Justice's opinion, the evidence must show that there is a "likelihood approaching certainty" that the province would remediate the contamination itself (para. 86). In my respectful opinion, this is not the established test for determining where and how a contingent claim can be liquidated in bankruptcy and insolvency law. The test of "sufficient certainty" described by Deschamps J., which does not look very different from the general civil standard of probability, better reflects how both the common law and the civil law view and deal with contingent claims. On the basis of the test Deschamps J. proposes, I must agree with the Chief Justice and would allow the appeal.

[100] First, no matter how I read the CCAA court's judgment (2010 QCCS 1261, 68 C.B.R. (5th) 1), I find no support for a conclusion that it is consistent with the principle that the CCAA does not apply to purely regulatory obligations, or that the court had evidence that would satisfy the test of "sufficient certainty" that the province of Newfoundland and

[99] Sur ce, mes collègues diffèrent d'opinion quant au critère de preuve applicable pour déterminer si le gouvernement entend effectuer la décontamination. De l'avis de la Juge en chef, la preuve doit démontrer une « probabilité proche de la certitude » que la province se chargerait de la décontamination (par. 86). À mon humble avis, il ne s'agit pas du critère établi pour déterminer si, et de quelle façon, une réclamation éventuelle peut être liquidée en droit de la faillite et de l'insolvabilité. Le critère de ce qui est « suffisamment certain » qu'énonce la juge Deschamps ne semble pas différer beaucoup de la norme générale de probabilité en matière civile et reflète mieux la façon dont la common law et le droit civil envisagent et traitent les réclamations éventuelles. Cependant, en appliquant le critère que propose la juge Deschamps, je dois souscrire aux motifs de la Juge en chef et je suis d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi.

[100] Tout d'abord, sans égard à la façon d'envisager le jugement du tribunal chargé d'appliquer la LACC (2010 QCCS 1261, 68 C.B.R. (5th) 1), rien à mon sens ne permet de conclure qu'il soit conforme au principe selon lequel la LACC ne s'applique pas aux exigences purement réglementaires, ou que la preuve faite devant le tribunal respecterait le critère

Labrador ("Province") would perform the remedial work itself.

[101] In my view, the CCAA court was concerned that the arrangement would fail if the Abitibi respondents ("Abitibi") were not released from their regulatory obligations in respect of pollution. The CCAA court wanted to eliminate the uncertainty that would have clouded the reorganized corporations' future. Moreover, its decision appears to have been driven by an opinion that the Province had acted in bad faith in its dealings with Abitibi both during and after the termination of its operations in the Province. I agree with the Chief Justice that there is no evidence that the Province intends to perform the remedial work itself. In the absence of any other evidence, an offhand comment made in the legislature by a member of the government hardly satisfies the "sufficient certainty" test. Even if the evidentiary test proposed by my colleague Deschamps J. is applied, this Court can legitimately disregard the CCAA court's finding as the Chief Justice proposes, since it did not rest on a sufficient factual foundation.

[102] For these reasons, I would concur with the disposition proposed by the Chief Justice.

voulant qu'il soit « suffisamment certain » que la province de Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador (« province ») exécuterait elle-même les travaux de décontamination.

[101] À mon avis, le tribunal de première instance craignait un échec de l'arrangement si les sociétés du groupe Abitibi intimées (« Abitibi ») ne pouvaient se libérer des exigences réglementaires relatives à la pollution. Le tribunal voulait écarter l'incertitude qui aurait assombri l'avenir de ces sociétés après leur réorganisation. De plus, sa décision semble motivée par l'opinion suivant laquelle la province avait traité de mauvaise foi avec Abitibi dès que cette dernière eût cessé ses activités dans cette province. Je suis d'accord avec la Juge en chef pour conclure qu'aucune preuve ne confirme l'intention de la province d'exécuter elle-même les travaux de décontamination. En l'absence de tout autre élément de preuve, une remarque faite en passant par un ministre devant l'assemblée législative peut difficilement satisfaire au critère de ce qui est « suffisamment certain ». Même si l'on applique le critère de preuve que propose ma collègue la juge Deschamps, notre Cour peut légitimement écarter les conclusions du tribunal de première instance comme le propose la Juge en chef car elles ne reposent sur aucun fondement factuel suffisant.

In order to exploit oil and gas resources in Alberta, a company needs a property interest in the oil or gas (typically, a mineral lease with the Crown, which Canadian courts classify as a profit à prendre), surface rights and a licence issued by the Alberta Energy Regulator ("Regulator"). Under provincial legislation, the Regulator will not grant a licence to extract, process or transport oil and gas in Alberta unless the licensee assumes end-of-life responsibilities for plugging and capping oil wells to prevent leaks, dismantling surface structures and restoring the surface to its previous condition. These end-of-life obligations are known as "abandonment" and "reclamation".

The Licensee Liability Rating Program is one means by which the Regulator seeks to ensure that end-of-life obligations will be satisfied by licensees. As part of this program, the Regulator assigns each company a Liability Management Rating ("LMR"), which is the ratio between the aggregate value attributed by the Regulator to a company's licensed assets and the aggregate liability attributed by the Regulator to the eventual cost of abandoning and reclaiming those assets. For the purpose of calculating the LMR, all the licences held by a given company are treated as a package. A licensee's LMR is calculated on a monthly basis and, where it dips below the prescribed ratio, the licensee is required to bring its LMR back up to the prescribed level by paying a security deposit, performing end-of-life obligations, or transferring licences with the Regulator's approval. If either the transferor or the transferee would have a post-transfer LMR below 1.0, Pour exploiter des ressources pétrolières et gazières en Alberta, une société a besoin d'un intérêt de propriété sur le pétrole ou le gaz (habituellement un bail d'exploitation minière avec la Couronne que les tribunaux canadiens qualifient de profit à prendre), des droits de surface et d'un permis délivré par l'Alberta Energy Regulator (« organisme de réglementation »). Selon la législation provinciale, l'organisme de réglementation n'accordera pas le permis voulu pour extraire, traiter ou transporter du pétrole et du gaz en Alberta à moins que le titulaire de permis n'assume les responsabilités de fin de vie consistant à obturer et à fermer les puits de pétrole afin d'éviter les fuites, à démanteler les structures de surface ainsi qu'à remettre la surface dans son état antérieur. Ces obligations de fin de vie sont appelées l'« abandon » et la « remise en état ».

Le Programme d'évaluation de la responsabilité du titulaire de permis constitue un moyen par lequel l'organisme de réglementation vise à s'assurer que les titulaires de permis rempliront les obligations de fin de vie. Dans le cadre de ce programme, l'organisme de réglementation attribue à chaque société une cote de gestion de la responsabilité (« CGR »), qui représente le rapport entre la valeur totale attribuée par l'organisme de réglementation aux biens d'une société qui sont visés par des permis et la responsabilité totale que l'organisme de réglementation attribue aux coûts éventuels de l'abandon et de la remise en état de ces biens. Pour les besoins du calcul de la CGR, tous les permis détenus par une société donnée sont traités comme un tout. La CGR d'un titulaire de permis est calculée sur une base mensuelle et, lorsqu'elle tombe sous le ratio prescrit, le titulaire de permis doit la ramener en versant un dépôt de garantie, en exécutant les obligations the Regulator will normally refuse to approve the licence transfer.

The insolvency of an oil and gas company licensed to operate in Alberta engages Alberta's comprehensive licensing regime, which is binding on companies active in the oil and gas industry, and the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act ("BIA"), federal legislation that governs the administration of a bankrupt's estate and the orderly and equitable distribution of property among its creditors. Alberta's Environmental Protection and Enhancement Act ("EPEA") ensures that a licensee's regulatory obligations will continue to be fulfilled when it is subject to insolvency proceedings by including the trustee of a licensee in the definition of "operator" for the purposes of the duty to reclaim and by providing that an order to perform reclamation work may be issued to a trustee. However, it expressly limits a trustee's liability in relation to such an order to the value of the assets in the bankrupt estate, absent gross negligence or wilful misconduct. The Oil and Gas Conservation Act ("OGCA") and the Pipeline Act take a more generic approach: they simply include trustees in the definition of "licensee". As a result, every power which these Acts give the Regulator against a licensee can theoretically also be exercised against a trustee. The Regulator has delegated the authority to abandon and reclaim "orphans" — oil and gas assets and their sites left behind in an improperly abandoned or unreclaimed state by defunct companies at the close of their insolvency proceedings — to the Orphan Well Association ("OWA"), an independent non-profit entity. The OWA has no power to seek reimbursement of its costs, but it may be reimbursed up to the value of any security deposit held by the Regulator to the credit of the licensee of the orphans once it has completed its environmental work.

Redwater, a publicly traded oil and gas company, was first granted licences by the Regulator in 2009. Its principal assets are 127 oil and gas assets — wells, pipelines and facilities — and their corresponding licences. A few of its licensed wells are still producing and profitable, but the majority are spent and burdened with abandonment and reclamation liabilities that exceed their value. In 2013, ATB Financial, which had full knowledge of the de fin de vie ou en transférant des permis avec l'approbation de l'organisme de réglementation. Si le cédant ou le cessionnaire devait avoir une CGR inférieure à 1,0 après le transfert, l'organisme de réglementation refusera normalement d'approuver le transfert de permis.

L'insolvabilité d'une société pétrolière et gazière autorisée à exercer ses activités en Alberta met en jeu le régime complet de délivrance de permis de l'Alberta qui lie les sociétés actives dans l'industrie pétrolière et gazière, ainsi que la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité (« LFI »), une loi fédérale qui régit l'administration de l'actif d'un failli ainsi que la répartition ordonnée et équitable des biens entre ses créanciers. L'Environmental Protection and Enhancement Act (« EPEA ») de l'Alberta garantit que les obligations réglementaires d'un titulaire de permis continuent d'être respectées pendant qu'il fait l'objet d'une procédure d'insolvabilité en incluant le syndic d'un titulaire de permis dans la définition d'« exploitant » pour l'application de l'obligation de remettre en état et en prévoyant la possibilité qu'une ordonnance de remise en état soit adressée à un syndic. Cependant, faute de négligence grave ou d'inconduite délibérée, elle limite expressément la responsabilité du syndic à l'égard d'une telle ordonnance à la valeur des éléments de l'actif du failli. L'Oil and Gas Conservation Act (« OGCA ») et la Pipeline Act adoptent une approche plus générique : elles incluent simplement le syndic dans la définition de « titulaire de permis ». En conséquence, tout pouvoir que ces lois confèrent à l'organisme de réglementation à l'encontre d'un titulaire de permis peut, en théorie, s'exercer également contre un syndic. L'organisme de réglementation a délégué à l'Orphan Well Association (« OWA »), une entité indépendante sans but lucratif, le pouvoir d'abandonner et de remettre en état les « orphelins » — les biens pétroliers et gaziers ainsi que leurs sites délaissés sans que les processus en question n'aient été correctement effectués par les sociétés liquidées à la fin de leur procédure d'insolvabilité. L'OWA n'a pas le pouvoir de demander le remboursement de ses frais, mais elle peut être remboursée jusqu'à concurrence de la valeur du dépôt de garantie détenu, le cas échéant, par l'organisme de réglementation au profit du titulaire de permis associé au puits orphelin une fois ses travaux environnementaux terminés.

Redwater, une société pétrolière et gazière cotée en bourse, s'est vu octroyer ses premiers permis par l'organisme de réglementation en 2009. Son actif est principalement composé de 127 biens pétroliers et gaziers — puits, pipelines et installations — et des permis correspondants. Quelques-uns des puits autorisés de Redwater sont encore productifs et rentables, mais la majorité est tarie et grevée de responsabilités relatives à l'abandon et à la remise en end-of-life obligations associated with Redwater's assets, advanced funds to Redwater and, in return, was granted a security interest in Redwater's present and after-acquired property. In mid-2014, Redwater began to experience financial difficulties. Grant Thornton Limited ("GTL") was appointed as its receiver in 2015. At that time, Redwater owed ATB approximately $5.1 million and had 84 wells, 7 facilities and 36 pipelines, 72 of which were inactive or spent, but, since Redwater's LMR did not drop below the prescribed ratio until after it went into receivership, it never paid any security deposits to the Regulator.

Upon being advised of Redwater's receivership, the Regulator notified GTL that it was legally obligated to fulfill abandonment obligations for all licensed assets prior to distributing any funds or finalizing any proposal to creditors. The Regulator warned that it would not approve the transfer of any of Redwater's licences unless it was satisfied that both the transferee and the transferor would be in a position to fulfill all regulatory obligations, and that the transfer would not cause a deterioration in Redwater's LMR. GTL concluded that it could not meet the Regulator's requirements because the cost of the end-of-life obligations for the spent wells would likely exceed the sale proceeds for the productive wells. Based on this assessment, GTL informed the Regulator that it was taking possession and control only of Redwater's 17 most productive wells, 3 associated facilities and 12 associated pipelines ("Retained Assets"), and that it was not taking possession or control of any of Redwater's other licensed assets ("Renounced Assets"). GTL's position was that it had no obligation to fulfill any regulatory requirements associated with the Renounced Assets. In response, the Regulator issued orders under the OGCA and the Pipeline Act requiring Redwater to suspend and abandon the Renounced Assets ("Abandonment Orders"). The Regulator imposed short deadlines, as it considered the Renounced Assets an environmental and safety hazard.

The Regulator and the OWA then filed an application for a declaration that GTL's renunciation of the Renounced Assets was void, and for orders requiring GTL to comply with the Abandonment Orders and to fulfill the end-of-life obligations associated with Redwater's licensed properties.

état qui excèdent leur valeur. En 2013, ATB, qui avait pleinement connaissance des obligations de fin de vie associées aux biens de Redwater, lui a avancé des fonds et, en contrepartie, s'est vu accorder une sûreté sur ses biens actuels et futurs. Au milieu de 2014, Redwater a commencé à éprouver des difficultés financières. Grant Thornton Limited (« GTL ») a été nommé séquestre de Redwater en 2015. À cette époque, Redwater devait environ 5,1 millions de dollars à ATB et comptait 84 puits, 7 installations et 36 pipelines, dont 72 étaient inactifs ou taris, mais, comme la CGR de Redwater n'est tombée sous le ratio prescrit qu'après la mise sous séquestre de cette dernière, elle n'a jamais versé de dépôt de garantie à l'organisme de réglementation.

Après avoir été informé de la mise sous séquestre de Redwater, l'organisme de réglementation a avisé GTL qu'il était légalement tenu de remplir les obligations d'abandon pour tous les biens visés par des permis avant de distribuer des fonds ou de finaliser toute proposition aux créanciers. L'organisme de réglementation a averti qu'il n'approuverait pas le transfert de l'un ou l'autre permis de Redwater à moins d'être convaincu que le cessionnaire et le cédant seraient en mesure de s'acquitter de toutes les obligations réglementaires, et que le transfert n'occasionnerait pas une détérioration de la CGR de Redwater. GTL a conclu qu'il ne pouvait pas satisfaire aux exigences de l'organisme de réglementation car le coût des obligations de fin de vie des puits taris dépasserait probablement le produit de la vente des puits productifs. Sur la base de cette évaluation, GTL a informé l'organisme de réglementation qu'il prenait possession et contrôle seulement des 17 puits les plus productifs de Redwater, ainsi que de 3 installations et de 12 pipelines connexes (« biens conservés »), et qu'il ne prenait pas possession ou contrôle de tous les autres éléments d'actif de Redwater visés par des permis (« biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation »). Selon GTL, il n'était aucunement tenu de satisfaire aux exigences réglementaires en lien avec les biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation. L'organisme de réglementation a réagi en rendant des ordonnances au titre de l'OGCA et de la Pipeline Act enjoignant à Redwater de suspendre l'exploitation des biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation et de les abandonner (« ordonnances d'abandon »). L'organisme de réglementation a imposé des délais serrés parce qu'il considérait les biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation comme un danger pour l'environnement et la sécurité.

L'organisme de réglementation et l'OWA ont alors déposé une demande en vue d'obtenir un jugement déclaratoire portant que l'abandon par GTL des biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation était nul, de même qu'une ordonnance obligeant GTL à se conformer aux ordonnances

The Regulator did not seek to hold GTL liable for these obligations beyond the assets remaining in the Redwater estate. GTL brought a cross-application seeking approval to pursue a sales process excluding the Renounced Assets and an order directing that the Regulator could not prevent the transfer of the licences associated with the Retained Assets on the basis of, inter alia, the LMR requirements, failure to comply with the Abandonment Orders, refusal to take possession of the Renounced Assets or Redwater's outstanding debts to the Regulator. A bankruptcy order was issued for Redwater and GTL was appointed as trustee. GTL invoked s. 14.06(4)(a)(ii) of the BIA in relation to the Renounced Assets.

The chambers judge and a majority of the Court of Appeal agreed with GTL and held that the Regulator's proposed use of its statutory powers to enforce Redwater's compliance with abandonment and reclamation obligations during bankruptcy conflicted with the BIA in two ways: (1) it imposed on GTL the obligations of a licensee in relation to the Redwater assets disclaimed by GTL, contrary to s. 14.06(4) of the BIA; and (2) it upended the priority scheme for the distribution of a bankrupt's assets established by the BIA by requiring that the provable claims of the Regulator, an unsecured creditor, be paid ahead of the claims of Redwater's secured creditors. The dissenting judge in the Court of Appeal would have allowed the Regulator's appeal on the basis that there was no conflict between Alberta's environmental legislation and the BIA.

Held (Moldaver and Côté JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be allowed.

Per Wagner C.J. and Abella, Karakatsanis, Gascon and Brown JJ.: The Regulator's use of its statutory powers does not create a conflict with the BIA so as to trigger the doctrine of federal paramountcy. Section 14.06(4) of the BIA is concerned with the personal liability of trustees, and does not empower a trustee to walk away from the environmental liabilities of the estate it is administering. Furthermore, the Regulator is not asserting any claims provable in the bankruptcy, and the priority scheme in the BIA is not upended. Thus, no conflict is caused by GTL's status as a licensee under Alberta legislation. Alberta's d'abandon et à remplir les obligations de fin de vie associées aux biens de Redwater visés par des permis. L'organisme de réglementation n'a pas cherché à tenir GTL responsable de ces obligations au-delà des éléments qui faisaient encore partie de l'actif de Redwater. GTL a présenté une demande reconventionnelle visant à obtenir l'autorisation de poursuivre un processus de vente excluant les biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation ainsi qu'une ordonnance interdisant à l'organisme de réglementation d'empêcher le transfert des permis associés aux biens conservés en raison, notamment, des exigences relatives à la CGR, du non-respect des ordonnances d'abandon, du refus de prendre possession des biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation ou des dettes en souffrance de Redwater envers l'organisme de réglementation. Une ordonnance de faillite a été rendue à l'égard de Redwater, et GTL a été nommé syndic. GTL a invoqué le sous-al. 14.06(4)a)(ii) de la LFI à l'égard des biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation.

Le juge siégeant en cabinet et les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel ont donné raison à GTL et décidé que l'utilisation proposée par l'organisme de réglementation des pouvoirs que lui confère la loi pour contraindre Redwater à respecter les obligations d'abandon et de remise en état au cours de la faillite était incompatible avec la LFI de deux façons : (1) elle imposait à GTL les obligations d'un titulaire de permis relativement aux biens de Redwater auxquels GTL avait renoncé, ce qui est contraire au par. 14.06(4) de la LFI; (2) elle renversait le régime de priorité établi par la LFI pour le partage des biens d'un failli en exigeant que le paiement de ses réclamations prouvables, en tant que créancier ordinaire, soit effectué avant celui des réclamations des créanciers garantis de Redwater. La juge dissidente de la Cour d'appel aurait accueilli l'appel de l'organisme de réglementation au motif qu'il n'y avait pas de conflit entre la législation environnementale de l'Alberta et la LFI.

Le juge en chef Wagner et les juges Abella, Karakatsanis, Gascon et Brown : L'utilisation par l'organisme de réglementation des pouvoirs que lui confère la loi ne crée pas de conflit avec la LFI de façon à mettre en jeu la doctrine de la prépondérance fédérale. Le paragraphe 14.06(4) de la LFI intéresse la responsabilité personnelle du syndic et il ne l'investit pas du pouvoir de se soustraire aux engagements environnementaux liant l'actif qu'il administre. De plus, l'organisme de réglementation ne fait valoir aucune réclamation prouvable en matière de faillite, et le régime de priorité de la LFI n'est pas renversé. Donc, le statut regulatory regime can coexist with and apply alongside the BIA.

Bankruptcy is not a licence to ignore rules, and insolvency professionals are bound by and must comply with valid provincial laws during bankruptcy. They must, for example, comply with non-monetary obligations that are binding on the bankrupt estate, that cannot be reduced to provable claims, and the effects of which do not conflict with the BIA, notwithstanding the consequences this may have for the bankrupt's secured creditors. Given the procedural nature of the BIA, the bankruptcy regime relies heavily on the continued operation of provincial laws but, where there is a genuine conflict between provincial laws concerning property and civil rights and federal bankruptcy legislation, the BIA prevails. The BIA as a whole is intended to further two purposes: the equitable distribution of the bankrupt's assets among his or her creditors and the bankrupt's financial rehabilitation. As Redwater is a corporation that will never emerge from bankruptcy, only the former purpose is relevant here.

The Abandonment Orders and the LMR requirements are based on valid provincial laws of general application — exactly the kind of valid provincial laws upon which the BIA is built. There is no conflict between the Alberta regulatory scheme and s. 14.06 of the BIA, because, under s. 14.06(4), a trustee's disclaimer of real property when there is an order to remedy any environmental condition or damage affecting that property protects the trustee from personal liability, while the ongoing liability of the bankrupt estate is unaffected. This interpretation is supported by the plain language of the section, the Hansard evidence, a previous decision of this Court and the French version of the section. The same concept is also found in both s. 14.06(1.2) and s. 14.06(2), which also specifically state that the trustee is not personally liable — it is impossible to coherently read s. 14.06(2) as referring to personal liability and yet read s. 14.06(4) as somehow referring to the liability of the bankrupt estate.

Even assuming that GTL had successfully disclaimed in this case, no operational conflict or frustration of purpose would result from the fact that the Regulator requires GTL, as a licensee, to expend estate assets on abandoning the Renounced Assets. Furthermore, no conflict would be caused by continuing to include the Renounced Assets in the calculation of Redwater's LMR. Finally, given the de GTL en tant que titulaire de permis au sens de la loi albertaine n'est à l'origine d'aucun conflit. Le régime de réglementation de l'Alberta peut coexister et s'appliquer conjointement avec la LFI.

La faillite n'est pas un permis de faire abstraction des règles, et les professionnels de l'insolvabilité sont liés par les lois provinciales valides au cours de la faillite. Par exemple, ils doivent respecter les obligations non pécuniaires liant l'actif du failli qui ne peuvent être réduites à des réclamations prouvables et dont les effets n'entrent pas en conflit avec la LFI, sans égard aux répercussions que cela peut avoir sur les créanciers garantis du failli. Étant donné la nature procédurale de la LFI, le régime de faillite repose en grande partie sur l'application continue des lois provinciales mais, en cas de conflit véritable entre les lois provinciales concernant la propriété et les droits civils et la législation fédérale sur la faillite, la LFI l'emporte. La LFI dans son ensemble est censée favoriser l'atteinte de deux objectifs : le partage équitable des biens du failli entre ses créanciers et la réhabilitation financière du failli. Puisque Redwater est une société qui ne s'extirpera jamais de la faillite, seul le premier objectif est pertinent en l'espèce.

Les ordonnances d'abandon et exigences relatives à la CGR reposent sur des lois provinciales valides d'application générale et elles représentent exactement le genre de loi provinciale valide sur lequel se fonde la LFI. Il n'y a aucun conflit entre le régime de réglementation de l'Alberta et l'art. 14.06 de la LFI parce que, suivant le par. 14.06(4), la renonciation du syndic à un bien réel en cas d'ordonnance de réparation de tout fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement et touchant ce bien dégage le syndic de toute responsabilité personnelle, alors que la responsabilité continue de l'actif du failli n'est pas touchée. Cette interprétation est étayée par le texte clair de l'article, les débats parlementaires, un arrêt de notre Cour et la version française de l'article. On retrouve également le même concept aux par. 14.06(1.2) et (2), lesquels disposent expressément que le syndic est dégagé de toute responsabilité personnelle. Il est impossible d'interpréter de manière cohérente le par. 14.06(2) comme mentionnant la responsabilité personnelle tout en interprétant le par. 14.06(4) comme renvoyant d'une façon ou d'une autre à la responsabilité de l'actif du failli.

À supposer même que GTL ait renoncé avec succès à des biens en l'espèce, l'organisme de réglementation ne cause aucun conflit d'application ni n'entrave la réalisation d'un objet fédéral en exigeant de GTL, à titre de titulaire de permis, qu'il se serve d'éléments de l'actif pour abandonner les biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation. En outre, il n'y aurait aucun conflit du fait que ces biens soient restraint with which the doctrine of paramountcy must be applied, and given that the Regulator has not attempted to hold GTL personally liable as a licensee for the costs of abandonment, no conflict with s. 14.06(2) or s. 14.06(4) of the BIA is caused by the mere theoretical possibility of personal liability under the OGCA or the Pipeline Act.

The end-of-life obligations binding on GTL are not claims provable in the Redwater bankruptcy. Not all environmental obligations enforced by a regulator will be claims provable in bankruptcy. The test set out by the Court in Newfoundland and Labrador v. AbitibiBowater Inc., 2012 SCC 67, [2012] 3 S.C.R. 443 ("Abitibi"), must be applied to determine whether a particular regulatory obligation amounts to a claim provable in bankruptcy: (1) there must be a debt, a liability or an obligation to a creditor; (2) the debt, liability or obligation must be incurred before the debtor becomes bankrupt; and (3) it must be possible to attach a monetary value to the debt, liability or obligation. Only the first and third parts of the test are at issue in the instant case.

With respect to the first part of the test, Abitibi should not be taken as standing for the proposition that a regulator is always a creditor when it exercises its statutory enforcement powers against a debtor. A regulator exercising a power to enforce a public duty is not a creditor of the individual or corporation subject to that duty. Here, it is not disputed that, in seeking to enforce Redwater's end-of-life obligations, the Regulator is acting in a bona fide regulatory capacity and does not stand to benefit financially. It is clear that the Regulator acted in the public interest and for the public good in issuing the Abandonment Orders and enforcing the LMR requirements and that it is, therefore, not a creditor of Redwater. The public is the beneficiary of those environmental obligations; the province does not stand to gain financially from them. Strictly speaking, this is sufficient to dispose of this aspect of the appeal.

As it may prove helpful in future cases, under the third part of the test, a court must determine whether there are sufficient facts indicating the existence of an environmental duty that will ripen into a financial liability owed toujours inclus dans le calcul de la CGR de Redwater. Enfin, vu la retenue avec laquelle il faut appliquer la doctrine de la prépondérance, et vu que l'organisme de réglementation n'a pas tenté de tenir GTL personnellement responsable, en tant que titulaire de permis, des frais d'abandon, aucun conflit avec les par. 14.06(2) ou (4) de la LFI n'est causé par la simple possibilité théorique de responsabilité personnelle en application de la OGCA ou de la Pipeline Act.

Les obligations de fin de vie incombant à GTL ne sont pas des réclamations prouvables dans la faillite de Redwater. Les obligations environnementales appliquées par un organisme de réglementation ne sont pas toutes des réclamations prouvables en matière de faillite. Il faut appliquer le critère énoncé par la Cour dans Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador c. AbitibiBowater Inc., 2012 CSC 67, [2012] 3 R.C.S. 443 (« Abitibi »), pour déterminer si une obligation réglementaire précise équivaut à une réclamation prouvable en matière de faillite : (1) on doit être en présence d'une dette, d'un engagement ou d'une obligation envers un créancier; (2) la dette, l'engagement ou l'obligation doit avoir pris naissance avant que le débiteur ne devienne failli; et (3) il doit être possible d'attribuer une valeur pécuniaire à cette dette, cet engagement ou cette obligation. Seules les première et troisième parties du critère sont en litige dans la présente affaire.

Pour ce qui est de la première partie du critère, l'arrêt Abitibi ne doit pas être considéré comme soutenant la thèse qu'un organisme de réglementation est toujours un créancier lorsqu'il exerce les pouvoirs d'application qui lui sont dévolus par la loi à l'encontre d'un débiteur. L'organisme de réglementation exerçant un pouvoir pour faire respecter un devoir public n'est pas un créancier de la personne ou de la société assujettie à ce devoir. En l'espèce, personne ne conteste qu'en cherchant à assurer le respect des obligations de fin de vie incombant à Redwater, l'organisme de réglementation agit de bonne foi à titre d'autorité de réglementation et il n'est pas en mesure d'obtenir un avantage financier. Il est clair que l'organisme de réglementation a agi dans l'intérêt public et pour le bien public en rendant les ordonnances d'abandon et en assurant le respect des exigences relatives à la CGR, et qu'il n'est donc pas un créancier de Redwater. C'est le public qui bénéficie de ces obligations environnementales; la province n'est pas en mesure d'en bénéficier financièrement. Cela suffit, à proprement parler, pour trancher cet aspect du pourvoi.

Comme cela pourrait se révéler utile à l'avenir, à la troisième partie du critère, le tribunal doit décider s'il y a suffisamment de faits indiquant qu'il existe une obligation environnementale de laquelle résultera une dette envers un to a regulator. In determining whether a non-monetary regulatory obligation of a bankrupt is too remote or too speculative to be included in the bankruptcy proceeding, the court must apply the general rules that apply to future or contingent claims. It must be sufficiently certain that the contingency will come to pass — in other words, that the regulator will enforce the obligation by performing the environmental work and seeking reimbursement. In the instant case, the Abandonment Orders and the LMR requirements fail to satisfy this part of the test. It is not established by the evidence that it is sufficiently certain that the Regulator will perform the abandonments and advance a claim for reimbursement. This claim is too remote and speculative to be included in the bankruptcy process. Furthermore, the Regulator's refusal to approve licence transfers unless and until the LMR requirements have been satisfied does not give it a monetary claim against Redwater.

In crafting the priority scheme of the BIA, Parliament intended to permit regulators to place a first charge on real property of a bankrupt affected by an environmental condition or damage in order to fund remediation. Thus, the BIA explicitly contemplates that environmental regulators will extract value from the bankrupt's real property if that property is affected by an environmental condition or damage. Although the nature of property ownership in the Alberta oil and gas industry meant that s. 14.06(7) was unavailable to the Regulator, the Abandonment Orders and the LMR replicate the effect of s. 14.06(7) in this case. Furthermore, Redwater's only substantial assets were affected by environmental conditions or damage. Accordingly, the Abandonment Orders and LMR requirements did not seek to force Redwater to fulfill end-of-life obligations with assets unrelated to the environmental condition or damage. In other words, recognizing that the Abandonment Orders and LMR requirements are not provable claims in this case does not interfere with the aims of the BIA — rather, it facilitates them.

Per Moldaver and Côté JJ. (dissenting): GTL and ATB have satisfied their burden of demonstrating a genuine inconsistency between federal and provincial law under both branches of the paramountcy test, namely operational conflict and frustration of purpose. Accordingly, the appeal should be dismissed.

organisme de réglementation. Pour établir si une obligation réglementaire non pécuniaire du failli est trop éloignée ou trop conjecturale pour être incluse dans la procédure de faillite, le tribunal doit appliquer les règles générales qui visent les réclamations futures ou éventuelles. Il doit être suffisamment certain que l'éventualité se concrétisera ou, en d'autres termes, que l'organisme de réglementation fera respecter l'obligation en exécutant les travaux environnementaux et en sollicitant le remboursement de ses frais. Dans le cas présent, les ordonnances d'abandon et les exigences relatives à la CGR ne satisfont pas à cette partie du critère. La preuve n'établit pas qu'il est suffisamment certain que l'organisme de réglementation procédera à l'abandon et présentera une demande de remboursement. Cette réclamation est trop éloignée et conjecturale pour être incluse dans la procédure de faillite. En outre, le refus de l'organisme de réglementation d'approuver les transferts de permis jusqu'à ce que les exigences relatives à la CGR aient été satisfaites ne lui donne pas une réclamation pécuniaire contre Redwater.

Au moment d'élaborer le régime de priorité de la LFI, le Parlement voulait permettre aux organismes de réglementation d'imposer une charge prioritaire sur le bien réel du failli touché par un fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement en vue de financer la décontamination. Ainsi, la LFI envisage explicitement la possibilité que des organismes de réglementation tirent une valeur des biens réels du failli touchés par un fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement. Bien que l'organisme de réglementation n'ait pu se prévaloir du par. 14.06(7), compte tenu de la nature de la propriété des biens dans l'industrie pétrolière et gazière de l'Alberta, les ordonnances d'abandon et la CGR reproduisent l'effet du par. 14.06(7) en l'espèce. De plus, les seuls biens de valeur de Redwater étaient touchés par un fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement. Les ordonnances d'abandon et exigences relatives à la CGR n'avaient donc pas pour objet de forcer Redwater à s'acquitter des obligations de fin de vie avec des biens étrangers au fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement. Autrement dit, la reconnaissance que les ordonnances d'abandon et exigences relatives à la CGR ne sont pas des réclamations prouvables en l'espèce facilite l'atteinte des objets de la LFI au lieu de la contrecarrer.

Les juges Moldaver et Côté (dissidents) : GTL et ATB se sont acquittés de leur fardeau de démontrer qu'il existe une incompatibilité véritable entre la loi fédérale et la loi provinciale selon les deux volets du test de la prépondérance, à savoir le conflit d'application et l'entrave à la réalisation d'un objet fédéral. Par conséquent, il y a lieu de rejeter le pourvoi.

Because Alberta's statutory regime does not recognize the disclaimers by trustees of assets encumbered by environmental liabilities as lawful by virtue of the fact that receivers and trustees are regulated as licensees who cannot disclaim assets, there is an unavoidable conflict between federal and provincial law. Alberta's legislation governing the oil and gas sector should therefore be held inoperative to the extent that it does not recognize the legal effect of GTL's disclaimers. An operational conflict arises where it is impossible to comply with both laws. An operational conflict analysis is an exercise in statutory interpretation: the Court must ascertain the meaning of each competing enactment in order to determine whether dual compliance is possible. This interpretation exercise takes place within the guiding confines of cooperative federalism, which operates as a straightforward interpretive presumption — one that supports, rather than supplants, the modern approach to statutory interpretation. Courts should favour an interpretation of the federal legislation that allows the concurrent operation of both laws; however, where the proper meaning of the provision cannot support a harmonious interpretation, it is beyond a court's power to create harmony where Parliament did not intend it.

In the instant case, reliance on cooperative federalism must not result in an interpretation of s. 14.06(4) of the BIA that is inconsistent with its language, context and purpose. The natural meaning which appears when s. 14.06(4) is simply read through is that it assumes and incorporates a pre-existing common law right to disclaim property in the context of bankruptcy and insolvency. This right is in keeping with the fundamental objective of trustees, which is the maximization of recovery for creditors as a whole by realizing the estate's valuable assets. It enables trustees to administer the estate in the most efficient manner and to avoid significant costs of administration that would reduce creditor recovery. Section 14.06(4) expresses the disclaimer right in unqualified terms and emphasizes that a trustee may not be held liable whenever that right is exercised. Parliament did not intend to condition the right to disclaim property on the actual existence of a risk of personal liability. Although the opening words of s. 14.06(4) refer to the personal liability of the trustee, when the words of the provision are read in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act and the intention of Parliament, their meaning becomes apparent. Avoiding personal liability is not the only effect of the appropriate exercise of this power. By properly disclaiming certain properties, the trustee is relieved of Étant donné que le régime législatif albertain ne reconnaît pas la légalité des renonciations des syndics à des biens grevés d'engagements environnementaux en raison du fait que les séquestres et les syndics sont réglementés comme des titulaires de permis qui ne peuvent renoncer à des biens, il y a un conflit inévitable entre la loi fédérale et la loi provinciale. La loi albertaine régissant l'industrie pétrolière et gazière devrait donc être déclarée inopérante dans la mesure où elle ne reconnaît pas l'effet juridique des renonciations de GTL. Il y a conflit d'application lorsqu'il est impossible de respecter les deux lois. L'analyse relative au conflit d'application relève de l'interprétation des lois : la Cour doit déterminer le sens de chaque loi concurrente afin de décider s'il est possible de respecter les deux lois. Cette démarche d'interprétation s'effectue à l'intérieur du cadre directeur du fédéralisme coopératif, lequel fait office de simple présomption en matière d'interprétation — qui appuie, sans la supplanter, la méthode moderne d'interprétation des lois. Les tribunaux doivent favoriser une interprétation de la loi fédérale permettant une application concurrente des deux lois; cependant, lorsque le sens qu'il convient de donner à la disposition ne peut appuyer une interprétation harmonieuse, un tribunal n'a pas le pouvoir de créer l'harmonie là où le Parlement n'a pas eu l'intention de le faire.

En l'espèce, le recours au principe du fédéralisme coopératif ne doit pas donner lieu à une interprétation du par. 14.06(4) de la LFI qui est incompatible avec son libellé, son contexte et son objet. Le sens naturel qui se dégage de la simple lecture du par. 14.06(4) dans son ensemble est qu'il présume et incorpore un droit préexistant en common law de renoncer à des biens dans le contexte de la faillite et de l'insolvabilité. Ce droit est en accord avec l'objectif fondamental poursuivi par les syndics : maximiser le recouvrement au bénéfice de l'ensemble des créanciers par la réalisation des éléments de valeur de l'actif. Il permet aux syndics d'administrer l'actif le plus efficacement possible et leur épargne des frais considérables d'administration qui réduiraient le recouvrement pour les créanciers. Le paragraphe 14.06(4) exprime le droit de renonciation en des termes qui ne comportent aucune restriction et fait ressortir que le syndic ne peut être tenu responsable quand ce droit est exercé. Le Parlement ne voulait pas rendre le droit de renoncer à un bien tributaire de l'existence d'un risque de responsabilité personnelle. Bien que le début du par. 14.06(4) parle de la responsabilité personnelle du syndic, lorsqu'on lit les termes de la disposition dans leur contexte global en suivant le sens ordinaire et grammatical qui s'harmonise avec l'économie de la loi, l'objet de la loi et l'intention du législateur, leur sens devient apparent. La protection contre any liabilities associated with the disclaimed property and loses the ability to sell it for the benefit of the estate. The disclaimer right allows the trustee not to realize assets that would provide no value to the estate's creditors and whose realization would therefore undermine the trustee's objective of maximizing recovery. However, s. 14.06(4) does not relieve the estate of its liabilities or environmental obligations once a trustee exercises the disclaimer power. The disclaimed property ultimately reverts to the estate at the conclusion of the bankruptcy proceedings, as is the case with unrealized assets. Whether the estate has sufficient assets capable of satisfying those liabilities at that point in time is a separate question that is unrelated to the underlying fact of ongoing liability.

In accordance with the predominant and well-established modern approach to statutory interpretation, courts must read statutory provisions in their entire context, as parts of a coherent whole. In s. 14.06(4) of the BIA, Parliament has expressly referred to this disclaimer power and spelled out the particular effects flowing from its proper exercise. By doing so, it has purposefully incorporated the disclaimer power into its statutory scheme to achieve its desired purpose. Courts must read statutory provisions in their entire context, and Parliament is presumed to craft sections and subsections of legislation as parts of a coherent whole. The immediate statutory context surrounding s. 14.06(4), specifically, ss. 14.06(2), (5), (6) and (7), as well as the Hansard evidence, confirms that a trustee's right to disclaim property is not limited to protecting itself from personal liability.

The power to disclaim assets provided to trustees by s. 14.06(4) of the BIA was available to GTL on the facts of this case. The statutory conditions to the exercise of this power were met: the Abandonment Orders clearly relate to the remediation of an environmental condition. Additionally, the right of disclaimer is applicable in the context of the statutory regime governing the oil and gas industry. In delineating what interests may be disclaimed by a trustee under s. 14.06(4), Parliament used exceptionally broad language: the trustee is permitted to disclaim "any interest" in "any real property". GTL sought to disclaim profits à prendre and surface leases, which can be characterized as real property interests.

The requirement by the Regulator that GTL satisfy Redwater's environmental liabilities ahead of the estate's toute responsabilité personnelle n'est pas le seul effet de l'exercice régulier de ce pouvoir. En renonçant à bon droit à certains biens, le syndic est dégagé de toute responsabilité associée aux biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation et ne peut plus vendre les biens au profit de l'actif. Le droit de renonciation permet au syndic de ne pas réaliser des biens qui ne seraient pas profitables aux créanciers de l'actif et compromettraient par le fait même son objectif de maximiser le recouvrement. Cependant, le par. 14.06(4) ne décharge pas l'actif de ses obligations ou engagements environnementaux une fois que le syndic exerce le pouvoir de renonciation. Le bien visé par une renonciation retourne ultimement dans l'actif du failli à l'issue du processus de faillite, comme c'est le cas pour les biens non réalisés. La question de savoir si les éléments d'actif sont suffisants pour satisfaire à ces engagements à ce moment précis est une question distincte qui n'a aucun rapport avec le fait sous-jacent de la responsabilité continue.

D'après la méthode prédominante et bien établie d'interprétation des lois, les tribunaux doivent lire les dispositions législatives dans leur contexte global, comme un tout cohérent. Au paragraphe 14.06(4) de la LFI, le Parlement a mentionné expressément ce pouvoir de renonciation et exposé les effets particuliers découlant de son exercice approprié. Il a incorporé ainsi à dessein à son régime législatif le pouvoir de renonciation pour en réaliser l'objectif visé. Les tribunaux doivent lire les dispositions législatives dans leur contexte global, et le Parlement est présumé rédiger les articles et paragraphes d'une loi comme un tout cohérent. Le contexte immédiat du par. 14.06(4), plus précisément les par. 14.06(2), (5), (6) et (7), ainsi que les débats parlementaires, confirme que le droit du syndic de renoncer à des biens ne se limite pas à se prémunir contre une responsabilité personnelle.

Le pouvoir de renoncer à des biens que confère aux syndics le par. 14.06(4) de la LFI pouvait être exercé par GTL à la lumière des faits de la présente affaire. Les conditions statutaires préalables à l'exercice de ce pouvoir étaient réunies : les ordonnances d'abandon se rapportent clairement à la réparation d'un fait lié à l'environnement. En outre, le droit de renonciation s'applique dans le contexte du régime législatif régissant l'industrie pétrolière et gazière. En décidant des intérêts auxquels peut renoncer un syndic en vertu du par. 14.06(4), le Parlement a utilisé des mots exceptionnellement larges : il est permis au syndic de renoncer à « tout intérêt » sur « le bien réel ». GTL a tenté de renoncer aux profits à prendre et aux droits de surface, qui peuvent être qualifiés d'intérêts sur des biens réels.

L'exigence de l'organisme de réglementation voulant que GTL acquitte les engagements environnementaux de other debts contravenes the BIA's priority scheme. The Province's licensing scheme therefore should be held inoperative under the second prong of the paramountcy test, frustration of purpose. Even where dual compliance with both federal and provincial law is, strictly speaking, possible, provincial legislation or provisions will be rendered inoperative to the extent that they have the effect of frustrating a valid federal legislative purpose. The focus of the analysis is on the effect of the provincial legislation or provision, not its purpose. In the instant case, if the environmental claims asserted by the Regulator (i.e., the Abandonment Orders) are provable in bankruptcy, the Regulator will not be permitted to assert those claims outside the bankruptcy process and ahead of Redwater's secured creditors because this would frustrate the purpose of the federal priority scheme.

In Abitibi, the Court established a three-part test, rooted in the language of the BIA, to determine whether a claim is provable in bankruptcy. The first prong of the Abitibi test asks whether the debt, liability or obligation at issue is owed by a bankrupt entity to a creditor. The language of Abitibi admits of no ambiguity, uncertainty or doubt: the only determination that has to be made is whether the regulatory body has exercised its enforcement power against a debtor. Most environmental regulatory bodies can be creditors, and government entities cannot systematically evade the priority requirements of federal bankruptcy legislation under the guise of enforcing public duties. In the instant case, the first prong is satisfied. There is no doubt that the Regulator exercised its enforcement power against a debtor when it issued orders requiring Redwater to perform the environmental work on the non-producing properties. It is neither appropriate nor necessary in this case to attempt to redefine the first prong of the Abitibi test by narrowing the broad definition of "creditor" as the majority does.

There is no dispute that the second prong of the Abitibi test, which requires that the debt, liability or obligation be incurred before the debtor becomes bankrupt, is satisfied. The third prong asks whether it is sufficiently certain that the regulator will perform the work and make a claim for reimbursement. In this case, it is sufficiently certain that either the Regulator or its delegate, the OWA, will ultimately perform the abandonment and reclamation work and assert a monetary claim for reimbursement. Therefore, the final prong of the Abitibi test is satisfied. The chambers

Redwater avant les autres dettes de l'actif contrevient au régime de priorité établi par la LFI. Le régime provincial de délivrance de permis devrait donc être déclaré inopérant suivant le second volet du critère de la prépondérance, l'entrave à la réalisation d'un objet fédéral. Même lorsqu'il est à proprement parler possible de se conformer à la fois à la loi fédérale et à la loi provinciale, la loi ou les dispositions provinciales seront néanmoins rendues inopérantes dans la mesure où elles ont pour effet d'entraver la réalisation d'un objet valide d'une loi fédérale. L'analyse est axée sur l'effet de la loi ou de la disposition provinciale, et non sur son objet. En l'espèce, si les réclamations environnementales que fait valoir l'organisme de réglementation (c.-à-d. les ordonnances d'abandon) sont prouvables en matière de faillite, il n'est pas autorisé à faire valoir ces réclamations en dehors du processus de faillite et avant les créanciers garantis de Redwater, car cela entraverait la réalisation de l'objet du régime de priorité fédéral.

Dans Abitibi, la Cour a établi un test à trois volets, fondé sur le libellé de la LFI, pour déterminer si une réclamation est prouvable en matière de faillite. Le premier volet du test Abitibi pose la question de savoir si la dette, l'engagement ou l'obligation en cause sont dus par une entité faillie à un créancier. Le texte de cet arrêt ne laisse place à aucune ambiguïté, incertitude ou doute à cet égard : la seule question à trancher est de savoir si l'organisme de réglementation a exercé, à l'encontre d'un débiteur, son pouvoir de faire appliquer la loi. La plupart des organismes de réglementation environnementaux peuvent agir à titre de créanciers, et les entités gouvernementales ne sauraient systématiquement se soustraire aux exigences en matière de priorité de la loi fédérale sur la faillite sous le couvert de l'obligation de faire respecter les devoirs publics. Dans la présente affaire, il est satisfait au premier volet. Il ne fait aucun doute que l'organisme de réglementation a exercé son pouvoir d'appliquer la loi à l'encontre d'une débitrice lorsqu'il a rendu les ordonnances enjoignant à Redwater d'accomplir les travaux environnementaux sur les biens inexploités. Il n'est ni approprié ni nécessaire en l'espèce d'essayer de redéfinir ce volet du test Abitibi en restreignant le large sens attribué par la majorité au mot « créancier ».

Personne ne conteste qu'il est satisfait au second volet du test Abitibi, lequel exige que la dette, l'engagement ou l'obligation ait pris naissance avant que le débiteur ne devienne failli. Le troisième volet pose la question de savoir s'il est suffisamment certain que l'organisme de réglementation exécutera les travaux et présentera une demande de remboursement. En l'espèce, il est suffisamment certain que l'organisme de réglementation ou sa délégataire, l'OWA, effectuera ultimement les travaux d'abandon et de remise en état et fera valoir une réclamation pécuniaire judge made three critical findings of fact that easily support this conclusion. First, he found that GTL was not in possession of the disclaimed properties and, in any event, had no ability to perform any kind of work on these assets because the environmental liabilities exceeded the value of the estate itself and Redwater had no working interest participants that would step in to perform the work. As a result, he concluded that there was no other party who could be compelled to carry out the work. Second, in light of the fact that neither GTL nor Redwater's working interest participants would (or could) undertake this work, the chambers judge found as a fact that the Regulator will ultimately be responsible for the abandonment costs, since it has the power to seek recovery of abandonment costs and has actually performed the work on occasion, and has expressly stated an intention to seek reimbursement for the costs of abandoning the renounced assets. Third, the chambers judge found that the Regulator's only realistic alternative to performing the remediation work itself was to deem the renounced assets to be orphan wells. In this circumstance, he found that the legislation and evidence shows that if the Regulator deems a well an orphan, then the OWA will perform the work. In light of these factual determinations, the chambers judge rightly concluded that the sufficient certainty standard of Abitibi was satisfied because at a minimum, either the Regulator or the OWA will complete the abandonment work.

The majority elevates form over substance in concluding that the sufficient certainty standard is not satisfied when a regulatory body's delegate, as opposed to the regulatory body itself, performs the work. Considering the salient features of the OWA and its relationship with the Regulator, one must conclude that they are inextricably intertwined. When the Regulator exercises its statutory powers to declare a property an "orphan" under s. 70(2) of Alberta's Oil and Gas Conservation Act, it effectively delegates the abandonment work to the OWA. The majority's alternative conclusion that it is not sufficiently certain that even the OWA will perform the abandonment work would permit the Regulator to benefit from strategic gamesmanship by manipulating the timing of its intervention in order to escape the insolvency regime and strip Redwater of its assets.

afin d'obtenir un remboursement. Il est donc satisfait au dernier volet du test Abitibi. Le juge en cabinet a tiré trois conclusions de fait cruciales qui appuient aisément cette conclusion. Premièrement, il a conclu que GTL n'était pas en possession des biens visés par les renonciations et, de toute façon, qu'il ne peut pas exécuter de travaux sur ces biens parce que les engagements environnementaux dépassaient la valeur de l'actif même et Redwater ne comptait aucun participant en participation directe qui se chargerait d'exécuter les travaux. Il a donc conclu qu'il n'existe aucune autre partie susceptible d'être contrainte d'exécuter les travaux. Deuxièmement, compte tenu du fait que ni GTL ni les participants en participation directe de Redwater ne voudraient (ou ne pourraient) entreprendre ces travaux, le juge en cabinet a tiré la conclusion de fait selon laquelle l'organisme de réglementation sera en fin de compte responsable des frais d'abandon, car il a le pouvoir de tenter de recouvrer les frais d'abandon et a réellement exécuté les travaux à l'occasion. Il a aussi expressément manifesté l'intention de demander le remboursement des frais liés à l'abandon des biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation. Troisièmement, le juge en cabinet a conclu que la seule solution réaliste qui s'offre à l'organisme de réglementation autre que celle d'effectuer lui-même les travaux de décontamination était de considérer les biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation comme des puits orphelins. Il a conclu qu'en pareil cas, les dispositions législatives et les éléments de preuve démontrent que, si l'organisme de réglementation considère un puits comme orphelin, l'OWA exécutera les travaux. À la lumière de ces conclusions de fait, le juge en cabinet a eu raison de conclure qu'il était satisfait à la norme de certitude suffisante énoncée dans Abitibi parce qu'à tout le moins, l'organisme de réglementation ou l'OWA mènerait à terme les travaux d'abandon.

La majorité fait passer la forme avant le fond en concluant qu'il n'est pas satisfait à la norme de certitude suffisante lorsque le délégataire de l'organisme de réglementation, et non l'organisme de réglementation lui-même, effectue les travaux. Vu les caractéristiques saillantes de l'OWA et de sa relation avec l'organisme de réglementation, force est de constater qu'ils sont inextricablement liés. Lorsque l'organisme de réglementation exerce le pouvoir de déclarer un bien « orphelin » que lui confère le par. 70(2) de l'Oil and Gas Conservation Act de l'Alberta, il délègue effectivement l'exécution des travaux d'abandon à l'OWA. La conclusion subsidiaire de la majorité selon laquelle il n'est pas suffisamment certain que même l'OWA exécutera les travaux d'abandon permettrait à l'organisme de réglementation de tirer profit de manœuvres stratégiques en manipulant le moment de son intervention afin de se soustraire au régime d'insolvabilité et de dépouiller Redwater de ses biens.

Since it is sufficiently certain that the Regulator (or the OWA, as its delegate) will complete the abandonment and reclamation work, all three prongs of the Abitibi test are satisfied. The Regulator's Abandonment Orders constitute "claims provable in bankruptcy". It would undermine the BIA's priority scheme and therefore frustrate an essential purpose of the BIA if the Regulator could assert those claims outside the bankruptcy process — and ahead of the estate's secured creditors — whether by compelling GTL to carry out those orders or by making the sale of Redwater's valuable assets conditional on the fulfillment of those obligations.

Comme il est suffisamment certain que l'organisme de réglementation (ou l'OWA, sa délégataire) achèvera les travaux d'abandon et de remise en état, il est satisfait aux trois volets du test Abitibi. Les ordonnances d'abandon de l'organisme de réglementation constituent des « réclamations prouvables en matière de faillite ». Ce serait saper le régime de priorités établi par la LFI et entraver la réalisation d'un objet essentiel de la LFI que de permettre à l'organisme de réglementation de faire valoir ces réclamations en dehors du processus de faillite — et en priorité par rapport aux créanciers garantis de l'actif — que ce soit en obligeant GTL à exécuter ces ordonnances ou en faisant dépendre la vente des biens de valeur de Redwater de l'acquittement de ces obligations.

LE JUGE EN CHEF —

I. Introduction

[1] L'industrie pétrolière et gazière est une composante lucrative et importante de l'économie albertaine et canadienne. Cette industrie entraîne unavoidable environmental costs and consequences. To address them, Alberta has established a comprehensive cradle-to-grave licensing regime that is binding on companies active in the industry. A company will not be granted the licences that it needs to extract, process or transport oil and gas in Alberta unless it assumes end-of-life responsibilities for plugging and capping oil wells to prevent leaks, dismantling surface structures and restoring the surface to its previous condition. These obligations are known as "reclamation" and "abandonment" (Environmental Protection and Enhancement Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. E-12 ("EPEA"), s. 1(ddd), and Oil and Gas Conservation Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. O-6 ("OGCA"), s. 1(1)(a)).

[2] The question in this appeal is what happens to these obligations when a company is bankrupt and a trustee in bankruptcy is charged with distributing its assets among various creditors according to the rules in the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA"). Redwater Energy Corporation ("Redwater") is the bankrupt company at the centre of this appeal. Its principal assets are 127 oil and gas assets — wells, pipelines and facilities — and their corresponding licences. A few of Redwater's licensed wells are still producing and profitable. The majority of the wells are spent and burdened with abandonment and reclamation liabilities that exceed their value.

[3] The Alberta Energy Regulator ("Regulator") and the Orphan Well Association ("OWA") are the appellants in this Court. (For simplicity, I will refer to the Regulator when discussing the appellants' position, unless otherwise noted.) The Regulator administers Alberta's licensing regime and enforces the abandonment and reclamation obligations of licensees. The Regulator has delegated to the OWA, an independent non-profit entity, the authority to abandon and reclaim "orphans", which are oil and gas assets and their sites left behind in an improperly abandoned or unreclaimed state by defunct companies at the close of their insolvency proceedings. The Regulator says that, one way or another, the également certains coûts et certaines conséquences inévitables pour l'environnement. Pour y faire face, l'Alberta a mis en place un régime complet de délivrance de permis du berceau à la tombe qui lie les sociétés actives dans l'industrie. Une société n'obtiendra pas les permis dont elle a besoin pour extraire, traiter ou transporter du pétrole et du gaz en Alberta, à moins qu'elle n'assume les responsabilités de fin de vie consistant à obturer et à fermer les puits de pétrole afin d'éviter les fuites, à démanteler les structures de surface ainsi qu'à remettre la surface dans son état antérieur. Ces obligations sont appelées la [TRADUCTION] « remise en état » et l'« abandon » (Environmental Protection and Enhancement Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. E-12 (« EPEA »), al. 1(ddd) et Oil and Gas Conservation Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. O-6 (« OGCA »), al. 1(1)(a)).

[3] L'Alberta Energy Regulator (« organisme de réglementation ») et l'Orphan Well Association (« OWA ») sont les appelants devant notre Cour (pour simplifier, je les appellerai l'organisme de réglementation au moment d'analyser la position des appelants, sauf indication contraire). L'organisme de réglementation administre le régime de délivrance de permis de l'Alberta et assure le respect, par les titulaires de permis, des obligations relatives à l'abandon et à la remise en état. L'organisme de réglementation a délégué à l'OWA, une entité indépendante sans but lucratif, le pouvoir d'abandonner et de remettre en état les « orphelins » — les biens pétroliers et gaziers ainsi que leurs sites délaissés ou non réclamés sans remaining value of the Redwater estate must be applied to meet the abandonment and reclamation obligations associated with its licensed assets.

[4] Redwater's trustee in bankruptcy, Grant Thornton Limited ("GTL"), and Redwater's primary secured creditor, Alberta Treasury Branches ("ATB"), oppose the appeal. (For simplicity, I will refer to GTL when discussing the respondents' position, unless otherwise noted.) GTL argues that, since it has disclaimed Redwater's unproductive oil and gas assets, s. 14.06(4) of the BIA empowers it to walk away from those assets and the environmental liabilities associated with them and to deal solely with Redwater's producing oil and gas assets. Alternatively, GTL argues that, under the priority scheme in the BIA, the claims of Redwater's secured creditors must be satisfied ahead of Redwater's environmental liabilities. Relying on the doctrine of paramountcy, GTL says that Alberta's environmental legislation regulating the oil and gas industry is constitutionally inoperative to the extent that it authorizes the Regulator to interfere with this arrangement.

[5] The chambers judge (2016 ABQB 278, 37 C.B.R. (6th) 88) and a majority of the Court of Appeal (2017 ABCA 124, 47 C.B.R. (6th) 171) agreed with GTL. The Regulator's proposed use of its statutory powers to enforce Redwater's compliance with abandonment and reclamation obligations during bankruptcy was held to conflict with the BIA in two ways: (1) it imposed on GTL the obligations of a licensee in relation to the Redwater assets disclaimed by GTL, contrary to s. 14.06(4) of the BIA; and (2) it upended the priority scheme for the distribution of a bankrupt's assets established by the BIA by requiring that the "provable claims" of the Regulator, an unsecured creditor, be paid ahead of the claims of Redwater's secured creditors.

que les processus en question n'aient été correctement effectués par les sociétés liquidées à la fin de leur procédure d'insolvabilité. L'organisme de réglementation affirme que, d'une façon ou d'une autre, la valeur restante de l'actif de Redwater doit être utilisée pour satisfaire aux obligations d'abandon et de remise en état qui sont associées à ses biens visés par des permis.

[4] Le syndic de faillite de Redwater, Grant Thornton Limited (« GTL »), et le principal créancier garanti de Redwater, Alberta Treasury Branches (« ATB »), s'opposent au pourvoi (pour simplifier, je les appellerai GTL au moment d'analyser la position des intimées, sauf indication contraire). GTL soutient que, comme il a renoncé aux biens pétroliers et gaziers inexploités de Redwater, le par. 14.06(4) de la LFI l'investit du pouvoir de les délaisser et de se soustraire aux engagements environnementaux qui s'y rattachent et de s'occuper uniquement des biens pétroliers et gaziers productifs de Redwater. GTL soutient subsidiairement que, d'après le régime de priorité établi dans la LFI, il faut acquitter les réclamations des créanciers garantis de Redwater avant de respecter ses engagements environnementaux. Invoquant la doctrine de la prépondérance, GTL affirme que la législation environnementale de l'Alberta réglementant l'industrie pétrolière et gazière est constitutionnellement inopérante dans la mesure où elle autorise l'organisme de réglementation à se mêler de cet arrangement.

[5] Le juge siégeant en cabinet (2016 ABQB 278, 37 C.B.R. (6th) 88) et les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel (2017 ABCA 124, 47 C.B.R. (6th) 171) ont donné raison à GTL. L'utilisation proposée par l'organisme de réglementation des pouvoirs que lui confère la loi pour contraindre Redwater à respecter les obligations d'abandon et de remise en état au cours de la faillite a été jugée incompatible avec la LFI de deux façons : (1) elle imposait à GTL les obligations d'un titulaire de permis relativement aux biens de Redwater auxquels GTL avait renoncé, ce qui est contraire au par. 14.06(4) de la LFI; (2) elle renversait le régime de priorité établi par la LFI pour le partage des biens d'un failli en exigeant que le paiement de ses « réclamations prouvables », en tant que créancier ordinaire, soit effectué avant celui des réclamations des créanciers garantis de Redwater.

[6] Martin J.A., as she then was, dissented. She would have allowed the Regulator's appeal on the basis that there was no conflict between Alberta's environmental legislation and the BIA. Martin J.A. was of the view that: (1) s. 14.06 of the BIA did not operate to relieve GTL of Redwater's obligations with respect to its licensed assets; and (2) the Regulator was not asserting any provable claims, so the priority scheme in the BIA was not upended.

[7] For the reasons that follow, I would allow the appeal. Although my analysis differs from hers in some respects, I agree with Martin J.A. that the Regulator's use of its statutory powers does not create a conflict with the BIA so as to trigger the doctrine of federal paramountcy. Section 14.06(4) is concerned with the personal liability of trustees, and does not empower a trustee to walk away from the environmental liabilities of the estate it is administering. The Regulator is not asserting any claims provable in the bankruptcy, and the priority scheme in the BIA is not upended. Thus, no conflict is caused by GTL's status as a licensee under Alberta legislation. Alberta's regulatory regime can coexist with and apply alongside the BIA.

II. Background

A. Alberta's Regulatory Regime

[8] The resolution of the constitutional questions and the ultimate outcome of this appeal depend on a proper understanding of the complex regulatory regime which governs Alberta's oil and gas industry. I will therefore describe that regime in considerable detail.

[9] In order to exploit oil and gas resources in Alberta, a company needs three things: a property interest in the oil or gas, surface rights and a licence issued by the Regulator. In Alberta, mineral rights are typically reserved from ownership rights in land.

[7] Pour les motifs qui suivent, j'accueillerais le pourvoi. Bien que mon analyse diffère de la sienne à certains égards, je conviens avec la juge Martin que l'utilisation par l'organisme de réglementation des pouvoirs que lui confère la loi ne crée pas de conflit avec la LFI de façon à mettre en jeu la doctrine de la prépondérance fédérale. Le paragraphe 14.06(4) intéresse la responsabilité personnelle du syndic et il ne l'investit pas du pouvoir de se soustraire aux engagements environnementaux liant l'actif qu'il administre. L'organisme de réglementation ne fait valoir aucune réclamation prouvable en matière de faillite, et le régime de priorité de la LFI n'est pas renversé. Donc, le statut de GTL en tant que titulaire de permis au sens de la loi albertaine n'est à l'origine d'aucun conflit. Le régime de réglementation de l'Alberta peut coexister et s'appliquer conjointement avec la LFI.

II. Contexte

A. Le régime de réglementation de l'Alberta

[8] Le règlement des questions constitutionnelles et l'issue finale du présent pourvoi reposent sur une compréhension adéquate du régime complexe de réglementation qui régit l'industrie pétrolière et gazière de l'Alberta. Je vais donc décrire ce régime de façon très détaillée.

[9] Pour exploiter des ressources pétrolières et gazières en Alberta, une société a besoin de trois choses : un intérêt de propriété sur le pétrole ou le gaz, des droits de surface et un permis délivré par l'organisme de réglementation. En Alberta, les droits miniers sont

About 90 percent of Alberta's mineral rights are held by the Crown on behalf of the public.

[10] A company's property interest in the oil or gas it seeks to exploit typically takes the form of a mineral lease with the Crown (but occasionally with a private owner). The company also needs surface rights so it can access and occupy the physical land located above the oil and gas and place the equipment needed to pump, store and haul away the oil and gas. Surface rights may be obtained through a lease with the landowner, who is often a farmer or rancher (but is occasionally the Crown). Where a landowner does not voluntarily grant surface rights, Alberta law authorizes the Surface Rights Board to issue a right of entry order in favour of an "operator", that is, the person having the right to a mineral or the right to work it (Surface Rights Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. S-24, ss. 1(h) and 15).

[11] Canadian courts characterize a mineral lease that allows a company to exploit oil and gas resources as a profit à prendre. It is not disputed that a profit à prendre is a form of real property interest held by the company (Berkheiser v. Berkheiser, [1957] S.C.R. 387). A profit à prendre is fully assignable and has been defined as "a non-possessory interest in land, like an easement, which can be passed on from generation to generation, and remains with the land, regardless of changes in ownership" (F. L. Stewart, "How to Deal with a Fickle Friend? Alberta's Troubles with the Doctrine of Federal Paramountcy", in J. P. Sarra and B. Romaine, eds., Annual Review of Insolvency Law 2017 (2018), 163 ("Stewart"), at p. 193). Solvent and insolvent companies alike will often hold profits à prendre in both producing and unproductive or spent wells. There are a variety of potential "working interest" arrangements whereby several parties can share an interest in oil and gas resources.

généralement soustraits des droits de propriété sur les terres. Environ 90 p. 100 des droits miniers de l'Alberta sont détenus par la Couronne au nom du public.

[10] L'intérêt de propriété d'une société dans le pétrole ou le gaz qu'elle cherche à exploiter prend généralement la forme d'un bail d'exploitation minière avec la Couronne (mais parfois avec un propriétaire privé). La société a également besoin de droits de surface, afin de pouvoir accéder au terrain physique situé au-dessus du pétrole et du gaz, de l'occuper, ainsi que d'installer l'équipement nécessaire pour pomper, stocker et transporter le pétrole de même que le gaz. On obtient les droits de surface au moyen d'un bail avec le propriétaire foncier, dans bien des cas un agriculteur ou un éleveur (mais parfois la Couronne). Lorsqu'un propriétaire foncier n'accorde pas volontairement des droits de surface, la loi albertaine autorise le Surface Rights Board (Conseil des droits de surface) à rendre une ordonnance d'accès aux terres en faveur d'un [TRADUCTION] « exploitant », soit la personne qui a droit à une substance minérale ou le droit de la travailler (Surface Rights Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. S-24, al. 1h) et art. 15).

[11] Les tribunaux canadiens qualifient le bail d'exploitation minière permettant à une société d'exploiter des ressources pétrolières et gazières de profit à prendre. Il n'est pas contesté qu'un profit à prendre constitue une forme d'intérêt détenue par la société sur un bien réel (Berkheiser c. Berkheiser, [1957] R.C.S. 387). Un profit à prendre est entièrement cessible et il a été défini comme [TRADUCTION] « un intérêt foncier sans possession, comme une servitude, qui peut être transmis de génération en génération et qui reste avec la terre, indépendamment des changements de propriétaire » (F. L. Stewart, « How to Deal with a Fickle Friend? Alberta's Troubles with the Doctrine of Federal Paramountcy », dans J. P. Sarra et B. Romaine, dir., Annual Review of Insolvency Law 2017 (2018), 163 (« Stewart »), p. 193). Les sociétés, qu'elles soient solvables ou insolvables, détiennent souvent des profits à prendre tant dans les puits productifs que dans les puits inexploités ou épuisés. Il existe une foule d'ententes potentielles de « participation directe » par lesquelles plusieurs parties peuvent partager un intérêt dans des ressources pétrolières et gazières.

[12] The third thing a company needs in order to access and exploit Alberta's oil and gas resources, and the one most germane to this appeal, is a licence issued by the Regulator. The OGCA prohibits any person without a licence from commencing to drill a well or undertaking any operations preparatory or incidental to the drilling of a well, and from commencing to construct or operate a facility (ss. 11(1) and 12(1)). The Pipeline Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. P-15, similarly prohibits the construction of pipelines without a licence (s. 6(1)). The profit à prendre in an oil and gas deposit may be bought and sold without regulatory approval. However, it is of little practical use on its own, as, without the licence associated with a well, the purchaser cannot "continue any drilling operations, any producing operations or any injecting operations" (OGCA, s. 11(1)), and, without the licence associated with a facility, the purchaser cannot "continue any construction or operation" (OGCA, s. 12(1)).

[13] The three relevant licensed assets in the Alberta oil and gas industry are wells, facilities and pipelines. A "well" is defined, inter alia, as "an orifice in the ground completed or being drilled . . . for the production of oil or gas" (OGCA, s. 1(1)(eee)). A "facility" is broadly defined and includes any building, structure, installation or equipment that is connected to or associated with the recovery, development, production, handling, processing, treatment or disposal of oil and gas resources (OGCA, s. 1(1)(w)). A "pipeline" is defined as "a pipe used to convey a substance or combination of substances", including associated installations (Pipeline Act, s. 1(1)(t)).

[14] The licences a company needs to recover, process and transport oil and gas are issued by the Regulator. The Regulator is not an agent of the Crown. It is established as a corporation by s. 3(1) of the Responsible Energy Development Act, S.A. 2012, c. R-17.3 ("REDA"). It exercises a wide range of powers under the OGCA and the Pipeline Act. It also acts as the regulator in respect of energy resource [12] La troisième chose — celle qui se rapporte le plus au présent pourvoi — dont une société a besoin pour avoir accès aux ressources pétrolières et gazières de l'Alberta ainsi que pour les exploiter, c'est un permis délivré par l'organisme de réglementation. L'OGCA interdit à toute personne non titulaire d'un permis de commencer le forage d'un puits, y compris les activités préparatoires ou accessoires à cette fin, ou d'amorcer la construction ou l'exploitation d'une installation (par. 11(1) et 12(1)). La Pipeline Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. P-15, interdit également la construction de pipelines sans permis (par. 6(1)). Le profit à prendre dans des gisements de pétrole et de gaz peut être acheté et vendu sans approbation réglementaire. Cependant, cela n'a qu'une utilité pratique restreinte en soi, puisque, sans le permis associé à un puits, l'acheteur ne peut pas [TRADUCTION] « poursuivre une opération de forage, d'exploitation ou d'injection » (OGCA, par. 11(1)), et sans le permis associé à une installation, l'acheteur ne peut pas [TRADUCTION] « poursuivre la construction ou l'exploitation » (OGCA, par. 12(1)).

[14] Les permis dont une société a besoin pour récupérer, traiter ainsi que transporter le pétrole et le gaz sont délivrés par l'organisme de réglementation. Ce dernier n'est pas un mandataire de la Couronne. Il est constitué en société par le par. 3(1) de la Responsible Energy Development Act, S.A. 2012, c. R-17.3 (« REDA »). L'organisme de réglementation exerce un large éventail de pouvoirs en vertu de l'OGCA activities under the EPEA, Alberta's more general environmental protection legislation (REDA, s. 2(2)(h)). The Regulator's mandate is set out in the REDA and includes "the efficient, safe, orderly and environmentally responsible development of energy resources in Alberta" (s. 2(1)(a)). The Regulator is funded almost entirely by the industry it regulates, and it collects its budget through an administration fee (Stewart, at p. 219; REDA, ss. 28 and 29; Alberta Energy Regulator Administration Fees Rules, Alta. Reg. 98/2013).

et de la Pipeline Act. Il agit également à titre d'organisme de réglementation des activités liées aux ressources énergétiques sous le régime de l'EPEA, la loi albertaine plus générale sur la protection de l'environnement (REDA, al. 2(2)(h)). Le mandat de l'organisme de réglementation est énoncé dans la REDA et comprend [TRADUCTION] « la mise en valeur efficiente, sûre, ordonnée et respectueuse de l'environnement des ressources énergétiques en Alberta » (al. 2(1)(a)). L'organisme de réglementation est financé presque entièrement par l'industrie qu'il réglemente et il recueille ses recettes budgétaires au moyen de frais administratifs (Stewart, p. 219; REDA, art. 28 et 29; Alberta Energy Regulator Administration Fees Rules, Alta. Reg. 98/2013).

[15] The Regulator has a wide discretion when it comes to granting licences to operate wells, facilities and pipelines. On receiving an application for a licence, the Regulator may grant the licence subject to any conditions, restrictions and stipulations, or it may refuse the licence (OGCA, s. 18(1); Pipeline Act, s. 9(1)). Licences to operate a well, facility or pipeline are granted subject to obligations that will one day arise to abandon the underlying asset and reclaim the land on which it is situated.

[15] L'organisme de réglementation jouit d'un large pouvoir discrétionnaire lorsqu'il s'agit de délivrer des permis d'exploitation de puits, d'installations et de pipelines. À la réception d'une demande de permis, l'organisme de réglementation peut accorder le permis sous réserve de certaines conditions, restrictions et stipulations, ou il peut refuser le permis (OGCA, par. 18(1); Pipeline Act, par. 9(1)). Les permis d'exploitation d'un puits, d'une installation ou d'un pipeline sont accordés sous réserve d'obligations qui se manifesteront un jour d'abandonner le bien sous-jacent et de remettre en état le terrain sur lequel il est situé.

[16] "Abandonment" refers to "the permanent dismantlement of a well or facility in the manner prescribed by the regulations or rules" made by the Regulator (OGCA, s. 1(1)(a)). Specifically, the abandonment of a well has been defined as "the process of sealing a hole which has been drilled for oil or gas, at the end of its useful life, to render it environmentally safe" (Panamericana de Bienes y Servicios S.A. v. Northern Badger Oil & Gas Ltd., 1991 ABCA 181, 81 Alta. L.R. (2d) 45 ("Northern Badger"), at para. 2). The abandonment of a pipeline refers to its "permanent deactivation . . . in the manner prescribed by the rules" (Pipeline Act, s. 1(1)(a)). "Reclamation" includes "the removal of equipment or buildings", "the decontamination of buildings . . . land or water", and the "stabilization, contouring, maintenance, conditioning or reconstruction of the surface of the land" (EPEA, s. 1(ddd)). A further duty binding on those active in the Alberta oil and gas industry is remediation, which arises where a harmful or potentially harmful substance has been released into the environment (EPEA, ss. 112 to 122). As the extent of any remediation obligations that may be associated with Redwater assets is unclear, I will not refer to remediation separately from reclamation, unless otherwise noted. As has been done throughout this litigation, I will refer to abandonment and reclamation jointly as end-of-life obligations.

[16] Le terme [TRADUCTION] « abandon » désigne « le démantèlement permanent d'un puits ou d'une installation de la manière prescrite par les règlements ou les règles » pris par l'organisme de réglementation (OGCA, al. 1(1)(a)). Plus précisément, l'abandon d'un puits a été défini comme [TRADUCTION] « l'obturation d'un trou qui a été foré pour le pétrole ou le gaz, à la fin de sa vie utile, afin de le rendre sûr sur le plan environnemental » (Panamericana de Bienes y Servicios S.A. c. Northern Badger Oil & Gas Ltd., 1991 ABCA 181, 81 Alta L.R. (2d) 45 (« Northern Badger »), par. 2). L'abandon d'un pipeline fait référence à sa [TRADUCTION] « mise hors service permanente [. . .] de la manière prescrite par les règles » (Pipeline Act, al. 1(1)(a)). La remise en état comprend [TRADUCTION] « l'enlèvement des bâtiments et de l'équipement », « la décontamination des bâtiments, du terrain ou de l'eau », ainsi que

[17] A licensee must abandon a well or facility when ordered to do so by the Regulator or when required by the rules or regulations. The Regulator may order abandonment when "the Regulator considers that it is necessary to do so in order to protect the public or the environment" (OGCA, s. 27(3)). Under the rules, a licensee is required to abandon a well or facility, inter alia, on the termination of the mineral lease, surface lease or right of entry, where the Regulator cancels or suspends the licence, or where the Regulator notifies the licensee that the well or facility may constitute an environmental or safety hazard (Oil and Gas Conservation Rules, Alta. Reg. 151/71, s. 3.012). Section 23 of the Pipeline Act requires licensees to abandon pipelines in similar situations. The duty to reclaim is established by s. 137 of the EPEA. This duty is binding on an "operator", a broader term which encompasses the holder of a licence issued by the Regulator (EPEA, s. 134(b)). Reclamation is governed by the procedural requirements set out in regulations (Conservation and Reclamation Regulation, Alta. Reg. 115/93).

[18] The Licensee Liability Rating Program, which was, at the time of Redwater's insolvency, set out in Directive 006: Licensee Liability Rating (LLR) Program and License Transfer Process (March 12, la « stabilisation, l'établissement des courbes de niveau, l'entretien, le conditionnement ou la reconstruction de la surface du terrain » (EPEA, al. 1(ddd)). Une autre obligation qui incombe à ceux qui œuvrent dans l'industrie pétrolière et gazière de l'Alberta est celle de la décontamination, qui prend naissance lorsqu'une substance nocive ou potentiellement nocive a été rejetée dans l'environnement (EPEA, art. 112 à 122). Puisque l'on ne connaît pas l'étendue des obligations de décontamination, s'il en est, qui peuvent être associées aux biens de Redwater, je ne traiterai pas la décontamination séparément de la remise en état, sauf indication contraire. Comme cela a été fait tout au long du présent litige, je qualifierai conjointement l'abandon et la remise en état d'obligations de fin de vie.

[17] Le titulaire de permis doit abandonner un puits ou une installation lorsque l'organisme de réglementation le lui ordonne, ou lorsque les règles ou les règlements l'exigent. L'organisme de réglementation peut ordonner l'abandon lorsqu'il [TRADUCTION] « l'estime nécessaire pour protéger le public ou l'environnement » (OGCA, par. 27(3)). Selon les règles, le titulaire de permis est tenu d'abandonner un puits ou une installation, notamment, à la résiliation du bail d'exploitation minière, du bail de surface ou de l'accès aux terres, lorsque l'organisme de réglementation annule ou suspend le permis, ou lorsqu'il avise le titulaire de permis que le puits ou l'installation peut constituer un danger pour l'environnement ou la sécurité (Oil and Gas Conservation Rules, Alta. Reg. 151/71, art. 3.012). L'article 23 de la Pipeline Act oblige les titulaires de permis à abandonner des pipelines dans des situations semblables. L'obligation de remise en état est prévue par l'art. 137 de l'EPEA. Cette obligation s'impose à un « exploitant », terme plus large qui englobe le titulaire d'un permis délivré par l'organisme de réglementation (EPEA, al. 134(b)). La remise en état est régie par les exigences procédurales fixées dans le règlement (Conservation and Reclamation Regulation, Alta. Reg. 115/93).

[18] Le Programme d'évaluation de la responsabilité du titulaire de permis, qui était, au moment de l'insolvabilité de Redwater, établi dans la Directive 006 : Licensee Liability Rating (LLR) Program and 2013) ("Directive 006") is one means by which the Regulator seeks to ensure that end-of-life obligations will be satisfied by licensees rather than being offloaded onto the Alberta public. As part of this program, the Regulator assigns each company a Liability Management Rating ("LMR"), which is the ratio between the aggregate value attributed by the Regulator to a company's licensed assets and the aggregate liability attributed by the Regulator to the eventual cost of abandoning and reclaiming those assets. For the purpose of calculating the LMR, all the licences held by a given company are treated as a package, without any segregation or parcelling of assets. A licensee's LMR is calculated on a monthly basis and, where it dips below the prescribed ratio (1.0 at the time of Redwater's insolvency), the licensee is required to pay a security deposit. The security deposit is added to the licensee's "deemed assets" and must bring its LMR back up to the ratio prescribed by the Regulator. If the required security deposit is not paid, the Regulator may cancel or suspend the company's licences (OGCA, s. 25). As an alternative to posting security, the licensee can perform end-of-life obligations or transfer licences (with approval) in order to bring its LMR back up to the prescribed level.

License Transfer Process (12 mars 2013) (« Directive 006 ») constitue un moyen par lequel l'organisme de réglementation vise à s'assurer que les titulaires de permis rempliront les obligations de fin de vie, au lieu que celles-ci soient en fin de compte assumées par le public albertain. Dans le cadre de ce programme, l'organisme de réglementation attribue à chaque société une cote de gestion de la responsabilité (« CGR »), qui représente le rapport entre la valeur totale attribuée par l'organisme de réglementation aux biens d'une société qui sont visés par des permis et la responsabilité totale que l'organisme de réglementation attribue aux coûts éventuels de l'abandon et de la remise en état de ces biens. Pour les besoins du calcul de la CGR, tous les permis détenus par une société donnée sont traités comme un tout, sans isolement ou morcellement des biens. La CGR d'un titulaire de permis est calculée sur une base mensuelle et, lorsqu'elle tombe sous le ratio prescrit (1,0 à l'époque de l'insolvabilité de Redwater), le titulaire de permis est tenu de verser un dépôt de garantie. Le dépôt de garantie est ajouté aux [TRADUCTION] « biens réputés » du titulaire de permis, qui doit ramener sa CGR au ratio prescrit par l'organisme de réglementation. Si le dépôt de garantie requis n'est pas payé, l'organisme de réglementation peut annuler ou suspendre les permis de la société (OGCA, art. 25). Comme solution de rechange au versement d'une garantie, le titulaire de permis peut exécuter les obligations de fin de vie ou transférer des permis (avec approbation), afin de ramener sa CGR au niveau prescrit.

[19] Licences can be transferred only with the Regulator's approval. The Regulator uses the Licensee Liability Rating Program to ensure that end-of-life obligations will not be negatively affected by licence transfers. Upon receipt of an application to transfer one or more licences, the Regulator assesses how the transfer, if approved, would affect the LMR of both the transferor and the transferee. At the time of Redwater's insolvency, if both the transferor and the transferee would have a post-transfer LMR equal to or exceeding 1.0, the Regulator would approve the transfer, absent other concerns. Following the chambers judge's decision in this case, the Regulator implemented changes to its policies, including the requirement that transferees have an LMR of 2.0 or higher immediately following any licence transfer: Alberta Energy Regulator, Licensee Eligibility — Alberta Energy Regulator Measures to Limit Environmental Impacts Pending Regulatory Changes to Address the Redwater Decision, June 20, 2016 (online). For the purposes of this appeal, I will be referring to the regulatory regime as it existed at the time of Redwater's insolvency.

[20] As discussed in greater detail below, if either the transferor or the transferee would have a post-transfer LMR below 1.0, the Regulator would refuse to approve the licence transfer. In such a situation, the Regulator would insist on certain remedial steps being taken to ensure that neither LMR would drop below 1.0. Although Directive 006, as it was in the 2013 version, required both the transferee and transferor to have a post transfer LMR of at least 1.0, during this litigation, the Regulator stated that, when licensees are in receivership or bankruptcy, its working rule is to approve transfers as long as they do not cause a deterioration in the transferor's LMR, even where its LMR will remain below 1.0 following the transfer. The explanation for this working rule is that it helps to facilitate purchases. The Regulator's position is that the Licensee Liability Rating Program continues to apply to the transfer of licences as part of insolvency proceedings.

[21] The OGCA, the Pipeline Act and the EPEA all contemplate that a licensee's regulatory obligations will continue to be fulfilled when it is subject to insolvency proceedings. The EPEA achieves this by including the trustee of a licensee in the definition of "operator" for the purposes of the duty to reclaim (s. 134(b)(vi)). The EPEA also specifically provides that an order to perform reclamation work (known as an "environmental protection order") may be issued to a trustee (ss. 140 and 142(1)(a)(ii)). The EPEA imposes responsibility for carrying out the la présente affaire, l'organisme de réglementation a apporté des changements à ses politiques, y compris l'exigence selon laquelle les cessionnaires devaient avoir une CGR de 2,0 ou plus immédiatement après tout transfert de permis : Alberta Energy Regulator, Licensee Eligibility — Alberta Energy Regulator Measures to Limit Environmental Impacts Pending Regulatory Changes to Address the Redwater Decision, 20 juin 2016 (en ligne). Pour les besoins du présent pourvoi, je ferai référence au régime de réglementation tel qu'il existait à l'époque de l'insolvabilité de Redwater.

[20] Comme il est expliqué plus en détail ci-dessous, si le cédant ou le cessionnaire devait avoir une CGR inférieure à 1,0 après le transfert, l'organisme de réglementation refuserait d'approuver le transfert de permis. Dans une telle situation, l'organisme de réglementation insisterait pour que certaines mesures correctives soient prises afin de s'assurer qu'aucune des deux CGR ne descende en dessous de 1,0. Même si la Directive 006, dans sa version de 2013, exigeait que le cessionnaire ainsi que le cédant aient des CGR d'au moins 1,0 après le transfert, au cours de ce litige, l'organisme de réglementation a déclaré que, lorsque les titulaires de permis sont sous séquestre ou en faillite, sa règle pratique est d'approuver les transferts tant qu'ils n'entraînent pas une détérioration de la CGR du cédant, même si la CGR du cédant demeurerait inférieure à 1,0 après le transfert. L'explication donnée pour cette règle pratique est qu'elle vise à faciliter les achats. L'organisme de réglementation fait valoir que le Programme d'évaluation de la responsabilité du titulaire de permis continue de s'appliquer au transfert de permis dans le cadre de la procédure d'insolvabilité.

terms of an environmental protection order on the person to whom the order is directed (ss. 240 and 245). However, absent gross negligence or wilful misconduct, a trustee's liability in relation to such an order is expressly limited to the value of the assets in the bankrupt estate (s. 240(3)). The OGCA and the Pipeline Act take a more generic approach to applying the various obligations of licensees to trustees in the insolvency context: they simply include trustees in the definition of "licensee" (OGCA, s. 1(1)(cc); Pipeline Act, s. 1(1)(n)). As a result, every power which these Acts give the Regulator against a licensee can theoretically also be exercised against a trustee.

[22] Despite this, Alberta's regulatory regime does contemplate the possibility that some of a licensee's end-of-life obligations will remain unfulfilled when the insolvency process has run its course. The Regulator may designate wells, facilities, and their sites as "orphans" (OGCA, s. 70(2)(a)). A pipeline is defined as a "facility" for the purposes of the orphan regime (OGCA, s. 68(d)). Directive 006 stated that "a well, facility, or pipeline in the LLR program is eligible to be declared an orphan where the licensee of that licence becomes insolvent or defunct" (s. 7.1). An "orphan fund" has been established for the purpose of paying for, inter alia, the abandonment and reclamation of orphans (OGCA, s. 70(1)). The orphan fund is financed by an annual industry-wide levy paid by licensees of wells, facilities and unreclaimed sites (s. 73(1)). The amount of the levy is prescribed by the Regulator based on the estimated cost of abandoning and reclaiming orphans in a given fiscal year (s. 73(2)).

[23] The Regulator has delegated its statutory authority to abandon and reclaim orphans to the OWA (Orphan Fund Delegated Administration Regulation, (art. 140 et sous-al. 142(1)(a)(ii))). L'EPEA impose la responsabilité d'exécuter une ordonnance de protection de l'environnement à la personne visée par l'ordonnance (art. 240 et 245). Cependant, faute de négligence grave ou d'inconduite délibérée, la responsabilité du syndic à l'égard d'une telle ordonnance est expressément limitée à la valeur des éléments de l'actif du failli (par. 240(3)). L'OGCA et la Pipeline Act adoptent une approche plus générique pour appliquer les diverses obligations d'un titulaire de permis aux syndics dans le contexte de l'insolvabilité; elles incluent simplement le syndic dans la définition de [TRADUCTION] « titulaire de permis » (OGCA, al. 1(1)(cc); Pipeline Act, al. 1(1)(n)). En conséquence, tout pouvoir que ces lois confèrent à l'organisme de réglementation à l'encontre d'un titulaire de permis peut, en théorie, s'exercer également contre un syndic.

[22] Malgré cela, le régime de réglementation de l'Alberta envisage la possibilité qu'une partie des obligations de fin de vie d'un titulaire de permis demeure insatisfaite à la fin du processus d'insolvabilité. L'organisme de réglementation peut désigner des puits, des installations et leurs sites comme [TRADUCTION] « orphelins » (OGCA, al. 70(2)(a)). Un pipeline est défini comme une « installation » pour l'application du régime relatif aux orphelins (OGCA, al. 68(d)). La Directive 006 disposait qu'un [TRADUCTION] « puits, une installation ou un pipeline visé par le Programme d'évaluation de la responsabilité du titulaire de permis peut être déclaré orphelin lorsque le titulaire de ce permis devient insolvable ou est liquidé » (art. 7.1). Un « fonds pour les puits orphelins » a été créé dans le but de payer, entre autres choses, l'abandon et la remise en état des puits orphelins (OGCA, par. 70(1)). Le fonds pour les puits orphelins est financé au moyen d'une redevance annuelle, à l'échelle de l'industrie, payée par les titulaires de permis de puits et d'installations ainsi que de sites non remis en état (par. 73(1)). Le montant de la redevance est prescrit par l'organisme de réglementation en fonction du coût estimatif de l'abandon et de la remise en état des puits orphelins au cours d'un exercice donné (par. 73(2)).

[23] L'organisme de réglementation a délégué le pouvoir que lui confère la loi d'abandonner et de remettre en état les puits orphelins à l'OWA (Orphan Alta. Reg. 45/2001), a non-profit organization overseen by an independent board of directors. It is funded almost entirely through the industry-wide levy described above, 100 percent of which is remitted to it by the Regulator. The OWA has no power to seek reimbursement of its costs. However, once it has completed its environmental work, it may be reimbursed up to the value of any security deposit held by the Regulator to the credit of the licensee of the orphans. In recent years, the number of orphans in Alberta has increased rapidly. For example, the number of new orphan wells increased from 80 in the 2013-14 years to 591 in the 2014-15 years.

Fund Delegated Administration Regulation, Alta. Reg. 45/2001), un organisme sans but lucratif supervisé par un conseil d'administration indépendant. Cette entité est presque entièrement financée par la redevance décrite ci-dessus qui a été établie dans toute l'industrie, et la totalité de cette redevance est remise à l'OWA par l'organisme de réglementation. L'OWA n'a pas le pouvoir de demander le remboursement de ses frais. Toutefois, une fois ses travaux environnementaux terminés, l'OWA peut être remboursée jusqu'à concurrence de la valeur du dépôt de garantie détenu, le cas échéant, par l'organisme de réglementation au profit du titulaire de permis associé au puits orphelin. Au cours des dernières années, le nombre de puits orphelins a augmenté rapidement en Alberta. Par exemple, le nombre de nouveaux puits orphelins est passé de 80 en 2013-2014 à 591 en 2014-2015.

[24] At issue in this appeal is the applicability during bankruptcy of two powers conferred on the Regulator by the provincial legislation. Both are designed to ensure that licensees satisfy their end-of-life obligations.

[24] Ce qui est en cause dans le présent pourvoi, c'est l'applicabilité, durant la faillite, de deux pouvoirs conférés à l'organisme de réglementation par la législation provinciale. Les deux sont conçus pour garantir que les titulaires de permis remplissent les obligations de fin de vie qui leur incombent.

[25] The first power at issue in this appeal is the Regulator's power to order a licensee to abandon licensed assets, which is accompanied by statutory powers for the enforcement of such orders. Where a well or facility has not been abandoned in accordance with a direction of the Regulator or the rules or regulations, the Regulator may authorize any person to abandon the well or facility or may do so itself (OGCA, s. 28). Where the Regulator or the person it has designated performs the abandonment, the costs of doing so constitute a debt payable to the Regulator. An order of the Regulator showing these costs may be filed with and entered as a judgment of the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench and then enforced according to the ordinary procedure for enforcement of judgments of that court (OGCA, s. 30(6)). A similar scheme applies with respect to pipelines (Pipeline Act, ss. 23 to 26).

[25] Le premier pouvoir en cause dans le présent pourvoi est celui dont dispose l'organisme de réglementation d'ordonner à un titulaire de permis d'abandonner des biens visés par des permis, auquel s'ajoutent les pouvoirs que la loi confère pour faire exécuter de telles ordonnances. Lorsqu'il y a eu délaissement d'un puits ou d'une installation sans que le processus d'abandon ait été effectué conformément aux directives de l'organisme de réglementation, ou aux règles et règlements, l'organisme peut autoriser toute personne à effectuer ce processus à l'égard du puits ou de l'installation, ou s'en charger lui-même (OGCA, art. 28). Quand l'organisme de réglementation ou la personne qu'il a désignée procède à l'abandon, les frais liés à cette opération constituent une dette payable à l'organisme de réglementation. Une ordonnance de l'organisme de réglementation indiquant ces frais peut être déposée à la Cour du Banc de la Reine de l'Alberta, inscrite comme un jugement de cette cour, puis exécutée conformément à la procédure ordinaire d'exécution des jugements de cette cour (OGCA, par. 30(6)). Un régime semblable s'applique aux pipelines (Pipeline Act, art. 23 à 26).

[26] A licensee that contravenes or fails to comply with an order of the Regulator, or that has an outstanding debt to the Regulator in respect of abandonment or reclamation costs, is subject to a number of potential enforcement measures. The Regulator may suspend operations, refuse to consider licence applications or licence transfer applications (OGCA, s. 106(3)(a), (b) and (c)), or require the payment of security deposits, generally or as a condition of granting any further licences, approvals or transfers (OGCA, s. 106(3)(d) and (e)). Where a licensee contravenes the Act, regulations or rules, any order or direction of the Regulator, or any condition of a licence, the Regulator may prosecute the licensee for a regulatory offence and a fine may be imposed as a penalty, although the licensee can raise a due diligence defence (OGCA, ss. 108 and 110). A similar scheme applies with respect to pipelines (Pipeline Act, ss. 51 to 54) and the EPEA contains similar debt-creating provisions with respect to environmental protection orders. The EPEA also provides for the prosecution of regulatory offences in cases of non-compliance, with an available due diligence defence. However, as noted, a trustee's liability in relation to environmental protection orders is capped at estate assets, unless the trustee is guilty of gross negligence or wilful misconduct (EPEA, ss. 227 to 230, 240 and 245).

[26] Le titulaire de permis qui contrevient ou ne se conforme pas à une ordonnance de l'organisme de réglementation, ou qui a une dette impayée envers ce dernier relativement aux frais d'abandon ou de remise en état, est assujetti à un certain nombre de mesures d'exécution potentielles. L'organisme de réglementation peut suspendre les activités, refuser d'étudier des demandes de permis ou de transfert de permis (OGCA, al. 106(3)(a), (b) et (c)), ou exiger le paiement des dépôts de garantie, de façon générale ou comme condition à l'octroi d'autres permis, approbations ou transferts (OGCA, al. 106(3)(d) et (e)). Lorsqu'un titulaire de permis contrevient à la Loi, aux règlements ou aux règles, à toute ordonnance ou directive de l'organisme de réglementation ou à toute condition d'un permis, l'organisme de réglementation peut intenter une poursuite contre le titulaire de permis pour infraction réglementaire, et ce dernier est passible d'une amende en guise de pénalité, bien qu'il puisse invoquer la défense de diligence raisonnable (OGCA, art. 108 et 110). Un régime semblable s'applique aux pipelines (Pipeline Act, art. 51 à 54). L'EPEA contient elle aussi des dispositions similaires relatives à la création de dettes et afférentes aux ordonnances de protection de l'environnement, en plus de prévoir la poursuite d'infractions réglementaires en cas d'inobservation, avec la possibilité d'invoquer une défense de diligence raisonnable. Toutefois, comme il a été mentionné, la responsabilité du syndic en ce qui concerne les ordonnances de protection de l'environnement se limite aux éléments de l'actif, sauf s'il est responsable de négligence flagrante ou d'inconduite délibérée (EPEA, art. 227 à 230, 240 et 245).

[27] The second power at issue in this appeal is the Regulator's power to impose conditions on a licensee's transfer of its licence(s). As when it initially grants a licence, the Regulator has broad powers to consent to the transfer of a licence subject to any conditions, restrictions and stipulations or to reject the transfer (OGCA, s. 24(2)). Under Directive 006 and its 2016 replacement, the Regulator can reject a transfer even where both parties would have the required LMR after the transfer or where a security deposit is available to be posted in compliance with LMR requirements. In particular, the Regulator may determine that it is not in the public interest to approve the licence transfer based on the compliance history of one or both parties or their directors, officers or security holders, or based on the risk posed by the transfer to the orphan fund.

[28] Where a proposed transaction would cause the transferor's LMR to deteriorate below 1.0 (or simply to deteriorate, in the case of an insolvent transferor), the Regulator insists that one of the following conditions be met before it will approve the transaction: (i) that the transferor perform abandonment, reclamation, or both, thus reducing its deemed liabilities, or (ii) that the transferor post a security deposit, thus increasing its deemed assets. Alternatively, the transaction may be structured to avoid any deterioration of the transferor's LMR by "bundling" the licences for spent wells with the licences for producing wells. A transaction in which the licenses for spent wells are retained while the licences for producing wells are transferred will almost always cause a considerable deterioration in a company's LMR.

[29] During this appeal, there was significant discussion of other regulatory regimes which Alberta could have adopted to prevent environmental costs associated with the oil and gas industry from being offloaded onto the public. What Alberta has chosen is a licensing regime which makes such costs an inherent part of the value of the licensed assets. This regime has the advantage of aligning with the polluter-pays principle, a well-recognized tenet of Canadian environmental law. This principle assigns polluters the responsibility for remedying environmental damage for which they are responsible, thereby incentivizing companies to pay attention to the environment in the course of their economic activities (Imperial Oil Ltd. v. Quebec (Minister of the Environment), 2003 SCC 58, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 624, at para. 24). The Licensee Liability Rating Program essentially requires licensees to apply the value derived from oil and gas assets during the productive portions of the life cycle of peut être versé conformément aux exigences relatives à la CGR. Plus particulièrement, l'organisme de réglementation peut décider qu'il n'est pas dans l'intérêt public d'approuver le transfert de permis compte tenu des antécédents de conformité de l'une des parties, ou des deux, ou de leurs administrateurs, dirigeants ou détenteurs de titres, ou encore du risque que présenterait le transfert à l'égard du fonds pour les puits orphelins.

[28] Lorsqu'une transaction proposée entraînerait une détérioration de la CGR du cédant en deçà de 1,0 (ou simplement une détérioration dans le cas d'un cédant insolvable), l'organisme de réglementation insiste sur le respect d'une des conditions suivantes avant d'approuver la transaction : (i) que le cédant effectue les processus d'abandon et/ou de remise en état, réduisant ainsi ses passifs réputés; (ii) que le cédant verse un dépôt de garantie, augmentant ainsi ses biens réputés. La transaction pourrait également être structurée de manière à éviter toute détérioration de la CGR du cédant par le « regroupement » des permis relatifs aux puits épuisés et de ceux liés aux puits productifs. Une transaction au cours de laquelle on conserve les permis des puits épuisés tandis que les permis des puits productifs sont transférés entraînerait presque toujours une détérioration considérable de la CGR d'une société.

[29] Au cours du présent pourvoi, il a été beaucoup question d'autres régimes de réglementation que l'Alberta aurait pu adopter pour éviter que les coûts environnementaux associés à l'industrie pétrolière et gazière ne soient passés au public. Ce que l'Alberta a choisi, c'est un régime de permis qui fait de ces coûts une partie inhérente de la valeur des biens visés par les permis. Ce régime a l'avantage de s'accorder avec le principe du pollueur-payeur, un précepte bien reconnu du droit canadien de l'environnement. Ce principe attribue aux pollueurs la charge de réparer les dommages environnementaux dont ils sont responsables, ce qui incite les sociétés à se soucier de l'environnement dans le cadre de leurs activités économiques (Cie pétrolière Impériale ltée c. Québec (Ministre de l'Environnement), 2003 CSC 58, [2003] 2 R.C.S. 624, par. 24). Le Programme d'évaluation de la responsabilité des titulaires de permis exige essentiellement que les titulaires de permis the assets to the inevitable cost of abandoning those assets and reclaiming their sites at the end of those life cycles.

[30] Ultimately, it is not the role of this Court to decide the best regulatory approach to the oil and gas industry. What is not in dispute is that, in adopting its current regulatory regime, Alberta has acted within its constitutional authority over property and civil rights in the province and over the "development, conservation and management of non-renewable natural resources . . . in the province" (Constitution Act, 1867, ss. 92(13) and 92A(1)(c)). Alberta has devised a complex regulatory apparatus to address important policy questions concerning when, by whom and in what manner the inevitable environmental costs associated with oil and gas extraction are to be paid. Its solution is a licensing regime that depresses the value of key industry assets to reflect environmental costs, backstopped by a levy on industry in the form of the orphan fund. Alberta intended that apparatus to continue to operate when an oil and gas company is subject to insolvency proceedings.

[31] However, the insolvency of an oil and gas company licensed to operate in Alberta also engages the BIA. The BIA is federal legislation that governs the administration of a bankrupt's estate and the orderly and equitable distribution of property among its creditors. It is validly enacted pursuant to Parliament's constitutional authority over bankruptcy and insolvency (Constitution Act, 1867, s. 91(21)). Just as Alberta's regulatory regime reflects its considered choice about how to address the important policy questions raised by the environmental risks of oil and gas extraction, the BIA reflects Parliament's considered choice about how to balance important policy objectives when a bankrupt's assets are, by definition, insufficient to meet all of its various obligations. To the extent that there is an operational conflict between the Alberta regulatory regime and the appliquent la valeur dérivée des biens pétroliers et gaziers pendant les parties productives du cycle de vie des biens au coût inévitable de l'abandon de ces biens et de la remise en état de leurs sites à la fin de ce cycle de vie.

[30] En fin de compte, il ne revient pas à notre Cour de décider de la meilleure approche réglementaire pour l'industrie pétrolière et gazière. Ce qui n'est pas contesté, c'est qu'en adoptant son régime de réglementation actuel, l'Alberta a agi dans les limites de sa compétence constitutionnelle en matière de propriété et de droits civils dans la province ainsi que dans le domaine de l'« exploitation, [de la] conservation et [de la] gestion des ressources naturelles non renouvelables [. . .] de la province » (Loi constitutionnelle de 1867, par. 92(13) et al. 92A(1)c)). L'Alberta a mis au point un appareil réglementaire complexe pour régler d'importantes questions de politique concernant le moment où, par qui et de quelle manière les coûts environnementaux inévitables associés à l'extraction du pétrole et du gaz doivent être payés. Sa solution est un régime d'octroi de permis qui fait baisser la valeur des principaux éléments d'actif de l'industrie pour refléter les coûts environnementaux, lequel est soutenu par une redevance sur l'industrie sous forme de fonds pour les puits orphelins. L'Alberta voulait que cet appareil continue à fonctionner lorsqu'une société pétrolière et gazière fait l'objet d'une procédure d'insolvabilité.

[31] Par contre, l'insolvabilité d'une société pétrolière et gazière autorisée à exercer ses activités en Alberta met aussi en jeu la LFI, une loi fédérale qui régit l'administration de l'actif d'un failli ainsi que la répartition ordonnée et équitable des biens entre ses créanciers. Elle a été valablement promulguée dans l'exercice de la compétence constitutionnelle du Parlement en matière de banqueroute et de faillite (Loi constitutionnelle de 1867, par. 91(21)). Tout comme le régime de réglementation de l'Alberta témoigne de son choix réfléchi quant à la façon d'aborder les questions de politique importantes soulevées par les risques environnementaux liés à l'extraction du pétrole et du gaz, la LFI témoigne du choix réfléchi du Parlement concernant la manière d'équilibrer des objectifs de politique importants lorsque les biens d'un failli sont, de par leur nature, insuffisants

BIA, or that the Alberta regulatory regime frustrates the purpose of the BIA, the doctrine of paramountcy dictates that the BIA must prevail.

B. The Relevant Provisions of the BIA

[32] Here, I simply wish to note the sections of the BIA at issue in this appeal. These sections will determine whether the doctrine of paramountcy applies. I will discuss the purposes of the BIA and the various issues raised by s. 14.06 in greater detail below.

[33] The central concept of the BIA is that of a "claim provable in bankruptcy". Several provisions of the BIA form the basis for delineating the scope of provable claims. The first is the definition provided in s. 2:

claim provable in bankruptcy, provable claim or claim provable includes any claim or liability provable in proceedings under this Act by a creditor . . .

[34] "Creditor" is defined in s. 2 as "a person having a claim provable as a claim under this Act".

[35] The definition of "claim provable" is completed by s. 121(1):

All debts and liabilities, present or future, to which the bankrupt is subject on the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt or to which the bankrupt may become subject before the bankrupt's discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt shall be deemed to be claims provable in proceedings under this Act.

[36] A claim may be provable in a bankruptcy proceeding even if it is a contingent claim. A "contingent claim is 'a claim which may or may not ever ripen into a debt, according as some future event does or does not happen'" (Peters v. Remington, 2004 ABCA pour satisfaire à toutes ses obligations diverses. Et, pour autant qu'il y ait un conflit d'application entre le régime de réglementation de l'Alberta et la LFI, ou que le régime de réglementation de l'Alberta entrave la réalisation de l'objet de la LFI, la doctrine de la prépondérance commande que la LFI l'emporte.

B. Les dispositions applicables de la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité

[32] À ce stade-ci, je tiens simplement à souligner les articles de la LFI qui sont en cause dans le présent pourvoi. Ce sont ces articles qui détermineront si la doctrine de la prépondérance s'applique. J'analyserai plus en détail ci-après les objets de la LFI ainsi que les différentes questions soulevées par l'art. 14.06.

[33] Le concept central de la LFI est celui d'une « réclamation prouvable en matière de faillite ». Plusieurs dispositions de la LFI servent de fondement pour circonscrire la portée des réclamations prouvables. La première est la définition que l'on trouve à l'art. 2 :

réclamation prouvable en matière de faillite ou réclamation prouvable Toute réclamation ou créance pouvant être prouvée dans des procédures intentées sous l'autorité de la présente loi par un créancier.

[34] Le terme « créancier » est défini à l'art. 2 comme une « [p]ersonne titulaire d'une réclamation prouvable à ce titre sous le régime de la présente loi ».

[35] La définition de « réclamation prouvable » se termine au par. 121(1) :

Toutes créances et tous engagements, présents ou futurs, auxquels le failli est assujetti à la date à laquelle il devient failli, ou auxquels il peut devenir assujetti avant sa libération, en raison d'une obligation contractée antérieurement à cette date, sont réputés des réclamations prouvables dans des procédures entamées en vertu de la présente loi.

[36] Une réclamation peut être prouvable dans une procédure de faillite même s'il s'agit d'une réclamation éventuelle. Une [TRADUCTION] « réclamation éventuelle est "une réclamation qui peut ou non se transformer en une créance, selon qu'un événement

5, 49 C.B.R. (4th) 273, at para. 23, quoting Garner v. Newton (1916), 29 D.L.R. 276 (Man. K.B.), at p. 281). Sections 121(2) and 135(1.1) provide guidance on when a contingent claim will be a provable claim:

121 (2) The determination whether a contingent or unliquidated claim is a provable claim and the valuation of such a claim shall be made in accordance with section 135.

135 (1.1) The trustee shall determine whether any contingent claim or unliquidated claim is a provable claim, and, if a provable claim, the trustee shall value it, and the claim is thereafter, subject to this section, deemed a proved claim to the amount of its valuation.

[37] In Newfoundland and Labrador v. Abitibi-Bowater Inc., 2012 SCC 67, [2012] 3 S.C.R. 443 ("Abitibi"), at para. 26, this Court interpreted the foregoing provisions of the BIA and articulated a three-part test for determining when an environmental obligation imposed by a regulator will be a provable claim for the purposes of the BIA and the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 ("CCAA"):

First, there must be a debt, a liability or an obligation to a creditor. Second, the debt, liability or obligation must be incurred before the debtor becomes bankrupt. Third, it must be possible to attach a monetary value to the debt, liability or obligation. [Emphasis in original.]

[38] I will address the Abitibi test in greater detail below.

[39] Once bankruptcy has been declared, creditors of the bankrupt must participate in one collective bankruptcy proceeding if they wish to enforce their provable claims. Section 69.3(1) of the BIA thus provides for an automatic stay of enforcement of provable claims outside the bankruptcy proceeding, effective as of the first day of bankruptcy.

futur se produit ou non" » (Peters c. Remington, 2004 ABCA 5, 49 B.C.R. (4th) 273, par. 23, citant Garner c. Newton (1916), 29 D.L.R. 276, (B.R. Man.), p. 281. Les paragraphes 121(2) et 135(1.1) donnent des indications sur le moment où une réclamation éventuelle deviendra une réclamation prouvable :

121 (2) La question de savoir si une réclamation éventuelle ou non liquidée constitue une réclamation prouvable et, le cas échéant, son évaluation sont décidées en application de l'article 135.

[37] Dans l'arrêt Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador c. AbitibiBowater Inc., 2012 CSC 67, [2012] 3 R.C.S. 443 (« Abitibi »), par. 26, notre Cour a interprété les dispositions précédentes de la LFI et a formulé un critère tripartite afin de décider quand une obligation environnementale imposée par un organisme de réglementation sera une réclamation prouvable pour l'application de la LFI et de la Loi sur les arrangements avec les créanciers des compagnies, L.R.C. 1985, c. C-36 (« LACC ») :

Premièrement, on doit être en présence d'une dette, d'un engagement ou d'une obligation envers un créancier. Deuxièmement, la dette, l'engagement ou l'obligation doit avoir pris naissance avant que le débiteur ne devienne failli. Troisièmement, il doit être possible d'attribuer une valeur pécuniaire à cette dette, cet engagement ou cette obligation. [En italique dans l'original.]

[38] J'aborderai le critère de l'arrêt Abitibi plus en détail ci-dessous.

[40] The BIA establishes a comprehensive priority scheme for the satisfaction of the provable claims asserted against the bankrupt in the collective proceeding. Section 141 sets out the general rule, which is that all creditors rank equally and share rateably in the bankrupt's assets. However, the rule set out in s. 141 applies "[s]ubject to [the BIA]". Section 136(1) lists the claims of preferred creditors and the order of priority for their payment. It also states that this order of priority is "[s]ubject to the rights of secured creditors". Under s. 69.3(2), the stay of proceedings does not prevent secured creditors from realizing their security interest. The BIA therefore sets out a priority scheme for paying claims provable in bankruptcy, with secured creditors being paid first, preferred creditors second and unsecured creditors last (see Alberta (Attorney General) v. Moloney, 2015 SCC 51, [2015] 3 S.C.R. 327, at paras. 32-35).

[41] Essential to this appeal is s. 14.06 of the BIA, which deals with various environmental matters in the bankruptcy context. I will now reproduce s. 14.06(2) and s. 14.06(4), the two portions of the s. 14.06 scheme that are directly implicated in this appeal. The balance of s. 14.06 can be found in the appendix at the conclusion of these reasons.

[42] Section 14.06(2) reads as follows:

(2) Notwithstanding anything in any federal or provincial law, a trustee is not personally liable in that position for any environmental condition that arose or environmental damage that occurred

(a) before the trustee's appointment; or

(b) after the trustee's appointment unless it is established that the condition arose or the damage occurred as a result of the trustee's gross negligence or wilful misconduct or, in the Province of Quebec, the trustee's gross or intentional fault.

[40] La LFI établit un régime de priorité complet pour l'acquittement des réclamations prouvables présentées contre le failli dans la procédure collective. L'article 141 énonce la règle générale, à savoir que tous les créanciers ont un rang égal et une part proportionnelle des biens du failli. Toutefois, la règle énoncée à l'art. 141 s'applique « [s]ous réserve des autres dispositions de [la LFI] ». Le paragraphe 136(1) énumère les réclamations des « créanciers privilégiés » et fixe l'ordre de priorité dans lequel ils doivent recevoir leur paiement. Cet ordre établi par le par. 136(1) l'est « [s]ous réserve des droits des créanciers garantis ». Selon le par. 69.3(2), la suspension des procédures n'empêche pas les créanciers garantis de réaliser leur garantie. La LFI instaure donc un régime de priorité pour le versement des réclamations prouvables en matière de faillite, les créanciers garantis étant payés en premier, les créanciers privilégiés en deuxième et les créanciers non garantis en dernier (voir Alberta (Procureur général) c. Moloney, 2015 CSC 51, [2015] 3 R.C.S. 327, par. 32-35).

[41] L'article 14.06 de la LFI, qui traite de diverses questions environnementales dans le contexte de la faillite, est essentiel pour statuer sur le présent pourvoi. Je vais maintenant reproduire les par. 14.06(2) et 14.06(4), les deux parties du régime prévu à l'art. 14.06 qui sont directement en cause dans le présent pourvoi. Le reste de l'art. 14.06 se trouve en annexe à la fin des présents motifs.

[42] Voici le texte du par. 14.06(2) :

(2) Par dérogation au droit fédéral et provincial, le syndic est, ès qualités, dégagé de toute responsabilité personnelle découlant de tout fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement survenu avant ou après sa nomination, sauf celui causé par sa négligence grave ou son inconduite délibérée ou, dans la province de Québec, par sa faute lourde ou intentionnelle.

[43] Section 14.06(4) reads as follows:

(4) Notwithstanding anything in any federal or provincial law but subject to subsection (2), where an order is made which has the effect of requiring a trustee to remedy any environmental condition or environmental damage affecting property involved in a bankruptcy, proposal or receivership, the trustee is not personally liable for failure to comply with the order, and is not personally liable for any costs that are or would be incurred by any person in carrying out the terms of the order,

(a) if, within such time as is specified in the order, within ten days after the order is made if no time is so specified, within ten days after the appointment of the trustee, if the order is in effect when the trustee is appointed, or during the period of the stay referred to in paragraph (b), the trustee

(i) complies with the order, or

(ii) on notice to the person who issued the order, abandons, disposes of or otherwise releases any interest in any real property, or any right in any immovable, affected by the condition or damage;

(b) during the period of a stay of the order granted, on application made within the time specified in the order referred to in paragraph (a), within ten days after the order is made or within ten days after the appointment of the trustee, if the order is in effect when the trustee is appointed, by

(i) the court or body having jurisdiction under the law pursuant to which the order was made to enable the trustee to contest the order, or

(ii) the court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy for the purposes of assessing the economic viability of complying with the order; or

(c) if the trustee had, before the order was made, abandoned or renounced or been divested of any interest in any real property, or any right in any immovable, affected by the condition or damage.

[44] As I will discuss, a main point of contention between the parties is the very different interpretations they ascribe to s. 14.06(4) of the BIA. I note that s. 14.06(4)(a)(ii), which is relied upon by GTL, refers to a trustee who "abandons, disposes of or otherwise releases any interest in any real property".

[43] Voici le texte du par. 14.06(4) :

(4) Par dérogation au droit fédéral et provincial, mais sous réserve du paragraphe (2), le syndic est, ès qualités, dégagé de toute responsabilité personnelle découlant du non-respect de toute ordonnance de réparation de tout fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement et touchant un bien visé par une faillite, une proposition ou une mise sous séquestre administrée par un séquestre, et de toute responsabilité personnelle relativement aux frais engagés par toute personne exécutant l'ordonnance :

a) si, dans les dix jours suivant l'ordonnance ou dans le délai fixé par celle-ci, dans les dix jours suivant sa nomination si l'ordonnance est alors en vigueur ou pendant la durée de la suspension visée à l'alinéa b) :

(i) il s'y conforme,

(ii) il abandonne, après avis à la personne ayant rendu l'ordonnance, tout droit sur l'immeuble en cause ou tout intérêt sur le bien réel en cause, en dispose ou s'en dessaisit;

b) pendant la durée de la suspension de l'ordonnance qui est accordée, sur demande présentée dans les dix jours suivant l'ordonnance visée à l'alinéa a) ou dans le délai fixé par celle-ci, ou dans les dix jours suivant sa nomination si l'ordonnance est alors en vigueur :

(i) soit par le tribunal ou l'autorité qui a compétence relativement à l'ordonnance, en vue de permettre au syndic de la contester,

(ii) soit par le tribunal qui a compétence en matière de faillite, en vue d'évaluer les conséquences économiques du respect de l'ordonnance;

c) si, avant que l'ordonnance ne soit rendue, il avait abandonné tout droit sur l'immeuble en cause ou tout intérêt sur le bien réel en cause ou y avait renoncé, ou s'en était dessaisi.

[44] Comme je l'expliquerai, un point de discorde important entre les parties tient aux interprétations fort différentes qu'elles donnent au par. 14.06(4) de la LFI. Je remarque que le sous-al. 14.06(4)a)(ii), sur lequel s'appuie GTL, parle du syndic qui « abandonne [. . .] tout intérêt sur le bien réel en cause, en dispose

The word "disclaim" is used in these reasons, as it has been throughout this litigation, as a shorthand for these terms.

[45] I turn now to a brief discussion of the events of the Redwater bankruptcy.

C. The Events of the Redwater Bankruptcy

[46] Redwater was a publicly traded oil and gas company. It was first granted licences by the Regulator in 2009. On January 31 and August 19, 2013, ATB advanced funds to Redwater and, in return, was granted a security interest in Redwater's present and after-acquired property. ATB lent funds to Redwater with full knowledge of the end-of-life obligations associated with its assets. In mid-2014, Redwater began to experience financial difficulties. Upon application by ATB, GTL was appointed receiver for Redwater on May 12, 2015. At that time, Redwater owed ATB approximately $5.1 million.

[47] Upon being advised of the receivership, the Regulator sent GTL a letter dated May 14, 2015, setting out its position. The Regulator noted that the OGCA and the Pipeline Act included both receivers and trustees in the definition of "licensee". The Regulator stated that it was not a creditor of Redwater and that it was not asserting a "provable claim in the receivership". Accordingly, notwithstanding the receivership, Redwater remained obligated to comply with all regulatory requirements, including abandonment obligations for all licensed assets. The Regulator stated that GTL was legally obligated to fulfill these obligations prior to distributing any funds or finalizing any proposal to creditors. It warned that it would not approve the transfer of any of Redwater's licences unless it was satisfied that both the transferee and the transferor would be in a position to fulfill all regulatory obligations. It requested confirmation that GTL had taken possession of Redwater's licensed properties and that it was taking steps to comply with all of Redwater's regulatory obligations.

ou s'en dessaisit ». Dans les présents motifs, le mot « renoncer » sert à raccourcir ces termes, comme cela a été le cas tout au long du litige qui nous occupe.

[45] Je vais maintenant procéder à une brève analyse des faits entourant la faillite de Redwater.

C. Les faits entourant la faillite de Redwater

[46] Redwater était une société pétrolière et gazière cotée en bourse. L'organisme de réglementation lui a octroyé ses premiers permis en 2009. Le 31 janvier et le 19 août 2013, ATB a avancé des fonds à Redwater et, en contrepartie, s'est vu accorder une sûreté sur les biens actuels et futurs de Redwater. ATB a prêté des fonds à Redwater en pleine connaissance des obligations de fin de vie associées à ses biens. Au milieu de 2014, Redwater a commencé à éprouver des difficultés financières. Sur demande d'ATB, GTL a été nommé séquestre de Redwater le 12 mai 2015. À cette époque, Redwater devait environ 5,1 millions de dollars à ATB.

[47] Après avoir été informé de la mise sous séquestre, l'organisme de réglementation a envoyé à GTL une lettre datée du 14 mai 2015 exposant sa position. L'organisme de réglementation a fait remarquer que l'OGCA et la Pipeline Act incluaient à la fois les séquestres et les syndics dans la définition d'un « titulaire de permis ». L'organisme de réglementation a déclaré qu'il n'était pas un créancier de Redwater et qu'il ne faisait pas valoir une [TRADUCTION] « réclamation prouvable dans le cadre de la mise sous séquestre ». Ainsi, malgré la mise sous séquestre, Redwater demeurait tenue de se conformer à toutes les exigences réglementaires, y compris les obligations d'abandon, pour tous les biens visés par des permis. L'organisme de réglementation a déclaré que GTL était légalement tenu de remplir ces obligations avant de distribuer des fonds ou de finaliser toute proposition aux créanciers. L'organisme de réglementation a averti qu'il n'approuverait pas le transfert de l'un ou l'autre permis de Redwater à moins d'être convaincu que le cessionnaire et le cédant seraient en mesure de s'acquitter de toutes les obligations réglementaires. Il a demandé la confirmation que GTL avait pris possession des biens de Redwater visés par des permis et qu'il prenait des mesures pour se conformer à toutes les obligations réglementaires de Redwater.

[48] At the time it ran into financial difficulties, Redwater was licensed by the Regulator for 84 wells, 7 facilities and 36 pipelines, all in central Alberta. The vast majority of its assets were these oil and gas assets. At the time GTL was appointed receiver, 19 of the wells and facilities were producing and the remaining 72 were inactive or spent. There were working interest participants in several of the wells and facilities. Redwater's LMR did not drop below 1.0 until after it went into receivership, so it never paid any security deposits to the Regulator.

[49] By September 2015, Redwater's LMR had dropped to 0.93. The net value of its deemed assets and its deemed liabilities was negative $553,000. The 19 producing wells and facilities for which Redwater was the licensee would have had an LMR of 2.85 and a deemed net value of $4.152 million. The remaining 72 wells and facilities for which Redwater was the licensee would have had an LMR of 0.30 and a deemed net value of negative $4.705 million. Given that Redwater was in receivership, the Regulator's position was that it would approve the transfer of Redwater's licences only if the transfer did not cause a deterioration in its LMR.

[50] In its Second Report to the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench dated October 3, 2015, GTL explained why it had concluded that it could not meet the Regulator's requirements. GTL had concluded that the cost of the end-of-life obligations for the spent wells would likely exceed the sale proceeds for the productive wells. It viewed a sale of the non-producing wells — even if bundled with producing wells — as unlikely. If such a sale were possible, the purchase price would be reduced by the end-of-life obligations, negating the benefit to the estate. Based on this assessment, by letter dated July 3, 2015, GTL informed the Regulator that it was taking possession and control only of Redwater's 17 most productive wells (including a leaking well that was subsequently abandoned), 3 associated facilities and 12 associated

[49] En septembre 2015, la CGR de Redwater avait chuté à 0,93. La valeur nette de ses biens réputés moins ses passifs réputés était égale à un montant négatif de 553 000 $. Les 19 puits et installations productifs pour lesquels Redwater était titulaire de permis avaient une CRG de 2,85 et une valeur nette réputée de 4,152 millions de dollars. Les 72 autres puits ou installations pour lesquels Redwater était titulaire de permis auraient eu une CGR de 0,30 et une valeur nette réputée négative de 4,705 millions de dollars. Puisque Redwater était sous séquestre, l'organisme de réglementation a mentionné qu'il n'approuverait le transfert des permis de Redwater que si cela n'occasionnait pas une détérioration de sa CGR.

[50] Dans son Deuxième rapport à la Cour du Banc de la Reine de l'Alberta daté du 3 octobre 2015, GTL a expliqué pourquoi il avait conclu qu'il ne pouvait pas satisfaire aux exigences de l'organisme de réglementation. D'après GTL, le coût des obligations de fin de vie des puits taris dépasserait probablement le produit de la vente des puits productifs. Il considérait comme improbable la vente des puits inexploités, même s'ils étaient regroupés avec les puits productifs. Si une telle vente était possible, le prix d'achat serait réduit au regard des obligations de fin de vie, annulant ainsi le bénéfice pour l'actif. Sur la base de cette évaluation, par lettre datée du 3 juillet 2015, GTL a informé l'organisme de réglementation qu'il prenait possession et contrôle seulement des 17 puits les plus productifs de Redwater (y compris un puits pipelines ("Retained Assets"), and that, pursuant to para. 3(a) of the Receivership Order, it was not taking possession or control of any of Redwater's other licensed assets ("Renounced Assets"). GTL's position was that it had no obligation to fulfill any regulatory requirements associated with the Renounced Assets.

[51] In response, on July 15, 2015, the Regulator issued orders under the OGCA and the Pipeline Act requiring Redwater to suspend and abandon the Renounced Assets ("Abandonment Orders"). The orders required abandonment to be carried out immediately where there were no other working interest participants and, by September 18, 2015, where there were other working interest participants. The Regulator stated that it considered the Renounced Assets an environmental and safety hazard and that s. 3.012(d) of the Oil and Gas Conservation Rules required a licensee to abandon wells or facilities so considered. In issuing the Abandonment Orders, the Regulator also relied on ss. 27 to 30 of the OGCA and ss. 23 to 26 of the Pipeline Act. If the Abandonment Orders were not complied with, the Regulator threatened to abandon the assets itself and to sanction Redwater through the use of s. 106 of the OGCA. The Regulator further stated that, once abandonment had taken place, the surface would need to be reclaimed and reclamation certificates obtained in accordance with s. 137 of the EPEA.

[52] On September 22, 2015, the Regulator and the OWA filed an application for a declaration that GTL's renunciation of the Renounced Assets was void, an order requiring GTL to comply with the Abandonment Orders, and an order requiring GTL to "fulfill the statutory obligations as licensee in relation to the abandonment, reclamation and remediation" of all of Redwater's licensed properties (A.R., vol. II, at p. 41). The Regulator did not seek to hold GTL qui fuyait et qui a été abandonné par la suite), ainsi que de 3 installations et de 12 pipelines connexes (« biens conservés »), et qu'en vertu du par. 3a) de l'ordonnance de mise sous séquestre, il ne prenait pas possession ou contrôle de tous les autres éléments d'actif de Redwater visés par des permis (« biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation »). Selon GTL, il n'était aucunement tenu de satisfaire aux exigences réglementaires en lien avec les biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation.

[52] Le 22 septembre 2015, l'organisme de réglementation et l'OWA ont déposé une demande en vue d'obtenir un jugement déclaratoire portant que l'abandon par GTL des biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation était nul, une ordonnance obligeant GTL à se conformer aux ordonnances d'abandon, de même qu'une ordonnance enjoignant à GTL de [TRADUCTION] « remplir les obligations légales en tant que titulaire de permis concernant l'abandon, liable for these obligations beyond the assets remaining in the Redwater estate. GTL brought a cross-application on October 5, 2015, seeking approval to pursue a sales process excluding the Renounced Assets. GTL sought a court order directing that the Regulator could not prevent the transfer of the licences associated with the Retained Assets on the basis of, inter alia, the LMR requirements, failure to comply with the Abandonment Orders, refusal to take possession of the Renounced Assets or any outstanding debts owed by Redwater to the Regulator. GTL did not seek to foreclose the possibility that the Regulator might have some other valid reason to reject a proposed transfer.

[53] A bankruptcy order was issued for Redwater on October 28, 2015, and GTL was appointed as trustee. GTL sent another letter to the Regulator on November 2, 2015, this time invoking s. 14.06(4)(a)(ii) of the BIA in relation to the Renounced Assets. The Abandonment Orders remain outstanding.

D. Judicial History

(1) Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta

[54] The chambers judge concluded that s. 14.06 of the BIA was designed to permit trustees to disclaim property where this was a rational economic decision in light of the environmental condition affecting the property. Personal liability of the trustee was not a condition precedent to the power to disclaim. The chambers judge accordingly found an operational conflict between s. 14.06 of the BIA and the definition of "licensee" in the OGCA and the Pipeline Act. Under s. 14.06 of the BIA, GTL could renounce assets and not be responsible for the associated environmental obligations. However, under the OGCA and the Pipeline Act, GTL could not renounce licensed assets because the definition of "licensee" la remise en état et la décontamination » de tous les biens de Redwater visés par des permis (A.R., vol. II, p. 41). L'organisme de réglementation n'a pas cherché à tenir GTL responsable de ces obligations au-delà des éléments qui faisaient encore partie de l'actif de Redwater. Le 5 octobre 2015, GTL a présenté une demande reconventionnelle visant à obtenir l'autorisation de poursuivre un processus de vente excluant les biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation. GTL a demandé au tribunal de rendre une ordonnance interdisant à l'organisme de réglementation d'empêcher le transfert des permis associés aux biens conservés en raison, notamment, des exigences relatives à la CGR, du non-respect des ordonnances d'abandon, du refus de prendre possession des biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation ou des dettes en souffrance de Redwater envers l'organisme de réglementation. GTL n'a pas cherché à exclure la possibilité que l'organisme de réglementation ait un autre motif valable de rejeter un transfert proposé.

[53] Le 28 octobre 2015, une ordonnance de faillite a été rendue à l'égard de Redwater, et GTL a été nommé syndic. GTL a envoyé une autre lettre à l'organisme de réglementation le 2 novembre 2015, dans laquelle il invoquait cette fois le sous-al. 14.06(4)a)(ii) de la LFI à l'égard des biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation. Les ordonnances d'abandon sont toujours pendantes.

D. Historique judiciaire

(1) La Cour du Banc de la Reine de l'Alberta

[54] Le juge siégeant en cabinet a conclu que l'art. 14.06 de la LFI visait à permettre aux syndics de renoncer à un bien lorsqu'il s'agissait d'une décision économique rationnelle compte tenu du fait lié à l'environnement et touchant le bien. La responsabilité personnelle du syndic n'était pas une condition préalable au pouvoir de renonciation. Le juge siégeant en cabinet a donc conclu à un conflit d'application entre l'art. 14.06 de la LFI et la définition de « titulaire de permis » que l'on trouve dans l'OGCA et la Pipeline Act. En vertu de l'art. 14.06 de la LFI, GTL pouvait renoncer aux biens et ne pas être responsable des obligations environnementales qui y étaient associées. Cependant, aux termes de l'OGCA included receivers and trustees, so GTL remained liable for environmental obligations.

[55] Applying the test from Abitibi, the chambers judge concluded that, although in a "technical sense" it was not sufficiently certain that the Regulator or the OWA would carry out the Abandonment Orders and assert a monetary claim to have its costs reimbursed, the situation met what was intended by the Court in Abitibi because the Abandonment Orders were "intrinsically financial" (para. 173). Forcing GTL, as a "licensee", to comply with the Abandonment Orders would therefore frustrate the BIA's overall purpose of equitable distribution of the bankrupt's assets, as the Regulator's claim would be given a super priority to which it was not entitled, ahead of the claims of secured creditors. It would also frustrate the purpose of s. 14.06, by which Parliament had legislated as to environmental claims in bankruptcy and had specifically chosen not to give them a super priority. The conditions imposed by the Regulator on transfers of the licences for the Retained Assets further frustrated s. 14.06 by including the Renounced Assets in the calculation for determining the approval of a sale.

[56] The chambers judge approved the sale procedure proposed by GTL. He declared that the OGCA and the Pipeline Act were inoperative to the extent that they conflicted with the BIA by deeming GTL to be the "licensee" of the Renounced Assets; that GTL was entitled to disclaim the Renounced Assets pursuant to s. 14.06(4)(a)(ii) and (c), and was not subject to any obligations in relation to those assets; that the Abandonment Orders were inoperative to the extent that they required GTL to comply or to provide security deposits; and that Directive 006 was inoperative to the extent it conflicted with s. 14.06 of the BIA. Lastly, he declared that the Regulator, in exercising its discretion to approve a transfer of the et de la Pipeline Act, GTL ne pouvait renoncer aux biens visés par des permis parce que la définition de « titulaire de permis » comprenait le séquestre et le syndic, si bien que GTL demeurait responsable des obligations environnementales.

[55] Appliquant le critère de l'arrêt Abitibi, le juge siégeant en cabinet a conclu que, bien qu'au [TRADUCTION] « sens technique », il n'était pas suffisamment certain que l'organisme de réglementation ou l'OWA exécuteraient les ordonnances d'abandon et feraient valoir une réclamation pécuniaire pour obtenir le remboursement de leurs frais, la situation répondait à l'intention de la Cour dans Abitibi car les ordonnances d'abandon étaient « intrinsèquement financières » (par. 173). Forcer GTL en tant que « titulaire de permis » à se conformer aux ordonnances d'abandon irait donc à l'encontre de l'objectif global de la LFI de partage équitable des biens du failli, puisque l'organisme de réglementation se verrait accorder, pour sa réclamation, une superpriorité à laquelle il n'avait pas droit, avant les réclamations des créanciers garantis. Cela entraverait aussi la réalisation de l'objet de l'art. 14.06, par lequel le Parlement a légiféré sur les réclamations environnementales en cas de faillite et a expressément fait le choix de ne pas leur accorder une superpriorité. Les conditions imposées par l'organisme de réglementation sur les transferts de permis relatifs aux biens conservés ont contrecarré davantage l'article 14.06 en incluant les biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation dans le calcul pour décider de l'approbation d'une vente.

[56] Le juge siégeant en cabinet a approuvé la procédure de vente proposée par GTL. Il a déclaré que l'OGCA et la Pipeline Act étaient inopérantes dans la mesure où elles entraient en conflit avec la LFI, en considérant GTL comme le « titulaire des permis » relatifs aux biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation, que GTL avait le droit de renoncer à ces biens au titre du sous-al. 14.06(4)a)(ii) et de l'al. 14.06(4)c), et qu'il n'était assujetti à aucune obligation à l'égard de ces biens, que les ordonnances d'abandon étaient inopérantes dans la mesure où elles obligeaient GTL à s'y conformer ou à fournir des dépôts de garantie et que la Directive 006 était inopérante dans la mesure où elle entrait en conflit avec l'art. 14.06 de la LFI.

licences for the Retained Assets, could not consider the Renounced Assets for the purpose of calculating Redwater's LMR before or after the transfer, nor could it consider any other issue involving the Renounced Assets.

(2) Court of Appeal of Alberta

(a) Majority Reasons

[57] Slatter J.A., for the majority, dismissed the appeals. He stated that the constitutional issues in the appeals were complementary to the primary issue, which was the interpretation of the BIA. Section 14.06 did not exempt environmental claims from the general bankruptcy regime, other than the super priority in s. 14.06(7), which would rarely, if ever, have any application to oil and gas wells. Section 14.06(4) did not "limit the power of the trustee to renounce . . . properties to those circumstances where it might be exposed to personal liability" (para. 68). Additionally, the word "order" in s. 14.06(4) had to be given a wide meaning.

[58] Slatter J.A. identified the essential issue as "whether the environmental obligations of Redwater meet the test for a provable claim" (para. 73). He agreed with the chambers judge that the third branch of the Abitibi test was met, but concluded that that test had been met "in both a technical and substantive way" (para. 76). The Regulator's policies essentially stripped away from the bankrupt estate enough value to meet environmental obligations. Requiring the depositing of security, or diverting value from the bankrupt estate, clearly met the standard of "certainty". The Regulator's policies required that the full value of the bankrupt's assets be applied first to environmental liabilities, creating a super priority for environmental claims. Slatter J.A. concluded that, "[n]otwithstanding their intended effect as conditions of licensing, the Regulator's policies [had] a direct effect on property, priorities, and the Trustee's right to renounce Enfin, il a déclaré que l'organisme de réglementation, dans l'exercice de son pouvoir discrétionnaire d'approuver un transfert des permis relatifs aux biens conservés, ne pouvait pas tenir compte des biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation pour le calcul de la CGR de Redwater, avant ou après le transfert, ni tenir compte de toute autre question liée aux biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation.

(2) La Cour d'appel de l'Alberta

a) Les motifs majoritaires

[57] Le juge Slatter, au nom des juges majoritaires, a rejeté les appels. Il a déclaré que les questions constitutionnelles des appels étaient complémentaires à la question principale, l'interprétation de la LFI. L'article 14.06 n'a pas soustrait les réclamations environnementales au régime général de faillite, à l'exception de la superpriorité prévue au par. 14.06(7), qui s'appliquerait rarement, voire jamais, aux puits de pétrole et de gaz. Le paragraphe 14.06(4) n'a pas [TRADUCTION] « limité le pouvoir du syndic de renoncer [. . .] aux biens dans des circonstances où il pourrait s'exposer à une responsabilité personnelle » (par. 68). En outre, il fallait donner un sens large au mot « ordonnance » qui figure au par. 14.06(4).

[58] Le juge Slatter a décidé que la question essentielle était de savoir [TRADUCTION] « si les obligations environnementales de Redwater satisf[aisaient] au critère de la réclamation prouvable » (par. 73). Il était d'accord avec le juge siégeant en cabinet quant au respect du troisième volet du critère d'Abitibi, mais il a conclu que ce critère avait été respecté « tant sur le plan technique que sur le fond » (par. 76). Les politiques de l'organisme de réglementation ont essentiellement privé l'actif du failli d'une valeur suffisante pour respecter les obligations environnementales. Exiger le dépôt d'une garantie, ou détourner la valeur de l'actif du failli, répond clairement à la norme de « certitude ». Les politiques de l'organisme de réglementation exigeaient que la pleine valeur des biens du failli soit d'abord appliquée aux engagements environnementaux, créant ainsi une superpriorité pour les réclamations environnementales. Le juge Slatter a estimé que, « [n]onobstant leur effet assets, all of which [were] governed by the BIA" (para. 86).

[59] In terms of constitutional analysis, Slatter J.A. concluded that the role of GTL as a "licensee" under the OGCA and the Pipeline Act was "in operational conflict with the provisions of the BIA" that exempted trustees from personal liability, allowed them to disclaim assets and established the priority of environmental claims (para. 89). It also frustrated the BIA's purpose of "managing the winding up of insolvent corporations and settling the priority of claims against them" (para. 89). As such, the Regulator could not "insist that the Trustee devote substantial parts of the bankrupt estate in satisfaction of the environmental claims in priority to the claims of the secured creditor" (para. 91).

(b) Dissenting Reasons

[60] Martin J.A. dissented. In contrast to the majority, she stressed the constitutional dimensions of the case, in particular the need for co-operative federalism in the area of the environment, and noted that the doctrine of paramountcy should be applied with restraint. She concluded that the Regulator was not asserting a provable claim within the meaning of the Abitibi test. It was not enough for a regulatory order to be "intrinsically financial" for it to be a claim provable in bankruptcy (para. 185, quoting the chambers judge's reasons, at para. 173). There was not sufficient certainty that the ordered abandonment work would be done, either by the Regulator or by the OWA, and there was "no certainty at all that a claim for reimbursement would be made" (para. 184). Martin J.A. was also of the view that the Regulator was not a creditor of Redwater — or, if it was a creditor in issuing the Abandonment Orders, it was at least not one in enforcing the conditions for the transfer of licences. The Regulator had to be able to maintain control over the transfer of licences during prévu en tant que conditions associées aux permis, les politiques de l'organisme de réglementation ont eu un effet direct sur les biens, les priorités et le droit du Syndic de renoncer à des biens, qui étaient tous régis par la LFI » (par. 86).

[59] Sur le plan de l'analyse constitutionnelle, le juge Slatter a conclu que le rôle de GTL en tant que « titulaire de permis » au sens de l'OGCA et de la Pipeline Act était [TRADUCTION] « en conflit d'application avec les dispositions de la LFI » qui dégageaient les syndics de toute responsabilité personnelle, qui leur permettaient de renoncer à des biens et qui établissaient la priorité des réclamations environnementales (par. 89). Ce rôle entravait également la réalisation de l'objet de la LFI consistant à « gérer la liquidation des sociétés insolvables et à régler la priorité des réclamations à leur encontre » (par. 89). Ainsi, l'organisme de réglementation ne pouvait pas « insister pour que le syndic consacre une partie substantielle de l'actif du failli à l'acquittement des réclamations environnementales, par priorité sur les réclamations du créancier garanti » (par. 91).

b) Les motifs dissidents

[60] La juge Martin a exprimé sa dissidence. Contrairement aux juges majoritaires, elle a souligné les dimensions constitutionnelles de l'affaire, en particulier la nécessité d'un fédéralisme coopératif dans le domaine de l'environnement, et a fait remarquer que la doctrine de la prépondérance devait être appliquée avec retenue. Elle a conclu que l'organisme de réglementation ne faisait pas valoir de réclamation prouvable au sens du critère d'Abitibi. Il ne suffisait pas qu'une ordonnance réglementaire soit [TRADUCTION] « intrinsèquement financière » pour qu'il s'agisse d'une réclamation prouvable en matière de faillite (par. 185, citant les motifs du juge siégeant en cabinet, par. 173). Il n'était pas suffisamment certain que les travaux d'abandon ordonnés soient accomplis, soit par l'organisme de réglementation soit par l'OWA, et il n'y avait « aucune certitude qu'une demande de remboursement soit présentée » (par. 184). La juge Martin estimait elle aussi que l'organisme de réglementation n'était pas un créancier de Redwater — ou, s'il était un créancier au moment de rendre les ordonnances a bankruptcy, and there was no reason why such regulatory requirements could not coexist with the distribution of the bankrupt's estate.

[61] With regard to s. 14.06, Martin J.A. accepted the Regulator's argument that s. 14.06(4) allowed a trustee to renounce real property in order to avoid personal liability but did not prevent the assets of the bankrupt estate from being used to comply with environmental obligations. However, she went beyond this. In her view, s. 14.06(4) to (8) were enacted together as a statutory compromise. Martin J.A. concluded that a trustee's power to disclaim assets under s. 14.06 simply had no applicability to Alberta's regulatory regime. The ability to renounce under s. 14.06(4) had to be read in conjunction with the other half of the compromise — the Crown's super priority over the debtor's real property established by s. 14.06(7). Licence conditions were not the sort of "order" contemplated by s. 14.06(4), nor were licences the kind of "real property" contemplated by that provision. The balance struck by s. 14.06 was not effective when there was no "real property of the debtor" in which the Crown could take a super priority (para. 210).

[62] As there was no entitlement under the BIA to renounce the end-of-life obligations imposed by Alberta's regulatory regime, there was no operational conflict in enforcing those obligations under provincial law. Nor was there any frustration of purpose. The Regulator was not asserting any claims provable in bankruptcy: "The continued application of [Alberta's] regulatory regime following bankruptcy did not determine or reorder priorities among creditors, but rather value[d] accurately the assets available for distribution" (para. 240).

d'abandon, il ne l'était pas dans l'application des conditions de transfert des permis. L'organisme de réglementation devait être en mesure de conserver la maîtrise du transfert des permis pendant une faillite, et il n'y avait aucune raison pour que de telles exigences réglementaires ne puissent pas coexister avec le partage de l'actif du failli.

[61] En ce qui concerne l'article 14.06, la juge Martin a retenu l'argument de l'organisme de réglementation selon lequel le par. 14.06(4) permettait à un syndic de renoncer aux biens réels afin d'éviter d'engager sa responsabilité personnelle, mais n'empêchait pas que l'on se serve des éléments de l'actif du failli pour se conformer aux obligations environnementales. Cependant, elle est allée plus loin. Selon elle, les par. 14.06(4) à (8) ont été adoptés ensemble à titre de compromis d'ordre législatif. La juge Martin a conclu que le pouvoir du syndic de renoncer aux biens en vertu de l'art. 14.06 n'était tout simplement pas applicable dans le régime de réglementation de l'Alberta. La faculté de renoncer en vertu du par. 14.06(4) devait être interprétée en corrélation avec l'autre moitié du compromis, la superpriorité de la Couronne sur les biens réels du débiteur établie par le par. 14.06(7). Les conditions relatives aux permis n'étaient pas le genre d'« ordonnance » envisagé par le par. 14.06(4), ni les permis le genre de « bien réel » envisagé par cette disposition. L'équilibre atteint par l'art. 14.06 n'était pas solide lorsqu'il n'y avait pas de [TRADUCTION] « bien réel du débiteur » à l'égard duquel la Couronne pouvait prendre une superpriorité (par. 210).

[62] Comme il n'y avait aucun droit, aux termes de la LFI, de renoncer aux obligations de fin de vie imposées par le régime de réglementation [de l'Alberta], aucun conflit d'application ne résultait de l'exécution de ces obligations sous le régime du droit provincial. Et il n'existait pas non plus d'entrave à la réalisation d'un objet fédéral. L'organisme de réglementation ne faisait valoir aucune réclamation prouvable en matière de faillite : [TRADUCTION] « L'application continue du régime de réglementation [de l'Alberta] après la faillite n'a pas fixé ou réarrangé les priorités parmi les créanciers, mais a plutôt donné lieu à une évaluation juste des biens pouvant être répartis » (par. 240).

III. Analysis

A. The Doctrine of Paramountcy

[63] As I have explained, Alberta legislation grants the Regulator wide-ranging powers to ensure that companies that have been granted licences to operate in the Alberta oil and gas industry will safely and properly abandon oil wells, facilities and pipelines at the end of their productive lives and will reclaim their sites. GTL seeks to avoid being subject to two of those powers: the power to order Redwater to abandon the Renounced Assets and the power to refuse to allow a transfer of the licences for the Retained Assets due to unmet LMR requirements. There is no doubt that these are valid regulatory powers granted to the Regulator by valid Alberta legislation. GTL seeks to avoid their application during bankruptcy by virtue of the doctrine of federal paramountcy, which dictates that the Alberta legislation empowering the Regulator to use the powers in dispute in this appeal will be inoperative to the extent that its use of these powers during bankruptcy conflicts with the BIA.

[64] The issues in this appeal arise from what has been termed the "untidy intersection" of provincial environmental legislation and federal insolvency legislation (Nortel Networks Corp., Re, 2012 ONSC 1213, 88 C.B.R. (5th) 111, at para. 8). Paramountcy issues frequently arise in the insolvency context. Given the procedural nature of the BIA, the bankruptcy regime relies heavily on the continued operation of provincial laws. However, s. 72(1) of the BIA confirms that, where there is a genuine conflict between provincial laws concerning property and civil rights and federal bankruptcy legislation, the BIA prevails (see Moloney, at para. 40). In other words, bankruptcy is carved out from property and civil rights but remains conceptually part of it. Valid provincial legislation of general application continues to apply in bankruptcy until Parliament legislates pursuant to its exclusive jurisdiction in relation to bankruptcy and insolvency. At that point,

III. Analyse

A. La doctrine de la prépondérance fédérale

[63] Comme je l'ai expliqué, la législation albertaine accorde à l'organisme de réglementation des pouvoirs étendus pour s'assurer que les sociétés qui ont obtenu des permis d'exploitation dans l'industrie pétrolière et gazière de l'Alberta abandonneront, de façon appropriée et sécuritaire, les puits de pétrole, installations et pipelines à la fin de leur vie productive, et remettront en état leurs sites. GTL cherche à éviter d'être assujetti à deux de ces pouvoirs : celui d'ordonner à Redwater d'abandonner les biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation et celui de refuser de permettre le transfert des permis relatifs aux biens conservés à cause du non-respect des exigences relatives à la CGR. Il s'agit là sans aucun doute de pouvoirs réglementaires valables accordés à l'organisme de réglementation par une loi albertaine valide. GTL cherche à éviter leur application au cours de la faillite en invoquant la doctrine de la prépondérance fédérale, selon laquelle la loi de l'Alberta habilitant l'organisme de réglementation à utiliser les pouvoirs qui sont en litige dans le cadre du présent pourvoi est inopérante dans la mesure où son exercice de ces pouvoirs pendant la faillite entre en conflit avec la LFI.

[64] Les questions en litige dans le présent pourvoi découlent de ce qu'on a appelé [TRADUCTION] l'« intersection désordonnée » de la législation provinciale sur l'environnement et de la législation fédérale sur l'insolvabilité (Nortel Networks Corp., Re, 2012 ONSC 1213, 88 C.B.R. (5th) 111, par. 8). Les questions de prépondérance se posent souvent dans le contexte de l'insolvabilité. Étant donné la nature procédurale de la LFI, le régime de faillite repose en grande partie sur l'application continue des lois provinciales. Toutefois, le par. 72(1) de la LFI confirme qu'en cas de conflit véritable entre les lois provinciales concernant la propriété et les droits civils et la législation fédérale sur la faillite, la LFI l'emporte (voir Moloney, par. 40). En d'autres termes, la faillite est issue de la propriété et des droits civils, mais elle en fait toujours partie conceptuellement. Les lois provinciales valides d'application générale continuent de s'appliquer dans le domaine de la faillite jusqu'à ce the provincial law becomes inoperative to the extent of the conflict (see Husky Oil Operations Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue, [1995] 3 S.C.R. 453, at para. 3).

[65] Over time, two distinct forms of conflict have been recognized. The first is operational conflict, which arises where compliance with both a valid federal law and a valid provincial law is impossible. Operational conflict arises "where one enactment says 'yes' and the other says 'no', such that 'compliance with one is defiance of the other'" (Saskatchewan (Attorney General) v. Lemare Lake Logging Ltd., 2015 SCC 53, [2015] 3 S.C.R. 419, at para. 18, quoting Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 161, at p. 191). The second is frustration of purpose, which occurs where the operation of a valid provincial law is incompatible with a federal legislative purpose. The effect of a provincial law may frustrate the purpose of the federal law, even though it does "not entail a direct violation of the federal law's provisions" (Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 3, at para. 73). The party relying on frustration of purpose "must first establish the purpose of the relevant federal statute, and then prove that the provincial legislation is incompatible with this purpose" (Lemare, at para. 26, quoting Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canadian Owners and Pilots Association, 2010 SCC 39, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 536, at para. 66).

[66] Under both branches of paramountcy, the burden of proof rests on the party alleging the conflict. This burden is not an easy one to satisfy, as the doctrine of paramountcy is to be applied with restraint. Conflict must be defined narrowly so that each level of government may act as freely as possible within its respective sphere of constitutional authority. "[H]armonious interpretations of federal and provincial legislation should be favoured over an interpretation that results in incompatibility . . . [i]n the absence of 'very clear' statutory language to the contrary" (Lemare, at paras. 21 and 27). "It is presumed that Parliament intends its laws to co-exist with provincial laws" (Moloney, at para. 27). As this Court found in Lemare, at paras. 22-23, the application of the que le Parlement légifère en vertu de sa compétence exclusive en matière de faillite et d'insolvabilité. La loi provinciale devient alors inopérante dans la mesure du conflit (voir Husky Oil Operations Ltd. c. Ministre du Revenu national, [1995] 3 R.C.S. 453, par. 3).

[65] Au fil du temps, deux formes distinctes de conflit ont été reconnues. La première est le conflit d'application, qui survient lorsqu'il est impossible de se conformer en même temps à une loi fédérale valide et à une loi provinciale valide. Il y a conflit d'application lorsqu'« une loi dit "oui" et l'autre dit "non", de sorte que "l'observance de l'une entraîne l'inobservance de l'autre" » (Saskatchewan (Procureur général) c. Lemare Lake Logging Ltd., 2015 CSC 53, [2015] 3 R.C.S. 419, par. 18, citant Multiple Access Ltd. c. McCutcheon, [1982] 2 R.C.S. 161, p. 191). La seconde est l'entrave à la réalisation d'un objet fédéral, qui se produit lorsque l'application d'une loi provinciale valide est incompatible avec l'objet d'une loi fédérale. L'effet d'une loi provinciale peut contrecarrer la réalisation de l'objet de la loi fédérale, « sans toutefois entraîner une violation directe de ses dispositions » (Banque canadienne de l'Ouest c. Alberta, 2007 CSC 22, [2007] 2 R.C.S. 3, par. 73). La partie qui invoque l'entrave à la réalisation d'un objet fédéral « doit d'abord établir l'objet de la loi fédérale pertinente et ensuite prouver que la loi provinciale est incompatible avec cet objet » (Lemare, par. 26, citant Québec (Procureur général) c. Canadian Owners and Pilots Association, 2010 CSC 39, [2010] 2 R.C.S. 536, par. 66).

[66] Aux deux volets de la prépondérance, la charge de la preuve incombe à la partie qui allègue l'existence du conflit. Il n'est pas facile de s'en acquitter, puisque la doctrine de la prépondérance doit être appliquée avec retenue. Le conflit doit être défini de façon étroite pour que chaque ordre de gouvernement puisse agir aussi librement que possible dans sa sphère de compétence constitutionnelle respective. « [L]es tribunaux doivent donner aux lois provinciale et fédérale une interprétation harmonieuse plutôt qu'une interprétation qui donne lieu à une incompatibilité [. . .] [e]n l'absence d'un texte législatif "clair" à cet effet » (Lemare, par. 21 et 27). « On présume que le Parlement a l'intention de faire coexister ses lois avec les lois provinciales » (Moloney, par. 27).

doctrine of paramountcy should also give due weight to the principle of co-operative federalism. This principle allows for interplay and overlap between federal and provincial legislation. While co-operative federalism does not impose limits on the otherwise valid exercise of legislative power, it does mean that courts should avoid an expansive interpretation of the purpose of federal legislation which will bring it into conflict with provincial legislation.

[67] The case law has established that the BIA as a whole is intended to further "two purposes: the equitable distribution of the bankrupt's assets among his or her creditors and the bankrupt's financial rehabilitation" (Moloney, at para. 32, citing Husky Oil, at para. 7). Here, the bankrupt is a corporation that will never emerge from bankruptcy. Accordingly, only the former purpose is relevant. As I will discuss below, the chambers judge also spoke of the purposes of s. 14.06 as distinct from the broader purposes of the BIA. This Court has discussed the purpose of specific provisions of the BIA in previous cases — see, for example, Lemare, at para. 45.

[68] GTL has proposed two conflicts between the Alberta legislation establishing the disputed powers of the Regulator during bankruptcy and the BIA, either of which, it says, would have provided a sufficient basis for the order granted by the chambers judge.

[69] The first conflict proposed by GTL results from the inclusion of trustees in the definition of "licensee" in the OGCA and the Pipeline Act. GTL says that s. 14.06(4) releases it from all environmental liability associated with the Renounced Assets after a valid "disclaimer" is made. But as a "licensee", it can be required by the Regulator to satisfy all of Redwater's statutory obligations and liabilities, which disregards the "disclaimer" of the Renounced Assets. GTL further notes the possibility that it may be held personally liable as a "licensee". In response, the Regulator says that s. 14.06(4) is concerned primarily with protecting trustees from personal liability in relation to environmental orders, and does not affect the ongoing responsibilities of the bankrupt

Comme le conclut notre Cour aux par. 22 et 23 de l'arrêt Lemare, l'application de la doctrine de la prépondérance devrait également tenir dûment compte du principe du fédéralisme coopératif. Ce principe permet l'interaction ainsi que le chevauchement entre les lois fédérales et provinciales. Bien que le fédéralisme coopératif n'impose pas de limites à l'exercice par ailleurs valide du pouvoir législatif, cela signifie que les tribunaux devraient éviter de donner à l'objet de la loi fédérale une interprétation large qui le mettrait en conflit avec la loi provinciale.

[67] La jurisprudence a établi que la LFI dans son ensemble est censée favoriser l'atteinte de « deux objectifs : le partage équitable des biens du failli entre ses créanciers et la réhabilitation financière du failli » (Moloney, par. 32, citant Husky Oil, par. 7). En l'espèce, la faillie est une société qui ne s'extirpera jamais de la faillite. Donc, seul le premier objectif est pertinent. Comme je vais l'expliquer ci-dessous, le juge siégeant en cabinet a également affirmé que l'objet de l'art. 14.06 se distinguait des objets plus larges de la LFI. Notre Cour a analysé l'objet de certaines dispositions de la LFI dans des décisions antérieures (voir, par exemple, Lemare, par. 45).

[68] GTL a relevé deux conflits entre la législation albertaine établissant les pouvoirs contestés de l'organisme de réglementation pendant la faillite et la LFI, et l'un ou l'autre aurait constitué, selon lui, un fondement suffisant pour l'ordonnance rendue par le juge siégeant en cabinet.

[69] Le premier conflit avancé par GTL découle de l'ajout des syndics à la définition de « titulaire de permis » qui figure dans l'OGCA et la Pipeline Act. GTL affirme que le par. 14.06(4) le soustrait à tout engagement environnemental associé aux biens faisant l'objet d'une « renonciation » valide. Toutefois, comme il est « titulaire de permis », l'organisme de réglementation peut l'obliger à s'acquitter de toutes les obligations et de tous les engagements légaux de Redwater, faisant ainsi abstraction de la « renonciation » aux biens en cause. GTL souligne en outre la possibilité qu'il soit tenu personnellement responsable en tant que « titulaire de permis ». L'organisme de réglementation réplique que le par. 14.06(4) a pour objectif premier de mettre les syndics à l'abri de toute estate. Thus, as long as a trustee is protected from personal liability, no conflict arises from its status as a "licensee" or from the fact that the bankrupt estate remains responsible under provincial law for the ongoing environmental obligations associated with "disclaimed" assets.

[70] The second conflict proposed by GTL is that, even if s. 14.06(4) is only concerned with a trustee's personal liability, the Regulator's use of its statutory powers effectively reorders the priorities in bankruptcy established by the BIA. Such reordering is said to be caused by the fact that the Regulator requires the expenditure of estate assets to comply with the Abandonment Orders and to discharge or secure the environmental liabilities associated with the Renounced Assets before it will approve a transfer of the licences for the Retained Assets (in keeping with the LMR requirements). These end-of-life obligations are said by GTL to be unsecured claims held by the Regulator, which cannot, under the BIA, be satisfied in preference over the claims of Redwater's secured creditors. In response, the Regulator says that, on the proper application of the Abitibi test, these environmental regulatory obligations are not provable claims in bankruptcy. Accordingly, says the Regulator, the provincial laws requiring the Redwater estate to satisfy these obligations prior to the distribution of its assets to secured creditors do not conflict with the priority scheme in the BIA.

[71] I will consider each alleged conflict in turn.

B. Is There a Conflict Between the Alberta Regulatory Scheme and Section 14.06 of the BIA?

[72] As a statutory scheme, s. 14.06 of the BIA raises numerous interpretive issues. As noted by Martin J.A., the only matter concerning s. 14.06 on responsabilité personnelle à l'égard des ordonnances environnementales et que cette disposition n'a aucune incidence sur les responsabilités continues de l'actif du failli. Ainsi, tant qu'un syndic est à l'abri de toute responsabilité personnelle, son statut de « titulaire de permis » et le fait que l'actif d'un failli demeure responsable, aux termes du droit provincial, des obligations environnementales continues associées aux éléments le composant et faisant l'objet de la renonciation ne sont à l'origine d'aucun conflit.

[70] Le second conflit allégué par GTL est que, même si le par. 14.06(4) ne porte que la responsabilité personnelle d'un syndic, l'exercice par l'organisme de réglementation des pouvoirs que lui confère la loi réarrange de fait les priorités établies par la LFI en matière de faillite. Un tel réarrangement serait imputable au fait que l'organisme de réglementation exige la dépense d'éléments d'actif pour respecter les ordonnances d'abandon ainsi que pour libérer ou garantir les engagements environnementaux associés aux biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation avant d'approuver un transfert des permis liés aux biens conservés (conformément aux exigences relatives à la CGR). Ces obligations de fin de vie sont considérées par GTL comme étant une créance ordinaire de l'organisme de réglementation, que la LFI ne permet pas d'acquitter de préférence aux réclamations des créanciers garantis de Redwater. L'organisme de réglementation réplique que, si l'on applique correctement le critère d'Abitibi, ces obligations réglementaires environnementales ne sont pas des réclamations prouvables en matière de faillite. En conséquence, selon l'organisme de réglementation, les lois provinciales exigeant que l'actif de Redwater satisfasse à ces obligations avant le partage, entre les créanciers garantis, des éléments dont il est composé n'entre pas en conflit avec le régime de priorité de la LFI.

[71] J'examinerai chacun des conflits allégués, l'un après l'autre.

B. Y a-t-il un conflit entre le régime de réglementation albertain et l'art. 14.06 de la LFI?

[72] En tant que régime législatif, l'art. 14.06 de la LFI soulève de nombreuses questions d'interprétation. Comme l'a fait remarquer la juge Martin, le seul which all the parties to this litigation can agree is that it "is not a model of clarity" (C.A. reasons, at para. 201). Given the confusion caused by attempts to interpret s. 14.06 as a coherent scheme during this litigation, Parliament may very well wish to re-examine s. 14.06 during its next review of the BIA.

[73] At its core, this appeal raises the issue of whether there is a conflict between specific Alberta legislation and the BIA. GTL submits that there is such a conflict. It argues that, because it "disclaimed" the Renounced Assets under s. 14.06(4) of the BIA, it should cease to have any responsibilities, obligations or liability with respect to them. And yet, it notes, as a "licensee" under the OGCA and the Pipeline Act, it remains responsible for abandoning the Renounced Assets. Furthermore, those assets continue to be included in the calculation of Redwater's LMR. GTL suggests an additional conflict with s. 14.06(2) of the BIA based on its possible exposure, as a "licensee", to personal liability for the costs of abandoning the Renounced Assets.

[74] I have concluded that there is no conflict. Various arguments were advanced during this appeal concerning the disparate elements of the s. 14.06 scheme. However, the provision upon which GTL in fact relies in arguing that it is entitled to avoid its responsibilities as a "licensee" under the Alberta legislation is s. 14.06(4). As I have noted, GTL and the Regulator propose very different interpretations of s. 14.06(4). However, s. 14.06(4) is clear and unambiguous when read on its own: where it is invoked by a trustee, the result is that "the trustee is not personally liable" for failure to comply with certain environmental orders or for the costs incurred by any person in carrying out the terms of such orders. The provision says nothing about the liability of the "bankrupt" or the "estate" — distinct concepts referenced many times throughout the BIA. Section 14.06(4), on its own wording, does not support the interpretation urged upon this Court by GTL.

point concernant l'art. 14.06 sur lequel toutes les parties au présent litige ont pu s'entendre est le fait que ce [TRADUCTION] « n'est pas un modèle de clarté » (motifs de la Cour d'appel, par. 201). Vu la confusion semée par les tentatives d'interpréter l'art. 14.06 comme un régime cohérent lors du présent litige, le Parlement pourrait fort bien vouloir réexaminer cet article durant sa prochaine étude de la LFI.

[73] Fondamentalement, le présent pourvoi porte sur la question de savoir s'il existe un conflit entre une loi albertaine en particulier et la LFI. GTL soutient que oui et affirme que, comme il a « renoncé » aux biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation en vertu du par. 14.06(4) de la LFI, il peut cesser d'assumer toute responsabilité ou obligation ou tout engagement à l'égard de ces biens. Pourtant, aux dires de GTL, en tant que « titulaire de permis », il reste chargé de les abandonner. De plus, ceux-ci sont toujours inclus dans le calcul de la CGR de Redwater. GTL prétend qu'il y a un autre conflit avec le par. 14.06(2) de la LFI du fait que sa responsabilité personnelle comme « titulaire de permis » peut être engagée relativement aux frais d'abandon des biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation.

[74] J'ai conclu à l'absence de conflit. Différents arguments ont été présentés lors du pourvoi au sujet des éléments disparates du régime instauré par l'art. 14.06. Cependant, la disposition qu'invoque en fait GTL pour affirmer avoir le droit d'échapper à ses responsabilités en tant que « titulaire de permis » en application de la législation albertaine est le par. 14.06(4). Rappelons que GTL et l'organisme de réglementation proposent des interprétations fort différentes du par. 14.06(4). Toutefois, à la simple lecture de ses termes, le par. 14.06(4) est clair et sans équivoque : lorsqu'il est invoqué par un syndic, « le syndic est dégagé de toute responsabilité personnelle » découlant du non-respect de certaines ordonnances environnementales ou relativement aux frais engagés par toute personne exécutant ces ordonnances. La disposition ne dit rien à propos de la responsabilité du « failli » ou de l'« actif », des notions distinctes mentionnées à maintes reprises dans la LFI. Le texte même du par. 14.06(4) n'étaye pas l'interprétation que GTL nous exhorte à retenir.

[75] In my view, s. 14.06(4) sets out the result of a trustee's "disclaimer" of real property when there is an order to remedy any environmental condition or damage affecting that property. Regardless of whether "disclaimer" is understood as a common law power or as a power deriving from some other statutory source, the result of a trustee's "disclaimer" of real property where an environmental order has been made in relation to that property is that the trustee is protected from personal liability, while the ongoing liability of the bankrupt estate is unaffected. The interpretation of s. 14.06(4) as being concerned with the personal liability of the trustee and not with the liability of the bankrupt estate is supported not only by the plain language of the section, but also by the Hansard evidence, a previous decision of this Court and the French version of the section. Furthermore, not only is the plain meaning of the words "personally liable" clear, but the same concept is also found in both s. 14.06(1.2) and s. 14.06(2), which specifically state that the trustee is not personally liable. In particular, in my view, it is impossible to coherently read s. 14.06(2) as referring to personal liability and yet read s. 14.06(4) as somehow referring to the liability of the bankrupt estate.

[76] Given that s. 14.06(4) dictates that "disclaimer" only protects trustees from personal liability, then, even assuming that GTL successfully "disclaimed" in this case, no operational conflict or frustration of purpose results from the fact that the Regulator requires GTL, as a "licensee", to expend estate assets on abandoning the Renounced Assets. Furthermore, no conflict is caused by continuing to include the Renounced Assets in the calculation of Redwater's LMR. Finally, given the restraint with which the doctrine of paramountcy must be applied, and given that the Regulator has not attempted to hold GTL personally liable as a "licensee" for the costs of abandonment, no conflict with s. 14.06(2) or s. 14.06(4) is caused by the mere theoretical possibility of personal liability under the OGCA or the Pipeline Act.

[75] À mon avis, le par. 14.06(4) expose le résultat d'une « renonciation » du syndic à un bien réel en cas d'ordonnance de réparation de tout fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement et touchant ce bien. Que l'on voit la « renonciation » comme un pouvoir reconnu par la common law ou un pouvoir découlant d'une quelconque autre source législative, la « renonciation » d'un syndic à des biens réels en réaction à une ordonnance environnementale visant ces biens dégage le syndic de toute responsabilité personnelle, alors que la responsabilité continue de l'actif du failli n'est pas touchée. L'idée que le par. 14.06(4) vise la responsabilité personnelle du syndic, et non celle de l'actif du failli, est étayée non seulement par le texte clair de l'article, mais également par les débats parlementaires, un arrêt de notre Cour et la version française de l'article. De plus, non seulement le sens ordinaire des mots « responsabilité personnelle » est-il clair, mais on retrouve également le même concept aux par. 14.06(1.2) et (2), lesquels disposent expressément que le syndic est dégagé de toute responsabilité personnelle. En particulier, il me paraît impossible d'interpréter de manière cohérente le par. 14.06(2) comme mentionnant la responsabilité personnelle tout en interprétant le par. 14.06(4) comme renvoyant d'une façon ou d'un autre à la responsabilité de l'actif du failli.

[76] Comme le par. 14.06(4) dispose que la « renonciation » dégage uniquement le syndic de toute responsabilité personnelle, à supposer même que GTL ait « renoncé » avec succès à des biens en l'espèce, l'organisme de réglementation ne cause aucun conflit d'application ni n'entrave la réalisation d'un objet fédéral en exigeant de GTL à titre de « titulaire de permis » qu'il se serve d'éléments de l'actif pour abandonner les biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation. En outre, il n'y a aucun conflit du fait que ces biens soient toujours inclus dans le calcul de la CGR de Redwater. Enfin, vu la retenue avec laquelle il faut appliquer la doctrine de la prépondérance, et vu que l'organisme de réglementation n'a pas tenté de tenir GTL personnellement responsable en tant que « titulaire de permis » des frais d'abandon, aucun conflit avec les par. 14.06(2) ou (4) n'est causé par la simple possibilité théorique de responsabilité personnelle en application de la OGCA ou de la Pipeline Act.

[77] In what follows, I will begin by interpreting s. 14.06(4) and explaining why, based on its plain wording and other relevant considerations, the provision is concerned solely with the personal liability of the trustee, and not with the liability of the bankrupt estate. I will then explain how, despite their superficial similarity, s. 14.06(4) and s. 14.06(2) have different rationales, and I will demonstrate that, on a proper understanding of the scheme crafted by Parliament, s. 14.06(4) does not affect the liability of the bankrupt estate. To conclude, I will demonstrate that there is no operational conflict or frustration of purpose between the Alberta legislation and s. 14.06 of the BIA in this case, with particular reference to the question of GTL's protection from personal liability.

(1) The Correct Interpretation of Section 14.06(4)

(a) Section 14.06(4) Is Concerned With the Personal Liability of Trustees

[78] I have concluded that s. 14.06(4) is concerned with the personal liability of trustees, and not with the liability of the bankrupt estate. I emphasize here the well-established principle that, "[w]hen a federal statute can be properly interpreted so as not to interfere with a provincial statute, such an interpretation is to be applied in preference to another applicable construction which would bring about a conflict between the two statutes" (Canadian Western Bank, at para. 75, quoting Attorney General of Canada v. Law Society of British Columbia, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 307, at p. 356).

[79] Section 14.06(4) says nothing about the "bankrupt estate" avoiding the applicability of valid provincial law. In drafting s. 14.06(4), Parliament could easily have referred to the liability of the bankrupt estate. Parliament chose instead to refer simply to the personal liability of a trustee. Notably, s. 14.06(7) and s. 14.06(8) both refer to a "debtor in a bankruptcy". Parliament's choice in this regard cannot be ignored. I agree with Martin J.A. that there is no basis on which to read the words "the trustee is not personally liable" in s. 14.06(4) as encompassing the liability of the bankrupt estate. As noted by Martin J.A., it

[77] Dans les paragraphes qui suivent, je vais d'abord interpréter le par. 14.06(4) et expliquer pourquoi, compte tenu de sa formulation claire et d'autres considérations pertinentes, la disposition ne concerne que la responsabilité personnelle du syndic, et non la responsabilité de l'actif du failli. Je vais ensuite expliquer en quoi, malgré leur similitude superficielle, la raison d'être du par. 14.06(4) diffère de celle du par. 14.06(2), et démontrer que, si l'on comprend bien le régime conçu par le Parlement, le par. 14.06(4) n'influe pas sur la responsabilité de l'actif du failli. Pour conclure, je démontrerai qu'il n'y a aucun conflit d'application ni aucune entrave à la réalisation d'un objet fédéral entre la législation albertaine et l'art. 14.06 de la LFI dans la présente affaire, particulièrement en ce qui a trait à la protection de GTL contre toute responsabilité personnelle.

(1) L'interprétation juste du par. 14.06(4)

a) Le paragraphe 14.06(4) s'attache à la responsabilité personnelle du syndic

[78] J'ai conclu que le par. 14.06(4) s'attache à la responsabilité personnelle du syndic et non à la responsabilité de l'actif du failli. Je souligne ici le principe bien établi selon lequel « [c]haque fois qu'on peut légitimement interpréter une loi fédérale de manière qu'elle n'entre pas en conflit avec une loi provinciale, il faut appliquer cette interprétation de préférence à toute autre qui entraînerait un conflit » (Banque canadienne de l'Ouest, par. 75, citant Procureur général du Canda c. Law Society of British Columbia, [1982] 2 R.C.S. 307, p. 356).

[79] Le paragraphe 14.06(4) est muet à propos de « l'actif du failli » qui évite l'applicabilité d'une loi provinciale valide. Lorsqu'il a rédigé le par. 14.06(4), le Parlement aurait pu aisément parler de la responsabilité de l'actif du failli. Le Parlement a plutôt choisi de mentionner uniquement la responsabilité personnelle du syndic. Fait à noter, les par. 14.06(7) et (8) parlent tous deux du « débiteur ». Ce choix du Parlement ne peut être ignoré. Je conviens avec la juge d'appel Martin qu'il n'y aucune raison de considérer que les mots « le syndic est [. . .] dégagé de toute responsabilité personnelle » figurant is apparent from the express language chosen by Parliament that s. 14.06(4) was motivated by and aimed at concerns about the protection of trustees, not the protection of the full value of the estate for creditors. Nothing in the wording of s. 14.06(4) suggests that it was intended to extend to estate liability.

[80] The Hansard evidence leads to the same conclusion. Jacques Hains, Director, Corporate Law Policy Directorate, Department of Industry Canada, noted the following during the 1996 debates preceding the enactment of s. 14.06(4) in 1997:

> The aim is to provide a better definition of the liability of insolvency professionals and practitioners in order to encourage them to accept mandates where there may be problems related to the environment. It is hoped that this will reduce the number of abandoned sites both for the benefit of the environment and the safeguard of businesses and jobs.

(Standing Committee on Industry, Evidence, No. 16, 2nd Sess., 35th Parl., June 11, 1996, at 15:49-15:55, as cited in C.A. reasons, at para. 197.)

Several months later, Mr. Hains stated:

> What Parliament tried to do in 1992 was to provide a relief to insolvency practitioners . . . because they were at risk when they accepted a mandate to liquidate an insolvent business. Under environmental laws, therefore, they could have been subject to personal liability to clean up the environment. I am speaking of personal liability here, meaning "out of their own pockets."

(Proceedings of the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, No. 13, 2nd Sess., 35th Parl., November 4, 1996, at p. 15)

Mr. Hains proceeded to explain how the 1997 amendments were intended to improve on the 1992 reforms to the BIA that had included the original version of s. 14.06(2) (as discussed further below), but he gave au par. 14.06(4) visent la responsabilité de l'actif du failli. Comme l'a signalé la juge Martin, il ressort des termes exprès choisis par le Parlement que le 14.06(4) découlait du souci de protéger les syndics et se voulait une réponse à ce souci, et non de protéger la pleine valeur de l'actif au bénéfice des créanciers. Le texte du par. 14.06(4) ne porte aucunement à croire qu'il devait s'étendre à la responsabilité de l'actif.

[80] Les débats parlementaires mènent à la même conclusion. Jacques Hains, directeur de la Direction de la politique des lois commerciales au ministère d'Industrie Canada, a souligné ce qui suit pendant les débats tenus en 1996 avant l'adoption du par. 14.06(4) l'année suivante :

> L'objectif est de mieux définir la responsabilité des professionnels de l'insolvabilité, des praticiens de façon à les encourager à accepter des mandats où il pourrait peut-être y avoir des problèmes en matière d'environnement, de façon à réduire le nombre de sites abandonnés au pays, pour le bénéfice de l'environnement et la sauvegarde des entreprises et des emplois qui en dépendent.

(Comité permanent de l'industrie, Témoignages, nº 16, 2e sess., 35e lég., 11 juin 1996, entre 15 h 49 et 15 h 55, cité dans les motifs de la Cour d'appel, par. 197.)

Plusieurs mois plus tard, M. Hains a mentionné que :

> [L]es dispositions [ont été] adoptées par le Parlement en 1992 en vue d'alléger le fardeau de ceux qui travaillent dans le domaine de l'insolvabilité [. . .] parce que le mandat de liquider une entreprise insolvable leur impose des risques. En vertu du droit environnemental, par conséquent, ils auraient pu être tenus personnellement responsables d'un accident environnemental et obligés de verser les dommages-intérêts.

(Délibérations du comité sénatorial permanent des Banques et du commerce, nº 13, 2e sess., 35e lég., 4 novembre 1996, p. 16)

M. Hains a ensuite expliqué en quoi les modifications de 1997 visaient à améliorer la réforme de la LFI en 1992 qui comprenait la première version du par. 14.06(2) (comme nous le verrons plus loin), mais no indication that the focus had somehow shifted away from a trustee's "personal liability".

[81] Prior to the enactment of the 1997 amendments, G. Marantz, Legal Advisor to the Department of Industry Canada, noted that they were intended to "provide the trustee with protection from being chased with deep-pocket liability" (Standing Committee on Industry, Evidence, No. 21, 2nd Sess., 35th Parl., September 25, 1996, at 17:15, as cited in C.A. reasons, at para. 198). I agree with the Regulator that the legislative debates give no hint of any intention by Parliament to immunize bankrupt estates from environmental liabilities. The notion that s. 14.06(4) was aimed at encouraging trustees in bankruptcy to accept mandates, and not at limiting estate liability, is further supported by the fact that the provision was inserted under the general heading "Appointment and Substitution of Trustees".

[82] Furthermore, in drafting s. 14.06(4), Parliament chose to use exactly the same concept it had used earlier in s. 14.06(2): by their express wording, where either provision applies, a trustee is not "personally liable". This cannot have been an oversight given that s. 14.06(4) was added to the BIA some five years after the enactment of s. 14.06(2). Since both provisions deal expressly with the protection of trustees from being "personally liable", it is very difficult to accept that they could be concerned with different kinds of liability. By their wording, s. 14.06(2) and s. 14.06(4) are clearly both concerned with the same concept. Indeed, if one interprets s. 14.06(4) as extending to estate liability, then there is no principled reason not to interpret s. 14.06(2) in the same way. However, it is undisputed that this was not Parliament's intention in enacting s. 14.06(2).

[83] Similarly, Parliament has also chosen to use the same concept found in both s. 14.06(4) and s. 14.06(2) in a third part of the 14.06 scheme, namely s. 14.06(1.2). This provision states that a trustee carrying on the business of a debtor or continuing the employment of a debtor's employees is il n'a pas laissé entendre que l'accent n'était plus mis sur la « responsabilité personnelle » du syndic.

[81] Avant l'adoption des modifications de 1997, Gordon Marantz, conseiller juridique au ministère d'Industrie Canada, a fait remarquer qu'elles visaient à « empêcher le syndic d'être poursuivi pour de fortes sommes » (Comité permanent de l'industrie, Témoignages, nº 21, 2e sess., 35e lég., 25 septembre 1996, à 17 h 15, cité dans les motifs de la Cour d'appel, par. 198)). Je conviens avec l'organisme de réglementation que les débats législatifs ne donnent aucun indice d'une intention du Parlement de mettre les biens des faillis à l'abri de toute responsabilité environnementale. L'idée que le par. 14.06(4) avait pour objectif d'inciter les syndics de faillite à accepter des mandats, et non de limiter la responsabilité de l'actif, est étayée davantage par l'insertion de la disposition sous la rubrique générale « Nomination et remplacement des syndics ».

[82] De plus, au moment de rédiger le par. 14.06(4), le Parlement a décidé d'utiliser la même notion qu'il avait employé précédemment au par. 14.06(2) : de par leur libellé explicite, lorsque l'une ou l'autre disposition s'applique, le syndic est dégagé de toute « responsabilité personnelle ». Il ne peut s'agir d'une erreur, car le par. 14.06(4) a été inséré dans la LFI quelque cinq ans après l'adoption du par. 14.06(2). Puisque les deux dispositions visent expressément à protéger les syndics contre toute « responsabilité personnelle », il est très difficile d'accepter qu'elles puissent concerner différents types de responsabilité. D'après leurs termes, le par. 14.06(2) et le par. 14.06(4) traitent manifestement du même concept. En effet, si l'on considère que le par. 14.06(4) s'étend à la responsabilité de l'actif, il n'y a aucune raison de principe de ne pas donner la même interprétation au par. 14.06(2). Toutefois, personne ne conteste que ce n'était pas l'intention qu'avait le Parlement au moment d'adopter le par. 14.06(2).

[83] Dans le même ordre d'idées, le Parlement a aussi choisi d'utiliser la même notion figurant aux par. 14.06(4) et 14.06(2) dans une troisième partie du régime établi par l'art. 14.06, soit le par. 14.06(1.2). Selon cette disposition, le syndic qui continue l'exploitation de l'entreprise du débiteur ou lui succède not "personally liable" in respect of certain enumerated liabilities, including as a successor employer. Although this provision is not directly raised in this litigation, by its own terms, it clearly does not and cannot refer to the liability of the bankrupt estate. Again, it is difficult to conceive of how Parliament could have specified that a trustee is not "personally liable", using the ordinary, grammatical sense of that phrase, in both s. 14.06(1.2) and s. 14.06(2), but then intended the phrase to be read in a completely different and illogical manner in s. 14.06(4). All three provisions refer to the personal liability of a trustee, and all three must be interpreted consistently. Indeed, I note that the concept of a trustee being "not personally liable" is also used consistently in other parts of the BIA unrelated to the s. 14.06 scheme — see, for example, s. 80 and s. 197(3).

comme employeur est dégagé de toute « responsabilité personnelle » à l'égard de certains engagements énumérés, notamment comme successeur de l'employeur. Bien qu'elle n'ait pas été directement soulevée en l'espèce, cette disposition, de par ses propres termes, ne traite manifestement pas et ne peut traiter de la responsabilité de l'actif du failli. Là encore, il est difficile de concevoir comment le Parlement aurait pu préciser qu'un syndic est « dégagé de toute responsabilité personnelle » suivant le sens ordinaire et grammatical de cette expression au par. 14.06(1.2) et au par. 14.06(2), et souhaiter par la suite que l'on donne à cette expression une interprétation tout à fait différente et illogique au par. 14.06(4). Les trois dispositions traitent toutes de la responsabilité personnelle d'un syndic et il faut les interpréter uniformément. En effet, je signale que l'idée selon laquelle le syndic est « dégagé de toute responsabilité personnelle » est aussi reprise systématiquement dans d'autres parties de la LFI étrangères au régime de l'art. 14.06, par exemple l'art. 80 et le par. 197(3).

[84] This interpretation of s. 14.06(4) is also bolstered by the French wording of s. 14.06. The French versions of both s. 14.06(2) and s. 14.06(4) refer to a trustee's protection from personal liability "ès qualités". This French expression is defined by Le Grand Robert de la langue française (2nd ed. 2001) dictionary as referring to someone acting "à cause d'un titre, d'une fonction particulière", which, in English, would mean acting by virtue of a title or specific role. The Robert & Collins dictionary (online) translates "ès qualités" as in "one's official capacity". In using this expression in s. 14.06(4), Parliament is therefore stating that, where "disclaimer" properly occurs, a trustee, is not personally liable, in its capacity as trustee, for orders to remedy any environmental condition or damage affecting the "disclaimed" property. These provisions are clearly not concerned with the concept of estate liability. The French versions of s. 14.06(2) and s. 14.06(4) thus utilize identical language to describe the limitation of liability they offer trustees. It is almost impossible to conceive of Parliament using identical language in two such closely related provisions and yet intending different meanings. Accordingly, a trustee is not personally liable in its official capacity as representative of the bankrupt estate where it invokes s. 14.06(4).

[84] L'interprétation qui précède du par. 14.06(4) est également renforcée par la version française de l'art. 14.06. Les versions françaises des par. 14.06(2) et (4) indiquent que le syndic est, « ès qualités », dégagé de toute responsabilité personnelle. Selon le dictionnaire Le Grand Robert de la langue française (2e éd. 2001), cette expression française désigne la personne qui agit « à cause d'un titre, d'une fonction particulière »; en anglais, elle désigne la personne agissant « by virtue of a title or specific role ». Dans le dictionnaire Robert & Collins (en ligne), cette expression décrit la personne qui agit en « one's official capacity ». En utilisant cette expression au par. 14.06(4), le Parlement prévoit ainsi qu'en cas de « renonciation » valide, le syndic est, ès qualités, dégagé de toute responsabilité personnelle à l'égard d'ordonnance de réparation de tout fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement et touchant le bien auquel il a été « renoncé ». Ces dispositions ne portent manifestement pas sur la notion de responsabilité de l'actif. Les versions françaises des par. 14.06(2) et (4) emploient donc les mêmes mots pour décrire la limitation de responsabilité qu'elles offrent aux syndics. Il est presque impossible de concevoir que le Parlement emploie les mêmes termes dans deux

[85] Prior to this litigation, the case law on s. 14.06 was somewhat scarce. However, this Court has considered the s. 14.06 scheme once before, in GMAC Commercial Credit Corp. — Canada v. T.C.T. Logistics Inc., 2006 SCC 35, [2006] 2 S.C.R. 123. In that case, comments made by both the majority and the dissenting judge support my conclusion that s. 14.06(4) is concerned only with the personal liability of trustees. Abella J., writing for the majority, explained that "where Parliament has intended to confer immunity on trustees or receivers from certain claims, it has done so explicitly" (para. 67). As examples of this principle, she referred to 14.06(1.2) and, most notably for our purposes, to s. 14.06(4), which she described as follows: "trustee immune in certain circumstances from environmental liabilities" (para. 67). In her dissent, Deschamps J. explained that a "trustee is not personally bound by the bankrupt's obligations" (para. 91). She noted that trustees are protected by the provisions that confer immunity upon them, including s. 14.06 (1.2), (2) and (4).

[86] Although the dissenting reasons focus on the source of the "disclaimer" power in s. 14.06(4), nothing in this case turns on either the source of the "disclaimer" power or on whether GTL successfully "disclaimed" the Renounced Assets. I would note that, while the dissenting reasons rely on a purported common law power of "disclaimer", the Court has been referred to no cases — and the dissenting reasons have cited none — demonstrating the existence of a common law power allowing trustees to "disclaim" real property. In any case, regardless of the source of the "disclaimer" power, nothing in s. 14.06(4) suggests that, where a trustee does "disclaim" real property, the result is that it is simply free to walk away from the environmental orders applicable to it. Quite the contrary — the provision is clear that, where an environmental order has been made, dispositions aussi intimement liées et leur attribue pourtant des sens différents. En conséquence, le syndic est dégagé de toute responsabilité personnelle en sa qualité officielle de représentant de l'actif du failli lorsqu'il invoque le par. 14.06(4).

[85] Avant le présent litige, la jurisprudence sur l'art. 14.06 était relativement peu abondante. Notre Cour a cependant examiné le régime de l'art. 14.06 une fois auparavant, dans Société de crédit commercial GMAC — Canada c. T.C.T. Logistics Inc., 2006 CSC 35, [2006] 2 R.C.S. 123. Dans cet arrêt, les commentaires de la majorité et de la juge dissidente étayent ma conclusion selon laquelle le par. 14.06(4) ne porte que sur la responsabilité personnelle des syndics. La juge Abella a expliqué, au nom des juges majoritaires, que « lorsque le législateur a voulu protéger les syndics ou les séquestres contre certains recours, il l'a fait explicitement » (par. 67). À titre d'exemples de manifestation de ce principe, elle a cité le par. 14.06(1.2) et, notamment pour les fins qui nous occupent, le par. 14.06(4), qu'elle a décrits ainsi : « protection du syndic dans certaines circonstances contre les ordonnances en matière environnementale » (par. 67). Dans ses motifs dissidents, la juge Deschamps a expliqué que le « [syndic] n'est pas tenu personnellement aux obligations du failli » (par. 91). Elle a signalé que les syndics étaient protégés par les dispositions qui leur conférait une immunité, dont les par. 14.06 (1.2), (2) et (4).

[86] Bien que les motifs dissidents mettent l'accent sur la source du pouvoir de « renonciation » prévu au par. 14.06(4), la présente affaire ne porte aucunement sur la source de ce pouvoir ou sur la question de savoir si GTL a « renoncé » avec succès aux biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation. Je me contente de signaler brièvement que, même si les juges dissidents s'appuient sur un supposé pouvoir de « renonciation » en common law, les parties n'ont renvoyé à la Cour aucune décision — et les juges dissidents n'en ont cité aucune — attestant l'existence d'un pouvoir en common law qui permet au syndic de « renoncer » à un bien réel. Quoi qu'il en soit, peu importe la source de ce pouvoir, rien dans le par. 14.06(4) ne donne à penser que le syndic « renonçant » à des biens réels peut tout simplement se soustraire aux ordonnances

the result of an act of "disclaimer" is the cessation of personal liability. No effect of "disclaimer" on the liability of the bankrupt estate is specified. Had Parliament intended to empower trustees to walk away entirely from assets subject to environmental liabilities, it could easily have said so.

[87] Additionally, as I have mentioned, s. 14.06(4)'s scope is not narrowed to a "disclaimer" in its formal sense. Under s. 14.06(4)(a)(ii), a trustee is not personally liable for an environmental order where the trustee "abandons, disposes of or otherwise releases any interest in any real property". This appeal does not, however, require us to decide what constitutes abandoning, disposing of or otherwise releasing real property for the purpose of s. 14.06(4), and I therefore leave the resolution of this question for another day. Nor does this appeal require us to decide the effects of a successful divestiture under s. 20 of the BIA. Section 20 of the BIA was not raised or relied upon by GTL as providing it with the authority to walk away from all responsibility, obligation or liability regarding the Renounced Assets.

[88] The dissenting reasons argue that certain other parts of the s. 14.06 scheme make the most sense if s. 14.06(4) limits estate liability. Other than s. 14.06(2), none of these provisions is in issue in this litigation, and none of them was relied on by GTL. Regardless, in view of the clear and unambiguous wording of s. 14.06(4), less weight should be given to its statutory context. This is particularly so given that the proposed alternative interpretation would require the Court to read words such as "personally" out of the subsection. As has been noted, when the words of a provision are precise and unequivocal, their ordinary meaning plays a dominant role in the interpretive process (Canada Trustco Mortgage Co. v. Canada, 2005 SCC 54, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 601, at para. 10). Ultimately, the consequences of a trustee's "disclaimer" are clear — protection from personal liability, not from estate liability. There is no ambiguity on the face of s. 14.06(4). This Court has no environnementales qui s'appliquent à eux. Bien au contraire, la disposition prévoit clairement que, si une ordonnance environnementale a été rendue, la « renonciation » emporte la cessation de la responsabilité personnelle. On ne fait état d'aucun effet de la renonciation sur la responsabilité de l'actif du failli. Si le Parlement avait voulu investir les syndics du pouvoir de délaisser entièrement les biens visés par des engagements environnementaux, il aurait pu le faire aisément.

[87] En outre, comme je l'ai mentionné, le par. 14.06(4) ne vise pas uniquement la « renonciation » au sens formel. D'après le sous-al. 14.06(4)(a)(ii), le syndic est dégagé de toute responsabilité personnelle à l'égard d'une ordonnance environnementale lorsqu'il « abandonne [. . .] tout intérêt sur le bien réel en cause, en dispose ou s'en dessaisit ». Le présent pourvoi ne nous oblige cependant pas à décider ce qui constitue l'abandon, la disposition ou le dessaisissement d'un bien réel pour l'application du par. 14.06(4), et je remets le règlement de ce point à une autre occasion. Le pourvoi ne nous oblige pas non plus à décider des effets d'une renonciation réussie en vertu de l'art. 20 de la LFI. GTL n'a pas invoqué cet article ni soutenu qu'il lui accordait le pouvoir d'abandonner toute responsabilité ou obligation ou tout engagement applicable aux biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation.

[88] D'après les juges dissidents, d'autres parties du régime de l'art. 14.06 sont plus sensées si le par. 14.06(4) limite la responsabilité de l'actif. À l'exception du par. 14.06(2), aucune de ces dispositions n'était en litige dans la présente affaire et aucune d'elles n'a été invoquée par GTL. Quoi qu'il en soit, étant donné le libellé clair et sans équivoque de ce paragraphe, le poids à accorder à son contexte législatif est amoindri. Cela est d'autant plus vrai que l'autre interprétation proposée obligerait la Cour à écarter des mots comme « personnelle » du paragraphe. Tel qu'il a été mentionné, lorsque le libellé d'une disposition est précis et sans équivoque, le sens ordinaire des mots joue un rôle primordial dans le processus d'interprétation (Hypothèques Trustco Canada c. Canada, 2005 CSC 54, [2005] 2 R.C.S. 601, par. 10). En dernière analyse, les conséquences de la « renonciation » du syndic sont claires : l'immunité contre la responsabilité personnelle, et non celle de l'actif.

option other than to accede to the clear intention of Parliament.

[89] I turn now to the relationship between s. 14.06(2) and (4).

(b) How Section 14.06(4) Is Distinguishable From Section 14.06(2)

[90] In this case, GTL relied solely on s. 14.06(4) in purporting to "disclaim" the Renounced Assets. However, as I will explain, GTL is fully protected from personal liability for the environmental liabilities associated with those assets whether it is understood as having "disclaimed" the Renounced Assets or not. However, it cannot simply "walk away" from the Renounced Assets in either case.

[91] Regardless of whether GTL can access s. 14.06(4) (in other words, regardless of whether it has "disclaimed"), it is already fully protected from personal liability in respect of environmental matters by s. 14.06(2). Section 14.06(2) protects trustees from personal liability for "any environmental condition that arose or environmental damage that occurred", unless it is established that the condition arose or the damage occurred after the trustee's appointment and as a result of their gross negligence or wilful misconduct. In this case, it is not disputed that the environmental condition or damage leading to the Abandonment Orders arose or occurred prior to GTL's appointment. Section 14.06(2) provides trustees with protection from personal liability as broad as that provided by s. 14.06(4). Although, on the face of the provisions, there are two ways in which s. 14.06(4) may appear to offer broader protection, neither of them withstands closer examination.

[92] First, the Regulator submits that the protection offered by s. 14.06(4) should be distinguished from that offered by s. 14.06(2) on the basis that the former is concerned with orders while the latter is concerned with environmental obligations generally. I agree with the dissenting reasons that a persuasive distinction cannot be drawn between liability for an environmental condition or environmental damage

Le paragraphe 14.06(4) ne souffre à première vue d'aucune ambiguïté. Notre Cour n'a d'autre choix que d'accéder à l'intention manifeste du Parlement.

[89] Je passe maintenant au rapport entre les par. 14.06(2) et (4).

b) La manière dont le par. 14.06(4) se distingue du par. 14.06(2)

[90] En l'espèce, GTL s'est fondé uniquement sur le par. 14.06(4) pour prétendre « renoncer » aux biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation. Or, comme je l'expliquerai, que l'on considère ou non que GTL a « renoncé » aux biens en question, il est entièrement protégé contre toute responsabilité personnelle à l'égard des engagements environnementaux associés à ces biens. Toutefois, il ne peut tout simplement pas les « délaisser » dans un cas comme dans l'autre.

[91] Que GTL puisse ou non se prévaloir du par. 14.06(4) (autrement dit, qu'il ait « renoncé » ou non aux biens en question), il est déjà entièrement à l'abri de toute responsabilité personnelle en matière environnementale par application du par. 14.06(2). Ce paragraphe dégage les syndics de toute responsabilité personnelle découlant de « tout fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement », sauf celui causé par sa négligence grave ou son inconduite délibérée après sa nomination. En l'espèce, personne ne conteste que le fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement à l'origine des ordonnances d'abandon est survenu avant la nomination de GTL. Le paragraphe 14.06(2) offre aux syndics une protection contre toute responsabilité personnelle aussi large que celle fournie par le par. 14.06(4). Bien qu'à la lecture des dispositions, le par. 14.06(4) semble offrir de deux manières une protection plus large, aucune d'entre elles ne résiste à un examen plus approfondi.

[92] En premier lieu, l'organisme de réglementation soutient qu'il y a lieu de distinguer la protection offerte par le par. 14.06(4) de celle accordée par le par. 14.06(2) car le premier concerne les « ordonnances » tandis que le deuxième intéresse les obligations environnementales en général. Je conviens avec les juges dissidents qu'il est impossible d'établir une distinction convaincante entre la responsabilité d'un (purportedly covered by s. 14.06(2)) and liability for failure to comply with an order to remedy such a condition or such damage (purportedly covered by s. 14.06(4)). As the dissenting reasons note, "[t]his distinction is entirely artificial" (para. 212). The underlying liability addressed through environmental orders is the liability provided for in s. 14.06(2): an "environmental condition that arose or environmental damage that occurred". Second, on the face of s. 14.06(4), no exceptions are carved out for gross negligence or wilful misconduct post-appointment, unlike in s. 14.06(2). However, s. 14.06(4) is expressly made "subject to subsection (2)". I agree with the dissenting reasons that the only possible interpretation of this proviso is that, where the trustee has caused an environmental condition or environmental damage through its wilful misconduct or gross negligence, the trustee will still be personally liable, regardless of its reliance on s. 14.06(4).

[93] It follows that s. 14.06(4) does not provide trustees with protection from personal liability any broader than the protection provided by s. 14.06(2). Despite this, in my view, Parliament had good reasons for enacting s. 14.06(4) in 1997. The first was to make it clear to trustees that they had complete protection from personal liability in respect of environmental conditions and damage (absent wilful misconduct or gross negligence), especially in situations where they have "disclaimed". The Hansard evidence shows that one of the impetuses for the 1997 reforms was the desire of trustees for further certainty. The second was to clarify the effect of a trustee's "disclaimer", on the liability of the bankrupt estate for orders to remedy an environmental condition or damage. In other words, s. 14.06(4) makes it clear not just that a trustee who "disclaims" real property is exempt from personal liability under environmental orders applicable to that property, but also that the liability of the bankrupt estate is unaffected by such "disclaimer".

fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement (prétendument visé par le par. 14.06(2)) et celle découlant du non-respect d'une ordonnance de réparation du fait ou dommage en question (prétendument visé par le par. 14.06(4)). Comme l'indiquent les motifs dissidents, « [c]ette distinction est tout à fait artificielle » (par. 212). La responsabilité sous-jacente sur laquelle portent les ordonnances environnementales découle du « fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement » et est prévue au par. 14.06(2). En second lieu, à la lecture du par. 14.06(4), celui-ci ne prévoit aucune exception pour négligence grave ou inconduite délibérée après la nomination, contrairement au par. 14.06(2). Le paragraphe 14.06(4) s'applique toutefois expressément « sous réserve du paragraphe (2) ». Je suis d'accord avec les juges dissidents pour dire que, d'après la seule interprétation que l'on peut donner à cette disposition, le syndic ayant causé un fait ou un dommage lié à l'environnement par son inconduite délibérée ou sa négligence grave engagerait toujours sa responsabilité personnelle même s'il invoque le par. 14.06(4).

[93] Ainsi, le par. 14.06(4) n'offre pas aux syndics une protection contre la responsabilité personnelle plus large que celle fournie par le par. 14.06(2). Malgré cela, j'estime que le Parlement avait de bonnes raisons d'adopter le par. 14.06(4) en 1997. La première était de préciser aux syndics qu'ils étaient entièrement dégagés de toute responsabilité personnelle à l'égard des faits et dommages liés à l'environnement (en l'absence d'inconduite délibérée ou de négligence grave), surtout dans des cas où ils ont « renoncé » à des biens. Les débats parlementaires indiquent que la réforme de 1997 prenait sa source notamment dans le vœu des syndics d'obtenir une certitude accrue. La réforme visait aussi à clarifier l'effet qu'a la « renonciation » d'un syndic sur la responsabilité de l'actif du failli relativement aux ordonnances de réparation d'un fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement. En d'autres termes, il ressort du par. 14.06(4) non seulement que le syndic « renonçant » à des biens réels échappe à toute responsabilité personnelle à l'égard des ordonnances environnementales qui visent ces biens, mais aussi que pareille renonciation n'a aucune incidence sur la responsabilité de l'actif du failli.

[94] In 1992, Parliament turned its attention to the potential liability of trustees in the environmental context and enacted s. 14.06(2). The provision originally stated that trustees were protected from personal liability for any environmental condition that arose or any environmental damage that occurred "(a) before [their] appointment . . . or (b) after their appointment except where the condition arose or the damage occurred as a result of their failure to exercise due diligence". The Hansard evidence demonstrates that trustees were unhappy with the original language of s. 14.06(2). As Mr. Hains explained, they complained that the due diligence standard was "too vague. No one knows what it does and it may vary from one case to another. With the vagueness of the standard and what may be required to satisfy it, and with the risk of personal liability, the trustees were not even interested in investigating how they might exercise due diligence" (Proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, No. 13, 2nd Sess., 35th Parl., November 4, 1996, at pp. 15-16).

[95] As a result, Parliament made reforms to the BIA in 1997. These reforms not only changed the standard of protection offered to trustees by s. 14.06(2) by adopting the current language, but also introduced s. 14.06(4). As is evident from their shared language, the provisions were intended to work together to clarify a trustee's protection from personal liability for any environmental condition or damage. Section 14.06(4) provided the certainty that trustees had been seeking in the years prior to 1997. For the first time, it explicitly linked the concept of "disclaimer" to the scheme protecting trustees from environmental liability. Whether it is understood as a common law power or as a reference to other statutory provisions, the concept of "disclaimer" predates s. 14.06(4) itself, as well as the 1992 version of s. 14.06(2). "Disclaimer" is also applicable in other contexts, such as in relation to executory contracts, as discussed in New Skeena Forest Products Inc. v. Don Hull & Sons Contracting Ltd., 2005 BCCA 154, 251 D.L.R. (4th) 328.

[94] En 1992, le Parlement s'est penché sur la responsabilité potentielle des syndics en matière environnementale et a édicté le par. 14.06(2). Cette disposition prévoyait au départ que le syndic était dégagé de toute responsabilité personnelle découlant d'un fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement survenu « a) avant sa nomination [. . .]; ou b) après sa nomination, sauf d'un fait ou dommage causé par son omission d'agir avec la prudence voulue ». Il appert des débats parlementaires que les syndics étaient insatisfaits du libellé initial du par. 14.06(2). Comme l'explique M. Hains, ils se sont plaints que la norme de diligence raisonnable était « trop vague. Nul ne sait comment l'interpréter, et les interprétations peuvent varier d'une affaire à l'autre. Étant donné le libellé trop vague de la norme, le fait que l'on ignore ce qu'il faut faire pour y satisfaire et le risque de responsabilité personnelle, les syndics ne cherchaient même pas à savoir de quelle manière ils pourraient faire preuve de diligence raisonnable. » (Délibérations du comité sénatorial permanent des Banques et du commerce, nº 13, 2e sess., 35e lég., 4 novembre 1996, p. 15-16).

[95] En conséquence, le Parlement a réformé la LFI en 1997. Cette réforme a non seulement modifié la norme visant la protection que le par. 14.06(2) offre aux syndics par l'adoption du texte actuel, mais elle a aussi introduit le par. 14.06(4). Comme le montrent à l'évidence les termes qu'ils ont en commun, les dispositions étaient censées s'appliquer ensemble pour clarifier l'immunité de responsabilité personnelle dont bénéficient les syndics à l'égard de tout fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement. Le paragraphe 14.06(4) leur offre la certitude qu'ils recherchaient avant 1997. Pour la première fois, il établissait en termes exprès un lien entre la notion de « renonciation » et le régime dégageant les syndics de toute responsabilité environnementale. Qu'on le voit comme un pouvoir de common law ou un renvoi à d'autres dispositions légales, le concept de « renonciation » précède le par. 14.06(4) lui-même ainsi que la version de 1992 du par. 14.06(2). Il peut aussi y avoir « renonciation » dans différents contextes, tel celui des contrats exécutoires étudiés dans New Skeena Forest Products Inc. c. Don Hull & Sons Contracting Ltd., 2005 BCCA 154, 251 D.L.R. (4th) 328.

[96] Prior to 1997, the effects of a "disclaimer" of real property on environmental liability was unclear. In particular, it was unclear what effect "disclaimer" might have on the liability of the bankrupt estate, given that environmental legislation imposed liability based on the achievement of the status of owner, party in control or licensee (see J. Klimek, Insolvency and Environment Liability (1994), at p. 4-19). By enacting s. 14.06(4), Parliament clarified that the effect of the "disclaimer" of real property was to limit the personal liability of the trustee for orders to remedy any environmental condition or damage, but not to limit the liability of the bankrupt estate. Parliament could have merely updated the language of s. 14.06(2) in 1997, but this would have left the question of "disclaimer" and estate liability unaddressed. Knowledge of the impact of "disclaimer" could be important to a trustee who is deciding whether to accept a mandate. Section 14.06(4) thus went a considerable way towards resolving the vagueness of which trustees had complained prior to 1997.

[97] A notable aspect of the scheme crafted by Parliament is that s. 14.06(4) applies "[n]otwithstanding anything in any federal or provincial law". In enacting s. 14.06(4), Parliament specified the effect of the "disclaimer" of real property solely in the context of environmental orders. The effect of "disclaimer" on liability in other contexts was not addressed. Parliament was concerned with orders to remedy any environmental condition or damage, where, liability frequently attaches based on the status of owner, party in control, or licensee. Parliament did not want trustees to think that they could avoid the estate's environmental liability through the act of "disclaiming". Accordingly, it used specific language indicating that the effect of the "disclaimer" of real property on orders to remedy an environmental condition or damage is merely that the trustee is not personally liable. It is possible that the effect of "disclaimer" on the liability of the bankrupt estate might be different in other contexts.

[96] Avant 1997, on ne savait pas quels effets la « renonciation » à des biens réels avait sur la responsabilité environnementale. Plus précisément, on ne connaissait pas l'effet que pouvait avoir la renonciation sur la responsabilité de l'actif du failli, vu que la législation environnementale imposait une responsabilité fondée sur l'acquisition du statut de propriétaire, de partie en possession du bien ou de titulaire de permis (voir J. Klimek, Insolvency and Environment Liability (1994), p. 4-19). En adoptant le par. 14.06(4), le Parlement a précisé que la « renonciation » à des biens réels avait pour effet de limiter la responsabilité personnelle du syndic, et non celle de l'actif du failli, aux ordonnances de réparation de tout fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement. Le Parlement aurait pu se contenter d'actualiser le texte du par. 14.06(2) en 1997, mais cela aurait laissé en suspens la question de la « renonciation » et de la responsabilité de l'actif. La connaissance de l'incidence de la « renonciation » pourrait avoir de l'importance pour le syndic qui décide d'accepter ou non un mandat. Le paragraphe 14.06(4) a donc dissipé considérablement l'imprécision dont se plaignaient les syndics avant 1997.

[97] Un aspect digne de mention du régime conçu par le Parlement est l'application du par. 14.06(4) « [p]ar dérogation au droit fédéral et provincial ». En adoptant ce paragraphe, le Parlement a précisé l'effet de la « renonciation » à des biens réels uniquement dans le contexte des ordonnances environnementales. L'effet de la « renonciation » sur la responsabilité dans d'autres contextes n'a pas été abordé. Le Parlement se souciait des ordonnances de réparation de tout fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement où la responsabilité est fréquemment engagée en raison du statut de propriétaire, de partie ayant le contrôle du bien ou de titulaire de permis. Le Parlement ne voulait pas que les syndics croient pouvoir échapper à la responsabilité environnementale de l'actif par la « renonciation ». Il a donc utilisé des termes précis pour indiquer que le seul effet de la « renonciation » à des biens réels sur des ordonnances de réparation d'un fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement est que le syndic est dégagé de toute responsabilité personnelle. Il se peut que la « renonciation » ait un effet différent sur la responsabilité de l'actif du failli dans d'autres contextes.

[98] Section 14.06(4) thus makes it clear that "disclaimer" by the trustee has no effect on the bankrupt estate's continuing liability for orders to remedy any environmental condition or damage. The liability of the bankrupt estate is, of course, an issue with which s. 14.06(2) is absolutely unconcerned. Thus, it can be seen that s. 14.06(4) and s. 14.06(2) are not in fact the same — they may provide trustees with the same protection from personal liability, but only the former has any relevance to the question of estate liability. Section 14.06(2) protects trustees without having to be invoked by them — it does not speak to the results of a trustee's "disclaimer".

[99] Where a trustee has "disclaimed" real property, it is not personally liable under an environmental order applicable to that property, but the bankrupt estate itself remains liable. Of course, the fact that the bankrupt estate remains liable even where a trustee invokes s. 14.06(4) does not necessarily mean that the trustee must comply with environmental obligations in priority to all other claims. The priority of an environmental claim depends on the proper application of the Abitibi test, as I will discuss below.

[100] Accordingly, regardless of whether GTL is properly understood as having "disclaimed", the result is the same. Given that the environmental condition or damage arose or occurred prior to GTL's appointment, it is fully protected from personal liability by s. 14.06(2). However, "disclaimer" does not empower a trustee to simply walk away from the "disclaimed" assets when the bankrupt estate has been ordered to remedy any environmental condition or damage. The environmental liability of the bankrupt estate remains unaffected.

[101] I offer the following brief comment on the balance of the s. 14.06 scheme, although, as mentioned, none of those provision is actually in issue before this Court. The dissenting reasons argue that interpreting s. 14.06(4) as being concerned solely with the personal liability of trustees creates interpretive issues with the balance of the s. 14.06 scheme.

[99] Le syndic ayant « renoncé » à des biens réels est dégagé de toute responsabilité personnelle à l'égard d'une ordonnance environnementale applicable à ces biens, mais l'actif du failli lui-même demeure responsable. Bien sûr, le fait que la responsabilité de l'actif du failli demeure engagée même lorsque le syndic invoque le par. 14.06(4) ne veut pas nécessairement dire que le syndic doit respecter les obligations environnementales et qu'elles ont priorité sur toutes les autres réclamations. La priorité d'une réclamation environnementale dépend de la bonne application du critère d'Abitibi, comme je l'expliquerai plus loin.

[100] En conséquence, peu importe si l'on considère que GTL a « renoncé » ou non à des biens, le résultat est le même. Puisque le fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement est survenu avant la nomination de GTL, ce dernier est entièrement protégé contre toute responsabilité personnelle par le par. 14.06(2). En revanche, la « renonciation » n'habilite pas le syndic à tout simplement délaisser les biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation quand on l'enjoint à réparer un fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement. La responsabilité environnementale de l'actif du failli demeure inchangée.

[101] J'aimerais faire de brèves observations sur le reste du régime de l'art. 14.06 même si, comme je l'ai mentionné, aucune de ces dispositions n'est de fait en litige devant notre Cour. Les juges dissidents soutiennent que l'on créerait des problèmes d'interprétation avec le reste du régime de l'art. 14.06 si on interprétait le par. 14.06(4) comme visant uniquement

In my view, this is not a reason to ignore the plain meaning of s. 14.06(4). No principle of statutory interpretation requires that the plain meaning of a provision be contorted to make its scheme more coherent. This Court has been tasked with interpreting s. 14.06(4), and, in my view, the wording of s. 14.06(4) admits of only one interpretation.

(2) There Is No Operational Conflict or Frustration of Purpose Between Section 14.06(2) and Section 14.06(4) of the BIA and the Alberta Regulatory Scheme

[102] The operational conflicts between the BIA and the Alberta legislation alleged by GTL arise from its status as a "licensee" under the OGCA and the Pipeline Act. As I have just demonstrated, s. 14.06(4) does not empower a trustee to walk away from all responsibilities, obligations and liabilities with respect to "disclaimed" assets. Rather, it clarifies a trustee's protection from environmental personal liability and makes it clear that a trustee's "disclaimer" does not affect the environmental liability of the bankrupt estate. Regardless of whether GTL effectively "disclaimed" the Renounced Assets, it cannot walk away from them. In light of the proper interpretation of s. 14.06(4), no operational conflict is caused by the fact that, under Alberta law, GTL, as a "licensee", remains responsible for abandoning the Renounced Assets utilizing the remaining assets of the Redwater estate. Likewise, no operational conflict is caused by the fact that the end-of-life liabilities associated with the Renounced Assets continue to be included in the calculation of Redwater's LMR.

[103] Thus, regardless of whether it has effectively "disclaimed", s. 14.06(2) fully protects GTL from personal liability in respect of environmental matters affecting the Redwater estate. GTL notes that, on the face of the OGCA and the Pipeline Act, there is nothing specifically preventing the Regulator from holding it personally liable as a "licensee" for the costs of carrying out the Abandonment Orders. GTL submits that the mere possibility that it may la responsabilité personnelle des syndics. À mon avis, ces difficultés ne justifient pas que l'on fasse abstraction du sens clair du par. 14.06(4). Aucun principe d'interprétation législative ne requiert que l'on déforme le sens clair d'une disposition pour en rendre le régime plus cohérent. Notre Cour s'est vu confier la tâche d'interpréter le par. 14.06(4) et j'estime que son libellé ne permet qu'une seule interprétation.

(2) Il n'y a pas de conflit d'application ni d'entrave à la réalisation d'un objet fédéral entre les par. 14.06(2) et (4) de la LFI et le régime de réglementation de l'Alberta

[102] Les conflits d'application entre la LFI et la législation albertaine allégués par GTL résultent de sa qualité de « titulaire de permis » au sens de l'OGCA et de la Pipeline Act. Comme je viens de le démontrer, le par. 14.06(4) n'investit pas le syndic du pouvoir de se soustraire à l'ensemble des responsabilités, obligations ou engagements à l'égard de biens auxquels il a été « renoncé ». Il clarifie plutôt l'exonération de responsabilité personnelle dont jouit le syndic et précise que sa « renonciation » n'a aucune incidence sur la responsabilité environnementale de l'actif du failli. Que GTL ait bel et bien « renoncé » ou non aux biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation, il ne peut les délaisser. Vu l'interprétation qu'il convient de donner au par. 14.06(4), aucun conflit d'application n'est imputable au fait que, suivant le droit albertain, GTL demeure, en qualité de « titulaire de permis », tenu d'abandonner les biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation et d'utiliser les autres éléments de l'actif de Redwater. De même, le fait que les obligations de fin de vie associées aux biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation sont toujours prises en compte dans le calcul de la CGR de Redwater ne donne lieu à aucun conflit d'application.

[103] Donc, qu'il ait « renoncé » effectivement ou non aux biens, GTL est entièrement protégé par le par. 14.06(2) contre toute responsabilité personnelle à l'égard de questions environnementales touchant l'actif de Redwater. GTL signale qu'à première vue, l'OGCA et la Pipeline Act n'empêchent aucunement en termes exprès l'organisme de réglementation de le tenir personnellement responsable, à titre de « titulaire de permis », du coût d'exécution be held personally liable for abandonment under the Alberta legislation creates an operational conflict with the protection from personal liability provided by s. 14.06(2) of the BIA.

[104] There is no possibility of trustees facing personal liability for reclamation or remediation — they are specifically protected from such liability by the EPEA, absent wilful misconduct or gross negligence. GTL is correct that its potential personal liability for abandonment as a "licensee" is not similarly capped at estate assets under the OGCA and the Pipeline Act. The Regulator submits that "[w]hile the definition of a licensee does not explicitly provide that the receiver's liability is limited to assets in the insolvency estate, such federal requirements are obviously read in to the provision and [are] explicitly included in other legislation administered by the [Regulator], namely the [EPEA]" (A.F., at para. 104 (footnote omitted)). For its part, GTL says that it is no answer that the Regulator's practice is to impose liability only up to the value of the estate because, as ATB argues, without a specific statutory provision, "[p]ractices can change without notice" (ATB's factum, at para. 106).

[105] I reject the proposition that the inclusion of trustees in the definition of "licensee" in the OGCA and the Pipeline Act should be rendered inoperative by the mere theoretical possibility of a conflict with s. 14.06(2). Such an outcome would be inconsistent with the principle of restraint which underlies paramountcy, as well as with the principles of cooperative federalism. The inclusion of trustees in the definition of "licensee" is an important part of the Alberta regulatory regime. It confers on them the privilege of operating the licensed assets of bankrupts while also ensuring that insolvency professionals are regulated during the lengthy periods of time when they manage oil and gas assets.

des ordonnances d'abandon. Toujours selon GTL, la simple possibilité que la législation albertaine l'oblige à effectuer l'abandon crée un conflit d'application avec l'exonération de responsabilité personnelle qu'accorde le par. 14.06(2) de la LFI.

[104] Les syndics ne peuvent être personnellement tenus de remplir des obligations de remise en état ou de décontamination — ils sont expressément exonérés de cette responsabilité par l'EPEA en l'absence d'inconduite délibérée ou de négligence grave de leur part. GTL a raison de dire que son éventuelle obligation, en tant que « titulaire de permis », de procéder à l'abandon n'est pas, de façon similaire, limitée aux éléments de l'actif en application de l'OGCA et de la Pipeline Act. L'organisme de réglementation fait valoir que, [TRADUCTION] « [b]ien que la définition de "titulaire de permis" ne prévoit pas explicitement que la responsabilité du séquestre se limite aux éléments de l'actif du failli, cette exigence fédérale figure manifestement par interprétation dans la disposition et est explicitement prévue dans une autre loi, à savoir [l'EPEA], qu'applique [l'organisme de réglementation] » (m.a., par. 104 (note en bas de page omise)). Pour sa part, GTL affirme que la pratique de l'organisme de réglementation de n'imposer une responsabilité que jusqu'à concurrence de la valeur de l'actif ne constitue pas une réponse valable, étant donné que, comme le prétend ATB, faute d'une disposition légale expresse, [TRADUCTION] « [l]es pratiques peuvent changer sans préavis » (mémoire d'ATB, par. 106).

[105] Je rejette la proposition selon laquelle l'ajout des syndics à la définition de « titulaire de permis » dans l'OGCA et la Pipeline Act devrait être déclaré inopérant en raison de la simple possibilité théorique de conflit avec le par. 14.06(2). Une telle issue serait incompatible avec le principe de la retenue qui sous-tend celui de la prépondérance fédérale, ainsi qu'avec le principe du fédéralisme coopératif. L'ajout des syndics à la définition de « titulaire de permis » constitue un aspect important du régime de réglementation albertain. Il leur confère le privilège d'exploiter les biens des faillis qui sont visés par des permis, tout en s'assurant que les professionnels de l'insolvabilité sont encadrés au cours des longues périodes pendant lesquelles ils gèrent les biens pétroliers et gaziers.

[106] Importantly, the situation in this case is completely different from the one before the Court in Moloney. In that case, Gascon J. rejected the argument that there was no operational conflict because the bankrupt could voluntarily pay a provincial debt post discharge or could choose not to drive. He noted that "the test for operational conflict cannot be limited to asking whether the respondent can comply with both laws by renouncing the protection afforded to him or her under the federal law or the privilege he or she is otherwise entitled to under the provincial law" (para. 60). In the instant case, GTL retains both the protection afforded to it under the federal law (no personal liability) and the privilege to which it is entitled under the provincial law (ability to operate the bankrupt's assets in a regulated industry). GTL is not being asked to forego doing anything or to voluntarily pay anything. Nor is it urged that the Regulator could avoid conflict by declining to apply the impugned law during bankruptcy, as in Moloney, at para. 69. This is not a situation in which the Regulator might decline to apply the provincial law, but a situation in which the provincial law can be — and has been — applied during bankruptcy without conflict.

[107] According to the evidence in this case, the OGCA and the Pipeline Act have included trustees in the definition of "licensee" for 20 years now, and, in that time, the Regulator has never attempted to hold a trustee personally liable. The Regulator does not look beyond the assets remaining in the bankrupt estate in seeking compliance with the bankrupt's environmental obligations. If the Regulator were to attempt to hold GTL personally liable under the Abandonment Orders, this would create an operational conflict between the OGCA and the Pipeline Act, and s. 14.06(2) of the BIA, rendering the former two Acts inoperative to the extent of the conflict. As it stands, however, GTL can both be protected from personal liability by s. 14.06(2) and comply with the Alberta regime in administering the Redwater estate as a "licensee".

[106] Fait important, la situation en l'espèce est complètement différente de celle dont a été saisie notre Cour dans Moloney. Dans cette affaire, le juge Gascon a rejeté l'argument selon lequel il n'y avait pas de conflit d'application parce que le failli pouvait volontairement payer une dette provinciale postérieure à la libération ou choisir de ne pas conduire. Le juge Gascon a signalé que « l'analyse relative au conflit d'application ne saurait se limiter à la question de savoir si l'intimé peut se conformer aux deux lois en renonçant soit à la protection que lui offre la loi fédérale, soit au droit dont il bénéficie en vertu de la loi provinciale » (par. 60). Dans l'affaire qui nous occupe, GTL conserve à la fois la protection que lui confère la loi fédérale (aucune responsabilité personnelle) et le privilège auquel il a droit en vertu de la loi provinciale (faculté d'exploiter l'actif du failli dans une industrie réglementée). On ne demande pas à GTL de renoncer à faire quelque chose ni de payer volontairement quoi que ce soit. On ne soutient pas non plus que l'organisme de réglementation puisse éviter le conflit en refusant d'appliquer les mesures législatives contestées pendant la faillite (comme dans Moloney, par. 69). Nous ne sommes pas en présence d'une situation où l'organisme de réglementation pourrait refuser d'appliquer la loi provinciale, mais d'une situation où la loi provinciale peut être appliquée — et l'a été — pendant la faillite sans qu'il y ait de conflit.

[108] The suggestion, in the dissenting reasons, that the Regulator is seeking to hold GTL personally liable is untrue. No one disputes that significant value remains in the Redwater estate. Although the Regulator's entitlement is, of course, dependent on the priorities established by the BIA, the history of this regulatory system demonstrates that there are ways for the Regulator to access that value without holding GTL personally liable. It is not this Court's role to mandate a particular mechanism for the Regulator to achieve that end. Even if this was not the case, the fact that Redwater's assets have already been sold and are currently being held in trust means that personal liability is no longer a concern. There is no operational conflict.

[109] I turn now to frustration of purpose. The chambers judge identified a number of purposes of s. 14.06 in his reasons. GTL relies on three of them, namely: "limit[ing] the liability of insolvency professionals, so that they will accept mandates despite environmental issues"; "reduc[ing] the number of abandoned sites in the country"; and "permit[ing] receivers and trustees to make rational economic assessments of the costs of remedying environmental conditions, and giv[ing] receivers and trustees the discretion to determine whether to comply with orders to remediate property affected by these conditions" (chambers judge's reasons, at paras. 128-29).

[110] The burden is on GTL to establish the specific purposes of s. 14.06(2) and s. 14.06(4) if it wishes to demonstrate a conflict. This has been described as a "high" burden, requiring "[c]lear proof of purpose" (Lemare, at para. 26). In my view, based on the plain wording of s. 14.06(2) and s. 14.06(4) (a "trustee is not personally liable") and the Hansard evidence, it is evident that the purpose of these provisions is to protect trustees from personal liability in respect of environmental matters affecting the estates they are administering.

[108] La suggestion faite dans les motifs dissidents selon laquelle l'organisme de réglementation tente d'engager la responsabilité personnelle de GTL est inexacte. Personne ne conteste que l'actif de Redwater a toujours une grande valeur. Bien que le droit de l'organisme de réglementation soit naturellement tributaire des priorités établies par la LFI, l'historique du régime de réglementation en cause démontre que l'organisme de réglementation dispose de moyens pour obtenir cette valeur sans engager la responsabilité personnelle de GTL. Il n'appartient pas à notre Cour de prescrire un mécanisme en particulier à cette fin. Même si ce n'était pas le cas, le fait que les biens de Redwater ont déjà été vendus et qu'ils sont actuellement détenus en fiducie signifie que la responsabilité personnelle ne pose plus problème. Il n'y a pas de conflit d'application.

[109] Je me penche maintenant sur l'entrave à la réalisation d'un objet fédéral. Le juge siégeant en cabinet a relevé dans ses motifs un certain nombre d'objets de l'art. 14.06. GTL s'appuie sur trois d'entre eux, à savoir : [TRADUCTION] « limiter la responsabilité des professionnels de l'insolvabilité, afin qu'ils acceptent des mandats en dépit des problèmes environnementaux »; « réduire le nombre de sites délaissés dans le pays »; et « permettre aux séquestres et aux syndics de procéder à des évaluations économiques rationnelles des coûts de réparation des faits liés à l'environnement, et donner aux séquestres ainsi qu'aux syndics le pouvoir discrétionnaire de déterminer s'il y a lieu de se conformer aux ordonnances de décontamination des biens touchés par ces faits » (motifs du juge siégeant en cabinet, par. 128-129).

[110] Il incombe à GTL d'établir les objectifs précis des par. 14.06(2) et (4) s'il souhaite démontrer qu'il y a conflit. Notre Cour a qualifié ce fardeau d'« élevé » et ajouté qu'il faut « une preuve claire de l'objet » (Lemare, par. 26). À mon avis, compte tenu du libellé clair des par. 14.06(2) et (4) (« le syndic est, ès qualité, dégagé de toute responsabilité personnelle ») et des débats parlementaires, l'objectif de ces dispositions est manifestement de dégager les syndics de toute responsabilité personnelle à l'égard de questions environnementales touchant l'actif qu'ils administrent.

[111] This purpose is not frustrated by the inclusion of trustees in the definition of "licensee" in the OGCA and the Pipeline Act. The Regulator's position is that it would never attempt to hold a trustee personally liable. Trustees have been considered licensees under these Acts for over 20 years, and they have yet to face the scourge of personal liability. To find an essential part of Alberta's regulatory regime inoperative based on the theoretical possibility of frustration of purpose would be inconsistent with the principles of paramountcy and cooperative federalism. To date, Alberta's regulatory regime has functioned as intended without frustrating the purpose of s. 14.06(2) or s. 14.06(4) of the BIA.

[112] In arguing that s. 14.06 has the broader goals of reducing the number of abandoned sites (in the non-technical sense of "abandoned") and encouraging trustees to accept mandates, GTL relies on what it calls "the available extrinsic evidence and the actual words and structure of that section" (GTL's factum, at para. 91). In my view, the arguments it advances are insufficient for GTL to meet its high burden and demonstrate that the purpose of s. 14.06(2) and s. 14.06(4) should be defined as including these broader objectives. Reducing the number of unaddressed sites and encouraging trustees to accept mandates may be positive side effects of s. 14.06(2) and s. 14.06(4), but it is a stretch to see them as the purpose of the provisions. Like the provision at issue in Lemare, it is more plausible that they serve a "simple and narrow purpose" (para. 45).

[113] Regardless, even if it is assumed that such broader goals are part of the purpose of s. 14.06(2) and s. 14.06(4), the evidence does not show that they are frustrated by the inclusion of trustees in the statutory definition of "licensee". Relying on statements made by GTL in the Second Report, ATB asserts that, if trustees continue to be considered licensees and if environmental claims continue to be binding on estates, then, in situations akin to that of the Redwater insolvency, trustees will refuse to accept appointments. The fact that, prior to this litigation, it had been settled in Alberta since at least

[112] Pour soutenir que l'art. 14.06 a comme objectif général de réduire le nombre de sites abandonnés (au sens non technique du terme) et d'encourager les syndics à accepter des mandats, GTL se fonde sur ce qu'il appelle [TRADUCTION] « la preuve extrinsèque disponible et le libellé de cette disposition » (mémoire de GTL, par. 91). À mon avis, les arguments qu'il avance ne lui permettent pas de s'acquitter du fardeau élevé qui lui incombe et de démontrer que l'objectif des par. 14.06(2) et (4) devrait être défini de manière à inclure ces objectifs généraux. Réduire le nombre de sites délaissés et encourager les syndics à accepter des mandats peuvent être des effets secondaires positifs des par. 14.06(2) et (4), mais il serait exagéré de dire qu'il s'agit des objectifs de ces dispositions. Comme dans le cas de la disposition en litige dans Lemare, il est plus plausible que ces dispositions aient un « simple et restreint » (par. 45).

[113] Quoi qu'il en soit, même si l'on tient pour acquis que les par. 14.06(2) et (4) ont de tels objectifs généraux, la preuve ne démontre pas que la réalisation de ces objectifs est entravée par l'ajout des syndics à la définition légale de « titulaire de permis ». S'appuyant sur des affirmations de GTL dans le Deuxième rapport, ATB prétend que, si les syndics sont toujours considérés comme des « titulaires de permis » et les réclamations environnementales continuent de lier l'actif, les syndics refuseront la nomination dans des situations semblables à celle de l'insolvabilité de Redwater. À cette prétention Northern Badger that certain ongoing environmental obligations in the oil and gas industry continue to be binding on bankrupt estates must be weighed against this bald allegation. It was also well established that the Regulator would never attempt to hold insolvency professionals personally liable for such obligations. As noted by the Canadian Association of Petroleum Producers, there is nothing to suggest that this well-established state of affairs has led insolvency professionals to refuse to accept appointments or has increased the number of orphaned sites. There is no reason why the Regulator and trustees cannot continue to work together collaboratively, as they have for many years, to ensure that end-of-life obligations are satisfied, while at same time maximizing recovery for creditors.

sommaire il faut opposer le fait qu'avant le présent litige, il était établi en Alberta, depuis au moins l'arrêt Northern Badger, que certaines obligations environnementales continues dans l'industrie pétrolière et gazière liaient toujours l'actif du failli. Il était aussi bien établi que l'organisme de réglementation n'aurait jamais essayé de tenir les professionnels de l'insolvabilité personnellement responsables de telles obligations. Comme l'a fait remarquer l'Association canadienne des producteurs pétroliers, rien n'indique que cet état de fait bien établi a conduit les professionnels de l'insolvabilité à refuser la nomination ou augmenté le nombre de sites orphelins. Il n'y a aucune raison pour laquelle l'organisme de réglementation et les syndics ne peuvent pas poursuivre leur collaboration, comme ils le font depuis de nombreuses années, pour assurer le respect des obligations de fin de vie tout en maximisant le recouvrement au profit des créanciers.

(3) Conclusion on Section 14.06 of the BIA

[114] There is no conflict between the Alberta legislation and s. 14.06 of the BIA that makes the definition of "licensee" in the former inapplicable insofar as it includes GTL. GTL continues to have the responsibilities and duties of a "licensee" to the extent that assets remain in the Redwater estate. Nonetheless, GTL submits that, even if it cannot walk away from the Renounced Assets by invoking s. 14.06(4), the environmental obligations associated with those assets are unsecured claims of the Regulator for the purposes of the BIA. GTL says that the order of priorities in the BIA requires it to satisfy the claims of Redwater's secured creditors before the Regulator's claims, which rank equally with the claims of other unsecured creditors. According to GTL, the Regulator's attempts to use its statutory powers to prioritize its environmental claims conflict with the BIA. I will now consider this alleged conflict, which turns on the Abitibi test.

(3) Conclusion sur l'art. 14.06 de la LFI

[114] Il n'y a aucun conflit entre la législation albertaine et l'art. 14.06 de la LFI par suite duquel la définition de « titulaire de permis » dans la première est inapplicable dans la mesure où elle vise GTL. Ce dernier conserve les responsabilités et obligations d'un « titulaire de permis » tant qu'il reste des éléments dans l'actif de Redwater. GTL plaide néanmoins que, même s'il ne peut délaisser les biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation en invoquant le par. 14.06(4), les obligations environnementales qui y sont associés sont des réclamations non garanties de l'organisme de réglementation pour l'application de la LFI. GTL affirme que l'ordre de priorités fixé dans la LFI l'oblige à acquitter les réclamations des créanciers garantis de Redwater avant celles de l'organisme de réglementation, lesquelles occupent le même rang que les réclamations des autres créanciers ordinaires. D'après GTL, les tentatives de l'organisme de réglementation d'utiliser les pouvoirs que lui accorde la loi pour faire primer ses réclamations environnementales entrent en conflit avec la LFI. Je vais maintenant me pencher sur ce conflit allégué, qui fait intervenir le critère d'Abitibi.

C. The Abitibi Test: Is the Regulator Asserting Claims Provable in Bankruptcy?

[115] The equitable distribution of the bankrupt's assets is one of the purposes of the BIA. It is achieved through the collective proceeding model. Creditors of the bankrupt wishing to enforce a claim provable in bankruptcy must participate in the collective proceeding. Their claims will ultimately have the priority assigned to them by the BIA. This ensures that the bankrupt's assets are distributed fairly. This model avoids inefficiency and chaos, thus maximizing global recovery for all creditors. For the collective proceeding model to be viable, creditors with provable claims must not be allowed to enforce them outside the collective proceeding.

[116] It is well established that a provincial law will be rendered inoperative in the context of bankruptcy where the effect of the law is to conflict with, reorder or alter the priorities established by the BIA. Both Martin J.A. and the chambers judge dealt with the altering of bankruptcy priorities under the frustration of purpose branch of paramountcy. In my view, it could also be plausibly advanced that a provincial law that has the effect of reordering bankruptcy priorities is in operational conflict with the BIA — such was the conclusion in Husky Oil, at para. 87. For the purposes of this appeal, there is no need to decide which would be the appropriate branch of the paramountcy analysis. Under either branch, the Alberta legislation authorizing the Regulator's use of its disputed powers will be inoperative to the extent that the use of these powers during bankruptcy alters or reorders the priorities established by the BIA.

[117] GTL says that this is precisely the effect of the obligations imposed on the Redwater estate by the Regulator through the use of its statutory powers, even if it cannot walk away from the Renounced Assets by invoking s. 14.06(4). Parliament has assigned a particular rank to environmental claims

C. Le critère d'Abitibi : L'organisme de réglementation fait-il valoir des réclamations prouvables en matière de faillite?

[115] La répartition équitable des biens du failli est l'un des objectifs de la LFI. Elle est réalisée par le truchement du modèle de la procédure collective. Les créanciers du failli souhaitant faire valoir une réclamation prouvable en matière de faillite doivent participer à la procédure collective. Leurs réclamations recevront en fin de compte la priorité qui leur a été attribuée par la LFI. Cela assure la répartition équitable des biens du failli. Ce modèle évite l'inefficacité et le chaos, maximisant ainsi le recouvrement global au profit de tous les créanciers. Pour que le modèle de la procédure collective soit viable, les créanciers ayant des réclamations prouvables ne doivent pas être autorisés à les faire valoir en dehors de la procédure collective.

[116] Il est bien établi qu'une loi provinciale devient inopérante dans le contexte d'une faillite si elle a pour effet d'entrer en conflit avec l'ordre de priorité établi par la LFI, de le réarranger ou de le modifier. La juge Martin et le juge siégeant en cabinet ont tous les deux traité de la modification des priorités en matière de faillite en fonction du volet « entrave à la réalisation d'un objet fédéral » de la doctrine de la prépondérance. À mon avis, il pourrait aussi être plausiblement avancé qu'une loi provinciale ayant pour effet de réarranger les priorités en matière de faillite est en conflit d'application avec la LFI; telle était la conclusion dans Husky Oil, au par. 87. Pour les besoins du présent pourvoi, il n'est pas nécessaire de décider quel serait le bon volet de l'analyse relative à la prépondérance. Dans l'un ou l'autre volet, la loi albertaine autorisant l'organisme de réglementation à exercer ses pouvoirs contestés sera inopérante, dans la mesure où l'exercice de ces pouvoirs pendant la faillite modifie ou réarrange les priorités établies par la LFI.

[117] GTL affirme que, même si le fait d'invoquer le par. 14.06(4) ne lui permet pas de délaisser les biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation, les obligations imposées à l'actif de Redwater par l'organisme de réglementation au moyen de l'exercice des pouvoirs que lui confère la loi font exactement cela. Le that are provable in bankruptcy. It is accepted that the limited super priority for environmental claims created by s. 14.06(7) of the BIA does not apply here, and accordingly, says GTL, the Regulator is an ordinary creditor as regards its environmental claims — in other words, neither a secured nor a preferred creditor. The Regulator's environmental claims are thus to be paid rateably with those of Redwater's other ordinary creditors under s. 141 of the BIA. GTL argues that, to comply with the Abandonment Orders or LMR requirements, the Redwater estate will have to expend funds prior to distributing its assets to the secured creditors, and that this amounts to the Regulator using its statutory powers to create for itself a priority in bankruptcy to which it is not entitled.

[118] However, only claims provable in bankruptcy must be asserted within the single proceeding. Other claims are not stayed upon bankruptcy and continue to be binding on the estate. In Abitibi, this Court clearly stated that not all environmental obligations enforced by a regulator will be claims provable in bankruptcy. As a matter of principle, bankruptcy does not amount to a licence to disregard rules. The Regulator says that it is not asserting any claims provable in the bankruptcy, so the Redwater estate must comply with its environmental obligations, to the extent that assets are available to do so.

[119] The resolution of this issue turns on the proper application of the Abitibi test for determining whether a particular regulatory obligation amounts to a claim provable in bankruptcy. To reiterate:

> First, there must be a debt, a liability or an obligation to a creditor. Second, the debt, liability or obligation must be incurred before the debtor becomes bankrupt. Third, it must be possible to attach a monetary value to the debt, liability or obligation. [Emphasis in original; para. 26.]

Parlement a attribué un rang donné aux réclamations environnementales qui sont prouvables en matière de faillite. Il est admis que la superpriorité limitée créée par le par. 14.06(7) de la LFI pour les réclamations de cette nature ne s'applique pas en l'espèce et, en conséquence, affirme GTL, l'organisme de réglementation est un créancier ordinaire à l'égard de ces réclamations, c'est-à-dire qu'il n'est ni un créancier garanti ni un créancier privilégié. Les réclamations environnementales de l'organisme de réglementation doivent donc être acquittées au prorata avec celles des autres créanciers ordinaires de Redwater en application de l'art. 141 de la LFI. GTL soutient que, pour respecter les ordonnances d'abandon ou les exigences relatives à la CGR, il devra dépenser des fonds avant de partager ses biens entre les créanciers garantis. Cela équivaut, pour l'organisme de réglementation, à utiliser les pouvoirs que lui confère la loi pour se créer une priorité en matière de faillite à laquelle il n'a pas droit.

[118] Toutefois, on doit faire valoir uniquement les réclamations prouvables en matière de faillite dans le cadre de la procédure unique. Les réclamations non prouvables ne sont pas suspendues à la faillite et elles lient toujours l'actif. Dans l'arrêt Abitibi, notre Cour a clairement déclaré que les obligations environnementales appliquées par un organisme de réglementation ne sont pas toutes des réclamations prouvables en matière de faillite. En principe, la faillite n'équivaut pas à une autorisation de faire fi des règles. L'organisme de réglementation dit qu'il ne fait valoir aucune réclamation prouvable dans la faillite et que l'actif de Redwater doit respecter ses obligations environnementales dans la mesure des biens dont il dispose.

[119] Le règlement de cette question requiert que l'on applique correctement le critère d'Abitibi pour déterminer si une obligation réglementaire précise équivaut à une réclamation prouvable en matière de faillite. Il y a lieu de réitérer ce critère :

> Premièrement, on doit être en présence d'une dette, d'un engagement ou d'une obligation envers un créancier. Deuxièmement, la dette, l'engagement ou l'obligation doit avoir pris naissance avant que le débiteur ne devienne failli. Troisièmement, il doit être possible d'attribuer une valeur pécuniaire à cette dette, cet engagement ou cette obligation. [En italique dans l'original; par. 26.]

[120] There is no dispute that in this appeal, the second part of the test is met. Accordingly, I will discuss only the first and the third parts of the test.

[121] In this Court, the Regulator, supported by various interveners, raised two concerns about how the Abitibi test has been applied, both by the courts below and in general. The first concern is that the "creditor" step of the Abitibi test has been interpreted too broadly in cases such as the instant appeal and Nortel Networks Corp., Re, 2013 ONCA 599, 368 D.L.R. (4th) 122 ("Nortel CA"), and that, in effect, this step of the test has become so pro forma as to be practically meaningless. The second concern has to do with the application of the "monetary value" step of the Abitibi test by the chambers judge and Slatter J.A. This step is generally called the "sufficient certainty" step, based on the guidance provided in Abitibi. The argument here is that the courts below went beyond the test established in Abitibi by focusing on whether Redwater's regulatory obligations were "intrinsically financial". Under Abitibi, the sufficient certainty analysis should have focused on whether the Regulator would ultimately perform the environmental work and assert a monetary claim for reimbursement.

[122] In my view, both concerns raised by the Regulator have merit. As I will demonstrate, Abitibi should not be taken as standing for the proposition that a regulator is always a creditor when it exercises its statutory enforcement powers against a debtor. On a proper understanding of the "creditor" step, it is clear that the Regulator acted in the public interest and for the public good in issuing the Abandonment Orders and enforcing the LMR requirements and that it is, therefore, not a creditor of Redwater. It is the public, not the Regulator or the General Revenue Fund, that is the beneficiary of those environmental obligations; the province does not stand to gain financially from them. Although this conclusion is sufficient to resolve this aspect of the appeal, for the sake of completeness, I will also demonstrate that the chambers judge erred in finding that, on these facts, there is sufficient certainty that the Regulator will ultimately perform the environmental work and assert a claim for reimbursement. To conclude, I will briefly comment on why the effects of the end-of-life obligations do not conflict with the priority scheme in the BIA.

[120] Il est incontestable que, dans le présent pourvoi, la deuxième partie du critère est respectée. En conséquence, je ne traiterai que des première et troisième parties.

[121] Devant notre Cour, l'organisme de réglementation, avec l'appui de divers intervenants, a soulevé deux préoccupations quant à la façon dont le critère d'Abitibi avait été appliqué, tant par les tribunaux d'instance inférieure que par les cours en général. La première préoccupation concerne le fait que l'étape « créancier » du critère a reçu une interprétation trop large dans des affaires analogues à celle en l'espèce et Nortel Networks Corp., Re, 2013 ONCA 599, 368 D.L.R. (4th) 122 (« Nortel CA ») et qu'en réalité, cette étape du critère est si aisément franchie qu'elle n'est appliquée que pour la forme et qu'elle n'a pratiquement plus de sens. La seconde préoccupation a trait à l'application de l'étape « valeur pécuniaire » du critère d'Abitibi par le juge siégeant en cabinet et le juge Slatter. Cette étape reçoit généralement le nom de « certitude suffisante », compte tenu des directives données dans Abitibi. On soutient par là que les tribunaux d'instance inférieure sont allés au-delà du critère établi dans l'arrêt Abitibi en se concentrant sur la question de savoir si les obligations réglementaires de Redwater étaient « intrinsèquement financières ». Suivant l'arrêt Abitibi, l'analyse de la certitude suffisante aurait dû être axée sur la question de savoir si l'organisme de réglementation effectuerait lui-même, au bout du compte, les travaux environnementaux et ferait valoir une réclamation pécuniaire pour le remboursement.

[122] Les deux préoccupations exprimées par l'organisme de réglementation me paraissent fondées. Comme je vais le démontrer, l'arrêt Abitibi ne doit pas être considéré comme soutenant la thèse qu'un organisme de réglementation est toujours un créancier lorsqu'il exerce les pouvoirs d'application qui lui sont dévolus par la loi à l'encontre d'un débiteur. D'après le sens qu'il convient de donner à l'étape « créancier », il est clair que l'organisme de réglementation a agi dans l'intérêt public et pour le bien public en rendant les ordonnances d'abandon et en assurant le respect des exigences relatives à la CGR, et qu'il n'est donc pas un créancier de Redwater.

C'est le public, et non l'organisme de réglementation ou le fonds d'administration du gouvernement, qui bénéficie de ces obligations environnementales; la province n'est pas en mesure d'en bénéficier financièrement. Bien que cette conclusion suffise pour trancher cet aspect du pourvoi, par souci d'exhaustivité, je vais aussi démontrer que le juge siégeant en cabinet a eu tort de conclure qu'au vu des faits de l'espèce, il est suffisamment certain que l'organisme de réglementation exécutera au bout du compte les travaux environnementaux et présentera une demande de remboursement. Pour conclure, je me prononcerai brièvement sur les raisons pour lesquelles les effets des obligations de fin de vie n'entrent pas en conflit avec le régime de priorité établi dans la LFI.

(1) The Regulator Is Not a Creditor of Redwater

(1) L'organisme de réglementation n'est pas un créancier de Redwater

[123] The Regulator and the supporting interveners are not the first to raise issues with the "creditor" step of the Abitibi test. In the six years since Abitibi was decided, concerns about the "creditor" step and the fact that, as it is commonly understood, it will seemingly be satisfied in all — or nearly all — cases have also been expressed by academic commentators, such as A. J. Lund, "Lousy Dentists, Bad Drivers, and Abandoned Oil Wells: A New Approach to Reconciling Provincial Regulatory Regimes with Federal Insolvency Law" (2017), 80 Sask. L. Rev. 157, at p. 178, and Stewart. This Court has not had an opportunity to comment on Abitibi since it was decided. However, the interpretation of the "creditor" step adopted by lower courts, including the majority of the Court of Appeal in this case, has focused on certain comments found at para. 27 of Abitibi, and the "creditor" step has accordingly been found to be satisfied whenever a regulator exercises its enforcement powers against a debtor (see, for example, C.A. reasons, at para. 60; Nortel CA, at para. 16).

[123] L'organisme de réglementation et les intervenants qui l'appuient ne sont pas les premiers à cerner des problèmes relativement à l'étape « créancier » du critère d'Abitibi. Pendant les six années qui ont suivi l'arrêt Abitibi, des problèmes au sujet de cette étape et le fait que, dans son acception courante, cette étape sera toujours — ou presque toujours — franchie ont aussi été énoncés par des commentateurs universitaires tels que A. J. Lund, « Lousy Dentists, Bad Drivers, and Abandoned Oil Wells : A New Approach to Reconciling Provincial Regulatory Regimes with Federal Insolvency Law » (2017), 80 Sask L. Rev. 157, p. 178, et M. Stewart. Notre Cour n'a pas eu l'occasion de commenter l'arrêt Abitibi depuis qu'il a été rendu. Par contre, l'interprétation de l'étape « créancier » retenue par des juridictions inférieures, notamment la majorité de la Cour d'appel en l'espèce, a mis l'accent sur certaines remarques faites au par. 27 de l'arrêt Abitibi. Sur cette base, ces tribunaux ont conclu que l'étape « créancier » est franchie chaque fois qu'un organisme de réglementation exerce à l'encontre d'un débiteur son pouvoir d'appliquer la loi (voir, par exemple, les motifs de la Cour d'appel, par. 60; Nortel CA, par. 16).

[124] GTL submits that these lower courts have correctly interpreted and applied the "creditor" step.

[124] Selon GTL, les juridictions inférieures susmentionnées ont bien interprété et appliqué l'étape

It further submits that, because of Abitibi, the 1991 Alberta Court of Appeal decision in Northern Badger is of no assistance in analyzing the creditor issue. Conversely, the Regulator forcefully argues that Abitibi must be understood in the context of its own unique facts and that it did not overrule Northern Badger. Relying on Northern Badger, the Regulator argues that a regulator exercising a power to enforce a public duty is not a creditor of the individual or corporation subject to that duty. Like Martin J.A., I agree with the Regulator on this point. If, as GTL urges and the majority of the Court of Appeal concluded, the "creditor" step is satisfied whenever a regulator exercises its enforcement powers against a debtor, then it is hard to imagine a situation in which the "creditor" step would not be satisfied by the actions of an environmental regulator. Stewart was correct to suppose that "[s]urely, the Court did not intend this result" (p. 189). For the "creditor" step to have meaning, "there must be situations where the other two steps could be met . . . but the order [or obligation] is still not a provable claim because the regulator is not a creditor of the bankrupt" (Attorney General of Ontario's factum, at para. 39).

[125] Before further explaining my conclusion on this point, I must address a preliminary issue: the fact that the Regulator conceded in the courts below that it was a creditor. It is well established that concessions of law are not binding on this Court: see Ocean Port Hotel Ltd. v. British Columbia (General Manager, Liquor Control and Licensing Branch), 2001 SCC 52, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 781, at para. 44; M. v. H., [1999] 2 S.C.R. 3, at para. 45; R. v. Sappier, 2006 SCC 54, [2006] 2 S.C.R. 686, at para. 62. As noted by L'Heureux-Dubé J., in dissent, but not on this point, in R. v. Elshaw, [1991] 3 S.C.R. 24, at p. 48, "the fact that an issue is conceded below means nothing in and of itself". Although concessions by the parties are often relied upon, it is ultimately for « créancier ». Il ajoute qu'à la suite de l'arrêt Abitibi, l'arrêt Northern Badger rendu en 1991 par la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta n'est d'aucun secours pour analyser la question du créancier. À l'inverse, l'organisme de réglementation soutient avec vigueur qu'il faut situer l'arrêt Abitibi dans le contexte des faits qui lui sont propres, et qu'il n'a pas infirmé Northern Badger. Se fondant sur cet arrêt, l'organisme de réglementation plaide qu'un organisme de réglementation exerçant un pouvoir pour faire respecter un devoir public n'est pas un créancier de la personne ou de la société assujettie à ce devoir. À l'instar de la juge Martin, je partage l'avis de l'organisme de réglementation sur ce point. Si, comme l'exhorte GTL et le concluent les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel, l'étape « créancier » est franchie chaque fois qu'un organisme de réglementation exerce ses pouvoirs d'application à l'encontre d'un débiteur, il est difficile d'imaginer une situation où les actes d'un organisme de réglementation ne franchiraient pas l'étape « créancier ». Monsieur Stewart avait raison de supposer que [TRADUCTION] « la Cour ne souhaitait sûrement pas ce résultat » (p. 189). Pour que l'étape « créancier » ait un quelconque sens [TRADUCTION] « il doit y avoir des situations dans lesquelles les deux autres étapes du critère d'Abitibi sont franchies […], mais l'ordonnance [ou l'obligation] environnementale n'est toujours pas une réclamation prouvable car l'organisme de réglementation n'est pas un créancier du failli » (mémoire de la procureure générale de l'Ontario, par. 39).

[125] Avant d'expliquer davantage ma conclusion sur ce point, je dois traiter d'une question préliminaire : l'organisme de réglementation a concédé devant les juridictions inférieures qu'il était un créancier. Il est bien établi que les concessions de droit ne lient pas notre Cour : voir Ocean Port Hotel Ltd. c. Colombie-Britannique (General Manager, Liquor Control & Licensing Branch), 2001 CSC 52, [2001] 2 R.C.S. 781, par. 44; M. c. H., [1999] 2 R.C.S. 3, par. 45; R. c. Sappier, 2006 CSC 54, [2006] 2 R.C.S. 686, par. 62). Comme l'a fait remarquer la juge L'Heureux-Dubé (dissidente, mais non sur ce point) dans R. c. Elshaw, [1991] 3 R.C.S. 24, p. 48, « un aveu fait devant une instance inférieure ne signifie rien en soi ». Bien que l'on se fonde souvent this Court to determine points of law. For several reasons, no fairness concerns are raised by disregarding the Regulator's concession in this case.

[126] First, in a letter to GTL dated May 14, 2015, the Regulator advanced the position that it was "not a creditor of [Redwater]", but, rather, had a "statutory mandate to regulate the oil and gas industry in Alberta" (GTL's Record, vol. 1, at p. 78). I note that this was the initial communication between the Regulator and GTL, only two days after the latter's appointment as receiver of Redwater's property. Second, the issue of whether the Regulator is a creditor was discussed in the parties' factums. Third, during oral arguments before this Court, the Regulator was questioned about its concession. Counsel made the undisputed point that higher courts are not bound by such concessions and took the position that, on the correct interpretation of Abitibi, the Regulator was not a creditor. Fourth, when the Regulator's status as a creditor was raised as an issue before this Court, opposing counsel did not argue that they would have adduced further evidence on the issue had it been raised in the courts below. Finally, a proper understanding of the "creditor" step of the Abitibi test is of fundamental importance to the proper functioning of the national bankruptcy scheme and of provincial environmental schemes throughout Canada. I conclude that this case is one in which it is appropriate to disregard the Regulator's concession in the courts below.

[127] Returning to the analysis, I note that the unique factual matrix of Abitibi must be kept in mind. In that case, Newfoundland and Labrador expropriated most of AbitibiBowater's property in the province without compensation. Subsequently, sur les concessions des parties, il revient en fin de compte à notre Cour de statuer sur des points de droit. Pour plusieurs raisons, on ne suscite aucune préoccupation en matière d'équité en ne tenant pas compte de la concession faite par l'organisme de réglementation en l'espèce.

[126] Premièrement, dans une lettre adressée à GTL en date du 14 mai 2015, l'organisme de réglementation soutient qu'il était [TRADUCTION] « non pas un créancier de [Redwater] », mais avait plutôt « pour mandat légal de réglementer l'industrie pétrolière et gazière de l'Alberta » (dossier de GTL, vol. 1, p. 78). Je constate qu'il s'agissait de la première communication entre l'organisme de réglementation et GTL et qu'elle est survenue seulement deux jours après la nomination de ce dernier comme séquestre des biens de Redwater. Deuxièmement, les parties ont traité dans leurs mémoires de la question de savoir si l'organisme de réglementation est un créancier. Troisièmement, au cours de sa plaidoirie devant notre Cour, l'organisme de réglementation a été interrogé à propos de sa concession. L'avocate a signalé le point non contesté que les tribunaux supérieurs ne sont pas liés par de telles concessions, et a soutenu que, si l'on interprète correctement l'arrêt Abitibi, l'organisme de réglementation n'était pas un créancier. Quatrièmement, quand le statut de l'organisme de réglementation en tant que créancier a été évoqué devant notre Cour, les avocats des parties adverses n'ont pas prétendu qu'ils auraient présenté des éléments de preuve supplémentaires sur ce point s'il avait été soulevé devant les juridictions inférieures. Enfin, le sens qu'il convient de donner à l'étape « créancier » du critère d'Abitibi est d'une importance fondamentale pour le bon fonctionnement du régime national de faillite et des régimes environnementaux provinciaux partout au Canada. Je conclus qu'il est indiqué en l'espèce de ne pas tenir compte de la concession faite par l'organisme de réglementation devant les juridictions inférieures.

[127] Pour revenir à l'analyse, je signale qu'il ne faut pas oublier la matrice factuelle unique de l'arrêt Abitibi. Dans cette affaire, Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador a exproprié la plupart des biens d'AbitibiBowater dans la province, sans indemnisation. Par la suite, AbitibiBowater was granted a stay under the CCAA. It then filed a notice of intent to submit a claim to arbitration under the North American Free Trade Agreement between the Government of Canada, the Government of the United Mexican States and the Government of the United States of America, Can. T.S. 1994 No. 2 ("NAFTA"), for losses resulting from the expropriation. In response, Newfoundland's Minister of Environment and Conservation ordered AbitibiBowater to remediate five sites pursuant to the Environmental Protection Act, S.N.L. 2002, c. E-14.2 ("EPA"). Three of the five sites had been expropriated by Newfoundland and Labrador. The evidence led to the conclusion that "the Province never truly intended that Abitibi was to perform the remediation work", but instead sought a claim that could be used as an offset in connection with AbitibiBowater's NAFTA claim (Abitibi, at para. 54). In other words, the Province sought a financial benefit from the remediation orders.

AbitibiBowater s'est vu accorder une suspension en vertu de la LACC. Elle a ensuite déposé un avis d'intention de soumettre une réclamation à l'arbitrage au titre de l'Accord de libre-échange nord-américain entre le gouvernement du Canada, le gouvernement des États-Unis mexicains et le gouvernement des États-Unis d'Amérique, R.T. Can. 1994 nº 2 (« ALENA »), pour les pertes résultant de l'expropriation. En réponse, le ministre de l'Environnement et de la Conservation de Terre-Neuve a ordonné à AbitibiBowater de décontaminer cinq sites conformément à l'Environmental Protection Act, S.N.L. 2002, c. E-14.2 (« EPA »). Trois des cinq sites avaient été expropriés par la province. La preuve a mené à la conclusion que « la province n'avait jamais vraiment eu l'intention qu'Abitibi exécute les travaux [de décontamination] » (Abitibi, par. 54) et qu'elle cherchait plutôt à faire valoir une réclamation qui pourrait être utilisée à titre compensatoire au regard de la demande d'indemnisation d'AbitibiBowater fondée sur l'ALENA. Autrement dit, la province voulait tirer un avantage financier des ordonnances de décontamination.

[128] In this appeal, it is not disputed that, in seeking to enforce Redwater's end-of-life obligations, the Regulator is acting in a bona fide regulatory capacity and does not stand to benefit financially. The Regulator's ultimate goal is to have the environmental work actually performed, for the benefit of third-party landowners and the public at large. There is no colourable attempt by the Regulator to recover a debt, nor is there an ulterior motive on its part, as there was in Abitibi. The distinction between the facts of this appeal and those of Abitibi becomes even clearer when one examines the comprehensive reasons of the chambers judge in Abitibi. The crux of the findings of Gascon J. (as he then was) is found at paras. 173-76:

[128] En l'espèce, personne ne conteste qu'en cherchant à assurer le respect des obligations de fin de vie incombant à Redwater, l'organisme de réglementation agit de bonne foi à titre d'autorité de réglementation et il n'est pas en mesure d'obtenir un avantage financier. L'objectif ultime de l'organisme de réglementation est de faire exécuter les travaux environnementaux au profit des tiers propriétaires terriens et de la population en général. L'organisme de réglementation n'a pas fait de tentative déguisée de recouvrer une créance et il n'y avait pas de motif oblique de sa part, comme c'était le cas dans Abitibi. La distinction entre les faits du présent pourvoi et ceux de l'affaire Abitibi ressort encore plus clairement lorsqu'on examine les motifs exhaustifs du juge siégeant en cabinet dans Abitibi. Le cœur des conclusions du juge Gascon (maintenant juge de notre Cour) se trouve aux par. 173-176 :

. . . the Province stands as the direct beneficiary, from a monetary standpoint, of Abitibi's compliance with the EPA Orders. In other words, the execution in nature of the EPA Orders would result in a definite credit to the Province's own "balance sheet". Abitibi's liability in that regard is an asset for the Province itself.

With all due respect, this is not regulatory in nature; it is rather purely financial in reality. This is, in fact, closer to a debtor-creditor relationship than anything else.

This is quite far from the situation of the detached regulator or public enforcer issuing order for the public good. Here, the Province itself derives the direct pecuniary benefit from the required compliance of Abitibi to the EPA Orders. The Province stands to directly gain in the outcome. None of the cases submitted by the Province bear any similarity to the fact pattern in the present proceedings.

From this perspective, it is the hat of a creditor that best fits the Province, not that of a disinterested regulator.

(AbitibiBowater Inc., Re, 2010 QCCS 1261, 68 C.B.R. (5th) 1)

[129] This Court recognized in Abitibi that the Province "easily satisfied" the creditor requirement (para 49). It was therefore not necessary to consider at any length how the "creditor" step should be understood or how it would apply in other factual situations. However, even at para. 27 of Abitibi, the paragraph relied on by the majority of the Court of Appeal, Deschamps J. made a point of noting that "[m]ost environmental regulatory bodies can be creditors in respect of monetary or non-monetary obligations imposed by the relevant statutes" (emphasis added). The interpretation of the "creditor" step adopted by the majority of the Court of Appeal and urged upon this Court by GTL leaves no room for a regulator that enforces obligations not to be a creditor, though this possibility was clearly contemplated by para. 27 of Abitibi. As noted above, GTL's interpretation leaves the "creditor" step with no independent work to perform.

par un crédit certain au propre « bilan » de la province. Le passif d'Abitibi à cet égard constitue un actif de la province elle-même.

Soit dit en tout respect, il ne s'agit pas d'une affaire de nature réglementaire; il s'agit plutôt en fait d'une affaire purement financière. Cela s'apparente effectivement davantage à une relation créancier-débiteur qu'à autre chose.

Nous sommes assez loin du cas de l'organisme de réglementation ou d'application de la loi qui a rendu de manière objective une ordonnance dans l'intérêt public. En l'espèce, la province elle-même tire directement l'avantage pécunaire du respect obligatoire, par Abitibi, des ordonnances EPA. La province peut tirer profit du résultat. Aucune des affaires soumises par la province ne ressemble un tant soit peu aux faits à l'origine de la présente instance.

Sous cet angle, la province a agi plus comme un créancier que comme un organisme de réglementation désintéressé.

(AbitibiBowater Inc., Re, 2010 QCCS 1261, 68 C.B.R. (5th) 1)

[129] Notre Cour a reconnu dans Abitibi qu'il était « facile [pour la province] de répondre » à l'exigence relative au créancier (par. 49). Il n'était donc pas nécessaire d'analyser en profondeur le sens de l'étape « créancier » ou la manière dont elle s'appliquerait dans d'autres situations factuelles. Or, même au par. 27 de l'arrêt Abitibi, le paragraphe sur lequel se fondent les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel, la juge Deschamps a pris soin de souligner que « [l]a plupart des organismes administratifs peuvent agir à titre de créanciers en relation avec les obligations pécuniaires ou non pécuniaires imposées par ces lois » (italiques ajoutés). L'interprétation de l'étape « créancier » qu'ont retenue les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel et que GTL nous a exhortés à faire nôtre exclut la possibilité qu'un organisme de réglementation faisant respecter des obligations ne soit pas un créancier, alors que cette possibilité a été clairement envisagée au par. 27 de l'arrêt Abitibi. Comme je l'ai mentionné ci-dessus, l'interprétation de GTL prive l'étape « créancier » de toute fonction indépendante.

[130] Northern Badger established that a regulator enforcing a public duty by way of non-monetary order is not a creditor. I reject the claim in the dissenting reasons that Northern Badger should be interpreted differently. First, I note that whether the Regulator has a contingent claim is relevant to the sufficient certainty test, which presupposes that the Regulator is a creditor. I cannot accept the proposition in the dissenting reasons that Northern Badger was concerned with what would become the third prong of the Abitibi test. In Northern Badger, Laycraft C.J.A. accepted that abandonment was a liability and identified the issue as "whether that liability is to the board so that it is the board which is the creditor" (para. 32). Second, the underlying scenario here with regards to Redwater's end-of-life obligations is exactly the same as in Northern Badger — a regulator is ordering an entity to comply with its legal obligations in furtherance of the public good. This reasoning from Northern Badger was subsequently adopted in cases such as Strathcona (County) v. Fantasy Construction Ltd. (Trustee of), 2005 ABQB 794, 261 D.L.R. (4th) 221, at paras. 23-25, and Lamford Forest Products Ltd. (Re) (1991), 86 D.L.R. (4th) 534.

[131] I cannot agree with the suggestion by the majority of the Court of Appeal in this case that Northern Badger "is of limited assistance" in the application of the Abitibi test (para. 63). Rather, I agree with Martin J.A. that Abitibi did not overturn the reasoning in Northern Badger, but instead "emphasized the need to consider the substance of provincial regulation in assessing whether it creates a claim provable in bankruptcy" (para. 164). As Martin J.A. noted, even following Abitibi, the law continues to be that "public obligations are not provable claims that can be counted or compromised in the bankruptcy" (para. 174). Abitibi clarified the scope of Northern Badger by confirming that a regulator's environmental claims will be provable claims under certain circumstances. It does not stand for the [130] L'arrêt Northern Badger a établi qu'un organisme de réglementation faisant respecter un devoir public au moyen d'une ordonnance non pécuniaire n'est pas un créancier. Je rejette la prétention faite dans les motifs dissidents selon laquelle Northern Badger devrait recevoir une interprétation différente. Premièrement, je souligne que le point de savoir si l'organisme de réglementation a une réclamation éventuelle relève du critère de la certitude suffisante, lequel suppose au préalable que l'organisme de réglementation est un créancier. Je ne peux accepter la proposition énoncée dans les motifs dissidents selon laquelle Northern Badger porte sur ce qui allait devenir le troisième volet du critère d'Abitibi. Dans Northern Badger, après avoir reconnu que l'abandon constituait une responsabilité, le juge d'appel Laycraft a dit qu'il s'agissait de savoir [TRADUCTION] « si cette responsabilité appartient à l'Office, ce qui fait de lui le créancier » (par. 32). Deuxièmement, le scénario sous-jacent en l'espèce quant aux obligations de fin de vie qui incombent à Redwater est exactement le même que dans Northern Badger : un organisme de réglementation ordonne à une entité de se conformer à ses obligations légales pour le bien public. Ce raisonnement exact tiré de Northern Badger a été adopté par la suite dans des décisions telles Strathcona (County) c. Fantasy Construction Ltd. (Trustee of), 2005 ABQB 794, 261 D.L.R. (4th) 221, par. 23-25, et Lamford Forest Products Ltd. (Re) (1991), 86 D.L.R. (4th) 534.

[131] Je ne puis souscrire à l'opinion des juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel en l'espèce selon laquelle Northern Badger [TRADUCTION] « n'est guère utile » dans l'application du critère d'Abitibi (par. 63). Je partage plutôt l'avis de la juge Martin voulant que l'arrêt Abitibi n'ait pas infirmé le raisonnement de Northern Badger, et qu'il ait au contraire « mis en relief le besoin de prendre en considération la teneur du règlement provincial pour déterminer s'il crée une réclamation prouvable en matière de faillite » (par. 164). Comme l'a signalé la juge Martin, même depuis l'arrêt Abitibi, l'état du droit reste inchangé : « les obligations publiques ne sont pas des réclamations prouvables qui peuvent être comptabilisées ou compromises dans la faillite » (par. 174). L'arrêt Abitibi a éclairci la proposition that a regulator exercising its enforcement powers is always a creditor. The reasoning in Northern Badger was simply not applicable on the facts of Abitibi, given the actions of the Province as outlined above.

[132] In Abitibi, Deschamps J. noted that insolvency legislation had evolved in the years since Northern Badger. That legislative evolution did not, however, change the meaning to be ascribed to the term "creditor". In this regard, I agree with the conclusion in Strathcona County v. Fantasy Construction Ltd. (Trustee of), 2005 ABQB 559, 256 D.L.R. (4th) 536, that the amendments to the BIA dealing with environmental matters in the years following Northern Badger cannot be interpreted as having overturned the reasoning in that case. As should be clear from the earlier discussion of s. 14.06, the amendments to the BIA do not speak to when a regulator enforcing an environmental claim is a creditor.

[133] The conclusion that the reasoning in Northern Badger continues to be relevant since Abitibi and the amendments to insolvency legislation also finds support in the writings of academic commentators. Stewart's position is that, while Abitibi discussed Northern Badger, it did not overturn it. He urges this Court to clarify that there remains "a distinction between a regulatory body that is a creditor because it is enforcing a debt, and a regulatory body that is not a creditor because it is enforcing the law" (p. 221). Similarly, Lund argues that a court should "consider the importance of the public interests protected by the regulatory obligation when deciding whether the debtor owes a debt, liability or obligation to a creditor" (p. 178).

portée de Northern Badger en confirmant que les réclamations environnementales d'un organisme de réglementation seront des réclamations prouvables dans certains cas. Il ne permet pas d'affirmer qu'un organisme de réglementation exerçant ses pouvoirs d'application est toujours un créancier. Le raisonnement de l'arrêt Northern Badger ne s'appliquait tout simplement pas aux faits de l'affaire Abitibi, étant donné les agissements de la province décrits précédemment.

[132] Dans Abitibi, la juge Deschamps a signalé que la législation en matière d'insolvabilité avait évolué au cours des années qui ont suivi Northern Badger. Cette évolution législative n'a en revanche pas modifié le sens à attribuer au terme « créancier ». À cet égard, je souscris à la conclusion du juge Burrows dans Strathcona County c. Fantasy Construction Ltd. (Trustee of), 2005 ABQB 559, 256 D.L.R. (4th) 536, suivant laquelle les modifications en matière d'environnement qui ont été apportées à la LFI au cours des années suivant Northern Badger ne peuvent être interprétées comme ayant infirmé le raisonnement de cet arrêt. Tel qu'il devrait ressortir clairement de mon analyse précédente de l'art. 14.06, les modifications à la LFI ne traitent pas des cas où un organisme de réglementation faisant valoir une réclamation environnementale est un créancier.

[133] Les écrits de commentateurs universitaires appuient également la conclusion voulant que le raisonnement de l'arrêt Northern Badger conserve sa pertinence depuis Abitibi et les modifications à la loi sur l'insolvabilité. Monsieur Stewart estime que, même si l'arrêt Abitibi traite de Northern Badger, il ne l'a pas infirmé. Il exhorte notre Cour à préciser qu'il subsiste une distinction entre [TRADUCTION] « l'organisme de réglementation qui agit comme créancier car il recouvre une dette et celui qui n'est pas un créancier car il applique la loi » (p. 221). De même, M^me^ Lund fait valoir qu'un tribunal devrait [TRADUCTION] « prendre en considération l'importance que revêtent les intérêts publics protégés par l'obligation réglementaire au moment de décider si le débiteur a une dette, un engagement ou une obligation envers un créancier » (p. 178).

[134] For the foregoing reasons, Abitibi cannot be understood as having changed the law as summarized by Laycraft C.J.A. I adopt his comments at para. 33 of Northern Badger:

> The statutory provisions requiring the abandonment of oil and gas wells are part of the general law of Alberta, binding every citizen of the province. All who become licensees of oil and gas wells are bound by them. Similar statutory obligations bind citizens in many other areas of modern life . . . But the obligation of the citizen is not to the peace officer, or public authority which enforces the law. The duty is owed as a public duty by all the citizens of the community to their fellow citizens. When the citizen subject to the order complies, the result is not the recovery of money by the peace officer or public authority, or of a judgment for money, nor is that the object of the whole process. Rather, it is simply the enforcement of the general law. The enforcing authority does not become a "creditor" of the citizen on whom the duty is imposed.

[135] Based on the analysis in Northern Badger, it is clear that the Regulator is not a creditor of the Redwater estate. The end-of-life obligations the Regulator seeks to enforce against Redwater are public duties. Neither the Regulator nor the Government of Alberta stands to benefit financially from the enforcement of these obligations. These public duties are owed, not to a creditor, but, rather, to fellow citizens, and are therefore outside the scope of "provable claims". I do not intend to suggest, however, that a regulator will be a creditor only where it acts exactly as the province did in Abitibi. There may very well be situations in which a regulator's actions fall somewhere between those in Abitibi and those in the instant case. Notably, unlike some previous cases, the Regulator has performed no environmental work itself. I leave such situations to be addressed in future cases in which there are full factual records. Here, it is clear that the Regulator is seeking to enforce Redwater's public duties, whether by issuing the Abandonment Orders or by maintaining the LMR

[134] Pour les motifs qui précèdent, on ne peut juger que l'arrêt Abitibi a modifié le droit, comme l'a résumé le juge en chef Laycraft. Je fais miennes les remarques qu'il fait au par. 33 de Northern Badger :

> [TRADUCTION] Les dispositions légales qui exigent l'abandon de puits de pétrole et de gaz font partie du droit commun de l'Alberta et lient chaque citoyen de la province. Toutes les personnes qui acquièrent un permis d'exploitation de puits de pétrole ou de gaz doivent les respecter. Des obligations légales semblables lient les citoyens dans bien d'autres secteurs de la vie moderne [. . .] Mais l'obligation incombant au citoyen n'est pas envers l'agent de la paix ou l'autorité publique qui applique la loi. L'obligation est établie comme une obligation à caractère public qui doit être respectée par l'ensemble des citoyens de la collectivité à l'égard de leurs concitoyens. Lorsque le citoyen visé par l'ordonnance s'y conforme, le résultat n'est pas perçu comme le recouvrement d'une somme d'argent par un agent de la paix ou l'autorité publique, ni comme l'exécution d'un jugement ordonnant le paiement d'une somme d'argent; d'ailleurs, cela ne constitue pas non plus l'objectif de l'ensemble du processus. Il faut plutôt y voir l'application du droit commun. L'organisme d'application de la loi ne devient pas un « créancier » du citoyen à qui incombe l'obligation.

[135] Étant donné l'analyse effectuée dans Northern Badger, il est clair que l'organisme de réglementation n'est pas un créancier de l'actif de Redwater. Les obligations de fin de vie que l'organisme de réglementation veut imposer à Redwater sont de nature publique. Ni l'organisme de réglementation ni le gouvernement de l'Alberta ne peuvent bénéficier financièrement de l'exécution de ces obligations. Ces obligations à caractère public sont non pas envers un créancier, mais envers les concitoyens et échappent donc à la portée des « réclamations prouvables ». Je ne veux toutefois pas laisser entendre par là qu'un organisme de réglementation n'est un créancier que s'il se comporte d'une manière identique à la province dans Abitibi. Il peut fort bien exister des situations où les agissements d'un organisme de réglementation se situent quelque part entre ceux dans Abitibi et ceux en l'espèce. Signalons que, contrairement à certains cas antérieurs, l'organisme de réglementation n'a exécuté aucuns travaux environnementaux lui-même. Je laisse aux tribunaux disposant de dossiers factuels requirements. The Regulator is not a creditor within the meaning of the Abitibi test.

[136] I reject the suggestion that the foregoing analysis somehow overrules the first prong of the Abitibi test. The facts in Abitibi were not comparable to the facts of this appeal. Although this Court discussed Northern Badger in Abitibi, it merely referenced the subsequent amendments to the BIA, and did not overturn the earlier decision. The Court was clear that the ultimate outcome "must be grounded in the facts of each case" (para. 48). The dissenting reasons claim that, given the foregoing analysis, it will be nearly impossible to find that regulators are ever creditors. Abitibi itself shows this not to be the case. Furthermore, as I have said, there may well be cases that fall between Abitibi and the present case. However, if Abitibi is read as requiring only a determination of whether the regulator has exercised an enforcement power, it will in fact be impossible for a regulator not to be a creditor. The dissenting reasons do not seriously deny this, merely suggesting that regulators can publish guidelines or issue licences. The Regulator does both, yet, under the approach taken in the dissenting reasons, it is powerless to take any practical steps in the public interest regarding its guidelines or licences without qualifying as a creditor. As I have explained, Abitibi clearly contemplates a place for regulators who are not creditors.

[137] Strictly speaking, this is sufficient to dispose of this aspect of the appeal. However, additional guidance on the sufficient certainty analysis may prove helpful in future cases. Accordingly, I turn now to a discussion of the "sufficient certainty" step and complets le soin de résoudre pareilles situations à l'avenir. Dans la présente affaire, il est clair que l'organisme de réglementation cherche à faire respecter les devoirs à caractère public de Redwater, que ce soit en rendant les ordonnances d'abandon ou en maintenant les exigences relatives à la CGR. L'organisme de réglementation n'est pas un créancier au sens du critère d'Abitibi.

[136] Je rejette la thèse voulant que l'analyse qui précède écarte d'une façon ou d'une autre le premier volet du critère d'Abitibi. Les faits de l'affaire Abitibi n'étaient pas comparables à ceux de l'espèce. Bien que notre Cour ait examiné l'arrêt Northern Badger dans Abitibi, elle s'est contentée de mentionner les modifications subséquentes à la LFI et n'a pas infirmé l'arrêt antérieur. La Cour a été claire : l'issue finale « doit être fondée sur les faits de chaque affaire » (par. 48). Selon les motifs dissidents, vu l'analyse exposée précédemment, il sera presque impossible de juger que des organismes de réglementation sont des créanciers. L'arrêt Abitibi démontre lui-même que ce n'est pas le cas. De plus, comme je l'ai dit, il peut fort bien exister des cas qui se situent entre l'affaire Abitibi et celle qui nous occupe. Par contre, si l'on considère qu'Abitibi exige uniquement que le tribunal décide si l'organisme de réglementation a exercé un pouvoir d'application, il sera en fait impossible pour un organisme de réglementation de ne pas être un créancier. Les motifs dissidents ne nient pas sérieusement cette opinion et donnent seulement à penser que les organismes de réglementation peuvent publier des lignes directrices ou délivrer des permis. L'organisme de réglementation fait les deux mais, selon l'approche adoptée dans les motifs dissidents, il est dépourvu de moyens pour prendre quelque mesure concrète que ce soit dans l'intérêt public à propos de ses lignes directrices ou de permis sans avoir le statut de créancier. Comme je l'ai expliqué, l'arrêt Abitibi accorde clairement une place aux organismes de réglementation qui ne sont pas des créanciers.

[137] Cela suffit, à proprement parler, pour trancher cet aspect du pourvoi. Cependant, d'autres indications sur l'analyse de la certitude suffisante pourraient se révéler utiles à l'avenir. En conséquence, je passe maintenant à l'analyse de l'étape of the reasons why the Abandonment Orders and the LMR conditions both fail on this step of the Abitibi test. Abitibi test.

(2) There Is No Sufficient Certainty That the Regulator Will Perform the Environmental Work and Advance a Claim for Reimbursement

[138] The "sufficient certainty" test articulated in paras. 30 and 36 in Abitibi essentially does no more than reorganize and restate the requirements of the relevant provisions of the BIA. Section 121(2) provides that contingent claims may be provable claims. In other words, contingent debts or liabilities owed by a bankrupt to a creditor may be, but are not necessarily, provable claims. Section 135(1.1) provides for the valuation of such a claim. A contingent claim must be capable of valuation under s. 135(1.1) — it cannot be too remote or speculative — in order to be a provable claim under s. 121(2).

[139] Before the third step of the Abitibi test can even be reached, a regulator must already have been shown to be a creditor. I have concluded that, on the facts of this case, the Regulator is not a creditor of Redwater. However, for the purpose of explaining how I differ from the chambers judge on the "sufficient certainty" analysis, I will proceed as if the Regulator were, in fact, a creditor of Redwater in respect of the Abandonment Orders and LMR requirements. These end-of-life obligations do not directly require Redwater to make a payment to the Regulator. Rather, they are obligations requiring Redwater to do something. As discussed in Abitibi, if the Regulator were in fact a creditor, end-of-life obligations would be its contingent claims.

[140] What a court must determine is whether there are sufficient facts indicating the existence of an environmental duty that will ripen into a financial liability owed to a regulator. In determining whether de la « certitude suffisante » et des raisons pour lesquelles les ordonnances d'abandon et les conditions liées à la CGR ne franchissent pas cette étape du critère d'Abitibi.

(2) Il n'est pas suffisamment certain que l'organisme de réglementation exécutera les travaux environnementaux et présentera une demande de remboursement

[138] Le critère de la « certitude suffisante » énoncé aux par. 30 et 36 de l'arrêt Abitibi ne fait essentiellement que restructurer et reformuler les exigences des dispositions applicables de la LFI. Selon le par. 121(2), des réclamations éventuelles peuvent constituer des réclamations prouvables. Autrement dit, les dettes que devra peut-être le failli à un créancier peuvent constituer des réclamations prouvables, mais pas nécessairement l'être. Le paragraphe 135(1.1) prévoit l'évaluation d'une réclamation éventuelle, qui doit être évaluable suivant cette disposition; elle ne doit pas être trop éloignée ou conjecturale pour constituer une réclamation prouvable au sens du par. 121(2).

[139] Avant de pouvoir atteindre la troisième étape du critère d'Abitibi, il faut déjà avoir fait la démonstration que l'organisme de réglementation est un créancier. Au vu des faits de l'espèce, j'ai conclu que l'organisme de réglementation n'est pas un créancier de Redwater. Toutefois, afin d'expliquer pourquoi je me dissocie du juge siégeant au cabinet à l'égard de l'analyse de la « certitude suffisante », je vais procéder comme si l'organisme de réglementation était effectivement un créancier de Redwater en ce qui concerne les ordonnances d'abandon et les exigences de la CGR. Ces obligations de fin de vie n'exigent pas directement de Redwater qu'elle fasse un paiement à l'organisme de réglementation. Elles l'obligent plutôt à faire quelque chose. Comme l'indique l'arrêt Abitibi, si l'organisme de réglementation était en fait un créancier, les obligations de fin de vie constitueraient ses réclamations éventuelles.

[140] Ce que le tribunal doit décider, c'est s'il y a suffisamment de faits indiquant qu'il existe une obligation environnementale de laquelle résultera une dette envers un organisme de réglementation.

a non-monetary regulatory obligation of a bankrupt is too remote or too speculative to be included in the bankruptcy proceeding, the court must apply the general rules that apply to future or contingent claims. It must be sufficiently certain that the contingency will come to pass — in other words, that the regulator will enforce the obligation by performing the environmental work and seeking reimbursement.

[141] I will now discuss the Abandonment Orders and the LMR requirements in turn and demonstrate how they fail to satisfy the "sufficient certainty" step of the Abitibi test.

(a) The Abandonment Orders

[142] The Regulator has issued orders under the OGCA and the Pipeline Act requiring Redwater to abandon the Renounced Assets. Even if the Regulator were a creditor of Redwater, the Abandonment Orders would still have to be capable of valuation in order to be included in the bankruptcy process. In my view, it is not established either by the chambers judge's factual findings or by the evidence that it is sufficiently certain that the Regulator will perform the abandonments and advance a claim for reimbursement. The claim is too remote and speculative to be included in the bankruptcy process.

[143] The chambers judge acknowledged that it was "unclear" whether the Regulator would perform the abandonments itself or would deem the wells subject to the Abandonment Orders to be orphans (para. 173). He stated that, in the latter case, the OWA would probably carry out the abandonments, although it was not clear when they would be completed. Indeed, the chambers judge acknowledged that, given the OWA's resources, it could take as long as 10 years for it to get around to performing the required environmental work on the Redwater property. He nonetheless concluded that — even though the "sufficient certainty" step was not satisfied in a

Pour établir si une obligation réglementaire non pécuniaire du failli est trop éloignée ou trop conjecturale pour être incluse dans la procédure de faillite, le tribunal doit appliquer les règles générales qui visent les réclamations futures ou éventuelles. Il doit être suffisamment certain que l'éventualité se concrétisera ou, en d'autres termes, que l'organisme de réglementation fera respecter l'obligation en exécutant les travaux environnementaux et en sollicitant le remboursement de ses frais.

a) Les ordonnances d'abandon

[143] Le juge siégeant en cabinet a reconnu qu'il n'était [TRADUCTION] « pas clair » si l'organisme de réglementation effectuerait lui-même le processus d'abandon ou s'il considérerait les puits assujettis aux ordonnances d'abandon comme orphelins (par. 173). Il a dit que, dans ce dernier cas, l'OWA se chargerait probablement de l'abandon, mais on ne savait pas quand cette tâche serait menée à terme. En effet, le juge siégeant en cabinet a admis qu'étant donné les ressources de l'OWA, cela pourrait lui prendre jusqu'à 10 ans avant qu'elle amorce les travaux environnementaux nécessaires sur la propriété de Redwater. Il a conclu néanmoins que, même

"technical sense" — the situation met what had been intended in Abitibi. That conclusion was at least partly based on his finding that the Abandonment Orders were "intrinsically financial" (para. 173).

si l'étape de la « certitude suffisante » n'a pas été franchie au « sens technique », la situation répondait à la norme voulue dans Abitibi. Cette conclusion reposait, du moins en partie, sur la sienne voulant que les ordonnances d'abandon soient « intrinsèquement financières » (par. 173).

[144] In my view, the chambers judge did not make a finding of fact that the Regulator would carry out the abandonments itself. As noted, he acknowledged that it was "unclear" whether the Regulator would perform the abandonments. This can hardly be deemed a finding of fact deserving of deference. In my view, considered as a whole, the evidence in this case leads to the conclusion that the Regulator will not abandon the Renounced Assets itself.

[144] À mon avis, le juge siégeant en cabinet n'a pas tiré la conclusion de fait que l'organisme de réglementation se chargerait lui-même des travaux d'abandon. Je le rappelle, il a reconnu qu'il n'était « pas clair » si l'organisme de réglementation s'en occuperait. On peut difficilement dire qu'il s'agit qu'une conclusion de fait qui commande la déférence. Prise dans son ensemble, la preuve en l'espèce me semble mener à la conclusion selon laquelle l'organisme de réglementation ne procèdera pas lui-même à l'abandon des biens auxquels il a été renoncé.

[145] The Regulator is not in the business of performing abandonments. It has no statutory duty to do so. Abandonment is instead an obligation of the licensee. The evidence of the Regulator's affiant was that the Regulator very rarely abandons properties on behalf of licensees and virtually never does so where the licensee is in receivership or bankruptcy. The affiant stated that the Regulator had no intention of abandoning Redwater's licensed assets. As noted by the chambers judge, it is true that, in its letter to GTL dated July 15, 2015, the Regulator threatened to perform the abandonments itself, but the Regulator subsequently took no steps to follow up on that threat. Even if this letter should be accorded any weight, the contradiction between it and the Regulator's subsequent affidavits at the very least makes it difficult to say with anything approaching sufficient certainty that the Regulator intends to carry out the abandonments. These facts distinguish this case from Abitibi, in which the restructuring judge's findings were based on the premise that the province would most likely perform the remediation work itself.

[145] Dans le cadre de ses activités, l'organisme de réglementation n'effectue pas lui-même les travaux d'abandon. Il n'est pas tenu par la loi de le faire. Il s'agit plutôt d'une obligation incombant au titulaire de permis. Dans son affidavit, le déposant de l'organisme de réglementation a déclaré que celui-ci procédait très rarement à l'abandon de biens au nom des titulaires de permis et qu'il ne le faisait pratiquement jamais dans le cas d'un titulaire de permis sous séquestre ou en faillite. Le déposant a déclaré que l'organisme de réglementation n'avait pas l'intention d'abandonner les biens de Redwater visés par des permis. Comme l'a signalé le juge siégeant en cabinet, il est vrai que, dans sa lettre adressée à GTL en date du 15 juillet 2015, l'organisme de réglementation a menacé d'effectuer lui-même ces processus, mais il n'a rien fait par la suite pour mettre cette menace à exécution. Même si l'on devrait accorder de l'importance à cette lettre, la contradiction entre elle et les affidavits subséquents de l'organisme de réglementation font en sorte à tout le moins qu'il est difficile de dire avec quoi que ce soit de comparable à une certitude suffisante que l'organisme de réglementation compte effectuer le processus d'abandon. Ces faits distinguent la présente affaire d'Abitibi, où les conclusions du juge chargé de la restructuration reposaient sur la prémisse que la province exécuterait fort probablement elle-même les travaux de décontamination.

[146] Below, I will explain why the OWA's involvement is insufficient to satisfy the "sufficient certainty" test. First, I note that any reliance the chambers judge placed on the intrinsically financial nature of the Abandonment Orders was an error. In this regard, I am in complete agreement with Martin J.A. Considering whether an order is intrinsically financial is an erroneous interpretation of the third step of the Abitibi test. It is too broad and would result in a provable claim being found even where the existence of a monetary claim in bankruptcy is merely speculative. Thus, in Nortel CA, Juriansz J.A. rightly rejected the argument that the Abitibi test did not require a determination that the regulator would perform the environmental work and claim reimbursement, and that it was sufficient for there to be an environmental order requiring an expenditure of funds by the bankrupt estate. He held the following, at paras. 31-32:

. . . As I read it, the Supreme Court's decision is clear: ongoing environmental remediation obligations may be reduced to monetary claims that can be compromised in CCAA proceedings only where the province has performed the remediation work and advances a claim for reimbursement, or where the obligation may be considered a contingent or future claim because it is "sufficiently certain" that the province will do the work and then seek reimbursement.

The respondents' approach is not only inconsistent with AbitibiBowater Inc., Re, it is too broad. It would result in virtually all regulatory environmental orders being found to be provable claims. As Deschamps J. observed, a company may engage in activities that carry risks. When those risks materialize, the costs are borne by those who hold a stake in the company. A risk that results in an environmental obligation becomes subject to the insolvency process only when it is in substance monetary and is in substance a provable claim.

[146] J'expliquerai ci-après pourquoi l'intervention de l'OWA est insuffisante pour satisfaire au critère de la « certitude suffisante ». Premièrement, je constate que le juge siégeant en cabinet a eu tort de tabler sur le caractère « intrinsèquement financier » des ordonnances d'abandon. Je suis entièrement d'accord avec la juge Martin sur ce point. Se demander si une ordonnance est « intrinsèquement financière » constitue une interprétation erronée de la troisième étape du critère d'Abitibi. Elle est trop large et conduirait à la conclusion qu'il y a une « réclamation prouvable » même lorsque l'existence d'une réclamation pécuniaire en matière de faillite ne relève que de la conjecture. Ainsi, dans l'arrêt Nortel CA, le juge Juriansz a rejeté à juste titre l'argument selon lequel le critère d'Abitibi n'exigeait pas qu'il soit décidé que l'organisme de réglementation exécuterait les travaux environnementaux et demanderait un remboursement, et qu'il suffisait qu'il y ait une ordonnance environnementale exigeant une dépense de fonds par l'actif du failli. Il a déclaré ce qui suit, aux par. 31-32 :

L'approche des intimées n'est pas seulement incompatible avec celle de l'arrêt Abitibi, elle est trop large. Il en résulterait que pratiquement toutes les ordonnances réglementaires en matière d'environnement soient considérées comme des réclamations prouvables. Comme l'a fait remarquer la juge Deschamps, une société peut exercer des activités qui comportent des risques. Lorsque ces risques se matérialisent, les coûts sont supportés par ceux qui détiennent une participation dans la société. Un risque qui entraîne une obligation environnementale n'est soumis au processus d'insolvabilité que lorsqu'il est en substance pécuniaire et qu'il constitue en substance une réclamation prouvable.

[147] As the chambers judge correctly acknowledged, the fact that the Regulator would not conduct the abandonments itself does not mean that it would wash its hands of the Renounced Assets. Rather, if necessary, it would designate them as orphans pursuant to the OGCA and leave them for the OWA. I am not suggesting that a regulator can strategically avoid the "sufficient certainty" test simply by delegating environmental work to an arm's length organization. I would not decide, as the Regulator urges, that the Abitibi test always requires that the environmental work be performed by the regulator itself. However, the OWA's true nature must be emphasized. There are strong grounds to conclude that, given the particular features of this regulatory context, the OWA is not the regulator.

[148] The creation of the OWA was not an attempt by the Regulator to avoid the BIA order of priorities in bankruptcy. It is a non-profit organization with its own mandate and independent board of directors, and it operates as a financially independent entity pursuant to legally delegated authority. Although the OWA's board includes a representative of the Regulator and a representative of Alberta Environment and Parks, its independence is not in question. The OWA's 2014-2015 annual report indicates that five out of six voting directors represent industry. The OWA uses a risk assessment tool to prioritize when and how it will perform environmental work on the many hundreds of orphans in Alberta. There is no suggestion that the Regulator has any say in the order in which the OWA chooses to perform environmental work. The 2014-2015 annual report also states that, since 1992, 87 percent of the money collected and invested to fund OWA activities has been provided by industry via the orphan levy. The Regulator, at para. 99 of its factum, hints obliquely that additional provincial or federal funding may be forthcoming in the future, but even if it materializes, it will be almost entirely in the form of loans. I cannot accept the suggestion in the dissenting reasons

[147] Comme l'a reconnu à bon droit le juge siégeant en cabinet, ce n'est pas parce que l'organisme de réglementation n'effectuerait pas lui-même les travaux d'abandon qu'il se laverait les mains des biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation. Il les qualifierait plutôt, au besoin, d'orphelins conformément à l'OGCA et les confiera à l'OWA. Je ne prétends pas qu'un organisme de réglementation puisse stratégiquement éviter le critère de la « certitude suffisante » en déléguant simplement des travaux environnementaux à une organisation indépendante. Je ne déciderai pas, comme l'organisme de réglementation nous a exhortés à le faire, que le critère d'Abitibi exige toujours que les travaux environnementaux soient exécutés par l'organisme lui-même. Cependant, la véritable nature de l'OWA doit être soulignée. Il y a des motifs sérieux de conclure que, vu les caractéristiques propres à ce contexte réglementaire, l'OWA n'est pas l'organisme de réglementation.

[148] La création de l'OWA ne représentait pas une tentative de l'organisme de réglementation pour éviter l'ordre de priorité fixé en matière de faillite par la LFI. C'est un organisme sans but lucratif doté de son propre mandat et de son propre conseil d'administration indépendant, et il fonctionne comme une entité financièrement indépendante en vertu du pouvoir qui lui est délégué par la loi. Bien qu'un représentant de l'organisme de réglementation et un représentant d'Alberta Environment and Parks siègent au conseil d'administration de l'OWA, son indépendance n'est pas mise en question. Le rapport annuel 2014-2015 de l'OWA indique que cinq des six directeurs votants représentent l'industrie. L'OWA se sert d'un outil d'évaluation des risques pour décider, en ordre de priorité, quand et de quelle manière elle exécutera des travaux environnementaux sur les centaines de puits orphelins de l'Alberta. Personne ne prétend que l'organisme de réglementation a son mot à dire sur l'ordre dans lequel l'OWA décide d'exécuter des travaux environnementaux. Le rapport annuel 2014-2015 ajoute que, depuis 1992, 87 p. 100 de l'argent recueilli et investi pour financer les activités de l'OWA est fourni par l'industrie via la redevance pour les puits orphelins. Au paragraphe 99 de son mémoire, l'organisme de réglementation laisse that the Regulator and the OWA are "inextricably intertwined" (para. 273).

[149] Even assuming that the OWA's abandonment of Redwater's licensed assets could satisfy the "sufficient certainty" test, I agree with Martin J.A. that it is difficult to conclude that there is sufficient certainty that the OWA will in fact perform the abandonments. I also agree with her view that there is no certainty that a claim for reimbursement will be advanced should the OWA ultimately abandon the assets.

[150] The dissenting reasons suggest that the facts of this appeal are more akin to those of Northstar Aerospace Inc., Re, 2013 ONCA 600, 8 C.B.R. (6th) 154, than to those of Nortel CA, arguing that the "sufficient certainty" test is satisfied because, as in Northstar, there is no purchaser to take on Redwater's assets and the debtor itself is insolvent, so only the OWA can perform the work. In my view, Northstar is easily distinguishable. In that case, the bankrupt had been voluntarily carrying out remediation prior to its bankruptcy. After it made its assignment into bankruptcy, the Ministry of the Environment ("MOE") took over the remediation activities itself, purporting to do so on a without prejudice basis. Jurianz J.A. found that the fact that the MOE had already undertaken remediation activities made it sufficiently certain that it would do so. As I will now demonstrate, the facts here are very different.

[151] At the beginning of this litigation, the OWA estimated that it would take 10 to 12 years to get through the backlog of orphans. By 2015, that backlog was increasing rapidly, and it may well have continued to increase at the same or an even greater speed in the intervening years, as submitted by the Regulator. If anything, this suggests the possibility of an even larger backlog. There is no indication that entendre indirectement que la province ou le gouvernement fédéral pourrait accorder à l'avenir des fonds supplémentaires à l'OWA mais, même si cette possibilité se concrétise, les fonds seront presque entièrement consentis sous forme de prêts. Je ne peux accepter la proposition des juges dissidents selon laquelle l'organisme de réglementation et l'OWA sont « inextricablement liés » (par. 273).

[149] À supposer même que l'abandon par l'OWA des biens de Redwater visés par des permis puisse satisfaire au critère de la « certitude suffisante », je conviens avec la juge Martin qu'il est difficile de conclure à la certitude suffisante que l'OWA se chargera effectivement des travaux d'abandon et qu'il n'y a aucune certitude qu'une demande de remboursement sera présentée si l'OWA finit par abandonner les biens.

[150] Les motifs dissidents laissent croire que les faits de l'espèce s'apparentent davantage à ceux de l'affaire Northstar Aerospace Inc., Re, 2013 ONCA 600, 8 C.B.R. (6th) 154, qu'à ceux de Nortel CA, faisant valoir qu'il est satisfait au critère de la « certitude suffisante » car, tout comme dans Northstar, personne ne veut acheter les biens de Redwater et la débitrice elle-même est insolvable; en conséquence, seule l'OWA peut exécuter les travaux. Il me semble facile de distinguer l'affaire Northstar de celle qui nous occupe. Dans cette affaire, le failli effectuait de son plein gré des travaux de décontamination avant sa faillite. Après que le failli eu fait cession de ses biens, le ministre de l'Environnement (« ME ») a pris lui-même la relève des activités de décontamination et il entendait le faire sans préjudice. Selon le juge Jurianz, comme le ME avait déjà entrepris des activités de décontamination, il était suffisamment certain qu'il s'en occuperait. Comme je le démontrerai maintenant, les faits de l'espèce sont fort différents.

[151] Au début du présent litige, l'OWA a estimé qu'il lui faudrait de 10 à 12 ans pour résorber l'arriéré d'orphelins. Cet arriéré augmentait rapidement en 2015 et il peut fort bien avoir continué de croître tout aussi ou encore plus rapidement au cours des années suivantes, comme le soutient l'organisme de réglementation. Cela tend plutôt à établir que l'arriéré pourrait encore augmenter. Rien n'indique the Renounced Assets would have a particularly high priority in the backlog. Even if the potential additional funding materializes, the Regulator submits that it will be a generation or more before the OWA can address its existing inventory of orphans.

[152] The dissenting reasons rely on the chambers judge's conclusion that the OWA would "probably" perform the abandonments eventually, while downplaying the fact that he also concluded that this would not "necessarily [occur] within a definite timeframe" (paras. 261 and 278, citing the chambers judge's reasons, at para. 173). Given the most conservative timeline — the 10 years discussed by the chambers judge — it is difficult to predict anything occurring with sufficient certainty. Much could change within the next decade, both in terms of government policy and in terms of the willingness of those in the Alberta oil and gas industry to discharge environmental liabilities. This is not at all the same situation as in Northstar, in which the MOE had already commenced environmental work.

[153] Perhaps more to the point, this lengthy timeline means that, should it ultimately perform the work, the OWA will not advance a claim for reimbursement. Advancement of a claim is an element of the test that is just as essential as performance of the work. The OWA itself has no ability to seek reimbursement of its costs from licensees and, although the costs of abandonment carried out by a person authorized by the Regulator constitute a debt payable to the Regulator under s. 30(5) of the OGCA, no evidence has been adduced that the Regulator has exercised its power to recover such costs in comparable cases. There is a good reason for this: the reality is that, by the time the OWA got around to abandoning any of Redwater's wells, the estate would be finalized and GTL long since discharged. In sum, the chambers judge erred in failing to consider whether the OWA can be treated as the regulator and in failing to appreciate that, even if it can, it is not sufficiently certain that the OWA will qu'une priorité particulièrement grande serait accordée dans l'arriéré aux biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation. Même si la possibilité d'attribuer des fonds supplémentaires se concrétise, l'organisme de réglementation fait valoir que cela prendra une génération ou plus avant que l'OWA ne puisse s'occuper de son inventaire actuel d'orphelins.

[152] Les motifs dissidents se fondent sur la conclusion du juge siégeant en cabinet selon laquelle l'OWA effectuerait « probablement » le processus d'abandon, tout en minimisant le fait qu'il a également conclu que l'OWA ne le ferait pas « nécessairement dans un délai précis » (par. 261 et 278, citant les motifs du juge siégeant en cabinet, par. 173). Vu l'échéancier le plus conservateur — celui de 10 ans dont a parlé le juge siégeant en cabinet —, il est difficile de prédire quoi que ce soit avec une certitude suffisante. La donne pourrait changer considérablement au cours de la prochaine décennie, tant au chapitre de la politique gouvernementale qu'à celui de la volonté de l'industrie pétrolière et gazière de l'Alberta de s'acquitter de ses responsabilités environnementales. Il ne s'agit pas du tout de la même situation que dans Northstar, où le ME avait déjà amorcé les travaux environnementaux.

[153] Plus particulièrement, ce long échéancier garantit que, s'il finit par exécuter les travaux, l'OWA ne présentera pas de demande de remboursement. La présentation de la demande est un élément tout aussi essentiel du critère que l'exécution des travaux. L'OWA lui-même ne peut faire rembourser ses frais par les titulaires de permis et, même si les coûts des processus d'abandon effectués par la personne autorisée par l'organisme de réglementation constituent une dette payable à cet organisme suivant le par. 30(5) de l'OGCA, on n'a produit aucune preuve montrant que l'organisme de réglementation a exercé son pouvoir de recouvrer ces frais dans des cas analogues, et pour cause : le fait est qu'au moment où l'OWA en arriverait à abandonner l'un ou l'autre des puits de Redwater, la liquidation de l'actif serait terminée et GTL serait libéré depuis longtemps. En somme, le juge siégeant en cabinet a eu tort de ne pas se demander si l'OWA peut être assimilé à l'organisme de réglementation et en ne in fact perform the abandonments and advance a claim for reimbursement.

[154] Accordingly, even if the Regulator had acted as a creditor in issuing the Abandonment Orders, it cannot be said with sufficient certainty that it would perform the abandonments and advance a claim for reimbursement.

(b) The Conditions for the Transfer of Licenses

[155] I will deal briefly with the LMR conditions for the transfer of licences. Much of the foregoing analysis with regard to the Abandonment Orders also applies to these conditions. As noted by Martin J.A., the requirement of regulatory approval for licence transfers is difficult to compare directly with the remediation orders at issue in Abitibi. However, this Court confirmed that the Abitibi test applies to a class of regulatory obligations that is broader than "orders" in Moloney, at paras. 54-55. The LMR conditions are a "non-monetary obligation" for the Redwater estate, since they must be satisfied before the Regulator will approve the transfer of any of Redwater's licences. However, it is notable that, even apart from the LMR conditions, licences are far from freely transferrable. The Regulator will not approve the transfer of licences where the transferee is not a licensee under the OGCA, the Pipeline Act, or both. The Regulator also reserves the right to reject a proposed transfer where it determines that the transfer is not in the public interest, such as where the transferee has outstanding compliance issues.

[156] In a sense, the factors suggesting an absence of sufficient certainty are even stronger for the LMR requirements than for the Abandonment Orders. There is a debt enforcement scheme under the OGCA and the Pipeline Act in respect of abandonment, but considérant pas que, même s'il peut l'être, il n'est pas suffisamment certain qu'il effectuera dans les faits le processus d'abandon et présentera une demande de remboursement.

[154] En conséquence, même si l'organisme de réglementation avait agi comme un créancier en rendant les ordonnances, on ne saurait dire avec une certitude suffisante qu'il effectuerait les processus d'abandon et présenterait une demande de remboursement.

b) Les conditions liées au transfert de permis

[155] Je traiterai brièvement des conditions relatives à la CGR dont est assorti le transfert de permis. Une grande partie de l'analyse qui précède concernant les ordonnances d'abandon vaut tout autant pour ces conditions. Comme l'a souligné la juge Martin, il est difficile de comparer directement la nécessité d'obtenir une approbation réglementaire pour les transferts de permis et les ordonnances de décontamination en litige dans Abitibi. Or, notre Cour a confirmé aux par. 54-55 de Moloney que le critère d'Abitibi s'applique à une catégorie d'obligations réglementaires plus large que les « ordonnances ». Les conditions relatives à la CGR forment une « obligation non pécuniaire » de l'actif de Redwater, car elles doivent être remplies avant que l'organisme de réglementation n'approuve le transfert de tout permis de Redwater. Cependant, il convient de noter que, même mises à part les conditions relatives à la CGR, les permis sont loin d'être librement transférables. L'organisme n'approuvera pas le transfert des permis si le cessionnaire n'est pas un titulaire de permis au sens de l'OGCA ou de la Pipeline Act ou des deux. L'organisme de réglementation se réserve également le droit de rejeter un transfert proposé lorsqu'il juge que le transfert n'est pas dans l'intérêt public, comme dans un cas où le cessionnaire a des problèmes non résolus touchant à la conformité.

[156] En un sens, les facteurs laissant croire qu'il n'y a pas de certitude suffisante militent encore plus fortement en faveur des exigences relatives à la CGR que des ordonnances d'abandon. L'OGCA et la Pipeline Act prévoient un régime de recouvrement there is no such scheme for the LMR requirements. The Regulator's refusal to approve licence transfers unless and until the LMR requirements have been satisfied does not give it a monetary claim against Redwater. It is true that compliance with the LMR requirements results in a reduction in the value of the bankrupt estate. However, as discussed earlier, not every obligation that diminishes the value of the bankrupt estate, and therefore the amount available to secured creditors, satisfies the "sufficient certainty" step. The question is not whether an obligation is intrinsically financial.

[157] Compliance with the LMR conditions prior to the transfer of licences reflects the inherent value of the assets held by the bankrupt estate. Without licences, Redwater's profits à prendre are of limited value at best. All licences held by Redwater were received by it subject to the end-of-life obligations that would one day arise. These end-of-life obligations form a fundamental part of the value of the licensed assets, the same as if the associated costs had been paid up front. Having received the benefit of the Renounced Assets during the productive period of their life cycles, Redwater cannot now avoid the associated liabilities. This understanding is consistent with Daishowa-Marubeni International Ltd. v. Canada, 2013 SCC 29, [2013] 2 S.C.R. 336, which dealt with the statutory reforestation obligations of holders of forest tenures in Alberta. This Court unanimously held that the reforestation obligations were "a future cost embedded in the forest tenure that serves to depress the tenure's value at the time of sale" (para. 29).

[158] The fact that regulatory requirements may cost money does not transform them into debt collection schemes. As noted by Martin J.A., licensing requirements predate bankruptcy and apply to all licensees regardless of solvency. GTL does not dispute the fact that Redwater's licences can be transferred only to other licensees nor that the Regulator retains the authority in appropriate situations to de créances en matière d'abandon, mais il n'existe aucun régime de ce genre pour les exigences liées à la CGR. Le refus de l'organisme de réglementation d'approuver les transferts de permis jusqu'à ce que ces exigences aient été satisfaites ne lui donne pas une réclamation pécuniaire contre Redwater. Certes, le respect des exigences relatives à la CGR entraîne une diminution de la valeur de l'actif du failli. Toutefois, comme nous l'avons vu plus tôt, toute obligation qui diminue la valeur de l'actif du failli, et donc la somme que peuvent recouvrer les créanciers garantis, ne franchit pas nécessairement l'étape de la « certitude suffisante ». Il ne s'agit pas de savoir si une obligation est intrinsèquement financière.

[157] Le respect des conditions liées à la CGR avant le transfert des permis reflète la valeur inhérente des biens détenus par l'actif du failli. Sans les permis, les profits à prendre appartenant à Redwater ont, au mieux, peu de valeur. Tous les permis détenus par Redwater ont été reçus par elle, sous réserve d'obligations de fin de vie qui prendraient naissance un jour. Ces obligations constituent une part fondamentale de la valeur des biens visés par des permis, comme si les frais connexes avaient été payés d'emblée. Ayant reçu le bénéfice des biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation pendant la période productive de leur cycle de vie, Redwater ne peut plus éviter les engagements connexes. Cette interprétation concorde avec l'arrêt Daishowa-Marubeni International Ltd. c. Canada, 2013 CSC 29, [2013] 2 R.C.S. 336, qui portait sur les obligations légales de reboisement des détenteurs de tenures forestières en Alberta. Notre Cour a conclu à l'unanimité que les obligations relatives au reboisement constituaient « un coût futur inhérent à la tenure forestière qui a pour effet d'en diminuer la valeur au moment de la vente » (par. 29).

[158] La possibilité que des exigences réglementaires coûtent de l'argent ne les transforme pas en régimes de recouvrement de créances. Comme l'a fait remarquer la juge Martin, les exigences en matière de permis précèdent la faillite et s'appliquent à tous les titulaires de permis, peu importe leur solvabilité. GTL ne conteste pas le fait que les permis de Redwater ne peuvent être transférés qu'à reject proposed transfers due to safety or compliance concerns. There is no difference between such conditions and the condition that the Regulator will not approve transfers where they would leave the requirement to satisfy end-of-life obligations unaddressed. All these regulatory conditions depress the value of the licensed assets. None of them creates a monetary claim in the Regulator's favour. Licensing requirements continue to exist during bankruptcy, and there is no reason why GTL cannot comply with them.

(3) Conclusion on the Abitibi test

[159] Accordingly, the end-of-life obligations binding on GTL are not claims provable in the Redwater bankruptcy, so they do not conflict with the general priority scheme in the BIA. This is not a mere matter of form, but of substance. Requiring Redwater to pay for abandonment before distributing value to creditors does not disrupt the priority scheme of the BIA. In crafting the priority scheme set out in the BIA, Parliament intended to permit regulators to place a first charge on real property of a bankrupt affected by an environmental condition or damage in order to fund remediation (see s. 14.06(7)). Thus, the BIA explicitly contemplates that environmental regulators will extract value from the bankrupt's real property if that property is affected by an environmental condition or damage. Although the nature of property ownership in the Alberta oil and gas industry meant that s. 14.06(7) was unavailable to the Regulator, the Abandonment Orders and the LMR replicate s. 14.06(7)'s effect in this case. Furthermore, it is important to note that Redwater's only substantial assets were affected by an environmental condition or damage. Accordingly, the Abandonment Orders and LMR requirements did not seek to force Redwater to fulfill end-of-life obligations with assets unrelated to the environmental condition or damage. In other words, recognizing that the Abandonment Orders and LMR requirements are not provable claims d'autres titulaires de permis, ni le fait que l'organisme de réglementation conserve le pouvoir, dans les situations qui s'y prêtent, de rejeter les transferts proposés en raison de préoccupations relatives à la sécurité ou à la conformité. Il n'y a aucune différence entre ces conditions et celle voulant que l'organisme de réglementation n'approuve pas les transferts qui laisseraient en suspens l'exigence de satisfaire aux obligations de fin de vie. Toutes ces conditions réglementaires font baisser la valeur des biens visés par des permis. Aucune ne donne naissance à une réclamation pécuniaire en faveur de l'organisme de réglementation. Les exigences en matière de permis subsistent pendant la faillite, et il n'y a aucune raison pour laquelle GTL ne peut s'y conformer.

(3) Conclusion sur le critère d'Abitibi

[159] En conséquence, les obligations de fin de vie incombant à GTL ne sont pas des réclamations prouvables dans la faillite de Redwater et n'entrent donc pas en conflit avec le régime de priorité général instauré dans la LFI. Ce n'est pas une simple question de forme, mais de fond. Obliger Redwater à payer l'abandon avant de répartir la valeur entre les créanciers ne perturbe pas le régime de priorité établi dans la LFI. Au moment d'élaborer ce régime, le Parlement voulait permettre aux organismes de réglementation d'imposer une charge prioritaire sur le bien réel du failli touché par un fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement en vue de financer la décontamination (voir le par. 14.06(7)). Ainsi, la LFI envisage explicitement la possibilité que des organismes de réglementation tire une valeur des biens réels du failli touchés par un fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement. Bien que l'organisme de réglementation n'ait pu se prévaloir du par. 14.06(7), compte tenu de la nature de la propriété des biens dans l'industrie pétrolière et gazière de l'Alberta, les ordonnances d'abandon et la CGR reproduisent l'effet du par. 14.06(7) en l'espèce. De plus, il importe de souligner que les seuls biens de valeur de Redwater étaient touchés par un fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement. Les ordonnances d'abandon et exigences relatives à la CGR n'avaient donc pas pour objet de forcer Redwater à s'acquitter des obligations de fin de vie avec des biens étrangers au fait in this case does not interfere with the aims of the BIA — rather, it facilitates them.

[160] Bankruptcy is not a licence to ignore rules, and insolvency professionals are bound by and must comply with valid provincial laws during bankruptcy. They must, for example, comply with non-monetary obligations that are binding on the bankrupt estate, that cannot be reduced to provable claims, and the effects of which do not conflict with the BIA, notwithstanding the consequences this may have for the bankrupt's secured creditors. The Abandonment Orders and the LMR requirements are based on valid provincial laws of general application — exactly the kind of valid provincial laws upon which the BIA is built. As noted in Moloney, the BIA is clear that "[t]he ownership of certain assets and the existence of particular liabilities depend upon provincial law" (para. 40). End-of-life obligations are imposed by valid provincial laws which define the contours of the bankrupt estate available for distribution.

[161] Finally, as noted earlier, the BIA's general purpose of facilitating financial rehabilitation is not relevant for a corporation such as Redwater. Corporations with insufficient assets to satisfy their creditors will never be discharged from bankruptcy because they cannot satisfy all their creditors' claims in full (BIA, s. 169(4)). Thus, no conflict with this purpose is caused by the conclusion that the end-of-life obligations binding Redwater are not provable claims.

IV. Conclusion

[162] There is no conflict between Alberta's regulatory regime and the BIA requiring portions of the former to be rendered inoperative in the context of bankruptcy. Although GTL remains fully protected from personal liability by federal law, it cannot walk away from the environmental liabilities of the bankrupt estate by invoking s. 14.06(4). On a ou dommage lié à l'environnement. Autrement dit, la reconnaissance que les ordonnances d'abandon et exigences relatives à la CGR ne sont pas des réclamations prouvables en l'espèce facilite l'atteinte des objets de la LFI au lieu de la contrecarrer.

[161] Enfin, rappelons que l'objet général de la LFI de favoriser la réhabilitation financière ne concerne pas une société comme Redwater. Les sociétés n'ayant pas assez de biens pour satisfaire leurs créanciers ne seront jamais libérées de leur faillite puisqu'elles ne peuvent acquitter entièrement toutes les réclamations de leurs créanciers (LFI, par. 169(4)). Ainsi, la conclusion selon laquelle les obligations de fin de vie incombant à Redwater ne sont pas des réclamations prouvables n'est à l'origine d'aucun conflit avec cet objet.

IV. Conclusion

[162] Il n'y a aucun conflit entre le régime de réglementation de l'Alberta et la LFI en raison duquel des parties du premier doivent être inopérantes dans le contexte de la faillite. Bien que GTL demeure entièrement dégagé de toute responsabilité personnelle par le droit fédéral, il ne peut se soustraire aux engagements environnementaux qui lient l'actif du proper application of the Abitibi test, the Redwater estate must comply with ongoing environmental obligations that are not claims provable in bankruptcy.

[163] Accordingly, the appeal is allowed. In Alberta Energy Regulator v. Grant Thornton Limited, 2017 ABCA 278, 57 Alta. L.R. (6th) 37, Wakeling J.A. declined to stay the precedential effect of the Court of Appeal's decision. As he noted, the interests of the Regulator itself were already protected. Pursuant to earlier orders of the Alberta courts, GTL had already sold or renounced all of Redwater's assets, and the sale proceeds were being held in trust. Accordingly, the Regulator's request for an order that the proceeds from the sale of Redwater's assets be used to address Redwater's end-of-life obligations is granted. Additionally, the chambers judge's declarations in paras. 3 and 5-16 of his order are set aside.

[164] As the successful party in the appeal, the Regulator would normally be entitled to its costs. However, the Regulator specifically did not seek costs. Accordingly, there will be no order made as to costs.

I. Introduction

[165] Redwater Energy Corporation ("Redwater") is a bankrupt oil and gas company. Its estate principally consists of two types of properties or assets: valuable, producing oil wells and facilities that are still capable of generating revenue; and value-negative, non-producing assets, including depleted wells that are subject to onerous environmental liabilities. Redwater's receiver and trustee in bankruptcy, Grant Thornton Limited ("GTL"), purports to have disclaimed ownership of the non-producing failli en invoquant le par. 14.06(4). D'après une juste application du critère d'Abitibi, l'actif de Redwater doit respecter les obligations environnementales continues qui ne sont pas des réclamations prouvables en matière de faillite.

[163] En conséquence, le pourvoi est accueilli. Dans Alberta Energy Regulator c. Grant Thornton Limited, 2017 ABCA 278, 57 Alta. L.R. (6th) 37, le juge Wakeling a refusé de suspendre l'effet de précédent de l'arrêt rendu par la Cour d'appel. Comme il l'a fait remarquer, les intérêts de l'organisme de réglementation lui-même étaient déjà protégés. Conformément aux ordonnances rendues auparavant par les tribunaux albertains, GTL avait déjà vendu l'ensemble des biens de Redwater ou y avait renoncé et le produit de la vente a été détenu en fiducie. Ainsi, la Cour rend l'ordonnance demandée par l'organisme de réglementation selon laquelle le produit de la vente des biens de Redwater doit être utilisé pour satisfaire aux obligations de fin de vie de Redwater. En outre, les déclarations du juge siégeant en cabinet qui figurent aux par. 3 et 5-16 de son ordonnance sont annulées.

[164] Puisqu'il a gain de cause dans le cadre de ce pourvoi, l'organisme de réglementation aurait normalement droit aux dépens. Toutefois, il a expressément mentionné ne pas les demander. C'est pourquoi aucune ordonnance ne sera rendue à cet égard.

Version française des motifs des juges Moldaver et Côté rendus par

La juge Côté (dissidente) —

I. Introduction

[165] Redwater Energy Corporation (« Redwater ») est une société pétrolière et gazière en faillite. Son actif se compose principalement de deux types de biens : des puits de pétrole et des installations pétrolières de valeur productifs qui sont encore susceptibles de générer un revenu; et des biens inexploités ayant une valeur négative, notamment des puits taris auxquels se rattachent de lourds engagements environnementaux. Le séquestre et syndic de faillite de Redwater, Grant Thornton Limited (« GTL »), assets. It did so in order to sell the valuable, producing wells separately — unencumbered by the liabilities attached to the disclaimed properties — and to distribute the proceeds of that sale to the estate's creditors.

[166] However, Alberta law does not recognize GTL's disclaimers as enforceable. Shortly after GTL's appointment as receiver, the Alberta Energy Regulator ("AER") issued "Abandonment Orders" for the disclaimed assets, directing Redwater and its working interest participants to carry out environmental work on those properties. Specifically, the AER sought to have GTL "abandon" the non-producing properties, which meant to render the wells environmentally safe according to the AER's directives. It later notified GTL that it would refuse to approve any sale of Redwater's valuable assets unless GTL did one of three things: sell the disclaimed properties in a single package with the producing wells and facilities; complete the abandonment and reclamation work itself; or post security to cover the environmental liabilities associated with the disclaimed properties.

[167] The evidence reveals that none of these options is economically viable. The net value of Redwater's 127 licensed properties is negative, so no rational purchaser would ever agree to buy them as a package. This is precisely why GTL opted to disclaim the burdensome properties in the first place. As to the remaining options, GTL cannot undertake or guarantee the abandonment and reclamation work because the environmental liabilities attached to the disclaimed assets exceed the estate's realizable value — and in any event, GTL could not access the funds necessary to satisfy these commitments until after a sale of the estate's valuable assets was completed. The effect of the AER's position, then, is to hamper GTL in its administration of the estate, preventing it from realizing any value for any of Redwater's creditors, including the AER. And the AER's position effectively leaves the valuable and producing wells in limbo, creating a real risk that prétend avoir renoncé à la propriété des biens inexploités, et ce, afin de vendre séparément les puits de valeur productifs — non grevés des engagements se rattachant aux biens visés par les renonciations — et de répartir le produit de cette vente entre les créanciers de l'actif.

[167] La preuve révèle qu'aucune de ces possibilités n'est viable sur le plan économique. La valeur nette des 127 biens de Redwater qui sont visés par des permis est négative, de sorte qu'aucun acheteur sensé n'accepterait de les acquérir ensemble. C'est précisément pour cette raison que GTL a choisi de renoncer aux biens représentant un fardeau en premier lieu. Quant aux autres possibilités, GTL ne peut ni exécuter les travaux d'abandon et de remise en état ni en garantir l'exécution parce que les engagements environnementaux se rattachant aux biens visés par les renonciations dépassent la valeur de réalisation de l'actif et que, de toute façon, GTL ne pourrait obtenir les sommes nécessaires pour satisfaire à ces engagements qu'après avoir procédé à la vente des biens de valeur se trouvant dans l'actif. La position de l'AER a donc pour effet d'entraver GTL dans son administration de l'actif, l'empêchant de réaliser une quelconque valeur pour l'un ou l'autre des créanciers they, too, will become "orphans" — assets that are unable to be sold to another company and are left entirely unrealized.

[168] According to Wagner C.J., GTL is without recourse because federal law enables it only to protect itself from personal liability and because the AER was entitled to assert its environmental liability claims outside of the bankruptcy process. I disagree on both points. In my view, two aspects of Alberta's regulatory regime conflict with the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA"). This result flows from a proper and accurate understanding of fundamental principles of constitutional and insolvency law.

[169] First, Alberta's statutes regulating the oil and gas industry define the term "licensee" as including receivers and trustees in bankruptcy. The effect of this definition is that insolvency professionals are subject to the same obligations and liabilities as Redwater itself — including the obligation to comply with the AER's Abandonment Orders and the risk of personal liability for failing to do so. The BIA, however, permits a trustee in bankruptcy to disclaim assets encumbered by environmental liabilities. This power was available to GTL in the circumstances of this case, and GTL validly disclaimed the non-productive assets. The result is that it is no longer subject to the environmental liabilities associated with those assets. Because Alberta's statutory regime does not recognize these disclaimers as lawful (by virtue of the fact that receivers and trustees are regulated as licensees, who cannot disclaim assets), there is an unavoidable operational conflict between federal and provincial law. Alberta's legislation governing the oil and gas sector should therefore be held inoperative to the extent that it does not recognize the legal effect of GTL's disclaimers.

de Redwater, y compris l'AER. La position de l'AER place de fait les puits de valeur productifs dans une situation incertaine, créant un risque réel qu'ils deviennent, eux aussi, des [TRADUCTION] « orphelins » — des biens qui ne peuvent être vendus à une autre société et dont la valeur demeure entièrement non réalisée.

[168] Selon le juge en chef Wagner, GTL est sans recours parce que la loi fédérale ne l'autorise qu'à se dégager de toute responsabilité personnelle, et que l'AER avait le droit de faire valoir ses réclamations environnementales en dehors du processus de faillite. Je suis en désaccord sur les deux points. À mon avis, deux aspects du régime de réglementation albertain entrent en conflit avec la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité, L.R.C. 1985, c. B-3 (« LFI »). Une compréhension adéquate et fidèle des principes fondamentaux du droit constitutionnel et du droit de l'insolvabilité conduit à ce résultat.

[169] D'abord, les lois albertaines qui règlementent l'industrie pétrolière et gazière précisent que le terme [TRADUCTION] « titulaire de permis » vise les séquestres et syndics de faillite. Cette définition a pour effet d'assujettir les professionnels de l'insolvabilité aux mêmes obligations et responsabilités que Redwater elle-même — notamment l'obligation de se conformer aux ordonnances d'abandon de l'AER et le risque d'engager sa responsabilité personnelle pour ne pas l'avoir fait. La LFI, par contre, autorise le syndic de faillite à renoncer aux éléments d'actif grevés d'engagements environnementaux. GTL disposait de ce pouvoir dans les circonstances de l'espèce et elle a valablement renoncé aux biens inexploités. Elle n'est donc plus assujettie aux engagements environnementaux liés à ces biens. Étant donné que le régime législatif albertain ne reconnaît pas la légalité de ces renonciations (en raison du fait que les séquestres et les syndics sont réglementés comme des titulaires de permis, qui ne peuvent renoncer à des biens), il y a un conflit d'application inévitable entre la loi fédérale et la loi provinciale. La loi albertaine régissant l'industrie pétrolière et gazière devrait donc être déclarée inopérante dans la mesure où elle ne reconnaît pas l'effet juridique des renonciations de GTL.

[170] Second, the AER has required that GTL satisfy Redwater's environmental liabilities ahead of the estate's other debts, which contravenes the BIA's priority scheme. Because the Abandonment Orders are "claims provable in bankruptcy" under the three-part test outlined by this Court in Newfoundland and Labrador v. AbitibiBowater Inc., 2012 SCC 67, [2012] 3 S.C.R. 443 — from which this Court should not depart either explicitly or implicitly — the AER cannot assert those claims outside the bankruptcy process. To do so would frustrate an essential purpose of the BIA: distributing the estate's value in accordance with the statutory priority scheme. Nor can the AER achieve the same result indirectly by imposing conditions on the sale of Redwater's valuable assets. The province's licensing scheme effectively operates as a debt collection mechanism in relation to a bankrupt company: it prevents GTL from discharging its duties as trustee unless the AER's environmental claims are satisfied. As such, it should be held inoperative as applied to Redwater under the second prong of the paramountcy test, frustration of purpose.

[170] Ensuite, l'AER a exigé que GTL acquitte les engagements environnementaux de Redwater avant les autres dettes de l'actif, ce qui contrevient au régime de priorité établi par la LFI. Comme les ordonnances d'abandon sont des « réclamations prouvables en matière de faillite » selon le test à trois volets énoncé par la Cour dans l'arrêt Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador c. AbitibiBowater Inc., 2012 CSC 67, [2012] 3 R.C.S. 443 — test dont notre Cour ne devrait pas s'écarter explicitement ou implicitement — l'AER ne peut faire valoir ces réclamations en dehors du processus de faillite. Agir ainsi entraverait la réalisation d'un objet essentiel de la LFI : le partage de la valeur de l'actif conformément au régime de priorités établi par la loi. L'AER ne peut pas non plus atteindre indirectement le même résultat en imposant des conditions à la vente des biens de valeur de Redwater. Le régime provincial de délivrance de permis sert en fait de mécanisme de recouvrement de créances à l'endroit d'une société en faillite : il empêche GTL de s'acquitter de ses obligations à titre de syndic si les réclamations environnementales de l'AER ne sont pas réglées. Par conséquent, il devrait être déclaré inopérant en ce qui concerne Redwater, suivant le second volet du critère de la prépondérance, l'entrave à la réalisation d'un objet fédéral.

II. Background

II. Contexte

[171] Redwater was a publicly traded oil and gas company that operated wells, pipelines and other facilities in central Alberta. In mid-2014, it suffered a number of financial setbacks following a series of acquisitions and unsuccessful drilling initiatives. As a result, it became unable to meet its obligations to its largest secured creditor, ATB Financial, which commenced enforcement proceedings.

[171] Redwater était une société pétrolière et gazière cotée en bourse qui exploitait des puits, des pipelines et d'autres installations dans le centre de l'Alberta. Au milieu de l'année 2014, elle a connu plusieurs déboires financiers à la suite d'une série d'acquisitions et d'initiatives de forage infructueuses. Elle n'a donc plus été en mesure de respecter ses obligations envers son plus important créancier garanti, ATB Financial, qui a introduit une procédure d'exécution.

[172] GTL was appointed as Redwater's receiver on May 12, 2015. Upon its appointment, but before taking possession of any AER-licensed properties, GTL carried out an analysis of the economic viability and marketability of Redwater's assets. It determined that only a portion of the company's properties was actually saleable and that it would not be in Redwater's best interests — or in the interests of its creditors — for GTL, as receiver, to take possession of the non-producing properties. It therefore informed the AER on July 3, 2015, that it would take possession of only 20 of Redwater's 127 licensed wells and facilities. On November 2, 2015, shortly after its appointment as trustee, GTL again disclaimed the same non-producing properties it had previously renounced in its capacity as receiver.

[173] According to GTL's assessment, Redwater's valuable assets were worth $4.152 million and would generate significant value for the estate's creditors if they were sold at auction. On the other hand, the net value of the non-producing properties was -$4.705 million, reflecting the extensive abandonment and reclamation liabilities owed to the AER. The net value of the estate as a whole was -$0.553 million. This was why, in GTL's business judgment, a sale of all the estate's assets together was simply not realistic.

[174] The AER responded to GTL's first disclaimer notice by issuing the Abandonment Orders which required Redwater to carry out environmental work on the non-producing properties that GTL had disclaimed. But the AER's enforcement efforts were not limited to the debtor's estate itself. In its initial application that spurred this litigation, the AER filed suit against GTL seeking three principal remedies: (1) a declaration that GTL's disclaimers were void and unenforceable; (2) an order compelling GTL, in its capacity as receiver, to comply with the Abandonment Orders issued in relation to a portion of Redwater's assets; and (3) an order compelling GTL to fulfill its obligations as licensee under Alberta's legislation, specifically in relation to the abandonment, reclamation and remediation of Redwater's licensed properties.

[175] The genesis of this litigation, then, was a clear and forceful effort by the AER to require GTL société était réellement vendable, et qu'il ne serait pas dans l'intérêt supérieur de Redwater — ni dans l'intérêt de ses créanciers — que GTL, à titre de séquestre, prenne possession des biens inexploités. Elle a donc informé l'AER le 3 juillet 2015 qu'elle prendrait possession de seulement 20 des 127 puits et installations de Redwater visés par un permis. Le 2 novembre 2015, peu après sa nomination à titre de syndic, GTL a encore une fois renoncé aux biens inexploités auxquels elle avait déjà renoncé en sa qualité de séquestre.

[175] Le présent litige tire donc son origine d'un effort manifeste et vigoureux de l'AER dans le but to satisfy Redwater's environmental obligations. To understand why the AER took that approach, it is important to note that it had provincial law on its side. Under the Oil and Gas Conservation Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. O-6 ("OGCA") and the Pipeline Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. P-15 ("PLA"), the term "licensee" is defined to include receivers and trustees in bankruptcy (OGCA, s. 1(1)(cc); PLA, s. 1(1)(n)). As a result, insolvency professionals become subject to the same regulatory obligations as the insolvent debtor itself by effectively stepping into its shoes. They can therefore be compelled to carry out abandonment and reclamation work on the direction of the AER (OGCA, s. 27; PLA, s. 23; Oil and Gas Conservation Rules, Alta. Reg. 151/71 ("OGCA Rules"), s. 3.012); to reimburse anyone else who does abandonment work (OGCA, ss. 29 and 30; PLA, s. 25); to pay the orphan fund levy for any of the debtor's assets (OGCA, s. 74); to provide a security deposit, under certain circumstances, at the AER's request (OGCA Rules, s. 1.100(2)); and to pay a fine for failing to comply with an order made by the AER (OGCA, ss. 108 and 110(1); PLA, ss. 52(2) and 54(1)). These liabilities are all personal in nature. Other comparable legislation expressly limits the liability of insolvency professionals. For example, the Environmental Protection and Enhancement Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. E-12, states that the liability of a receiver or trustee under an environmental protection order "is limited to the value of the assets that the person is administering", absent "gross negligence or wilful misconduct" (s. 240(3)). Alberta's oil and gas statutory regime, however, does not include such a clause protecting receivers and trustees. And as the AER's initial application makes clear, the AER itself viewed these obligations as personal. This was why it sued GTL to compel it, among other things, to comply with its obligations as a licensee under provincial law.

d'obliger GTL à acquitter les obligations environnementales de Redwater. Pour comprendre pourquoi l'AER a agi de la sorte, il est important de souligner que l'AER avait la loi provinciale de son côté. Aux termes de l'Oil and Gas Conservation Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. O-6 (« OGCA »), et de la Pipeline Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. P-15 (« PLA »), le terme [TRADUCTION] « titulaire de permis » est défini de façon à inclure les séquestres et les syndics de faillite (OGCA, al. 1(1)(cc); PLA, al. 1(1)(n)). Les professionnels de l'insolvabilité deviennent par le fait même assujettis aux mêmes obligations réglementaires que le débiteur insolvable lui-même, en se mettant de fait à sa place. Ils peuvent donc être contraints d'exécuter des travaux d'abandon et de remise en état sur ordre de l'AER (OGCA, art. 27; PLA, art. 23; Oil and Gas Conservation Rules, Alta. Reg. 151/71 (« Règles prises en vertu de l'OGCA »), art. 3.012), de rembourser n'importe qui d'autre effectue les travaux d'abandon (OGCA, art. 29 et 30; PLA, art. 25), de payer au fonds pour les puits orphelins la redevance requise à l'égard de n'importe lequel des biens du débiteur (OGCA, art. 74), de verser un dépôt de garantie, dans certaines circonstances, à la demande de l'AER (Règles prises en vertu de l'OGCA, par. 1.100(2)) et de payer une amende pour avoir omis de se conformer à une ordonnance de l'AER (OGCA, art. 108 et par. 110(1); PLA, par. 52(2) et 54(1)). Ces obligations sont toutes de nature personnelle. D'autres lois comparables limitent expressément la responsabilité des professionnels de l'insolvabilité. Par exemple, l'Environmental Protection and Enhancement Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. E-12, prévoit que la responsabilité du séquestre ou du syndic à l'égard d'une ordonnance de protection environnementale [TRADUCTION] « ne dépasse pas la valeur des biens qu'administre cette personne », en l'absence de « négligence grave ou d'inconduite délibérée » (par. 240(3)). Le régime législatif albertain en matière de pétrole et de gaz ne contient toutefois aucune disposition semblable visant à protéger les séquestres et les syndics. Et, comme il ressort de sa demande initiale, l'AER considérait lui-même ces obligations comme des obligations personnelles. C'est pourquoi il a poursuivi GTL afin de le contraindre, notamment, à respecter les obligations que lui impose la loi provinciale en tant que titulaire de permis.

[176] The AER also exercised its enforcement power in another capacity. In addition to issuing the Abandonment Orders, the AER imposed restrictions and conditions on the sale of Redwater's assets — conditions that effectively required GTL to satisfy those same obligations before a sale could be approved. Thus, even if GTL defied the AER's request to abandon the non-producing properties, it would still be unable to discharge its duties as receiver and trustee.

[177] Both the chambers judge and the majority of the Court of Appeal found in favour of GTL on each prong of the paramountcy test, concluding that there is an operational conflict and a frustration of purpose (2016 ABQB 278, 33 Alta. L.R. (6th) 221; 2017 ABCA 124, 50 Alta. L.R. (6th) 1). They agreed with GTL and ATB Financial that the provisions of Alberta's statutory regime permitting the AER to enforce compliance with Redwater's environmental abandonment and reclamation obligations were constitutionally inoperative during bankruptcy. The AER and the Orphan Well Association ("OWA") then appealed to this Court.

III. Analysis

[178] The Constitution Act, 1867, grants the federal government exclusive jurisdiction to regulate matters relating to bankruptcy and insolvency (s. 91(21)). In the exercise of that jurisdiction, Parliament enacted the BIA, "a complete code governing bankruptcy" (Alberta (Attorney General) v. Moloney, 2015 SCC 51, [2015] 3 S.C.R. 327, at para. 40; see also Husky Oil Operations Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue, [1995] 3 S.C.R. 453, at para. 85). The BIA outlines, among other things, the powers, duties and functions of receivers and trustees responsible for administering bankrupt or insolvent estates and the scope of claims that fall within the bankruptcy process (see BIA, ss. 16 to 38 and 121 to 154).

[179] Although the operation of the BIA "depends upon the survival of various provincial rights" (Moloney, at para. 40), this is true only to the extent that "substantive provisions of any [provincial] law or [176] L'AER a également exercé son pouvoir de faire appliquer la loi à un autre titre. En plus de rendre les ordonnances d'abandon, l'AER a imposé des restrictions et conditions à la vente des biens de Redwater — conditions qui obligent en fait GTL à satisfaire auxdites obligations avant même qu'une vente puisse être approuvée. Par conséquent, même si GTL n'accédait pas à la demande de l'AER visant l'abandon des biens inexploités, il ne serait toujours pas en mesure de s'acquitter de ses obligations à titre de séquestre et de syndic.

III. Analyse

[178] La Loi constitutionnelle de 1867 confère au gouvernement fédéral la compétence exclusive pour réglementer la faillite et l'insolvabilité (par. 91(21)). Dans l'exercice de cette compétence, le Parlement a édicté la LFI, « un code complet en matière de faillite » (Alberta (Procureur général) c. Moloney, 2015 CSC 51, [2015] 3 R.C.S. 327, par. 40; voir aussi Husky Oil Operations Ltd. c. Ministre du Revenu national, [1995] 3 R.C.S. 453, par. 85). La LFI expose notamment les pouvoirs, obligations et attributions des séquestres et syndics chargés d'administrer l'actif du failli ou l'actif insolvable ainsi que la portée des réclamations qui relèvent du processus de faillite (voir LFI, art. 16 à 38 et 121 à 154).

[179] Quoique l'application de la LFI « dépend[e] de la subsistance de divers droits provinciaux » (Moloney, par. 40), ce n'est vrai que dans la mesure où « les dispositions de droit substantif d'une [. . .] loi ou statute relating to property . . . are not in conflict with [the BIA]" (BIA, s. 72(1)). When a conflict arises, the BIA necessarily prevails (Moloney, at paras. 16 and 29; Saskatchewan (Attorney General) v. Lemare Lake Logging Ltd., 2015 SCC 53, [2015] 3 S.C.R. 419, at para. 16). This reflects the constitutional principle that federal laws are paramount (Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 3, at para. 32).

[180] The respondents in this appeal — GTL and ATB Financial — posit two distinct conflicts between the federal and provincial legislation. First, they argue that the BIA grants receivers and trustees the power to disclaim any interest in any real property, even where they are not at risk of personal liability by virtue of their possession of the property. This disclaimer power enables trustees to renounce valueless and liability-laden property of a bankrupt in pursuit of their primary goal, which is to maximize global recovery for all creditors. The respondents argue that GTL validly disclaimed the non-producing assets and therefore cannot be held responsible for carrying out the Abandonment Orders; nor can the AER make any sale of Redwater's assets conditional on the fulfillment of obligations with respect to the disclaimed properties.

[181] Second, they argue that the AER's Abandonment Orders constitute "claims provable in bankruptcy". In their view, it would undermine the BIA's priority scheme if the AER could assert those claims outside the bankruptcy process — and ahead of the estate's secured creditors — whether by compelling GTL to carry out those orders or by making the sale of Redwater's valuable assets conditional on the fulfillment of those obligations.

[182] In my view, GTL and ATB Financial have satisfied their burden of demonstrating a genuine inconsistency between federal and provincial law under both branches of the paramountcy test. In what follows, I first discuss the operational conflict that arises between Alberta's regulatory regime and s. 14.06(4) of the BIA. I then turn to the second règle de droit [provinciale] concernant la propriété [. . .] [ne sont pas] incompatibles avec la [LFI] » (LFI, par. 72(1)). Lorsqu'il y a un conflit, la LFI doit prévaloir (Moloney, par. 16 et 29; Saskatchewan (Procureur général) c. Lemare Lake Logging Ltd., 2015 CSC 53, [2015] 3 R.C.S. 419, par. 16). Cela reflète le principe constitutionnel selon lequel les lois fédérales sont prépondérantes (Banque canadienne de l'Ouest c. Alberta, 2007 CSC 22, [2007] 2 R.C.S. 3, par. 32).

[180] Les intimées en l'espèce — GTL et ATB Financial — plaident qu'il existe deux conflits distincts entre la législation fédérale et la législation provinciale. D'abord, ils soutiennent que la LFI confère aux séquestres et aux syndics le pouvoir de renoncer à tout intérêt sur un bien réel, même lorsque le séquestre ou le syndic ne risque pas d'engager sa responsabilité personnelle du fait qu'il est en possession du bien. Ce pouvoir de renonciation permet aux syndics de renoncer aux biens sans valeur et grevés d'engagements du failli en vue d'atteindre leur objectif premier : maximiser le recouvrement global pour tous les créanciers. Les intimées soutiennent que GTL a valablement renoncé aux biens inexploités et qu'il ne peut donc être tenu responsable de l'exécution des ordonnances d'abandon; l'AER ne peut pas non plus faire dépendre la vente des biens de Redwater de l'acquittement d'obligations à l'égard des biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation.

[181] Ensuite, ils soutiennent que les ordonnances d'abandon de l'AER constituent des « réclamations prouvables en matière de faillite ». À leur avis, ce serait saper le régime de priorités établi par la LFI que de permettre à l'AER de faire valoir ces réclamations en dehors du processus de faillite — et en priorité par rapport aux créanciers garantis de l'actif — que ce soit en obligeant GTL à exécuter ces ordonnances, ou en faisant dépendre la vente des biens de valeur de Redwater de l'acquittement de ces obligations.

[182] À mon avis, GTL et ATB Financial se sont acquittés de leur fardeau de démontrer qu'il existe une incompatibilité véritable entre la loi fédérale et la loi provinciale selon les deux volets du test de la prépondérance. Dans les paragraphes qui suivent, j'analyse d'abord le conflit d'application qui existe entre le régime de réglementation albertain et le branch of the paramountcy analysis, frustration of purpose.

A. Operational Conflict

[183] The first branch of the paramountcy test is operational conflict. An operational conflict arises where "it is impossible to comply with both laws" (Moloney, at para. 18) — "where one enactment says 'yes' and the other says 'no'", or where "the same citizens are being told to do inconsistent things" (Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 161, at p. 191; see also Lemare Lake, at para. 18).

[184] In essence, an operational conflict analysis is an exercise in statutory interpretation: the Court must ascertain the meaning of each competing enactment in order to determine whether dual compliance is possible. Although this interpretation exercise takes place within the guiding confines of cooperative federalism, a concept that allows for some interplay and overlap between federal and provincial legislation, this Court recently set out the limits to this concept:

> [C]ooperative federalism may be used neither to "override nor [to] modify the division of powers itself" (Rogers Communications Inc. v. Châteauguay (City), [2016 SCC 23, [2016] 1 S.C.R. 467] at para. 39), nor to impose "limits on the otherwise valid exercise of legislative competence" (Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canada (Attorney General), [2015 SCC 14, [2015] 1 S.C.R. 693] at para. 19; Reference re Securities Act, [2011 SCC 66, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 837] at paras. 61-62). It cannot, therefore, be used to make ultra vires legislation intra vires. By fostering cooperation between Parliament and the legislatures within the existing constitutional boundaries, however, cooperative federalism works to support, rather than supplant, the division of legislative powers (see: Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 3, at para. 22).

(Reference re Pan-Canadian Securities Regulation, 2018 SCC 48, [2018] 3 S.C.R. 189, at para. 18)

[185] Properly understood, cooperative federalism operates as a straightforward interpretive par. 14.06(4) de la LFI. J'examine ensuite le second volet de l'analyse relative à la prépondérance, l'entrave à la réalisation d'un objet fédéral.

A. Conflit d'application

[183] Le premier volet du test de la prépondérance est le conflit d'application. Il y a conflit d'application lorsqu'« il est impossible de respecter les deux lois » (Moloney, par. 18) — « lorsqu'une loi dit "oui" et que l'autre dit "non" », ou lorsque l'« on demande aux mêmes citoyens d'accomplir des actes incompatibles » (Multiple Access Ltd. c. McCutcheon, [1982] 2 R.C.S. 161, p. 191; voir aussi Lemare Lake, par. 18).

[184] L'analyse relative au conflit d'application relève essentiellement de l'interprétation des lois : la Cour doit déterminer le sens de chaque loi concurrente afin de décider s'il est possible de respecter les deux lois. Bien que cette démarche d'interprétation s'effectue à l'intérieur du cadre directeur du fédéralisme coopératif, une notion qui permet une certaine interaction et un certain chevauchement entre la loi fédérale et la loi provinciale, notre Cour a récemment fixé les limites de cette notion :

(Renvoi relatif à la réglementation pancanadienne des valeurs mobilières, 2018 CSC 48, [2018] 3 R.C.S. 189, par. 18)

presumption — one that supports, rather than supplants, the modern approach to statutory interpretation. This Court recognized as much in Moloney, where Gascon J. wrote that courts should "favour an interpretation of the federal legislation that allows the concurrent operation of both laws" on the basis of a presumption "that Parliament intends its laws to co-exist with provincial laws" (para. 27). But where "the proper meaning of the provision" — one that is not limited to "a mere literal reading of the provisions at issue" — cannot support a harmonious interpretation, it is beyond this Court's power to create harmony where Parliament did not intend it (para. 23; see also Pan-Canadian Securities Regulation, at para. 18; Lemare Lake, at paras. 78-79, per Côté J., dissenting, but not on this point).

[186] In my view, my colleague places undue reliance on the principle of cooperative federalism to narrow the scope of federal law and find a harmonious interpretation where no plausible one exists. Courts must be especially careful about using cooperative federalism to interpret legislative provisions narrowly in a case like this where Parliament expressly envisioned that the disclaimer right could come into conflict with provincial law. This is evident from the very first line of s. 14.06(4), which states that the disclaimer power applies "[n]otwithstanding anything in any federal or provincial law". The notion that judicial restraint should compel a different interpretation is therefore belied by the fact that Parliament considered, acknowledged and accepted the potential for conflict. To rely on judicial restraint, then, to avoid a conflict between federal and provincial law is to disregard Parliament's express instruction. Simply put, this is not a case where a drastic power is to be assumed from the statute; it is one where such a power is clearly provided for. In my view, reliance on cooperative federalism must never result in an interpretation of s. 14.06(4) that is inconsonant with its language, context and purpose.

d'interprétation — qui appuie, sans la supplanter, la méthode moderne d'interprétation des lois. La Cour l'a reconnu dans l'arrêt Moloney, où le juge Gascon a écrit que les tribunaux doivent « favoris[er] une interprétation de la loi fédérale permettant une application concurrente des deux lois » en se fondant sur la présomption « que le Parlement a voulu que ses lois coexistent avec les lois provinciales » (par. 27). Mais lorsque « le sens qu'il convient de donner à la disposition » — sens qui ne se limite pas à « une lecture littérale de la disposition en cause » — ne peut appuyer une interprétation harmonieuse, la Cour n'a pas le pouvoir de créer l'harmonie là où le Parlement n'a pas eu l'intention de le faire (Moloney, par. 23; voir aussi Réglementation pancanadienne des valeurs mobilières, par. 18; Lemare Lake, par. 78-79, la juge Côté, dissidente, mais non sur ce point).

[186] À mon avis, mon collègue se fonde indûment sur le principe du fédéralisme coopératif pour limiter la portée d'une loi fédérale et trouver une interprétation harmonieuse là où il n'en existe aucune qui soit plausible. Les tribunaux doivent être très prudents lorsqu'il s'agit de se fonder sur le fédéralisme coopératif pour interpréter étroitement des dispositions législatives dans un cas comme l'espèce, où le Parlement a expressément prévu que le droit de renonciation pouvait entrer en conflit avec le droit provincial. Cela ressort à l'évidence de la toute première ligne du par. 14.06(4), qui énonce que le pouvoir de renonciation s'applique « [p]ar dérogation au droit fédéral et provincial ». L'idée selon laquelle la retenue judiciaire devrait commander une interprétation différente est donc contredite par le fait que le Parlement a envisagé, reconnu et accepté la possibilité de conflit. Recourir à la retenue judiciaire pour éviter un conflit entre le droit fédéral et le droit provincial équivaut donc à faire fi de la directive expresse du Parlement. Autrement dit, il ne s'agit pas en l'espèce d'un cas où un pouvoir draconien doit être déduit de la loi; il s'agit d'un cas où un tel pouvoir est clairement prévu. À mon avis, le recours au principe du fédéralisme coopératif ne doit jamais donner lieu à une interprétation du par. 14.06(4) qui est incompatible avec son libellé, son contexte et son objet.

[187] It is undisputed in this appeal that Alberta law does not recognize GTL's disclaimers of assets licensed by the AER as enforceable to the extent that they relieve GTL of the obligation to satisfy the environmental liabilities associated with the assets. As receiver and trustee, GTL steps into Redwater's shoes as a "licensee" under provincial law; and, GTL submits, it can therefore, without the disclaimers, be held liable for the debtor's abandonment and reclamation obligations in the same manner as Redwater itself. The question, then, is whether the BIA permits GTL to disclaim these properties and what legal effect results from such disclaimer.

[188] Section 14.06 of the BIA, reproduced in full in the appendix, outlines a trustee's powers and duties with respect to environmental liabilities and the disclaimer of property. Specifically, s. 14.06(4) states that the trustee is "not personally liable for failure to comply" with an order requiring it to "remedy any environmental condition or environmental damage affecting property involved in a bankruptcy", provided that the trustee "abandons, disposes of or otherwise releases any interest in any real property . . . affected by the condition or damage" within the statutory timeframes. The timing of GTL's disclaimers is not at issue here.

[189] My colleague concludes that, regardless of whether GTL could have properly invoked the disclaimer power in this case, the effect of any such disclaimer would simply be to protect it from personal liability. He states that, in any event, the exercise of the disclaimer power was unnecessary in this case because GTL was already fully protected from personal liability through the operation of s. 14.06(2). Further, he argues, because the AER has not sought to hold GTL personally liable, there is no conflict between federal and provincial law on the facts of this case. With respect, I disagree with this approach to the language of the BIA, which does not properly account for fundamental principles of constitutional and insolvency law. I will begin by addressing the proper scope of the disclaimer power provided to trustees, explaining that the actual existence of a risk of personal liability is not a necessary condition for [187] Il n'est pas contesté en l'espèce que la loi albertaine ne reconnaît pas de force exécutoire aux renonciations de GTL à des biens visés par un permis délivré par l'AER dans la mesure où elles soustraient GTL à l'obligation de respecter les engagements environnementaux liés aux biens. À titre de séquestre et de syndic, GTL remplace Redwater en tant que « titulaire de permis » selon la loi provinciale, et GTL soutient qu'il peut par conséquent, en l'absence des renonciations, être tenu responsable des obligations d'abandon et de remise en état de la débitrice au même titre que Redwater elle-même. Il s'agit donc de savoir si la LFI autorise GTL à renoncer à ces biens et quel est l'effet de cette renonciation en droit.

[188] L'article 14.06 de la LFI, reproduit intégralement en annexe, décrit les pouvoirs et responsabilités du syndic quant aux engagements environnementaux et à la renonciation aux biens. Plus précisément, le par. 14.06(4) prévoit que le syndic est « dégagé de toute responsabilité personnelle découlant du non-respect » d'une ordonnance l'obligeant à « répar[er] [. . .] tout fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement et touchant un bien visé par une faillite », pourvu que le syndic « abandonne [. . .] tout intérêt sur le bien réel en cause, en dispose ou s'en dessaisit » dans les délais prévus par la loi. Le moment des renonciations de GTL n'est pas en litige en l'espèce.

[189] Mon collègue conclut que, peu importe si GTL avait pu invoquer à juste titre le pouvoir de renonciation en l'espèce, cette renonciation a simplement pour effet de le dégager de toute responsabilité personnelle. Selon lui, en tout état de cause, il était inutile d'exercer le pouvoir de renonciation dans la présente affaire parce que GTL était déjà entièrement à l'abri de toute responsabilité personnelle par application du par. 14.06(2). Il soutient en outre que, comme l'AER n'a pas cherché à tenir GTL personnellement responsable, il n'y a aucun conflit entre la loi fédérale et la loi provinciale en l'espèce. Avec égards, je ne suis pas d'accord avec cette interprétation du libellé de la LFI, qui ne tient pas dûment compte des principes fondamentaux du droit constitutionnel et du droit de l'insolvabilité. Je commencerai par traiter de la portée que doit avoir le pouvoir de renonciation accordé aux syndics, en the exercise of this power and that, while protection from personal liability is one effect of a valid disclaimer, it is not the only one. In my view, this interpretation makes s. 14.06(4) consistent with the remainder of the section and is therefore to be preferred. With respect, I do not accept that Parliament intended s. 14.06(4) simply to protect trustees from the exact same liability that it had already addressed through s. 14.06(2). Subsection (4) must have a meaningful role to play within Parliament's bankruptcy and insolvency regime; I reject the suggestion that Parliament crafted a superfluous provision. I will also deal briefly with the AER's argument that the disclaimer power is not available at all in the context of Alberta's oil and gas statutory regime. In my view, it is available in this context.

(1) The Power to Disclaim Under Section 14.06(4)

[190] The "natural meaning which appears when the provision is simply read through" (Canadian Pacific Air Lines Ltd. v. Canadian Air Line Pilots Assn., [1993] 3 S.C.R. 724, at p. 735) is that s. 14.06(4) assumes and incorporates a pre-existing common law right to disclaim property in the context of bankruptcy and insolvency (see L. Silverstein, "Rejection of Executory Contracts in Bankruptcy and Reorganization" (1964), 31 U. Chi. L. Rev. 467, at pp. 468-72; New Skeena Forest Products Inc. v. Don Hull & Sons Contracting Ltd., 2005 BCCA 154, 251 D.L.R. (4th) 328, at paras. 24-31; Re Thompson Knitting Co., Ltd., [1925] 2 D.L.R. 1007 (Ont. S.C. (App. Div.), at p. 1008). This right is in keeping with the fundamental objective of court officers in insolvencies: the maximization of recovery for creditors as a whole by realizing the estate's valuable assets. By allowing trustees to disclaim assets with substantial liabilities, this power enables them to administer the estate in the most efficient manner and to avoid significant costs of administration that would reduce creditor recovery. Section 14.06(4) expliquant que l'existence d'un risque de responsabilité personnelle ne constitue pas une condition essentielle à l'exercice de ce pouvoir et que, même si la protection contre toute responsabilité personnelle est un effet d'une renonciation valide, ce n'est pas le seul. À mon avis, cette interprétation fait en sorte que le par. 14.06(4) s'accorde avec le reste de l'article et il convient donc de la privilégier. Avec égards, je n'accepte pas que le Parlement voulait par ce paragraphe mettre simplement les syndics à l'abri de la même responsabilité, ce qu'il avait déjà fait au par. 14.06(2). Le paragraphe (4) doit avoir un rôle significatif à jouer dans le régime de faillite et d'insolvabilité du Parlement; je rejette la thèse selon laquelle le Parlement a conçu une disposition superflue. Je me pencherai aussi brièvement sur l'argument de l'AER selon lequel il n'est pas du tout possible d'exercer le pouvoir de renonciation dans le contexte du régime législatif de l'Alberta en matière de pétrole et de gaz. J'estime qu'il peut être exercé dans ce contexte.

(1) Le pouvoir de renonciation en vertu du par. 14.06(4)

[190] Le « sens naturel qui se dégage de la simple lecture de la disposition dans son ensemble » (Lignes aériennes Canadien Pacifique Ltée c. Assoc. canadienne des pilotes de lignes aériennes, [1993] 3 R.C.S. 724, p. 735) est que le par. 14.06(4) présume et incorpore un droit préexistant en common law de renoncer à des biens dans le contexte de la faillite et de l'insolvabilité (voir L. Silverstein, « Rejection of Executory Contracts in Bankruptcy and Reorganization » (1964), 31 U. Chi. L. Rev. 467, p. 468-472; New Skeena Forest Products Inc. c. Don Hull & Sons Contracting Ltd., 2005 BCCA 154, 251 D.L.R. (4th) 328, par. 24-31; Re Thompson Knitting Co., Ltd., [1925] 2 D.L.R. 1007 (C.S. Ont. (Div. app.), p. 1008). Ce droit est en accord avec l'objectif fondamental poursuivi par les officiers de la cour en insolvabilité : maximiser le recouvrement au bénéfice de l'ensemble des créanciers par la réalisation des éléments de valeur de l'actif. En permettant aux syndics de renoncer à des biens grevés d'engagements substantiels, ce pouvoir donne aux syndics la faculté d'administrer l'actif le plus efficacement recognizes and supports this foundational principle of insolvency law.

[191] This reading offers the clearest and most obvious explanation for the manner in which the provision is drafted, in that it plainly describes a result or legal effect of disclaimer: a trustee "is not personally liable for failure to comply" with an environmental order "if . . . the trustee . . . abandons, disposes of or otherwise releases any interest in any real property" (s. 14.06(4)). We should interpret s. 14.06(4) as authorizing the act of disclaimer in light of the principle that "[t]he legislator does not speak in vain" (Bell ExpressVu Limited Partnership v. Rex, 2002 SCC 42, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 559, at para. 37, citing Attorney General of Quebec v. Carrières Ste-Thérèse Ltée, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 831, at p. 838). If a trustee did not have the power to disclaim property, and if that power were not recognized and provided for in the statute, a provision describing the effect of such a disclaimer would serve no purpose.

[192] The AER submits that property may be disclaimed only where it is necessary for a trustee to avoid personal liability with respect to an environmental order. This interpretation entirely inverts the language of the provision, turning a stated effect of disclaimer into a necessary condition that circumscribes the exercise of the power. The operative clauses are neither written nor ordered in this manner. Rather, s. 14.06(4) expresses the disclaimer right in unqualified terms and emphasizes that a trustee may not be held liable whenever that right is exercised. If Parliament truly intended to condition the right to disclaim property on the actual existence of a risk of personal liability, "it is hard to conceive of a more convoluted and sibylline way of stating something that could be so easily expressed in clear and direct terms" (Mitchell v. Peguis Indian Band, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 85, at p. 124).

possible et leur épargne des frais considérables d'administration qui réduiraient le recouvrement au profit des créanciers. Le paragraphe 14.06(4) reconnaît et appuie ce principe fondamental du droit de l'insolvabilité.

[191] Cette interprétation offre l'explication la plus claire et la plus évidente de la façon dont la disposition est rédigée, en ce qu'elle décrit simplement un résultat ou effet juridique d'une renonciation : le syndic est « dégagé de toute responsabilité personnelle découlant du non-respect » d'une ordonnance environnementale « si [. . .] il abandonne [. . .] tout intérêt sur le bien réel en cause, en dispose ou s'en dessaisit » (al. 14.06(4)). Nous devons interpréter le par. 14.06(4) comme autorisant l'acte de renonciation à la lumière du principe selon lequel « le législateur ne parle pas pour ne rien dire » (Bell ExpressVu Limited Partnership c. Rex, 2002 CSC 42, [2002] 2 R.C.S. 559, par. 37, citant Procureur général du Québec c. Carrières Ste-Thérèse Ltée, [1985] 1 R.C.S. 831, p. 838). Si le syndic n'avait pas le pouvoir de renoncer à des biens et si ce pouvoir n'était pas reconnu et prévu dans la loi, une disposition décrivant l'effet d'une telle renonciation n'aurait aucune utilité.

[192] L'AER soutient qu'il est possible de renoncer à un bien uniquement lorsque cela est nécessaire pour que le syndic échappe à toute responsabilité personnelle à l'égard d'une ordonnance environnementale. Cette interprétation inverse complètement le libellé de la disposition, transformant un effet énoncé de la renonciation en condition essentielle circonscrivant l'exercice du pouvoir. Les dispositions applicables ne sont ni rédigées ni ordonnées de cette façon. Le paragraphe 14.06(4) exprime plutôt le droit de renonciation en des termes qui ne comportent aucune restriction et fait ressortir que le syndic ne peut être tenu responsable quand ce droit est exercé. Si le Parlement avait vraiment voulu rendre le droit de renoncer à un bien tributaire de l'existence d'un risque de responsabilité personnelle, « il est difficile d'imaginer une façon plus compliquée et sibylline d'exprimer quelque chose qui pouvait être dit si facilement dans des termes clairs et directs » (Mitchell c. Bande indienne Peguis, [1990] 2 R.C.S. 85, p. 124).

[193] My colleague adopts a slightly different approach. Rather than accepting the argument that the risk of personal liability is a necessary condition to the exercise of the disclaimer power in s. 14.06(4), he concludes that protection from personal liability for non-compliance with environmental orders is the only consequence of a valid disclaimer. Therefore, he says, the bankrupt's estate is not relieved of its obligations under the environmental orders and the trustee can be compelled to expend the entirety of the estate's assets on compliance. With respect, this also cannot be the correct reading of the subsection. Nor do I believe that the brief references to s. 14.06(4) in GMAC Commercial Credit Corp. — Canada v. T.C.T. Logistics Inc., 2006 SCC 35, [2006] 2 S.C.R. 123 — a case in which this subsection was not directly in issue and this Court was not tasked with interpreting it in any meaningful way — provide much assistance in this case.

[193] Mon collègue adopte une approche légèrement différente. Au lieu d'accepter l'argument selon lequel le risque d'engager la responsabilité personnelle est une condition essentielle à l'exercice du pouvoir de renonciation prévu au par. 14.06(4), il conclut que la protection contre toute responsabilité personnelle pour non-respect d'ordonnance environnementale est l'unique conséquence d'une renonciation valide. Par conséquent, dit-il, l'actif du failli n'est pas déchargé des obligations que lui imposent les ordonnances environnementales et on peut contraindre le syndic à consacrer la valeur entière de l'actif au respect des ordonnances. Avec égards, il ne peut s'agir de la lecture correcte du par. 14.06(4). Je ne crois pas non plus que les brèves mentions de ce paragraphe dans Société de crédit commercial GMAC — Canada c. T.C.T. Logistics Inc., 2006 CSC 35, [2006] 2 R.C.S. 123, une affaire où le par. 14.06(4) n'était pas directement en cause et où notre Cour n'avait pas à l'interpréter de façon significative, se révèlent fort utiles en l'espèce.

[194] I accept that the opening words of s. 14.06(4) refer to the personal liability of the trustee. However, when the words of the subsection are read "in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament", as the courts are required to do (see Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 27; Bell ExpressVu, at para. 26, quoting E. Driedger, Construction of Statutes (2nd ed. 1983), at p. 87), their meaning becomes apparent.

[194] Certes, le début du par. 14.06(4) parle de la responsabilité personnelle du syndic. Cependant, lorsqu'on lit les termes du paragraphe « dans leur contexte global en suivant le sens ordinaire et grammatical qui s'harmonise avec l'[économie] de la loi, l'objet de la loi et l'intention du législateur », tel que doivent le faire les tribunaux (voir Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re), [1998] 1 R.C.S. 27; Bell ExpressVu, par. 26, citant E. Driedger, Construction of Statutes (2e éd. 1983), p. 87), leur sens devient apparent.

[195] Section 14.06(4) both assumes and relies on the common law power of trustees to disclaim assets, a power that the majority of the Court of Appeal described as "commonplace" (para. 47). Even my colleague appears to accept that this disclaimer power "predates" s. 14.06(4) itself (at para. 95). Indeed, the majority of the Court of Appeal recognized that "[s]ection 14.06 does not appear to create a right in a trustee to abandon properties without value, but rather assumes that one exists upon bankruptcy" (para. 63). This is the only rational explanation for why Parliament made the effects of s. 14.06(4) available when the trustee "abandons, disposes of or otherwise releases any interest in any real property". While avoiding personal liability is one effect of the appropriate exercise of this power, it is not the only effect. Disclaimer operates to "determine, as from the date of the disclaimer, the rights, interests and liabilities" in the disclaimed property (R. Goode, Principles of Corporate Insolvency Law (4th ed. 2011), at p. 202). By properly disclaiming certain assets, the trustee is relieved of any liabilities associated with the disclaimed property and loses the ability to sell the property for the benefit of the estate. The author Frank Bennett, writing about the administration of the bankrupt's real property, explains that "[w]here the trustee disclaims its interest, the disclaimer releases and disclaims any and all right, title and interest to the property" (Bennett on Creditors' and Debtors' Rights and Remedies (5th ed. 2006), at p. 482 (footnote omitted)).

[196] The majority asserts that s. 14.06(4) does not allow a trustee to "walk away" from assets and the environmental liabilities associated with them (paras. 86, 100 and 102). However, disclaiming property does have precisely this effect. It permits the trustee not to realize assets that would provide no value to the estate's creditors and whose realization would therefore undermine the trustee's fundamental objective. A recognized purpose of the disclaimer power is to "avoid the continuance of liabilities in respect of onerous property which would be payable as expenses of the liquidation, to the detriment of unsecured creditors" (Goode, at p. 200 (footnote omitted)). These principles are no less valid in relation to valueless real property than they are in relation to unprofitable and burdensome executory contracts. Indeed, there has been no suggestion in this appeal, including from the AER and the OWA, that trustees can never disclaim onerous real property.

[197] This explanation of the disclaimer power is borne out by GTL's actions in the instant case. After assessing the economic viability and marketability of Redwater's assets, GTL determined that it would be most beneficial to Redwater's creditors as a whole if it disclaimed the non-producing, liability-laden assets.

réel en cause, en dispose ou s'en dessaisit ». Bien que la protection contre toute responsabilité personnelle soit un effet de l'exercice régulier de ce pouvoir, ce n'est pas le seul. La renonciation sert à [TRADUCTION] « déterminer, à partir de sa date, les droits, intérêts et engagements » sur le bien auquel le syndic a renoncé (R. Goode, Principles of Corporate Insolvency Law (4e éd. 2011), p. 202). En renonçant à bon droit à certains biens, le syndic est dégagé de toute responsabilité associée aux biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation et ne peut plus vendre les biens au profit de l'actif. Dans le contexte de l'administration des biens réels du failli, l'auteur Frank Bennett explique que [TRADUCTION] « [l]orsque le syndic renonce à son intérêt, la renonciation emporte dessaisissement de tout droit, titre et intérêt sur le bien en question » (Bennett on Creditors' and Debtors' Rights and Remedies (5e éd. 2006), p. 482 (note en bas de page omise)).

[196] Les juges majoritaires font valoir que le par. 14.06(4) n'autorise pas le syndic à « délaisser » des biens ou à se soustraire aux engagements environnementaux qui s'y rattachent (par. 86, 100 et 102). Or, c'est exactement ce qu'entraîne la renonciation à des biens. Elle permet au syndic de ne pas réaliser des biens qui ne seraient pas profitables aux créanciers de l'actif et compromettraient par le fait même son objectif principal. Le pouvoir de renonciation a pour objet reconnu [TRADUCTION] « [d']éviter la poursuite des engagements à l'égard de biens onéreux qui seraient payables aux dépens de la liquidation, et ce, au détriment des créanciers non garantis » (Goode, p. 200 (note en bas de page omise)). Ces principes valent tout autant dans le cas des biens réels sans valeur que dans celui des contrats exécutoires non rentables et contraignants. En fait, personne n'a laissé entendre en l'espèce, pas même l'AER ou l'OWA, que les syndics ne peuvent jamais renoncer à des biens réels onéreux.

[197] Cette explication du pouvoir de renonciation est confirmée par les agissements de GTL en l'espèce. Après avoir estimé la viabilité économique et la qualité marchande des biens de Redwater, GTL a décidé que ce qui serait le plus profitable aux créanciers de Redwater dans leur ensemble, ce serait qu'il renonce aux biens inexploités et grevés d'engagements.

[198] Parliament's recognition of this common law disclaimer power in s. 14.06(4) is not new. The power is also referred to in another section, albeit in a broader context. Section 20(1) of the BIA, provides trustees with the ability to "divest" themselves of "any real property or immovable of the bankrupt" generally. However, the disclaimer power itself does not derive from this section. Nor is a trustee required to invoke s. 20(1) in order to exercise the disclaimer power described in s. 14.06(4), which incorporates that power and spells out the particular effects of its exercise in the specific context of environmental remediation orders. In any event, this Court is not required in this appeal to comment on the full effects of s. 20(1).

[199] Under my colleague's interpretation, it is unclear why Parliament chose to enact the disclaimer mechanism. It is surely true that Parliament could have achieved the same outcome through the use of simpler language. Had it merely intended to protect trustees from personal liability for failure to comply with environmental orders, it could have easily done so directly — in fact, it had already done so in s. 14.06(2). There is no reason why Parliament would have attempted to achieve this relatively straightforward result through the convoluted mechanism of requiring trustees to disclaim property while at the same time not intending such disclaimer to have its "commonplace" common law effects. There is a reason why Parliament has referred to the power to disclaim in s. 14.06(4); we must give effect to this choice and to the words that Parliament has used.

[200] It follows, then, that I respectfully disagree that s. 14.06(4) only protects trustees from specific types of personal liability. But it does not follow that the estate is relieved of its liabilities once a trustee exercises the disclaimer power — a misconception that is pervasive in the AER's submissions and the majority's analysis. The disclaimed property ultimately reverts to the estate at the conclusion of the bankruptcy proceedings, as is the case with unrealized assets (see BIA, s. 40; see also Bennett, at p. 528). The estate remains liable for the remediation obligations attached to the land. Whether the estate has sufficient assets capable of satisfying those liabilities at that point in time is a separate question that is unrelated to the underlying fact of ongoing liability. In any case, the regulatory scheme continues to apply with respect to the retained assets. In referring repeatedly to the idea that disclaimer does not "immunize bankrupt estates from environmental liabilities" (para. 81), the majority misunderstands the impact and purpose of the disclaimer power. The estate itself is not relieved of environmental obligations. As I have noted, the trustee does not take possession of the bankrupt's assets in order to continue the life of the bankrupt indefinitely. The trustee's function is to realize on the estate's valuable assets and maximize global recovery for all creditors. Allowing the trustee to deal only with the value-positive assets to achieve this goal does not relieve the estate of its environmental obligations. As a result, the disclaimer power, and its incorporation into s. 14.06(4), is entirely consistent with the foundational principles of insolvency law.

[198] La reconnaissance par le Parlement, au par. 14.06(4), de ce pouvoir de renonciation en common law n'a rien de nouveau. Le pouvoir est aussi mentionné dans une autre disposition, quoique dans un contexte plus général. Le paragraphe 20(1) de la LFI donne au syndic la possibilité de « renoncer » à « un immeuble ou [à] un bien réel du failli » en général. Le pouvoir de renonciation lui-même ne découle cependant pas de cette disposition. Le syndic n'est pas non plus obligé d'invoquer le par. 20(1) pour exercer le pouvoir de renonciation décrit au par. 14.06(4), lequel incorpore ce pouvoir et expose certains effets de son exercice dans le contexte précis des ordonnances de décontamination environnementale. Quoi qu'il en soit, notre Cour n'a pas à commenter en l'espèce tous les effets du par. 20(1).

[199] Suivant l'interprétation de mon collègue, la raison pour laquelle le Parlement a choisi d'instaurer le mécanisme de renonciation n'est pas claire. Il ne fait aucun doute que le Parlement aurait pu atteindre le même résultat en employant un langage plus simple. Si le Parlement comptait simplement protéger les syndics contre toute responsabilité personnelle découlant du non-respect d'ordonnances environnementales, il aurait pu aisément le faire directement; en fait, il l'avait déjà fait au par. 14.06(2). Il n'y a aucune raison pour laquelle le Parlement aurait tenté d'obtenir ce résultat relativement simple par le mécanisme alambiqué consistant à exiger des syndics qu'ils renoncent aux biens, tout en évitant que cette renonciation ait « couramment » des effets en common law. Il y a une raison pour laquelle le Parlement a mentionné le pouvoir de renonciation au par. 14.06(4); nous devons donner effet à ce choix et aux mots qu'il a utilisés.

[200] Par conséquent, avec égards, je ne suis pas d'accord pour dire que le par. 14.06(4) protège les syndics uniquement contre certains types de responsabilité personnelle. Mais cela ne signifie pas que l'actif est déchargé de ses engagements une fois que le syndic exerce son pouvoir de renonciation — une idée fausse qui est omniprésente dans les observations de l'AER et l'analyse de la majorité. Le bien visé par une renonciation retourne ultimement dans l'actif à l'issue du processus de faillite, comme c'est

[201] In s. 14.06(4), Parliament has expressly referred to this disclaimer power and spelled out the particular effects flowing from its proper exercise. By doing so, it has purposefully incorporated the disclaimer power into its statutory scheme to achieve its desired purposes.

[202] My interpretation of s. 14.06(4) finds ample support in the Hansard evidence. In the debates preceding the enactment of s. 14.06(4) in 1997, Jacques Hains, a director in the Department of Industry Canada who had been involved in drafting the amendments to the BIA, discussed the new options being provided to trustees when faced with an environmental remediation order:

First, he could decide to carry out the order and remedy the environmental damage, the costs to be charged as costs of administration from the bankrupt's assets.

le cas pour les biens non réalisés (voir LFI, art. 40; voir aussi Bennett, p. 528). L'actif demeure responsable des obligations de décontamination qui se rattachent au terrain. La question de savoir si les éléments d'actif sont suffisants pour satisfaire à ces engagements à ce moment précis est une question distincte qui n'a aucun rapport avec le fait sous-jacent de la responsabilité continue. Dans tous les cas, le régime de réglementation continue de s'appliquer aux biens conservés. En exprimant maintes fois l'idée que la renonciation ne met pas « les biens des faillis à l'abri de toute responsabilité environnementale » (par. 81), la majorité se méprend sur l'incidence et l'objet du pouvoir de renonciation. L'actif en soi n'est pas libéré des obligations environnementales. Comme je l'ai noté, le syndic ne prend pas possession des biens du failli en vue de poursuivre indéfiniment la vie du failli. Il a pour fonction de réaliser les biens de valeur de l'actif et de maximiser le recouvrement global au profit de tous les créanciers. Permettre au syndic de s'occuper uniquement des biens de valeur pour atteindre cet objectif ne libère pas l'actif de ses obligations environnementales. Ainsi, le pouvoir de renonciation et son incorporation au par. 14.06(4) s'accordent parfaitement avec les principes fondamentaux du droit de l'insolvabilité.

[201] Au paragraphe 14.06(4), le Parlement a mentionné expressément ce pouvoir de renonciation et exposé les effets particuliers découlant de son exercice approprié. Il a incorporé ainsi à dessein à son régime législatif le pouvoir de renonciation pour en réaliser les objectifs visés.

[202] Mon interprétation du par. 14.06(4) est amplement étayée par les débats parlementaires. Lors des débats qui ont précédé l'adoption du par. 14.06(4) en 1997, Jacques Hains, directeur au ministère d'Industrie Canada qui avait participé à la rédaction des modifications à la LFI, a discuté des nouvelles solutions qui s'offraient aux syndics aux prises avec des ordonnances de décontamination environnementale :

Premièrement, ils pourraient décider de se conformer à l'ordonnance et d'effectuer la dépollution, dont les coûts seraient des coûts d'administration des actifs du failli.

The second option would be to challenge this order to remedy before the appropriate courts; these two options are already to be found in environmental legislation.

The third option would be for the monitor to apply to the appropriate court for a period of stay to assess the economic viability of complying with the order, whether it is worth the trouble and whether the assets are sufficient to cover the clean up costs.

As a fourth option, if he considers that this course has absolutely no economic viability, he may give notification that he has renounced the real property to which the order applies. [Emphasis added.]

(Standing Committee on Industry, Evidence, No. 16, 2nd Sess., 35th Parl., June 11, 1996, at 15:45 to 15:50)

The above passage makes no reference to the personal liability of a trustee who is considering whether to invoke the "fourth option" and disclaim the property. Mr. Hains was clear that the decision to disclaim is based on the "economic viability" of complying with the remediation orders, specifically "whether the assets are sufficient to cover the clean up costs". This makes sense only in the context of the trustee's obligation to maximize economic recovery for creditors.

[203] Several months later, Mr. Hains reiterated this fourth option, explaining that, after assessing the economic viability of complying with the order and "knowing that the bill will be too expensive and will not be economically viable, the trustees are then out of it and can abandon that piece of property subject to the order" (Proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, No. 13, 2nd Sess., 35th Parl., November 4, 1996, at p. 13:68 (emphasis added)). This description plainly reflects the function of the disclaimer power, which does indeed allow trustees to "walk away" from liability-laden assets that will not contribute to maximizing creditor recovery.

[204] Mr. Hains' answers to questions from the House of Commons Standing Committee further Comme deuxième option, ils pourraient contester devant les tribunaux compétents cette ordonnance de dépollution; ces deux options sont déjà prévues dans les lois en matière d'environnement.

La troisième option du praticien consisterait à demander à un tribunal compétent du temps de réflexion pour évaluer s'il est économique de se conformer à l'ordonnance ou non, si cela en vaut la peine et si les actifs sont suffisants pour couvrir les frais de dépollution.

Comme quatrième option, s'il croit que ce n'est absolument pas une décision économique, il pourra signifier qu'il abandonne les sites faisant l'objet de l'ordonnance. [Je souligne.]

(Comité permanent de l'industrie, Témoignages, nº 16, 2e sess., 35e lég., 11 juin 1996, entre 15 h 45 et 15 h 50)

Le passage précité ne mentionne aucunement la responsabilité personnelle du syndic qui se demande s'il y a lieu de se prévaloir de la « quatrième option » et de renoncer au bien. M. Hains a clairement affirmé que la décision de renoncer repose sur la viabilité « économique » du respect des ordonnances de décontamination, tout particulièrement sur la question de savoir « si les actifs sont suffisants pour couvrir les frais de dépollution ». Cela n'est logique que dans le contexte de l'obligation du syndic de maximiser le recouvrement au profit des créanciers.

[203] Plusieurs mois plus tard, M. Hains a répété cette quatrième option, expliquant qu'après avoir évalué s'il est économique de se conformer à l'ordonnance et « sachant que la facture sera trop élevée et que la proposition ne sera donc pas économiquement viable, le syndic peut s'en laver les mains et abandonner la propriété visée par l'ordonnance » (Délibérations du comité sénatorial permanent des Banques et du commerce, nº 13, 2e sess., 35e leg., 4 novembre 1996, p. 13:68 (je souligne)). Cette description traduit clairement la fonction du pouvoir de renonciation, qui permet au syndic de « délaisser » les biens grevés d'engagement qui ne contribuent pas à maximiser le recouvrement au profit des créanciers.

[204] Les réponses de M. Hains aux questions du Comité permanent de la Chambre des communes confirms this interpretation of the disclaimer power. The following exchange is very telling:

Mr. Lebel [Member of Parliament for Chambly]: When a trustee decides to give up the land and realize[s] assets elsewhere, for example by making a profit from the sale of assets, having released himself from the obligation to clean up the land, he would be sharing a dividend realized from other profitable assets and telling the creditors to manage as best they can with the real property. If the creditors are not willing to touch it, he will then tell the government to clean it up. In such a case, each of the bankruptcy creditors would also . . . stand to earn a small dividend, as it is referred to in Bankruptcy Law.

Do you not think that your bill should require the trustee to carry out a clean-up from the assets of the bankruptcy before the dividends are distributed?

Mr. Hains: It's an excellent question that was put to me only three weeks ago by colleagues from the Department of the Environment of Quebec, whom I was meeting to discuss this subject. There were a number of matters of interest to them, particularly the one raised by Mr. Lebel. [Emphasis added.]

(Standing Committee on Industry, June 11, 1996, at 16:55)

Mr. Hains went on to reference various other features of the scheme to assuage Mr. Lebel's concerns and noted that provincial environmental agencies would be responsible for performing the remediation work. Significantly, at no point did Mr. Hains contradict Mr. Lebel's understanding of the bill's provisions. Nor did he take issue with the premise underlying the question: that the new legislation does not "require the trustee to carry out a clean-up from the assets of the bankruptcy" before they are distributed to creditors. Mr. Hains did not claim that provincial regulators might still enforce such a requirement.

[205] This exchange between Mr. Lebel and Mr. Hains clearly demonstrates the collective understanding of all parties that the proposed amendments, containing what would become s. 14.06(4), specifically did not require the trustee to expend confirment elles aussi cette interprétation du pouvoir de renonciation. L'échange qui suit est fort éloquent :

M. Lebel [député de Chambly] : Lorsque le syndic décide de renoncer au terrain et réalise des actifs par ailleurs, par exemple en faisant un profit par la vente d'actifs, s'étant libéré de son obligation de dépolluer le terrain, il partage un dividende réalisé sur d'autres actifs rentables et dit aux créanciers de s'organiser avec le terrain. Si les créanciers ne veulent pas y toucher, il dit au gouvernement de le dépolluer. À ce moment-là, chacun des autres créanciers de la faillite ressort avec un petit dividende. C'est ainsi qu'on appelle cela en droit de la faillite.

Ne pensez-vous pas que votre projet de loi devrait forcer le syndic à faire la décontamination à même les actifs de la faillite avant de distribuer des dividendes?

M. Hains : C'est une excellente question qui m'a été posée il y a à peine trois semaines par des collègues du ministère de l'Environnement du Québec, que j'ai rencontrés pour parler de ce sujet-là. Il y avait des questions qui les intéressaient, notamment celle que M. Lebel soulève. [Je souligne.]

(Comité permanent de l'industrie, 11 juin 1996, à 16 h 55)

M. Hains a ensuite mentionné plusieurs autres caractéristiques du régime pour dissiper les préoccupations de M. Lebel et a fait remarquer que les organismes de réglementation environnementaux provinciaux devraient exécuter les travaux de décontamination. Fait important, M. Hains ne contredit jamais la conception que M. Lebel se fait des dispositions du projet de loi. Il ne conteste pas non plus la prémisse qui sous-tend la question : la nouvelle loi ne « force [. . .] pas le syndic à faire la décontamination à même les actifs de la faillite » avant leur répartition entre les créanciers. M. Hains ne prétend pas que les organismes de réglementation provinciaux peuvent toujours assurer le respect d'une telle exigence.

[205] Cet échange entre MM. Lebel et Hains démontre clairement que toutes les parties s'entendent pour dire que les modifications proposées, lesquelles contiennent ce qui allait devenir le par. 14.06(4), *n'*obligeaient pas expressément le syndic à dépenser the estate's assets to comply with environmental remediation orders. The drafters of s. 14.06(4) thus turned their minds directly to this issue, and their understanding of the provision's effects was contrary to that proposed by the majority.

[206] Based on these references to Hansard, I cannot agree with the majority's statement that the legislative debates provide "no hint" of a parliamentary intention to relieve trustees of the obligation to expend estate assets on environmental remediation (para. 81). This intention was clearly expressed on multiple occasions.

[207] As courts must read statutory provisions in their entire context, and as Parliament is presumed to craft sections and subsections of legislation as parts of a coherent whole, it is important to carefully examine the other subsections of s. 14.06. This is true regardless of whether a party to litigation seeks to apply them or to put them directly in issue (majority reasons, at paras. 88 and 101). Significantly, the immediate statutory context surrounding s. 14.06(4) confirms that a trustee's right to disclaim property is not limited in the manner suggested by the AER or my colleague. Four provisions adjacent to s. 14.06(4) support this conclusion.

[208] First, s. 14.06(5) provides that a court may stay an environmental order "for the purpose of enabling the trustee to assess the economic viability of complying with the order". Assessing "economic viability" is, on its face, broader than assessing the risk of personal liability. This provision indicates that a trustee is entitled to disclaim assets based on a rational economic analysis geared toward maximizing the value of the estate, and not merely in order to protect itself from personal liability. Otherwise, there would be no reason for Parliament to permit a court to grant a stay for the purpose of assessing economic viability. This understanding is consistent with the fundamental principles of insolvency law and with the Hansard evidence, as noted above, as well as with one of the recognized justifications for the disclaimer power more generally: to allow a trustee les biens de l'actif pour respecter les ordonnances de décontamination environnementale. Les rédacteurs du par. 14.06(4) se sont ainsi directement attardés à cette question et leur conception des effets de la disposition contredisait celle proposée par les juges majoritaires.

[207] Puisque les tribunaux doivent lire les dispositions législatives dans leur contexte global, et que le Parlement est présumé rédiger les articles et paragraphes d'une loi comme un tout cohérent, il importe d'examiner avec soin les autres paragraphes de l'art. 14.06. Il en est ainsi, peu importe qu'une partie au litige cherche à les appliquer ou à les mettre directement en cause (motifs des juges majoritaires, par. 88 et 101). Fait révélateur, le contexte immédiat du par. 14.06(4) confirme que le droit du syndic de renoncer à des biens n'est pas limité de la façon suggérée par l'AER ou mon collègue. Quatre dispositions adjacentes au par. 14.06(4) étayent cette conclusion.

[208] Premièrement, le par. 14.06(5) prévoit que le tribunal peut suspendre une ordonnance environnementale « [e]n vue de permettre au syndic d'évaluer les conséquences économiques du respect de l'ordonnance ». Évaluer les « conséquences économiques » a, à première vue, une portée plus large qu'évaluer le risque de responsabilité personnelle. Cette disposition indique que le syndic a le droit de renoncer à des biens en se fondant sur une analyse économique rationnelle visant à maximiser la valeur de l'actif, et non simplement afin de se prémunir contre une responsabilité personnelle. Sinon, le Parlement n'aurait aucune raison d'autoriser le tribunal à accorder une suspension en vue de permettre l'évaluation des conséquences économiques. Cette interprétation s'accorde avec les principes fondamentaux du droit de l'insolvabilité et les débats parlementaires, tel que

"to complete the administration of the liquidation without being held up by continuing obligations on the company under . . . continued ownership and possession of assets which are of no value to the estate" (Goode, at p. 200).

[209] Second, s. 14.06(7) grants the government a super priority for environmental claims in cases where it has already taken action to remedy the condition or damage. This provision would serve little purpose if a government regulator could assert a super priority for all environmental claims, as the AER effectively purports to do here by refusing to recognize GTL's disclaimers as lawful. It also suggests that Parliament specifically envisioned that the government could obtain a super priority and leapfrog other creditors, but only where the government itself has already remediated the environmental damage. An analogous argument was central to the reasoning in Abitibi, where this Court observed that the existence of a Crown priority limited to the contaminated property and certain related property under s. 11.8(8) of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36, undercut the argument that Parliament "intended that the debtor always satisfy all remediation costs" in circumstances where that express priority was inapplicable and where the Crown had no further priority with respect to the totality of the estate's assets (para. 33).

[210] Third, s. 14.06(6) provides that claims for costs of remedying an environmental condition or environmental damage cannot rank as costs of administration if the trustee has disclaimed the property in question. Again, if the AER could effectively assert a super priority by compelling GTL to use all of Redwater's assets to satisfy its outstanding environmental liabilities, this provision would be unnecessary, because the costs of environmental je l'ai signalé précédemment, de même qu'avec l'une des justifications reconnues du pouvoir de renonciation de façon plus générale : permettre au syndic [TRADUCTION] « de mener à terme la liquidation sans être freiné par les obligations permanentes de la société [. . .] en conservant la propriété et la possession de biens qui n'augmentent en rien la valeur de l'actif » (Goode, p. 200).

[209] Deuxièmement, le par. 14.06(7) accorde au gouvernement une superpriorité à l'égard des réclamations environnementales dans les cas où il a déjà pris des mesures pour réparer le fait ou le dommage. Cette disposition serait fort peu utile si un organisme de réglementation gouvernemental pouvait faire valoir une superpriorité à l'égard de toutes les réclamations environnementales, comme l'AER a effectivement la prétention de le faire en l'espèce, en refusant de reconnaître la légalité des renonciations de GTL. Elle donne également à penser que le Parlement a expressément prévu que le gouvernement pouvait obtenir une superpriorité et devancer les autres créanciers, mais seulement lorsqu'il a lui-même déjà réparé le dommage lié à l'environnement. Un argument analogue a constitué l'élément central du raisonnement dans Abitibi, où la Cour a fait remarquer que l'existence d'une priorité de la Couronne portant uniquement sur les biens contaminés et certains biens connexes en vertu du par. 11.8(8) de la Loi sur les arrangements avec les créanciers des compagnies, L.R.C. 1985, c. C-36, mine l'argument selon lequel le Parlement a eu « l'intention d'obliger le débiteur à supporter dans tous les cas tous les coûts des travaux de décontamination » dans les situations où ce droit de priorité exprès était inapplicable et où la Couronne ne disposait d'aucune autre priorité sur l'ensemble des biens de l'actif (par. 33).

[210] Troisièmement, le par. 14.06(6) prévoit que les réclamations visant les frais de réparation du fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement ne peuvent faire partie des frais d'administration si le syndic a renoncé au bien en question. Encore une fois, si l'AER pouvait effectivement faire valoir une superpriorité en obligeant GTL à utiliser tous les biens de Redwater pour satisfaire aux engagements environnementaux non acquittés de celle-ci, cette disposition remediation would rank ahead of administrative costs in the priority structure. Moreover, s. 14.06(6) highlights the potential for a direct conflict between federal and provincial law. A trustee cannot comply with the AER's instruction to pay environmental costs as part of its administration of the estate while simultaneously complying with the BIA's requirement that such costs not be included in the trustee's administrative costs. This further raises the spectre of bankruptcy professionals being forced to expend their own funds under Alberta's regulatory regime — a notion that Parliament clearly rejected by amending the BIA in response to Panamericana de Bienes y Servicios S.A. v. Northern Badger Oil & Gas Ltd., 1991 ABCA 181, 81 D.L.R. (4th) 280 (see C.A. reasons, at para. 63). This is a risk that is not adequately addressed under my colleague's interpretation.

ne serait pas nécessaire parce que les frais de décontamination environnementale passeraient avant les frais d'administration dans l'ordre de priorité. De plus, le par. 14.06(6) fait ressortir la possibilité d'un conflit direct entre la loi fédérale et la loi provinciale. Le syndic ne peut pas obtempérer à la directive de l'AER lui indiquant de supporter les frais environnementaux dans le cadre de son administration de l'actif tout en respectant l'exigence de la LFI selon laquelle ces frais ne font pas partie des frais d'administration du syndic. Cela fait également apparaître le spectre de l'obligation pour les professionnels de la faillite de dépenser leurs propres fonds en application du régime de réglementation albertain, une idée que le Parlement a clairement rejetée en modifiant la LFI en réaction à l'arrêt Panamericana de Bienes y Servicios S.A. c. Northern Badger Oil & Gas Ltd., 1991 ABCA 181, 81 D.L.R. (4th) 280 (voir motifs de la Cour d'appel, par. 63). C'est un risque auquel l'interprétation de mon collègue ne répond pas adéquatement.

[211] Fourth, s. 14.06(2) already deals with the circumstances in which a trustee can be held personally liable for a bankrupt's environmental liabilities. Under this provision, personal liability can arise only where environmental damage occurs as a result of the trustee's gross negligence or wilful misconduct. If a risk of personal liability is, in fact, a necessary condition to disclaim under s. 14.06(4), or if protection from personal liability is the only effect of disclaimer, this would mean that the disclaimer power is available or useful only in cases where the underlying environmental condition arises after the trustee's appointment and the trustee is responsible for gross negligence or wilful misconduct.

[211] Quatrièmement, le par. 14.06(2) traite déjà des circonstances dans lesquelles le syndic peut être tenu personnellement responsable des engagements environnementaux du failli. Selon cette disposition, la responsabilité personnelle du syndic ne peut être engagée que si le dommage lié à l'environnement est imputable à sa négligence grave ou à son inconduite délibérée. Si le risque de responsabilité personnelle constitue, en fait, une condition essentielle à la renonciation prévue par le par. 14.06(4), ou si la protection contre toute responsabilité personnelle est le seul effet de la renonciation, cela signifie que le pouvoir de renonciation ne peut être exercé ou n'est utile que dans les cas où le fait sous-jacent lié à l'environnement prend naissance après la nomination du syndic et où ce dernier est responsable de négligence grave ou d'inconduite délibérée.

[212] On ne saurait contourner ce résultat manifestement absurde en tentant d'établir une distinction entre la responsabilité découlant d'un dommage lié à l'environnement (qui serait visée par le par. 14.06(2)) et la responsabilité découlant du non-respect de toute ordonnance de réparation de ce dommage (qui serait visée par le par. 14.06(4)). Cette distinction est tout à fait artificielle. Si l'AER rend une ordonnance

the underlying condition itself — liability that would still be encompassed by s. 14.06(2). This is evident from the marginal note for s. 14.06(2), "[l]iability in respect of environmental matters", which is capacious enough to include liability that flows from a failure to comply with an environmental order. In any event, it is difficult to imagine why Parliament would intend to immunize a trustee from personal liability for an environmental condition, but still hold the trustee liable for a failure to comply with an order to remedy that exact same condition — and then further, permit the trustee to avoid that very liability by disclaiming the property, but either not permit the trustee to disclaim that property in any other circumstance or make it pointless to do so. This convoluted reasoning not only misreads s. 14.06(4), but also rewrites s. 14.06(2) in the process. It effectively creates a sector specific exemption from bankruptcy law that would prohibit many receivers and trustees that operate in the oil and gas industry from disclaiming assets (see N. Bankes, Majority of the Court of Appeal Confirms Chief Justice Wittmann's Redwater Decision, May 3, 2017 (online)).

[213] I also cannot accept that Parliament enacted s. 14.06(4) simply to protect trustees from personal liability in the narrow subset of circumstances not already covered by s. 14.06(2) — namely where an environmental condition or environmental damage arises after a trustee's appointment and as a result of the trustee's gross negligence or wilful misconduct — for two main reasons. Firstly, the terms of the provision itself belie this theory. The opening lines of s. 14.06(4) expressly make the limitation of liability "subject to subsection (2)". This indicates that Parliament deliberately intended subs. (2) to supersede subs. (4) in the determination of liability. Thus, where a trustee has caused an environmental condition or environmental damage through its wilful misconduct or gross negligence, the trustee will still be personally liable, despite any valid disclaimer d'abandon à l'égard d'un bien visé par un permis, il crée effectivement une responsabilité découlant du fait sous-jacent lui-même — une responsabilité qui serait toujours visée par le par. 14.06(2). Cela ressort clairement de la note marginale du par. 14.06(2), « [r]esponsabilité en matière d'environnement », qui est suffisamment vaste pour englober la responsabilité découlant du non-respect d'une ordonnance environnementale. Quoi qu'il en soit, il est difficile d'imaginer pourquoi le Parlement voudrait mettre le syndic à l'abri d'une responsabilité personnelle découlant d'un fait lié à l'environnement, tout en tenant néanmoins le syndic responsable du non-respect d'une ordonnance de réparation concernant exactement le même fait — pour ensuite permettre au syndic d'être dégagé de cette même responsabilité en renonçant au bien, mais en ne permettant pas au syndic de renoncer à ce bien dans d'autres circonstances ou en rendant inutile cette renonciation. Non seulement ce raisonnement alambiqué constitue-t-il une mauvaise interprétation du par. 14.06(4), mais il équivaut en même temps à une reformulation du par. 14.06(2). Cela revient en fait à créer une exemption sectorielle à l'application du droit de la faillite qui empêcherait les séquestres et les syndics qui exercent leurs activités dans l'industrie pétrolière et gazière de renoncer à des biens (voir N. Bankes, Majority of the Court of Appeal Confirms Chief Justice Wittmann's Redwater Decision, 3 mai 2017 (en ligne)).

[213] Je ne peux non plus accepter que le Parlement a adopté le par. 14.06(4) dans le simple but de protéger les syndics contre toute responsabilité personnelle dans le sous-ensemble restreint de circonstances qui ne sont pas déjà visées par le par. 14.06(2) — à savoir celles où un fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement survient après la nomination du syndic et à cause de sa négligence grave ou de son inconduite délibérée — pour deux raisons principales. Tout d'abord, le texte de la disposition contredit lui-même cette théorie. Les premières lignes du par. 14.06(4) limitent expressément la responsabilité « sous réserve du paragraphe (2) ». Le Parlement tenait donc à ce que le par. (2) l'emporte sur le par. (4) pour ce qui est de déterminer la responsabilité. Ainsi, le syndic ayant causé un fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement par son inconduite délibérée ou sa négligence grave under subs. (4). Secondly, there is no evidence, or indeed any rationale, to explain why Parliament would have drafted s. 14.06(4) to protect trustees in such narrow circumstances, through the method of disclaiming property, and to shield them from liability where they cause environmental issues through their own wrongdoing.

[214] The majority of this Court accepts that, on its interpretation, no meaningful distinction can be drawn between the protection from personal liability provided by subs. (2) and that provided by subs. (4). Indeed, the majority appears to believe that such a distinction is not even necessary, accepting that "s. 14.06(4) does not provide trustees with protection from personal liability any broader than the protection provided by s. 14.06(2)" (para. 93). However, the effect of this interpretation is to render subs. (4) entirely meaningless and redundant. Trustees would have no reason to exercise their power to disclaim assets, as the only effect of doing so would be to protect them from personal liability from which they are already fully shielded by subs. (2). Section 14.06(4) would therefore serve no purpose whatsoever within Parliament's bankruptcy regime. I cannot understand the logic of Parliament explicitly referring to, and incorporating, the ability of trustees to disclaim assets — and specifically outlining one consequence of that power — simply to mandate that such an action has no meaningful effect. We must presume that Parliament does not speak in vain and did not craft a pointless provision (Canada (Attorney General) v. JTI-Macdonald Corp., 2007 SCC 30, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 610, at para. 87). It is a trite principle of statutory interpretation that every provision of a statute should be given meaning:

> It is presumed that every feature of a legislative text has been deliberately chosen and has a particular role to play in the legislative design. The legislature does not include unnecessary or meaningless language in its statutes; . . . it does not make the same point twice.

engagera toujours sa responsabilité personnelle, malgré toute renonciation dûment effectuée en vertu du par. (4). Ensuite, aucune preuve, ni raison en fait, n'explique pourquoi le Parlement aurait rédigé le par. 14.06(4) afin de protéger les syndics dans des situations aussi particulières, par la renonciation à des biens, et de les mettre à l'abri de leur responsabilité lorsqu'ils endommagent l'environnement par leurs propres actes répréhensibles.

[214] Les juges majoritaires reconnaissent que, d'après leur interprétation, on ne peut établir de distinction utile entre l'immunité de responsabilité personnelle accordée par le par. (2) et celle fournie par le par. (4). En effet, ils semblent croire que cette distinction n'est même pas nécessaire, acceptant que « le par. 14.06(4) n'offre pas aux syndics une protection contre la responsabilité personnelle plus large que celle fournie par le par. 14.06(2) » (par. 93). Cette interprétation a cependant pour effet de rendre le par. (4) tout à fait dénué de sens et redondant. Le syndic n'aurait aucune raison d'exercer son pouvoir de renoncer à des biens, car cette mesure ne servirait qu'à le protéger contre la responsabilité personnelle dont le par. (2) le met déjà entièrement à l'abri. Ainsi, le par. 14.06(4) n'aurait absolument aucune utilité dans le régime de faillite du Parlement. Je ne peux saisir la logique, pour le Parlement, de mentionner explicitement et d'incorporer le pouvoir du syndic de renoncer à ces biens — et d'énoncer en termes exprès une conséquence de ce pouvoir — simplement pour disposer que cette mesure n'a aucun effet utile. Nous devons présumer que le Parlement ne parle pas pour ne rien dire et qu'il n'a pas rédigé une disposition inutile (Canada (Procureur général) c. JTI-Macdonald Corp., 2007 CSC 30, [2007] 2 R.C.S. 610, par. 87). Un principe reconnu d'interprétation législative veut que chaque disposition d'une loi reçoive un sens :

> [TRADUCTION] On présume que chaque caractéristique d'un texte de loi a été délibérément choisie et a un rôle précis à jouer dans le cadre législatif. Le législateur n'emploie pas de termes inutiles ou dénués de sens dans ses lois; [. . .] il ne dit pas la même chose deux fois.

[215] This evident absurdity cannot be avoided by suggesting that s. 14.06(4) was created to clarify to trustees that they may be required to expend the entire value of a bankrupt estate to comply with environmental orders, despite valid disclaimers. If Parliament's intent was truly to undermine the disclaimer power in this way, it is difficult to conceive of a more convoluted, tortuous and unclear method to achieve this result than s. 14.06(4). Had Parliament simply sought to make clear to trustees that disclaimer would not allow them to relieve themselves from satisfying environmental liabilities, it could easily have done so directly rather than enacting a provision that describes protection from personal liability they do not actually face.

[216] Section 14.06, when read as a whole, indicates that subs. (4) does more than merely protect trustees from personal liability. My colleague has declined to even consider the remaining subsections of s. 14.06 that I have discussed, other than subs. (2). Nonetheless, he says that the plain meaning of a provision cannot be "contorted to make its scheme more coherent" (para. 101). The conclusion that would result from such an approach would be that Parliament simply intended to craft a largely incoherent framework. I disagree that we should reach this conclusion here. As Dickson J. (as he then was) stated in Morgentaler v. The Queen, [1976] 1 S.C.R. 616, at p. 676: "We should pay Parliament the respect of not assuming readily that it has enacted legislative inconsistencies or absurdities." A determination that Parliament designed s. 14.06 as an incoherent whole is inconsistent with the role of the courts in statutory interpretation, which is to read the words of a statute in their entire context, harmoniously with the scheme of the statute. As Ruth Sullivan has noted:

> It is presumed that the provisions of legislation are meant to work together, both logically and teleologically, as parts of a functioning whole. The parts are presumed to fit together logically to form a rational, internally consistent framework; and because the framework has a purpose, the parts are also presumed to work together dynamically, [215] Il est impossible d'éviter cette absurdité évidente en affirmant que le par. 14.06(4) visait à préciser au syndic qu'il devait dépenser toute la valeur de l'actif d'un failli pour se conformer à des ordonnances environnementales en dépit de renonciations valides. Si le Parlement avait vraiment eu l'intention de miner ainsi le pouvoir de renonciation, il est difficile d'imaginer un moyen plus alambiqué, tortueux et vague d'atteindre ce résultat que le par. 14.06(4). Si le Parlement avait simplement voulu préciser au syndic que la renonciation ne leur permettrait pas d'être dégagés de l'obligation de respecter les engagements environnementaux, il lui aurait été facile de le faire directement, plutôt que d'adopter une disposition décrivant une immunité de responsabilité personnelle dont le syndic n'a pas besoin.

[216] Lu dans son ensemble, l'art. 14.06 indique que le par. (4) ne se borne pas à dégager les syndics de toute responsabilité personnelle. Mon collègue a même refusé d'examiner les autres paragraphes de l'art. 14.06 dont j'ai parlé, sauf le par. (2). Peu importe, dit-il, on ne peut « déforme[r] le sens clair d'une disposition pour en rendre le régime plus cohérent » (par. 101). Cette approche mènerait à la conclusion selon laquelle le Parlement voulait simplement concevoir un cadre incohérent en grande partie. Je suis en désaccord avec cette conclusion. Tel que l'a mentionné le juge Dickson (plus tard juge en chef) dans Morgentaler c. La Reine, [1976] 1 R.C.S. 616, p. 676 : « Nous devons avoir envers le Parlement la courtoisie de ne pas présumer aisément qu'il a édicté des incohérences ou des absurdités ». La conclusion que le Parlement a conçu l'art. 14.06 comme un tout incohérent est incompatible avec la tâche confiée aux tribunaux dans l'interprétation législative, laquelle consiste à lire les termes d'une loi dans leur contexte global en harmonie avec l'économie de la loi. Comme l'a fait remarquer Ruth Sullivan : each contributing something toward accomplishing the intended goal.

The presumption of coherence is also expressed as a presumption against internal conflict. It is presumed that the body of legislation enacted by a legislature does not contain contradictions or inconsistencies, that each provision is capable of operating without coming into conflict with any other. [Footnote omitted.]

(Sullivan on the Construction of Statutes (6th ed. 2014), at p. 337; see also R. v. L.T.H., 2008 SCC 49, [2008] 2 S.C.R. 739, at para. 47.)

[217] Where it is possible to read the provisions of a statute — especially the various subsections of a single section — in a consistent manner, that interpretation is to be preferred over one that results in internal inconsistency. In my view, as I have set out above, it is possible to read s. 14.06(4) coherently with the remainder of the section. This is the interpretation that Parliament is presumed to have intended. In this case, I see no compelling reason to depart from this presumption.

[218] My colleague's analysis is reminiscent of the strictly textual or literal approach to statutory interpretation — the "plain meaning rule" — that this Court squarely rejected in Rizzo. This is apparent from the fact that he relies strictly on what he alleges to be the "clear and unambiguous" wording of s. 14.06(4), while discounting the context of the provision. With respect, I am of the view that the Court should rely on the predominant and well-established modern approach to statutory interpretation: the words of an Act must be "'read in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament"' (Rizzo, at para. 21; Bell ExpressVu, at para. 26, both quoting Driedger, at p. 87).

[219] In Rizzo, Iacobucci J. explained that "statutory interpretation cannot be founded on the wording of the legislation alone" (para. 21). The Court of Appeal in Rizzo, which had adopted the plain présumés s'appliquer ensemble de façon dynamique, chacun contribuant à la réalisation de l'objectif visé.

La présomption de cohérence se traduit également par une présomption d'absence d'incompatibilité intrinsèque. Il est présumé que l'ensemble des textes législatifs édictés par une législature ne comporte pas de contradictions ou d'incohérences et que chaque disposition peut être appliquée sans entrer en conflit avec une autre. [Note en bas de page omise.]

(Sullivan on the Construction of Statutes (6e éd. 2014), p. 337; voir aussi R. c. L.T.H., 2008 CSC 49, [2008] 2 R.C.S. 739, par. 47.)

[217] Quand il est possible d'interpréter les dispositions d'une loi — surtout les divers paragraphes d'un même article — de façon cohérente, il faut privilégier cette interprétation à une interprétation qui donne lieu à une incohérence intrinsèque. À mon avis, et comme je l'ai déjà dit, il est possible de lire le par. 14.06(4) de façon cohérente avec le reste de l'article. Voilà l'interprétation que le Parlement est présumé avoir donnée à ce paragraphe. En l'espèce, je ne vois aucune raison impérieuse de s'écarter de cette présomption.

[218] L'analyse de mon collègue rappelle la méthode purement textuelle ou littérale d'interprétation des lois — la « règle du sens ordinaire » — que notre Cour a rejetée sans équivoque dans Rizzo. Cela ressort du fait qu'il se fonde strictement sur ce qu'il prétend être le texte « clai[r] et non ambig[u] » du par. 14.06(4), tout en ne tenant pas compte du contexte de la disposition. Avec égards, j'estime que la Cour devrait recourir à la méthode prédominante et bien établie d'interprétation des lois : il faut lire les termes d'une loi « dans leur contexte global en suivant le sens ordinaire et grammatical qui s'harmonise avec l'[économie] de la loi, l'objet de la loi et l'intention du législateur » (Rizzo, par. 21; Bell ExpressVu, par. 26, citant tous les deux Driedger, p. 87).

[219] Dans l'arrêt Rizzo, le juge Iacobucci a expliqué que « l'interprétation législative ne peut pas être fondée sur le seul libellé du texte de loi » (par. 21). La Cour d'appel saisie de l'affaire Rizzo, qui avait retenu meaning interpretation, "did not pay sufficient attention to the scheme of the [Act], its object or the intention of the legislature; nor was the context of the words in issue appropriately recognized" (para. 23).

[220] In interpreting s. 14.06(4) of the BIA, the majority similarly relies on the supposed plain meaning of the words of the provision but does not pay sufficient attention to the scheme of s. 14.06 as a whole; nor does it appropriately recognize the context of the words.

[221] Even if we were to leave aside the wording of the provision itself and its immediate statutory context, a purposive interpretation would lead to the same result. Consider the consequences of the analysis of the AER or the analysis of my colleague in other cases like this, where an oil company's environmental liabilities exceed the value of its realizable assets. Insolvency professionals, knowing in advance that they can be compelled to funnel all of the estate's remaining assets toward those environmental liabilities (either because they cannot disclaim value-negative assets absent a risk of personal liability or because their disclaimer will be ineffective to prevent this), will never accept mandates in the first place. This is sensible business practice: if the estate's entire realizable value must go toward its environmental liabilities, leaving nothing behind to cover administrative costs, insolvency professionals will have nothing to gain — and much to lose — by stepping in to serve as receivers and trustees, irrespective of whether they are protected from personal liability. Debtors and creditors alike, knowing that this is the case, will have no reason to even petition for bankruptcy. The result is that none of a bankrupt estate's assets will be sold — not even an oil company's valuable wells — and the number of orphaned properties will increase. This is a far cry from the objectives of the 1997 amendments to the BIA as discussed in Parliament, which were to "encourage [insolvency professionals] to accept mandates" and to "reduce the number of abandoned sites" (Standing Committee on Industry, June 11, 1996, at 15:49). It is difficult to imagine that Parliament would have intended a construction l'interprétation fondée sur le sens ordinaire, « n'a pas accordé suffisamment d'attention à l'économie de la [Loi], à son objet ni à l'intention du législateur; le contexte des mots en cause n'a pas non plus été pris en compte adéquatement » (par. 23).

[220] En interprétant le par. 14.06(4) de la LFI, la majorité s'appuie elle aussi sur le supposé sens ordinaire des mots de la disposition mais n'accorde pas suffisamment d'attention à l'économie de l'art. 14.06 dans son ensemble; elle ne prend pas non plus adéquatement en compte le contexte de ces mots.

[221] Même si nous faisions abstraction du libellé de la disposition elle-même et de son contexte législatif immédiat, une interprétation téléologique mènerait au même résultat. Considérons les conséquences de l'analyse de l'AER ou de celle de mon collègue dans d'autres cas comme celui qui nous occupe, où les engagements environnementaux de la société pétrolière excèdent la valeur de son actif réalisable. Les professionnels de l'insolvabilité, sachant d'avance qu'ils peuvent être contraints de canaliser tous les autres éléments d'actif vers ces engagements environnementaux (soit parce qu'ils ne peuvent renoncer à des biens ayant une valeur négative en l'absence du risque d'engager leur responsabilité personnelle, soit parce que leur renonciation n'empêchera pas cette éventualité de se produire), n'accepteront jamais de mandats au départ. Il s'agit là d'une pratique commerciale sensée : si toute la valeur réalisable de l'actif doit être dirigée vers ces engagements environnementaux, et qu'il ne reste rien pour couvrir les frais administratifs, les professionnels de l'insolvabilité n'auront rien à gagner — et beaucoup à perdre — en acceptant d'exercer les fonctions de séquestre et de syndic, indépendamment de la question de savoir s'ils sont protégés contre toute responsabilité personnelle. Les débiteurs tout comme les créanciers, sachant qu'il en est ainsi, n'auront aucune raison de même présenter une requête de mise en faillite. Il s'ensuit qu'aucun des biens de l'actif du failli ne sera vendu — pas même les puits de valeur de la société pétrolière — et que le nombre de biens orphelins augmentera. Cela est bien loin des objectifs des modifications apportées à la LFI en 1997 qui ont été débattues au Parlement of s. 14.06(4) that explicitly undermines its stated purposes.

[222] The majority appears to accept that the purposes of s. 14.06(4) of the BIA included encouraging insolvency professionals to accept mandates in cases where there may be environmental liabilities (paras. 80-81). However, merely protecting trustees from personal liability in such cases will fail to achieve Parliament's desired result. As I have explained, even where prospective trustees face no risk of personal liability, they will be reluctant to accept mandates if provincial entities can require the entire value of a bankrupt's realizable estate to be applied to satisfy environmental obligations.

[223] Since I have explained that s. 14.06(4) provides trustees with the power to disclaim assets even where there is no risk of personal liability, it is now necessary to briefly consider whether this power was available to GTL on the facts of this case. Here, the statutory conditions to the exercise of this power were met. The Abandonment Orders clearly relate to the remediation of an "environmental condition" (or "tout fait . . . lié à l'environnement" in the French version of the BIA, which can be translated literally as "any fact . . . related to the environment"). Indeed, even the AER and the OWA have never contested this point. In response to such orders, GTL was therefore entitled to exercise the disclaimer power provided for in s. 14.06(4).

(2) Section 14.06(4) Applies to Alberta's Oil and Gas Industry

[224] The AER raised an additional argument that the right of disclaimer is entirely inapplicable in the context of the statutory regime governing the oil and gas industry due to the role played by third-party surface landowners and the nature of the property et qui devaient « encourager [les professionnels de l'insolvabilité] à accepter des mandats » et « réduire le nombre de sites abandonnés » (Comité permanent de l'industrie, 11 juin 1996 à 15 h 49). Il est difficile d'imaginer que le Parlement aurait privilégié une interprétation du par. 14.06(4) qui nuit explicitement aux objectifs qu'il a énoncés.

[222] La majorité semble reconnaître que le par. 14.06(4) de la LFI a eu notamment pour objectif d'encourager les professionnels de l'insolvabilité à accepter des mandats dans des cas où il existe peut-être des engagements environnementaux (par. 80-81). Or, le simple fait de mettre les syndics à l'abri de la responsabilité personnelle en pareil cas ne permettra pas d'atteindre le résultat escompté par le Parlement. Comme je l'ai expliqué, même lorsque les syndics potentiels ne courent aucun risque d'engager leur responsabilité personnelle, ils seront réticents à accepter des mandats si des entités provinciales peuvent exiger que toute la valeur de l'actif réalisable d'un failli serve à acquitter des obligations environnementales.

[223] Ayant expliqué que le par. 14.06(4) confère aux syndics le pouvoir de renoncer à des biens même en l'absence d'un risque de responsabilité personnelle, je dois maintenant me demander brièvement si GTL disposait de ce pouvoir à la lumière des faits de la présente affaire. En l'espèce, les conditions statutaires préalables à l'exercice de ce pouvoir étaient réunies. Les ordonnances d'abandon se rapportent clairement à la réparation de « tout fait [. . .] lié à l'environnement » (dans la version française de la LFI) ou d'une « condition environnementale » (une traduction littérale du terme « environmental condition » dans la version anglaise de la LFI). En effet, même l'AER et l'OWA n'ont jamais contesté ce point. En réaction à de telles ordonnances, GTL pouvait donc exercer le pouvoir de renonciation prévu au par. 14.06(4).

(2) Le paragraphe 14.06(4) s'applique à l'industrie pétrolière et gazière de l'Alberta interests involved which rendered the Crown's super priority under s. 14.06(7) impractical. Martin J.A. (as she then was), writing in dissent at the Alberta Court of Appeal, reached the same conclusion. With respect, I cannot agree. Parliament did not make the disclaimer power in s. 14.06(4) conditional on the availability of the Crown's super priority.

[224] L'AER a également soutenu que le droit de renonciation ne s'applique aucunement dans le contexte du régime législatif régissant l'industrie pétrolière et gazière en raison du rôle joué par les tiers propriétaires de droits de surface et de la nature

[225] In delineating what interests may be disclaimed by a trustee under s. 14.06(4), Parliament used exceptionally broad language. The trustee is permitted to disclaim "any interest" in "any real property". While Redwater's AER-issued licences may not be real property, all of the parties accept that profits à prendre and surface leases can be characterized as real property interests. In the context of this case, it is these interests that GTL truly sought to disclaim. The AER argued that s. 14.06(4) permits the disclaimer only of "true real property", meaning land currently or previously owned by the bankrupt, without any third-party landowners. This interpretation is not consistent with the actual language used by Parliament. Had Parliament intended to restrict the disclaimer power solely to fee simple interests, it could have stated this, rather than referring to "any interest in any real property".

[226] Further, the Alberta oil and gas industry is far from the only natural resource sector in which companies traditionally operate on the land of third parties, whether the Crown or private landowners. The potential liability of trustees would explode if the mere presence of these third-party landowners rendered the disclaimer power in s. 14.06(4) entirely inapplicable. The language of the section is clearly broad enough to capture the statutory regime governing Alberta's oil and gas sector.

(3) Conclusion on Operational Conflict

[227] In light of this interpretation of s. 14.06(4), I agree with both courts below that there is an operational conflict to the extent that Alberta's statutory des droits de propriété en cause qui empêchaient la Couronne de se prévaloir de la superpriorité dont elle jouit en vertu du par. 14.06(7). La juge Martin (maintenant juge de notre Cour), dissidente en Cour d'appel de l'Alberta, est parvenue à la même conclusion. Avec égards, je ne peux partager son avis. Le Parlement n'a pas rendu le pouvoir de renonciation prévu au par. 14.06(4) conditionnel à la possibilité pour la Couronne de se prévaloir de sa superpriorité.

[225] En décidant des intérêts auxquels peut renoncer un syndic en vertu du par. 14.06(4), le Parlement a utilisé des mots exceptionnellement larges. Il est permis au syndic de renoncer à « tout intérêt » sur « le bien réel ». Bien que les permis réglementaires de Redwater ne soient peut-être pas des biens réels, toutes les parties reconnaissent que les profits à prendre et droits de surface peuvent être qualifiés d'intérêts sur des biens réels. Dans le contexte de la présente affaire, ce sont les droits auxquels GTL veut vraiment renoncer. L'AER a soutenu que le par. 14.06(4) autorise uniquement la renonciation à de « véritables biens réels », soit un terrain qui appartient ou appartenait au failli, sans tiers propriétaires fonciers. Cette interprétation ne s'accorde pas avec les mots employés par le Parlement. Si ce dernier avait voulu ne restreindre le pouvoir de renonciation qu'aux intérêts en fief simple, il aurait pu le dire plutôt que de parler de « tout intérêt sur le bien réel ».

[226] De plus, l'industrie pétrolière et gazière de l'Alberta est loin d'être le seul secteur de ressources naturelles où les sociétés exercent depuis longtemps leurs activités sur le terrain de tiers, qu'il s'agisse de la Couronne ou de propriétaires privés. La responsabilité potentielle des syndics exploserait si la simple présence de ces tiers propriétaires fonciers écartait complètement l'application du pouvoir de renonciation prévu au par. 14.06(4). Le texte du paragraphe est manifestement assez large pour embrasser le régime législatif régissant le secteur pétrolier et gazier de l'Alberta.

(3) Conclusion sur le conflit d'application

[227] Compte tenu de cette interprétation du par. 14.06(4), je suis d'accord avec les deux tribunaux d'instance inférieure pour dire qu'il y a un regime holds receivers and trustees liable as "licensees" in relation to the disclaimed assets (see chambers judge reasons, at para. 181; C.A. reasons, at para. 57). This conflict is far from hypothetical. Under federal law, GTL is entitled to disclaim the bankrupt's assets affected by the Abandonment Orders. Under the BIA, GTL cannot be compelled to take action with respect to properties it has validly disclaimed, since the act of disclaimer relieves it of any rights, interests and liabilities in respect of the disclaimed properties. But under provincial law, the AER can order GTL to abandon the disclaimed assets, among other things (see para. 11). This is exactly what happened here. Not only did the AER order GTL to complete the work, but it also made the sale of Redwater's valuable assets conditional on GTL either abandoning the non-producing properties itself or packaging those properties with the estate's valuable assets for the purposes of any sale. In doing so, the AER impermissibly disregarded the effect of GTL's disclaimers. This remains the case, irrespective of whether GTL could (or would) ever be held personally liable for the costs of abandoning the properties above and beyond the entire value of the estate.

[228] My colleague claims that the AER "has never attempted to hold a trustee personally liable" (para. 107). What is clear is that, on the facts of this case, the AER directly sought to require GTL to perform or pay for the abandonment work itself, whether this is referred to as personal liability or not. It is critical to observe that this litigation began when the AER filed an application seeking to compel GTL to comply with its obligations as a licensee, including the obligation to abandon the non-producing properties. Practically speaking, this amounted to an effort to hold GTL personally liable. Where else would the money required to abandon the disclaimed properties have come from? The value of the estate as a whole was negative, and the AER refused to permit GTL to sell the valuable properties on their own. No purchaser would have agreed to buy all of the assets together. Therefore, conflit d'application dans la mesure où le régime législatif albertain tient les séquestres et les syndics responsables en tant que « titulaires de permis » relativement aux biens faisant l'objet d'une renonciation (voir les motifs du juge en cabinet, par. 181; motifs de la Cour d'appel, par. 57). Ce conflit est loin d'être hypothétique. En vertu de la loi fédérale, GTL peut renoncer aux biens du failli touchés par les ordonnances d'abandon. Selon la LFI, GTL ne peut être contraint de prendre des mesures à l'égard des biens auxquels il a valablement renoncé puisque l'acte de renonciation le libère de tous les droits, intérêts et obligations à l'égard des biens visés par la renonciation. Mais selon la loi provinciale, l'AER peut notamment ordonner à GTL d'abandonner les biens ayant fait l'objet d'une renonciation (voir par. 11). C'est exactement ce qui s'est passé en l'espèce. Non seulement l'AER a-t-il ordonné à GTL de mener les travaux à terme, mais il a aussi rendu la vente des biens de valeur de Redwater conditionnelle à l'abandon des biens inexploités par GTL lui-même ou de la vente de ces biens avec les biens de valeur de l'actif comme un tout unique. En agissant ainsi, l'AER a indûment fait abstraction de l'effet des renonciations de GTL. Cela demeure vrai indépendamment de la question de savoir si GTL pouvait (ou allait) être tenue personnellement responsable des frais d'abandon des biens susmentionnés au-delà de la valeur totale de l'actif.

[228] Mon collègue prétend que l'AER « n'a jamais essayé d'engager la responsabilité personnelle d'un syndic » (par. 107). Ce qui est clair, c'est qu'à la lumière des faits de l'espèce, l'AER a directement tenté de contraindre GTL à exécuter ou à payer lui-même les travaux d'abandon, que l'on qualifie cela de responsabilité personnelle ou non. Il est primordial de faire remarquer que le présent litige a commencé lorsque l'AER a déposé une demande visant à contraindre GTL à respecter ses obligations en tant que titulaire de permis, notamment l'obligation d'abandonner des biens inexploités. Sur le plan pratique, cela constituait une tentative de tenir GTL personnellement responsable. Où d'autre aurait-on pris l'argent nécessaire à l'abandon des biens visés par les renonciations? La valeur de l'actif dans son ensemble était négative, et l'AER a refusé de permettre à GTL de vendre isolément les biens de GTL had no way to recoup any value from the estate, as Redwater was bankrupt and no longer generating income. The only source of funds, in this scenario, was GTL itself. This is why the AER filed suit to compel GTL to carry out Redwater's abandonment obligations. As this makes clear, I cannot agree with the suggestion that the provincial regime has never been utilized to hold trustees personally liable in contravention of federal law. That is precisely what happened in this very case.

[229] This conclusion cannot be avoided by referring to the fact that, pursuant to orders of the Alberta courts, GTL has already sold the valuable Redwater assets and the proceeds are being held in trust pending the outcome of this appeal (see majority reasons, at para. 108). This is precisely the result the AER sought to prevent by precluding GTL from selling only the valuable properties, without the disclaimed ones. GTL was able to do so only as a direct result of this litigation.

[230] My colleague states that, if the AER "were to attempt to hold GTL personally liable under the Abandonment Orders, this would create an operational conflict between the OGCA and the Pipeline Act, and s. 14.06(2) of the BIA, rendering the former two Acts inoperative to the extent of the conflict" (para. 107). Thus, even on my colleague's interpretation of s. 14.06 — which I do not accept — an operational conflict does exist on the facts of this case, specifically as a result of the AER's application to the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench seeking to have GTL personally satisfy the environmental obligations associated with the disclaimed assets.

[231] All of that being said, creditors with provable claims can still seek payment in accordance with the BIA's priority scheme (Abitibi, at para. 98). As I discuss below, the AER's environmental claims remain valid as against the Redwater estate, and it may pursue those claims through the normal bankruptcy valeur. Personne n'aurait consenti à acheter les biens tous ensemble. GTL ne disposait par conséquent d'aucun moyen de recouvrer une quelconque valeur de l'actif, car Redwater était en faillite et ne générait plus aucun revenu. La seule source de fonds, dans ce scénario, était GTL lui-même. C'est pourquoi l'AER a intenté une poursuite visant à contraindre GTL à exécuter les obligations d'abandon de Redwater. Il est donc clair que je ne puis souscrire à l'idée que le régime provincial n'a jamais été utilisé pour tenir les syndics personnellement responsables en violation de la loi fédérale. C'est justement ce qui s'est passé dans la présente affaire.

[229] On ne peut éviter cette conclusion en invoquant le fait que, conformément aux ordonnances des tribunaux albertains, GTL a déjà vendu les biens de valeur de Redwater et que le produit de leur vente est détenu en fiducie en attendant l'issue du présent pourvoi (voir les motifs de la majorité, par. 108). C'est exactement le résultat que l'AER a cherché à prévenir en empêchant GTL de vendre uniquement les biens de valeur, sans les biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation. GTL n'est parvenu à le faire qu'à la suite du présent litige.

[230] Mon collègue dit que, si l'AER « devait tenter d'obliger personnellement GTL à se conformer aux ordonnances d'abandon, cela engenderait un conflit d'application entre, d'une part, l'OGCA et la Pipeline Act et, d'autre part, le par. 14.06(2) de la LFI, ce qui rendrait les deux premières lois inopérantes dans la mesure de ce conflit » (par. 107). Ainsi, même d'après l'interprétation donnée par mon collègue à l'art. 14.06 — que je ne retiens pas — il existe bel et bien un conflit d'application eu égard aux faits de l'espèce, surtout du fait de la demande présentée par l'AER à la Cour du Banc de la Reine de l'Alberta pour que GTL respecte personnellement les obligations environnementales associées aux biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation.

[231] Tout cela étant dit, les créanciers ayant des réclamations prouvables peuvent toujours demander un paiement conformément au régime de priorité établi par la LFI (Abitibi, par. 98). Comme je l'explique plus loin, les réclamations environnementales de l'AER demeurent valides à l'égard de l'actif de process. Thus, even if s. 14.06(4) does not permit GTL to disclaim the non-producing wells and relieve itself of the environmental obligations associated with them, it is nevertheless the case that the AER cannot compel GTL to satisfy its claims ahead of those of Redwater's secured creditors.

B. Frustration of Purpose

[232] The second branch of the paramountcy test is frustration of purpose. Even where dual compliance with both federal and provincial law is, strictly speaking, possible, provincial legislation or provisions will nevertheless be rendered inoperative to the extent that they have the effect of frustrating a valid federal legislative purpose (Moloney, at para. 25; Bank of Montreal v. Hall, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 121, at pp. 154-55; Canadian Western Bank, at para. 73). The focus of the analysis is on the effect of the provincial legislation or provisions, not its purpose (Moloney, at para. 28; Husky Oil, at para. 39).

[233] This Court has repeatedly recognized that one of the purposes of the BIA is "the equitable distribution of the bankrupt's assets among his or her creditors" (Moloney, at para. 32; Husky Oil, at para. 7). It achieves this goal through a collective proceeding model — one that maximizes creditors' total recovery and promotes order and efficiency by distributing the estate's assets in accordance with a designated priority scheme (Century Services Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2010 SCC 60, [2010] 3 S.C.R. 379, at para. 22). All claims that are "provable in bankruptcy" are subject to this priority scheme. Exercises of provincial power that have the effect of altering bankruptcy priorities are therefore inoperative because they frustrate Parliament's purpose of equitably distributing the estate's assets in accordance with the federal statutory regime (Abitibi, at para. 19; Husky Oil, at para. 32).

[234] The question here is whether the environmental claims asserted by the AER (i.e., the Abandonment Orders) are provable in bankruptcy. If they Redwater, et il peut faire valoir ces réclamations dans le cadre du processus normal de faillite. Donc, même si le par. 14.06(4) n'autorise pas GTL à renoncer aux puits inexploités et à se libérer des obligations environnementales qui s'y rattachent, il n'en demeure pas moins que l'AER ne peut pas contraindre GTL à régler ses propres réclamations avant celles des créanciers garantis de Redwater.

B. Entrave à la réalisation d'un objet fédéral

[232] Le second volet du test de la prépondérance est l'entrave à la réalisation d'un objet fédéral. Même lorsqu'il est à proprement parler possible de se conformer à la fois à la loi fédérale et à la loi provinciale, la loi ou les dispositions provinciales seront néanmoins rendues inopérantes dans la mesure où elles ont pour effet d'entraver la réalisation d'un objet valide d'une loi fédérale (Moloney, par. 25; Banque de Montréal c. Hall, [1990] 1 R.C.S. 121, p. 154-155; Banque canadienne de l'Ouest, par. 73). L'analyse est axée sur l'effet de la loi ou des dispositions provinciales, et non sur son objet (Moloney, par. 28; Husky Oil, par. 39).

[233] La Cour a maintes fois reconnu que l'un des objets de la LFI est « le partage équitable des biens du failli entre ses créanciers » (Moloney, par. 32; Husky Oil, par. 7). Elle réalise cet objectif au moyen d'un modèle de procédure collective — modèle qui maximise le recouvrement intégral au profit des créanciers et fait régner l'ordre et l'efficacité en partageant les biens de l'actif conformément à un régime de priorité désigné (Century Services Inc. c. Canada (Procureur général), 2010 CSC 60, [2010] 3 R.C.S. 379, par. 22). Toutes les réclamations « prouvables en matière de faillite » sont assujetties à ce régime de priorité. Les exercices d'un pouvoir provincial ayant pour effet de modifier les priorités en matière de faillite sont donc inopérants parce qu'ils entravent la réalisation de l'objectif du Parlement d'assurer le partage équitable des biens de l'actif conformément au régime établi par la loi fédérale (Abitibi, par. 19; Husky Oil, par. 32).

[234] Il s'agit de savoir en l'espèce si les réclamations environnementales que fait valoir l'AER (c.-à-d. les ordonnances d'abandon) sont prouvables are, then the AER is not permitted to assert those claims outside of the bankruptcy process and ahead of Redwater's secured creditors because this would frustrate the purpose of the federal priority scheme. Rather, it must abide by the BIA and seek recovery from the estate through the normal bankruptcy procedures (Abitibi, at para. 40).

[235] In Abitibi, this Court established a three-part test, rooted in the language of the BIA, to determine whether a claim is provable in bankruptcy: "First, there must be a debt, a liability or an obligation to a creditor. Second, the debt, liability or obligation must be incurred before the debtor becomes bankrupt. Third, it must be possible to attach a monetary value to the debt, liability or obligation" (para. 26 (emphasis in original)). Since there is no dispute that Redwater's environmental obligations arose before it became bankrupt, I limit my analysis below to the first and third prongs of the Abitibi test: whether the liability is owed to a creditor, and whether it is possible to attach a monetary value to that liability.

[236] The first prong of the Abitibi test asks whether the debt, liability or obligation at issue is owed by a bankrupt entity to a creditor. Deschamps J., writing for a majority of the Court, suggested that this is not an exacting requirement: "The only determination that has to be made at this point is whether the regulatory body has exercised its enforcement power against a debtor. When it does so, it identifies itself as a creditor, and the requirement of this stage of the analysis is satisfied" (para. 27 (emphasis added)). Though I would not go so far as to suggest that the analysis under the first prong is merely perfunctory or pro forma, and circumstances may well exist where it is not satisfied, Deschamps J. made clear in Abitibi that "[m]ost environmental regulatory bodies can be creditors", again stressing that government entities cannot systematically evade the priority requirements of federal bankruptcy legislation under the guise of enforcing public duties (para. 27 (emphasis added)).

en matière de faillite. Si elles le sont, l'AER n'est pas autorisé à faire valoir ces réclamations en dehors du processus de faillite et avant les créanciers garantis de Redwater, car cela entraverait la réalisation de l'objet du régime de priorité fédéral. Il doit plutôt se conformer à la LFI et tenter de recouvrer de l'actif par le truchement de la procédure normale de faillite (Abitibi, par. 40).

[235] Dans Abitibi, la Cour a établi un test à trois volets, fondé sur le libellé de la LFI, pour déterminer si une réclamation est prouvable en matière de faillite : « Premièrement, on doit être en présence d'une dette, d'un engagement ou d'une obligation envers un créancier. Deuxièmement, la dette, l'engagement ou l'obligation doit avoir pris naissance avant que le débiteur ne devienne failli. Troisièmement, il doit être possible d'attribuer une valeur pécuniaire à cette dette, cet engagement ou cette obligation » (par. 26 (en italique dans l'original)). Comme personne ne conteste le fait que les obligations environnementales de Redwater ont pris naissance avant que cette dernière ne devienne faillie, je limiterai mon analyse ci-dessous aux premier et troisième volets du test établi dans Abitibi : la question de savoir si l'engagement est dû à un créancier, et celle de savoir s'il est possible d'attribuer une valeur pécuniaire à cet engagement.

[236] Le premier volet du test Abitibi pose la question de savoir si la dette, l'engagement ou l'obligation en cause sont dus par une entité faillie à un créancier. S'exprimant au nom des juges majoritaires, la juge Deschamps a laissé entendre qu'il ne s'agit pas d'une exigence rigoureuse : « [à] cette étape, la seule question à trancher est de savoir si l'organisme administratif a exercé, à l'encontre d'un débiteur, son pouvoir de faire appliquer la loi. Lorsqu'il le fait, il s'identifie alors comme créancier et la condition de cette étape est respectée » (par. 27 (je souligne)). Je n'irais pas jusqu'à dire que l'analyse à effectuer au premier volet est une simple analyse superficielle ou pro forma et il peut fort bien exister des cas où il n'est pas satisfait à ce volet, mais la juge Deschamps indique clairement dans Abitibi que « [l]a plupart des organismes administratifs [environnementaux] peuvent agir à titre de créanciers » (par. 27 (je souligne)), soulignant encore une

Even Martin J.A., writing in dissent at the Court of Appeal in this case, acknowledged that "Abitibi cast[s] the creditor net widely" (para. 186). The language of Abitibi admits of no ambiguity, uncertainty or doubt in this regard.

[237] The majority suggests that applying Abitibi on its own terms will make it "impossible for a regulator not to be a creditor" (para. 136 (emphasis in original)). Without seeking to speculate on all possible scenarios, I would simply note that there will be many obvious circumstances in which regulators are not even exercising enforcement powers against particular debtors and the analysis from Abitibi can be concluded at a very early stage. Provincial regulators do many things that do not qualify as enforcement mechanisms against specific parties. For example, a regulatory agency may publish guidelines for the benefit of all actors in a certain industry or it may issue a license or permit to an individual. In such cases, any discussion of frustrating federal purposes will not go far. However, as Deschamps J. expressly acknowledged, the first prong of the test will have very broad application. This Court should not feel compelled to limit its scope when Abitibi employed clear language in full recognition of its wide-ranging effects.

[238] Here, there is no doubt that the AER exercised its enforcement power against a debtor when it issued orders requiring Redwater to perform the environmental work on the non-producing properties. The reasoning is simple: Redwater owes a debt to the AER, and the AER has attempted to enforce that debt by issuing the Abandonment Orders, which require Redwater to make good on its obligation. If Redwater (or GTL, as the receiver and trustee) does not abide by those orders — to the detriment of the estate's other creditors — it can be held liable fois que les entités gouvernementales ne sauraient systématiquement se soustraire aux exigences en matière de priorité de la loi fédérale sur la faillite sous le couvert de l'obligation de faire respecter les devoirs publics. Même la juge d'appel Martin, dans les motifs dissidents qu'elle a rédigés, a reconnu que [TRADUCTION] « l'arrêt Abitibi ratisse large en ce qui a trait à la qualité de créancier » (par. 186). Le texte de cet arrêt ne laisse place à aucune ambiguïté, incertitude ou doute à cet égard.

[237] Les juges majoritaires soutiennent que, si l'on applique tel quel l'arrêt Abitibi, cela « exclut la possibilité qu'un organisme de réglementation ne soit pas un créancier » (par. 136 (en italique dans l'original)). Sans vouloir conjecturer tous les scénarios possibles, je ferai simplement remarquer qu'il existe de nombreuses situations évidentes où des organismes de réglementation n'exercent même pas de pouvoirs d'application à l'encontre de débiteurs en particulier, et l'analyse tirée d'Abitibi peut être menée à terme très tôt. Les organismes de réglementation font bien des choses qui ne participent pas de mécanismes d'application à l'encontre de certaines parties. Par exemple, un organisme de réglementation peut publier des lignes directrices pour le bien de tous les acteurs d'une industrie donnée, ou encore délivrer une licence ou un permis à un particulier. Dans ces cas, toute analyse de l'entrave à la réalisation d'objets fédéraux sera brève. Or, comme l'a explicitement reconnu la juge Deschamps, le premier volet du test sera d'application très large. Notre Cour ne devrait pas se sentir contrainte d'en restreindre la portée alors que des termes clairs sont employés dans cet arrêt pour reconnaître sans réserve ses vastes effets.

[238] En l'espèce, il ne fait aucun doute que l'AER a exercé son pouvoir d'appliquer la loi à l'encontre d'une débitrice lorsqu'il a rendu les ordonnances enjoignant à Redwater d'accomplir les travaux environnementaux sur les biens inexploités. Le raisonnement est simple : Redwater a une dette envers l'AER, et l'AER a tenté de recouvrer cette créance en rendant les ordonnances d'abandon, qui enjoignent à Redwater d'honorer son obligation. Si Redwater (ou GTL, en tant que séquestre et syndic) ne respecte pas ces ordonnances — au détriment des autres under provincial law. This is, by any definition, an exercise of enforcement power, which is precisely what Abitibi describes. In fact, the AER itself conceded this point twice — first before the Court of Queen's Bench, and again at the Court of Appeal (chambers judge reasons, at para. 164; C.A. reasons, at para. 73).

[239] The conclusion that I reach with respect to the AER's status as a creditor follows from a straightforward application of Abitibi. My colleague, however, seeks to reformulate this prong of the test. He suggests that a regulator is acting as a creditor only where it is not acting in the public interest and where the regulator itself, or the general revenue fund, is the beneficiary of the environmental obligation. He endorses the holding allegedly made in Northern Badger that "a regulator enforcing a public duty by way of non-monetary order is not a creditor" (para. 130).

[240] In my view, it is neither appropriate nor necessary in this case to attempt to redefine this prong of Abitibi and narrow the broad definition of "creditor" provided by Deschamps J. This Court should leave her clear description of the provable claim standard to stand on its own terms. Respectfully, I disagree with the manner in which the majority is attempting to reformulate the "creditor" analysis, for a number of reasons.

[241] Firstly, I do not believe that this case represents an appropriate opportunity to revisit the "creditor" stage of the Abitibi test. The AER conceded in both of the courts below that it was in fact a creditor of GTL. As a direct result of these concessions, neither the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench nor the majority of the Court of Appeal directly addressed this issue; instead, they merely provided cursory comments. This issue appears to have been raised for the first time by Martin J.A. in her dissenting judgment. However, even her analysis is relatively brief, comprising only three paragraphs and consisting mainly of the statement that the costs of créanciers de l'actif — elle peut être tenue responsable en application de la loi provinciale. Il s'agit, par définition, de l'exercice d'un pouvoir d'appliquer la loi, ce qui est précisément ce que décrit l'arrêt Abitibi. En fait, l'AER a lui-même concédé ce point à deux reprises — la première fois devant la Cour du Banc de la Reine, et la deuxième fois devant la Cour d'appel (motifs du juge en cabinet, par. 164; motifs de la Cour d'appel, par. 73).

[239] La conclusion que je tire quant au statut de créancier de l'AER découle d'une application pure et simple de l'arrêt Abitibi. Mon collègue, en revanche, cherche à reformuler ce volet du critère. Il soutient qu'un organisme de réglementation agit comme créancier seulement lorsqu'il ne le fait pas dans l'intérêt public et lorsque l'organisme lui-même, ou le Trésor, est le bénéficiaire de l'obligation environnementale. Il fait sienne la conclusion qui aurait été tirée dans Northern Badger selon laquelle « un organisme de réglementation faisant respecter un devoir public au moyen d'une ordonnance non pécuniaire n'est pas un créancier » (par. 130).

[240] À mon sens, il n'est ni approprié ni nécessaire en l'espèce d'essayer de redéfinir ce volet du critère Abitibi et de restreindre le large sens attribué par la juge Deschamps au mot « créancier ». La Cour devrait s'en tenir à la description claire que fait la juge Deschamps de la norme de la réclamation prouvable. Avec égards, je ne puis me rallier à la façon dont les juges majoritaires tentent de reformuler l'analyse relative au « créancier », et ce, pour plusieurs raisons.

[241] Premièrement, je ne crois pas que la présente affaire soit une bonne occasion de revoir l'étape « créancier » du critère Abitibi. L'AER a concédé devant les deux tribunaux d'instance inférieure qu'il était en effet un créancier de GTL. Ces concessions ont pour conséquence directe que la question n'a été abordée directement ni par la Cour du Banc de la Reine de l'Alberta ni par les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel, qui se sont plutôt contentés de formuler de brefs commentaires. Cette question semble avoir été soulevée pour la première par la juge d'appel Martin dans ses motifs dissidents. Toutefois, même son analyse est relativement brève, ne compte abandonment are "not owed to the Regulator, or to the province" (para. 185). While it is true that the parties briefly addressed this issue in their written and oral submissions to this Court, it was clearly not a substantial focus of their arguments. Without the benefit of considered reasons from the lower courts or thorough submissions on the continued application of the first prong of the test formulated in Abitibi, this Court should not attempt to significantly alter it.

[242] Secondly, the majority states that no fairness concerns are raised by disregarding the AER's concessions below. It makes this point predominantly because the issue was raised and argued before this Court and because of the AER's unilateral assertion in its letter to GTL in May 2015. However, it is important to note that the effect of the AER's concessions was that GTL and ATB Financial were no longer required to adduce any evidence on this issue (S. N. Lederman, A. W. Bryant and M. K. Fuerst, The Law of Evidence in Canada (5th ed. 2018), at p. 1387). This point is important given that the majority's reformulation of the "creditor" requirement under the first prong of the test is highly fact-specific and dependent on the circumstances of the particular case. As a direct result of the AER's concession in the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench, we cannot know what evidence GTL or ATB Financial could have adduced on this issue. Therefore, there may indeed be real prejudice occasioned to these parties by disregarding the AER's concession at this point in time.

[243] Thirdly, my colleague relies on the fact that the chambers judge in Abitibi found that the Province had already expropriated three of the five sites for which it issued remediation orders and was likely using the orders as a means to offset AbitibiBowater's NAFTA claims. While the chambers judge did in fact make these findings, they were inconsequential to Deschamps J.'s analysis on the "creditor" prong of the test. When applying the test to the facts of que trois paragraphes et se limite principalement à l'affirmation portant que les coûts liés à l'abandon ne sont pas dûs à [TRADUCTION] « l'organisme de réglementation ou à la province » (par. 185). Bien que les parties aient abordé succinctement la question dans leurs observations écrites et leurs plaidoiries présentées à la Cour, ce n'était clairement pas au cœur de leur argumentaire. En l'absence de motifs réfléchis des tribunaux d'instance inférieure ou d'observations exhaustives sur l'application continue du premier volet du test formulé dans Abitibi, la Cour ne devrait pas tenter de le modifier substantiellement.

[242] Deuxièmement, selon les juges majoritaires, on ne soulève aucune préoccupation en matière d'équité en ne tenant pas compte de la concession faite par l'AER devant les tribunaux d'instance inférieure. La majorité apporte cette précision principalement parce que la question a été soulevée et débattue devant la Cour et en raison de l'affirmation unilatérale contenue dans la lettre de l'AER adressée à GTL en mai 2015. Il importe toutefois de noter que les concessions de l'AER ont eu pour effet que GTL et ATB Financial ne sont plus tenus de présenter de la preuve à cet égard (S. N. Lederman, A. W. Bryant et M. K. Fuerst, The Law of Evidence in Canada (5e éd. 2018), p. 1387). Il s'agit d'un point important étant donné que la reformulation, par les juges majoritaires, de l'exigence « créancier » au premier volet du test est largement tributaire des faits et dépend des circonstances de l'affaire en cause. La concession de l'AER devant la Cour du Banc de la Reine de l'Alberta a pour résultat direct qu'il nous est impossible de savoir quels éléments de preuve GTL ou ATB Financial aurait présentés à ce sujet. Par conséquent, ne pas tenir compte de la concession à ce moment-ci pourrait bien causer un véritable préjudice aux parties.

[243] Troisièmement, mon collègue s'appuie sur le fait que, dans Abitibi, le juge en cabinet a conclu que la Province avait déjà exproprié trois des cinq sites pour lesquels elle avait émis des ordonnances exigeant la décontamination et qu'elle utilisait vraisemblablement ces ordonnances pour compenser les réclamations d'AbitibiBowater fondées sur l'ALENA. Bien que le juge en cabinet soit effectivement arrivé à ces conclusions, celles-ci n'ont eu

Abitibi, she explained that the first prong was "easily satisfied" because "the Province had identified itself as a creditor by resorting to [Environmental Protection Act, S.N.L. 2002, c. E-14.2] enforcement mechanisms" (Abitibi, at para. 49). She placed no reliance on the fact that the Province might itself derive a financial benefit from its actions and was not enforcing a purely public duty. Her analysis was in no way based on a finding that the Province's actions were a "colourable attempt" to recover a debt or that they demonstrated an "ulterior motive" (majority reasons, at para. 128).

[244] Fourthly, in my view, it is incorrect to rely on Northern Badger in this case. That decision does not support my colleague's position in the manner he alleges. The issue in Northern Badger was also whether environmental remediation orders could be considered claims provable in bankruptcy. However, the crux of the dispute was whether "enforcing the requirement for the proper abandonment of oil and gas wells" (p. 57) gave rise to a provable claim because it would require the receiver to expend funds. Laycraft C.J.A. never addressed the question of whether the regulator could be said to have a contingent claim because it would complete the abandonment work itself and assert a claim for reimbursement. It was in the context of the regulator requiring the receiver to fulfill the abandonment obligations itself that the Alberta Court of Appeal discussed the enforcement of a public duty. It is important to carefully examine what the Court of Appeal actually said in this regard:

> The statutory provisions requiring the abandonment of oil and gas wells are part of the general law of Alberta, binding every citizen of the province. All who become licensees of oil and gas wells are bound by them. Similar statutory obligations bind citizens in many other areas of

aucune incidence sur l'analyse de la juge Deschamps relativement au volet « créancier » du test. Appliquant le test aux faits dans l'affaire Abitibi, elle a expliqué qu'il était « facile de répondre » au premier volet étant donné que « la province s'est elle-même présentée comme créancière en ayant recours aux mécanismes d'application de l'[Environmental Protection Act, S.N.L. 2002, c. E-14.2] » (Abitibi, par. 49). Elle n'a pas tenu compte du fait que la Province pourrait elle-même tirer un avantage financier de ses actions et qu'elle n'appliquait pas un devoir purement public. Son analyse ne reposait aucunement sur la conclusion suivant laquelle les mesures de la Province étaient une « tentative déguisée » de recouvrer une créance ou témoignaient de « motifs obliques » (motifs des juges majoritaires, par. 128).

[244] Quatrièmement, il me paraît incorrect de s'appuyer sur l'arrêt Northern Badger en l'espèce. Cet arrêt n'étaye pas la position de mon collègue comme il l'affirme. L'arrêt Northern Badger portait également sur la question de savoir si des ordonnances de décontamination environnementale pouvaient être considérées comme des réclamations prouvables en matière de faillite. Le nœud du litige consistait toutefois à établir si [TRADUCTION] « l'application de l'exigence concernant l'abandon de puits de pétrole et de gaz » (p. 57) donnait naissance en soi à une réclamation prouvable parce qu'elle exigerait du séquestre qu'il débourse des fonds. Le juge en chef Laycraft de la Cour d'appel n'a jamais abordé la question de savoir s'il était possible d'affirmer que l'organisme de réglementation pouvait faire valoir une réclamation éventuelle du fait qu'il achèverait lui-même les travaux et présenterait une demande de remboursement. C'est dans le contexte où l'organisme de réglementation exige du séquestre qu'il s'acquitte lui-même des obligations liées à l'abandon que la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta s'est prononcée sur l'exécution d'un devoir public par l'organisme de réglementation. Il est important d'examiner avec soin les propos tenus par la Cour d'appel à cet égard :

> [TRADUCTION] Les dispositions statutaires exigeant l'abandon des puits de pétrole et de gaz font partie des lois d'application générale de l'Alberta et lient tous les citoyens de la province. Quiconque devient titulaire de permis relativement à de tels puits y est assujetti. Les modern life. Rules relating to health, or the prevention of fires, or the clearing of ice and snow, or the demolition of unsafe structures are examples which come to mind. But the obligation of the citizen is not to the peace officer, or public authority which enforces the law. The duty is owed as a public duty by all the citizens of the community to their fellow citizens. When the citizen subject to the order complies, the result is not the recovery of money by the peace officer or public authority, or of a judgment for money, nor is that the object of the whole process. Rather, it is simply the enforcement of the general law. The enforcing authority does not become a "creditor" of the citizen on whom the duty is imposed.

citoyens sont liés par des obligations statutaires similaires dans de nombreux domaines de la vie moderne. Notons, par exemple, les règles relatives à la santé, à la prévention des incendies, à l'enlèvement de la glace et de la neige ou à la démolition des structures non sécuritaires. Mais l'obligation qui incombe au citoyen n'incombe pas au policier ou à l'autorité publique qui applique la loi. L'obligation est établie comme une obligation à caractère public qui doit être respectée par l'ensemble des citoyens de la collectivité à l'égard de leurs concitoyens. Lorsque le citoyen visé par l'ordonnance s'y conforme, le résultat n'est pas perçu comme le recouvrement d'une somme d'argent par un agent de la paix ou l'autorité publique, ni comme l'exécution d'un jugement ordonnant le paiement d'une somme d'argent; d'ailleurs, cela ne constitue pas non plus l'objectif de l'ensemble du processus. Il faut plutôt y voir l'application d'une loi générale. L'organisme d'application de la loi ne devient pas un « créancier » du citoyen à qui incombe l'obligation.

It is true that this board has the power by statute to create in its own favour a statutory debt if it chooses to do so. It may, under Sections 91(1) and (2) of the Oil and Gas Conservation Act (discussed above) do the work of abandonment itself and become a creditor for the sums expended. But the Board has not done so in this case. Rather it is simply in the course of enforcing observance of a part of the general law of Alberta. [Emphasis added; paras. 33-34.]

Il est vrai que la loi autorise l'Office à créer une créance légale en sa faveur s'il le désire. En vertu des par. 91(1) et (2) de l'Oil and Gas Conservation Act (analysée précédemment), l'Office peut exécuter lui-même les travaux d'abandon et devenir créancier à l'égard des sommes dépensées. Mais il n'a pas procédé de cette façon en l'espèce. En réalité, il applique simplement une partie des lois d'application générale de l'Alberta. [Je souligne; par. 33-34.]

[245] As is evident from para. 34 of Northern Badger, quoted above, the Court of Appeal never stated in that case that a regulator is not — or cannot be — a creditor when it is acting to enforce a public duty. In Abitibi, when referring to Northern Badger, Deschamps J. explained that the Alberta Court of Appeal "found that the duty to undertake remediation work is owed to the public at large until the regulator exercises its power to assert a monetary claim" (Abitibi, at para. 44 (emphasis added)). Laycraft C.J.A. accepted that when the regulator fulfills an environmental obligation itself and asserts a claim for reimbursement, it does indeed "become a creditor for the sums expended". Even in this situation, the public is still the ultimate beneficiary of the remediation work. This is largely consistent with Deschamps J.'s formulation of the test for a provable claim. In fact, this Court simply extended this principle in Abitibi, concluding that a regulator may also be a creditor with a provable contingent claim

[245] Comme il ressort du par. 34 précité de l'arrêt Northern Badger, la Cour d'appel n'a jamais mentionné dans cette affaire qu'un organisme de réglementation n'a pas — ou ne peut avoir — le statut de créancier lorsqu'il fait respecter un devoir public. En parlant de Northern Badger dans l'arrêt Abitibi, la juge Deschamps a expliqué que la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta a « conclu que l'obligation d'entreprendre les travaux de décontamination est due au public en général jusqu'à ce que l'organisme administratif exerce son pouvoir de faire valoir une réclamation pécuniaire » (Abitibi, par. 44 (je souligne)). Le juge Laycraft a reconnu que l'organisme de règlementation qui s'acquitte lui-même d'une obligation environnementale et présente une demande de remboursement devient effectivement [TRADUCTION] « créancier à l'égard des sommes dépensées ». Même dans une telle situation, le public demeure l'ultime bénéficiaire des travaux de décontamination, ce qui cadre largement avec la norme de la réclamation when it is sufficiently certain that the regulator will perform the remediation work and advance a claim for reimbursement. This is precisely the situation with the AER and the OWA here, as I will explain in more detail below. The Alberta Court of Appeal did not frame the issue in terms of the three-part test that would later be developed in Abitibi; it did not divide its analysis of whether a provable claim existed. However, viewed properly, Deschamps J. dealt with the concerns raised in Northern Badger under the third prong of the Abitibi test. It is not appropriate to duplicate these principles under the first prong as well, as the majority proposes. For this reason, it is misguided to rely on Northern Badger in this appeal to conclude that the AER is not a creditor.

[246] However, even if the majority were correct about the reasoning in Northern Badger with respect to whether regulators enforcing public duties can be creditors — which I do not concede — I do not accept its conclusion that Abitibi did not overturn that reasoning. The Court was well aware of the decision in Northern Badger and cited it directly. Despite this, Deschamps J., when formulating the first prong of the test, made no distinction between regulators acting in the public interest and regulators acting for their own benefit. Instead, she stated that "the only determination that has to be made" (para. 27) is whether the regulator is exercising its enforcement powers against a debtor. In referring to Northern Badger, she expressly noted that "[t]he real question is not to whom the obligation is owed, as this question is answered by the statute, which determines who can require that it be discharged" (paras. 27 and 46 (emphasis added)).

[247] Finally, and perhaps most importantly, suggesting that a regulator is not acting as a creditor prouvable énoncée par la juge Deschamps. En fait, notre Cour a simplement élargi ce principe dans Abitibi, concluant que l'organisme de réglementation peut également avoir le statut de créancier relativement à une revendication éventuelle prouvable s'il est suffisamment certain qu'il exécutera les travaux de décontamination et présentera une demande de remboursement. Comme je l'expliquerai plus en détail, il s'agit précisément de la situation dans laquelle se trouvent l'AER et OWA en l'espèce. La Cour d'appel de l'Alberta n'a pas formulé la question sous l'angle du test à trois volets qui a été élaboré par la suite dans Abitibi; elle n'a pas divisé son analyse de la question de savoir s'il existait une réclamation prouvable. Toutefois, il est juste de considérer que la juge Deschamps a traité des préoccupations exprimées dans Northern Badger en fonction du troisième volet du test Abitibi. Il ne convient pas de reprendre ces principes au premier volet également, comme le propose la majorité. C'est pourquoi il est malavisé de se fonder sur l'arrêt Northern Badger en l'espèce pour conclure que l'AER n'est pas un créancier.

[246] Cependant, même si les juges majoritaires avaient raison quant au raisonnement dans l'arrêt Northern Badger à savoir si un organisme de réglementation faisant respecter un devoir public peut avoir le statut de créancier — ce que je ne concède pas — je ne retiens pas leur conclusion portant que l'arrêt Abitibi n'a pas écarté ce raisonnement. La Cour était bien au fait de la décision rendue dans Northern Badger et l'a citée textuellement. Malgré cela, lorsqu'elle a formulé le premier volet du test, la juge Deschamps n'a établi aucune distinction entre les organismes de réglementation qui agissent dans un intérêt public et ceux qui agissent dans leur propre intérêt. Elle a plutôt affirmé que « la seule question à trancher » (par. 27) est de savoir si l'organisme exerce ses pouvoirs d'application de la loi à l'encontre d'un débiteur. En mentionnant l'arrêt Northern Badger, elle a souligné expressément que « [l]a véritable question n'est pas de savoir à qui est due l'obligation, puisque la loi y répond en indiquant qui peut en exiger l'exécution » (par. 27 et 46 (je souligne)).

[247] Enfin, et fait peut-être plus important encore, laisser entendre qu'un organisme de réglementation where its environmental enforcement activities are aimed at the public good and are for the benefit of the public effectively overrules the first prong of the Abitibi test. Under my colleague's approach, it is no longer the case that the only determination that has to be made at the creditor stage of the analysis is "whether the regulatory body has exercised its enforcement power against a debtor" (Abitibi, at para. 27). Instead, the court must consider whether the regulatory body is enforcing a public duty and whether it stands to benefit financially from the fulfillment of the obligation in question.

[248] Provincial regulators, in exercising their statutory environmental powers, will, in some sense, virtually always be acting in some public interest or for the benefit of some segment of the public. Under my colleague's reformulation of the first prong of the Abitibi test, it will be nearly impossible to find that regulators acting to protect environmental interests are ever creditors, outside the facts of Abitibi itself. As a result, provincial entities will be able to completely disregard the BIA's priority scheme as long as they can plausibly point to some public interest that is furthered by their actions. Such a result strips Abitibi of its central holding and entitles provincial regulators to easily upend Parliament's purpose of providing an equitable recovery scheme in bankruptcy for all creditors.

[249] In my view, it is insufficient to simply note that the facts of Abitibi differ from those of the present appeal (majority reasons, at para. 136). Deschamps J.'s broad articulation of the first prong of the test was in no way made dependent upon the particular facts of Abitibi. She sought to provide a clear general framework for determining when a regulator will be classified as a creditor — a framework that the majority's reasons effectively rewrite.

[250] Further, it is worth noting that this Court in Moloney followed Abitibi in applying the broad n'agit pas comme créancier quand ses activités de protection de l'environnement visent le bien public et profitent au public écarte dans les faits le premier volet du test Abitibi. Suivant l'approche de mon collègue, la question de savoir « si l'organisme [de réglementation] a exercé, à l'encontre d'un débiteur, son pouvoir de faire appliquer la loi » (Abitibi, par. 27) n'est plus la seule question à trancher à l'étape « créancier » de l'analyse. Le tribunal doit plutôt se demander si l'organisme de réglementation fait respecter un devoir public et s'il peut tirer un avantage financier de l'acquittement de l'obligation en question.

[248] Dans l'exercice des pouvoirs que la loi leur confie en matière d'environnement, les organismes de réglementation provinciaux agissent, en quelque sorte, toujours dans un intérêt public ou au bénéfice d'une partie de la population. Selon le premier volet du test Abitibi reformulé par mon collègue, il sera presque impossible de conclure que les organismes de réglementation protégeant les droits environnementaux sont des « créanciers » à l'extérieur du cadre de l'arrêt Abitibi lui-même. Par conséquent, les entités provinciales pourront totalement ignorer le régime de priorité de la LFI tant qu'elles sont en mesure de relever un quelconque intérêt public qui est servi par leurs actions. Pareil résultat vide l'arrêt Abitibi de sa conclusion centrale et permet aux organismes de réglementation provinciaux de faire obstacle aisément à l'objectif du Parlement d'instaurer un régime équitable de recouvrement des créances en matière de faillite au bénéfice de tous les créanciers.

[249] À mon avis, il ne suffit pas de noter simplement que les faits de l'affaire Abitibi diffèrent de ceux de l'espèce (motifs des juges majoritaires, par. 136). Les termes larges employés par la juge Deschamps pour formuler le premier volet du test n'étaient aucunement tributaires des faits propres à cette affaire. Elle a cherché à établir un cadre général clair indiquant dans quelles circonstances l'organisme de réglementation sera considéré comme un créancier, un cadre effectivement remanié dans les motifs de la majorité.

[250] En outre, il convient de souligner que, dans Moloney, la Cour a suivi l'arrêt Abitibi en definition of "creditor". In Moloney, this Court concluded that the Province of Alberta was acting as a creditor even though the debt it was collecting was reimbursement for compensating a third party who had been injured by the debtor in a car accident (para. 55). I fail to see how any meaningful distinction can be drawn between that situation and a situation in which a regulator seeks reimbursement for the costs incurred to remedy environmental damage caused to the land of third parties by the debtor.

[251] "[G]reat care should be taken" before this Court overturns or overrules one of its prior decisions (Teva Canada Ltd. v. TD Canada Trust, 2017 SCC 51, [2017] 2 S.C.R. 317, at para. 65). It is "a step not to be lightly undertaken" (Canada v. Craig, 2012 SCC 43, [2012] 2 S.C.R. 489, at para. 24). In order to do so, "the Court must be satisfied based on compelling reasons that the precedent was wrongly decided and should be overruled" (Craig, at para. 25; see also Teva, at para. 65). The reasons for exercising such caution are clear and sound, namely to ensure "certainty, consistency and institutional legitimacy" and to recognize that "the public relies on our disciplined ability to respect precedent" (Teva, at para. 65). When this Court decides that it is necessary to depart from one of its past decision, it should be clear about what it is doing and why.

[252] Despite these clear admonitions against this Court too easily overturning its own precedents, that is precisely what the majority proposes to do in this case. Its approach effectively overrules the unequivocal definition of "creditor" provided in Abitibi — a considered decision rendered by a majority of this Court a mere six years ago. Not only does the majority fail to provide compelling reasons why Deschamps J.'s clear definition is wrong, but it also does not acknowledge that it is overturning a recent decision of this Court, rejecting the suggestion that this is the impact of its reasoning (para. 136). Further, this is being done without complete and robust submissions on the issue. Such an approach to our own precedents does not serve appliquant la définition large de « créancier ». Dans cette affaire, la Cour a conclu que la province de l'Alberta agissait à titre de créancier même si la créance qu'elle cherchait à recouvrer était le remboursement d'une indemnité versée à une tierce partie blessée par le débiteur dans un accident de voiture (par. 55). Je ne vois pas en quoi il est possible d'établir quelque véritable distinction que ce soit entre cette situation et celle d'un organisme de réglementation qui chercherait à obtenir le remboursement des dépenses engagées pour réparer des dommages environnementaux causés au terrain d'un tiers par le débiteur.

[251] « [U]ne grande prudence s'impose » avant que notre Cour n'infirme ou n'écarte l'un de ses précédents (Teva Canada Ltée c. TD Canada Trust, 2017 CSC 51, [2017] 2 R.C.S. 317, par. 65). Cette étape ne peut être accomplie « à la légère » (Canada c. Craig, 2012 CSC 43, [2012] 2 R.C.S. 489, par. 24). Pour ce faire, la Cour doit « être convaincue, pour des raisons impérieuses, que la décision est erronée et qu'elle devrait être écartée » (Craig, par. 25; voir aussi Teva, par. 65). Il y de bonnes raisons qui, clairement, justifient de prendre une telle précaution, à savoir assurer « la certitude, la cohérence et la légitimité institutionnelle » et reconnaître que « le public s'attend à ce que nous respections scrupuleusement nos précédents » (Teva, par. 65). Lorsque la Cour juge nécessaire de s'écarter de l'un de ses précédents, sa décision et ce qui la motive devraient être clairs.

[252] Malgré ces mises en garde claires contre l'idée pour la Cour d'écarter trop aisément ses propres précédents, c'est précisément ce que les juges majoritaires proposent de faire en l'espèce. Leur approche revient, dans les faits, à infirmer la définition sans équivoque de « créancier » énoncée dans l'arrêt Abitibi — une décision réfléchie rendue par les juges majoritaires de la Cour il y a six ans à peine. En plus de ne fournir aucune raison impérieuse qui expliquerait en quoi la définition claire de la juge Deschamps est erronée, les juges majoritaires, dans leurs motifs, ne reconnaissent pas qu'ils écartent une décision récente de la Cour et rejettent la proposition que c'est là l'incidence de leur raisonnement (par. 136). Qui plus est, ils ont pris leur décision en l'absence d'observations complètes the goals of certainty, consistency or institutional legitimacy.

[253] This Court should continue to apply the "creditor" prong of the test as it was clearly articulated in Abitibi. Deschamps J.'s definition ensures that provincial regulators are not able to easily appropriate for themselves a higher priority in bankruptcy and undermine Parliament's priority scheme. It advances the goals of orderliness and fairness in insolvency proceedings. Under that broad standard, the AER plainly acted as a creditor with respect to the Redwater estate. That is likely why it conceded this point in both of the courts below.

[254] Since there is no dispute that the second prong of the Abitibi test is satisfied, I turn next to the third prong, which asks whether it is sufficiently certain that the regulator will perform the work and make a claim for reimbursement. As explained in Abitibi in the context of an environmental order:

> With respect to the third requirement, that it be possible to attach a monetary value to the obligation, the question is whether orders that are not expressed in monetary terms can be translated into such terms. I note that when a regulatory body claims an amount that is owed at the relevant date, that is, when it frames its order in monetary terms, the court does not need to make this determination, because what is being claimed is an "indebtedness" and therefore clearly falls within the meaning of "claim" as defined in s. 12(1) of the CCAA.
>
> The criterion used by courts to determine whether a contingent claim will be included in the insolvency process is whether the event that has not yet occurred is too remote or speculative (Confederation Treasury Services Ltd. (Bankrupt), Re (1997), 96 O.A.C. 75). In the context of an environmental order, this means that there must be sufficient indications that the regulatory body that triggered the et étoffées à ce sujet. Adopter une telle approche à l'égard de nos propres précédents ne permet pas d'atteindre les objectifs de certitude, de cohérence ou de légitimité institutionnelle.

[254] Puisque personne ne conteste qu'il est satisfait au second volet du test Abitibi, je passe maintenant au troisième volet, qui pose la question de savoir s'il est suffisamment certain que l'organisme de réglementation exécutera les travaux et présentera une demande de remboursement. Comme l'explique l'arrêt Abitibi, dans le contexte d'une ordonnance environnementale :

> En ce qui concerne la troisième condition, soit qu'il doit être possible d'attribuer à l'obligation une valeur pécuniaire, la question est de savoir si des ordonnances qui ne sont pas formulées en termes pécuniaires peuvent être formulées en de tels termes. Je souligne que lorsqu'un organisme administratif réclame une somme qui est due à la date pertinente, il formule ainsi son ordonnance en termes pécuniaires. Le tribunal n'a alors aucune détermination à faire à cette étape car ce qui est réclamé est une « dette » et est, par conséquent, clairement visé par la définition d'une « réclamation » prévue au par. 12(1) de la LACC.
> Le critère retenu par les tribunaux pour décider si une réclamation éventuelle sera incluse dans le processus d'insolvabilité est celui qui consiste à déterminer si l'événement non encore survenu est trop éloigné ou conjectural (Confederation Treasury Service Ltd. (Bankrupt), Re (1997), 96 O.A.C. 75). Dans le contexte d'une ordonnance environnementale, cela signifie qu'il doit y avoir enforcement mechanism will ultimately perform remediation work and assert a monetary claim to have its costs reimbursed. If there is sufficient certainty in this regard, the court will conclude that the order can be subjected to the insolvency process. [Emphasis added; paras. 30 and 36.]

[255] In my view, it is sufficiently certain that either the AER or the OWA will ultimately perform the abandonment and reclamation work and assert a monetary claim for reimbursement. Therefore, the final prong of the Abitibi test is satisfied. The chambers judge made three critical findings of fact — each of which is entitled to deference on appeal (Housen v. Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235, at para. 10) — that easily support this conclusion.

[256] First, Wittmann C.J. found that GTL was not in possession of the disclaimed properties and, in any event, "has no ability to perform any kind of work on these assets" because the environmental liabilities exceeded the value of the estate itself (para. 170; see also Abitibi, at para. 53 where the Court stated that: "Abitibi had no means to perform the remediation work"). He discounted the possibility that any of Redwater's working interest participants would step in to perform the work, even for the small number of Redwater's licensed assets for which such partners existed (chambers judge reasons, at para. 171). In sum, he concluded that "there is no other party who could be compelled to carry out the abandonment work" (para. 172).

[257] Two decisions of the Ontario Court of Appeal highlight why this is important. In Nortel Networks Corp., Re, 2013 ONCA 599, 6 C.B.R. (6th) 159, Juriansz J.A. found that the "sufficient certainty" standard was not satisfied in respect of certain sites because those sites had already been sold so the purchasers could be compelled to carry out the work on the basis that they were jointly and severally liable for the remediation obligations (paras. 39-40). But in Northstar Aerospace Inc., Re, 2013 ONCA 600, 8 C.B.R. (6th) 154, Juriansz J.A. found that the des indications suffisantes permettant de conclure que l'organisme administratif qui a eu recours aux mécanismes d'application de la loi effectuera en fin de compte des travaux de décontamination et présentera une réclamation pécuniaire afin d'obtenir le remboursement de ses débours. Si cela est suffisamment certain, le tribunal conclura que l'ordonnance peut être assujettie au processus d'insolvabilité. [Je souligne; par. 30 et 36]

[255] À mon avis, il est suffisamment certain que l'AER ou l'OWA effectuera ultimement les travaux d'abandon et de remise en état et fera valoir une réclamation pécuniaire afin d'obtenir un remboursement. Il est donc satisfait au dernier volet du test Abitibi. Le juge en cabinet a tiré trois conclusions de fait cruciales — chacune d'elles commandant la déférence en appel (Housen c. Nikolaisen, 2002 CSC 33, [2002] 2 R.C.S. 235, par. 10) — qui appuient aisément cette conclusion.

[256] Premièrement, le juge en chef Wittmann a conclu que GTL n'était pas en possession des biens visés par les renonciations et, de toute façon, il [TRADUCTION] « ne peut pas exécuter de travaux sur les biens » parce que les engagements environnementaux dépassaient la valeur de l'actif même (par. 170; voir également Abitibi, par. 53, où la Cour a dit que : « Abitibi ne disposait d'aucune ressource pour exécuter les travaux »). Il a écarté la possibilité que les participants en participation directe de Redwater se chargent de le faire même à l'égard des quelques biens visés par des permis de Redwater pour lesquels de tels partenaires existaient (motifs du juge en cabinet, par. 171). Bref, il a conclu [TRADUCTION] « qu'il n'existe aucune autre partie susceptible d'être contrainte d'exécuter les travaux d'abandon » (par. 172).

[257] Deux décisions de la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario font ressortir pourquoi cela est important. Dans Nortel Networks Corp., Re, 2013 ONCA 599, 6 C.B.R. (6th) 159, le juge Juriansz a conclu qu'il n'était pas satisfait au critère de la « certitude suffisante » relativement à certains sites parce que ceux-ci avaient déjà été achetés. Les acheteurs pouvaient par conséquent être contraints d'exécuter les travaux parce qu'ils étaient solidairement responsables des obligations de décontamination (par. 39-40). Mais dans Northstar Aerospace Inc., Re, 2013 ONCA 600,

"sufficient certainty" standard was satisfied because there was no purchaser that could be compelled by the regulator to complete the work. While it is true that fresh evidence on appeal revealed that the Ministry of the Environment had commenced the remediation work, Juriansz J.A. found that the fact that there were no subsequent purchasers had grounded the application judge's implicit conclusion regarding sufficient certainty (paras. 16-17). The present case is like Northstar, which is perfectly applicable to the facts of this case: there is no purchaser to take on Redwater's assets, and the debtor itself is insolvent. The chambers judge in this case concluded that there was no other party who could be compelled to carry out the work.

[258] Second, in light of the fact that neither GTL nor Redwater's working interest participants would (or could) undertake this work, Wittmann C.J. found as a fact that "the AER will ultimately be responsible for [the abandonment] costs" (para. 171). He concluded that "the AER has the power [to seek recovery of abandonment costs] and has actually performed the work on occasion" (para. 168). In fact, in this very case, "the AER has expressly stated an intention to seek reimbursement for the costs of abandoning the renounced assets" (para. 172). This conclusion finds ample support in the record. In a cover letter sent with the Abandonment Orders on July 15, 2015, the AER unambiguously stated that if Redwater failed to abandon the disclaimed properties in accordance with its instructions, "the AER will, without further notice, use its process to have the properties abandoned" (GTL's Record, vol. I, at p. 102 (emphasis added)). The letter further stated that "[t]he AER will exercise all remedies available to it to recover the costs from the liable parties" (p. 102 (emphasis added)). The chambers judge did not err in relying on these unequivocal statements from the AER itself — to the effect that it will have the abandonment work performed and seek reimbursement — to conclude that sufficient certainty existed in this case.

[258] Deuxièmement, compte tenu du fait que ni GTL ni les participants en participation directe de Redwater ne voudraient (ou ne pourraient) entreprendre ces travaux, le juge en chef Wittmann a tiré la conclusion de fait selon laquelle [TRADUCTION] « l'AER sera en fin de compte responsable des frais [d'abandon] » (par. 171). Il a conclu que « l'AER a le pouvoir [de tenter de recouvrer les frais d'abandon] et a réellement exécuté les travaux à l'occasion » (par. 168). Dans les faits, en l'espèce, « l'AER a expressément manifesté l'intention de demander le remboursement des frais liés à l'abandon des biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation » (par. 172). Cette conclusion est amplement étayée par le dossier. Dans la lettre du 15 juillet 2015 accompagnant les ordonnances d'abandon, l'AER a déclaré sans équivoque que, si Redwater ne procède pas à l'abandon des biens visés par les renonciations conformément aux directives de l'AER, [TRADUCTION] « l'AER utilisera, sans autre avis, sa procédure pour faire abandonner les biens » (dossier de GTL, vol. I, p. 102 (je souligne)). La lettre indiquait également que « [l']AER exercera tous les recours dont il dispose pour recouvrer les frais des parties responsables » (p. 102 (je souligne)). Le juge siégeant en cabinet n'a pas commis d'erreur en se fondant sur ces déclarations sans équivoque de l'AER lui-même — selon lesquelles il fera exécuter les travaux d'abandon et demandera un remboursement — pour conclure qu'il y avait une certitude suffisante en l'espèce.

[259] Although there is some contrary evidence in the record — principally, the remarks of an AER affiant, who stated that the AER would not abandon the properties — Wittmann C.J. did not commit any palpable and overriding error by giving more weight to the letter that the AER sent contemporaneously with the Abandonment Orders. Likewise, to the extent that the AER sent other correspondence stating that it was not a creditor and that it was not asserting a provable claim, Wittmann C.J. did not err in discounting these self-serving statements as insufficiently probative on the ultimate legal questions. There is therefore no basis to disturb these factual findings or to reweigh this evidence on appeal.

[260] Even if the AER's admission that it would abandon the properties itself is not sufficient on its own, Wittmann C.J. made a third critical finding of fact: the AER's only "realistic alternativ[e] to performing the remediation work itself" was to deem the renounced assets to be orphan wells (para. 172). In this circumstance, he found that "the legislation and evidence shows that if the AER deems a well an orphan, then the OWA will perform the work" (para. 166 (emphasis added)).

[261] In light of these factual determinations, Wittmann C.J. rightly concluded that the "sufficient certainty" standard of Abitibi was satisfied. He elaborated on the legal basis for that conclusion as follows:

> Does this situation meet the sufficient certainty criterion as described in AbitibiBowater? The answer is no in a narrow and technical sense, since it is unclear whether the AER will perform the work itself or if it will deem the properties subject to the orders, orphans. If so, the OWA will probably perform the work, although not necessarily within a definite timeframe. However, the situation does meet, in my opinion, what was intended by the majority of the Court in AbitibiBowater. . . . In the result, I find that although not expressed in monetary terms, the AER orders are in this case intrinsically financial. [para. 173]

[259] Bien qu'il y ait certains éléments de preuve contraires au dossier — notamment les propos d'un déclarant de l'AER selon lesquels l'AER ne procéderait pas à l'abandon des biens — le juge en chef Wittmann n'a pas commis d'erreur manifeste et dominante en accordant plus de poids à la lettre que l'AER a envoyée en même temps que les ordonnances d'abandon. De même, dans la mesure où l'AER a envoyé d'autres lettres dans lesquelles il déclarait ne pas être un créancier et ne pas faire valoir une réclamation prouvable, le juge en chef Wittmann n'a pas commis d'erreur en faisant abstraction de ces déclarations intéressées parce qu'elles n'étaient pas suffisamment probantes quant aux questions de droit ultimes. Il n'y a donc aucune raison de modifier ces conclusions de fait ou d'apprécier de nouveau ces éléments de preuve en appel.

[260] Même si la déclaration de l'AER selon laquelle il procéderait lui-même à l'abandon des biens n'est pas suffisante en soi, le juge en chef Wittmann a tiré une troisième conclusion de fait cruciale : la seule [TRADUCTION] « solution réaliste [qui s'offre à l'AER] autre que celle d'effectuer lui-même les travaux de décontamination » était de considérer les biens faisant l'objet de la renonciation comme des puits orphelins (par. 172). Il a conclu qu'en pareil cas, « les dispositions législatives et les éléments de preuve démontrent que, si l'AER considère un puits comme orphelin, l'OWA exécutera les travaux » (par. 166 (je souligne)).

[261] À la lumière de ces conclusions de fait, le juge en chef Wittmann a eu raison de conclure qu'il était satisfait à la norme de « certitude suffisante » énoncée dans Abitibi. Il a précisé ainsi le fondement juridique de cette conclusion :

> [TRADUCTION] La situation répond-elle au critère de la certitude suffisante décrit dans l'arrêt AbitibiBowater? Au sens strict et technique du terme, la réponse est non, car il n'est pas clair si l'AER effectuera lui-même les travaux ou s'il considérera les biens visés par les ordonnances comme orphelins. Dans l'affirmative, l'OWA exécutera probablement les travaux, mais pas nécessairement dans un délai précis. La situation correspond toutefois, à mon avis, à ce qu'ont voulu les juges majoritaires de la Cour dans AbitibiBowater. . . . Par conséquent, je conclus que, bien qu'elles ne soient pas formulées en termes pécuniaires, les ordonnances de l'AER sont, en l'espèce, intrinsèquement financières. [par. 173]

[262] My colleague does not specify the standard of review he applies in overturning Wittmann C.J.'s application of the third prong of the Abitibi test to this case. Nevertheless, he disagrees with the chambers judge and holds that the "sufficient certainty" standard is not satisfied. He offers two reasons for overruling Wittmann C.J.'s finding; but in doing so, he does not identify any palpable and overriding error (or, even under the non-deferential standard of correctness, any true error) in the chambers judge's ultimate conclusion.

[263] The first reason — the purported legal error of determining that the Abandonment Orders are "intrinsically financial" — is little more than a distraction. Even if this is an erroneous application of Abitibi, it is evident that Wittmann C.J. was of the view, at a minimum, that either the AER or the OWA would complete the abandonment work. And as I describe below, this alone is enough to satisfy the "sufficient certainty" standard. My colleague overemphasizes the import of this stray comment in the context of a thorough set of reasons that otherwise faithfully applies the correct standard. Any legal error on this basis, to the extent that one exists, does not displace the result that the chambers judge reached.

[264] The second reason is more substantial. According to Wagner C.J., whether the AER will perform the abandonment work itself or delegate that task to the OWA is dispositive, since it was the Province itself that undertook the reclamation work in Abitibi. Here, he suggests, "the OWA is not the regulator" (para. 147) and thus the involvement of the OWA "is insufficient to satisfy the 'sufficient certainty' test" (para. 146).

[265] Accepting, for a moment, the potential relevance of this distinction, I am of the view that any uncertainty as to whether the AER would delegate the reclamation work to the OWA is questionable. My colleague's emphasis on the self-serving remarks of an AER affiant and the fact that the AER took no immediate steps to perform the abandonment work

[262] Mon collègue ne précise pas la norme de contrôle qu'il applique en infirmant l'application par le juge en chef Wittmann du troisième volet du test Abitibi à la présente affaire. Néanmoins, il est en désaccord avec le juge en cabinet et conclut qu'il n'est pas satisfait au volet de la « certitude suffisante ». Il donne deux raisons pour infirmer la conclusion du juge en chef Wittmann; mais ce faisant, il ne relève aucune erreur manifeste et dominante (ni même une véritable erreur selon la norme de la décision correcte, qui ne commande aucune déférence) dans la conclusion ultime du juge en cabinet.

[263] La première raison, la prétendue erreur de droit consistant à décider que les ordonnances d'abandon sont [TRADUCTION] « intrinsèquement financières », n'est guère plus qu'une distraction. Même s'il s'agit d'une application erronée de l'arrêt Abitibi, il est manifeste que le juge en chef Wittmann a estimé, au moins, que l'AER ou l'OWA mènerait à terme les travaux d'abandon. Et comme je l'explique plus loin, cela suffit en soi pour satisfaire à la norme de « certitude suffisante ». Mon collègue surestime l'importance de ce commentaire isolé dans le contexte d'un ensemble de motifs étoffés où la norme appropriée est par ailleurs fidèlement appliquée. Toute erreur de droit de ce genre, dans la mesure où il en existe une, n'écarte en rien le résultat auquel est arrivé le juge en cabinet.

[264] La deuxième raison est plus sérieuse. Selon le juge en chef Wagner, la question de savoir si l'AER effectuera lui-même les travaux d'abandon ou s'il déléguera cette tâche à l'OWA est déterminante, car c'est la Province elle-même qui a procédé aux travaux de décontamination dans Abitibi. Dans l'affaire qui nous occupe, suggère-t-il, « l'OWA n'est pas l'organisme de réglementation » (par. 147) et, en conséquence, l'intervention de l'OWA « est insuffisante pour satisfaire au critère de la "certitude suffisante" » (par. 146).

[265] Acceptant pour un instant la pertinence éventuelle de cette distinction, j'estime que toute incertitude quant à la question de savoir si l'AER déléguerait l'exécution des travaux de décontamination à l'OWA est discutable. L'importance qu'accorde mon collègue aux propos intéressés d'un déclarant de l'AER et au fait que l'AER n'a rien fait sur-le-champ pour exécuter itself amounts to little more than post hoc appellate fact finding, especially in light of the AER's own statement. Although Wittmann C.J. suggested that it was "unclear" whether the AER would complete this work itself, his other findings of fact and law — that the AER has the statutory power to perform the work, that it has actually done so in the past, and that it expressly stated its intention to seek reimbursement here — suggest otherwise. Regardless, Wittmann C.J.'s remark that the "sufficient certainty" standard was not satisfied "in a narrow and technical sense" must be read in this context: he was simply suggesting that there was some uncertainty as to "whether the AER will perform the work itself" as opposed to delegating the work to the OWA (para. 173). He was not implying — let alone concluding as a matter of law — that GTL had failed to prove the third prong of the Abitibi test. That reading would vastly overstate, and completely decontextualize, the meaning of a few isolated words in his reasons.

[266] The more important problem, though, is that any distinction between the performance of the abandonment work by the AER and its performance by the OWA is meaningless. Form is elevated over substance if it is concluded that the "sufficient certainty" standard is not satisfied when a regulatory body's delegate, as opposed to the regulatory body itself, performs the work. And despite my colleague's suggestion that a regulatory body cannot act strategically to evade Abitibi, that is precisely what his analysis permits.

[267] We are told that the "OWA's true nature" (majority reasons, at para. 147) — and therefore what purports to distinguish this case from impermissible examples of strategic delegation — rests on four factors: (1) the OWA is a non-profit organization; (2) it has an independent board of directors; (3) it has its own mandate and determines "when and how it will perform environmental work" (para. 148); and (4) it is "financially independent" (para. 148) as it is lui-même les travaux d'abandon ne constitue rien de moins qu'une appréciation des faits après coup en appel, surtout compte tenu de la propre déclaration de l'AER. Bien que le juge en chef Wittmann ait affirmé qu'il n'était [TRADUCTION] « pas clair » si l'AER effectuerait lui-même les travaux, ses autres conclusions de fait et de droit — que la loi confère à l'AER le pouvoir d'exécuter les travaux, qu'il l'a réellement fait dans le passé et qu'il a expressément manifesté l'intention de demander un remboursement en l'espèce — indiquent le contraire. Quoi qu'il en soit, la remarque du juge en chef Wittmann selon laquelle il n'était pas satisfait à la norme de « certitude suffisante » « au sens strict et technique » doit être interprétée dans ce contexte : il voulait tout simplement dire qu'il y avait une certaine incertitude quant à savoir « si l'AER effectuera[it] lui-même les travaux » au lieu de déléguer les travaux à l'OWA (par. 173). Il ne sous-entendait pas — et concluait encore moins en droit — que GTL n'avait pas réussi à établir le troisième volet du test Abitibi. Cette interprétation exagère considérablement le sens de quelques mots isolés contenus dans ses motifs, et sort complètement ces mots de leur contexte.

[266] Le problème le plus important, cependant, c'est que toute distinction entre l'exécution des travaux d'abandon par l'AER et leur exécution par l'OWA est dénuée de sens. C'est faire passer la forme avant le fond que de conclure qu'il n'est pas satisfait à la norme de « certitude suffisante » lorsque le délégataire de l'organisme de réglementation, et non l'organisme de réglementation lui-même, effectue les travaux. Et malgré l'affirmation de mon collègue selon laquelle un organisme de réglementation ne saurait stratégiquement éviter l'arrêt Abitibi, c'est précisément ce que son analyse permet de faire.

[267] On nous dit que la « véritable nature de l'OWA » (motifs majoritaires, par. 147) — et, par conséquent, ce qui est censé distinguer la présente affaire des exemples inadmissibles de délégation stratégique — repose sur quatre facteurs : (1) l'OWA est un organisme sans but lucratif; (2) elle a un conseil d'administration indépendant; (3) elle dispose de son propre mandat et décide « quand et de quelle manière elle exécutera des travaux environnementaux » funded "almost entirely" by a tax on the oil and gas industry (para. 23).

[268] The first point is true, but irrelevant. Why does an organization's non-profit status have any bearing on whether it is being used as a vehicle to avoid the "sufficient certainty" standard under Abitibi?

[269] The second point is not accurate. The AER appoints members of the OWA's board of directors, as does another provincial body, Alberta Environment and Parks — underscoring the extent to which the provincial government can influence the OWA's activities.

[270] The third point overstates the OWA's level of independence. The Orphan Fund Delegated Administration Regulation, Alta. Reg. 45/2001, gives the AER substantial power to influence the OWA's decision making. Section 3(2)(b) of the regulation expressly states that, in fulfilling its delegated powers, duties and functions, the OWA must act in accordance with "applicable requirements, guidelines, directions and orders of the [AER]". The regulation also mandates that the OWA provide information to the AER on request and regularly submit reports indicating or containing its budget, "goals, strategies and performance measures", activities for the previous year and financial statements (s. 6). The AER appears to be able to exercise substantial control and oversight over the OWA if it so chooses, including over the manner in which the OWA carries out its environmental work.

[271] The fourth point is also inaccurate and would probably be irrelevant even if it were accurate. The Province has provided funding to the OWA in the past, including a $30 million contribution in 2009 and an additional $50,000 in 2012, and it has announced that it will loan the OWA an additional $230 million (see A.F., at para. 99 (alluding to this loan); recall Abitibi, at para. 58 where the Court stated that: "Earmarking money may be a strong (par. 148); (4) elle est « financièrement indépendante » (par. 148) et « presque entièrement » financée par une taxe imposée à l'industrie pétrolière et gazière (par. 23).

[268] Le premier point est exact, mais non pertinent. Pourquoi le statut d'organisme sans but lucratif aurait-il une incidence sur la question de savoir s'il est utilisé comme moyen d'éviter la norme de « certitude suffisante » fixée dans Abitibi?

[269] Le deuxième point est inexact. L'AER nomme les membres du conseil d'administration de l'OWA, comme le fait un autre organisme provincial, Alberta Environment and Parks — ce qui fait ressortir à quel point le gouvernement provincial peut influencer les activités de l'OWA.

[270] Le troisième point surestime l'indépendance de l'OWA. Le Orphan Fund Delegated Administration Regulation, Alta. Reg. 45/2001, accorde à l'AER le pouvoir important d'influencer la prise de décisions de l'OWA. L'alinéa 3(2)(b) du règlement dispose en termes exprès que, dans l'exercice des pouvoirs, obligations et attributions qui lui sont déléguées, l'OWA doit se conformer aux [TRADUCTION] « conditions, lignes directrices, directives et ordonnances applicables de [l'AER] ». Le règlement exige que l'OWA fournisse sur demande des renseignements à l'AER et dépose périodiquement des rapports décrivant son budget de même que ses « objectifs, stratégies, mesures du rendement », activités de l'année précédente et états financiers (art. 6). L'AER semble être à même d'exercer beaucoup d'emprise et de surveillance sur l'OWA, si tel est son désir, y compris sur la manière dont l'OWA effectue ses travaux environnementaux.

[271] Le quatrième point est lui aussi inexact et il n'aurait probablement aucune pertinence même s'il était exact. La Province a fourni des fonds à l'OWA dans le passé, notamment une contribution de 30 millions de dollars en 2009 et une somme supplémentaire de 50 000 $ en 2012, et elle a annoncé qu'elle prêtera une somme supplémentaire de 230 millions de dollars à l'OWA (voir le m.a., par. 99 (faisant allusion à ce prêt); rappelons ce que la Cour a affirmé indicator that a province will perform remediation work").

[272] In any event, it is important to note the more salient features of the OWA and its relationship with the AER (and, more generally, with the provincial government). The OWA operates under legal authority delegated to it by the AER and in accordance with a Memorandum of Understanding it has signed with both the AER and Alberta Environment and Parks. The orphan fund itself is administered by the AER, which prescribes and collects industry contributions and remits the funds to the OWA. The OWA cannot increase the industry levy without first obtaining approval from the Alberta Treasury Board. In addition, the OGCA makes clear that abandonment costs incurred by any person authorized by the AER — which would include the OWA — constitute a debt payable to the AER (OGCA, s. 30(5)). The record shows that the AER has remitted abandonment costs to the OWA in the past, in the form of security deposits and amounts recovered through successful enforcement action against licensees.

[273] The AER and the OWA are therefore inextricably intertwined. We should see this arrangement for what it is: when the AER exercises its statutory powers to declare a property an "orphan" under s. 70(2) of the OGCA, it effectively delegates the abandonment work to the OWA. Treating the OWA's work as meaningfully different from abandonment activities carried out by the AER turns a blind eye to this reality and does nothing to further the underlying principles of paramountcy. To the contrary, it provides provincial regulators with an easy way to evade the test of Abitibi through strategic behaviour, thereby undermining the legitimate federal interest in enforcing the BIA's priority scheme. It should not matter which body carries out the work (see C.A. reasons, at para. 78; OGCA, s. 70(1)(a)(ii)).

[274] The majority faults the chambers judge for "failing to consider whether the OWA can be treated as the regulator" (para. 153). However, the chambers dans Abitibi, par. 58 : « [l]e fait de prévoir un budget peut constituer un indicateur clair qu'une province exécutera des travaux de décontamination »).

[272] Quoi qu'il en soit, il importe de souligner les caractéristiques plus saillantes de l'OWA et de sa relation avec l'AER (et, de façon plus générale, avec le gouvernement provincial). L'OWA agit en vertu du pouvoir légal qui lui est délégué par l'AER et conformément au protocole d'entente qu'elle a signé avec l'AER et Alberta Environment and Parks. Le fonds pour les puits orphelins est lui-même administré par l'AER, qui fixe et recueille les contributions de l'industrie et remet les fonds à l'OWA. L'OWA ne peut pas augmenter les prélèvements qu'elle effectue auprès de l'industrie sans d'abord obtenir l'approbation du Conseil du trésor de l'Alberta. De plus, l'OGCA indique clairement que les frais liés à l'abandon engagés par toute personne autorisée par l'AER — y compris l'OWA — constituent une dette payable à l'AER (OGCA, par. 30(5)). Le dossier révèle que l'AER a versé des frais d'abandon à l'OWA dans le passé, sous la forme de dépôts de garantie et de sommes recouvrées grâce à des mesures de recouvrement réussies à l'encontre des titulaires de permis.

[273] L'AER et l'OWA sont donc inextricablement liés. Il faut reconnaître cet arrangement pour ce qu'il est : lorsque l'AER exerce le pouvoir de déclarer un bien [TRADUCTION] « orphelin » que lui confère le par. 70(2) de l'OGCA, il délègue effectivement l'exécution des travaux d'abandon à l'OWA. Considérer les travaux de l'OWA comme significativement différents des activités d'abandon menées par l'AER ne tient pas compte de cette réalité et n'aide en rien à favoriser l'application des principes sous-jacents de la prépondérance. Au contraire, cela donne aux organismes de réglementation provinciaux un moyen facile d'échapper au test Abitibi par l'adoption d'un comportement stratégique, minant ainsi l'intérêt légitime du gouvernement fédéral à assurer le respect du régime de priorité établi par la LFI. Il importe peu de savoir qui effectue les travaux (voir les motifs de la Cour d'appel, par. 78; OGCA, sous-al. 70(1)(a)(ii)).

[274] La majorité reproche au juge en cabinet de « ne pas se demander si l'OWA [pouvait] être assimilé à l'organisme de réglementation » (par. 153).

judge cannot have erred by failing to appreciate a level of independence that simply does not exist.

[275] The majority also offers an alternative conclusion: it is not sufficiently certain that even the OWA will perform the abandonment work (para. 149). Whether the chambers judge's conclusion to the contrary amounts to a palpable and overriding error, or something else, we are not told.

[276] Again, such an approach would permit the AER to benefit from strategic gamesmanship by manipulating the timing of its intervention in order to escape the insolvency regime and strip Redwater of its assets. This arbitrary line-drawing exercise, in which a period of 10 years before the wells are abandoned is too long (but presumably some shorter time line would not be), has no basis in law. As Slatter J.A. convincingly observed in his reasons, the AER > cannot insist that security be posted to cover environmental costs, but at the same time argue that it may be a long time before the Orphan Well Association actually does the remediation. If the Regulator takes security for remediating Redwater's orphan wells, those funds cannot be used for any other purpose. If security is taken, it is no answer that the security might be held for an indefinite period of time; the consequences to the insolvency proceedings and distribution of funds to the creditors are immediate and certain. Further, if security is taken, the environmental obligation has clearly been reduced to monetary terms. [Emphasis added; para. 79.]

[277] Moreover, the OWA's estimate of 10 to 12 years was put forward at the start of this litigation more than 3 years ago. Whether that estimate remains accurate after the province's proposed infusion of nearly a quarter of a billion dollars into the orphan fund (A.F., at para. 99)[1] — money that will undoubt-

[1] I am assuming that the AER's factum is accurate in referring to the existence and amount of this loan (which no other party contested).

Le juge en cabinet ne peut toutefois avoir fait erreur en n'appréciant pas une indépendance qui n'existe tout simplement pas.

[275] La majorité tire aussi une conclusion subsidiaire : il n'est pas suffisamment certain que même l'OWA exécutera les travaux d'abandon (par. 149). Quant à savoir si la conclusion contraire du juge en cabinet équivaut à une erreur manifeste et dominante, ou à quelque chose d'autre, on ne nous le dit pas.

[276] Là encore, une telle approche permettrait à l'AER de tirer profit de manœuvres stratégiques en manipulant le moment de son intervention afin de se soustraire au régime d'insolvabilité et de dépouiller Redwater de ses biens. Cet exercice de délimitation arbitraire, dans lequel une période de 10 ans avant que les puits fassent l'objet d'un abandon est trop longue (mais selon lequel une période plus courte ne le serait présumément pas), n'a aucun fondement en droit. Comme le juge Slatter l'a fait observer de manière convaincante dans ses motifs, l'AER

> [TRADUCTION] ne peut exiger qu'un dépôt de garantie soit versé pour couvrir les frais environnementaux, et en même temps faire valoir qu'il pourrait s'écouler beaucoup de temps avant que l'Orphan Well Association procède réellement à la décontamination. Si l'organisme de réglementation prend un dépôt de garantie afin de décontaminer les puits orphelins de Redwater, ces fonds ne peuvent être utilisés à aucune autre fin. Si un dépôt de garantie est pris, il ne suffit pas de répondre que ce dépôt pourrait être conservé pendant une période indéterminée; les conséquences pour la procédure d'insolvabilité et la distribution des fonds aux créanciers sont immédiates et certaines. De plus, si un dépôt de garantie est pris, l'obligation environnementale est clairement réduite à une obligation formulée en termes pécuniaires. [Je souligne; par. 79.]

[277] De plus, l'estimation de 10 à 12 ans de l'OWA a été mise de l'avant au début du présent litige il y a plus de 3 ans. La question de savoir si cette estimation demeure exacte après l'injection proposée par la province de près d'un quart de milliard de dollars dans le fonds pour les puits orphelins (m.a., par. 99)[1] — des edly speed up the OWA's abandonment efforts — is an open question. In any case, the changing factual context highlights the essential problem with the majority's approach: pinning the constitutional analysis on the timing of the OWA's intervention is arbitrary and irrational, as it causes the result to shift based on decisions made by the very actor that stands to benefit from a finding that the "sufficient certainty" standard is not satisfied.

[278] All that aside, the chambers judge's recognition that the OWA will "probably" abandon the properties should be enough (chambers judge reasons, at para. 173). Concluding otherwise is not justified, since it would mean applying a stricter certainty requirement than is called for by Abitibi itself. Deschamps J. expressly rejected an alternative standard — a "likelihood approaching certainty" — adopted by McLachlin C.J. in dissent (Abitibi, at para. 60). But here, dismissing as insufficient the chambers judge's conclusion that the OWA would "probably" complete the work essentially means requiring a "likelihood approaching certainty". Since Abitibi does not require absolute certainty, or even a likelihood approaching certainty, Wittmann C.J. did not err in concluding that the third prong was satisfied (see the Oxford English Dictionary (online), which defines "probably" as "with likelihood (though not with certainty)"; "almost certainly; as far as one knows or can tell; in all probability; most likely").

[279] After concluding that it is not sufficiently certain that the AER will abandon the sites, the majority goes on to find that the AER's licence transfer restrictions similarly do not satisfy the Abitibi test. This is so, it says, because the AER's refusal to approve a licence transfer does not give it a monetary claim against Redwater and because compliance with the Licensee Management Ratio ("LMR") conditions "reflects the inherent value of the assets held by the bankrupt estate" (para. 157). At the outset, I wish to sommes qui accéléreront sans doute les efforts d'abandon de l'OWA — demeure sans réponse. Quoi qu'il en soit, le contexte factuel changeant met en lumière le problème fondamental que pose l'approche de la majorité : arrimer l'analyse constitutionnelle au moment de l'intervention de l'OWA est arbitraire et irrationnel, car cette approche a pour effet d'inverser le résultat en fonction de décisions prises par l'acteur même qui peut bénéficier de la conclusion selon laquelle il n'est pas satisfait à la norme de « certitude suffisante ».

[278] Mis à part tout ce qui précède, la reconnaissance par le juge en cabinet que l'OWA abandonnera [TRADUCTION] « probablement » les biens devrait suffire (motifs du juge en cabinet, par. 173). Il n'est pas justifié de conclure le contraire, car cela reviendrait à appliquer une norme plus stricte en matière de certitude que celle que commande l'arrêt Abitibi lui-même. La juge Deschamps a expressément rejeté la norme subsidiaire — une « probabilité proche de la certitude » — qu'a adoptée la juge en chef McLachlin dans ses motifs dissidents (Abitibi, par. 60). Mais en l'espèce, rejeter comme insuffisante la conclusion du juge en cabinet selon laquelle l'OWA mènerait « probablement » à terme les travaux revient essentiellement à exiger une « probabilité proche de la certitude ». Étant donné que l'arrêt Abitibi n'exige pas une certitude absolue, ni même une probabilité proche de la certitude, le juge en chef Wittmann n'a pas commis d'erreur en concluant qu'il était satisfait au troisième volet du test (voir l'Oxford English Dictionary (en ligne), qui définit [TRADUCTION] « probablement » comme « selon la vraisemblance (mais sans certitude) »; « presque certainement; pour autant que l'on sache ou que l'on puisse le dire; selon toute vraisemblance; vraisemblablement »).

[279] Après avoir conclu qu'il n'est pas suffisamment certain que l'AER abandonnera les sites, la majorité juge que les restrictions imposées par l'AER au transfert de permis ne satisfont pas non plus au test Abitibi. Il en est ainsi, dit-elle, parce que le refus de l'AER d'approuver le transfert d'un permis ne lui confère pas une réclamation pécuniaire contre Redwater et que le respect des conditions liées au ratio de gestion du titulaire de permis (« RGTP ») « reflète la valeur inhérente des biens détenus par make clear that I have already concluded that, since GTL lawfully disclaimed the non-producing properties under s. 14.06(4) of the BIA, an operational conflict arises to the extent that the AER included those disclaimed properties in calculating Redwater's LMR for the purpose of imposing conditions on the sale of Redwater's assets. In the analysis that follows, I reach that same conclusion under the frustration of purpose aspect of the paramountcy test as well.

[280] I take issue with the majority's conclusion regarding the LMR conditions for two reasons. First, this approach elevates form over substance, disregarding Gascon J.'s admonition in Moloney that "[t]he province cannot do indirectly what it is precluded from doing directly" (para. 28; see also Husky Oil, at para. 41). Refusing to approve a sale of Redwater's assets unless GTL satisfies Redwater's environmental liabilities is no different, in substance, from directly ordering Redwater or GTL to undertake that work. This is because the AER achieves the exact same thing — the fulfillment of Redwater's environmental obligations — by making any sale conditional on GTL completing the work itself, posting security or packaging the non-producing assets into the sale, which reduces the sale price by the exact amount of those liabilities and ensures that the purchaser can be compelled, as the subsequent "licensee" under provincial law, to comply with the Abandonment Orders.

[281] The only difference between these two exercises of provincial power is the means by which the AER has opted to enforce the underlying obligations. The Abandonment Orders carry a threat of liability for non-compliance; imposing conditions on the sale of Redwater's assets, on the other hand, does not create a liability in a formal sense, but it does preclude any sale from occurring unless and until those obligations are satisfied. Since the trustee must sell the assets in order to carry out its mandate, the effect of imposing conditions on the sale of Redwater's assets l'actif du failli » (par. 157). Tout d'abord, je tiens à préciser une chose : j'ai déjà conclu qu'étant donné que GTL a légalement renoncé aux bien inexploités en vertu du par. 14.06(4) de la LFI, il y a un conflit d'application dans la mesure où l'AER a inclus ces biens visés par les renonciations dans le calcul du RGTP de Redwater afin d'imposer des conditions à la vente des actifs de Redwater. Dans l'analyse qui suit, j'arrive également à la même conclusion en m'appuyant sur le second volet concernant l'entrave à la réalisation d'un objet fédéral du test de la prépondérance.

[280] Je suis en désaccord avec la conclusion de la majorité quant aux conditions relatives au RGTP pour deux raisons. D'abord, cette approche fait passer la forme avant le fond, ignorant la mise en garde du juge Gascon dans l'arrêt Moloney selon laquelle « [l]a province ne peut faire indirectement ce qu'il lui est interdit de faire directement » (par. 28; voir aussi Husky Oil, par. 41). Refuser d'approuver la vente des biens de Redwater à moins que GTL ne satisfasse aux obligations environnementales de Redwater n'est pas différent, au fond, que d'ordonner directement à Redwater ou à GTL de procéder à ces travaux. Il en est ainsi parce que l'AER atteint exactement le même résultat — le respect des obligations environnementales de Redwater — en faisant dépendre la vente de l'exécution des travaux par GTL lui-même, du versement par celle-ci d'un dépôt de garantie ou de l'inclusion des biens inexploités dans la vente, ce qui réduit le prix de vente du montant exact de ces engagements et permet de contraindre l'acheteur, en tant que « titulaire de permis » subséquent sous le régime de la loi provinciale, à se conformer aux ordonnances d'abandon.

[281] La seule différence entre ces deux exercices d'un pouvoir provincial est le moyen par lequel l'AER a choisi de faire exécuter les obligations sous-jacentes. Les ordonnances d'abandon comportent un risque de responsabilité pour non-respect; l'imposition de conditions à la vente des actifs de Redwater, par contre, ne crée pas formellement de responsabilité, mais empêche effectivement toute vente de se réaliser tant et aussi longtemps qu'il n'est pas satisfait à ces obligations. Étant donné que le syndic doit vendre les biens afin de remplir is the same as that of issuing abandonment orders — and, as my colleague acknowledges, it is the effect of provincial action, not its intent or its form, that is central to the paramountcy analysis (para. 116; see also Husky Oil, at para. 40). In either case, then, the effect of the AER's action is to create a debt enforcement scheme — one that requires the environmental obligations owed to the AER to be discharged ahead of the bankrupt's other debts.

[282] Second, it is irrelevant to this analysis that the licensing requirements predate Redwater's bankruptcy and apply to all licensees. This is no different from Abitibi, where the obligation to close down and remediate the properties predated AbitibiBowater's bankruptcy and could also have been said to constitute an "inherent" limitation on the value of the regulatory licence. Yet the obligations at issue there were provable claims. So too here. Alberta is, of course, free to affect the priority of claims in non-bankruptcy contexts. For example, it can leverage its licensing power to condition the sale of assets by solvent corporations on the payment of outstanding debts to the province. But "once bankruptcy has occurred [the BIA] determines the status and priority of the claims" (Husky Oil, at para. 32, quoting A. J. Roman and M. J. Sweatman, "The Conflict Between Canadian Provincial Personal Property Security Acts and The Federal Bankruptcy Act: The War is Over" (1992), 71 Can. Bar Rev. 77, at p. 79).

[283] In this case, imposing conditions on the sale of Redwater's valuable assets does result in a monetary debt in the AER's favour, whether in the form of: (1) the posting of security; (2) actual completion of the environmental work; or (3) the sale of the non-producing properties to another entity that is then regulated as a "licensee" and, as such, can be compelled under provincial law to complete the work. In each case, the result is the same: the AER is conditioning any sale of Redwater's assets on its son mandat, l'effet de l'imposition de conditions à la vente des biens de Redwater est le même que celui des ordonnances d'abandon — et, comme le reconnaît mon collègue, c'est l'effet de l'action provinciale, et non son intention ou sa forme, qui est au cœur de l'analyse relative à la prépondérance (par. 116; voir aussi Husky Oil, par. 40). L'effet de l'action de l'AER est donc, dans les deux cas, de créer un régime de recouvrement des créances — qui exige que les obligations environnementales envers l'AER soient acquittées avant les autres dettes du failli.

[282] Ensuite, le fait que les exigences en matière de permis précèdent la faillite et s'appliquent à tous les titulaires de permis n'est pas pertinent pour les besoins de la présente analyse. La situation n'est pas différente de celle dans l'affaire Abitibi, où l'obligation de fermer et de décontaminer les biens précédait la faillite d'AbitibiBowater et aurait également pu être considérée comme constituant une limite « inhérente » à la valeur du permis réglementaire. Pourtant, les obligations en cause dans cette affaire étaient des réclamations prouvables. C'est également le cas en l'espèce. Il est certes loisible à l'Alberta de modifier l'ordre de priorité des réclamations dans un contexte autre que celui d'une faillite. Par exemple, elle peut se servir de son pouvoir de délivrer des permis pour faire dépendre la vente des biens des sociétés solvables du paiement des dettes impayées envers la province. Mais « dès qu'il y a faillite, c'est [la LFI] qui détermine le statut et l'ordre de priorité des réclamations » (Husky Oil, par. 32, citant A. J. Roman et M. J. Sweatman, « The Conflict Between Canadian Provincial Personal Property Security Acts and the Federal Bankrupcy Act : The War is Over » (1992), 71 R. du B. can. 77, p. 79).

[283] En l'espèce, l'imposition de conditions à la vente des actifs de valeur de Redwater entraîne bel et bien une créance pécuniaire en faveur de l'AER, que ce soit sous forme : (1) de versement d'un dépôt de garantie; (2) d'achèvement réel des travaux environnementaux; ou (3) de vente des biens inexploités à une autre entité qui est alors réglementée comme « titulaire de permis » et qui peut ainsi être contrainte en application de la loi provinciale à mener à bien les travaux. Dans un cas comme dans l'autre, le résultat ability to recover a pre-existing debt owed to it by the bankrupt.

[284] An approach which artificially separates the Abandonment Orders and the transfer requirements in order to treat them as analytically distinct under the Abitibi test would cause the paramountcy analysis to turn on irrelevant subtleties in the manner or form in which the province has chosen to exercise its power. The two measures must be seen in tandem as the AER's means of enforcing a debt against the Redwater estate. As I have described, there is no meaningful difference in the bankruptcy context between a formal abandonment order directing a trustee to engage in remediation work and a rigid licensing system that imposes the exact same obligations as a condition of sale — a sale that, if the trustee is to carry out its mandate, must occur. The only effect of the majority's analysis is to encourage regulators to collect on their debts in more creative ways. None of this serves the purposes of paramountcy; and, more critically, nothing in that analysis offers insolvency professionals (or regulators, for that matter) clear guidance as to the types of obligations that will or will not satisfy the Abitibi test.

[285] Since it is sufficiently certain that the AER (or the OWA, as its delegate) will complete the abandonment and reclamation work, all three prongs of the Abitibi test are satisfied. The Abandonment Orders are provable claims, and therefore the AER may not compel Redwater or its trustee to fulfill the obligations in question outside of the BIA's priority scheme. Likewise, the AER may not condition the sale of Redwater's valuable assets on the performance of those same obligations.

[286] Towards the end of its analysis, the majority makes the point that the AER's enforcement actions in this case facilitate, rather than frustrate, est le même : l'AER fait dépendre la vente des biens de Redwater de sa capacité de recouvrer une dette préexistante que lui devait le failli.

[284] Une approche qui différencie artificiellement les ordonnances d'abandon et les exigences relatives au transfert afin de leur réserver un traitement distinct sur le plan analytique en application du critère Abitibi ferait reposer l'analyse relative à la prépondérance sur des subtilités non pertinentes concernant la manière dont la province a choisi d'exercer son pouvoir ou la forme que prend ce choix. Les deux mesures doivent être considérées ensemble comme le moyen employé par l'AER pour recouvrer une créance à l'encontre de l'actif de Redwater. Comme je l'ai expliqué, il n'existe aucune différence significative dans le contexte de la faillite entre une ordonnance officielle d'abandon enjoignant au syndic de procéder à des travaux de décontamination et un système de délivrance de permis rigide qui impose exactement les mêmes obligations comme condition de la vente — une vente qui, si le syndic veut remplir son mandat, doit avoir lieu. Le seul effet qu'a l'analyse de la majorité est d'encourager les organismes de réglementation à trouver des façons plus ingénieuses de recouvrer leurs créances. Rien de tout cela ne sert les fins de la prépondérance; et, fait plus important, rien dans cette analyse ne donne aux professionnels de l'insolvabilité (ni aux organismes de réglementation, d'ailleurs) des indications claires quant aux types d'obligations qui peuvent ou non satisfaire au test Abitibi.

[285] Comme il est suffisamment certain que l'AER (ou l'OWA, sa délégataire) achèvera les travaux d'abandon et de remise en état, il est satisfait aux trois volets du test Abitibi. Les ordonnances d'abandon sont des réclamations prouvables, et l'AER ne peut donc contraindre Redwater ou son syndic à acquitter les obligations en cause à l'extérieur du régime de priorité établi par la LFI. De la même façon, l'AER ne peut faire dépendre la vente des biens de valeur de Redwater de l'exécution de ces mêmes obligations.

[286] Vers la fin de son analyse, la majorité soutient que les mesures d'application prises par l'AER en l'espèce favorisent, au lieu de contrecarrer, la Parliament's intentions behind the BIA priority scheme due to the super priority for environmental remediation costs set out in s. 14.06(7) (para. 159). Respectfully, I completely reject this contention. No party attempted to argue that the super priority in subs. (7) was applicable on the facts of this case. Indeed, it is clear that it is not, as the majority itself acknowledges. I cannot accept that where Parliament has set out a particular super priority for the Crown for environmental remediation costs, secured against specific real property assets of the bankrupt, and where certain conditions are met, it somehow "facilitates" Parliament's priority scheme to, in effect, impose that super priority over other assets, in the absence of those statutory conditions being satisfied. It is wrong to rely on s. 14.06(7) to recognize an effective super priority for the AER in circumstances where the terms of that subsection are inapplicable. Doing so clearly undermines the detailed and comprehensive priority scheme that Parliament set out in the BIA to achieve its purposes. Had Parliament wished to extend a Crown super priority for environmental remediation costs beyond the circumstances in s. 14.06(7), it could have done so.

[287] As a final note, GTL and ATB Financial advance alternative arguments that some aspects of Alberta's statutory regime, including the definition of "licensee", frustrate the purposes of the 1997 amendments to the BIA — purposes that, they say, include protecting insolvency professionals from liability and reducing the number of orphaned sites.

[288] It is not strictly necessary for me to address these arguments, since I have already found that there is an operational conflict (the Alberta regime's failure to recognize the lawfulness of GTL's disclaimers) as well as a frustration of purpose on other grounds (interference with the BIA's priority scheme). I would note, however, that GTL has stated that it would immediately seek a discharge if it were required to carry out the abandonment work, which would result réalisation des intentions du Parlement qui sous-tendent le régime de priorité de la LFI en raison de la superpriorité prévue au par. 14.06(7) pour les frais de décontamination environnementale (par. 159). Avec égards, je rejette entièrement cette prétention. Aucune partie n'a tenté de faire valoir que la superpriorité visée au par. (7) s'appliquait aux faits de l'espèce. En effet, elle ne s'applique clairement pas, comme le reconnait elle-même la majorité. Je ne peux accepter que, dans les cas où le Parlement a conféré à la Couronne une superpriorité lorsque certaines conditions sont réunies pour les frais de décontamination environnementale et l'a garantie par une sûreté sur certains biens réels du failli, on « favorise » d'une façon ou d'une autre le régime de priorité du Parlement en imposant dans les faits cette superpriorité sur d'autres biens alors que ces conditions statutaires ne sont pas remplies. Il est erroné d'invoquer le par. 14.06(7) pour reconnaître à l'AER une superpriorité dans des situations où les conditions de ce paragraphe ne s'appliquent pas. Agir de la sorte sape clairement le régime de priorité détaillé et complet que le Parlement a établi dans la LFI pour réaliser ses objectifs. Si le Parlement avait souhaité étendre une superpriorité de la Couronne pour des frais de décontamination environnementale dans d'autres cas que ceux visés au par. 14.06(7), il aurait pu le faire.

[287] En terminant, GTL et ATB Financial font valoir des arguments subsidiaires selon lesquels certains aspects du régime de réglementation albertain, notamment la définition de « titulaire de permis », entravent la réalisation des objets des modifications apportées à la LFI en 1997 — objets qui, affirment-ils, comprennent la protection des professionnels de l'insolvabilité contre la responsabilité et la réduction du nombre de sites orphelins.

[288] Il n'est pas strictement nécessaire que j'examine ces arguments, car j'ai déjà conclu qu'il existe un conflit d'application (la non-reconnaissance par le régime albertain de la légalité des renonciations de GTL) ainsi qu'une entrave à la réalisation d'objet pour d'autres motifs (atteinte au régime de priorité établi par la LFI). Je tiens toutefois à souligner que GTL a déclaré qu'elle demanderait immédiatement une libération si elle était tenue d'exécuter les in the remaining Redwater assets being surrendered to the OWA. The result in this circumstance, which does not appear to be acknowledged, or which appears to be ignored, in my colleague's reasons, would be more orphaned oil wells. To the extent, then, that the 1997 amendments were intended to reduce the number of orphaned properties, that purpose is also frustrated by preventing a receiver or trustee from disclaiming value-negative assets.

IV. Conclusion

[289] There is much to be said in the context of this appeal about which outcome will optimally balance environmental protection and economic development. On the one hand, enforcing the AER's remediation orders would effectively wipe out the estate's remaining value and leave all of its creditors (except the AER) without any recovery. It would also likely discourage insolvency professionals from accepting mandates in cases such as this one — potentially resulting in more orphaned properties across the province. On the other hand, permitting GTL to disclaim the non-producing wells and preventing the AER from enforcing environmental obligations before the estate's value is depleted would leave open the question of who, exactly, should foot the bill for remediating the affected land.

[290] Whatever the merits of these competing positions, in matters of statutory interpretation this Court is one of law, not of policy. As the majority recognizes, at para. 30, "it is not the role of this Court to decide the best regulatory approach to the oil and gas industry"; decisions on these matters are made — indeed, they have been made — by legislators, not judges. And the law in this case supports only one outcome. But this does not mean that the AER is without options to protect the public from bearing the costs of abandoning oil wells. It could adjust its LMR requirements to prevent other oil companies from reaching the point of bankruptcy with unfunded abandonment obligations (as it has already done since this litigation began). It could travaux d'abandon, ce qui entraînerait la cession du reste des biens de Redwater à l'OWA. Il en résulterait, ce qui ne semble pas être reconnu ou paraît être passé sous silence dans les motifs de mon collègue, un nombre plus élevé de puits de pétrole orphelins. Dans la mesure où les modifications de 1997 étaient censées entraîner une réduction du nombre de biens orphelins, la réalisation de cet objet est également entravée en empêchant le séquestre ou le syndic de renoncer aux biens ayant une valeur négative.

IV. Conclusion

[289] Il y a beaucoup à dire, dans le contexte du présent pourvoi, sur l'issue qui établirait un équilibre optimal entre la protection de l'environnement et le développement économique. D'une part, faire exécuter les ordonnances de décontamination de l'AER aurait pour effet d'éliminer la valeur restante de l'actif et priverait tous ses créanciers (sauf l'AER) de tout recouvrement. En outre, cela découragerait vraisemblablement les professionnels de l'insolvabilité d'accepter des mandats dans des cas comme celui qui nous occupe, ce qui pourrait occasionner une augmentation du nombre de biens orphelins dans l'ensemble de la province. D'autre part, permettre à GTL de renoncer aux puits inexploités en empêchant l'AER de faire exécuter les obligations environnementales avant que l'actif soit épuisé laisserait sans réponse la question de savoir qui, exactement, devrait payer la facture de la décontamination des terrains concernés.

[290] Quel que soit le bien-fondé de ces positions opposées en matière d'interprétation statutaire, notre Cour est un tribunal de droit, et non de politique. Comme le reconnaît la majorité (par. 30), « il ne revient pas à notre Cour de décider de la meilleure approche réglementaire pour l'industrie pétrolière et gazière » : les décisions sur ces enjeux sont prises — et ont d'ailleurs été prises — par les législateurs, et non par les juges. Et le droit en l'espèce n'appuie qu'une seule issue. Mais cela ne veut pas dire qu'aucune solution ne s'offre à l'AER pour empêcher le public d'avoir à supporter les frais liés à l'abandon des puits de pétrole. Il pourrait ajuster ses exigences relatives à la RGTP afin d'éviter que d'autres sociétés pétrolières soient acculées à la faillite en raison adopt strategies used in other jurisdictions, such as requiring the posting of security up-front so that abandonment costs are not borne entirely at the end of an oil well's life cycle. One of the interveners, the Canadian Bankers' Association, noted that such systems of up-front bonding are prevalent in American jurisdictions. The AER could work with industry to increase levies so that the orphan fund has sufficient resources to respond to the recent increase in the number of orphaned properties. It could seek judicial intervention in cases where it suspects that a company is strategically using insolvency as a voluntary step to avoid its environmental liabilities (Sydco Energy Inc. (Re), 2018 ABQB 75, 64 Alta. L.R. (6th) 156, at para. 84). And, as I have noted, it can continue to apply the province's statutory regime to all assets of an insolvent or bankrupt debtor that are retained by a receiver or trustee, including wells and facilities that the receiver or trustee seeks to operate rather than sell.

d'obligations d'abandon non financées (comme il l'a déjà fait depuis que le présent litige a commencé). Il pourrait adopter les stratégies utilisées dans d'autres ressorts, comme exiger dès le début le versement d'un dépôt de garantie afin que les frais liés à l'abandon ne soient pas entièrement supportés à la fin du cycle de vie du puits de pétrole. L'une des intervenants, l'Association des banquiers canadiens, a fait remarquer que de tels systèmes de dépôts de garantie au départ abondent dans les États américains. L'AER pourrait collaborer avec l'industrie pour augmenter les prélèvements afin que le fonds pour les puits orphelins dispose de ressources suffisantes pour répondre à la récente augmentation du nombre de biens orphelins. Il pourrait solliciter l'intervention des tribunaux dans les cas où il soupçonne une société d'utiliser stratégiquement l'insolvabilité comme une mesure facultative lui permettant de se soustraire à ses engagements environnementaux (Sydco Energy Inc. (Re), 2018 ABQB 75, 64 Alta. L.R. (6th) 156, par. 84). Et, comme je l'ai mentionné, il peut continuer d'appliquer le régime législatif provincial à tous les biens d'un débiteur insolvable ou en faillite qui sont conservés par un séquestre ou un syndic, y compris les puits et installations que le séquestre ou le syndic veut exploiter plutôt que de les vendre.

[291] The AER may not, however, disregard federal bankruptcy law in the pursuit of otherwise valid statutory objectives. Yet that is precisely what it has done here by effectively displacing the "polluter-pays" principle enacted by Parliament in favour of a "lender-pays" regime, in which responsibility for the bankrupt's environmental liabilities is transferred to the estate's creditors. Our paramountcy jurisprudence does not permit that result.

[291] L'AER ne peut pas, cependant, faire abstraction du droit fédéral de la faillite pour atteindre des objectifs statutaires par ailleurs valides. Or, c'est précisément ce qu'il a fait en l'espèce en écartant effectivement le principe du « pollueur-payeur » adopté par le Parlement en faveur d'un régime du « prêteur-payeur », dans le cadre duquel la responsabilité à l'égard des engagements environnementaux du failli passe aux créanciers de l'actif. Notre jurisprudence en matière de prépondérance n'admet pas ce résultat.

[292] For the foregoing reasons, I would dismiss the appeal and affirm the orders made by the chambers judge.

[292] Pour les motifs qui précèdent, je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi et de confirmer les ordonnances rendues par le juge en cabinet.

APPENDIX

Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3

14.06 (1) No trustee is bound to assume the duties of trustee in matters relating to assignments, bankruptcy orders or proposals, but having accepted an appointment in relation to those matters the trustee shall, until discharged or another trustee is appointed in the trustee's stead, perform the duties required of a trustee under this Act.

(1.1) In subsections (1.2) to (6), a reference to a trustee means a trustee in a bankruptcy or proposal and includes

(a) an interim receiver;

(b) a receiver within the meaning of subsection 243(2); and

(c) any other person who has been lawfully appointed to take, or has lawfully taken, possession or control of any property of an insolvent person or a bankrupt that was acquired for, or is used in relation to, a business carried on by the insolvent person or bankrupt.

(2) Notwithstanding anything in any federal or provincial law, a trustee is not personally liable in that position for any environmental condition that arose or environmental damage that occurred

(a) before the trustee's appointment; or

(b) after the trustee's appointment unless it is established that the condition arose or the damage occurred as a result of the trustee's gross negligence or wilful misconduct or, in the Province of Quebec, the trustee's gross or intentional fault.

(3) Nothing in subsection (2) exempts a trustee from any duty to report or make disclosure imposed by a law referred to in that subsection.

(4) Notwithstanding anything in any federal or provincial law but subject to subsection (2), where an order is made which has the effect of requiring a trustee to remedy

Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité, L.R.C. 1985, c. B-3

14.06 (1) Le syndic n'est pas tenu d'assumer les fonctions de syndic relativement à des cessions, à des ordonnances de faillite ou à des propositions concordataires; toutefois, dès qu'il accepte sa nomination à ce titre, il doit accomplir les fonctions que la présente loi lui impose, jusqu'à ce qu'il ait été libéré ou qu'un autre syndic ait été nommé à sa place.

(1.1) Les paragraphes (1.2) à (6) s'appliquent également aux syndics agissant dans le cadre d'une faillite ou d'une proposition ainsi qu'aux personnes suivantes :

a) les séquestres intérimaires;

b) les séquestres au sens du paragraphe 243(2);

c) les autres personnes qui sont nommément habilitées à prendre — ou ont pris légalement — la possession ou la responsabilité d'un bien acquis ou utilisé par une personne insolvable ou un failli dans le cadre de ses affaires.

(2) Par dérogation au droit fédéral et provincial, le syndic est, ès qualités, dégagé de toute responsabilité personnelle découlant de tout fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement survenu avant ou après sa nomination, sauf celui causé par sa négligence grave ou son inconduite délibérée ou, dans la province de Québec, par sa faute lourde ou intentionnelle.

(3) Le paragraphe (2) n'a pas pour effet de soustraire le syndic à une obligation de faire rapport ou de communiquer des renseignements prévue par le droit applicable en l'espèce.

(4) Par dérogation au droit fédéral et provincial, mais sous réserve du paragraphe (2), le syndic est, ès qualités, dégagé de toute responsabilité personnelle découlant du any environmental condition or environmental damage affecting property involved in a bankruptcy, proposal or receivership, the trustee is not personally liable for failure to comply with the order, and is not personally liable for any costs that are or would be incurred by any person in carrying out the terms of the order,

(a) if, within such time as is specified in the order, within ten days after the order is made if no time is so specified, within ten days after the appointment of the trustee, if the order is in effect when the trustee is appointed, or during the period of the stay referred to in paragraph (b), the trustee

(i) complies with the order, or

(ii) on notice to the person who issued the order, abandons, disposes of or otherwise releases any interest in any real property, or any right in any immovable, affected by the condition or damage;

(b) during the period of a stay of the order granted, on application made within the time specified in the order referred to in paragraph (a), within ten days after the order is made or within ten days after the appointment of the trustee, if the order is in effect when the trustee is appointed, by

(i) the court or body having jurisdiction under the law pursuant to which the order was made to enable the trustee to contest the order, or

(ii) the court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy for the purposes of assessing the economic viability of complying with the order; or

(c) if the trustee had, before the order was made, abandoned or renounced or been divested of any interest in any real property, or any right in any immovable, affected by the condition or damage.

(5) The court may grant a stay of the order referred to in subsection (4) on such notice and for such period as the court deems necessary for the purpose of enabling the trustee to assess the economic viability of complying with the order.

(6) If the trustee has abandoned or renounced any interest in any real property, or any right in any immovable, affected by the environmental condition or environmental non-respect de toute ordonnance de réparation de tout fait ou dommage lié à l'environnement et touchant un bien visé par une faillite, une proposition ou une mise sous séquestre administrée par un séquestre, et de toute responsabilité personnelle relativement aux frais engagés par toute personne exécutant l'ordonnance :

a) si, dans les dix jours suivant l'ordonnance ou dans le délai fixé par celle-ci, dans les dix jours suivant sa nomination si l'ordonnance est alors en vigueur ou pendant la durée de la suspension visée à l'alinéa b) :

(i) il s'y conforme,

(ii) il abandonne, après avis à la personne ayant rendu l'ordonnance, tout droit sur l'immeuble en cause ou tout intérêt sur le bien réel en cause, en dispose ou s'en dessaisit;

b) pendant la durée de la suspension de l'ordonnance qui est accordée, sur demande présentée dans les dix jours suivant l'ordonnance visée à l'alinéa a) ou dans le délai fixé par celle-ci, ou dans les dix jours suivant sa nomination si l'ordonnance est alors en vigueur :

(i) soit par le tribunal ou l'autorité qui a compétence relativement à l'ordonnance, en vue de permettre au syndic de la contester,

(ii) soit par le tribunal qui a compétence en matière de faillite, en vue d'évaluer les conséquences économiques du respect de l'ordonnance;

c) si, avant que l'ordonnance ne soit rendue, il avait abandonné tout droit sur l'immeuble en cause ou tout intérêt sur le bien réel en cause ou y avait renoncé, ou s'en était dessaisi.

(5) En vue de permettre au syndic d'évaluer les conséquences économiques du respect de l'ordonnance, le tribunal peut en ordonner la suspension après avis et pour la période qu'il estime indiqués.

(6) Si le syndic a abandonné tout droit sur l'immeuble en cause ou tout intérêt sur le bien réel en cause ou y a renoncé, les réclamations pour les frais de réparation du

(7) Any claim by Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province against the debtor in a bankruptcy, proposal or receivership for costs of remedying any environmental condition or environmental damage affecting real property or an immovable of the debtor is secured by security on the real property or immovable affected by the environmental condition or environmental damage and on any other real property or immovable of the debtor that is contiguous with that real property or immovable and that is related to the activity that caused the environmental condition or environmental damage, and the security

(a) is enforceable in accordance with the law of the jurisdiction in which the real property or immovable is located, in the same way as a mortgage, hypothec or other security on real property or immovables; and

(b) ranks above any other claim, right, charge or security against the property, despite any other provision of this Act or anything in any other federal or provincial law.

(8) Despite subsection 121(1), a claim against a debtor in a bankruptcy or proposal for the costs of remedying any environmental condition or environmental damage affecting real property or an immovable of the debtor shall be a provable claim, whether the condition arose or the damage occurred before or after the date of the filing of the proposal or the date of the bankruptcy.

Court File No. M19800 (C24399)

COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO

IN THE MATTER OF THE BANKRUPTCY OF CONFEDERATION TREASURY SERVICES LIMITED, a corporation incorporated under the laws of the Province of Ontario having its head office in the City of Toronto, in the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto, Province of Ontario, and

IN THE MATTER OF the Winding-Up Act, and

IN THE MATTER OF the Liquidation of Confederation Life Insurance Company

BEFORE: CATZMAN, CARTHY and MOLDAVER JJ.A.

COUNSEL: Peter H. Griffin and Risa Kirshblum for Ernst & Young

A. Sternberg for former directors and officers of Confederation Life Insurance Company and Confederation Treasury Services Limited

William G. Horton for the Rehabilitator of Confederation Life Insurance Company in the United States

R.N. Robertson and E. Lamek for the trustee of the estate of Confederation Treasury Services Limited, a bankrupt

HEARD: December 19, 1996

ENDORSEMENT

Ernst & Young ("E&Y") filed a proof of claim, dated February 21st, 1996, with the trustee of the estate of Confederation Treasury Services Limited ("the trustee"). In one of several orders made on April 8th, 1996, Farley J. granted a motion by the trustee disallowing E&Y's proof of claim. No appeal was taken from this order until its significance became apparent during the argument of the appeal from another order made by Farley J. on the same day. In that appeal, E&Y and the former directors and officers of Confederation Life Insurance Company and Confederation Treasury Services Limited ("the directors and officers") sought an order that would entitle them to assert a claim against the trustee for relief arising out of their potential liability in an action now pending in Michigan. But only a creditor may seek such leave: see ss. 69 ff. of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.B-3 ("the BIA"). Section 2 of the BIA defines "creditor" to mean a person having a claim, preferred, secured or unsecured, provable as a claim under the Act, and defines "claim provable in bankruptcy", "provable claim" and "claim provable" to include any claim or liability provable in proceedings under the Act by a creditor. The trustee resisted the other appeal on a number of grounds, including the ground that, because E&Y's proof of claim had been disallowed, it was not a "creditor" entitled to the relief it sought.

E&Y immediately brought this motion for leave to extend the time to appeal from the order disallowing its proof of claim. The uncontradicted evidence of E&Y is that it always intended to appeal the whole of the disposition of Farley J. made on April 8th, 1996 which had the result of foreclosing its entitlement to assert a claim for contribution and indemnity from the trustee, and we are not satisfied that the trustee would suffer any prejudice from the granting of such leave. Leave to extend the time to appeal from the order disallowing the proof of claim is therefore granted.

We turn to the appeal itself. Section 121 of the BIA deems all debts and liabilities, present or future, to which the bankrupt is subject on the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt or to which the bankrupt may become subject before the bankrupt's discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt to be claims provable in proceedings under the Act. Section 121(2) makes specific reference to contingent claims and unliquidated claims. The claim of E&Y is, on its face, a contingent claim and, because E & Y is subject to a claim for treble damages in the Michigan proceedings, is not the same as the claim asserted against the trustee in Ontario by the Rehabilitator and exceeds that claim to the extent that any such damages may be awarded over and above the amount that may be awarded against the trustee.

In so far as the cases of Claude Resources Inc. (Trustee of) v. Dutton (1993), 22 C.B.R. (3d) 56 and Re Wiebe (1995), 30 C.B.R. (3d) 109, relied upon by the trustee, articulate as a test for a valid contingent claim the need for probability of liability arising from the court proceedings in question, we believe that they impose too high a threshold for the establishment of such a claim. While there may be claims so remote and speculative in nature that they could not properly be considered contingent claims, the claim of E&Y in the present case for contribution and indemnity in respect of the relief sought against it in the Michigan proceedings does not fall into that category and, in our view, constitutes a valid contingent claim within the contemplation of sec. 121 of the BIA.

Accordingly, the appeal from the order disallowing E&Y's proof of claim is allowed and, in its place, a declaration will issue that E&Y's contingent claim is a claim provable in the bankruptcy of Confederation Treasury Services Limited. Pursuant to s. 121(2) of the BIA, the matter is remitted to the Ontario Court (General Division) to value

E&Y's claim upon such evidence as may be adduced by the parties in respect of such valuation and E&Y's claim shall be deemed a proved claim to the amount of its valuation.

It has been common ground throughout the argument of these appeals that the directors and officers, who have not yet filed a proof of claim with the trustee, fall into the same category as E&Y with respect to the relief sought against them in the Michigan proceedings. Such a proof of claim, as and when it is filed by the directors and officers, is to be treated in the same manner as we have directed in respect of E&Y's proof of claim.

Having regard to the circumstances out of which the appeal from the disallowance of E&Y's proof of claim arose, we order that there should be no costs of this appeal except the usual order for payment of the costs of the trustee out of the estate of Confederation Treasury Services Limited.

Ontario Supreme Court
Wiebe, Re
Date: 1995-02-06

Re bankruptcy of Peter Victor Wiebe

Ontario Court of Justice (General Division) [In Bankruptcy] Kozak J.

Judgment – February 6, 1995.

(Doc. 48-94B)

[1] February 6, 1995. KOZAK J.: – This is an application pursuant to R. 94 of the Bankruptcy Act for a determination as to whether the contingent claim of the Thunder Bay District Health Unit is a provable claim and, if so, the value of the said claim.

Factual Background

[2] The bankrupt, Peter Victor Wiebe, is a dentist who is licensed and duly qualified to carry on a private practice in the Province of Ontario. An assignment in bankruptcy was filed on his behalf on November 5, 1993. On November 25, 1993, a proof of claim was filed by the Thunder Bay District Health Unit in which the sum of $94,458.58 was shown as an unsecured debt owing by the bankrupt to the said creditor. The amount shown as being owing arises out of an agreement, in writing, dated January 2, 1992 under which the Thunder Bay District Health Unit advanced to Doctor Wiebe the sum of $94,458.58 for the purpose of becoming qualified as a Dental Director in Public Health so that the Health Unit could hire him as its Dental Director. In this regard I take it that Doctor Wiebe successfully completed the necessary courses to qualify himself to practice as a Dental Director in Dental Public Health in the Province of Ontario, and that he commenced employment with the Health Unit in that capacity on September 1, 1993. The affidavit material filed indicates that he continues to be so employed.

[3] Paragraph 5 of the agreement between Doctor Wiebe and the Health Unit states:

> Provided the Dentist successfully obtains the necessary qualifications and is employed by the Health Unit for the period September 1, 1993 to February 28, 1998 as its Dental Director then all monies loaned to him or paid on his behalf by the Health Unit shall be forgiven.

On the other hand, para. 3(d) states:

> Except in the occurrence of death or permanent disability in the event that the Dentist enters employment with the Health Unit but his employment is terminated before completing the required period of service of 54 months commencing September 1, 1993 to February 28, 1998 of such service, then all monies advanced to the Dentist or on his behalf pursuant to paragraph 2 shall forthwith be due and payable on demand by him to the Health Unit together with interest at the rate of 11 percent per annum calculated from the dates of the respective advances or payments on his behalf.

[4] On August 5, 1994 a discharge hearing took place at which time the bankrupt's discharge was ordered suspended for a period of four months and he was discharged on December 5, 1994. Subsequent to the discharge the trustee came into possession of an unexpected sum in the amount of $2,500 and now wishes to have this amount paid out to the unsecured creditors. Hence the need to have the contingent claim of the Thunder Bay Health Unit determined as a provable claim and valued.

Legal Considerations

[5] Section 121(1) makes it clear that only debts to which the debtor is liable before the date of the bankruptcy or those to which he may become subject before his discharge, by reason of an obligation incurred before the bankruptcy, share in the assets vested in the trustee.

[6] Rule 94(1) provides that when a contingent or unliquidated claim is filed with the trustee, he shall, unless he compromises the claim, apply to the Court to determine whether the claim is a provable claim and, if so, to value the claim.

[7] A provable claim must be one recoverable by legal process (Farm Credit Corp. v. Holowach (Trustee of) (1988), 68 C.B.R. (N.S.) 255 (Alta. C.A.)). To be a provable claim under s. 121(2), a claim must not be too remote and speculative. To establish that a contingent claim or unliquidated claim is a provable claim, a creditor must prove more than he has been sued, and that he has an indemnity agreement from the bankrupt. There has to be an element of probability of liability arising from the Court proceedings. If there are too many ifs about the action and the applicability of the indemnity agreement before a provable claim comes into being, the claim is not a provable claim under s. 121(2). See Claude Resources Inc. (Trustee of) v. Dutton (1993), 22 C.B.R. (3d) 56 (Sask. Q.B.).

Decision

[8] This is a case where the bankrupt has now been employed as the Dental Director of the Health Unit since September 1, 1993 and it would appear that he is performing his job function in a satisfactory manner. According to the Trustee, there is no present intention, on the part of the bankrupt, to leave his current employment, nor is there any indication at the present time, on behalf of the Health Unit, to terminate the employment of the bankrupt. The parties are content with the present arrangement which has existed for the past 18 months, and it is anticipated that the status will prevail until February 28, 1998 at which time the loan to the bankrupt will be forgiven. And yet, the contingency that the bankrupt might leave his employment or be terminated by his employer prior to February 28, 1998 and thereby incur liability for the loan is not so speculative or remote a probability as to render the creditor's claim unprovable. There are any number of reasons as to why a person might leave a position such as this or be terminated for cause. The bankrupt might receive a better job offer, wish to return to private practice, or move to another area. On the other hand, there might be misconduct or misbehaviour on the part of the bankrupt in the performance of his duties that could result in his dismissal prior to the expiration of the 54 month period. There is a case to be made for the Court to consider some factor for the happening of the contingency in this case. Accordingly, it is the finding of this Court that the creditor, Thunder Bay District Health Unit, has proven its claim.

[9] As to the value of the said claim, the Court must look to what is reasonable in the circumstances. Given the current state of satisfaction of the parties, the tenure of the bankrupt on the job and the period remaining in the agreement, this Court values the claim at approximately ten percent of its face value which would be $9,500.

Order accordingly.

Ontario Reports

Court of Appeal for Ontario,

Gillese, Blair and D.M. Brown JJ.A.

January 6, 2016

128 O.R. (3d) 537 | 2016 ONCA 5

Case Summary

Bankruptcy and insolvency — Discharge — Personal income tax debt — Amount of assessed personal income tax that was under appeal at time of bankrupt's discharge hearing not included in calculating bankrupt's personal income tax debt under s. 172.1(1) of Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act — Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, s. 172.1(1). [page538]

At the time of the bankrupt's discharge, he had unpaid income tax assessments totalling approximately $4.478 million. About $4.424 million of that amount was subject to outstanding appeals by the bankrupt to the Tax Court of Canada. If the full assessed amount was considered part of his personal income tax debt, s. 172.1 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act would apply to his bankruptcy; if the appealed amounts were excluded, s. 172.1 would not apply. The registrar in bankruptcy held that s. 172.1 did not apply to the discharge application. She discharged the bankrupt, subject to a condition that he remit to the trustee the remaining surplus income payable, up to a maximum of $10,000. The motion judge dismissed the Attorney General's motion by way of appeal. The Attorney General appealed.

Held, the appeal should be dismissed.

In calculating the bankrupt's personal income tax debt under s. 172.1(1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, the assessed amounts of personal income tax that were under appeal at the time of his discharge hearing were not to be included. The motion judge and the registrar correctly concluded that until the Tax Court of Canada had disposed of the bankrupt's appeals of the assessments, the portion of the Canada Revenue Agency's claim for the assessed amounts under appeal was a contingent one that the trustee could refuse to admit as a proven claim. The stipulation in s. 158 of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) that any unpaid amount assessed is "payable forthwith" upon the mailing of a notice of assessment must be understood within the larger context of the taxpayer's right under the Income Tax Act to object to an assessment and to appeal a minister's confirmation of an assessment to the Tax Court of Canada.

APPEAL from the order of T.J. McEwen J. of the Superior Court of Justice dated December 8, 2014 affirming a decision of the registrar in bankruptcy.

Kevin Dias and Maria Vujnovic, for appellant.

Fred Tayar, for respondent.

The judgment of the court was delivered by

D.M. BROWN J.A.: —

I. Overview

[1] Special rules govern discharge hearings in income tax-driven personal bankruptcies. Section 172.1 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA") provides that where the bankrupt has $200,000 or more of personal income tax debt and that personal income tax debt represents 75 per cent or more of the bankrupt's total unsecured proven claims, the timing of the discharge hearing, the discharge orders available to the court to make, and the factors the court must take into account in deciding the discharge application differ from those applied in a standard bankruptcy.

[2] At the time of his discharge hearing, the respondent bankrupt, Paul Schnier, had unpaid income tax assessments totalling approximately $4.478 million. About $4.424 million of that amount was subject to outstanding appeals he had filed in the Tax Court of Canada. If the full assessed amount was considered part of his personal income tax debt, s. 172.1 of the BIA would apply to his bankruptcy; if the appealed amounts were excluded, s. 172.1 would not apply.

[3] The registrar in bankruptcy held that s. 172.1 of the BIA did not apply to Mr. Schnier's application for discharge. Her order of July 18, 2014 (the "discharge order") discharged Mr. Schnier, subject to the condition that he remit to the trustee the remaining surplus income payable, up to a maximum of $10,000. [page540]

[4] By order dated December 8, 2014 (the "appeal order"), the motion judge dismissed the Attorney General's motion by way of appeal from the discharge order. The Attorney General now appeals to this court.

[5] Although the Attorney General asks that the appeal order be set aside, if it is, the Attorney General does not seek to vary the conditions of the discharge order made by the registrar. The relief sought by the Attorney General on this appeal is limited to a determination that s. 172.1 of the BIA applied to Mr. Schnier's discharge hearing.

[6] The issue then, on this appeal, is a narrow one: In calculating Mr. Schnier's personal income tax debt under BIA, s. 172.1(1), should the assessed amounts of personal income tax that were under appeal at the time of his discharge hearing be included?

[7] For the reasons set out below, I conclude the answer is no, and I would dismiss the appeal. Both the motion judge and the registrar correctly concluded that until the Tax Court of Canada had disposed of Mr. Schnier's appeals of the Canada Revenue Agency ("CRA") assessments, the portion of the CRA's claim for the assessed amounts under appeal was a contingent one that the trustee could refuse to admit as a proven claim. Accordingly, the motion judge and the registrar correctly held that s. 172.1 of the BIA did not apply to Mr. Schnier's discharge hearing.

II. Background

[8] Mr. Schnier is a tax lawyer. His bankruptcy was driven by investments he made in two types of tax shelters. Between 1985 and 1991, Mr. Schnier invested in two yacht tax shelters. In the 1990s and early 2000s, he invested in four computer software tax shelters. Mr. Schnier claimed deductions from his income on those investments for either interest expenses or business losses. At the time Mr. Schnier made these investments, he believed that the tax shelters were permitted under the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) ("ITA"); he had made the investments after receiving opinions from independent tax lawyers and accountants.

[9] Beginning in 1989, Mr. Schnier received notices of reassessment in relation to the yacht tax shelters going back to the 1985 taxation year. He immediately served on the Minister of National Revenue notices of objection to all of the CRA reassessments.

[10] Section 165(3) of the ITA provides that upon receipt of a notice of objection, the minister "shall, with all due dispatch, reconsider the assessment and vacate, confirm or vary the [page541] assessment or reassess". That did not occur in this case. Inexplicably, the minister allowed Mr. Schnier's objections to languish for over two decades. During that time, Mr. Schnier repeatedly asked the CRA to deal with his file, to no avail. It was not until October 2011 that the minister confirmed the reassessments for the yacht tax shelters. Mr. Schnier promptly filed notices of appeal to the Tax Court of Canada in November 2011.

[11] The following month, Mr. Schnier made a proposal to his creditors under the BIA. At that time, he had been assessed $1,278,519.62 in income tax, plus penalties and interest, for a total of $4,478,703.19. Although Mr. Schnier increased the amount of his proposal to creditors over the course of the following creditors' meetings, the CRA rejected the proposal, resulting in his deemed assignment into bankruptcy on January 19, 2012.

[12] On February 1, 2012, the CRA filed a proof of claim in the bankruptcy in the amount of $4,478,703.19 (the "claim"). The CRA disclosed that of the amount claimed, $4,424,558.19 was under appeal.

[13] In January 2013, the minister confirmed the assessments for the computer software tax shelters. Mr. Schnier filed appeals from those assessments in April 2013.

[14] In its February 4, 2014 report on the bankrupt's application for discharge, the trustee noted that the Tax Court had not yet determined Mr. Schnier's appeals of the CRA assessments. As a result, the trustee reported that it was "unable to value the claim and has not admitted CRA's claim for the assessed amounts under appeal as it is contingent". Consequently, the trustee's July 9, 2014 claims register admitted only $71,170.40 of the claim, and recorded the remaining $4.424 million of the claim as a contingent claim which was not admitted by the trustee.

[15] The CRA opposed Mr. Schnier's application to be discharged from bankruptcy.

[16] The registrar was required to consider whether the rules governing tax-driven personal bankruptcies set out in BIA, s. 172.1 applied to Mr. Schnier's bankruptcy. The reason is that important differences exist in the discharge procedures for individual bankrupts who fall within s.

172.1 and those who do not:

(i) in a standard personal bankruptcy, the passage of time may result in the automatic discharge of a bankrupt; under s. 172.1, an application to the court for a discharge hearing must be made;

(ii) in a standard personal bankruptcy, the court may grant an absolute order of discharge; such an order is not available if s. 172.1 applies; [page542]

(iii) if a court suspends the discharge in a s. 172.1 bankruptcy, the court must require the bankrupt to file income and expense statements with the trustee each month and to file all returns of income required by law to be filed; and

(iv) a court must take into account the following factors in considering a s. 172.1 discharge application: the circumstances of the bankrupt at the time the personal income tax debt was incurred; the efforts, if any, made by the bankrupt to pay the personal income tax debt; whether the bankrupt made payments in respect of other debts while failing to make reasonable efforts to pay the personal income tax debt; and the bankrupt's financial prospects.

[17] In her July 18, 2014 reasons, the registrar considered that the CRA was a proven creditor to the extent of the claims admitted by the trustee -- about $71,170. The balance of the CRA's claim consisted of assessed amounts of tax that were subject to appeals pending in the Tax Court of Canada and constituted a contingent claim. The registrar concluded that, "at present, the CRA has a contingent liability that cannot support the applicability of s. 172.1 of the BIA". On appeal, the motion judge agreed with the registrar.

III. Issue on the Appeal

[18] At issue on this appeal is whether s. 172.1(1) of the BIA applied to Mr. Schnier's discharge hearing. The section provides that the special income tax-driven bankruptcy discharge rules apply "[i]n the case of a bankrupt who has $200,000 or more of personal income tax debt and whose personal income tax debt represents 75% or more of the bankrupt's total unsecured proven claims".

[19] The parties offer competing interpretations of what constitutes "personal income tax debt" for purposes of s. 172.1. The Attorney General argues that "personal income tax debt" includes unpaid assessed tax, notwithstanding any right the taxpayer has to file an objection or appeal. The Attorney General submits that in this case, all of the $4.4 million CRA claimed in its proof of claim were amounts payable as of the dates of assessment, and remained payable under the ITA notwithstanding Mr. Schnier's subsequent appeals.

[20] The Attorney General submits that its interpretation is consistent with the express language of the ITA, which I discuss in detail below. It acknowledges a pair of cases that take the contrary view: [page543] Port Chevrolet Oldsmobile Ltd. (Re), [2002] B.C.J. No. 3206, 2002 BCSC 1874, 49 C.B.R. (4th) 127, affd [2004] B.C.J. No. 101, 2004 BCCA 37; and 2713250 Canada inc. (Re), [2011] J.Q. no 16993, 2011 QCCS 6119. The Attorney General submits that those cases were wrongly decided and should not be followed by this court.

[21] For his part, Mr. Schnier argues that on a proper interpretation of the ITA, his unpaid assessed amounts of tax that were subject to appeal were contingent claims which the trustee in bankruptcy did not accept as proven claims and, therefore, did not constitute "personal income tax debt" for the purposes of BIA, s. 172.1(1). Mr. Schnier submits that Port Chevrolet (Re) and 2713250 Canada inc. (Re) were correctly decided and should be followed by this court.

IV. Standard of Review

[22] The applicable standard of review was set out by this court in Murphy v. Sally Creek Environs Corp. (Trustee of), [2010] O.J. No. 1773, 2010 ONCA 312, 67 C.B.R. (5th) 161, at paras. 68, 70 and 72. On an appeal of a discharge order made by a registrar in bankruptcy, the reviewing motion judge may only set aside the order if the registrar erred in principle or in law, failed to take into account a proper factor, took into account an improper factor that demonstrably led to a wrong conclusion, or made a palpable and overriding error in respect of a finding of fact. The same standard of review applies to a further appeal to this court, although the decision under appeal is that of the motion judge, not the registrar. A motion judge will commit an error of law if he or she does not adhere to the correct standard when reviewing the registrar's decision.

V. Analysis

[23] Since the issue on this appeal concerns the interpretation of a statutory provision, I start by considering the legislative context in which s. 172.1 of the BIA is situated. I then outline and analyze the Attorney General's arguments regarding the proper interpretation of "personal income tax debt" that draw upon the language of the ITA. Next, I consider the Attorney General's argument that this court should decline to follow Port Chevrolet (Re) and 2713250 Canada inc. (Re). I then address the Attorney General's concern that upholding the motion judge's decision could invite abuse of the bankruptcy process. Finally, I consider the Attorney General's argument that the trustee in this case failed to determine whether or not CRA's claim was provable. [page544]

A. The legislative context for the analysis

[24] Applying the basic principle of statutory interpretation, the words "personal income tax debt" in BIA, s. 172.1(1) must be read in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the BIA, its object and the intention of Parliament: Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re) (1998), 36 O.R. (3d) 418, [1998] 1 S.C.R. 27, [1998] S.C.J. No. 2, at para. 21.

[25] A bankruptcy under the BIA follows a single proceeding model. In general terms, the property of the bankrupt not subject to security interests is realized and collected by the trustee in bankruptcy and then distributed to creditors with proven claims in accordance with the priorities set out in the scheme of distribution found in BIA, s. 136(1).

[26] At the heart of this distribution scheme lies the concept of creditor claims provable in bankruptcy. Section 121(1) of the BIA describes what claims are provable in a bankruptcy:

> 121(1) All debts and liabilities, present or future, to which the bankrupt is subject on the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt or to which the bankrupt may become subject before the bankrupt's discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt shall be deemed to be claims provable in proceedings under this Act.

[27] Liquidated claims are not the only ones provable in a bankruptcy. Section 121(2) of the BIA specifically recognizes contingent claims as provable in a bankruptcy by providing that "[t]he determination whether a contingent or unliquidated claim is a provable claim and the valuation of such a claim shall be made in accordance with section 135".

[28] In each bankruptcy, the trustee must examine and classify the claims filed by the bankrupt's creditors: BIA, s. 135. As part of that process, the trustee must consider whether the characteristics of a debt claimed by a creditor are those of a liquidated claim, future claim or contingent claim. If a trustee concludes that the debt claimed has the character of a contingent claim, the trustee must then determine whether the contingent claim is a provable claim. As BIA, s. 135(1.1) states:

> 135(1.1) The trustee shall determine whether any contingent claim or unliquidated claim is a provable claim, and, if a provable claim, the trustee shall value it, and the claim is thereafter, subject to this section, deemed a proved claim to the amount of its valuation.

[29] As explained by the Supreme Court of Canada in Newfoundland and Labrador v. AbitibiBowater Inc., [2012] 3 S.C.R. 443, [2012] S.C.J. No. 67, 2012 SCC 67, at paras. 34 and 36, [page545] "a claim may be asserted in insolvency proceedings even if it is contingent on an event that has not yet occurred", and "[t]he criterion used by courts to determine whether a contingent claim will be included in the insolvency process is whether the event that has not yet occurred is too remote or speculative".

[30] This general legislative scheme for the examination and determination of creditor claims in a bankruptcy provides the critical context in which to determine the narrow issue raised by this appeal -- i.e., whether the assessed amounts of income tax that were under appeal at the time of Mr. Schnier's discharge hearing should be included when calculating his personal income tax debt under BIA, s. 172.1(1). That is so because whether s. 172.1 applies to a bankruptcy turns on how the trustee classifies a claim by the CRA for the payment of assessed amounts of income tax which remain subject to an appeal by the bankrupt taxpayer at the time of his discharge hearing. The arguments advanced by the parties about the proper interpretation of "personal income tax debt" in s. 172.1(1) must be assessed within the larger context of this legislative scheme.

B. "Amounts payable" within the meaning of ITA, s. 223(1)

[31] As noted, s. 172.1(1) of the BIA provides that the special discharge hearing rules apply "[i]n the case of a bankrupt who has $200,000 or more of personal income tax debt and whose personal income tax debt represents 75% or more of the bankrupt's total unsecured proven claims".

[32] Section 172.1(8) of the BIA defines "personal income tax debt" to mean "the amount payable, within the meaning of subsection 223(1) of the Income Tax Act . . . by an individual".

[33] Section 223(1) of the ITA defines an "amount payable" by a person as any or all of "an amount payable under this Act by the person".

[34] What are the fundamental characteristics of an "amount payable" under the ITA? The Attorney General argues that there are two. First, s. 158 of the ITA provides:

> 158. Where the Minister mails a notice of assessment of any amount payable by a taxpayer, that part of the amount assessed then remaining unpaid is payable forthwith by the taxpayer to the Receiver General.

[35] Second, s. 152(8) of the ITA deems an assessment to be "valid and binding". According to the Attorney General, when combined together these two characteristics of an unpaid assessed personal income tax debt are determinative of the analysis in this appeal. Even if a taxpayer appeals an assessment, the character of the tax debt remains one that is "payable [page546] forthwith" (s. 158) and "valid and binding" (s. 152(8)): in effect, a liquidated claim. As a result, the Attorney General submits, "personal income tax debt" within the meaning of BIA, s. 172.1(1) includes unpaid assessed amounts of income tax that are under appeal.

[36] I do not find that argument persuasive, for two reasons.

[37] First, the roles played by ss. 152(8) and 158 of the ITA in the characterization of an assessed tax debt must take into account the right of a taxpayer to appeal a notice of assessment to the Tax Court of Canada under Part I, Division J of the ITA.

[38] Section 152(8) of the ITA expressly provides that the valid and binding effect of an assessment is made subject to a taxpayer's right to appeal an assessment. The section states:

> 152(8) An assessment shall, subject to being varied or vacated on an objection or appeal under this Part and subject to a reassessment, be deemed to be valid and binding notwithstanding any error, defect or omission in the assessment or in any proceeding under this Act relating thereto.

(Emphasis added)

[39] As put by the Federal Court of Appeal in Wesbrook Management Ltd. v. Canada, [1996] F.C.J. No. 1466, [1997] 1 C.T.C. 124 (C.A.), at p. 129 C.T.C., when commenting on the effect of what is now s. 152(8): "Once . . . an assessment can no longer be varied or vacated on objection or appeal . . . the last assessment is deemed valid and binding on both the taxpayer and the Minister".[1]

[40] Section 248(2) of the ITA is to the same effect. It states that "the tax payable by a taxpayer under any Part of this Act by or under which provision is made for the assessment of tax means the tax payable by the taxpayer as fixed by assessment or reassessment subject to variation on objection or on appeal, if any, in accordance with the provisions of that Part" (emphasis added).

[41] Both ss. 152(8) and 248(2) indicate that until the objection or appeal process is concluded, the amount of tax the minister can compel a taxpayer to pay cannot be known. The assessed amount can change from time to time by virtue of judicial decisions or new assessments: Terra Nova Properties Ltd. v. M.N.R., [1967] 2 Ex. C.R. 46, [1967] C.T.C. 82 (Exch. Ct.), at p. 51 Ex. C.R. [page547]

[42] The stipulation in s. 158 of the ITA that any unpaid amount assessed is "payable forthwith" upon the mailing of a notice of assessment must be understood within the larger context of the taxpayer's right under the ITA to object to an assessment and to appeal a minister's confirmation of an assessment to the Tax Court of Canada.

[43] Second, Part XV of the ITA places significant restrictions on the minister's ability to collect assessed amounts that are "payable forthwith" where a taxpayer has objected to or appealed those amounts.

[44] Usually, where an amount is payable under the ITA, s. 223(2) authorizes the minister to certify an amount payable that has not been paid "as an amount payable by the debtor". A certificate of an amount payable under ITA, s. 223(2) can be registered in the Federal Court and, when registered, has the same effect as if the certificate were a judgment obtained in the Federal Court against the tax debtor. Sections 223 through 225 then describe the different enforcement steps available to the minister to collect the amount payable: commencing legal proceedings in court; certifying the amount due under s. 223; using statutory garnishment remedies; and seizing the tax debtor's goods and chattels.

[45] However, when a taxpayer files an objection to or appeals an assessment, s. 225.1 places limits on the minister's ability to take steps to collect the assessed amounts. If a taxpayer has served a notice of objection to an assessment, the minister cannot take any of the statutory enforcement steps until 90 days after the minister has sent his notice of confirmation to the taxpayer (s. 225.1(2)). Similarly, if a taxpayer has appealed from an assessment to the Tax Court of Canada, the minister cannot take any of those steps before the day of mailing of a copy of the decision of that court to the taxpayer (s. 225.1(3)).[2]

[46] The rationale behind the limits s. 225.1 places on the minister's ability to collect is that it would be unfair to allow the minister to collect an assessed amount of tax until there is a final determination of the ultimate amount the taxpayer must pay.[3] [page548]

[47] In my view, the Attorney General takes far too narrow an approach to what constitutes an "amount payable" under ITA, s. 223(1), and therefore "personal income tax debt" in BIA, s. 172.1. The Attorney General's submission focuses on only some of the characteristics of an assessed income tax debt -- "payable forthwith" and "valid and binding notwithstanding any error, defect, or omission". It ignores the critical effect of sections 152(8), 225.1 and 248(2) of the ITA that enable a taxpayer to appeal an assessment and limit the collectability of that tax debt by the minister until the courts dispose of the appeal.

[48] When the provisions of the ITA are considered as a whole, the meaning of "amount payable" as used in ITA, s. 223(1) and BIA, s. 172.1(8) must take into account that where a taxpayer has appealed an assessment to the Tax Court of Canada, the actual amount of tax that the minister can compel the taxpayer to pay will not be known until the occurrence of a future event -- i.e., the determination of the taxpayer's appeal from the assessment. This is a hallmark of a contingent claim.

[49] Further, a creditor's inability to enforce a claim bears directly on the creditor's ability to prove its claim under the BIA. In order to be a provable claim within the meaning of BIA, s. 121, a claim must be one recoverable by legal process: Royal Bank of Canada v. Central Capital Corp. (Re) (1996), 27 O.R. (3d) 494, [1996] O.J. No. 359 (C.A.), at pp. 532-33 O.R. The restraints placed by ITA, s. 225.1 on the enforceability of an assessed amount of tax that is under appeal are strong indicators that a claim based on those amounts would not be provable in a bankruptcy.

[50] Consequently, where amounts of income tax assessed against an individual bankrupt taxpayer remain under appeal at the time of his discharge hearing, the existence of the outstanding appeal entitles the trustee to classify the claim based on the unpaid assessed amounts as a contingent, unprovable one.

C. The jurisprudence

[51] Turning to the jurisprudence, the Attorney General advances two arguments: (i) support for its position can be found in the decision of this court in Norris (Re) (1989), 69 O.R. (2d) 285, [1989] O.J. No. 995 (C.A.); and (ii) the British Columbia and Quebec courts were wrong to conclude in Port Chevrolet (Re) and 2713250 Canada inc. (Re), respectively, that an unpaid assessed amount of tax under appeal is a contingent claim. [page549]

The decision in Norris (Re)

[52] The Attorney General submits that Norris (Re) stands for the principle that in carrying out its duties under the BIA, a trustee cannot ignore what Parliament has legislated with respect to tax debts. Applying that principle to the present case, the Attorney General argues that the trustee must give full recognition to assessed amounts under appeal because under the ITA a taxpayer becomes liable for an unpaid portion of an assessment when the notice of assessment is sent. That liability continues to exist until the assessment is varied or vacated on an objection or appeal.

[53] In my view, the principle in Norris (Re) does not extend as far as the Attorney General submits. That case involved the bankruptcy of an individual against whom an assessment had been issued under the ITA. Critically, unlike in the present case, the bankrupt had not filed a notice of objection to the assessment. The Crown filed a proof of claim in the bankruptcy for the assessed amount and provided the trustee with the notice of assessment. The trustee disallowed the claim. This court held, at p. 287 O.R., that the trustee's request for evidence to support the proof of claim was fully answered by the notice of assessment, and if the trustee in bankruptcy wished to question the validity of an assessment against the bankrupt, it was required to seek its remedy within the ITA by filing a notice of objection.

[54] In the present case, the trustee did not look behind the notice of assessment in order to ascertain the amount of Mr. Schnier's personal income tax debt. Instead, the trustee gave effect to the appeal and enforcement provisions of the ITA. Whether the tax debt was liquidated or contingent for purposes of the BIA depended upon whether the taxpayer had exercised the appeal rights granted by the ITA and, if he had, whether s. 225.1 of the ITA restrained the minister from taking steps to enforce and collect the assessed amount. The trustee took into account that no final determination of Mr. Schnier's appeal had been made under the ITA, with the result that it was unable to value the CRA's claim.

The decisions in Port Chevrolet (Re) and 2713250 Canada inc. (Re)

[55] More relevant to the facts of this case are two decisions dealing with the power of the chair of a meeting of creditors under s. 108 of the BIA to admit or reject a proof of claim for the purpose of voting: Port Chevrolet (Re) and 2713250 Canada inc. (Re). [page550]

[56] In the Port Chevrolet (Re) case, the Canada Customs Revenue Agency ("CCRA") had issued an assessment under the Excise Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. E-15 to Port Chevrolet for about $16.4 million. The company filed a notice of intention to make a proposal under the BIA. The company also filed a notice of objection to the assessment. The CCRA filed a proof of claim in the amount of about $15.8 million the day before the meeting of creditors to vote on the company's proposal. The trustee disallowed CCRA's claim and valued it at nil, taking the view that it was unproven because it was based on an unresolved appeal and notice of objection. Relying on the trustee's disallowance, the chair of the creditors' meeting concluded that the CCRA claim was contingent and valued it at nil for voting purposes.

[57] The CCRA appealed the trustee's disallowance of its claim and the chair's decision that it had no right to vote at the meeting. The chambers judge dismissed the appeal on two grounds. First, the CCRA had failed to file a proof of claim in proper form: at para. 25. Second, the court rejected the CCRA's argument that provisions in the Excise Tax Act analogous to ss. 152(8) and 158 of the ITA created a valid and binding debt due from the moment of assessment regardless of the pending objection and appeal process: at paras. 35-36. The court stated, at para. 43:

> [I]f CCRA wishes to participate in concurrent proceedings under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, then it is bound to comply with the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act process with respect to proving its claim, and that compliance includes recognition of the trustee's powers to determine a claim is contingent and value it accordingly. I do not read Re Norris as precluding a trustee from exercising his discretion under s. 135(1.1).

[58] The British Columbia Court of Appeal affirmed the decision, but only in respect of the finding that the CCRA had failed to file a proof of claim in proper form. The BCCA specifically declined to consider the trustee's disallowance of the CCRA's contingent claim.

[59] A similar issue arose in a Quebec case involving a proposal made by 2713250 Canada Inc. under the BIA. The Agence du revenue du Québec ("ARQ") had issued two notices of assessment to the debtor company for which the company had filed notices of objection. The ARQ filed proofs of claim in the proposal proceedings based upon the full amount of the assessments. At two meetings of creditors, the proposal trustee held that the ARQ's claims were contingent and impossible to value because of the pending appeal of the notices of assessment. [page551] Therefore, the ARQ was ineligible to vote. The ARQ appealed the trustee's decisions.

[60] Gascon J., as he then was, dismissed the appeal, applying the reasoning of the chambers judge in the Port Chevrolet (Re) case. He held that in exercising the power conferred on it by BIA, s. 108(1), the trustee could conclude that the ARQ's claims were in fact contingent, unliquidated and not provable claims, due to the impossibility of valuing them with any certainty: at para. 86. Gascon J. then considered, and rejected, the ARQ's argument about the validity and binding nature of its notices of assessment, at paras. 88 through 94:

> Contrary to what the ARQ argues, the Court believes that in exercising the power ascribed to it by section 108(1), the Trustee was not legally bound to consider as valid, regardless of the situation, the notices of assessment on which the disputed proofs of claims are based.
>
> On the one hand, if the relevant tax laws establish a presumption of validity of those notices of assessment, that presumption is not irrebuttable. The objection process such tax laws authorize surely demonstrates this.
>
> On the other hand, the presumptions of validity established by tax laws are not incompatible with the exercise of the jurisdiction which the BIA confers on the Trustee pursuant to sections 108, 121 or 135 of the BIA.
>
> As the Court of Appeal for British Columbia points out in its analysis of the problem in Port Chevrolet, there are two possible solutions under such circumstances.
>
> The first is that in terms of a proof of claim filed under the BIA, one must give, without reservation, full faith and credit to any notice of assessment by the tax authorities, regardless whether it may eventually be set aside.
>
> The second is that we can reconcile the BIA and tax laws by drawing a distinction between, on the one hand, business judgment and a trustee's practice in exercising its powers under the BIA and, on the other hand, the "rebuttable" presumptions of validity of tax laws which subsist notwithstanding the prescribed objection and appeal processes.
> For its part, the Court prefers the second solution, which is much more respectful of the objectives of the BIA.

(Translation from French)

[61] Although the Port Chevrolet (Re) and 2713250 Canada Inc. (Re) cases both involved the exercise by trustees of their discretion in the context of admitting or rejecting proofs of claim for the purposes of voting under BIA, s. 108(1), in my view the reasoning in Port Chevrolet (Re), as adopted by 2713250 Canada inc. (Re), applies equally to the exercise of the trustee's general power to determine whether a contingent claim is a provable claim under ss. 121 and 135 of the BIA. Where a bankrupt taxpayer has appealed assessed amounts of income tax, it is open to a trustee to characterize a CRA proof of claim based on those [page552] assessments as a contingent claim. If the claim cannot be valued with any certainty prior to the disposition of the appeal, the trustee may treat the contingent claim as not provable in the bankruptcy.

[62] Such a result gives full recognition to the provisions of the ITA discussed earlier dealing with the calculation and enforcement of assessed amounts of income tax, while treating a proof of claim based on an appealed assessment in a manner harmonious with the general scheme of the BIA concerning creditors' proofs of claim.

[63] Such an interpretation is also consistent with the language of s. 172.1(1) of the BIA, which provides that the special discharge rules for tax-driven personal bankruptcies apply "in the case of a bankrupt who has $200,000 or more of personal income tax debt and whose personal income tax debt represents 75% or more of the bankrupt's total unsecured proven claims" (emphasis added). The use of the word "represents" signifies that in order for "personal income tax debt" to be capable of representing 75 per cent of a bankrupt's unsecured "proven claims", the "personal income tax debt" must possess the characteristics of a provable claim in bankruptcy. Put another way, to qualify as "personal income tax debt" within the meaning of s. 172.1(1), the tax debt must be a proven claim.

[64] To hold otherwise would give unfair, preferential treatment to CRA proofs of claim based on assessed income tax amounts that remain under appeal at the time of a discharge hearing. If the full amount of the assessed amount under appeal was recognized as a claim provable in the bankruptcy, and the taxpayer's appeal of the assessment was later allowed and the assessed amount reduced or eliminated, the CRA would have obtained an unjustified advantage over other creditors in the bankruptcy proceeding.

D. Potential abuse of the bankruptcy process

[65] Against that conclusion, the Attorney General argues that to treat CRA claims for unpaid assessed income tax under appeal as contingent ones that may not be provable would render meaningless s. 172.1 of the BIA. A taxpayer who was subject to significant income tax assessments could abuse the bankruptcy process by appealing his assessment, then make an assignment in bankruptcy and fail to expedite the hearing of his tax appeal. That would allow a bankrupt to avoid the special discharge rules created by s. 172.1 for tax-driven bankruptcies.

[66] In my view, the motion judge correctly addressed this argument when he held that "an adjournment could have been [page553] sought before the [registrar] so the appeal could be heard and no attempt was made in this case". Indeed, had the CRA sought a brief adjournment of Mr. Schnier's discharge hearing, no dispute could have arisen about the applicability of s. 172.1 to his bankruptcy, as the following chronology of events discloses.

[67] Section 225.1(5) of the ITA states that where a taxpayer who has appealed to the Tax Court of Canada has agreed to delay his appeal until the court has decided related test cases, then the minister may take actions to enforce the assessments against the taxpayer at any time after the minister gives written notice to the taxpayer that the decision of the Tax Court of Canada in the test case has been mailed to the minister.

[68] In February 2012, Mr. Schnier had filed with the Tax Court of Canada his agreement to be bound in the lead test cases before that court concerning the deductibility of expenses relating to the yacht tax shelters. The Tax Court of Canada confirmed that it would hold his appeal in abeyance pending the resolution of the three lead test cases. The lead cases concerning the yacht tax shelters were dismissed on January 7, 2014, and an appeal from that dismissal to the Federal Court of Appeal was withdrawn on March 19, 2014. Both those events took place before Mr. Schnier's bankruptcy hearing.

[69] However, the Tax Court of Canada did not formally dismiss Mr. Schnier's appeal from the yacht tax shelter assessments until August 18, 2014, slightly more than a month after his discharge hearing was held. The record does not explain when the Tax Court of Canada mailed the minister the decision dismissing the lead test appeals concerning the yacht tax shelters or why the minister did not send a written notice of the decision to Mr. Schnier prior to his discharge hearing. From the transcript of the discharge hearing, it is apparent that the parties were aware the test cases had been resolved in favour of the CRA: appeal book, p. 56. Why, given those circumstances, the CRA did not ask for a short adjournment of the discharge hearing pending formal notice to Mr. Schnier of the dismissal of the lead test appeals pursuant to ITA, s. 225.1(5) was not explained in the record before us.

E. Whether the trustee disallowed any part of the claim

[70] Finally, in her factum, the Attorney General argued that the trustee had failed to determine whether or not the CRA's claim was provable. I disagree.

[71] Although the appeal record did not contain a notice of disallowance issued by the trustee under BIA, s. 135(3) in respect of [page554] the claim, appellant's counsel candidly conceded that there was no evidence before the court about what, if anything, the trustee did under s. 135.

[72] In any event, the evidence showed that the CRA was aware well before the discharge hearing that the trustee had disallowed that part of its claim covering the assessed amounts under appeal. The trustee's report under s. 170(1) on the bankrupt's application for discharge was dated February 4, 2014, some five months prior to the discharge hearing, and was signed by the inspectors, including one of the inspectors who was an employee of the CRA. The report clearly stated that the trustee was unable to value most of the CRA's claim and had not admitted the portion concerning the assessed amounts under appeal as it was contingent. The trustee's July 9, 2014 claims register also recorded that $4.385 million of the CRA claim had been classified as contingent and had not been admitted for dividend. Accordingly, the evidence before the registrar at the time of the discharge hearing was that the trustee had determined that only $71,170 of the CRA claim was provable in the bankruptcy.

F. Conclusion

[73] For the reasons set out above, I conclude that both the motion judge and the registrar were correct in concluding that until the Tax Court of Canada disposed of Mr. Schnier's appeals of the CRA's assessments, the CRA's claim in the bankruptcy for the assessed amount under appeal was a contingent one which the trustee could refuse to admit as a proven claim. Consequently, the motion judge and the registrar correctly concluded that s. 172.1 of the BIA did not apply to Mr. Schnier's discharge hearing.

VI. Disposition

[74] I would dismiss the appeal. The parties agreed that the successful party would be entitled to costs of the appeal on a partial indemnity basis in the amount of $15,000. I would therefore order the Attorney General of Canada to pay Mr. Schnier costs of $15,000, inclusive of HST and disbursements.

Appeal dismissed.

Notes

1 Moreover, the case law interpreting s. 152(8) treats the section's purpose as a modest one, operating as a curative provision ensuring the validity of an administratively issued assessment despite any errors, defects or omissions: Regina Shoppers Mall Ltd. v. Canada, [1991] F.C.J. No. 52, [1991] 1 C.T.C. 297 (C.A.), at p. 301 C.T.C.; Leung v. Canada, [1993] F.C.J. No. 942, [1993] 2 C.T.C. 284 (T.D.), at p. 302 C.T.C.

2 Although ITA, s. 225.1 provides for certain exceptions to these bars to collection, none apply to the facts of the present case.

3 If reasonable grounds exist to believe that the collection of an assessed amount would be jeopardized by a delay in collection, ITA, s. 225.2 authorizes the minister to apply ex parte to the court for an order allowing him to take enforcement steps.

EN APPEL DE LA COUR D'APPEL DE LA NOUVELLE-ÉCOSSE

Droit de l'emploi — Congédiement déguisé — Obligation de donner un préavis raisonnable — Dommages-intérêts — Employé au service de l'employeur pendant environ 14 ans — Régime d'intéressement à long terme créé par l'employeur prévoyant le versement d'une prime à l'employé en cas de vente de l'entreprise — Entreprise vendue peu de temps après le congédiement déguisé de l'employé — Est-ce que les dommages-intérêts accordés à l'égard du manquement à l'obligation de donner un préavis raisonnable doivent inclure la prime d'intéressement?

À partir de 1997, M, un chimiste expérimenté, a occupé plusieurs postes de direction chez Ocean Nutrition Canada Limited (« Ocean »). En tant que cadre supérieur, M participait au régime d'intéressement à long terme (« RILT ») d'Ocean, un arrangement contractuel visant à récompenser les employés pour leurs contributions antérieures au an incentive to continue contributing to the company's success. Under the LTIP, a "Realization Event", such as the sale of the company, would trigger payments to employees who qualified under the plan. In 2007, Ocean hired a new Chief Operating Officer, who began a campaign to marginalize M in the company, limiting M's responsibilities and lying to M about his status and prospects with Ocean. Despite his problems with senior management, the LTIP was a key reason for which M wanted to stay with Ocean, anticipating Ocean would soon be sold. However, M eventually left Ocean in June 2011, taking a position with a new employer.

About 13 months after M's departure, Ocean was sold for $540 million. The sale constituted a Realization Event for the purposes of the LTIP. Since M was not actively employed on that date, Ocean took the position that M did not satisfy the terms of the plan, and he did not receive a payment. M filed an application against Ocean alleging that he was constructively dismissed, and that the constructive dismissal was carried out in bad faith and in breach of Ocean's duty of good faith. The trial judge concluded that Ocean constructively dismissed M, and that M was owed a reasonable notice period of 15 months. The trial judge also held that M would have been a full-time employee when the Realization Event occurred had he not been constructively dismissed, and that, because the terms of the LTIP did not unambiguously limit or remove his common law right to damages, M was entitled to damages equivalent to what he would have received under the LTIP. The Court of Appeal unanimously upheld the decision that M had been constructively dismissed and that the appropriate reasonable notice period was 15 months. However, a majority of the court found that M was not entitled to damages on account of the lost LTIP payment.

Held: The appeal should be allowed, the judgment of the Court of Appeal set aside and the trial judgment restored.

At common law, an employer has the right to prompt an employee to choose to leave their job in circumstances that amount to a dismissal subject to the duty to provide succès de l'entreprise et à les inciter à continuer de le faire. Conformément au RILT, un « événement déclencheur », par exemple la vente de l'entreprise, entraînerait le versement des paiements prévus aux employés admissibles aux termes du régime. En 2007, Ocean a embauché un nouveau directeur de l'exploitation, qui a entamé une campagne de marginalisation de M au sein de l'entreprise, en limitant ses responsabilités et en lui mentant au sujet de son statut et de son avenir au sein d'Ocean. Malgré les problèmes que connaissait M avec la haute direction, le RILT était une raison déterminante pour laquelle il voulait continuer de travailler pour Ocean, car il s'attendait à ce que l'entreprise soit bientôt vendue. Cependant, M a finalement quitté Ocean en juin 2011, acceptant un poste chez un nouvel employeur.

Environ 13 mois après le départ de M, Ocean a été vendue pour la somme de 540 millions de dollars. Cette vente constituait, pour les besoins du RILT, l'événement déclencheur. Comme M ne travaillait plus activement pour l'entreprise au moment de la vente, Ocean a soutenu que M ne satisfaisait pas aux conditions du régime, et il n'a pas reçu de prime. M a présenté contre Ocean une requête dans laquelle il alléguait qu'il avait été congédié de façon déguisée, et que ce congédiement avait été effectué de mauvaise foi et en contravention à l'obligation d'Ocean d'agir de bonne foi. Le juge de première instance a conclu qu'Ocean avait congédié M de manière déguisée et que ce dernier avait droit à un préavis raisonnable de 15 mois. Le juge de première instance a également conclu que M aurait été un employé à temps plein de l'entreprise lorsque l'événement déclencheur s'est produit s'il n'avait pas fait l'objet d'un congédiement déguisé, et que, comme les modalités du RILT n'avaient pas pour effet de limiter ou de supprimer clairement son droit à des dommages-intérêts en vertu de la common law, M avait droit à des dommages-intérêts d'un montant équivalant au paiement qu'il aurait reçu en vertu du RILT. La Cour d'appel a confirmé à l'unanimité la décision portant que M avait fait l'objet d'un congédiement déguisé et que le préavis raisonnable approprié était de 15 mois. Toutefois, les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel ont conclu que M n'avait pas droit à des dommages-intérêts pour la perte du paiement prévu par le RILT.

Arrêt : Le pourvoi est accueilli, l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel est écarté et le jugement de première instance est rétabli.

Suivant la common law, un employeur a le droit de pousser un employé à quitter son emploi dans des circonstances qui équivalent à un congédiement, pourvu reasonable notice. The obligation to provide reasonable notice does not, in theory, turn on the presence or absence of good faith. The contractual breach that arises from the employer's choice is simply the failure to provide reasonable notice, which leads to an award of damages in lieu thereof. A breach of the duty to exercise good faith in the manner of dismissal is a distinct contractual breach and is independent of any failure to provide reasonable notice. It can serve as a basis to answer for foreseeable injury that results from callous or insensitive conduct in the manner of dismissal. Damages arising out of the same dismissal are calculated differently depending on the breach invoked. The nature of the contractual breach of good faith is of a different order than that associated with the failure to provide reasonable notice.

Courts should ask two questions when determining whether the appropriate quantum of damages for breach of an implied term to provide reasonable notice includes bonus payments. First, courts should consider the employee's common law rights and examine whether, but for the termination, the employee would have been entitled to the bonus or benefit as part of their compensation during the reasonable notice period. Second, if so, courts should determine whether the terms of the employment contract or bonus plan unambiguously take away or limit that common law right. This approach accords with basic principles of damages for constructive dismissal, anchoring the analysis around reasonable notice. When an employee sues for damages for constructive dismissal, they are claiming for damages as compensation for the income, benefits, and bonuses they would have received had the employer not breached the implied term to provide reasonable notice. This approach respects the well-established understanding that the contract effectively remains alive for the purposes of assessing the employee's damages, in order to determine what compensation the employee would have been entitled to but for the dismissal. Damages for wrongful dismissal are designed to compensate the employee for the breach by the employer of the implied term in the employment contract to provide reasonable notice of termination. There is no such implied term of the contract to provide payment in lieu. The payment in lieu is not damages for a breach of the contract, but rather one component of the compensation provided for in the contract. If an employer que cet employeur s'acquitte de son obligation de donner un préavis raisonnable. L'obligation de donner un préavis raisonnable ne dépend pas, en théorie, de la question de savoir s'il y a eu ou non bonne foi. Le manquement au contrat découlant de la décision de l'employeur est simplement le défaut de donner un préavis raisonnable, situation qui entraîne le paiement de dommages-intérêts tenant lieu de préavis. Un manquement à l'obligation d'agir de bonne foi dans la façon de congédier l'employé constitue une violation contractuelle distincte et est indépendant de tout manquement à l'obligation de donner un préavis raisonnable. Il peut servir de fondement permettant d'exiger réparation à l'égard d'un préjudice prévisible résultant d'un traitement brutal ou implacable de la part de l'employeur dans la façon dont il a congédié l'employé. Les dommages-intérêts découlant d'un même congédiement sont calculés différemment selon la violation reprochée. La nature du manquement à l'obligation contractuelle d'agir de bonne foi n'est pas du même ordre que dans le cas du défaut de donner un préavis raisonnable.

Les tribunaux devraient se poser deux questions lorsqu'ils sont appelés à décider si le montant des dommages-intérêts qu'il convient d'accorder pour manquement à l'obligation tacite de donner un préavis raisonnable doit inclure les primes. Premièrement, les tribunaux devraient considérer les droits dont dispose l'employé en vertu de la common law et se demander si, n'eût été son congédiement, l'employé aurait eu droit à la prime ou à l'avantage dans le cadre de ses conditions de rémunération pendant la période de préavis raisonnable. Deuxièmement, dans l'affirmative, les tribunaux devraient déterminer si les modalités du contrat de travail ou du régime de primes ont pour effet de supprimer ou de limiter clairement ce droit que confère la common law. Cette démarche est conforme aux principes fondamentaux applicables aux dommages-intérêts pour congédiement déguisé, l'analyse s'attachant à la question du préavis raisonnable. Lorsqu'un employé intente une action en dommages-intérêts pour congédiement déguisé, il sollicite des dommages-intérêts à titre de dédommagement pour le revenu, les prestations et les primes qu'il aurait touchés si l'employeur n'avait pas manqué à son obligation tacite de donner un préavis raisonnable. Cette démarche est compatible avec l'interprétation bien établie selon laquelle le contrat demeure effectivement en vigueur pour les besoins de l'évaluation du préjudice de l'employé en vue de calculer le montant de l'indemnité à laquelle ce dernier aurait eu droit n'eût été son congédiement. Les dommages-intérêts versés pour congédiement injustifié visent à indemniser l'employé à fails to give proper notice or pay in lieu, the breach is in the failure to pay, not in the termination.

In the present case, in determining whether M's damages include an amount to compensate him for his lost LTIP payment, the focus should be on what damages were appropriately due for Ocean's failure to provide M with reasonable notice and not on whether the terms of the LTIP were plain and unambiguous. The issue is not whether M is entitled to the LTIP in itself, but rather what damages he is entitled to and, specifically, whether he was entitled to compensation for bonuses he would have earned had Ocean not breached the employment contract. It is uncontested that the Realization Event occurred during the notice period and therefore, but for M's dismissal, he would have received an LTIP payment during that period. In such circumstances, there is no need to ask whether the LTIP payment was integral to his compensation. On the first question, M is prima facie entitled to receive damages as compensation for the lost bonus. On the second question, the LTIP does not unambiguously limit or remove M's common law right. Had M been given proper notice, he would have been full-time or actively employed throughout the reasonable notice period. For the purpose of calculating wrongful dismissal damages, the employment contract is not treated as terminated until after the reasonable notice period expires. M should therefore be awarded the amount of the LTIP as part of his common law damages for breach of the implied term to provide reasonable notice. On the issue of good faith, it suffices to say that a contractual breach of good faith rests on a wholly distinct basis from that relating to the failure to provide reasonable notice.

l'égard de la violation par l'employeur de la condition implicite du contrat d'emploi selon laquelle ce dernier doit donner à l'employé un préavis raisonnable de cessation d'emploi. Le contrat ne comporte aucune condition implicite portant que l'employeur doit verser une indemnité tenant lieu de préavis. L'indemnité tenant lieu de préavis raisonnable ne constitue pas des dommages-intérêts pour violation du contrat, mais plutôt une portion de l'indemnité prévue au contrat. Si un employeur ne donne pas un préavis adéquat ou une indemnité en tenant lieu, la violation réside dans le non-paiement d'une indemnité et non dans le congédiement.

En l'espèce, afin de déterminer si les dommages-intérêts accordés à M doivent inclure une somme l'indemnisant pour la perte du paiement prévu par le RILT, il faut mettre l'accent sur le montant des dommages-intérêts qu'il convenait d'accorder à M parce qu'Ocean ne lui a pas donné un préavis raisonnable, et non sur la question de savoir si les modalités du RILT étaient claires et non ambiguës. Il ne s'agit pas de décider si M est admissible au RILT, mais plutôt de déterminer le montant des dommages-intérêts auquel il a droit et, plus précisément, s'il a droit d'être indemnisé pour les primes qu'il aurait touchées si Ocean n'avait pas contrevenu au contrat de travail. Il n'est pas contesté que l'événement déclencheur s'est produit pendant la période de préavis et que, par conséquent, n'eût été son congédiement, M aurait reçu le paiement prévu par le RILT durant cette période. Dans ces circonstances, il est inutile de se demander si ce paiement faisait partie intégrante de sa rémunération. En ce qui concerne la première question, M a droit, à première vue, de recevoir des dommages-intérêts à titre de dédommagement pour la prime qu'il a perdue. En ce qui a trait à la deuxième question, le RILT n'a pas pour effet de limiter ou de supprimer clairement le droit que confère la common law à M. Si un préavis adéquat avait été donné à M, ce dernier aurait été un employé à temps plein ou un employé actif de l'entreprise pendant la période de préavis raisonnable. Pour les besoins du calcul du montant des dommages-intérêts à verser en cas de congédiement injustifié, le contrat de travail est considéré comme étant résilié uniquement après l'expiration de la période de préavis raisonnable. Par conséquent, le montant de la prime prévue par le RILT doit être inclus dans les dommages-intérêts accordés à M, en vertu de la common law, pour le manquement à l'obligation tacite de lui donner un préavis raisonnable. Relativement à la question de bonne foi, qu'il suffise de dire qu'un manquement à l'obligation contractuelle d'agir de bonne foi repose sur des fondements entièrement distincts de ceux liés à l'omission de donner un préavis raisonnable.

Kasirer J. —

I. Overview

[1] This appeal bears on the redress available to an employee who, by reason of the circumstances of his departure from a job he had held for many years, is treated in law as if he were dismissed. By extension, it concerns some of the proper contours of an employer's common law right to determine the composition of its workforce.

[2] Different complaints are often made by employees who sue for wrongful dismissal. This case is no exception: in his original application, the employee alleged he was dismissed "without notice" and that this dismissal was in breach of the employer's "duty of good faith". He asked for damages reflecting his entitlement to reasonable notice, including an incentive bonus that fell due during the period, as well as damages for the employer's dishonest conduct, including punitive damages and damages in the amount of the lost bonus should it be excluded by a contractual term.

[3] The fact that the employee was constructively dismissed and is entitled to notice is no longer in dispute. The parties continue to disagree, however, as to the remedies that should be afforded to the employee at common law. Specifically, the parties dispute whether the failure to provide damages

Version française du jugement de la Cour rendu par

Le juge Kasirer —

I. Aperçu

[1] Le présent pourvoi porte sur les voies de recours qui s'offrent à un employé qui, en raison des circonstances de son départ d'un emploi qu'il a occupé pendant de nombreuses années, est considéré par le droit comme ayant été congédié. Par extension, le pourvoi porte également sur les paramètres applicables au droit des employeurs de déterminer la composition de leurs effectifs en common law.

[2] Divers griefs sont souvent soulevés lorsqu'un employé intente une action pour congédiement injustifié. La présente affaire ne fait pas exception : dans sa demande initiale, l'employé alléguait qu'il avait été congédié [traduction] « sans préavis » et que ce congédiement constituait un manquement à l'« obligation d'agir de bonne foi » qui incombait à son employeur. Il sollicitait des dommages-intérêts reflétant son droit à un délai de préavis raisonnable, y compris une prime d'intéressement devenue exigible pendant ce délai. Il demandait aussi des dommages-intérêts en raison de la conduite malhonnête de son employeur, y compris des dommages-intérêts punitifs et des dommages-intérêts correspondant à la prime qu'il perdrait si celle-ci était exclue par application d'une disposition contractuelle.

[3] Le fait que l'employé concerné a fait l'objet d'un congédiement déguisé et a droit à un préavis n'est plus en litige. Les parties continuent toutefois d'être en désaccord en ce qui concerne les réparations qui devraient lui être accordées en vertu de la common law. Plus précisément, les parties ne s'entendent for reasonable notice includes the disputed bonus. Moreover, they are at odds as to the existence of the employer's alleged dishonest conduct and its eventual impact. The employee points this Court to the duty to act honestly in the performance of the contract, which, as this Court has recalled, "was a key component of the good faith requirements which have been recognized in relation to termination of employment contracts" (Bhasin v. Hrynew, 2014 SCC 71, [2014] 3 S.C.R. 494, at para. 73, referencing Wallace v. United Grain Growers Ltd., [1997] 3 S.C.R. 701, at para. 98; Honda Canada Inc. v. Keays, 2008 SCC 39, [2008] 2 S.C.R. 362, at para. 58).

[4] The parties' disagreement provides an occasion to clarify the duty to provide reasonable notice and to state clearly that a violation of a duty of good faith is a distinct contractual breach, with each alleged breach reflecting different considerations in respect of an employer's common law right of dismissal without cause in employment contracts having an indeterminate term. In making their respective cases, the employee and employer in this case call for significant changes to the law — respectively for an extension of good faith and a narrowing of the duty to provide reasonable notice — changes that, if existing principles are properly understood, are ultimately unnecessary to the disposition of the appeal.

[5] While I see the law as largely settled for the purpose of answering the employee's claim, the manner in which these complaints have been conflated in this case invites the Court to state plainly the different character of these paths of redress for breach of contract in employment. As in this instance, the complaints are sometimes intertwined at the expense of a proper understanding of the law of wrongful dismissal. In fairness to the parties here, this confusion is not altogether uncommon, since courts — even pas sur la question de savoir si les dommages-intérêts tenant lieu de préavis raisonnable devraient inclure la prime litigieuse. Elles sont également en désaccord quant à l'existence de la conduite malhonnête reprochée à l'employeur et aux répercussions éventuelles de celle-ci. L'employé attire l'attention de notre Cour sur l'obligation qu'ont les parties à un contrat d'agir avec honnêteté dans l'exécution de celui-ci, obligation qui, comme notre Cour l'a rappelé, « constitu[e] un élément clef des exigences de bonne foi qui ont été reconnues en lien avec la résiliation des contrats de travail » (Bhasin c. Hrynew, 2014 CSC 71, [2014] 3 R.C.S. 494, par. 73, se référant à Wallace c. United Grain Growers Ltd., [1997] 3 R.C.S. 701, par. 98; Honda Canada Inc. c. Keays, 2008 CSC 39, [2008] 2 R.C.S. 362, par. 58).

[4] Ce désaccord donne à la Cour l'occasion d'apporter des précisions sur l'obligation de donner un préavis raisonnable et d'énoncer clairement que la violation d'une obligation d'agir de bonne foi constitue une violation contractuelle distincte, l'un et l'autre de ces manquements soulevant des considérations différentes en ce qui a trait au droit dont dispose un employeur, en vertu de la common law, de congédier sans motif un employé dans le cadre d'un contrat de travail à durée indéterminée. Lors de la présentation de leurs arguments, l'employé et l'employeur en l'espèce ont réclamé des changements importants au droit en la matière — respectivement l'élargissement de l'application de l'obligation d'agir de bonne foi et la restriction de la portée de l'obligation de donner un préavis raisonnable — changements qui, si les principes existants sont interprétés correctement, sont en définitive inutiles pour trancher le pourvoi.

[5] Bien que je considère que le droit applicable pour statuer sur les prétentions de l'employé est dans une large mesure déjà bien établi, la manière dont les griefs soulevés ont été enchevêtrés en l'espèce incite notre Cour à exposer clairement le caractère distinct de ces voies de recours en cas de violations de contrats de travail. Comme c'est le cas dans le présent pourvoi, les griefs sont parfois intimement liés, de telle sorte que les règles de droit applicables au congédiement injustifié ne sont pas interprétées this Court — have at times conflated them when determining remedies for wrongful dismissal.

[6] For the reasons that follow, as a simple matter of the breach of the duty to provide reasonable notice, I respectfully disagree with the majority of the Court of Appeal's conclusion that the employee's damages do not include the incentive bonus. Given this conclusion, on the employee's own theory of the case, we need not provide a full answer to his allegations of dishonesty; this appeal can be resolved on settled employment law principles, despite the clear dishonest behaviour exhibited by the employer over a protracted period. But beyond clarification as to how courts should analyze claims for financial redress upon dismissal, the employee's complaint that he was mistreated nevertheless deserves some modest comments. In his notice of application, the employee sought a declaration that his termination was wrongful in that his employer's associated conduct was "oppressive", "unfair", and "carried out in bad faith" (A.R., at pp. 144-45). While he has made no detailed pleading on appeal for his original claim for punitive damages and, surprisingly perhaps, made no specific claim for damages for mental distress when he instituted proceedings that can flow when an employer fails to exercise good faith in the manner of dismissal, he remains insistent that the employer breached its obligations of good faith when he was lied to in the run up to the constructive dismissal.

correctement. En toute justice pour les parties au présent pourvoi, une telle confusion n'est pas rare, puisque des tribunaux — même notre Cour — les ont parfois amalgamés dans la détermination des réparations qu'il convenait d'accorder en cas de congédiement injustifié.

[6] Pour les motifs qui suivent, en ce qui concerne la simple question du manquement à l'obligation de donner un préavis raisonnable, je ne puis, avec égards, souscrire à la conclusion des juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel selon laquelle les dommages-intérêts accordés à l'employé ne doivent pas inclure la prime d'intéressement. Compte tenu de cette conclusion, au vu de la position de l'employé quant aux événements en cause, il ne nous est pas nécessaire de répondre exhaustivement aux prétentions relatives à la malhonnêteté qu'il a formulées. Le présent pourvoi peut être tranché suivant les principes bien établis du droit de l'emploi, malgré la conduite malhonnête évidente manifestée par l'employeur sur une période prolongée. Toutefois, outre les précisions qui s'imposent quant à la manière dont les tribunaux doivent analyser les demandes de réparations pécuniaires formulées à la suite d'un congédiement, le grief de l'employé reprochant à l'employeur de l'avoir traité incorrectement mérite quelques brefs commentaires. Dans son avis de requête, l'employé sollicitait une déclaration portant que son congédiement était injustifié parce que son employeur avait eu à son endroit une conduite [TRADUCTION] « abusive », « injuste » et « entachée de mauvaise foi » (d.a., p. 144-145). Bien qu'il n'ait présenté aucun argument détaillé en appel à l'égard de sa demande initiale de dommages-intérêts punitifs et, fait surprenant peut-être, qu'il n'ait pas, lorsqu'il a intenté son action, sollicité précisément des dommages-intérêts au titre des souffrances morales susceptibles de découler du défaut d'un employeur d'agir de bonne foi lorsqu'il congédie un employé, il continuer d'affirmer avec insistance que son employeur a manqué à son obligation d'agir de bonne foi lorsqu'il lui a menti durant la période précédant son congédiement déguisé.

[7] Some of this doggedness on appeal is explained by the fact that the employee asked not just for money but also sued his employer for non-financial reasons. The trial judge explicitly noted that the employee's sense of self-worth was particularly tied up in his job. This Court has been resolute in asserting that employment is a source of personal fulfilment — that brand of human dignity that comes from work — and this often comes into sharpest focus when a job is unfairly taken away (see, e.g., Machtinger v. HOJ Industries Ltd., [1992] 1 S.C.R. 986, at p. 991). Recently in Potter v. New Brunswick Legal Aid Services Commission, 2015 SCC 10, [2015] 1 S.C.R. 500, at para. 84, my colleague Wagner J., prior to his appointment as Chief Justice, identified these considerations as rooted in the "non-monetary benefit all workers may in fact derive from the performance of their work".

[8] Some comment on this aspect of the employee's claim is in my view appropriate. Recognition that an employer has acted dishonestly, independent of any failure to provide notice or other financial loss, can vindicate an employee whose sense of dignity is unfairly shaken when a valued job is lost.

II. Background

[9] David Matthews, an experienced chemist, is one of a handful of individuals in the world with the skills needed to run a large-scale omega-3 facility. Beginning in 1997, Mr. Matthews occupied several senior management positions with Ocean Nutrition Canada Limited ("Ocean"). His expertise proved extremely valuable to the success of Ocean in the manufacture of omega-3 products. Sometime company President and Chief Executive Officer, Robert Orr, testified that "[e]veryone who has gotten any value created out of Ocean in large part owes that in

[7] La persistance avec laquelle l'employé est revenu sur ce point en appel s'explique en partie par le fait qu'il ne poursuit pas son employeur uniquement pour être indemnisé financièrement, mais également pour des raisons non financières. Le juge de première instance a expressément fait remarquer que l'estime de soi de l'employé était particulièrement liée à son travail. Notre Cour a déclaré sans ambages que l'emploi constitue pour les gens une source d'épanouissement personnel — à savoir cette forme de dignité humaine qui découle du travail — et que ce phénomène se manifeste souvent avec encore plus d'acuité lorsqu'une personne perd injustement son emploi (voir, p. ex., Machtinger c. HOJ Industries Ltd., [1992] 1 R.C.S. 986, p. 991). Récemment, dans l'arrêt Potter c. Commission des services d'aide juridique du Nouveau-Brunswick, 2015 CSC 10, [2015] 1 R.C.S. 500, par. 84, mon collègue le juge Wagner, avant d'être nommé juge en chef, a indiqué que ces considérations sont enracinées dans « l'avantage non pécuniaire que tout salarié tire de l'exécution de son travail ».

[8] À mon sens, il convient de formuler quelques commentaires à l'égard de cet aspect de l'argumentation de l'employé. Reconnaître qu'un employeur a agi de façon malhonnête, indépendamment de l'existence de toute omission d'accorder un préavis raisonnable ou autre perte financière, peut permettre de restituer à un employé son sens de la dignité, qui a été injustement ébranlé lorsque celui-ci a perdu un emploi qui lui était cher.

II. Contexte

[9] David Matthews, un chimiste expérimenté, est l'une des rares personnes dans le monde qui possèdent les compétences nécessaires pour gérer une installation de fabrication de produits oméga-3 de grande envergure. À partir de 1997, M. Matthews a occupé plusieurs postes de direction chez Ocean Nutrition Canada Limited (« Ocean »). Son expertise s'est avérée extrêmement précieuse à Ocean, lui permettant de connaître du succès dans le domaine de la fabrication de produits oméga-3. L'ancien président-directeur général de l'entreprise, M. Robert some measure to [Mr. Matthews]" (see 2017 NSSC 16, at para. 66 (CanLII)).

[10] Mr. Matthews was deeply invested in his job. The trial judge wrote: "I find that Matthews is an individual whose sense of identity and self-worth is highly connected to his work. He is a person who values honesty and integrity, and is willing to work hard in exchange for fair treatment and respect" (para. 292).

[11] Mr. Matthews' fortunes took a turn for the worse in 2007, when Ocean hired a new Chief Operating Officer, Daniel Emond. Frictions quickly developed between the two men. For whatever reason, the senior manager did not like Mr. Matthews, and did not consider him to be a valuable asset to Ocean. Mr. Emond was responsible for assigning responsibilities to Mr. Matthews, and he soon began what the trial judge characterized as a "campaign" to marginalize Mr. Matthews in the company (para. 296). This course of conduct went beyond decisions limiting Mr. Matthews' responsibilities, and included instances in which Mr. Emond "lied" to Mr. Matthews and Mr. Orr about his status and prospects with Ocean, "went behind [Mr. Matthews'] back", and "ignored Matthews' request to speak with him" relating to his role within the company (paras. 296-99). Indeed, the extensive findings of facts that the trial judge set out included repeated incidents of dishonesty attributed to senior management toward Mr. Matthews (paras. 291-326). While I will not repeat every detail, the following examples illustrate how Mr. Matthews was treated in the final years of his employment.

[12] The "first step in a campaign to push Matthews out of operations and minimize his influence" began in 2007, when Mr. Emond drastically reduced the number of people reporting to Mr. Matthews

Orr, a déclaré que [TRADUCTION] « [t]ous ceux qui ont tiré des bénéfices de l'existence d'Ocean le doivent pour la plupart dans une certaine mesure à [M. Matthews] » (voir 2017 NSSC 16, par. 66 (CanLII)).

[10] Monsieur Matthews était très investi dans son travail. En effet, le juge de première instance a écrit : [TRADUCTION] « Je suis d'avis que le sens de l'identité et l'estime de soi de M. Matthews sont étroitement liés à son travail. Il accorde une grande importance à l'honnêteté et à l'intégrité, et il est prêt à travailler fort pourvu qu'on le traite de façon équitable et avec respect » (par. 292).

[11] La situation de M. Matthews s'est détériorée en 2007 lorsque Ocean a embauché un nouveau directeur de l'exploitation, M. Daniel Emond. Il y a rapidement eu des frictions entre les deux hommes. Pour une raison quelconque, le directeur de l'exploitation n'aimait pas M. Matthews et ne le considérait pas comme un atout pour Ocean. Monsieur Emond, qui était chargé d'assigner à M. Matthews ses responsabilités, a rapidement entamé ce que le juge de première instance a qualifié de [TRADUCTION] « campagne » de marginalisation de M. Matthews au sein de l'entreprise (par. 296). Dans le cadre de cette campagne, M. Emond a non seulement pris des décisions limitant les responsabilités de M. Matthews, mais il a en outre [TRADUCTION] « menti » à quelques reprises à ce dernier et à M. Orr au sujet du statut et de l'avenir de M. Matthews au sein de l'entreprise, il « a agi dans [le] dos [de M. Matthews] » et il « a fait la sourde oreille à la demande de M. Matthews qui souhaitait discuter avec lui » de son rôle dans l'entreprise (par. 296-299). D'ailleurs, les abondantes conclusions de fait tirées par le juge de première instance font état d'actes répétés de malhonnêteté attribués à la haute direction envers M. Matthews (par. 291-326). Je n'entends pas relater de nouveau tous ces actes par le menu, mais les exemples suivants illustrent comment M. Matthews a été traité au cours des dernières années de son emploi.

[12] La [TRADUCTION] « première étape d'une campagne visant à écarter M. Matthews des opérations et à réduire au minimum son influence » a débuté en 2007 lorsque M. Emond a réduit de façon (para. 296). Over the next four years, the trial judge observed that Mr. Matthews' responsibilities were reduced further, he became progressively more ostracized within the company, and Mr. Emond's conduct was characterized by dishonesty (e.g., see paras. 297-300). The trial judge explicitly found that Mr. Emond had "no qualms about leaving Matthews in a state of anxiety about his future", and that Mr. Matthews was left in a "prolonged state of anxiety and uncertainty" (paras. 317 and 341).

[13] At various times when confronted about decisions to transfer oversight away from Mr. Matthews or to change his reporting responsibilities, Mr. Emond would indeed lie to Mr. Matthews about his efforts to minimize the latter's role (see, e.g., paras. 296, 298 and 301). At one point, Mr. Emond wrote a letter to Mr. Matthews that purported to establish a reconciliation, acknowledging that their relationship had been "based on mistrust" and in which he undertook to be "more open and honest" with Mr. Matthews so he might be "respected by me" and by others in the company (see para. 114). The trial judge found that Mr. Emond's "use of the word 'honest' in the letter was intended to mean exactly that, with the implication being that he had been dishonest with Matthews in the past" (para. 301). These dishonest statements were relied upon by at least one other executive, who in turn developed "significant animosity" toward Mr. Matthews (paras. 286-87). Senior management also sought to exclude Mr. Matthews from various initiatives in which Mr. Matthews would normally participate, even if it was to the detriment of Ocean.

[14] In 2010, when Mr. Orr stepped away from running Ocean and became Chair of the Board of Directors, Mr. Matthews' situation worsened. Martin Jamieson assumed the role of President and Chief Executive Officer and, soon after his arrival, Mr. Matthews was placed under review. The trial substantielle le nombre de personnes relevant de ce dernier (par. 296). Le juge de première instance a fait remarquer que, au cours des quatre années qui ont suivi, les responsabilités de M. Matthews ont été réduites encore plus, ce dernier devenant progressivement de plus en plus ostracisé au sein de l'entreprise, et M. Emond a adopté une conduite qui était entachée de malhonnêteté (voir, p. ex., par. 297-300). Le juge de première instance a explicitement conclu que M. Emond ne montrait [TRADUCTION] « aucun scrupule à laisser M. Matthews angoisser sur son avenir », et que M. Matthews a été plongé dans un « état prolongé d'angoisse et d'incertitude » (par. 317 et 341).

[13] À diverses occasions, lorsque M. Matthews l'a confronté au sujet des décisions qu'il prenait pour confier à d'autres certaines de ses tâches de supervision ou pour modifier ses responsabilités redditionnelles, M. Emond lui a effectivement menti à propos des efforts qu'il déployait pour réduire au minimum le rôle de celui-ci (voir, p. ex., par. 296, 298 et 301). À un certain moment, M. Emond a écrit à M. Matthews une lettre se voulant un effort de réconciliation, dans laquelle il reconnaissait que leur relation [TRADUCTION] « reposait sur la méfiance » et il s'engageait à être « plus ouvert et honnête » avec M. Matthews afin que ce dernier soit « respecté par [M. Emond] » et par d'autres dans l'entreprise (voir par. 114). Le juge de première instance a conclu qu'en [TRADUCTION] « utilisant le mot "honnête" M. Emond disait exactement ce qu'il voulait dire, ce qui impliquait qu'il avait été malhonnête avec M. Matthews par le passé » (par. 301). Au moins un autre cadre a cru à ces déclarations malhonnêtes et a par la suite développé une [TRADUCTION] « animosité considérable » envers M. Matthews (par. 286-287). La haute direction a également cherché à exclure celui-ci de divers projets auxquels il aurait généralement participé, et ce, même si son exclusion nuisait à Ocean.

[14] En 2010, lorsque M. Orr a quitté ses fonctions de président-directeur général d'Ocean et a assumé la présidence du conseil d'administration, la situation de M. Matthews s'est aggravée. Monsieur Martin Jamieson est alors devenu président-directeur général et, peu de temps après son entrée en fonction, la judge found it had become clear that "Matthews' departure from [Ocean] was a possible consequence of the review" (para. 283). Around this time, Mr. Emond advised the Board of Directors there would soon be no place in the company for Mr. Matthews. When Mr. Orr informed him of these developments, Mr. Matthews' frustrations grew, as he was already suspicious that Ocean was conducting due diligence for a possible sale, a process in which he would normally have had a role but from which he found himself excluded.

[15] A potential sale of Ocean was significant, as it meant Mr. Matthews would be able to realize on Ocean's long term incentive plan ("LTIP"). The LTIP, a contractual arrangement providing for payment upon the sale of the company, proposed by Ocean and to which Mr. Matthews agreed in 2007, was designed for certain senior executives in service of two goals: to reward the participating employees for their previous contributions and provide an incentive to continue contributing to the company's success. Ocean's retention goal proved successful, as Mr. Matthews ended up staying longer than he would have otherwise. As the trial judge found, the LTIP was a "key reason" Mr. Matthews stayed with the company, particularly when his problems with senior management developed (para. 388).

[16] Mr. Matthews advised Mr. Emond that he wanted to stay in his role as he anticipated the company would soon be sold. Mr. Emond falsely told him he did not know what Ocean's plans were for him. He then sent an email to Mr. Jamieson, with the subject line "here we go again". It read in part:

Moreover [Matthews] also ask me if he is part of the restructuring???????? He said that he would like to stay as place de M. Matthews dans l'entreprise a été examinée. Le juge de première instance a conclu qu'il était devenu évident que [TRADUCTION] « le départ de M. Matthews d'[Ocean] était une conséquence possible de cet examen » (par. 283). À cette époque, M. Emond a dit au conseil d'administration qu'il n'y aurait bientôt plus de place pour M. Matthews au sein de l'entreprise. Lorsque M. Orr a informé M. Matthews de ces propos, la frustration de ce dernier s'est accentuée, car il soupçonnait déjà Ocean d'avoir entamé un processus de diligence raisonnable en vue d'une possible vente, un processus dans lequel il aurait normalement dû jouer un rôle mais duquel il s'est retrouvé exclu.

[15] La possible vente d'Ocean était un événement important, car M. Matthews aurait alors pu obtenir la prime à laquelle il avait droit au titre du régime d'intéressement à long terme (« RILT ») d'Ocean. Le RILT — un arrangement contractuel prévoyant une forme de paiement en cas de vente de l'entreprise, qui avait été proposé par Ocean et signé par M. Matthews en 2007 — avait été conçu à l'intention de certains cadres supérieurs et visait deux objectifs : récompenser les employés parties au régime pour leurs contributions antérieures au succès de l'entreprise et les inciter à continuer de le faire. Ocean a réussi à atteindre son objectif de maintenir en poste son employé, puisque M. Matthews est demeuré au service de l'entreprise plus longtemps qu'il ne l'aurait fait autrement. Comme l'a conclu le juge de première instance, le RILT était une [TRADUCTION] « raison déterminante » dans la décision de M. Matthews de continuer de travailler pour l'entreprise, particulièrement lorsque ses problèmes avec la haute direction ont commencé (par. 388).

[16] Monsieur Matthews a informé M. Emond qu'il souhaitait conserver son rôle, car il s'attendait à ce que l'entreprise soit bientôt vendue. Monsieur Emond a faussement affirmé qu'il ne savait pas quelles étaient les intentions d'Ocean à son égard. Il a ensuite envoyé à M. Jamieson un courriel dont l'objet indiquait [TRADUCTION] « C'est reparti », et dans lequel il disait notamment ce qui suit :

De plus, [M. Matthews] m'a aussi demandé s'il fait partie de la restructuration???????? Il a dit qu'il aimerait rester he believe the company will be sold to have is incentive on the sale?????? Anyway I manage to get myself out of it not sure he believe me but he got an answer. [Transcribed as in original.]

(See trial reasons, at para. 194.)

[17] A few months later, Mr. Matthews asked Mr. Jamieson whether Ocean was planning on terminating him. Mr. Jamieson told him the company had no such plans. Soon after, Mr. Matthews found himself meeting with the company's Vice President of Human Resources, discussing a possible termination package. Mr. Matthews advised the human resources representative that he would forfeit severance in order to protect his entitlement under the LTIP. In the end, however, negotiations over an "exit strategy" never came to fruition, as Mr. Matthews took a position with a new employer on June 22, 2011, officially leaving Ocean on June 24, 2011.

[18] About 13 months after Mr. Matthews' departure, Ocean was sold for $540 million. This constituted a "Realization Event" for the purposes of the LTIP, thus triggering payments to employees who qualified under the plan. But since Mr. Matthews was not actively employed on that date, Ocean took the position that he did not satisfy the terms of the plan. Accordingly, Mr. Matthews did not receive a payment. Notably, the trial judge found that Mr. Emond's mistreatment of Mr. Matthews was not motivated by a desire to deprive him of his LTIP entitlement, nor was there evidence of a company conspiracy to "get rid of Matthews in order to deprive him of his LTIP entitlement" (para. 325).

[19] Mr. Matthews filed an application against Ocean, alleging that his employer constructively dismissed him, behaved in a manner that was parce qu'il croit que l'entreprise sera vendue et qu'il veut toucher sa prime en cas de vente?????? Quoi qu'il en soit j'ai réussi à m'en sortir je ne suis pas certain qu'il m'a cru mais il a eu une réponse. [Transcription de l'original.]

(Voir les motifs du jugement de première instance, par. 194.)

[17] Quelques mois plus tard, M. Matthews a demandé à M. Jamieson si Ocean prévoyait mettre fin à son emploi. Ce dernier lui a alors répondu que l'entreprise n'avait aucun plan de la sorte. Peu de temps après, M. Matthews a rencontré le vice-président des ressources humaines pour discuter d'un possible règlement forfaitaire de cessation d'emploi. Monsieur Matthews a dit au représentant des ressources humaines qu'il renoncerait à son indemnité de départ pour protéger ses droits au titre du RILT. Cependant, au bout du compte, les négociations sur une [TRADUCTION] « stratégie de départ » n'ont jamais abouti, étant donné que M. Matthews a accepté un poste chez un nouvel employeur le 22 juin 2011 et a quitté officiellement Ocean le 24 juin 2011.

[18] Environ 13 mois après le départ de M. Matthews, Ocean a été vendue pour la somme de 540 millions de dollars. Cette vente constituait, pour les besoins du RILT, [TRADUCTION] « [l']événement déclencheur », qui entraînait le versement des primes aux employés admissibles aux termes du régime. Toutefois, comme M. Matthews ne travaillait plus activement pour l'entreprise au moment de la vente, Ocean a soutenu qu'il ne satisfaisait pas aux conditions du régime. Monsieur Matthews n'a par conséquent pas reçu de prime. Fait notable, le juge de première instance a conclu que la conduite incorrecte de M. Emond envers M. Matthews n'était pas motivée par le désir de priver celui-ci du droit de recevoir le paiement prévu par le RILT, et qu'il n'y avait pas non plus de preuve que l'entreprise avait comploté pour [TRADUCTION] « se débarrasser de M. Matthews afin de le priver de ses droits au titre du RILT » (par. 325).

[19] Monsieur Matthews a présenté contre Ocean une requête dans laquelle il alléguait que son employeur l'avait congédié de façon déguisée et avait

"oppressive of, unfairly prejudicial to and in unfair disregard" of his interests, and, separately, that the constructive dismissal "was carried out in bad faith at law and in breach of the corporation's duty of good faith" (A.R., at p. 145). He sought the declaration alluded to earlier as well as loss of pay, bonuses and benefits, together with general damages, and compensation pursuant to an oppression remedy under s. 241(1) of the Canada Business Corporation Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-44. In light of Ocean's conduct that proceeded "in contum[e]lious disregard of [his] contractual entitlements" (A.R., at p. 145), Mr. Matthews also asked for punitive damages and solicitor and client costs.

agi d'une manière [TRADUCTION] « abusive, injustement préjudiciable et injustement indifférente » à l'égard de ses intérêts, puis il affirmait, dans une allégation distincte, que son congédiement déguisé « avait été effectué de mauvaise foi au sens de la loi et en contravention à l'obligation de la société d'agir de bonne foi » (d.a., p. 145). Il sollicitait la déclaration mentionnée plus tôt, des dommages-intérêts pour perte de revenus, de primes et d'avantages, des dommages-intérêts généraux ainsi qu'une indemnité à titre de réparation pour cause d'abus en vertu du par. 241(1) de la Loi canadienne sur les sociétés par actions, L.R.C. 1985, c. C-44. Compte tenu de la conduite d'Ocean, qui a manifesté [TRADUCTION] « une indifférence méprisante à l'égard [de ses] droits d'ordre contractuel » (d.a., p. 145), M. Matthews sollicitait également des dommages-intérêts punitifs et les dépens taxés sur la base procureur-client.

III. Prior Decisions

A. Supreme Court of Nova Scotia (LeBlanc J.)

[20] The trial judge concluded that Ocean constructively dismissed Mr. Matthews, and that Mr. Matthews was owed a reasonable notice period of 15 months. The trial judge relied upon this Court's decision in Potter, where Wagner J. explained that, typically, an employee's decision to leave their employment may be considered a constructive dismissal in two different ways. First, an employee may be prompted to leave because the employer substantially breached an express or implied term of the employment contract. Second, Wagner J. drew upon cases where "the employer's treatment of the employee made continued employment intolerable" (at para. 33), explaining that such cases will amount to constructive dismissal where the employer displayed, through its cumulative actions over time, that it no longer intended to be bound by the contract.

[21] The trial judge was satisfied that the test for constructive dismissal had been satisfied on either

III. Décisions des juridictions inférieures

A. Cour suprême de la Nouvelle-Écosse (le juge LeBlanc)

[20] Le juge de première instance a conclu qu'Ocean avait congédié M. Matthews de manière déguisée et que ce dernier avait droit à un préavis raisonnable de 15 mois. Le juge de première instance s'est appuyé sur l'arrêt Potter de notre Cour, dans lequel le juge Wagner a expliqué que, généralement, la décision d'un employé de quitter son emploi peut être considérée comme un congédiement déguisé dans deux situations différentes. Premièrement, un employé peut être poussé à quitter son emploi parce que son employeur a violé de manière substantielle une condition expresse ou tacite de son contrat de travail. Deuxièmement, s'appuyant sur d'autres affaires où « le comportement de l'employeur vis-à-vis du salarié avait rendu la situation intolérable au travail » (par. 33), le juge Wagner a expliqué que le départ de l'employé équivaudra à un congédiement déguisé lorsque l'employeur a manifesté, par l'effet cumulatif de ses actes antérieurs, son intention de ne plus être lié par le contrat.

[21] Le juge de première instance était convaincu qu'il y avait lieu de conclure au congédiement branch articulated in Potter. With respect to the first branch, he concluded that it was an implied term that Mr. Matthews would be assigned work "which is substantially similar in terms of job duties, pay, responsibility and status" (para. 337, citing P. Barnacle, Employment Law in Canada (4th ed. (loose-leaf)), vol. 2, at §13.42). By unilaterally reducing Mr. Matthews' responsibilities in such a substantial manner, Ocean breached the employment contract.

[22] In terms of the second branch, the trial judge found that Ocean's senior manager "engaged in a course of conduct aimed at pushing Matthews out of operations and minimizing his influence and participation in the company", alluding to his findings of fact regarding Mr. Emond's deceit in respect of Mr. Matthews' future prospects with the company, as a result of which he "became increasingly ostracized" (para. 347). Given the behaviour, a reasonable person in Mr. Matthews' position would have felt that Ocean "had engaged in a course of conduct that evinced an intention [to] no longer . . . be bound by the contract" (para. 353).

[23] Relying on Paquette v. TeraGo Networks Inc., 2016 ONCA 618, 352 O.A.C. 1, and Lin v. Ontario Teachers' Pension Plan Board, 2016 ONCA 619, 352 O.A.C. 10, the trial judge held that Mr. Matthews would have been a full-time employee when the Realization Event occurred had he not been constructively dismissed. Because the terms of the LTIP did not unambiguously limit or remove his common law right to damages, Mr. Matthews was entitled to damages equivalent to what he would have received under the LTIP.

[24] Given his conclusion on the LTIP, the trial judge wrote that it was unnecessary to decide whether Mr. Matthews was entitled to an equivalent amount pursuant to the oppression remedy (para. 418). The trial judge went on to reject Mr. Matthews' claim déguisé suivant l'un ou l'autre des volets énoncés dans l'arrêt Potter. En ce qui concerne le premier volet, il a conclu qu'une condition tacite du contrat était que M. Matthews serait affecté à un poste [TRADUCTION] « dont les fonctions, la rémunération, les responsabilités et le statut seraient substantiellement similaires » (par. 337, citant P. Barnacle, Employment Law in Canada (4e éd. (feuilles mobiles)), vol. 2, §13.42). En réduisant unilatéralement les responsabilités de M. Matthews de manière aussi substantielle, Ocean a violé le contrat de travail.

[22] Pour ce qui est du deuxième volet, le juge de première instance a statué que le cadre supérieur d'Ocean [TRADUCTION] « a agi de façon à écarter M. Matthews des opérations et à réduire au minimum son influence et sa participation au sein de l'entreprise », se référant à ses conclusions de fait concernant la conduite trompeuse de M. Emond quant à l'avenir de M. Matthews dans l'entreprise, ce qui avait eu pour effet que ce dernier était « deven[u] de plus en plus ostracis[é] » (par. 347). Vu ce comportement, une personne raisonnable dans la situation de M. Matthews aurait estimé qu'Ocean [TRADUCTION] « agissait d'une manière démontrant [son] intention de ne plus être liée par le contrat » (par. 353).

[23] S'appuyant sur les arrêts Paquette c. TeraGo Networks Inc., 2016 ONCA 618, 352 O.A.C. 1, et Lin c. Ontario Teachers' Pension Plan Board, 2016 ONCA 619, 352 O.A.C. 10, le juge de première instance a déclaré que M. Matthews aurait été un employé à temps plein de l'entreprise lorsque l'événement déclencheur s'est produit s'il n'avait pas été l'objet d'un congédiement déguisé. Comme les modalités du RILT n'avaient pas pour effet de limiter ou de supprimer clairement son droit à des dommages-intérêts en vertu de la common law, M. Matthews avait droit à des dommages-intérêts d'un montant équivalant au paiement qu'il aurait reçu en vertu du RILT.

[24] Compte tenu de sa conclusion au sujet du RILT, le juge de première instance a écrit qu'il était inutile de décider si M. Matthews avait droit à une somme équivalente à titre de réparation pour cause d'abus (par. 418). Le juge a également for punitive damages, as he was not satisfied that Ocean's actions were directly motivated by a desire to deprive Mr. Matthews of his LTIP entitlement (para. 422).

[25] Based on his findings, the trial judge awarded Mr. Matthews lost earnings, $1,086,893.36 for the loss of the LTIP payment he would have received during the notice period, and other benefits, less an amount of $78,000 for mitigation of damages, representing monies paid to him by his new employer.

[26] The trial judge provided supplementary reasons regarding the quantum of damages during the reasonable notice period (2017 NSSC 123). A decision on costs was postponed pending a hearing on the matter. That was suspended while the case went to appeal.

B. Court of Appeal of Nova Scotia (Farrar, Bryson and Scanlan JJ.A.)

[27] The judges on appeal all agreed that Mr. Matthews' original claim for wrongful dismissal and for an oppression remedy had "morphed" into a case of constructive dismissal (2018 NSCA 44, 48 C.C.E.L. (4th) 171, at paras. 1 and 151). Accepting the trial judge's findings of fact, the Court of Appeal unanimously upheld his decision that Mr. Matthews had been constructively dismissed and that the appropriate reasonable notice period was 15 months. The judges differed, however, on the issue of damages and the relevance of good faith.

rejeté la demande de dommages-intérêts punitifs de M. Matthews, car il n'était pas convaincu que la conduite d'Ocean était directement motivée par le désir de priver M. Matthews de ses droits au titre du RILT (par. 422).

[25] Sur la base de ses conclusions, le juge de première instance a accordé à M. Matthews des dommages-intérêts pour sa perte de revenus, une somme de 1 086 893,36 $ pour la perte du paiement prévu par le RILT qu'il aurait reçu pendant la période de préavis et la perte d'autres avantages, moins une somme de 78 000 $ au titre de l'atténuation des dommages, qui correspondait à la rémunération que lui avait versée son nouvel employeur.

[26] Le juge de première instance a écrit des motifs supplémentaires relatifs au montant des dommages-intérêts qu'il convenait d'accorder pour la période de préavis raisonnable (2017 NSSC 123). La décision sur les dépens a été reportée jusqu'à la tenue d'une audience sur la question. Ce volet de l'affaire a été suspendu pendant la durée des procédures d'appel.

B. Cour d'appel de la Nouvelle-Écosse (les juges Farrar, Bryson et Scanlan)

[27] Les juges de la Cour d'appel étaient tous d'accord pour dire que l'action initiale de M. Matthews en congédiement injustifié et en réparation pour cause d'abus s'était [TRADUCTION] « transformée » en une action pour congédiement déguisé (2018 NSCA 44, 48 C.C.E.L. (4th) 171, par. 1 et 151). En acceptant les conclusions de fait du juge de première instance, la Cour d'appel a confirmé à l'unanimité la décision de celui-ci portant que M. Matthews avait fait l'objet d'un congédiement déguisé et que le préavis raisonnable approprié était de 15 mois. Les juges de la Cour d'appel ont toutefois différé d'opinions sur la question des dommages-intérêts et sur la pertinence de l'obligation d'agir de bonne foi.

(1) Majority Reasons (Farrar J.A., Bryson J.A. Concurring)

[28] The majority judges disagreed with the trial judge that Mr. Matthews was entitled to damages on account of the lost LTIP payment. The trial judge confused an employee's right to reasonable notice with an employee's ability to recover under an incentive plan. The proper question, they said, was "whether the employee qualifie[d] pursuant to the terms of the agreement" (para. 63).

[29] In their view, clause 2.03 of the LTIP was unambiguous, leading to the conclusion that Mr. Matthews' right to recover under the plan ceased the moment he left Ocean. They further held that clause 2.05 clearly stated that the LTIP could not be used for severance purposes, which, in their view, the trial judge had erroneously done. As was the case in Styles v. Alberta Investment Management Corp., 2017 ABCA 1, 44 Alta. L.R. (6th) 214, the plain and unambiguous language of the LTIP therefore deprived Mr. Matthews of the opportunity to recover under the LTIP.

[30] The majority judges went on to comment on the dissenting reasons. First, they observed that "[t]his may have been a different case if the hearing judge had concluded that [Ocean] had orchestrated Matthews' termination to avoid any liability it might have under the [LTIP]", but this was rejected by the trial judge (paras. 89-90 and 114-16). In the majority's view, the dissenting judge ignored this key finding of fact. Second, the majority judges noted that it was open for the trial judge to award "additional damages as a result of the manner in which [Mr. Matthews] was treated", but "given his finding that there was no bad faith on the part of Ocean Nutrition, he could not and did not do so" (para. 122 (emphasis added)). Even though the majority judges found for Ocean in part and reversed one portion of

(1) Motifs de la majorité (le juge Farrar, avec l'accord du juge Bryson)

[28] Les juges majoritaires n'ont pas souscrit à l'opinion du juge de première instance suivant laquelle M. Matthews avait droit à des dommages-intérêts pour la perte du paiement prévu par le RILT. À leur avis, le premier juge avait confondu le droit d'un employé à un préavis raisonnable et la capacité d'un employé de toucher une prime en vertu d'un régime d'intéressement. La véritable question, selon les juges majoritaires, consistait plutôt à se demander [TRADUCTION] « si l'employé [était] admissible selon les modalités de l'entente » (par. 63).

[29] De l'avis des juges majoritaires, la clause 2.03 du RILT n'était pas ambiguë et permettait de conclure que M. Matthews a cessé d'avoir droit à la prime prévue par le régime dès qu'il a quitté Ocean. Ils ont en outre statué que la clause 2.05 indiquait clairement que le RILT ne pouvait pas être utilisé pour le calcul d'une indemnité de départ, ce qu'avait fait à tort le juge de première instance selon eux. Tout comme dans l'affaire Styles c. Alberta Investment Management Corp., 2017 ABCA 1, 44 Alta. L.R. (6th) 214, le libellé clair et non ambigu du RILT privait donc M. Matthews de la possibilité de toucher une prime au titre de ce régime.

[30] Les juges majoritaires ont poursuivi en commentant les motifs de leur collègue dissident. Premièrement, ils ont fait remarquer que [TRADUCTION] « [l]'issue aurait été différente si le juge qui présidait l'audience avait conclu qu'[Ocean] avait orchestré la fin d'emploi de M. Matthews de manière à se soustraire à toute responsabilité qu'elle pourrait avoir aux termes du [RILT] », mais ce constat n'a pas été retenu par le juge de première instance (par. 89-90 et 114-116). De l'avis de la majorité, le juge dissident a fait abstraction de cette conclusion de fait cruciale. Deuxièmement, les juges majoritaires ont souligné qu'il était loisible au juge de première instance d'accorder [TRADUCTION] « des dommages-intérêts additionnels en raison de la manière dont [M. Matthews] avait été traité », mais the judgment in first instance, it awarded no costs on appeal.

(2) Dissenting Reasons (Scanlan J.A.)

[31] Focusing principally on the allegations of mistreatment, the dissenting judge reasoned that the parties could not have "intended to agree that a rogue manager such as Emond could engineer the dismissal of a valued long-term employee through a series of lies, deceit and manipulation so as to result in that employee not being entitled to share in the value he was so essential in creating" (para. 148). Drawing on Bhasin, he held that "[t]here was an implied agreement that the LTIP and the employment contract would be performed with honesty and integrity" (para. 148). The dissenting judge explained his view that Mr. Emond's actions displayed the type of dishonesty contemplated in Bhasin:

> Neither party should be able to rely upon lies, deceit and manipulation to deny the other side of the benefits of the contractual relationship, even if that was not the primary goal of the party acting dishonestly. The hearing judge did not find that Ocean acted to intentionally deny Matthews' entitlement to the LTIP benefits, but my colleague says a consequence of Emond's action, which resulted in Matthews leaving, was the loss of the LTIP benefits. [para. 168]

The dissenting judge concluded that Ocean should therefore be held liable for any damages sustained as a result of that dishonesty.

[32] Justice Scanlan then presented a second path to recovery, again based on Bhasin. In his view, the « comme il avait conclu à l'absence de mauvaise foi de la part d'Ocean Nutrition, il ne pouvait pas le faire et il ne l'a pas fait » (par. 122 (je souligne)). Même si les juges majoritaires ont partiellement statué en faveur d'Ocean et infirmé une partie du jugement rendu en première instance, ils n'ont pas adjugé de dépens en appel.

(2) Motifs dissidents (le juge d'appel Scanlan)

[31] S'attachant principalement aux allégations selon lesquelles M. Matthews avait été traité de façon incorrecte, le juge dissident a considéré que les parties ne pouvaient avoir eu [TRADUCTION] « l'intention de convenir qu'un directeur sans scrupules comme M. Emond puisse orchestrer le congédiement d'un employé estimé de longue date en usant de mensonges, de tromperies et de manipulations afin que cet employé n'ait pas le droit de toucher sa part d'une appréciation de valeur à laquelle il avait contribué de manière déterminante » (par. 148). Se fondant sur l'arrêt Bhasin, le juge dissident a déclaré [TRADUCTION] « [qu'il] existait un accord tacite portant que les modalités du RILT et du contrat de travail seraient exécutées avec honnêteté et intégrité » (par. 148). Il a expliqué ainsi son opinion selon laquelle les actes de M. Emond correspondaient au type d'actes malhonnêtes envisagés dans l'arrêt Bhasin :

> [TRADUCTION] Aucune partie ne devrait pouvoir user de mensonges, de tromperies et de manipulations pour refuser à l'autre les avantages découlant d'une relation contractuelle, et ce, même si ce n'était pas là l'objectif premier de la partie qui a agi malhonnêtement. Le juge qui présidait l'audience n'a pas conclu qu'Ocean avait agi intentionnellement afin de priver M. Matthews des avantages prévus par le RILT, mais mon collègue affirme qu'une des conséquences des actes de M. Emond, qui se sont traduits par le départ de M. Matthews, a été la perte de ces avantages. [par. 168]

Le juge dissident a conclu qu'Ocean devrait donc être tenue responsable de tout préjudice subi par M. Matthews en raison de cette malhonnêteté.

[32] Le juge Scanlan a ensuite exposé une autre voie permettant d'obtenir réparation, elle aussi employment contract included an implied term of honest performance as part of the prohibition against unlawful dismissal without notice. Given that Ocean would benefit financially from Mr. Emond's deception, and by extension from Mr. Matthews' dismissal, the dissenting judge would have used the LTIP as a means to measure the damages for the constructive dismissal. This was appropriate since Ocean knew that a consequence of Mr. Matthews' dismissal was that his LTIP would be at risk, and that the sale of Ocean might soon occur. Consequently, the loss of opportunity to participate in the LTIP was a predictable loss. Based on these conclusions, he would "have awarded costs on this appeal to Matthews in the amount of 30% of appropriate trial costs" (para. 211).

fondée sur l'arrêt Bhasin. À son avis, le contrat de travail comprenait une condition tacite d'exécution honnête faisant partie de l'interdiction visant les congédiements illégaux sans préavis. Étant donné qu'Ocean tirerait un avantage pécuniaire de la tromperie de M. Emond, et, par extension, du congédiement de M. Matthews, le juge dissident aurait utilisé le RILT pour calculer le montant des dommages-intérêts pour le congédiement déguisé. Cette approche était appropriée, puisqu'Ocean savait que le congédiement de M. Matthews compromettrait les droits de ce dernier au titre du RILT, et qu'il était possible que la vente d'Ocean survienne sous peu. Par conséquent, la perte de l'occasion de toucher l'avantage prévu par le RILT était prévisible. Compte tenu de ces conclusions, le juge Scanlan aurait [TRADUCTION] « adjugé à M. Matthews des dépens en appel représentant 30 % du montant des dépens appropriés en première instance » (par. 211).

IV. Analysis

IV. Analyse

A. Arguments on Appeal

A. Arguments en appel

[33] On appeal, the parties continue to disagree as to the amount that should be paid to Mr. Matthews for damages, specifically whether he was entitled to compensation for the lost LTIP payment. This, in turn, reflects the disagreement between them as to the basis for awarding those damages — whether as a remedy for failure to provide reasonable notice or to act in good faith, or both. Respectfully stated, their arguments on appeal are confounding when placed side-by-side — not only do they address matters at cross-purposes but, at times, the parties seem to be speaking past one another.

[33] En appel, les parties ont continué d'exprimer leur désaccord quant au montant qui devrait être versé à M. Matthews au titre des dommages-intérêts, et, plus précisément, quant à la question de savoir si ce dernier avait droit d'être indemnisé pour la perte du paiement prévu par le RILT. Cette situation témoigne à son tour du désaccord qui existe entre les parties quant au fondement de l'octroi de dommages-intérêts — à savoir à titre de réparation pour l'absence de préavis raisonnable, pour le défaut d'agir de bonne foi, ou pour ces deux raisons. Avec égards, les arguments des parties en appel sont déroutants lorsque considérés côte à côte — non seulement ces arguments ne traitent-ils pas des mêmes questions, mais, par moment, les parties elles-mêmes semblent ne pas s'adresser l'une à l'autre.

[34] At the hearing, Mr. Matthews confined his arguments almost exclusively to the consequences of Ocean's alleged dishonesty. He argued that the majority of the Court of Appeal failed to recognize that Ocean, through its dishonest actions, breached the duty set forth in Bhasin "to ensure that the contract is performed in line with the organizing principle of good faith and the duty of honest performance" (A.F., at para. 47). Relying on Hadley v. Baxendale (1854), 9 Ex. 341, 156 E.R. 145, Mr. Matthews submitted that, as a remedy for this breach, he was entitled to an amount equivalent to the LTIP payment. Moreover, he urged this Court to recognize good faith as animating the whole of the performance of the employment contract. This is relevant given what Mr. Matthews described as a "four-year course of lying to him about the status of his employment" (transcript, at p. 9).

[34] À l'audience, M. Matthews a limité ses arguments presque exclusivement aux conséquences de la malhonnêteté dont aurait fait preuve son employeur. Il a plaidé que les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel n'avaient pas tenu compte du fait que, par ses actes malhonnêtes, Ocean avait manqué à l'obligation formulée dans l'arrêt Bhasin [TRADUCTION] « de

[35] Mr. Matthews offered, secondarily, two further bases for his claim. First, he said, the majority of the Court of Appeal misdirected itself in failing to consider damages for Ocean's breach of its obligation to provide him with reasonable notice. Moreover, in light of the supposed breach of the duty of honest performance, Mr. Matthews argued, Ocean should have been barred from relying on the exclusionary clauses. In any event, Mr. Matthews said the LTIP was misread and the majority should have deferred to the trial judge's interpretation of that contract. Second, Mr. Matthews invoked the doctrine of estoppel to support his argument that Ocean cannot rely upon the exclusion clause.

[36] By contrast, Ocean focused on defending the exclusion of the LTIP as a matter of contractual interpretation. Ocean submitted that the bonus was not integral to Mr. Matthews' compensation. Further, it agreed with the majority of the Court of Appeal that the trial judge had misinterpreted the LTIP and that, given its plain and unambiguous language, the bonus should have been excluded from any damage award.

veiller à ce que le contrat soit exécuté en conformité avec le principe directeur de bonne foi et l'obligation d'agir honnêtement dans l'exécution des obligations contractuelles » (m.a., par. 47). S'appuyant sur l'arrêt Hadley c. Baxendale (1854), 9 Ex. 341, 156 E.R. 145, M. Matthews a affirmé qu'il avait droit à un montant correspondant au paiement prévu par le RILT à titre de réparation pour ce manquement. En outre, il a exhorté notre Cour à reconnaître que la bonne foi anime l'ensemble de l'exécution du contrat de travail. Cet argument est pertinent compte tenu de la situation que M. Matthews a décrite comme étant une [TRADUCTION] « campagne de quatre ans au cours de laquelle on lui a menti sur l'état de son emploi » (transcription, p. 9).

[35] À titre subsidiaire, M. Matthews a invoqué deux fondements additionnels au soutien de sa demande. Premièrement, il a affirmé que les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel se sont donné des directives erronées en omettant de considérer l'octroi de dommages-intérêts à l'égard du manquement d'Ocean de s'acquitter de son obligation de lui donner un préavis raisonnable. De plus, compte tenu du prétendu manquement à l'obligation d'exécution honnête, M. Matthews a fait valoir qu'Ocean n'aurait pas dû pouvoir invoquer les clauses d'exclusion. De toute façon, M. Matthews a déclaré que les juges majoritaires avaient mal interprété le RILT et qu'ils auraient dû s'en remettre à celle qu'en avait faite le juge de première instance. Deuxièmement, M. Matthews a invoqué la doctrine de la préclusion promissoire pour étayer son argument selon lequel Ocean ne pouvait pas appliquer la clause d'exclusion.

[36] En revanche, Ocean s'est attachée à défendre l'exclusion de M. Matthews du RILT comme étant une question d'interprétation contractuelle. Elle a fait valoir que la prime ne faisait pas partie intégrante de la rémunération de M. Matthews. De plus, à l'instar des juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel, elle a exprimé l'avis que le juge de première instance a mal interprété le RILT et que, vu le libellé clair et non équivoque de ce document, la prime aurait dû être exclue de toute somme accordée au titre des dommages-intérêts.

[37] Ocean had little to say on good faith, except to acknowledge that the employer had displayed some "bad conduct" and to assert that there was no finding, at trial or in the majority opinion on appeal, of bad faith (transcript, at p. 66). After proposing a fresh characterization of certain facts relating to the interaction between Ocean's representatives and Mr. Matthews to that end, Ocean urged this Court to hold that the majority judges on appeal were right to conclude there was no bad faith. In any event, Ocean argued that the common law does not recognize any duties of good faith on the employer during the performance of the contract that could serve as a basis for the payment of the bonus.

[38] In these reasons, I seek to explain my view, respectfully stated, that the majority of the Court of Appeal erred in not awarding Mr. Matthews the amount of the LTIP as part of his common law damages for breach of the implied term to provide reasonable notice. In considering all of the complaints made by Mr. Matthews, it bears recalling that he did not seek damages for mental distress,[1] and while he originally pleaded for punitive damages, he did not pursue that head of damages on appeal in this Court. Consequently, it is unnecessary in the circumstances, and perhaps even unwise given the method on which Bhasin rests, to resolve Mr. Matthews' allegations of dishonest treatment since I propose to award him the only remedy sought on appeal — an amount equivalent to his LTIP entitlement — on the basis of reasonable notice. That said, Ocean's alleged dishonest behaviour over a protracted period, but in the manner

[37] Ocean a peu dit sur la question de la bonne foi, si ce n'est qu'elle a reconnu que l'employeur s'était à certains moments [TRADUCTION] « mal conduit » et qu'elle a affirmé que ni le juge de première instance ni les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel n'avaient conclu à la mauvaise foi (transcription, p. 66). Après avoir proposé, au soutien de cette affirmation, une nouvelle qualification de certains faits liés aux interactions entre les représentants d'Ocean et M. Matthews, Ocean a demandé à notre Cour de statuer que les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel avaient eu raison de conclure à l'absence de mauvaise foi. Quoi qu'il en soit, Ocean a soutenu que la common law n'impose à l'employeur aucune obligation d'agir de bonne foi dans l'exécution du contrat qui pourrait servir de fondement justifiant le paiement de la prime en question.

[38] Je m'efforce, dans les présents motifs, d'expliquer, avec égards pour l'opinion contraire, mon point de vue selon lequel les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel ont fait erreur en n'incluant pas le montant de la prime prévue par le RILT dans les dommages-intérêts qui ont été accordés à M. Matthews, en vertu de la common law, pour le manquement à l'obligation tacite de lui donner un préavis raisonnable. Dans l'examen de l'ensemble des griefs invoqués par M. Matthews, il convient de rappeler que ce dernier n'a pas sollicité de dommages-intérêts pour souffrances morales[1], et que bien qu'il ait demandé des dommages-intérêts punitifs initialement, il n'a pas continué de réclamer ce chef de dommages-intérêts devant notre Cour. Par conséquent, il n'est pas nécessaire dans les circonstances, et il serait peut-être même peu judicieux vu la méthode suivie dans l'arrêt Bhasin, de statuer sur les allégations de malhonnêteté

[1] The term "aggravated damages" was used on occasion by the two parties throughout this appeal. I note, however, that in Fidler v. Sun Life Assurance Co. of Canada, 2006 SCC 30, [2006] 2 S.C.R. 3, at paras. 52-54, this Court explained that this term is largely a misnomer, and that compensatory damages for a contractual breach of the duty of good faith spoken to in Wallace "are based on what was in the reasonable contemplation of the parties at the time of contract formation".

[1] L'expression [TRADUCTION] « dommages-intérêts majorés » a été employée à l'occasion par les deux parties tout au long du présent pourvoi. Je fais remarquer toutefois que, dans l'arrêt Fidler c. Sun Life du Canada, compagnie d'assurance-vie, 2006 CSC 30, [2006] 2 R.C.S. 3, par. 52-54, notre Cour a expliqué que cette expression est en grande partie inexacte, et que les dommages-intérêts compensatoires accordés pour le manquement à l'obligation contractuelle d'agir de bonne foi dont il a été question dans l'arrêt Wallace « sont fondés sur ce que les parties pouvaient raisonnablement envisager au moment de la formation du contrat ».

of dismissal nonetheless, attracts a brief comment. I come to this view for two reasons.

[39] The first pertains to the proper method of analyzing claims for wrongful dismissal, like that of Mr. Matthews, where the employee alleges a failure to provide reasonable notice as well as bad faith. So long as damages are appropriately made out and causation established, a breach of a duty of good faith could certainly give rise to distinct damages based on the principles in Hadley, approved in this setting in Keays (at paras. 55-56), including damages for mental distress. Punitive damages could also be available in certain circumstances. To this end, ensuring litigants take care that their pleadings are properly made out, and ensuring courts are following a methodologically coherent approach to constructive dismissal cases is certainly of value as it can affect the ultimate damage amount to be awarded to an employee plaintiff.

[40] It is apparent too from the pleadings here that there is a measure of uncertainty as to the impact of Bhasin, not just in Mr. Matthews' case but on employment law more generally. At a minimum, I believe this is an occasion to re-affirm two important principles stated in Potter. First, given the various submissions in this case, I would recall that the duty of honest performance — which Cromwell J. explained in Bhasin applies to all contracts, and means simply that parties "must not lie [to] or otherwise knowingly mislead" their counterparty "about matters directly linked to the performance of the avancées par M. Matthews, étant donné que je propose de lui accorder la seule réparation sollicitée en appel — soit une somme équivalente au paiement auquel il a droit en vertu du RILT — sur la base du droit à un préavis raisonnable. Cela dit, quelques observations s'imposent à l'égard des allégations relatives à la conduite malhonnête qu'aurait eue Ocean pendant une période prolongée, mais néanmoins liée aux circonstances du congédiement. J'arrive à cette conclusion pour deux raisons.

[39] La première se rapporte à la méthode qu'il convient d'utiliser pour analyser les actions pour congédiement injustifié, comme celle de M. Matthews, lorsque l'employé prétend qu'on ne lui a pas donné un préavis raisonnable et qu'il y a eu mauvaise foi. Tant que la preuve du préjudice est apportée comme il se doit et que l'existence d'un lien de causalité est établie, un manquement à l'obligation d'agir de bonne foi pourrait certainement donner ouverture à des dommages-intérêts distincts selon les principes établis dans l'arrêt Hadley, qui ont été approuvés dans ce contexte dans l'arrêt Keays (par. 55-56), notamment des dommages-intérêts pour souffrances morales. Des dommages-intérêts punitifs pourraient également être accordés dans certaines circonstances. À cette fin, il est certes important que les parties s'assurent que leurs actes de procédure sont formulés adéquatement et que les tribunaux appliquent une approche cohérente sur le plan méthodologique lorsqu'ils instruisent des poursuites pour congédiement déguisé, car tout cela peut influer sur le montant des dommages-intérêts qui est accordé en définitive à l'employé demandeur.

[40] De plus, il ressort de l'argumentation des parties en l'espèce qu'une part d'incertitude plane en ce qui a trait à l'incidence de l'arrêt Bhasin, non seulement sur le pourvoi de M. Matthews, mais aussi sur le droit de l'emploi en général. Je crois que la présente affaire constitue à tout le moins une occasion de réaffirmer deux principes importants énoncés dans l'arrêt Potter. Premièrement, vu les divers arguments avancés par les parties, je tiens à rappeler que l'obligation d'exécution honnête — qui, comme l'a expliqué le juge Cromwell dans l'arrêt Bhasin, s'applique à tous les contrats et signifie simplement que contract" — is applicable to employment contracts (Bhasin, at para. 33, see also para. 73; Potter, at para. 99). Second, given the four-year period of alleged dishonesty leading up to Mr. Matthews' dismissal, I would also reiterate that when an employee alleges a breach of the duty to exercise good faith in the manner of dismissal — a phrase introduced by this Court in Wallace, and reinforced in Keays — this means courts are able to examine a period of conduct that is not confined to the exact moment of termination itself. All this reflects, in my view, settled law.

les parties « ne doivent pas se mentir » les unes aux autres « ni s'induire intentionnellement en erreur au sujet des questions directement liées à l'exécution du contrat » — est applicable aux contrats de travail (Bhasin, par. 33, voir aussi par. 73; Potter, par. 99). Deuxièmement, je prends bonne note de la période de quatre ans au cours de laquelle il y aurait eu comportement malhonnête à l'endroit de M. Matthews avant son congédiement. En conséquence, je tiens également à réitérer que, dans les cas où un employé prétend qu'il y a eu manquement à l'obligation d'agir de bonne foi dans la façon de procéder au congédiement — formule introduite par notre Cour dans l'arrêt Wallace, puis réaffirmée dans l'arrêt Keays —, il s'ensuit que les tribunaux sont autorisés à examiner une conduite qui s'est échelonnée sur une certaine période et qui ne se limite pas au moment précis où il a été mis fin à l'emploi. À mon avis, tous ces aspects constituent des règles de droit bien établies.

[41] The second reason relates to the qualitatively different types of the contractual breaches alleged from the start by Mr. Matthews. This difference was addressed, in some measure, in Keays when it was determined that the breach in question should not, as was sometimes the case, simply bump-up the reasonable notice period.[2] To say that one has been treated dishonestly is quite unlike saying that one has been dismissed without notice. This is directly relevant to Mr. Matthews' call for the courts to declare that he was mistreated by Ocean.

[41] La deuxième raison se rapporte aux types qualitativement différents de manquements contractuels qui ont été invoqués par M. Matthews dès le départ. Dans une certaine mesure, cette différence a été considérée dans l'arrêt Keays où il a été jugé que le manquement en question ne devrait pas, comme c'était parfois le cas, servir simplement à allonger la durée de la période de préavis raisonnable[2]. Dire qu'un employé a été traité malhonnêtement est très différent de dire qu'il a été congédié sans préavis. Cette constatation est directement pertinente dans le cas de la demande adressée par M. Matthews aux tribunaux afin d'obtenir une déclaration portant qu'il a été traité de façon incorrecte par Ocean.

B. The Appropriate Method of Analysis

B. Méthode d'analyse appropriée

[42] Properly understood, the claim pursued here indeed rests on allegations of distinct contractual breaches of Mr. Matthews' employment contract.

[42] Interprétée adéquatement, l'action débattue en l'espèce repose en effet sur des allégations reprochant deux manquements distincts au contrat de travail de M. Matthews.

[2] K. Banks, "Progress and Paradox: The Remarkable yet Limited Advance of Employer Good Faith Duties in Canadian Common Law" (2011), 32 Comp. Lab. L. & Pol'y J. 547, at pp. 561-62.

[2] K. Banks, « Progress and Paradox : The Remarkable yet Limited Advance of Employer Good Faith Duties in Canadian Common Law » (2011), 32 Comp. Lab. L. & Pol'y J. 547, p. 561-562.

[43] Neither party disputes that, at common law, an employer has the right to terminate the employment contract without cause — or, in this case, prompt the employee to choose to leave their job in circumstances that amount to a dismissal — subject to the duty to provide reasonable notice, a right which, as this Court noted in Farber v. Royal Trust Co., [1997] 1 S.C.R. 846, at para. 23, is reciprocal in the contract of employment. When breached, the obligation to provide reasonable notice does not, in theory, turn on the presence or absence of good faith: it is, in a manner of speaking, a "good faith" wrongful dismissal (see Machtinger, at p. 990). The contractual breach that arises from the employer's choice in this regard is simply the failure to provide reasonable notice, which leads to an award of damages in lieu thereof (Wallace, at para. 115, per McLachlin J., as she then was, dissenting, but not on this point). There is some dispute in the cases regarding how to determine what damages should be awarded in the event of a breach, which I will consider below, but this breach does not turn on whether or not the employer acted honestly or in good faith.

[44] Running parallel to the argument on reasonable notice, Mr. Matthews has alleged that his termination was also in breach of contract because it failed to meet the expected standard of good faith. Under rules recognized by this Court in Bhasin and Potter, an unhappy employee can allege dishonesty in the performance of the contract by the employer — i.e., a breach of the duty of honest performance, which Cromwell J. in Bhasin described as contractual doctrine — independently of any failure to provide reasonable notice. This Court has also recognized in Wallace and Keays that an unhappy employee can allege mistreatment — i.e., conduct that is "unfair or is in bad faith by being, for example, untruthful, misleading or unduly insensitive" — in the manner

[43] Ni l'une ni l'autre des parties ne contestent le fait, que suivant la common law, un employeur a le droit de résilier un contrat de travail sans motif — ou, comme c'est le cas en l'espèce, de pousser un employé à quitter son emploi dans des circonstances qui équivalent à un congédiement — pourvu que cet employeur s'acquitte de son obligation de donner un préavis raisonnable, droit qui, comme l'a souligné la Cour dans l'arrêt Farber c. Cie Trust Royal, [1997] 1 R.C.S. 846, par. 23, est réciproque en matière de contrat de travail. En cas de manquement à l'obligation de donner un préavis raisonnable, la question qui se pose n'est pas, en théorie, de savoir s'il y a eu ou non bonne foi; il s'agit, pour ainsi dire, d'un congédiement injustifié effectué de « bonne foi » (voir Machtinger, p. 990). Le manquement au contrat découlant de la décision de l'employeur à cet égard est simplement le défaut de donner un préavis raisonnable, situation qui entraîne le paiement de dommages-intérêts tenant lieu de préavis (Wallace, par. 115, la juge McLachlin (plus tard juge en chef), dissidente, mais non sur ce point). Il existe, dans la jurisprudence, un certain désaccord sur la façon de calculer le montant des dommages-intérêts qui devraient être accordés en cas de manquement, désaccord que j'aborderai plus loin; cependant, ce manquement ne dépend pas de la réponse à la question de savoir si l'employeur a agi avec honnêteté ou de bonne foi.

[44] Parallèlement à son argument fondé sur la question du préavis raisonnable, M. Matthews prétend que la façon dont on a mis fin à son emploi contrevenait également au contrat de travail en ce qu'on n'a pas respecté la norme de bonne foi attendue. En vertu des règles qui ont été reconnues par notre Cour dans les arrêts Bhasin et Potter, un employé mécontent peut alléguer que son employeur a agi de façon malhonnête dans l'exécution du contrat — c.-à-d., qu'il y a eu manquement à l'obligation d'exécution honnête, ce que le juge Cromwell dans Bhasin a qualifié de doctrine du droit des contrats — indépendamment de tout manquement à l'obligation de donner un préavis raisonnable. Notre Cour a également reconnu, dans les arrêts of dismissal by the employer (Wallace, at para. 98; Keays, at para. 57). A breach of the duty to exercise good faith in the manner of dismissal is also independent of any failure to provide reasonable notice. It can serve as a basis to answer for foreseeable injury that results from callous or insensitive conduct in the manner of dismissal, a point to which I will return to at the conclusion of these reasons (Wallace, at para. 88).

[45] Importantly, damages arising out of the same dismissal are calculated differently depending on the breach invoked. Again, this is nothing but a reflection of settled law. In Keays, at para. 56, for example, Bastarache J. helpfully explained that "[t]he contract of employment is, by its very terms, subject to cancellation on notice or subject to payment of damages in lieu of notice without regard to the ordinary psychological impact of that decision". By contrast, he explained that failure to act in good faith during the manner of dismissal "can lead to foreseeable, compensable damages" based on the Hadley principle (para. 58). Contrary to what had been thought until that time, an extension of the notice period was not to be used to determine the proper amount to be paid (para. 59). This is because the nature of the contractual breach is of a different order than that associated with the failure to provide reasonable notice. Indeed, it is this fundamental difference that explains why principles of mitigation apply differently to mental distress damages flowing from a breach of the good faith obligation in the manner of dismissal (Evans v. Teamsters Local Union No. 31, 2008 SCC 20, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 661, at para. 32).

Wallace et Keays, qu'un employé mécontent peut alléguer qu'il a été traité de façon incorrecte dans la façon dont on l'a congédié — c.-à-d., que l'employeur s'est comporté « de façon inéquitable ou [a fait] preuve de mauvaise foi en étant, par exemple, menteur [. . .], trompeur [. . .] ou trop implacable » (Wallace, par. 98; Keays, par. 57). Un manquement à l'obligation d'agir de bonne foi dans la façon de congédier l'employé est également indépendant de tout manquement à l'obligation de donner un préavis raisonnable. Il peut servir de moyen permettant d'exiger réparation à l'égard d'un préjudice prévisible résultant d'un traitement brutal ou implacable de la part de l'employeur dans la façon dont il a congédié l'employé, point sur lequel je reviendrai à la fin des présents motifs (Wallace, par. 88).

[45] Fait important, les dommages-intérêts découlant d'un même congédiement sont calculés différemment selon la violation reprochée. Je le répète, ce fait n'est que le reflet de la jurisprudence déjà établie. Dans l'arrêt Keays, par. 56, par exemple, le juge Bastarache a utilement expliqué que, « [s]uivant son libellé, le contrat d'emploi est susceptible de résiliation moyennant préavis ou paiement d'une indemnité en tenant lieu, indépendamment du préjudice psychologique normal causé par une telle mesure ». Par comparaison, il a précisé que si l'employeur n'agit pas de bonne foi lorsqu'il congédie un employé, « il y aura préjudice prévisible susceptible d'indemnisation » suivant le principe établi dans l'arrêt Hadley (par. 58). Contrairement à ce que l'on croyait avant cette affaire, il n'y a pas lieu d'allonger le préavis pour déterminer le juste montant de l'indemnité (par. 59). Il en est ainsi parce que la nature du manquement au contrat n'est pas du même ordre que dans le cas du défaut de donner un préavis raisonnable. En effet, cette distinction fondamentale permet d'expliquer pourquoi les principes relatifs à l'atténuation des dommages s'appliquent différemment aux dommages-intérêts pour souffrances morales imputables à un manquement à l'obligation d'agir de bonne foi dans la façon de procéder au congédiement (Evans c. Teamsters Local Union No. 31, 2008 CSC 20, [2008] 1 R.C.S. 661, par. 32).

[46] With this in mind, I turn now to examine the duty to provide reasonable notice, which as will become plain, is dispositive of this appeal.

(1) Duty to Provide Reasonable Notice

[47] In the case at bar, the only disagreement in respect of reasonable notice turns on whether Mr. Matthews' damages include an amount to compensate him for his lost LTIP payment.

[48] In my respectful view, the majority of the Court of Appeal erred by focusing on whether the terms of the LTIP were "plain and unambiguous" instead of asking what damages were appropriately due for Ocean's failure to provide Mr. Matthews with reasonable notice. The issue is not whether Mr. Matthews is entitled to the LTIP in itself, but rather what damages he is entitled to and whether he was entitled to compensation for bonuses he would have earned had Ocean not breached the employment contract. By focusing narrowly on the former question, the Court of Appeal applied an incorrect principle, resulting in what I see as an overriding error.

(a) Redress for Breach of the Implied Term to Provide Reasonable Notice of Termination

[49] Insofar as Mr. Matthews was constructively dismissed without notice, he was entitled to damages representing the salary, including bonuses, he would have earned during the 15-month period (Wallace, at paras. 65-67). This is so because the remedy for a breach of the implied term to provide reasonable notice is an award of damages based on the period of notice which should have been given, with the damages representing "what the employee would have earned in this period" (para. 115). Whether payments under incentive bonuses, such as the LTIP in this case, are to be included in these damages is a [46] Gardant ces considérations à l'esprit, j'examinerai maintenant l'obligation de donner un préavis raisonnable, obligation qui, comme il ressortira clairement, permet de trancher le présent pourvoi.

(1) Obligation de donner un préavis raisonnable

[47] En l'espèce, le seul désaccord quant au préavis raisonnable porte sur la question de savoir si les dommages-intérêts accordés à M. Matthews doivent inclure une somme l'indemnisant pour la perte du paiement prévu par le RILT.

[48] Je suis respectueusement d'avis que les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel ont commis une erreur en s'attachant à la question de savoir si les modalités du RILT étaient [TRADUCTION] « claires et non ambiguës » au lieu de s'interroger sur le montant des dommages-intérêts qu'il convenait d'accorder à M. Matthews parce qu'Ocean ne lui a pas donné un préavis raisonnable. Il ne s'agit pas de décider si M. Matthews est admissible au RILT, mais plutôt de déterminer le montant des dommages-intérêts auquel il a droit et s'il a droit d'être indemnisé pour les primes qu'il aurait touchées si Ocean n'avait pas contrevenu au contrat de travail. En se concentrant sur la première question, la Cour d'appel a appliqué un mauvais principe, ce qui a à mon avis entraîné une erreur déterminante.

a) Réparation pour manquement à l'obligation tacite de donner un préavis raisonnable de cessation d'emploi

[49] Dans la mesure où M. Matthews a fait l'objet d'un congédiement déguisé sans préavis, il avait droit à des dommages-intérêts correspondant au salaire, y compris les primes, qu'il aurait touché durant la période de préavis de 15 mois (Wallace, par. 65-67). Il en est ainsi parce que la réparation en cas de manquement à l'obligation tacite de donner un préavis raisonnable consiste à accorder des dommages-intérêts fondés sur la période du préavis qui aurait dû être donné, dommages-intérêts correspondant « au montant que l'employé aurait gagné pendant cette période » (par. 115). La question de common and recurring issue in the law of wrongful dismissal. To answer this question, the trial judge relied on Paquette and Lin from the Court of Appeal for Ontario. I believe he took the right approach.

[50] In Paquette, the employee participated in his employer's bonus plan, which stipulated that employees had to be "actively employed" on the date of the bonus payout. That language is broadly comparable to that found in the LTIP which, at clause 2.03, requires the claimant to be a "full-time employee" of the company. In Paquette, but for the employee's termination, the employee would have received the bonus within the reasonable notice period. The motion judge in that case, however, concluded that the employee was not entitled to the bonus because, while he may have been "notionally" employed during the reasonable notice period, he was not "actively" employed and so did not qualify under the terms of the plan.

[51] The employee's appeal was allowed. The Ontario Court of Appeal relied principally on its prior decision in Taggart v. Canada Life Assurance Co. (2006), 50 C.C.P.B. 163, concerning a similar question related to pension benefits. In that case, Sharpe J.A. rightly cautioned that courts should not ignore the legal nature of employees' claims. "The claim is not", he said, "for the pension benefits themselves. Rather, it is for common law contract damages as compensation for the pension benefits [the employee] would have earned had [the employer] not breached the contract of employment" (para. 16). Consequently, "a terminated employee is entitled to claim damages for the loss of pension benefits that would have accrued had the employee worked until the end of the notice period" (para. 13). With respect to the role of a bonus plan's contractual terms, Sharpe J.A. explained that "[t]he question at this savoir si les sommes à verser au titre d'un régime d'intéressement, tel le RILT en l'espèce, doivent être incluses dans les dommages-intérêts est une question courante et récurrente dans le domaine du droit applicable au congédiement injustifié. Pour répondre à cette question, le juge de première instance s'est appuyé sur les arrêts Paquette et Lin de la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario. J'estime qu'il a choisi la bonne approche.

[50] Dans l'arrêt Paquette, l'employé participait au régime de primes établi par son employeur, lequel stipulait que les employés devaient être des [TRADUCTION] « employés actifs » à la date du versement des primes. Cette formulation est sensiblement comparable à celle utilisée dans le RILT qui, à la clause 2.03, requiert que l'intéressé soit un [TRADUCTION] « employé à temps plein » de l'entreprise. Dans l'arrêt Paquette, n'eût été son congédiement, l'employé aurait touché la prime à laquelle il avait droit pendant la période de préavis raisonnable. Cependant, dans cette affaire, le juge des motions a conclu que l'employé n'avait pas droit à la prime en question, parce que même s'il était [TRADUCTION] « théoriquement » un employé de l'entreprise pendant la période de préavis raisonnable, il n'était pas un employé « actif » et n'était donc pas admissible suivant les modalités du régime.

[51] L'appel de l'employé a été accueilli. La Cour d'appel de l'Ontario s'est appuyée principalement sur sa décision antérieure dans l'affaire Taggart c. Canada Life Assurance Co. (2006), 50 C.C.P.B. 163, qui portait sur une question similaire concernant les prestations de retraite. Dans cet arrêt, le juge d'appel Sharpe a, à juste titre, mis en garde les tribunaux de ne pas faire abstraction de la nature juridique des réclamations des employés. Comme il l'a indiqué, [TRADUCTION] « [l]a réclamation ne porte pas sur les prestations de retraite elles-mêmes. Elle vise plutôt l'obtention de dommages-intérêts contractuels en common law à titre de dédommagement pour les prestations de retraite auxquels [l'employé] aurait eu droit si [l'employeur] n'avait pas contrevenu au contrat de travail » (par. 16). Par conséquent, [TRADUCTION] « un employé congédié a le droit de réclamer des dommages-intérêts pour la perte de stage is whether there is something in the language of the pension contract between the parties that takes away or limits that common law right" (para. 20).

[52] The Court of Appeal in Paquette built upon the approach in Taggart, proposing that courts should take a two-step approach to these questions. First, courts should "consider the [employee's] common law rights" (para. 30). That is, courts should examine whether, but for the termination, the employee would have been entitled to the bonus during the reasonable notice period. Second, courts should "determine whether there is something in the bonus plan that would specifically remove the [employee's] common law entitlement" (para. 31). "The question", van Rensburg J.A. explained, "is not whether the contract or plan is ambiguous, but whether the wording of the plan unambiguously alters or removes the [employee's] common law rights" (para. 31).

[53] I agree with van Rensburg J.A. that this is the appropriate approach. It accords with basic principles of damages for constructive dismissal, anchoring the analysis around reasonable notice. As the court recognized in Taggart, and reiterated in Paquette, when employees sue for damages for constructive dismissal, they are claiming for damages as compensation for the income, benefits, and bonuses they would have received had the employer not breached the implied term to provide reasonable notice (see also Iacobucci v. WIC Radio Ltd., 1999 BCCA 753, 72 B.C.L.R. (3d) 234, at paras. 19 and 24; Gillies v. Goldman Sachs Canada Inc., 2001 BCCA 683, 95 B.C.L.R. (3d) 260, at paras. 10-12 and 25; Keays, at paras. 54-55). Proceeding directly prestations de retraite auxquelles il aurait eu droit s'il avait travaillé jusqu'à la fin de la période de préavis » (par. 13). En ce qui concerne le rôle des modalités contractuelles d'un régime de primes, le juge d'appel Sharpe a expliqué que [TRADUCTION] « [l]a question à cette étape consiste à décider s'il y a quelque chose dans le texte des modalités du régime de retraite existant entre les parties qui a pour effet de supprimer ou de limiter ce droit que confère la common law » (par. 20).

[52] Dans l'arrêt Paquette, la Cour d'appel s'est inspirée de l'approche adoptée dans l'arrêt Taggart et a proposé que les tribunaux appliquent une démarche en deux étapes à l'égard de ces questions. Premièrement, les tribunaux devraient [TRADUCTION] « considérer les droits dont dispose [l'employé] en vertu de la common law » (par. 30). En d'autres mots, les tribunaux devraient se demander si, n'eût été son congédiement, l'employé aurait eu le droit de toucher la prime en litige pendant la période de préavis raisonnable. Deuxièmement, les tribunaux devraient [TRADUCTION] « déterminer s'il y a quelque chose dans les modalités du régime de primes qui prive expressément [l'employé] des droits que lui confère la common law » (par. 31). Comme l'a expliqué la juge d'appel van Rensburg, [TRADUCTION] « [l]a question n'est pas de savoir si le contrat ou le régime est ambigu, mais plutôt de savoir s'il y a quelque chose dans le texte des modalités du régime qui modifie ou supprime clairement les droits reconnus à [l'employé] par la common law » (par. 31).

[53] Tout comme la juge van Rensburg, je suis d'avis qu'il s'agit de la démarche appropriée. Elle est conforme aux principes fondamentaux applicables aux dommages-intérêts pour congédiement déguisé, l'analyse s'attachant à la question du préavis raisonnable. Comme la cour l'a reconnu dans l'arrêt Taggart, et réitéré dans l'arrêt Paquette, lorsque des employés intentent une action en dommages-intérêts pour congédiement déguisé, ils sollicitent des dommages-intérêts à titre de dédommagement pour le revenu, les prestations et les primes qu'ils auraient touchés si l'employeur n'avait pas manqué à son obligation tacite de donner un préavis raisonnable (voir aussi Iacobucci c. WIC Radio Ltd., 1999 BCCA 753, 72 B.C.L.R. (3d) 234, par. 19 to an examination of contractual terms divorces the question of damages from the underlying breach, which is an error in principle.

[54] Moreover, the approach in Paquette respects the well-established understanding that the contract effectively "remains alive" for the purposes of assessing the employee's damages, in order to determine what compensation the employee would have been entitled to but for the dismissal (see, e.g., Nygard Int. Ltd. v. Robinson (1990), 46 B.C.L.R. (2d) 103 (C.A.), at pp. 106-7, per Southin J.A., concurring; Gillies, at para. 17).

[55] Courts should accordingly ask two questions when determining whether the appropriate quantum of damages for breach of the implied term to provide reasonable notice includes bonus payments and certain other benefits. Would the employee have been entitled to the bonus or benefit as part of their compensation during the reasonable notice period? If so, do the terms of the employment contract or bonus plan unambiguously take away or limit that common law right?

(b) Application to Mr. Matthews' Case

[56] The first question is whether Mr. Matthews would have been entitled to the LTIP payment as part of his compensation during the reasonable notice period. Since the Realization Event was triggered within the 15-month reasonable notice period, Mr. Matthews argues that he is prima facie entitled to damages for the lost LTIP payment as part of his common law damages.

[57] Ocean argues that Mr. Matthews cannot satisfy the first stage of the analysis. It points this Court et 24; Gillies c. Goldman Sachs Canada Inc., 2001 BCCA 683, 95 B.C.L.R. (3d) 260, par. 10-12 et 25; Keays, par. 54-55). Procéder directement à l'examen des modalités contractuelles a pour effet de dissocier la question des dommages-intérêts du manquement sous-jacent, ce qui constitue une erreur de principe.

[54] En outre, la démarche suivie dans l'arrêt Paquette est compatible avec l'interprétation bien établie selon laquelle le contrat [TRADUCTION] « demeure [effectivement] en vigueur » pour les besoins de l'évaluation du préjudice de l'employé en vue de calculer le montant de l'indemnité à laquelle ce dernier aurait eu droit n'eût été son congédiement (voir, p. ex., Nygard Int. Ltd. c. Robinson (1990), 46 B.C.L.R. (2d) 103 (C.A.), p. 106-107, motifs concordants de la juge d'appel Southin; Gillies, par. 17).

[55] Les tribunaux devraient en conséquence se poser deux questions lorsqu'ils sont appelés à décider si le montant des dommages-intérêts qu'il convient d'accorder pour manquement à l'obligation tacite de donner un préavis raisonnable doit inclure les primes et certains autres avantages. L'employé aurait-il eu droit à la prime ou à l'avantage dans le cadre de ses conditions de rémunération pendant la période de préavis raisonnable? Dans l'affirmative, les modalités du contrat de travail ou du régime de primes ont-elles pour effet de supprimer ou de limiter clairement ce droit que confère la common law?

b) Application au cas de M. Matthews

[56] La première question consiste à se demander si M. Matthews aurait eu droit au paiement prévu par le RILT dans le cadre de ses conditions de rémunération pendant la période de préavis raisonnable. Comme l'événement déclencheur s'est produit pendant la période de préavis raisonnable de 15 mois, M. Matthews soutient qu'il a droit, à première vue, au titre des dommages-intérêts fondés sur la common law, à des dommages-intérêts pour la perte du paiement prévu par le RILT.

[57] Ocean affirme que M. Matthews n'est pas en mesure de satisfaire à la première étape de l'analyse.

to Singer v. Nordstrong Equipment Limited, 2018 ONCA 364, 47 C.C.E.L. (4th) 218, where the Court of Appeal for Ontario presented the first question by asking whether the bonus was "an integral part of his compensation package" (para. 21). Relying on this formulation, Ocean contends that, under the first step, Mr. Matthews has a common law entitlement to damages for all compensation and benefits that are integral to his compensation. Ocean maintains that the LTIP payment was not integral to Mr. Matthews' compensation since he did not have a vested right at the date of termination.

Elle invoque l'arrêt Singer c. Nordstrong Equipment Limited, 2018 ONCA 364, 47 C.C.E.L. (4th) 218, dans lequel la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario, à l'étape de la première question, s'est demandée si la prime [TRADUCTION] « faisait partie intégrante des conditions de rémunération [de l'intéressé] » (par. 21). S'appuyant sur cette formulation, Ocean prétend que, selon la première étape, la common law confère à M. Matthews le droit de recevoir des dommages-intérêts pour le salaire et les avantages qui font partie intégrante de sa rémunération. Elle soutient que le paiement prévu par le RILT ne faisait pas partie intégrante de la rémunération de M. Matthews, car ce dernier n'avait pas un droit acquis sur ce paiement lorsque son emploi a pris fin.

[58] The trial judge confronted this submission and concluded that Ocean was attempting to introduce an extra requirement into the analysis that is not supported by the jurisprudence (para. 387). I agree. The test of whether a benefit or bonus is "integral" to the employee's compensation assists in answering the question of what the employee would have been paid during the reasonable notice period (see, e.g., Brock v. Matthews Group Ltd. (1988), 20 C.C.E.L. 110 (Ont. H.C.J.), at p. 123, aff'd (1991), 34 C.C.E.L. 50 (C.A.); Paquette, at para. 17). Thus, in Paquette and Singer, where the bonuses at issue were discretionary, the Court of Appeal for Ontario considered this so-called "integral" test since there was doubt as to whether the employee would have received those discretionary bonuses during the reasonable notice period.

[58] Le juge de première instance s'est arrêté à cet argument et a conclu qu'Ocean cherchait à introduire dans l'analyse une exigence supplémentaire qui n'est pas étayée par la jurisprudence (par. 387). Je suis d'accord. Le critère qui consiste à déterminer si un avantage ou une prime fait « partie intégrante » de la rémunération d'un employé aide à répondre à la question de savoir ce qui aurait été payé à cet employé pendant la période de préavis raisonnable (voir, p. ex., Brock c. Matthews Group Ltd. (1988), 20 C.C.E.L. 110 (H.C.J. Ont.), p. 123, conf. par (1991), 34 C.C.E.L. 50 (C.A.); Paquette, par. 17). Ainsi, dans les arrêts Paquette et Singer, où les primes en litige étaient discrétionnaires, la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a pris en compte ce critère, dit de la « partie intégrante », car un doute subsistait quant à la question de savoir si l'employé aurait touché ces primes discrétionnaires pendant la période de préavis raisonnable.

[59] This case is different. The purpose of damages in lieu of reasonable notice is to put the employee in the position they would have been in had they continued to work through to the end of the notice period. It is uncontested that the Realization Event occurred during the notice period. But for Mr. Matthews' dismissal, he would have received an LTIP payment during that period. In such circumstances, there is no need to ask whether the LTIP payment was "integral" to his compensation.

[59] La présente affaire est différente. Les dommages-intérêts tenant lieu de préavis raisonnable ont pour objet de rétablir l'employé dans la situation où il se serait trouvé s'il avait continué de travailler jusqu'à la fin de la période de préavis. Il n'est pas contesté que l'événement déclencheur s'est produit pendant cette période. Cependant, n'eût été son congédiement, M. Matthews aurait reçu le paiement prévu par le RILT durant cette période. Dans ces circonstances, il est inutile de se demander si ce paiement faisait « partie intégrante » de sa rémunération.

[60] Furthermore, in answer to a question from one of my colleagues at the hearing, counsel for Ocean conceded that Mr. Matthews may well have had an entitlement to the LTIP absent clauses 2.03 and 2.05. I am thus satisfied that, on this first step, Mr. Matthews is prima facie entitled to receive damages as compensation for the lost bonus.

[61] On the second step, the question is whether the terms of the LTIP unambiguously limit or remove Mr. Matthews' common law right. It should be mentioned that the parties took opposing positions on the applicable standard of review for questions related to the interpretation of the LTIP. Both parties relied on Ledcor Construction Ltd. v. Northbridge Indemnity Insurance Co., 2016 SCC 37, [2016] 2 S.C.R. 23. For his part, Mr. Matthews argued that the trial judge's interpretation should be reviewed for palpable and overriding error. Ocean, in contrast, said that the standard of review should be correctness, relying on the standard form contract exception described in Ledcor. Ocean stressed that there is no evidence that Mr. Matthews negotiated the relevant terms, and that the LTIP applies to multiple employees.

[62] I am careful to note that the trial judge did not find that this was a commonly-used standard form agreement. In Ledcor, the Court was tasked with interpreting a standard form agreement commonly used in the insurance industry, where "consistency [in interpretation] is particularly important" (para. 40). Justice Wagner explained that, given that standard form contracts are those that are so widely used that the "interpretation of the . . . contract could affect many people" (at para. 39), a standard form exception is appropriate. This case is different: the only relevant finding by the trial judge on this issue is that it was "a limited number of executives" that were affected by the LTIP (para. 61). In the end, however, it is not necessary to decide whether or not the LTIP was truly a standard form contract in this case, [60] Qui plus est, en réponse à une question de l'un de mes collègues lors de l'audience, l'avocate d'Ocean a reconnu que M. Matthews aurait fort bien pu avoir droit au paiement prévu par le RILT en l'absence des clauses 2.03 et 2.05. Je suis donc convaincu que, au terme de la première étape, M. Matthews a droit, à première vue, de recevoir des dommages-intérêts à titre de dédommagement pour la prime qu'il a perdue.

[61] À la deuxième étape, la question consiste à se demander si les modalités du RILT ont pour effet de limiter ou de supprimer clairement le droit que confère la common law à M. Matthews. Il convient de mentionner que les parties ont avancé des thèses opposées en ce qui a trait à la norme de contrôle applicable aux questions liées à l'interprétation du RILT. Les deux parties ont invoqué l'arrêt Ledcor Construction Ltd. c. Société d'assurance d'indemnisation Northbridge, 2016 CSC 37, [2016] 2 R.C.S. 23. Pour sa part, M. Matthews a plaidé que l'interprétation du juge de première instance devait être contrôlée afin de déterminer si elle renferme des erreurs manifestes et déterminantes. À l'opposé, s'appuyant sur l'exception relative au contrat type qui est décrite dans l'arrêt Ledcor, Ocean a soutenu que la norme de contrôle applicable était celle de la décision correcte. Elle a insisté sur le fait qu'il n'y a aucune preuve indiquant que M. Matthews aurait négocié les modalités pertinentes du RILT, et que ce régime s'applique à de nombreux employés.

[62] Je prends bonne note du fait que le juge de première instance n'a pas conclu que le RILT était un contrat type couramment utilisé. Dans l'arrêt Ledcor, la Cour était appelée à interpréter un contrat type qui est couramment utilisé dans le secteur des assurances, où « la constance [dans l'interprétation] revêt une importance particulière » (par. 40). Le juge Wagner a expliqué que, comme les contrats types sont largement utilisés et que « l'interprétation du contrat [. . .] peut toucher de nombreuses personnes » (par. 39), il convient d'appliquer une exception à l'égard des contrats types. La présente affaire est différente : la seule conclusion pertinente qu'a tirée le juge de première instance sur ce point est [TRADUCTION] « [qu']un nombre limité de cadres supérieurs » étaient visés par le RILT (par. 61). En since the trial judge did not consider one of the two main clauses at issue in this case, clause 2.05, which therefore must be interpreted in any event.

[63] Returning, then, to the main clauses at issue, which provide the following:

2.03 CONDITIONS PRECEDENT:

ONC shall have no obligation under this Agreement to the Employee unless on the date of a Realization Event the Employee is a full-time employee of ONC. For greater certainty, this Agreement shall be of no force and effect if the employee ceases to be an employee of ONC, regardless of whether the Employee resigns or is terminated, with or without cause.

2.05 GENERAL:

The Long Term Value Creation Bonus Plan does not have any current or future value other than on the date of a Realization Event and shall not be calculated as part of the Employee's compensation for any purpose, including in connection with the Employee's resignation or in any severance calculation.

[64] The question is not whether these terms are ambiguous but whether the wording of the plan unambiguously limits or removes the employee's common law rights (Paquette, at para. 31, citing Taggart, at paras. 12 and 19-22). Importantly, given that the LTIP is a "unilateral contract", in the sense that the parties did not negotiate its terms, the principle of contractual interpretation that clauses excluding or limiting liability will be strictly construed "applies with particular force" (Taggart, at para. 18, citing Hunter Engineering Co. v. Syncrude Canada Ltd., [1989] 1 S.C.R. 426, at p. 459). As this Court recognized in Tercon Contractors Ltd. v. British Columbia (Transportation and Highways), 2010 SCC 4, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 69, at para. 73, albeit in the commercial context, and cited here to underscore just this point, définitive, cependant, il n'est pas nécessaire en l'espèce de décider si le RILT était véritablement un contrat type, étant donné que le juge de première instance a omis de tenir compte de l'une des deux principales clauses litigieuses dans la présente affaire, soit la clause 2.05, qu'il faudra en conséquence interpréter de toute façon.

[63] Je reviens donc aux principales clauses litigieuses, qui sont rédigées ainsi :

[TRADUCTION]

2.03 CONDITIONS PRÉALABLES

ONC n'a, aux termes de la présente entente, aucune obligation envers l'employé à moins que ce dernier ne soit un employé à temps plein d'ONC lorsque survient l'événement déclencheur. Il est entendu que la présente entente est nulle et sans effet si l'employé cesse d'être un employé d'ONC, que ce soit parce qu'il démissionne ou parce qu'il est congédié, avec ou sans motif.

2.05 GÉNÉRALITÉS

Le Régime de primes pour la création de valeur à long terme n'a aucune valeur actuelle ou future si ce n'est à la date de l'événement déclencheur et la prime calculée et versée à l'employé ne doit pas être considérée comme faisant partie de la rémunération de ce dernier à quelque fin que ce soit, y compris en cas de démission de l'employé ou de calcul de toute indemnité de départ.

[64] Il ne s'agit pas de déterminer si ces modalités sont ambiguës, mais de savoir si le texte du régime a pour effet de limiter ou de supprimer clairement les droits que confère la common law à l'employé (Paquette, par. 31, citant Taggart, par. 12 et 19-22). Fait important, comme le RILT est un [TRADUCTION] « contrat unilatéral », en ce sens que les parties n'ont pas négocié ses modalités, le principe d'interprétation des contrats selon lequel les clauses d'exonération ou de limitation de responsabilité doivent recevoir une interprétation stricte [TRADUCTION] « s'applique avec une vigueur singulière » (Taggart, par. 18, citant Hunter Engineering Co. c. Syncrude Canada Ltée, [1989] 1 R.C.S. 426, p. 459). Comme l'a reconnu notre Cour dans Tercon Contractors Ltd. c. Colombie-Britannique (Transports et Voirie), sophisticated parties are able to draft clear and comprehensive exclusion clauses when they are minded to do so.

[65] To this end, the provisions of the agreement must be absolutely clear and unambiguous. So, language requiring an employee to be "full-time" or "active", such as clause 2.03, will not suffice to remove an employee's common law right to damages. After all, had Mr. Matthews been given proper notice, he would have been "full-time" or "actively employed" throughout the reasonable notice period (Paquette, at para. 33, citing Schumacher v. Toronto-Dominion Bank (1997), 147 D.L.R. (4th) 128 (Ont. C.J. (Gen. Div.)), at p. 184; see also para. 47; Lin, at para. 89). Indeed, the trial judge and the majority of the Court of Appeal agreed that an "active employment" requirement is not sufficient to limit an employee's damages (trial reasons, at para. 398; C.A. reasons, at para. 66).

[66] Similarly, where a clause purports to remove an employee's common law right to damages upon termination "with or without cause", such as clause 2.03, this language will not suffice. Here, Mr. Matthews suffered an unlawful termination since he was constructively dismissed without notice. As this Court held in Bauer v. Bank of Montreal, [1980] 2 S.C.R. 102, at p. 108, exclusion clauses "must clearly cover the exact circumstances which have arisen". So, in Mr. Matthews' case, the trial judge properly recognized that "[t]ermination without cause does not imply termination without notice" (para. 399; see also Veer v. Dover Corp. (Canada) Ltd. (1999), 120 O.A.C. 394, at para. 14; Lin, at para. 91). Yet, it bears repeating that, for the purpose of calculating wrongful dismissal damages, the employment contract is not treated as "terminated" until after the reasonable notice period expires. So,

2010 CSC 4, [2010] 1 R.C.S. 69, par. 73, décision rendue en contexte commercial, et qui est mentionnée en l'espèce uniquement pour souligner le point suivant : des parties expérimentées peuvent rédiger des clauses à la fois claires et exhaustives d'exonération lorsqu'elles entendent le faire.

[65] Pour cette raison, les dispositions de l'entente doivent être absolument claires et non ambiguës. Ainsi, une disposition exigeant qu'un employé soit un [TRADUCTION] « employé à temps plein » ou un « employé actif » de l'entreprise, comme l'exige la clause 2.03, ne sera pas suffisante pour supprimer le droit que confère la common law à un employé d'obtenir des dommages-intérêts. Après tout, si un préavis adéquat avait été donné à M. Matthews, ce dernier aurait été un « employé à temps plein » ou un « employé actif » de l'entreprise pendant la période de préavis raisonnable (Paquette, par. 33, citant Schumacher c. Toronto-Dominion Bank (1997), 147 D.L.R. (4th) 128 (C.J. Ont. (Div. gén.)), p. 184; voir également par. 47; Lin, par. 89). D'ailleurs, le juge de première instance et les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel ont reconnu qu'une condition stipulant que l'employé soit en situation [TRADUCTION] « [d']emploi actif » n'est pas suffisante pour limiter les dommages-intérêts auxquels un employé a droit (motifs de première instance, par. 398; motifs de la Cour d'appel, par. 66).

[66] De même, lorsqu'une clause vise à supprimer le droit qu'a un employé en vertu de la common law d'obtenir des dommages-intérêts lorsqu'il est congédié « avec ou sans motif », comme le prévoit la clause 2.03, une telle disposition ne sera pas suffisante. En l'espèce, M. Matthews a fait l'objet d'un congédiement illégal étant donné qu'il a été congédié de manière déguisée sans préavis. Comme l'a conclu notre Cour dans l'arrêt Bauer c. Banque de Montréal, [1980] 2 R.C.S. 102, p. 108, « il doit être évident que [les clauses d'exclusion] vise[nt] les circonstances exactes qui se présentent ». Par conséquent, dans le cas de M. Matthews, le juge de première instance a reconnu à juste titre [TRADUCTION] « [qu'un] congédiement sans motif n'implique pas un congédiement sans préavis » (par. 399; voir également Veer c. Dover Corp. (Canada) Ltd. (1999), 120 O.A.C. 394, par. 14; Lin, par. 91). Or, il even if the clause had expressly referred to an unlawful termination, in my view, this too would not unambiguously alter the employee's common law entitlement.

[67] I therefore agree with the trial judge that clause 2.03 does not unambiguously limit or remove Mr. Matthews' common law right. In my respectful view, the majority of the Court of Appeal erred in concluding otherwise.

[68] As mentioned, it is true that the trial judge did not expressly consider clause 2.05. The dissenting judge suggested this clause only prevents Mr. Matthews from seeking the bonus as part of his severance, and not part of a claim for wrongful dismissal damages. The majority disagreed, arguing there is no functional difference between severance and damages (paras. 120-21).

[69] I respectfully disagree with the majority of the Court of Appeal on this point. The trial judge did not use the LTIP to calculate severance; rather, he determined the quantum of damages that Mr. Matthews was entitled to under the common law following the constructive dismissal. As the dissenting judge explained in detail, severance and damages are distinct legal concepts. The primary purpose of providing reasonable notice (or damages in lieu thereof) is to protect employees by providing them an opportunity to seek alternative employment (see Wallace, at para. 120, per McLachlin J. (as she then was) dissenting, but not on this point). Severance pay, by contrast, "acts to compensate long-serving employees for their years of service and investment in the employer's business and for the special losses they suffer when their employment terminates", and is often provided convient de répéter que, pour les besoins du calcul du montant des dommages-intérêts à verser en cas de congédiement injustifié, le contrat de travail est considéré comme étant « résilié » uniquement après l'expiration de la période de préavis raisonnable. Par conséquent, même si la clause en question avait fait mention expressément d'un congédiement illégal, je suis d'avis qu'une telle disposition n'aurait pas non plus modifié clairement le droit que confère la common law à l'employé.

[67] Ainsi, à l'instar du juge de première instance, j'estime que la clause 2.03 n'a pas pour effet de limiter ou de supprimer clairement le droit que confère la common law à M. Matthews. Je suis respectueusement d'avis que les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel ont commis une erreur en tirant une conclusion différente.

[68] Comme je l'ai mentionné, il est vrai que le juge de première instance n'a pas explicitement examiné la clause 2.05. Le juge dissident a précisé que cette clause empêche seulement M. Matthews de demander que la prime fasse partie de son indemnité de départ, et non des dommages-intérêts pour congédiement injustifié qu'il réclame. Les juges majoritaires ont exprimé leur désaccord à cet égard, affirmant qu'il n'existe aucune différence, du point de vue de la fonction, entre une indemnité de départ et des dommages-intérêts (par. 120-121).

[69] Avec égards, je ne puis me rallier à l'opinion des juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel sur ce point. Le juge de première instance n'a pas utilisé le RILT pour calculer l'indemnité de départ; il a plutôt déterminé le montant des dommages-intérêts auxquels M. Matthews avait droit en vertu de la common law par suite de son congédiement déguisé. Comme l'a expliqué en détail le juge dissident, l'indemnité de départ et les dommages-intérêts sont des concepts juridiques distincts. Le principal objectif d'un préavis raisonnable (ou de dommages-intérêts en tenant lieu) est de protéger l'employé en lui fournissant l'occasion de se chercher un autre emploi (voir Wallace, par. 120, la juge McLachlin (plus tard juge en chef), dissidente, mais non sur ce point). En revanche, l'indemnité de cessation d'emploi « vient indemniser les employés ayant beaucoup d'années for in provincial employment standards legislation (Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 27, at para. 26).

[70] Moreover, clause 2.05 must be read as a whole; it also states that the LTIP "does not have any current or future value other than on the date of a Realization Event". If Mr. Matthews had been properly given notice of termination, he would have remained a full-time employee on the date of the Realization Event, and thus would have received an LTIP payment. His damages reflect that lost opportunity.

[71] In reaching a different conclusion regarding the interpretation of clauses 2.03 and 2.05, the majority judges relied on Styles from the Court of Appeal of Alberta. Ocean urges this Court to do the same. While this is not the occasion to examine the law in Alberta in depth, I allow myself the following observations.

[72] At issue in Styles was a similar question to the one here: was the employee, upon being terminated without cause, entitled to receive a payment under his employer's contractual long-term incentive plan? Upon termination, the employer paid the employee a lump sum payment equal to three months' salary pursuant to the terms of his employment contract (Styles v. Alberta Investment Corp., 2015 ABQB 621, [2016] 4 W.W.R. 593, at paras. 9 and 27, per Yungwirth J.). The bonus would not have vested until several years after the employee's termination (paras. 17-23). Consequently, the employee could not recover damages for a payment under the bonus in connection to the reasonable notice period. At a minimum, Styles is thus distinguishable from Mr. Matthews' case. The latter raises issues surrounding damages connected to the notice period, while the former does not.

de service pour ces années investies dans l'entreprise de l'employeur et pour les pertes spéciales qu'ils subissent lorsqu'ils sont licenciés », et elle est souvent prévue dans les lois provinciales sur les normes d'emploi (Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re), [1998] 1 R.C.S. 27, par. 26).

[70] En outre, la clause 2.05 doit être considérée globalement; elle précise également que le RILT « n'a aucune valeur actuelle ou future si ce n'est à la date de l'événement déclencheur ». Si M. Matthews avait reçu un préavis de congédiement adéquat, il aurait toujours été un employé à temps plein de l'entreprise à la date de l'événement déclencheur et il aurait alors reçu le paiement prévu par le RILT. Les dommages-intérêts qui lui ont été accordés tiennent compte de cette occasion manquée.

[71] Pour arriver à une conclusion différente quant à l'interprétation des clauses 2.03 et 2.05, les juges majoritaires se sont appuyés sur l'arrêt Styles de la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta. Ocean exhorte notre Cour à faire de même. Bien que le présent pourvoi ne soit pas l'occasion d'examiner en profondeur les règles de droit applicables en Alberta, je me permets de faire les observations qui suivent.

[72] Dans l'arrêt Styles, la question en litige était similaire à celle qui se pose en l'espèce : après avoir été congédié sans motif, l'employé avait-il le droit de recevoir un paiement en vertu du régime d'intéressement à long terme de son employeur? Après le congédiement, l'employeur a versé à l'employé un paiement forfaitaire correspondant à trois mois de salaire conformément aux modalités de son contrat de travail (Styles c. Alberta Investment Corp., 2015 ABQB 621, [2016] 4 W.W.R. 593, par. 9 et 27, la juge Yungwirth). La prime n'aurait été acquise au profit de l'employé que plusieurs années après son congédiement (par. 17-23). Par conséquent, l'employé ne pouvait pas obtenir des dommages-intérêts pour la prime qui lui aurait été versée pendant la période de préavis raisonnable. À tout le moins, l'affaire Styles se distingue donc de cette façon du cas de M. Matthews. En effet, la situation de ce dernier soulève des questions concernant les dommages-intérêts liés à la période de préavis, alors que ce n'est pas le cas dans l'arrêt Styles.

[73] It also bears noting that the Court of Appeal of Alberta in Styles suggested that Paquette, one of the cases I rely on here, is premised upon an erroneous reading of this Court's decision in Sylvester v. British Columbia, [1997] 2 S.C.R. 315. In Styles, the Court of Appeal noted that "[t]he common law implies a term of reasonable notice, or pay in lieu, in those circumstances. The payment in lieu is not 'damages' for a breach of the contract, but rather one component of the compensation provided for in the contract. If an employer fails to give proper notice or pay in lieu, the breach is in the failure to pay, not in the termination" (para. 34 (footnote omitted)). The Court of Appeal then observed that "[t]here are decisions from other jurisdictions that treat termination as a breach, but they do not reflect the law of Alberta: see for example [Paquette]. Paquette relies on the dictum in [Sylvester], at para. 1, but para. 15 of that decision confirms that it is the non-payment that is the breach, not the termination itself" (para. 34, fn. 1).

[74] On my reading, this Court in Sylvester confirmed that "[d]amages for wrongful dismissal are designed to compensate the employee for the breach by the employer of the implied term in the employment contract to provide reasonable notice of termination" (para. 15 (emphasis added)). Authority elsewhere confirms this same idea: there is no such implied term of the contract to provide payment in lieu (see, e.g., Love v. Acuity Investment Management Inc., 2011 ONCA 130, 277 O.A.C. 15, at para. 44).[3]

[73] Il convient également de souligner que la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta, dans l'affaire Styles, a indiqué que l'arrêt Paquette, l'un des arrêts sur lesquels je m'appuie en l'espèce, repose sur une interprétation erronée de la décision de notre Cour dans Sylvester c. Colombie-Britannique, [1997] 2 R.C.S. 315. Dans l'arrêt Styles, la Cour d'appel a fait remarquer [TRADUCTION] « [qu'il] existe en common law une condition tacite selon laquelle un préavis raisonnable, ou une indemnité en tenant lieu, doit être fourni dans ces circonstances. L'indemnité tenant lieu de préavis raisonnable ne constitue pas des "dommages-intérêts" pour violation du contrat, mais plutôt une portion de l'indemnité prévue au contrat. Si un employeur ne donne pas un préavis adéquat ou une indemnité en tenant lieu, la violation réside dans le non-paiement d'une indemnité et non dans le congédiement » (par. 34 (note en bas de page omise)). La Cour d'appel a ensuite souligné que, [TRADUCTION] « [d]ans certaines décisions rendues dans d'autres ressorts, le congédiement est considéré comme une violation, mais ces décisions ne reflètent pas le droit albertain : voir, par exemple [Paquette]. Dans cet arrêt, le tribunal s'appuie sur la remarque incidente formulée dans [Sylvester], au par. 1, mais le par. 15 de cette décision confirme que c'est le non-paiement qui constitue la violation, et non le congédiement lui-même » (par. 34, note 1).

[74] Selon mon interprétation, notre Cour a confirmé dans l'arrêt Sylvester que « [l]es dommages-intérêts versés pour congédiement injustifié visent à indemniser l'employé à l'égard de la violation par l'employeur de la condition implicite du contrat d'emploi selon laquelle ce dernier doit donner à l'employé un préavis raisonnable de cessation d'emploi » (par. 15 (je souligne)). Cette même idée est d'ailleurs confirmée par d'autres sources dans d'autres ressorts : le contrat ne comporte aucune condition implicite selon laquelle l'employeur doit verser une indemnité tenant lieu de préavis (voir, p. ex., Love c. Acuity Investment Management Inc., 2011 ONCA 130, 277 O.A.C. 15, par. 44)[3].

[75] As explained by the Court of Appeal for British Columbia in Dunlop v. B.C. Hydro & Power Authority (1988), 32 B.C.L.R. (2d) 334, at pp. 338-39, there are three principal reasons why this is an important distinction. First, there are issues surrounding the complexity of an implied term to provide pay in lieu of notice, and whether such a term can readily be implied into an employment contract. Second, implying a term to provide pay in lieu of notice "would mean that if an employer elected to give pay in lieu of notice, the employer would be complying with the contract and not breaking it", and thus "the contract would require the full payment to be made immediately". Third, if the employer elected to invoke such an implied term and gave no notice of termination, "there would be no obligation on the part of the employee to mitigate damages by seeking other employment" since the term requires a payment in full without regard to the employee's actual losses. Ensuring that courts and litigants properly understand this distinction is thus important as it can profoundly affect employees' financial lives. To the extent that some cases suggest otherwise, I respectfully disagree.

[76] Finally, at this stage of the analysis, it may also be appropriate in certain cases to examine whether the clauses purporting to limit or take away an employee's common law right were adequately brought to the employee's attention (Paquette, at para. 18; Taggart, at paras. 20-23; Poole v. Whirlpool Corp., 2011 ONCA 808, 97 C.C.E.L. (3d) 20, at paras. 5-6). This issue, however, does not arise on these facts. Moreover, as several interveners commented on in this appeal, it may be appropriate to question whether the clause at issue is compatible with minimum employment standards (Machtinger, at p. 1004). This issue was not canvassed by the courts below and, in the present circumstances, it is unnecessary to explore further.

[75] Comme l'a expliqué la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique dans l'arrêt Dunlop c. B.C. Hydro & Power Authority (1988), 32 B.C.L.R. (2d) 334, p. 338-339, il y a trois raisons principales pour lesquelles cette distinction est importante. Premièrement, il existe des difficultés liées à la complexité d'une condition implicite prévoyant le versement du salaire en lieu et place d'un préavis, et à la question de savoir s'il est facile de dégager implicitement une telle condition d'un contrat de travail. Deuxièmement, le fait de dégager l'existence d'une telle condition implicite [TRADUCTION] « signifierait que, si un employeur choisissait de verser le salaire au lieu de donner un préavis, il respecterait alors le contrat et ne le violerait pas », et, pour cette raison, « le contrat exigerait le plein paiement du salaire immédiatement ». Troisièmement, si l'employeur choisissait d'appliquer une telle condition implicite et ne donnait pas de préavis de cessation d'emploi, [TRADUCTION] « l'employé ne serait pas tenu de limiter son préjudice en cherchant un autre emploi », étant donné que cette condition requiert le plein paiement du salaire sans égard aux pertes réelles subies par l'employé. Il est donc important que les tribunaux et les parties comprennent bien cette distinction, car elle peut affecter profondément la situation financière des employés. Dans la mesure où certaines décisions suggèrent le contraire, je dois, avec égards, exprimer mon désaccord.

[76] Enfin, à cette étape de l'analyse, il peut également être opportun, dans certains cas, de se demander si les clauses visant à limiter ou supprimer le droit que confère la common law à un employé ont été adéquatement portées à son attention (Paquette, par. 18; Taggart, par. 20-23; Poole c. Whirlpool Corp., 2011 ONCA 808, 97 C.C.E.L. (3d) 20, par. 5-6). Toutefois, cette question ne se soulève pas en l'espèce. De plus, comme l'ont fait remarquer plusieurs intervenants dans le cadre du présent pourvoi, il peut être approprié de se demander si la clause en litige est compatible avec les normes d'emploi minimales (Machtinger, p. 1004). Cette question n'a pas été examinée par les juridictions inférieures et, dans les circonstances de l'espèce, il n'est pas nécessaire de s'y attarder davantage.

[77] In sum, I agree with the trial judge that Mr. Matthews is entitled to receive damages equal to what he would have received pursuant to the LTIP, subject to mitigation.

(2) Good Faith

[78] Again, and I say so respectfully, the parties' arguments on good faith were confounding when placed side by side. Mr. Matthews focused largely on the duty of honest performance, and confirmed at the hearing that he is not seeking damages for mental distress flowing from a breach of the duty to exercise good faith in the manner of dismissal, noting that this "just doesn't get him there" in respect of the LTIP (transcript, at p. 17). Ocean, in contrast, defended the conclusion of the Court of Appeal that there was "no bad faith" in "the manner in which [Mr. Matthews] was treated", recalling specifically the trial judge's finding that Mr. Matthews had failed to show that Ocean had planned to terminate him in order to deprive him of his LTIP entitlement (see para. 122).

[79] Ocean is no doubt correct on this very last point. That said, and contrary to the succinct conclusion of the majority judges in the Court of Appeal, I share Mr. Matthews' view that the trial judge did make abundantly clear that the treatment experienced by Mr. Matthews from 2007 until the moment of his departure constituted dishonest conduct on the part of Ocean. He found, as a matter of fact, that Ocean's senior manager undertook a four-year "campaign", characterized by lies and dishonesty, to push Mr. Matthews out of operations (see, e.g., paras. 294, 296, 298 and 301).

[80] The trial judge did not, however, explicitly find a breach of contract resulting from this dishonesty.

[77] En résumé, je suis d'accord avec le juge de première instance pour conclure que M. Matthews a droit à des dommages-intérêts correspondant au paiement qu'il aurait reçu en vertu du RILT, déduction faite des sommes découlant de l'atténuation des dommages.

(2) Bonne foi

[78] Une fois de plus, je tiens à souligner, toujours avec égards, que les arguments des parties sur la bonne foi étaient déroutants lorsque considérés côte à côte. En effet, M. Matthews s'est essentiellement attaché à l'obligation d'exécution honnête, et il a confirmé, lors de l'audience, qu'il ne réclame pas de dommages-intérêts pour les souffrances morales susceptibles de découler d'un manquement à l'obligation d'agir de bonne foi dans la façon de procéder à un congédiement, faisant remarquer que cela [TRADUCTION] « ne le rapproche tout simplement pas de son objectif » en ce qui concerne le RILT (transcription, p. 17). Ocean, quant à elle, a défendu la conclusion de la Cour d'appel selon laquelle [TRADUCTION] « la manière dont [M. Matthews] avait été traité » n'avait été entachée d'« aucune mauvaise foi », rappelant précisément la conclusion du juge de première instance portant que M. Matthews n'avait pas été en mesure d'établir qu'Ocean avait planifié son renvoi afin de le priver de son droit au paiement prévu par le RILT (voir par. 122).

[79] Il ne fait aucun doute qu'Ocean a raison sur ce tout dernier point. Cela dit, contrairement à la conclusion succincte des juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel, je partage l'opinion de M. Matthews selon laquelle le juge de première instance a très clairement indiqué que la façon dont il a été traité de 2007 jusqu'au moment de son départ constituait une conduite malhonnête de la part d'Ocean. Le juge a tiré une conclusion de fait portant que le cadre supérieur d'Ocean avait mené pendant quatre ans une « campagne » afin d'écarter M. Matthews des opérations et que cette période avait été marquée par la malhonnêteté et le mensonge (voir, p. ex., par. 294, 296, 298 et 301).

[80] Le juge de première instance n'a toutefois pas conclu explicitement que cette malhonnêteté avait

He did not speak to the duty of honest performance, likely because — given that the original pleadings were filed before Bhasin's release — Bhasin was not pleaded at trial. Nor did he pursue an analysis, in accordance with Wallace and Keays, to determine whether this dishonesty amounted to a breach of the duty to exercise good faith in the manner of dismissal. One suspects this too reflected the character of the pleadings, since no compensatory damages for mental distress flowing from Mr. Matthews' treatment in the manner of his dismissal were pursued.

[81] On this latter point, I would take this opportunity to recall that, had the issue been properly placed before the trial judge, it was certainly within the trial judge's prerogative to tie the dishonesty that occurred over the four-year period to the "manner of dismissal". Due to the circumstances in Wallace and Keays, "in the manner of dismissal" was originally conceptualized as the moment of dismissal, suggesting to some degree that good faith must exist only at the very end of the employment relationship. Yet, circumstances of constructive dismissal show that this reading sometimes needs to be extended. Following Potter, an employee's constructive dismissal may be better understood as the consequence of conduct over a series of events in time, and not just a tipping point. On this reading, Potter extends the notion of "in the manner of dismissal" to encompass circumstances in which termination stems from an employee's decision to leave their job brought about, as here, by a series of events that predate the actual moment of the parting of ways between employer and employee (paras. 31-35). The constructive dismissal may, depending on the facts of a given case, reflect a choice to leave prompted by a series of changes to the employee's working conditions over time, absent any misconduct. Or a constructive dismissal may reflect a choice to leave where dishonest or like misconduct eventually pushes the employee out the door. In the latter circumstance, this suggests that, at least retrospectively, the duty is relevant to the performance of the contract prior to the moment of termination.

entraîné une violation du contrat. Il n'a pas traité de l'obligation d'exécution honnête, vraisemblablement parce que — comme les premiers actes de procédure ont été déposés avant que l'arrêt Bhasin ne soit rendu — cette décision n'a pas été plaidée au procès. Le juge de première instance n'a pas non plus procédé, sur la base des arrêts Wallace et Keays, à une analyse en vue de déterminer si cette conduite malhonnête constituait un manquement à l'obligation d'agir de bonne foi dans la façon de procéder au congédiement. On peut supposer que cela découle de la teneur des actes de procédure, en ce qu'aucune demande de dommages-intérêts compensatoires n'a été présentée pour les souffrances morales découlant du traitement réservé à M. Matthews par suite de la façon dont il a été congédié.

[81] Relativement à ce dernier point, je profite de l'occasion pour rappeler que, si la question avait été soumise adéquatement au juge de première instance, il lui aurait certes été loisible de rattacher les gestes malhonnêtes survenus au cours de la période de quatre ans aux « circonstances du congédiement ». Compte tenu des circonstances dans lesquelles les arrêts Wallace et Keays ont été rendus, l'expression « circonstances du congédiement » a initialement été interprétée comme visant le moment du congédiement, ce qui tendait dans une certaine mesure à suggérer que la bonne foi était requise uniquement à la toute fin de la relation d'emploi. Or, les situations de congédiement déguisé montrent que cette conception doit parfois être élargie. À la suite de l'arrêt Potter, il est sans doute plus juste de considérer le congédiement déguisé d'un employé comme étant la conséquence d'une série d'événements échelonnés dans le temps plutôt que comme un seul et unique moment décisif. D'après cette interprétation, l'arrêt Potter élargit la notion de « circonstances du congédiement » aux situations où une cessation d'emploi découle de la décision d'un employé de quitter son emploi en raison d'une suite d'événements survenus avant le moment concret où la relation employeur-employé a été rompue, comme c'est le cas en l'espèce (par. 31-35). Il peut arriver que, selon les faits propres à une affaire donnée, le congédiement déguisé reflète la décision d'un employé de quitter son emploi en raison de nombreuses modifications apportées aux conditions de son emploi au fil du

Indeed, there is no coherent reason why the measure of misconduct cannot be understood retrospectively in cases of wrongful dismissal "so long as it is 'a component of the manner of dismissal'" (Doyle v. Zochem Inc., 2017 ONCA 130, 31 C.C.P.B. (2nd) 200, at para. 13, citing Gismondi v. Toronto (City) (2003), 64 O.R. (3d) 688 (C.A.), at para. 23).

[82] In recognizing this, Potter affirmed what courts were already doing: examining the employment relationship retrospectively, and thus implicitly finding that good faith is owed not merely at the very end of the relationship. As Professor England has observed, courts have frequently examined whether employers treated their employees with good faith in constructive dismissal cases by, for example, ensuring employees were safeguarded from bullying, intimidation, and harassment from managers and other employers (Individual Employment Law (2nd ed. 2008), at pp. 92-93). This extension in Potter thus allowed for a more flexible measure of conduct over the period leading up to the moment of actual termination of the employment contract.[4]

[83] I would not, however, say anything further on how Bhasin, on the one hand, and Wallace and Keays, on the other, apply to this case. It suffices to say that a contractual breach of good faith rests on a wholly distinct basis from that relating to the failure to provide reasonable notice. I say this on the basis of my proposed conclusion above, with respect to Mr. Matthews' financial claim for breach temps, sans qu'il y ait eu de conduite répréhensible. Par ailleurs, un congédiement déguisé peut également refléter la décision d'un employé de quitter son travail lorsqu'une conduite malhonnête ou une autre action répréhensible l'a finalement poussé à le faire. Dans ce dernier cas, on pourrait croire que, rétrospectivement à tout le moins, l'obligation s'applique à l'exécution du contrat avant sa résiliation. De fait, il n'existe aucune raison cohérente pour que la conduite répréhensible ne puisse pas être considérée rétrospectivement dans les affaires de congédiement injustifié, [TRADUCTION] « pourvu qu'elle constitue un "aspect des circonstances du congédiement" » de l'employé (Doyle c. Zochem Inc., 2017 ONCA 130, 31 C.C.P.B. (2nd) 200, par. 13, citant Gismondi c. Toronto (City) (2003), 64 O.R. (3d) 688 (C.A.), par. 23).

[82] En reconnaissant ceci dans l'arrêt Potter, la Cour a confirmé ce que les tribunaux faisaient déjà, en ce qu'ils examinaient la relation d'emploi de façon rétrospective et concluaient ainsi implicitement que l'obligation d'agir de bonne foi ne s'applique pas uniquement à la toute fin de la relation. Comme l'a fait observer le professeur England, les tribunaux sont souvent appelés à se demander, dans les cas de congédiement déguisé, si les employeurs ont traité leurs employés de bonne foi, par exemple en veillant à ce que ceux-ci ne soient pas victimes d'intimidation ou de harcèlement de la part de gestionnaires ou de collègues (Individual Employment Law (2e éd. 2008), p. 92-93). Cet élargissement dans Potter des principes applicables a donc accordé plus de souplesse en étendant l'appréciation de la conduite à la période précédant le moment concret où le contrat de travail a été résilié[4].

[83] Je ne me prononcerai toutefois pas davantage sur la manière dont l'arrêt Bhasin, d'une part, et les arrêts Wallace et Keays, d'autre part, s'appliquent à la présente espèce. Qu'il suffise de dire qu'un manquement à l'obligation contractuelle d'agir de bonne foi repose sur des fondements entièrement distincts de ceux liés à l'omission de donner un préavis raisonnable. J'affirme cela en m'appuyant of the implied duty to provide reasonable notice. At the hearing, counsel for Mr. Matthews acknowledged that, if he received damages to compensate him for his lost LTIP payment as part of his reasonable notice damages, he cannot now claim the same amount under the Hadley principle. While the breaches of contract are indeed distinct, they cannot be deployed to provide what amounts to double recovery. Moreover, Mr. Matthews drew the Court's attention to the anxiety caused by Ocean, but made no request for damages for mental distress. As noted, while he originally claimed for punitive damages at trial, he did not pursue this head of damages on appeal. Given that Mr. Matthews failed to press his claim with further detail or argument, even when questioned on point by members of the Court, I need not go further to decide whether some duty of good faith has been breached, since no further remedies are being sought.

sur la conclusion que j'ai proposée précédemment à l'égard de la demande de réparation pécuniaire présentée par M. Matthews pour manquement à l'obligation tacite de donner un préavis raisonnable. À l'audience, l'avocat de M. Matthews a reconnu que, si les dommages-intérêts qui sont accordés à ce dernier pour l'absence de préavis raisonnable incluent des dommages-intérêts le compensant pour la perte du paiement prévu par le RILT, M. Matthews ne saurait réclamer maintenant ce même paiement suivant le principe établi dans l'arrêt Hadley. Bien qu'il s'agisse de violations de contrat distinctes, elles ne peuvent être appliquées pour accorder une réparation qui équivaudrait à une double indemnité. Qui plus est, si M. Matthews a attiré l'attention de notre Cour sur l'angoisse causée par Ocean, il n'a pas demandé de dommages-intérêts pour souffrances morales. Comme il a été mentionné plus tôt, quoique M. Matthews ait initialement réclamé des dommages-intérêts punitifs au procès, il n'a pas fait valoir ce chef de réclamation en appel. Étant donné que M. Matthews n'a pas fourni de détails ou d'arguments supplémentaires à cet égard, même lorsqu'il a été interrogé sur ce point par des juges de notre Cour, il n'est pas nécessaire que je m'y attarde davantage pour décider s'il y a eu manquement à une obligation de bonne foi, aucune réparation additionnelle n'étant réclamée.

[84] Further, I note that Mr. Matthews and several interveners argue that the general organizing principle of good faith described in Bhasin manifests itself in various ways throughout the whole of the contractual performance. Ocean answers that any extension of good faith would be an unwieldy precedent.

[84] De plus, je souligne que M. Matthews et plusieurs intervenants prétendent que le principe directeur général de bonne foi décrit dans l'arrêt Bhasin se manifeste de diverses façons tout au long de l'exécution du contrat. Pour sa part, Ocean affirme que tout élargissement de l'obligation de bonne foi créerait un précédent peu facile à appliquer.

[85] Mr. Matthews' argument is a serious one. Not all mistreatment by an employer will result in a constructive dismissal — some employees, for financial or other reasons, might choose not to leave their job. It might be that, as argued by various parties in this appeal, a duty of good faith will one day bind the employer based on a mutual obligation of loyalty in a non-fiduciary sense during the life of the employment contract, owed reciprocally by both the employer and employee. I recognize, however, that

[85] L'argument de M. Matthews est important. Le traitement incorrect réservé à un employé par son employeur ne se traduit pas dans tous les cas par un congédiement déguisé — il peut arriver que, pour des raisons financières ou autres, l'employé concerné décide de ne pas quitter son emploi. Il se pourrait, comme l'ont soutenu diverses parties au présent pourvoi, que les employeurs soient un jour tenus pendant la durée du contrat de travail à un devoir de bonne foi basé sur une obligation mutuelle whether the law should recognize this is a matter of fair debate.

[86] This is a dismissal case. In light of the comment in Bhasin (at para. 40) that the common law should develop in an incremental fashion, I would decline to decide whether a broader duty exists during the life of the employment contract in the absence of an appropriate factual record.

[87] Lastly, I recall that in his original application, Mr. Matthews sought a declaration that the termination of his employment reflected conduct on the part of Ocean that was oppressive and unfair, and that his dismissal was "carried out in bad faith at law and in breach of [Ocean's] duty of good faith". I recognize that, generally speaking, the mental distress that an employee might feel as a result of employer dishonesty is translated by law, in financial terms, as damages, and that, further, Mr. Matthews has declined to seek such damages here. Nevertheless, a proper acknowledgment that an employer's conduct was contrary to the expected standard of good faith can transcend the request for damages, and may be meaningful for an employee in a way that a mere finding that reasonable notice was provided cannot. One aspect of this relates to dignity in the workplace, and the non-financial value associated with fair treatment upon dismissal (J. Fudge, "The Limits of Good Faith in the Contract of Employment: From Addis to Vorvis to Wallace and Back Again?" (2007), 32 Queen's L.J. 529, at p. 548; G. Anderson, D. Brodie and J. Riley, The Common Law Employment Relationship: A Comparative Study (2017), at ch. 11). Indeed, this Court has been emphatic in recognizing that, in addition to whatever financial dimension work entails, a person's employment is "an essential component of [their] sense of identity, self-worth and emotional well-being" (Reference re Public Service Employee Relations Act (Alta.), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 313, at p. 368). To this end, it is understandable that employees seek some recognition that they have been mistreated, reflecting that they feel it unfair, beyond de loyauté, au sens non fiduciaire de ce terme, devoir liant réciproquement l'employeur et l'employé. Je reconnais toutefois que la question de savoir si ce principe devrait être reconnu en droit suscite des débats légitimes.

[86] Il s'agit en l'espèce d'une affaire de congédiement. Compte tenu de l'observation formulée dans l'arrêt Bhasin (par. 40) selon laquelle la common law doit évoluer de manière progressive, je m'abstiens, en l'absence d'un dossier factuel adéquat, de me prononcer sur l'existence d'une obligation de portée plus large pendant la durée du contrat de travail.

[87] Enfin, je rappelle que, dans sa demande initiale, M. Matthews sollicitait une déclaration indiquant que la cessation de son emploi résultait de la conduite abusive et injuste d'Ocean à son endroit, et que son congédiement avait été [TRADUCTION] « effectué de mauvaise foi au sens de la loi et en contravention à l'obligation [d'Ocean] d'agir de bonne foi ». Je reconnais que, de manière générale, les souffrances morales que pourrait éprouver un employé en raison de la conduite malhonnête de l'employeur se traduisent en droit, sur le plan financier, par des dommages-intérêts, et que, en outre, M. Matthews s'est abstenu de réclamer de tels dommages-intérêts en l'espèce. Néanmoins, une reconnaissance formelle que la conduite d'un employeur a contrevenu à la norme de la bonne foi attendue peut transcender la présentation d'une demande en dommages-intérêts, et pourrait avoir pour l'employé concerné une valeur significative que ne saurait avoir à ses yeux une simple conclusion qu'un préavis raisonnable a été donné. Cela découle notamment de la dignité à laquelle aspirent les employés au sein de leur milieu de travail et de la valeur non financière qu'ils associent au fait d'être traités équitablement en cas de congédiement (J. Fudge, « The Limits of Good Faith in the Contract of Employment : From Addis to Vorvis to Wallace and Back Again? » (2007), 32 Queen's L.J. 529, p. 548; G. Anderson, D. Brodie et J. Riley, The Common Law Employment Relationship : A Comparative Study (2017), ch. 11). D'ailleurs, notre Cour a clairement reconnu qu'en plus de la dimension financière qu'il présente, l'emploi est « une composante essentielle du sens de l'identité d'une any compensatory matter, that they were forced to quit in such circumstances.

[88] Regrettably, Mr. Matthews gave no explanation as to what basis this Court would make a formal declaration in these circumstances. I would refrain from making a declaration of a contractual breach related to good faith in the formal sense. Nonetheless, I would observe that it is clear from the findings at trial Mr. Matthews was mistreated and lied to about the security of his future with the company in the years leading up to his constructive dismissal in a manner that contributed to making his job intolerable. Compensation during the reasonable notice period does not speak to this. While it may not result in further remedies in this case, it is not inappropriate to recall that the "non-monetary benefit" (Potter, at para. 84) derived from the performance of work can be wrongly taken from employees if, at dismissal, they are lied to or misled as to the reasons for termination.

V. Conclusion

[89] For the foregoing reasons, I would allow the appeal, set aside the judgment of the Court of Appeal and restore the judgment of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, with costs throughout.

Appeal allowed with costs throughout.

personne, de sa valorisation et de son bien-être sur le plan émotionnel » (Renvoi relatif à la Public Service Employee Relations Act (Alb.), [1987] 1 R.C.S. 313, p. 368). Pour cette raison, il est compréhensible que des employés demandent qu'on reconnaisse qu'ils ont été traités de façon incorrecte, ce qui reflète le fait qu'ils estiment injuste, indépendamment des aspects financiers d'une telle situation, d'avoir été forcés de quitter leur emploi en pareilles circonstances.

[88] Malheureusement, M. Matthews n'a pas expliqué sur quel fondement notre Cour devrait s'appuyer pour prononcer une déclaration formelle dans les présentes circonstances. Je m'abstiendrais donc de prononcer formellement une déclaration portant qu'il y a eu manquement à l'obligation contractuelle d'agir de bonne foi. Je ferais néanmoins observer qu'il ressort clairement des conclusions tirées au procès que M. Matthews a été traité de façon incorrecte et qu'on lui a menti à l'égard de sa sécurité d'emploi future dans l'entreprise au cours des années ayant précédé son congédiement déguisé, et ce, d'une manière qui a contribué à créer une situation intolérable pour lui au travail. La rémunération versée pendant la période de préavis raisonnable ne tient pas compte de cela. Bien que l'observation susmentionnée ne se traduise pas par une réparation additionnelle en l'espèce, il n'est pas inapproprié de rappeler que « l'avantage non pécuniaire » (Potter, par. 84) qu'un salarié tire de l'exécution de son travail peut lui être retiré injustement si, en cas de congédiement, on lui ment et on le trompe quant aux raisons pour lesquelles on met fin à son emploi.

V. Conclusion

[89] Pour les motifs qui précèdent, je suis d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi, d'écarter l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel et de rétablir le jugement de la Cour suprême de la Nouvelle-Écosse, le tout avec dépens devant toutes les cours.

COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO

CITATION: Mikelsteins v. Morrison Hershfield Limited, 2019 ONCA 515
DATE: 20190620
DOCKET: C66315

Lauwers, Fairburn and Nordheimer JJ.A.

BETWEEN

Ivars Mikelsteins

Plaintiff (Respondent)

and

Morrison Hershfield Limited

Defendant (Appellant)

David Greenwood, for the appellant

James Heeney and Julia Burke, for the respondent

Heard: June 12, 2019

On appeal from the judgment of Justice Shaun Nakatsuru of the Superior Court of Justice, dated November 22, 2018, with reasons reported at 2018 ONSC 6952.

Nordheimer J.A.:

[1] The appellant Morrison Hershfield Limited ("MHL") appeals from the partial summary judgment awarding the respondent Ivars Mikelsteins, a former employee of MHL, an increase in the value of shares that he held in the parent corporation of MHL, along with a share bonus, through the period of reasonable notice.

Background

[2] MHL is an employee-owned engineering firm that provides engineering and construction consulting services. Mr. Mikelsteins was employed by MHL for 31 years, most recently in the position of Director, Business Development. On October 26, 2017, Mr. Mikelsteins was notified in writing that his employment was being terminated without cause, effective immediately.

[3] Mr. Mikelsteins commenced an action for wrongful dismissal. He then brought a motion for summary judgment. In granting partial summary judgment, the motion judge awarded Mr. Mikelsteins damages for wrongful dismissal based on a notice period of 26 months. Since partial summary judgment was being awarded prior to the expiration of the notice period, the motion judge reserved to himself any challenge that MHL might wish to bring, in the future, regarding Mr. Mikelsteins' mitigation efforts. None of those determinations are being appealed.

[4] The motion judge also made a determination regarding the value that Mr. Mikelsteins was entitled to be paid for the shares that he held in MHL's parent corporation, along with his entitlement to a share bonus. Those determinations are the subject of this appeal.

[5] Mr. Mikelsteins was one of a select group of MHL employees who were eligible to purchase shares of MHL's parent corporation, Morrison Hershfield Group Inc. Those shares were governed by the terms and conditions of the Amended and Restated Morrison Hershfield Group Inc. Shareholders' Agreement, dated January 18, 2013 (the "Shareholders' Agreement"). At the time that his employment was terminated, Mr. Mikelsteins owned a total of 5,108 shares.

[6] Under the terms of the Shareholders' Agreement, Mr. Mikelsteins and other shareholders were eligible to receive annual "Share Bonuses". The share bonus payable in respect of each share is determined by an objective calculation based on the company's financial results. As a result, the total share bonus payable to each shareholder depends on the total number of shares that the shareholder had previously decided to purchase. The share bonus is not related to the shareholder's contributions as an employee of MHL. It is, in effect, a dividend.

[7] With respect to Mr. Mikelsteins' shareholdings, the motion judge determined that he was entitled to: (i) hold the shares until the end of the reasonable notice period (i.e. 26 months after he was notified of his termination and his association with MHL had ceased); and (ii) receive damages for the loss of the share bonus that would have been payable during such 26 month period.

[8] Article 3 of the Shareholders' Agreement deals with "Automatic Transfer Notices", and applies in situations where, among other things, a shareholder resigns, is terminated, becomes bankrupt, or dies. Article 3.2 applies in cases of termination, and states:

> A Shareholder whose association with the Corporation and its Affiliates ceases by reason of termination by the Corporation of his/her employment with the Corporation and its Affiliates shall, immediately after such termination, be deemed to have given a Transfer Notice covering all of the Shares held by him/her on a date which is 30 days from the date he/she is notified of such termination by the Corporation.

The Shareholders' Agreement proceeds to specify that a shareholder that is deemed to have given a Transfer Notice under Article 3 is entitled to the "Fair Value" of his or her shares (as that term is defined in the Shareholders' Agreement).

[9] MHL takes the position that Mr. Mikelsteins' association with it had ceased by reason of the termination of his employment on October 26, 2017, which became the "trigger" date for purposes of the above provision. In accordance with that position, MHL paid Mr. Mikelsteins the sum of $999,431.28 (representing the "Fair Value" of his shares on November 25, 2017, which is 30 days from October 26, 2017, the date of his termination).

[10] The motion judge disagreed with MHL's position. He concluded that Mr. Mikelsteins was entitled to receive payment for his shares with the value calculated at the end of the reasonable notice period. The motion judge also concluded that Mr. Mikelsteins was entitled to the share bonus that would have accrued during the notice period. The motion judge reached this conclusion based on his view that the "basic principle to be applied is to put the person in the same position they would have been in if lawfully terminated": at para. 37. In so concluding, the motion judge relied on this court's decision in Paquette v. TeraGo Networks Inc., 2016 ONCA 618, 352 O.A.C. 1.

Analysis

(i) The standard of review

[11] I start with the standard of review applicable to the motion judge's decision. MHL submits that the standard of review is correctness because the Shareholders' Agreement is a standard form contract (sometimes called a contract of adhesion). Mr. Mikelsteins submits that the standard of review is reasonableness because the interpretation of the Shareholders' Agreement involves a finding of mixed fact and law.

[12] I agree with MHL. The evidence is that the Shareholders' Agreement is a "take it or leave it" form of contract. An employee who is invited to become a party to the Shareholders' Agreement has no ability to negotiate the terms of that agreement. The Shareholders' Agreement is therefore fairly characterized as a contract of adhesion. Consequently, the factual matrix plays less of a role in the interpretative exercise. Further, the interpretation of the Shareholders' Agreement will have implications for all of the other shareholders, both existing and future. It is important therefore that the Shareholders' Agreement be interpreted in a consistent manner. All of this leads to the conclusion that the proper standard of review is correctness. As Wagner J. said in Ledcor Construction Ltd v. Northbridge Indemnity Insurance Co, 2016 SCC 37, [2016] 2 S.C.R. 23, at para. 46:

> Where, like here, the appeal involves the interpretation of a standard form contract, the interpretation at issue is of precedential value, and there is no meaningful factual matrix specific to the particular parties to assist the interpretation process, this interpretation is better characterized as a question of law subject to correctness review.

(ii) The proper valuation of the shares and approach to share bonus

[13] Turning to the central issue, in my view, the motion judge erred in concluding that Mr. Mikelsteins was entitled to compensation in respect of his shares calculated at the end of the notice period. He did so by improperly conflating Mr. Mikelsteins' entitlement to compensation arising from the breach of his contract of employment with Mr. Mikelsteins' contractual entitlements respecting his shares. Mr. Mikelsteins received his shares pursuant to the Shareholders' Agreement. It is the terms of the Shareholders' Agreement that determine Mr. Mikelsteins' rights with respect to those shares. The common law relating to compensation for breaches of a contract of employment does not apply to Mr. Mikelsteins' entitlements regarding his shares.

[14] This fundamental distinction is why the cases relied upon by Mr. Mikelsteins, including Paquette, do not direct the proper result in this case. Rather, it is governed by the decisions of this court in cases such as Evans v. Paradigm Capital Inc., 2018 ONCA 952, 51 C.C.E.L. (4th) 21 which, in turn, confirmed the conclusion reached in Love v. Acuity Investment Management Inc., 2011 ONCA 130, 277 O.A.C. 15. In Love, where virtually the identical issue was raised, Goudge J.A. said, at para. 54:

> I therefore conclude that the appellant ceased to be an employee of the respondent on May 3, 2005, and that the trial judge erred in using the end of the notice period rather than his termination date as the trigger for the respondent's right to repurchase and for the valuation.

[15] The motion judge attempted to distinguish the decision in Love from the situation before him, on the basis of the specific wording of the terms of the agreement that were at issue in Love. In particular, the motion judge relied on the fact that the agreement in that case used the language "employment is terminated without cause" (emphasis added) whereas, in this case, the Shareholders' Agreement refers simply to "termination": at paras. 42-46. The respondent argues that the motion judge was correct to distinguish Love on that basis. I disagree.

[16] With respect, contractual rights differ from common law rights. Contractual rights depend on the terms of the contract to which the parties have agreed. The principle enunciated in Love, and reiterated in Evans, is that there is a difference between what a dismissed employee is entitled to as damages in lieu of notice upon termination of the employment contract and what the employee is entitled to under the terms of more specific contracts.

[17] Often, the terms of a dismissed employee's rights to pension payments (e.g. Taggart v. Canada Life Assurance Co., [2006] O.J. No. 310 (C.A.), bonuses (e.g. Lin v. Ontario Teachers' Pension Plan Board, 2016 ONCA 619, 352 O.A.C. 10, or similar entitlements, fall to be determined by the remedies that arise from a breach of the contract of employment where the employer fails to give proper notice. In such cases, the dismissed employee will be entitled to the benefits he or she would have received during the notice period. That, however, is not this case.

[18] As pointed out in Love, the fact that a dismissed employee may be entitled to certain benefits during the notice period does not change the date when his or her employment ends. In this case, Mr. Mikelsteins' employment ended on October 26, 2017. His entitlements relating to his shares are separate and apart from the relief to which he is entitled arising from his contract of employment. His entitlements relating to his shares fall to be determined by the terms of the Shareholders' Agreement.

[19] In that regard, the terms of the Shareholders' Agreement are clear. Once the shareholder's "association with the Corporation and its Affiliates ceases by reason of termination by the Corporation of his/her employment with the Corporation" a process is triggered whereby the shareholder's shares will be repurchased either by the corporation or the existing shareholders. The Shareholders' Agreement expressly provides that the corporation becomes entitled to repurchase the shares 30 days from the date the shareholder is "notified of such termination" by deeming the shareholder to have delivered a Transfer Notice as at that date. Where the corporation elects to purchase the shares, this in turn fixes the valuation date for the shares.

[20] None of this turns on whether the employee has been terminated with or without cause. I note, for example, that the employee in Evans had not been terminated without reasonable notice but rather had taken the position that she had been constructively dismissed. Nonetheless, this court applied the principle from Love because the terms of the shareholders' agreement in that case "clearly required the appellant to tender her shares for redemption on termination of her employment": Evans, at para. 27.

[21] Similarly here, the Shareholders' Agreement uses the cessation of Mr. Mikelsteins' employment as the triggering event for the process to transfer his shares. The termination occurred on October 26, 2017. There is a very plain and obvious reason why a corporation, that is employee owned, and which has terminated an employee who also happens to be a shareholder, would wish to commence the process of repurchasing the employee's shares the moment that employee is told of his or her dismissal, rather than at the end of the notice period. Understandably the corporation would not wish an employee to be able to exercise all of the rights of a shareholder once their employment is terminated.

[22] This conclusion also deals with the share bonus issue. Once it is concluded that the shares had to be transferred resulting from Mr. Mikelsteins' termination, he ceased to have any entitlement to any bonus arising from the shares that he no longer owned.

(iii) Employment Standards Act, 2000

[23] My conclusion regarding the shares requires me to address an alternative argument that is advanced by Mr. Mikelsteins – namely, that the terms of the Shareholders' Agreement violate the Employment Standards Act, 2000, S.O. 2000, c. 41 and therefore are null and void and of no effect. On this point, Mr. Mikelsteins relies on s. 60(1)(a) of the Employment Standards Act, which reads:

> During a notice period under section 57 or 58, the employer,
> (a) shall not reduce the employee's wage rate or alter any other term or condition of employment;

[24] The Shareholders' Agreement does not alter any term or condition of employment. Indeed, this alternative argument repeats the same error made by the motion judge which is the conflating of Mr. Mikelsteins' rights under his contract of employment regarding his entitlement to reasonable notice, and his rights under the Shareholders' Agreement regarding his shares, and treating them as one and the same. They are not.

[25] Mr. Mikelsteins' entitlement respecting the shares that he owned is determined in accordance with the terms of the Shareholders' Agreement and only that agreement. The Employment Standards Act has no application. Mr. Mikelsteins received that to which he was contractually entitled when the appellant paid him for his shares.

Conclusion

[26] The appeal is allowed, paragraph 5 of the judgment is set aside and Mr. Mikelsteins' claim in that respect is dismissed. MHL is entitled to its costs of the appeal fixed in the agreed amount of $12,500, inclusive of disbursements and HST.

Law of Damages § 5:1

Law of Damages
S.M. Waddams

Part I. Compensatory Damages

Chapter 5. Damage to Economic Interests

§ 5:1. Contractual Benefits

One of the most significant of all economic interests is the benefit of a favourable contract. A person who has made a good bargain is treated by the law for many purposes as one who has a present right, the value of which is measured by the value of the promised performance. The primary manifestation of this approach is reflected in the measure of damages for breach of contract; the contract breaker is bound to make good the loss caused by the breach, a loss measured by the value of the performance promised. [1] The notion of an enforceable contract as a present valuable right affects many other branches of the law where the measure of damages naturally reflects the primary measure for breach of contract. [2] Thus, assignments of contractual rights are common and the measure of damages for wrongful failure to assign would be based upon the value of the contractual right. Actions for breach of warranty of authority and for inducing breach of contract also lead to damages measured by the value of the contract lost to the plaintiff.

It is commonly said that the measure of damages for breach of contract differs from that in tort in that contract damages, but not tort damages, give to the plaintiff the benefit of the bargain. [3] The most generally accepted formulations of compensatory principles, however, are wide enough to embrace both contract and tort. Thus, it is usually said that the object of compensatory damages is to put the party complaining in the position that would have been occupied "if the wrong had not been done" [4] or "if his rights had been observed". [5] It will be seen that these formulations are quite capable of supporting a rule of contract damages that gives to the promisee the benefit of the bargain, for if the wrong had not been done the contract would have been performed and the promisee would have received the benefit of performance.

It may be objected that there is an element of circularity in this. No wrong would have been done to the plaintiff if no contract had been made in the first place. To describe the wrong as the breaking of the contract rather than as the making of a contract that is not kept is to beg the question. Independent justification is still needed for a rule measuring compensation by the value of the contractual benefit. Several writers have indeed questioned the necessity and the desirability of maintaining the present rule, and the arguments will be discussed in the following paragraphs. [6] So far as the courts are concerned, the general rule continues to be asserted as the normal rule of contract damages that the promisee is entitled to the full value of the promised performance. In Robinson v. Harman, [7] Parke B. said: "The rule of the common law is, that where a party sustains a loss by reason of a breach of contract, he is, so far as money can do it, to be placed in the same situation, with respect to damages, as if the contract had been performed." [8] A very similar statement, from a Canadian Privy Council case frequently cited in Canadian courts, appears in Wertheim v. Chicoutimi Pulp Co:

> And it is the general intention of the law that, in giving damages for breach of contract, the party complaining should, so far as it can be done by money, be placed in the same position as he would have been in if the contract had been performed … That is a ruling principle. It is a just principle. [9]

From time to time writers have asked whether this rule is indeed a just rule. It may be argued that the main social purpose of the law of contracts is to protect reliance, and that thought should be given to changing the present rule, at least in cases where it is clear that the plaintiff has not altered position in reliance on the defendant's promise. Answers can be given to the various arguments that have been adduced in support of enforcement. First the argument that reasonable expectations ought to be protected is met by pointing out its circularity and its tendency to prove too much by being theoretically applicable beyond the realm of promises. [10] Professor Atiyah has written:

> To raise an expectation and then to decline to fulfil it is, in some measure, to worsen the position of the promisee, certainly an individual promisee. Prima facie this is something that should be avoided, other things being equal. But I am bound to say that it does appear to me to be a very weak ground for the enforcement of executory contracts, and one that could very easily be counterbalanced by proof that other things are not equal … it might well be thought by most people that the inconvenience to the promisor of being held to his contract would be enough to outweigh the prima facie desirability of not disappointing the promisee. [11]

A second argument, that enforcing all promises as a matter of principle even where there has been no reliance will better protect reliance when reliance occurs, can be met by proposing a change in the onus of proof. If the reason for enforcement is reliance, it can be argued that the promisee's position is sufficiently protected by a requirement that the promisor is bound unless reliance is disproved. [12]

The argument that contracts are deliberate allocations of risk can be met by pointing out that not all contracts can be so categorized. [13] The moral argument for enforceability can be met by pointing out that, from a moral point of view, no distinction can be drawn between purely gratuitous promises and executory promises that have not been relied on. [14]

In his later book, The Rise and Fall of Freedom of Contract, [15] Professor Atiyah returns to the same theme. He writes:

> Nevertheless, it remains true in current law, generally speaking, that expectations are the basis of the damages which will be awarded for breach of contract where such liability does exist. Even where there has been some element of reliance, or some benefit rendered, and where it might have been thought that the damages would be confined to the element of reliance or the value of the benefit, this is not generally the case. Doubtless, there are arguments for maintaining the traditional principle here (see Fuller and Perdue "The Reliance Interest in Contract Damages") though it might be better to recognize them frankly for what they are. Frequently, the best justification for awarding such expectation damages is not that the plaintiff's expectations in fact deserve such handsome protection, but that proof of the losses flowing from reliance would be too difficult or costly, and that if the damages are excessive by way of compensation, then this is a deserved penalty on the defendant anyhow. But in view of the declining belief in the idea that the law should actually deter parties from breaking their contracts, it would not be surprising if future developments tend to show a still further whittling down of expectation damages. [16]

Professor Atiyah concludes his book with this comment: "So too, the role of expectations, their relationship to promises, and their importance even where they arise without promises, must be reexamined … The task is one to which I hope to return." [17]

A change in the present rule would, however, raise a number of difficulties. First, if specific performance [18] is available to enforce some contracts without a need for reliance, it seems difficult to contemplate a measure of damages that is not in principle of equivalent value. If the prima facie measure of damages ceased to be the value of the promised performance, there would be increased incentive to claim specific performance, an argument that damages were never "adequate" compensation and an anomalous discrepancy in economic result between cases where specific performance was awarded and cases where damages were given. A change in the basic measure of damages, therefore, would require a corresponding narrowing of the circumstances in which specific enforcement is available.

Secondly, in the case of a formal contract, for example a gift promise under seal, it has generally been accepted that the appropriate measure of enforcement is the value of the promise. [19] It would be anomalous if formal contracts were fully enforceable but informal contracts only to the extent of reliance.

Thirdly, it must surely be conceded that completed exchanges, after execution, are final. The result of exchanges is often to confer a benefit on one of the parties. It is difficult to contemplate a rule permitting the rescission of executed transactions on the ground that one party has benefited to a greater extent than his reliance. If this is a sound position, it is hard to see why, in principle, parties should not agree in respect to a future planned exchange that the legal relationship between the two shall now be as though the exchange were actually effected. If this can be done expressly it can surely be done by implication, and arguably such an implication is a fair one in the case of the usual exchange transaction. If the parties do not intend to commit themselves to the full extent of the exchange they can always, under present law, make express provision. If the law normally only protected reliance, a new class of contracts would surely emerge where the promisor fully guaranteed performance. Following normal rules of contract construction such a guarantee could be implicit, as well as express, and this would bring us back to the present position. In other words, the argument is that the normal measure of contract damages simply reflects the usual implications of a contractual transaction.

This point is strengthened, it is submitted, by the existence of the doctrine of consideration as the normal test of contract enforcement. One of the reasons for allowing the promisee to recover the value of the promised performance is that the promisee has "bought" the right to it. The doctrine of consideration is, in essence, a test of when a promise has been "bought". It is widely acknowledged that some measure of enforcement should be and has been given to promises that have not been bought (i.e., where there is no consideration), but it is in just those cases that, as has been argued elsewhere,[20] the measure of damages ought to be restricted to the protection of reliance. When the promisee has not bought the right to performance, there is much less reason to allow recovery of its value.

Fourthly, it would generally be conceded that risk allocation contracts ought to be enforced.[21] It does not seem that a ready means is available to distinguish "risk allocation" contracts from other contracts. Every agreed exchange can be said to allocate risks of error in assessing the comparative value of the properties to be exchanged. One of the simplest explanations of the theoretical basis of contract law is that it enables persons to make their future less uncertain; this explanation also provides a strong support for a remedial scheme that protects the promisee's expectations, for uncertainty about the future is only removed if the promisee can count on a legal remedy that will give the anticipated benefit of performance.

Lastly, Fuller and Perdue's argument that only a measure of expectation damages can adequately protect reliance does not seem fully to be met by putting the onus of proof upon the promisor to disprove reliance. A promisee who had made a beneficial bargain would know that reliance on performance of the promise was not safe until losses (not disprovable) or expenses equivalent to the contractual advantage had been incurred. Similarly, it would be profitable for the promisor to break a promise as long as the promisor calculated that it could be shown that such losses had not been incurred. These considerations would inhibit reliance and encourage the manufacture of otherwise unnecessary evidence of reliance for purposes of possible litigation. Furthermore, there is almost always reliance in the shape of foregone alternative opportunities that is very hard to measure. If a reversal of the onus of proof combined with consideration of the possibility that the promisee might have foregone other opportunities to contract will make it practically impossible for the promisor to disprove reliance, the present position will remain in substance unchanged in which case the present rule might as well be preserved. If, on the other hand, it is envisaged that reliance can be readily disproved on a showing that the promisee would probably not have found another opportunity to make a similar contract, it may be objected that reliance, in the form of a possibility (up to a probability of.49) of the promisee's making an alternative contract, will be left unprotected.

For these reasons there seems to be insufficient reason to advocate the judicial or legislative change of the present rule.

§6.10 The second general issue that permeates any discussion of the law of damages for breach of contract is confusion or disagreement over the basis for any award of damages. It is the argument of this book that any award of contract damages is based on the undertakings or promises made by the defendant, promisor (which, of course, have been breached) and on the allocation of the risk of loss between the parties inherent or expressed in that undertaking. The competing argument is that an award of damages is justified because the losses for which the plaintiff seeks compensation were reasonably foreseeable as a result of the defendant's breach. This argument puts the cart before the horse. Whether or not losses are foreseeable at all may well influence the drafting of a contract because the parties can decide to allocate the risks they can now foresee. A seller may say to a buyer that it will not — at least for the price that the buyer is prepared to pay — accept more than a very limited risk should something go wrong and that any other risk has to be borne by the buyer. The ability of the parties or their solicitors to foresee risks enables them, in the agreement they make, to allocate those risks; the liability of the seller is not based on what the parties should have foreseen or actually did foresee but on the obligations the seller was prepared to assume.[27] The same analysis applies to other kinds of contracts, contracts of carriage and storage, construction contracts, service contracts, etc.

§6.11 The third development, while having the potential to be a revolution in contract remedies, has not led to any significant change in the law. What had happened was the opening up to plaintiffs of the possibility of receiving, not compensation for their loss, but the profit that the defendant may have made from its breach of contract. This development occurred in a case which vividly demonstrates the truth of the aphorism that "hard cases make bad law"[28] and illustrates that a court that wants badly enough to "zap" a defendant can do terrible things to the law if it cannot find a better way.

§6.12 The combined effect of these three developments is that in an important sense the law of remedies for breach of contract is in a state of flux. The recent cases now offer plaintiffs' counsel new claims and new arguments. At the same time it is possible to see in some of the new developments in the Supreme Court of Canada indications that the Court is retreating from some of the more extreme positions it had taken only a short time before.

6.2 DAMAGES AS COMPENSATION

§6.13 The basic remedy for breach of contract is that the plaintiff, i.e., the innocent party, is to be compensated for the loss caused by the breach.[29] This principle

27 This issue is examined in section 6.2.6.2.

28 Attorney-General v. Blake, [2000] UKHL 45, [2001] 1 A.C. 268, [2000] 4 All E.R. 385, [2000] 3 W.L.R. 625 (H.L.).

29 It follows, of course, that the plaintiff has the burden of establishing (1) the existence of a contract between it and the defendant; (2) breach of that contract; and (3) if it wants damages, what those damages are. See, e.g., Toronto Transit Commission v. Aqua Taxi Ltd. (1956), [1957] O.W.N. 65, 6 D.L.R. (2d) 721, [1955] O.J. No. 280 (Ont. H.C.). For detailed analysis and criticism of this principle, see David Winterton, Money Awards in Contract Law (Oxford: Hart Publishing, 2015). Briefly put, Winterton argues that the canonical (or "orthodox" as he calls it)

(which for convenience can be called the "compensation principle") is usually based on one or other of a few cases decided in the nineteenth century or early twentieth century, though the principle that the plaintiff should be compensated is far older.[30] For example, Parke B. (later Lord Wensleydale) said in 1848:

> The next question is: What damages is the plaintiff entitled to recover? The rule of the common law is that where a party sustains a loss by reason of a breach of contract, he is, so far as money can do it, to be placed in the same situation, with respect to damages, as if the contract had been performed.[31]

Much the same statement was made by Lord Atkinson over 60 years later:

> And it is the general intention of the law that, in giving damages for breach of contract, the party complaining should, so far as it can be done by money, be placed in the same position as he would have been in if the contract had been performed ... That is a ruling principle. It is a just principle.[32]

§6.14 In the language of the interests protected by the law of contracts, the compensation principle corresponds to or protects the "expectation interest", i.e., it purports to give the plaintiff what the contract was to provide.[33] Like the expectation interest, the compensation principle may include protection of the reliance and the restitution interests of the plaintiff.

§6.15 These statements of the compensation principle have an appearance of simplicity and justice; in fact, they mask a number of important and difficult issues. Many of these issues had for a long time been largely ignored, but recent statement by Parke B. obscures rather than illuminates the proper answer and that the answer depends on two distinct principles. The compensation principle as conventionally understood, Winterton claims, does not explain all monetary awards for breach of contract because courts sometimes quantify such awards not on the basis of the loss suffered by B but on affirming or vindicating its interest in receiving the contractual performance that A promised B regardless of any loss B might have suffered as result of A's unexcused failure to provide it. Or, to put it slightly different, that such awards can surpass any loss A has actually suffered as result of B's breach; and this proposition necessarily entails that loss is not the "fundamental normative criterion for quantification" of a monetary award for breach of contract.

32 Wertheim v. Chicoutimi Pulp Co., [1911] A.C. 301, at 307 (P.C.).

33 The concept of the "expectation interest" has been briefly discussed in Chapter 1, section 1.52. English texts and judges have introduced the concept of the "performance interest". Daniel Friedmann, "The Performance Interest in Contract Damages" (1995) 111 L.Q.R. 628, is probably responsible for its spread. This interest is most commonly represented by orders of specific performance or injunctions which give the plaintiff exactly what the defendant promised, not what might be compensation for the defendant's failure to do what it undertook to do. There is no particular need to separate the performance interest from the expectation interest: the recognition that in some circumstances the plaintiff may have a right, for example, to an order of specific performance can be analyzed as simply the recognition of the expectation interest where there is no need to rely on the compensation principle to give the plaintiff what the contract was intended to give it. See, e.g., Chitty on Contracts, 30th ed. (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 2008), at para. 26-003.

cases have begun to examine them.[34] The principal feature of these developments is not a challenge to the compensation principle, but a broadening of the concept of the plaintiff's "position" so that more aspects of it are considered by the principle. The results are interesting and potentially far-reaching, though it is too early to know what features the long-term development of the law will have.

§6.16 Actions against an insurer for the amount promised by an insurance policy, by a bank against a borrower on a loan agreement or on a guarantee, or by a seller for the price of goods sold are not claims for damages; they are claims for the amount that the defendant promised to pay in the events that have occurred. The effect of a judgment in favour of the plaintiff will be similar to the effect of the compensation principle, i.e., the plaintiff will get what the contract was to have provided to it, but the compensation principle is not engaged and, for example, there can be no question of the plaintiff having to prove a loss, of the application of the limiting rules in Hadley v. Baxendale[35] or of mitigation. The amount the plaintiff will be awarded is determined by the contract: the plaintiff's claim will be characterized as a "liquidated" one. This characterization has procedural consequences. This difference in the remedies for breach of contract is often forgotten and when this event occurs it can have unfortunate consequences.[36]

6.2.1 The Compensation Principle

§6.17 The operation of the compensation principle can be seen in a simple case where the seller of goods (on a rising market) fails to deliver the goods to the buyer. The buyer obtains the goods from another seller and sues the original seller for the difference between the market and contract prices. A similar case would be the action of the seller against the buyer who (on a falling market) fails to take delivery. These cases are simple because it seems obvious what the buyer and

Sun Life Assurance Co. of Canada*, 2006 SCC 30, [2006] 2 S.C.R. 3, 271 D.L.R. (4th) 1, [2006] S.C.J. No. 30 (S.C.C.) (where the relation between the compensation principle and the limiting rule established by Hadley v. Baxendale (1854), 9 Exch. 341, 156 E.R. 145, [1843-1860] All E.R. seller respectively lost, and the monetary award based on the difference between the contract and market prices seems to be the appropriate compensation.[37]

§6.18 The examples just given are simple because it was assumed that the buyer could immediately find another seller, i.e., could obtain "cover", and that the seller could find another buyer without either of them incurring further losses. In their attempts to protect their clients from the risk of large damage claims, solicitors have tried to divide damages into classes. A seller might, for example, agree to be liable to return the price if the goods are defective, but disclaim responsibility for other costs incurred by the buyer in dealing with the defect in the goods. The terms used to describe the consequences of a promisor's breach are not terms of art but are now used (and probably were developed) to set limits on a promisor's contractual liability. One is likely to encounter in many kinds of agreements a distinction between "direct" and "indirect" damages, and descriptions of the latter as "consequential" or "incidental". In a contract of sale, the seller may agree to be liable for "direct" damages but not for "indirect" or "consequential" damages.[38] It is convenient to adopt a usage that corresponds to that frequently used by solicitors and by the courts. The term "direct" damages or "direct" loss or harm refers, for example, to the difference between the contract price and the market price in each of the examples. It is also referred to as a "loss in value", i.e., the difference between what the promisee should have received and what it actually received.[39] The terms "consequential", "incidental"

37 See, e.g., the Sale of Goods Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. S.1, s. 48:

> 48(1) Where the buyer wrongfully neglects or refuses to accept and pay for the goods, the seller may maintain an action against the buyer for damages for non-acceptance.
>
> (2) The measure of damages is the estimated loss directly and naturally resulting in the ordinary course of events from the buyer's breach of contract.
> (3) Where there is an available market for the goods in question, the measure of damages is, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, to be ascertained by the difference between the contract price and the market or current price at the time or times when the goods ought to have been accepted, or, if no time was fixed for acceptance, then at the time of the refusal to accept.

Subsection 3 provides for the measure of damages to be the difference between the contract and market price; subsection 2 is a combination of the compensation principle and the limiting rule in Hadley v. Baxendale. See also: R.S.A. 2000, c. S-2, s. 50; R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 410, s. 53; C.C.S.M. c. S10, s. 51; R.S.N.L. 1990, c. S-6, s. 51; R.S.N.B. 1973, c. 38 It is useful to consider such clauses as allocating a risk of loss to the customer. That allocation may have been the topic of negotiations over the price or it may reflect the usual allocation in the industry: for obvious reasons manufacturers (and particularly software developers) will be unwilling to bear the risk that the failure of their product to work properly may cause the closure of their customer's business. Notice, e.g., the standard disclaimer on any roll of photographic film (or, now, computer component, particularly software): the manufacturer will refund the price of a defective roll or component but will not be liable for any other losses.

3. The quantification of damages

(a) Nominal and substantial damages

Once it has been determined that the defendant has breached a contract and is to be held liable for its harmful consequences, in accordance with what has been discussed earlier with respect to causation and remoteness, the court is faced with the issue of deciding the amount to be awarded the plaintiff by way of damages for breach of contract. The rule of the common law is that where a party sustains a loss by reason of a breach of contract, he is, so far as money can do it, to be placed in the same situation, with respect to damages, as if the contract had been performed.[231] This represents what has been referred to as[232] "the general intention of the law". It is both a ruling and a just principle.[233] It enshrines the idea that the purpose of damages is compensation of the victim of a breach of contract.[234]

In this respect, the tenor of this language indicates that there may be instances when an appropriate award will be nominal, not substantial, in recognition of the fact that the defendant has committed a breach of a contract,[235] justifying and supporting an action, without there having been any actual, calculable loss being incurred by the plaintiff for which he ought to be compensated.

That is a situation that arises when the plaintiff makes a profit out of the defendant's breach, by becoming free to do things which, otherwise, he would not have been able and allowed to do, thereby obtaining some financial advantage. Such a plaintiff will be given only nominal damages.[236] If the plaintiff has lost nothing, or something quite trivial, as a result of the defendant's breach, only nominal damages may be recovered.[237] Indeed, if the plaintiff could have incurred a loss had the contract been completed, he might not be able to recover his expenses, in accordance with the "reliance" doctrine.[238] In Prince Rupert Sawmills Ltd. v. M.C. Logging Ltd.,[239] it was suggested that, where there is a breach of a contract to lend or borrow money, the loss to the plaintiff may be nominal, that is, the cost of obtaining an alternative loan, or may be substantial, for example, as where the failure to provide financing caused loss to the assets of the plaintiff's business.[240] Where there has been a breach of a contract under which a party was given an option to purchase, it has been pointed out that the loss to the injured party, whether the grantor or grantee of the option, may be more than nominal. The damages recoverable are not confined to the cost of performance but extend to the value of performance to the injured party.[241] While at first sight, therefore, the injured party may appear to have lost very little by the non-performance of the option contract, there may indeed be a substantial loss to him in consequence. If there is, then it is recoverable in accordance with the normal Hadley v. Baxendale principle.[242]

(b) Exemplary damages

Compensatory damages, whether based on expectation, reliance or restitution,[243] awarded under the principle referred to above,[244] and aggravated damages, which are also compensatory in nature, and are designed to provide extra compensation to a plaintiff who has suffered particularly serious or egregious harm by the defendant's breach of contract,[245] must be differentiated from exemplary damages which are intended to punish the defendant for his commission of a breach of contract not to compensate the plaintiff for any loss incurred by such breach.[246] The law has undergone development in regard to such damage since the decision of the House of Lords in Addis v. Gramophone Co.[247] in which the House of Lords laid down that in actions for breach of contract exemplary or punitive damages could not be awarded. The plaintiff was given the six months' notice which his employment required, but he was summarily replaced in breach of the service contract between the parties. In those circumstances, the House of Lords allowed the dismissed employee to recover the salary and commission that he would have earned in the relevant period, but would not award damages for wounded feelings or loss of reputation—which would have been in the nature of a penalty upon the employer in respect of the high-handed way in which the plaintiff was treated.[248] Prior to the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Vorvis v. Insurance Corporation of British Columbia[249] Canadian courts were divided on the question whether punitive damages could ever be awarded in cases of breach of contract. Some restated the older Addis principle on one of two grounds: (a) that damages are not to be awarded in a breach of contract case, especially one involving wrongful dismissal, for injured feelings, or (b) that vindictive or punitive damages are inappropriate in contract cases.[250] Others awarded such damages in circumstances which suggest that the true basis of the claim was not a breach of contract but a tort or the infringement of some statutory right.[251] Some appear to have accepted that punitive or exemplary damages were available to an aggrieved plaintiff in an appropriate case, while denying such damages to the particular plaintiff in the case before the court, on the ground that the conduct of the defendant did not justify such an award.[252] Such damages, it was said,[253] could be awarded where "a contract has been breached in a high-handed, shocking and arrogant fashion so as to demand condemnation by the Court as a deterrent."

The issue was put to rest by the decision in Vorvis v. Insurance Corp. of British Columbia.[254] This was a wrongful dismissal case in which the plaintiff claimed damages for mental distress caused by termination of his employment and punitive damages. According to his evidence he was treated in a harsh, humiliating and distressing manner by his employer before the termination. His claims were rejected by the trial judge and the British Columbia Court of Appeal, and by the majority of the Supreme Court of Canada. McIntyre J., speaking for the majority, said that the only basis for the imposition of punishment was the finding of the commission of

In Thompson v. Zurich Ins. Co. (1983), 45 O.R. (2d) 744 at 752-753 (Ont. However, he seemed to consider that punitive damages were most appropriate where a breach of contract merged with, and assumed the character of, a willful tort calculated rather than inadvertent and in a wanton and reckless disregard for the contractual rights of others. Compare Cherniak & Morse, "Aggravated, Punitive and Exemplary Damages in Canada" (1983) Special Lectures of Law Society of Upper Canada 151, especially at pp. 176-184.

an actionable wrong that caused the injury complained of by the plaintiff.[255] This was illustrated by reference to Robitaille v. Vancouver Hockey Club Ltd.,[256] where the plaintiff was denied proper medical attention by the club by which he was employed. The question was whether the case before the court was of this nature. In this respect, while it was unusual to do so, punitive damages could be awarded in cases of breach of contract.[257] Unlike the situation in tort cases, it will be rare to find a contractual breach appropriate for an award of exemplary or punitive damages. The distinction between tort and contract cases turned on the fact that in contract what was involved was a "private arrangement" between the parties.[258] That distinction did not eliminate an award of punitive damages, but made it rare in contract cases. In such cases, said McIntyre J.,[259] punitive damages

> . . . may only be awarded in respect of conduct which is of such nature as to be deserving of punishment because of its harsh, vindictive, reprehensible and malicious nature. . . . [I]n any case where such an award is made the conduct must be extreme in its nature and such that by any reasonable standard it is deserving of full condemnation and punishment.

The Vorvis case did not fall within this category.[260]

The dissenting judgment of Wilson J. and L'Heureux-Dubé J., relied heavily on the ideas propounded at first instance in Brown v. Waterloo (Region) Commissioners of Police[261] and in Nantel v. Parisien.[262] They were not perturbed by the notion that admitting the possibility of awarding such damages in contract cases would narrow the gap between tort and contract.[263] Nor did they agree that such damages could only be awarded where the misconduct in itself was an actionable wrong.[264] The correct approach was to assess the conduct in the context of all the circumstances and determine whether it was deserving of punishment because of its shockingly harsh, vindictive, reprehensible and malicious nature.[265] In the result, the minority held that the defendant's behaviour in this case justified an award of exemplary damages. The language of McIntyre and Wilson JJ. does not appear to differ too widely in its content or nature. The chief difference seems to be in the requirement by the majority of the commission of a separate actionable wrong that caused the injury complained of by the plaintiff, a requirement that led to the denial of such damages in Nogas v. Bernpaul Enterprises Ltd.,[266] despite the fact that the defendant had behaved in a high-handed manner.

In most of the cases since Vorvis in which that decision has been applied, punitive damages were not allowed.[267] However there is no doubt now that if the situation is one in which the conditions for an award of such damages can be met, a court will do so. The conditions under which such damages will be awarded have been restated by the Ontario Court of Appeal, following Vorvis, in two cases.[268] They are: (1) the defendant's behaviour must be egregious so as to offend the court's sense of decency: (2) the defendant must have committed an independent actionable wrong against the plaintiff: (3) such damages must serve a rational purpose because the compensatory damages are insufficient to express the court's repugnance at the actions of the defendant and to punish and deter. The points which should be covered in a case where punitive damages were claimed, by a judge in a charge to a jury or by a judge as a trier-of-fact as were set out by the Supreme Court of Canada in Whiten v. Pilot Insurance Co.[269] In that case an award of punitive damages was clearly justified. The defendant insurance company had wrongly and deliberately accused the plaintiff of arson in connection with the destruction by fire of the plaintiff's property and, as a result, had stopped providing the plaintiff with funds to pay her rent. She sued the defendants and obtained a judgment. However, her legal costs virtually extinguished the amount she recovered. In such circumstances an award of exemplary or punitive damages was justified under the guidelines contained in Vorvis and its successors. An initial award at trial of one million dollars was reduced to 100,000 dollars by the majority of the Ontario Court of Appeal but restored by the majority of the Supreme Court.

(c) Assessment of substantial damages

(i) The duty to assess

Except when, as previously discussed,[270] damages will be nominal not substantial, the court must determine the actual quantum of damages to be awarded to a successful plaintiff for breach of contract, which is a question of fact in every case.[271] The court is bound to monetize the loss suffered by the plaintiff,[272] as long as that loss is attributable to the defendant by the application of the rules set out in Hadley v. Baxendale.[273] The difficulty, if not virtual impossibility, of making such an assessment of the plaintiff's loss accurately and with definition does not relieve the court of fulfillment of this duty.[274] Such difficulty should not deter the court from 270 Above pp. 703-704.

272 Miller v. Advanced Farming Systems Ltd., [1969] S.C.R. 845; Alkok v. Grymek, [1968] S.C.R. 452; Hathaway v. McIntyre (1951), 1 W.W.R. (N.S.) 460 (B.C.C.A.); Williams v. Keyes, [1971] 5 W.W.R. 561 (B.C.S.C.); Cohnstaedt v. University of Regina, [1995] 3 S.C.R. 451. Such loss may include potential or future loss. For example, where the defendant was bound to maintain the plaintiff for life, damages for breach of this obligation will include the loss during the prospective life expectancy of the plaintiff: Zdan v. Hruden (1912), 4 D.L.R. 255 (Man. C.A.); Fedorowicz v. Skvarchuk (1951) 3 W.W.R. (N.S.) 230 (Man. K.B.). The justification for this is that damages are a once-for-all assessment; the plaintiff must establish his or her total loss at the time of the action for breach of contract.

IN THE MATTER OF THE BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY ACT, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, AS AMENDED

AND IN THE MATTER OF THE NOTICES OF INTENTION TO MAKE A PROPOSAL OF YG LIMITED PARTNERSHIP AND YSL RESIDENCES INC.
