AMENDED REASONS FOR INTERIM DECISION

Note: these reasons were amended on July 2, 2021 as more fully described in the in the concluding paragraphs hereof.

[1] The debtors are seeking approval of a bankruptcy proposal that has obtained the near unanimous approval of those affected creditors who cast a vote. Two groups of limited partnership unitholders have challenged the actions of the General Partner of the debtor YG Limited Partnership for much of the past year and urge me to annul the bankruptcy entirely or to reject the proposal and, if need be, to allow a Receiver or Trustee in bankruptcy to canvass the market fairly and objectively. Another unsecured creditor urges me to disregard much of the appraisal evidence tendered because she has been excluded from examining it and the result is a record that casts grave doubt as to whether fair value for stakeholders is being realized by this process.

[2] For the reasons that follow, I have decided that I will not approve the Proposal in the form it has been presented to me. The Proposal is yet able to be amended pursuant to art. 3.01 thereof and it is possible that an amendment may be formulated to address the concerns raised by the findings I outline below before a final decision on the fate of the Proposal is made.

Background facts

[3] A central issue in this case is the value of the "YSL Project" – the property owned by the debtor YSL as bare trustee for the limited partnership (the debtor YG LP) charged with developing it. Valuation is an area on which I must tread lightly in terms of what I can record in writing so as not to impact adversely any potential sale process that may be necessary in future.

[4] What follows is a general description of the capital structure of the debtors and the project sufficient to permit an understanding of the issues. For comparison purposes, it is relevant to consider the size of the project. There is no dispute that the "as if completed" value of the project is above $1 billion. How much above and based on which assumptions is an issue, but I provide the round figure solely for comparison purposes relative to the debt and equity interests discussed.

[5] The project is fully zoned and permitted for construction of an 85-story retail and condominium complex planned for the corner of Yonge St. and Gerard in downtown Toronto. Substantial pre-sales have been made. Demolition of the old structures and shoring up of the excavation have been largely completed. Unfortunately, things ground to halt in March of 2020 and the project has been stuck in the "hole in the ground" stage ever since.

The project ownership structure

[6] YP GP has a General Partner with nominal capital and a nominal interest in the limited partnership. The "equity" in the partnership effectively resides in the "A" units with approximately $14.8 million in capital but a capped right to return on that capital equivalent to interest (12.25% per year rate of return) and the “B” units who alone receive all of the residual profits from the project without limit.

[7] The owner of the “B” units and the General Partner are under common control within the Cresford group of companies as are the parties recorded as payees of the $38.3 million related party debt to which I shall refer.

The project debt structure

[8] The secured debt – including registered mortgages and construction liens – stands at about $160 million. The figure for secured debt is slightly misleading. There is just over $100 million in deposits from condominium pre-sales made for the most part prior to 2019. These are insured by the second secured creditor whose claim would increase dollar for dollar if the relevant purchase agreements were repudiated and the deposits had to be returned. For this reason and to have an “apples to apples” idea of the debt structure, a figure of about $260 million in secured debt is appropriate.

[9] The third-party unsecured debt that has been identified by the Trustee is in the range of approximately $20 million plus or minus a few million dollars depending upon reserves allowed for claims yet to be filed or finalized. There are also various litigation claims outstanding the largest of which is from a former officer claiming that the limited partnership was a common employer and seeking, among other things, to enforce oral profit-sharing agreements. I have reviewed the Trustee’s report and in particular the Trustee’s reasoned conclusion that these claims are too contingent to be considered valid for voting purposes. I concur in that assessment. A conservative and prudent assessment of potential total unsecured claims is thus in the range of about $25 million – a figure advanced with full knowledge that the total of all contingent claims identified could be in the same order of magnitude again. For the purposes of this motion, I find the figures estimated by me above are reasonable – those findings are, of course, without prejudice to the creditors holding such claims proving them in due course.

[10] There is also $38.3 million in outstanding advances to YG LP recorded on its books from related parties. I have found those claims to be equity claims for all purposes relevant to this hearing for reasons I shall expand upon below.

[11] In round figures, one can thus consider there to be approximately $260 million of secured debt and about $20-$25 million of unsecured debt outstanding. The Proposal assumes all of the former and would pay 58% of the latter when finalized. The “fulcrum” stakeholders in this case are thus the unsecured creditors to the extent of the 42% of their claims that are compromised ($8.4 to $10.5 million) plus the “A” limited partners in YG LP ($14.8 million plus accrued “interest” entitlements) – such figures based upon the estimates and rulings that I have made and explained herein.

Summary of nine findings made

[12] The process of sifting through the mountains of evidence presented to me by the parties has been made exceptionally time-consuming and tedious by reason of the lack of usable electronic indexing in much of the materials filed. Tabs or electronic hyperlinks within compilations of electronically filed documents are non-existent in all but the most recently filed documents and there are many, many thousands of pages of documents presented. The profession is going to need to get on top of this problem as judges cannot and will not in future undertake such gargantuan efforts to sift through a case when a few moments of care and attention at the front end could simplify it to such a great degree.

[13] Time does not permit me to set forth in writing a complete account of my review of the evidence and my conclusions – a written summary of which I was about 75% through before the impossibility of completing it in the form intended within the time available became obvious. I shall instead present below nine conclusions which encapsulate my reasons for finding that the Proposal as it currently stands has failed to satisfy me of the matters required by s. 59(2) of the BIA or the common law test of good faith.

(i) The McCracken Affidavit is inadmissible

[14] As is often the case in Commercial Court matters, this case proceeded on a "real time" schedule. In addition to the bankruptcy case that was commenced with an NOI filed on behalf of the debtors on April 30, 2021, there were two applications commenced the day before by two groups of YG LP limited partners seeking, among other things, the removal of the General Partner and various declarations challenging the authority of the General Partner to act on behalf of the partnership in any capacity and alleging breaches of fiduciary duty by the General Partner. The Proposal itself was filed on May 27, 2021 working towards a scheduled June 10, 2021 creditor meeting. On June 1, 2021 I issued directions for the conduct of all three proceedings with a view to having the sanction hearing ready to proceed on June 23, 2021.

[15] The Proposal Sponsor is Concord Properties. Concord is not a party to any of these proceedings although it is central to all three. Concord sponsored the Proposal and is bearing all the costs of it under a Proposal Sponsor Agreement dated April 30, 2021.

[16] The limited partner applicants issued subpoenas to Mr. McCracken – apparently the officer of Concord responsible for this Proposal. On the advice of counsel, Mr. McCracken declined to appear absent an order compelling him to do so. Counsel took the position that leave was required under the Bankruptcy Rules to compel him to appear in the bankruptcy proceeding and declined to produce him.

[17] The position taken was a curious one given my specific direction on June 1 that I was not applying the BIA stay to the two applications and that specific aspects of both applications would be heard and decided together on June 23, 2021 when the fairness hearing was conducted. The case timetable made specific allowances for responding records with respect to the limited partner applications and facta in relation to them. My ruling on June 1, 2021 was in both the civil and bankruptcy proceedings and bore the style of cause of both.

[18] Whether leave was or was not formally required to compel Mr. McCracken to appear, his failure has consequences in terms of the fairness of the process leading to the approval motion in front of me. The opponents of the Proposal were deprived of the opportunity to explore aspects of the unfairness or unreasonableness of the Proposal that they had raised. There was insufficient time available in the tight timetable to drop everything and bring a leave application. The position taken ran utterly contrary to the spirit and intent of my ruling on June 1, 2021 at which Concord's counsel appeared and made submissions. This is the sort of issue that counsel applying the "three C's" of the Commercial List ought to have agreed to disagree upon and produced the witness without prejudice to objections that might be raised.

[19] It is against the foregoing backdrop that the affidavit of Mr. McCracken – delivered the day prior to the fairness hearing – must be considered.

[20] The affidavit was filed far too late to permit any interested party to respond to it effectively or to cross-examine upon it. None of the subject-matter of the affidavit was new information. The affidavit was entirely devoted to providing responses to various issues seen in written arguments or that arose on the cross-examination of other witnesses.

[21] Concord appeared to consider itself sufficiently at interest to appear through counsel on June 1, 2021 while declining to submit to examination because of its non-party status when preparations for this hearing were in full swing a few days later. Permitting the admission of this affidavit at this juncture would be to sanction unfairness of the highest order. A timetable was worked out for the hearing of this motion – worked out, I might add, at a motion that Concord was present at through counsel. Whether or not Concord had the right to insist upon a further motion to compel its attendance during the pre-hearing procedures, it certainly knew that taking that position when there was no time available to challenge it in court would have the practical effect that it did.

[22] Lying in the weeds is a strategy, but it does not confer the right to spring out of them at will. I find the McCracken affidavit to be inadmissible and attach no weight to it.

(ii) No weight can be attached to the CBR April 2021 Appraisal

[23] The parties have very hotly debated the valuation evidence that is on the record before me. A portion of that valuation evidence has been sealed. My reason for doing so is straightforward: the approval of the Proposal cannot be taken for granted and it is thus reasonably foreseeable that the project may have to be sold by a Trustee or Receiver in the near future and the ability of whichever court officer is charged with undertaking that sale to achieve the highest and best price available ought not to be impaired more than the circumstances already have by the disclosure of appraisals that may serve to skew market expectations. A significant portion of such evidence is part of the public record and between the public information and the use of carefully-framed circumlocutions I believe that I can convey my conclusions and reasons for them regarding the valuation evidence with reasonable clarity.

[24] Two of the appraisals before me, both from CBRE, are the most central to the questions I must determine. The first in time is dated August 8, 2019 providing CBRE's opinion of value as at July 30, 2019. This appraisal was prepared for the parent company of the debtors within the Cresford group and is based on the particular assumptions set out therein, including some supplied by Cresford. The second in time, also by CBRE, is dated April 30, 2021 as of March 16, 2021. This latter appraisal was prepared for Concord based on the assumptions set out therein, including some supplied by Concord. I shall not discuss in a public document the actual appraisal amounts in either, focusing instead on the differences between them.

[25] For present purposes, it is sufficient for me to observe that the 2021 CBRE appraisal is lower than the 2019 CBRE appraisal and lower by an amount that is significantly higher than the sum of the compromised amount of unsecured claims under the Proposal plus the total capital of the "B" unitholders in YG LP.

[26] I find that I can attach little weight to the 2021 CBRE appraisal in these circumstances because:

a. The assumptions given to CBRE by Concord were materially different than those used in the 2019 CBRE appraisal including as to such things as leasable square footage of residential and retail space;

b. When it formulated the instructions to CBRE, Concord was in the process of attempting to negotiate a Proposal to acquire the property through the bankruptcy process given lack of limited partner consents and was being commissioned at a time when Concord had a clear and obvious interest in having appraisal evidence suggesting that the project was at least partly underwater;

c. The downward alterations made by Concord to the square footage assumptions used by CBRE are unexplained, untested and appear to be admitted as having been quite preliminary at all events;

d. Concord did not submit Mr. McCracken to cross-examination to examine in depth the reasons for the significant negative difference between the two instructions given to CBRE on the conflicting appraisals;

e. The differences between the two have not been reasonably or adequately reconciled. There has been no general downward correction to residential real estate in Toronto that has been brought to the court's attention nor can the difference between the two appraisals reasonably be attributed solely to pandemic-induced alterations to the retail environment.

(iii) ALL Construction Lien Claims are Unaffected Creditors under the Proposal

[27] Under the Proposal, Construction Lien Claims are defined as "Unaffected Creditors". The Trustee indicates that the total amount of such claims is $11.865 million. Of this total, fifteen lien claimants with $9.19 million in lien claims outstanding entered into assignment agreements with the Proposal Sponsor. As these are non-voting Unaffected Creditors under the Proposal, Concord required them to file claims as Affected Creditors in order to acquire the right to vote and to name a proxy designated by Concord.

[28] There was some controversy about what precisely the lien claimants received in return for agreeing to convert claims that were to be paid $1.00 per $1.00 of valid claims under the Proposal into claims receiving no more than $0.58 per dollar of claim value. The Trustee-reported second-hand information from Concord denying any "side" deals does little to address this concern. Assurances as to the lack of a side deal do not serve the purpose of permitting a reasonable understanding of the main deal. None of them have been disclosed beyond a skeletal summary and Concord declined to permit a representative to be examined prior to the hearing.

[29] It is of course open to the Proposal Sponsor to make any proposal that satisfies the formal requirements of the BIA if the debtor is prepared to adopt it and submit it to the creditors and the creditors are willing to accept it with their eyes open. In this case however the Proposal Sponsor has induced $9.19 million of otherwise Unaffected Creditors to file claims as something they are not by definition (i.e. Affected Creditors) thereby effectively reducing the size of the cap from $65 million to $55.8 million and the maximum pool of funds available to the actual Affected Creditors described by the Proposal from $37.7 million to $32.4 million. These are material changes impacting all Affected Creditors that follow from arrangements made by the Proposal Sponsor outside the terms of the Proposal.

[30] The Proposal makes no provision for creditors "downshifting" their claims voluntarily. Lien claims are defined as "Unaffected Claims" and I see no basis for them to be accepted under the Proposal on any other basis particularly where doing so operates to the obvious detriment of the affected class members. This is not a case of a secured creditor valuing its security and filing an unsecured claim for the shortfall. There are consequences to such a valuation exercise that are absent here.

[31] The “electing” lien claimants have little in common with the actual Affected Creditors who had no election to make. Despite having made the election, assuming there was any basis in the Proposal to make such an election (and it appears to me that there was not), such creditors retained their security intact. Pursuant to art. 9.01 of the Proposal, the Proposal would have “no effect upon Unsecured Creditors” which definition does not cease to apply to them by virtue of a make-shift “election” for which the Proposal makes no provision. They did not agree to surrender their security nor even to value it in the bankruptcy process. They agreed to sell their claims on whatever terms they chose to accept from the Proposal Sponsor secure in the knowledge that if, for any reason, the Proposal does not move forward, their security remains intact and unaffected.

[32] This is an element of unfairness in this that I find particularly disturbing. It is all the more disturbing when I am not at all persuaded that the unsecured creditors face the spectre of near certain annihilation in the event of a bankruptcy or receivership but face the very real prospect of additional and illegitimate dilution of their claim value were I to approve the Proposal as presented with the presence of lien claimants in the Affected Creditor pool.

(iv) The related party claims must be treated as equity

[33] A fundamental principle of the BIA is that equity claims are subordinate to debt claims. This principle is voiced in s. 60(1.7) of the BIA that provides quite simply that ”[n]o proposal that provides for the payment of an equity claim is to be approved by the court unless the proposal provides that all claims that are not equity claims are to be paid in full before the equity claim is to be paid”. Section 140.1 expresses a similar requirement in respect of dividends more generally. While there is some similarity behind the concept of “equity claims” in Canadian insolvency law and that of “equitable subordination” the two are separate and one and must not be confused with the other: U.S. Steel Canada Inc. (Re), 2016 ONCA 662 (CanLII) at para. 101.

[34] The limited partner applicants submit that the intercompany advances appearing in the general ledger of YG LP should be treated as equity claims within the meaning of the BIA. The debtors on the other hand urge me to pass over this issue entirely arguing that approval of the proposal does not entail approval of any payment of intercompany claims. Such claims will ultimately be determined by the Trustee and if disallowed for any reason will receive no distribution.

[35] I cannot accept the debtors’ argument that I should sweep the equity claims under the carpet to be dealt with another day in another forum. This is so for the following reasons:

a. The applicant limited partners have no standing to challenge the proof of the related party claims within the bankruptcy process even if their claims against related parties are not themselves released by the Proposal.

b. On June 1, 2021 I directed that issues raised in the two applications would be dealt with on June 23. A theme in those applications was, among others, the allegation that the General Partner had been seeking to divert substantial payments to Cresford from various investor proposals negotiated by the Cresford group ahead of limited partners, the allegations that representations had been made in the Subscription Documents and elsewhere that Cresford entities would be paid out of distribution after the "A" unit limited partners, that counsel for Cresford had confirmed that the intercompany loans were subordinated to the limited partners, that the General Partner had acted in breach of its fiduciary duties and that the Proposal was not being advanced in good faith; and
c. The timetable I approved on June 1 specifically contemplated the foregoing aspects of those applications being dealt with on June 23, 2021.

[36] If the related party claims are equity claims under the BIA, then it is also highly likely that the notional purchase price for the project being paid by the Proposal Sponsor under the Proposal must be viewed as being $22 million less than it might otherwise appear, a fact that is also material to the matters I must consider on this motion.

[37] The allegations of the applicant limited partners in the two outstanding applications challenge the good faith with which the Proposal has been advanced by the General Partner in part on the theory that the Proposal has in fact been advanced to secure payment of the related party claims in priority to the "A" unitholders and without securing their consent.

[38] For the foregoing reasons, I cannot avoid a consideration of whether the related party claims are equity claims. My conclusions on that subject are an integral part of any conclusion I must make on the subject of good faith or the criteria to be considered under s. 59(2) of the BIA.

[40] The BIA contains a definition of "equity claims" that is deliberately non-exhaustive. In Sino-Forest Corporation (Re), 2012 ONCA 816 (CanLII) (at para. 44) the Court of Appeal found that the term should be given an expansive meaning to best secure the remedial intentions of Parliament.

[41] Subsequent cases have explored the concept of "equity claim" with a view to fleshing out its parameters. Some of the guidelines that can be distilled from that jurisprudence include the following:

a. Neither the “intention of the parties” as between non-arm’s length parties nor the formal characterization they apply is conclusive as to the true nature of the transaction: Tudor Sales Ltd. (Re), 2017 BCSC 119 (CanLII) at para. 35 and Alberta Energy Regulator v Lexin Resources Ltd, 2018 ABQB 590 (CanLII) at para. 37.

b. The manner in which the transaction was implemented, and the economic reality of the surrounding circumstances must be examined to determine the true nature of the transaction with the form selected being merely the “point of departure” of the examination: Lexin at para. 37.

c. It is helpful to consider whether the parties to the transaction had a subjective intent to repay principal or interest on the alleged loan from the cash flows of the alleged borrower and, if so, was that expectation reasonable: Lexin at para. 41.

d. It is also helpful to consider the “list of factors” that courts have looked at in such cases – being careful not to apply them in a mechanical way or as a definitive checklist: Lexin at paras. 42-43.

e. Among the factors to examine are:

    i. the presence or absence of a fixed maturity date and schedule of payments (absence of such terms being a potential indicator of equity);

    ii. the presence or absence of a fixed rate of interest and interest payments. Again, it is suggested that the absence of a fixed rate of interest and interest payments is a strong indication that the advances were capital contributions rather than loans;

    iii. the source of repayments. If the expectation of repayment depends solely on the success of the borrower’s business, the cases suggest that the transaction has the appearance of a capital contribution;

    iv. the security, if any, for advances; and

    v. the extent to which the advances were used to acquire capital assets. The use of the advance to meet the daily operating needs for the corporation, rather than to purchase capital assets, is arguably indicative of bona fide indebtedness: Lexin at paras. 42-43.

[42] The related party claims may be broken down into different buckets for the purposes of this analysis. The first one consists of payments that were made to retire loans taken out for the specific purpose of financing equity interests in YG LP. This involved loans used to buy out the $15 million investment of a former limited partner, loans used to finance the Cresford group of companies' $15 million equity investment in Class B units as well as interest paid on both of these loans some or all of which has been recorded as obligations of YG LP on its books.

[43] Clearly advances made or charged to YG LP for the direct or indirect purpose of financing the purchase of an equity interest in YG LP are likely to the point of certainly to be characterized as equity claims of YG LP for the purposes of insolvency law. The evidence to this point supports the reasonable inference that a very substantial portion of the advances charged to YG LP by non-arm's length parties can be so characterized.

[44] A second category of advances made can only be described as "miscellaneous" comprised of various sporadic payments made by members of the Cresford group of companies that were recorded in the ledger of the limited partnership net of other payments made by the limited partnership to the Cresford group.

[45] The terms of the intercompany advances recorded on the general ledger of the limited partnership share the following characteristics:

a. They were all non-interest bearing without any defined term or maturity date; and

b. There are no loan documents evidencing any of them.

[46] Such payments as there were from YG LP on account of these advances were sporadic. The nature of the YG LP project is such that there is no cash flow nor any expectation of cash flow being available to repay the intercompany advances recorded until project completion when deposits and sales proceeds become available. The evidence does not suggest that intercompany advances were primarily short-term bridge advances pending the receipt of project financing that was to be used to repay them.

[47] There is substantial evidence that the related party advances were intended to be subordinated to holders of "A" units of YG LP and are thus equity claims. In the interest of time, I shall only summarize this evidence:

a. Direct written representations were made to the investors in YG LP "A" units as part of the subscription process that after payment of "project expenses" only "external lenders" debt would be repaid ahead of them and that distributions to "Cresford" – unambiguously referencing the group of companies rather than one entity – would come after repayment of invested capital and the agreed return on investment to the limited partner investors;

b. Cresford's communications to the limited partners never disclosed the existence of any "debt" owed to Cresford even when portraying "current debt" in various discussions with or disclosures made to them until very recently (and long after the advances in question were recorded on YG LP's books);

c. Other Cresford group projects with similar capital structures also made representations that intercompany advances were treated as equity;

d. There was a direct, written representations made by prior counsel to the General Partner in October 2020 that such intercompany advances were "subsequent in priority" to the YG LP "A" unit investors – that admission has since been retracted without an adequate explanation for why it was an alleged error; and

e. Cresford's CFO also advised that the YG LP "A" unitholders would be paid in priority to "Cresford" a term used to describe the related group of Cresford companies under common control.

[48] A review of the foregoing factors in light of the jurisprudence leads me to the conclusion that the related party advances must be considered as equity claims for the purposes of this motion at least. Virtually all indicators reviewed point towards equity and there is little to no evidence leaning the other way.

(v) The implied value of the Proposal is $22 million less than assumed [49] The Proposal operates to reduce the payments made to unsecured creditors if claims are lower than the $65 million cap. The converse is not the case. Absent the lien claims and the intercompany claims there is no mathematical prospect of the $65 million cap being operative unless the contingent and late-filed claims are resolved at levels far in excess of any reasonable estimate. This means that the consideration paid by Concord under the Proposal must be considered to be worth $22 million less than it might have been had the related party claims not been equity claims.

(vi) The general partner had authority to file the NOI

[50] The two groups of limited partners have raised three broad categories of objections to the capacity of the general partner to have filed the NOI and sought approval of the Revised Proposal: (i) as a matter of law, all partners including limited partners, must approve filing for bankruptcy; (ii) pursuant to the Limited Partnership Agreement, the general partner lacked the authority to file for bankruptcy; and (iii) the general partner ceased to be general partner prior to the filing. I shall consider each of these in turn.

S. 85(1) of the BIA

[51] Section 85(1) of the BIA provides that it "applies to limited partnerships in like manner as if limited partnerships were ordinary partnerships, and, on all the general partners of a limited partnership becoming bankrupt, the property of the limited partnership vests in the trustee.”.

[52] The limited partners’ position was that since all partners of a general partnership must authorize a bankruptcy filing and since s. 85(1) of the BIA applies the law in relation to general partnerships to limited partnerships in “like manner”, it follows that an NOI must be authorized by all limited partners in addition to the general partner. In support of this interpretation they cite the case of Aquaculture component Plant V Limited Partnership (Re), 1995 CanLII 9324 (NS SC) where two NOI’s filed on behalf of limited partnerships were annulled on this basis.

[53] While the decision of Hamilton J. in the Aquaculture case is entitled to deference, it is not binding upon me. I find that I am unable to agree with its reasoning.

[54] The Aquaculture case stands quite alone in the jurisprudence on this topic – alone in the sense that none appear to have followed or disagreed with it as far as the research conducted by the parties has been able to determine. In the 26 years since it was decided, a significant number of limited partnerships have passed through our bankruptcy courts either for proposals or liquidations without apparent objection on this score. That practice of course does not have the effect of altering the law but it is at least a factor to consider given the number of times since then that Parliament has examined the BIA including with the addition of s. 59(4) that authorized changes to the constating documents of a debtor including a limited partnership.

[55] I reach a different conclusion than was reached in Aquaculture for the following reasons:

a. The use of general “in like manner” language in s. 85(1) of the BIA is intended to ensure that the provision is interpreted consistent with the objects of the BIA and not in a manner as to defeat those objects or render the benefits of the BIA largely inaccessible to limited partnerships. The procedure for filing an NOI was intended to offer debtors a swift and relatively low cost means of seeking creditor protection after a secured creditor gives the required ten-day notice of its intention to enforce. Requiring unanimous consent for filing of an NOI would have the practical effect of making the benefits of bankruptcy law unavailable to limited partnerships in practice in a large number of cases. Limited partnerships often have large numbers of limited partners and the time required to convene a meeting and obtain unanimous consent would require more time than secured creditors are required by law to give in the way of notice.

b. Provincial law generally provides that only general partners may bind a limited partnership (in Manitoba, s. 54(1) of the The Partnership Act, CCSM c P30) and the BIA treats partnerships and limited partnerships as a full "debtor". The policy behind requiring all general partners to authorize a bankruptcy filing is obvious – all are liable without limit for the liabilities of the partnership. The same is not the case with a limited partnership.

c. Section 59 of The Partnership Act also provides that actions or suits in relation to the limited partnership may be brought and conducted by and against the general partners as if there were no limited partners. This too supports the proposition that the consent of limited partners is not required for the filing of an NOI on behalf of the partnership.

[56] I find that s. 85(1) of the BIA did not require the asset of each limited partner to the filing of an NOI.

[57] The limited partners also pointed to provisions of the Limited Partnership Agreement to allege that the General Partner had automatically ceased to be general partner of the partnership by reason of certain actions or that that it lacked the authority to file on behalf of the partnership.

Did the General Partner cease to be a general partner of YG LP at any time?

[58] The Proposal Sponsor Agreement is dated April 30, 2021 and was entered into between Concord as Proposal Sponsor and YG LP acting through the General Partner. It was executed prior to filing the NOI but after the two limited partner groups had filed their separate applications seeking, among other things, to remove the General Partner. To the extent it is relevant, there can be no question but that Concord was aware of the terms of the Limited Partnership Agreement at all relevant times when negotiating and entering into the Proposal Sponsor Agreement.

[59] Pursuant to s. 1.1 of the Proposal Sponsor Agreement, YG LP agreed to "use commercially reasonable efforts to effect a financial restructuring of [YG LP] that will result in the acquisition of the Property by the Proposal Sponsor together with [YG LP's] rights, title and interests in and to such Project-related contracts as may be stipulated". A draft of a proposal, substantially similar to the Proposal before this court for approval, was appended as a schedule to the Proposal Sponsor Agreement. The agreement was signed by Mr. Daniel Casey on behalf of each of the Cresford companies named as parties including YG LP.

[60] Section 10.14 of the YG LP Limited Partnership Agreement provides that "None of the following actions shall be taken unless it has first been approved by Special Resolution: (a) approving or disapproving the sale or exchange of all or substantially all of the business or assets of the Partnership"(emphasis added).

[61] The Proposal contemplated by the Proposal Sponsor Agreement clearly provides for the sale or exchange of all or substantially all of the business or assets of the Partnership. Section 1.1 of the Proposal Sponsor Agreement obliged YG LP to "use commercially reasonable efforts" to cause this to occur, including by filing the NOI and to requesting court approval of the Proposal. As obliged by the Proposal Sponsor Agreement, YG LP filed an NOI, filed the Proposal and subsequently sought court approval of the Proposal.

[62] Entering into the Proposal Sponsor Agreement constituted the "approval" of YG LP to the sale or exchange of all or substantially all of the business or assets of the Partnership" even if approvals of other parties were also required in order to complete the transaction. The prohibition in art. 10.14(a) attaches to the approval of the action and not its completion.

[63] Section 7.1(c) of the Limited Partnership Agreement creates an Event of Default if the General Partner "becomes insolvent … consents to or acquiesces in the benefit of [the BIA]". By filing the NOI as a general partner of YG LP, the General Partner necessarily admitted to being insolvent at the time the NOI was filled out. There is no evidence that such state of insolvency arrived suddenly that day. The General Partner has accordingly admitted to the existence of an insolvency default under s. 7.1(c) of the Limited Partnership Agreement at some time prior to filing the NOI failing which no NOI would have been possible. By signing the Proposal Sponsor Agreement and agreeing to file the NOI to advance the Proposal, the General Partner also consented to the receiving the benefit of the BIA proposal provisions.

[64] For all of the foregoing reasons, the signing of the Proposal Sponsor Agreement amounts to an admission of further breaches of the Limited Partnership Agreement.

[65] Do such breaches entail the automatic removal of the authority of the General Partner to act as such at the time the NOI was actually filed? The answer in my view is that none of them have that effect.

[66] Section 11.2 of the Limited Partnership Agreement concerns the removal of the General Partner. Pursuant to s. 11.2(a), the General Partner "'may be removed" by a court of competent jurisdiction on certain named grounds. That has not occurred. Section 11.2(b) provides that the General Partner "shall cease to be general partner" if any of the named events occurs. None of the agreement to file an NOI, the state of being insolvent or the signing of the Proposal Sponsor Agreement can be read to be included in the list of events listed in s. 11.2(b). The aftermath of the filing of the NOI may well be such a trigger but the answer to that question would require me to contend with the effects of the automatic stay which has not been raised before me.

[67] Accordingly, I find that the NOI filed by the General Partner was not void or subject to any similar infirmity. The foregoing conclusion refers only to the actual filing of the NOI and specifically does not apply to the breaches of the Limited Partnership Agreement consequent upon entering into the Proposal Sponsorship Agreement discussed above.

(vii) The Proposal was the product of a flawed process and breaches of fiduciary duty by the General Partner

[68] There are two aspects to this part of the objections raised by the objecting limited partners. First, it is alleged that during the year leading up to the Proposal Sponsor Agreement, the General Partner breached its fiduciary duty to act in the best interests of the partnership by seeking to advance the interests of non-arm's length parties to the detriment of the limited partners while simultaneously frustrating every effort of the limited partners to access the information that the Limited Partnership Agreement and the Manitoba Partnership Act gave them the rights to see. Second, it is alleged that negotiating and entering into the Proposal Sponsor Agreement was a breach of fiduciary duties of the General Partner in that this was nothing less than deliberately negotiating and entering into an agreement to breach the Limited Partnership Agreement.

[69] As the sole general partner of YG LP, the General Partner was responsible for the management of the affairs of the limited partnership and was the only one able to bind the partnership. The General Partner owed a fiduciary duty to all of the partners of the firm in discharging that role and pursuant to s. 64 of The Partnership Act, is liable to account, both at law and in equity to the limited partners for its management of the firm.

[70] As I have outlined above, entering into the Proposal Sponsor Agreement was a clear violation of s. 10.14 of the Limited Partnership Agreement as it agreed to a process whereby substantially all of the property of the firm would be conveyed to a third party without the assent of the limited partners. The fact that the BIA stay of proceeding may impede or prevent the limited partners from seeking a direct remedy for that breach when the agreement was subsequently put into action by filing the NOI does not detract from the existence of a present breach the moment pen was put to paper. Further, whether the negotiations of the Proposal Sponsor Agreement consumed two weeks or two months, it was a breach of fiduciary duty to plan and then put into execution a deliberate breach of the Limited Partnership Agreement and doing so in the teeth of a pending application to stop the General Partner adds further weight to that conclusion.

[71] The debtors suggested that being in the proximity of insolvency dissolved or altered the fiduciary duties of the general partner owed to the limited partners. It is true that the law recognizes that the interests of creditors assume a greater weight the closer to insolvency the enterprise approaches. None of this dissolves the fiduciary obligations of the General Partner so much as it adds to them. It is at this point that the other aspect of the complaint of the limited partners enters the analysis.

[72] Nothing in what I have written suggests that a general partner cannot file an NOI where doing so appears on all of the facts and in the good faith exercise of the best business judgment of the general partner to be in the best interests of the enterprise as a whole to do so – a judgment that necessarily accounts for the obligations of the firm owed to its creditors.

[73] This filing was different because it came with strings attached: a binding Proposal Sponsor Agreement that granted exclusivity to a single party and obliged the General Partner to pursue one path and one path only to emerge from the process. Those strings did not get attached as a result of a process which itself discharged faithfully the fiduciary duties of the General Partner. Rather they were attached as the culmination of almost a year of battling to keep information away from limited partners that they had a right to access (in most cases at least) and the squandering of an expensively purchased window of restructuring breathing room looking not for the solution best able to discharge all of the obligations of the partnership but rather looking for the investor best able to secure the optimal outcome for the Cresford group of companies generally. In that process the limited partners were an obstacle to be circumvented and bankruptcy provided a possible key.

[74] Good faith in such circumstances is not assumed but must be shown. The evidence presented to me has rather persuasively convinced me that good faith took a back seat to self-interest.

[75] The parties have expended considerable effort in outlining the details of what occurred in that time frame. In the interests of time, I shall summarize the important take-aways from those events:

a. Until the Proposal Sponsor Agreement and the April 2021 CBRE report prepared for Concord, all appraisal evidence showed a profitable project likely to result in full coverage for all of the outstanding third-party debt obligations plus all of the obligations owed to limited partners;

b. The General Partner presented two potential transactions to the “A” unit limited partners in the second half of 2020 that provided for the full payment of all debt, the payment of approximately $38 million to non-arm’s length parties related to the General Partner and payment of obligations owed to the limited partners at a discount – the latter of the two proposals emanated from Concord;

c. The two proposals failed to proceed primarily because the General Partner was unable to provide a satisfactory explanation as to why Cresford related parties were to receive a substantial payment when limited partners were asked to accept a compromise the obligations due to them and limited partners had been assured that Cresford group obligations ranked behind them both when they made their investment and as late as October 2020 in a letter from counsel the debtors; and

d. The limited partners were in a continual tug-of-war trying to pry information out of the General Partner having had to resort to a court order at the beginning of this year to obtain access to information that should have been available to them as of right.

[76] Few things are more precious in the restructuring business than time. YG LP was able to "purchase" more than a year of time with the forbearance arrangements that it worked out. That precious time appears to have been devoted solely to finding transactions that offered the greatest level of benefits for the Cresford group of companies. There is no evidence that any canvassing of the market – however constrained the market of developers capable of undertaking the completion of an 85-story mixed use tower in downtown Toronto may be – took place that was not indelibly tainted by the imperative of finding value for the Cresford group of companies rather than for the partnership itself.

[77] Despite the fact that I have found that fifteen of the forty-six votes cast in favour of the Proposal ought not to have been considered because they came from Unaffected Creditors, that determination does not impact the conclusion of the Trustee that the required statutory majorities voted in favour of the Proposal. There was but one negative vote cast and the Trustee disallowed that vote as being contingent. I have reviewed the Trustee's reasons for so ruling and find no fault with them. The removal of fifteen creditors and just over $9 million in claims does not detract from the fact that thirty-one creditors holding approximately $9 million in other claims cast votes in favour.

[78] While I am prepared to consider to some degree the impact of the assignment agreements negotiated by Concord (see below), I do not view such agreements as impacting the formal validity of the votes cast.

[79] I find that the Proposal received the required majority of two-thirds in value and over 50% in number of creditors voting in person or by proxy.

[80] In the normal course, the agreement of a broad group of creditors to accept less than 100% of what they are owed is cogent evidence of the fairness and reasonable nature of a proposal. This is so as a matter of common sense and by a very long tradition in our law. It is not an indicator lightly to be ignored.

[81] I must also recognize that whatever doubts the evidence may raise as to the insolvency of the debtors in terms of the realizable value of their assets, there can be little doubt that the liquidity test for insolvency is met. The lien claimants have been unpaid for a year or more without any formal forbearance agreement. The first mortgagee has entered into a forbearance agreements but this expires on June 30, 2021.

[82] There was a window of time to find an out-of-court solution, but it would appear that the debtors have squandered it.

[83] The vote of the Affected Creditors is probative of fairness, but I find that its weight is attenuated in this case by the following circumstances:

a. Only a relatively small minority voted who did not also enter into assignment agreements;

b. The evidence is equivocal about precisely what consideration was received by those who entered into such assignment agreements – a relayed denial of "side-deals" without more adds little to the equation particularly when the deal itself is not disclosed;

c. Clearly if assigning creditors received or stand to receive more than the value allocated to them under the Proposal, their positive vote says little about the business judgment of the creditors at large to accept the value offered to satisfy their claims but says more about the willingness of the Proposal Sponsor to pay more than has been reflected in the Proposal itself.

d. This last-in-line class of creditors did not have available to it the range of information produced in connection with this approval motion.

Disposition

[84] I will not approve the Proposal in its present form. I have concluded that, as presented, the Proposal is not reasonable, it is not calculated to benefit the general body of creditors and there are serious issues regarding the good faith with which it has been prepared and presented by the debtors. The debtors and the Proposal Sponsor have the authority under art. 3.06 of the Proposal to amend the Proposal to address the concerns I have raised. It is up to them – with the approval of the Trustee – to do so if they are so inclined.

[85] I am directing the parties to return on Wednesday June 30 at 2:15 pm either to propose amendments to the Proposal that address the concerns I have raised in a substantive way or to address next steps.

[86] These written reasons expand upon the summary reasons I presented orally in a hearing on June 29, 2021. I have released these reasons with relatively little opportunity to proof them and correct typographical errors or minor nits or stylistic glitches. I shall do so over the next week when I have more time available to me and the capacity to call upon my able assistant Ms. Daisy Ng to assist in that effort. Accordingly, I shall be releasing an amended version of these reasons over the course of the next week with such minor and non-substantive corrections.

The foregoing is the corrected text of my reasons. Orphaned words have been removed or obvious missing words restored along with corrections of minor errors only. The parties have received a blackline version to compare the changes. Since releasing these reasons, I have adjourned the hearing scheduled for June 30, 2021 at 2:15 until July 9, 2021 at 10:00am. In so doing, I issued the following additional directions:

> As KSV Restructuring Inc. ("KSV") will become the bankruptcy trustee and court-appointed receiver on July 9, 2021 if no satisfactory amended proposal is approved at that time, this Court hereby authorizes and directs KSV to undertake the steps towards formulating a sales process that it would be undertaking if it had been appointed the receiver today.
> KSV's costs of doing so from July 1, 2021 shall be deemed costs of the receiver upon the granting of a receivership order on July 9, 2021 failing which all such costs will be deemed to be costs of the Proposal Trustee in the proposal proceeding.

Overview

[1] This proceeding involves competing applications for the appointment of a receiver and manager pursuant to subsection 243(1) the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, as amended and section 101 of the Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C-43, as amended and an application for protection under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36, as amended.

[2] The hearing was held by telephone conference call due to the COVID-19 emergency on Friday, March 27, 2020. The hearing was held in accordance with: (a) the Notice to the Profession issued by Chief Justice Morawetz on March 15, 2020; and (b) the "Changes to Commercial List operations in light of COVID-19" developed by the Commercial List judges in consultation with the Commercial List Users Committee. The teleconference line was one provided by the Ontario Superior Court of Justice. Materials were sent to me by email before the hearing.

[3] At the end of the hearing I advised counsel that I would dismiss the CCAA application and grant the receivership application with reasons to follow. These are my reasons. I have issued two sets of reasons, a sealed confidential set of reasons and a public set of reasons. The public reasons contains all of the information in the confidential reasons except certain figures which have been redacted.

[4] In short, after considering the various factors that all sides brought to my attention, it struck me that a receivership was clearly the preferable route to take. Secured creditors with a blocking position to any plan objected to a CCAA proceeding. They had valid grounds for doing so. They had first mortgages in land, there was no concrete proposal at hand to have them paid out. The mortgagees had made demand on February 20. Demand was prompted by findings of financial irregularity within the debtors. The debtors had agreed to give the mortgagees receivership rights in the lending agreements they signed. Approving a CCAA proceeding would force lenders to continue to be bound to debtors in whom they no longer had any confidence by reason of the debtors' absence of transparency and forthrightness in its dealings with the lender. There was no evidence that a CCAA proceeding would have a material impact on safeguarding jobs nor was there any evidence that it would materially safeguard the interests of other creditors more so than a receivership would.

A. The Parties

[5] The Receivership Applicants, BCIMC Construction Fund Corporation and BCIMC Specialty Fund Corporation are affiliates of the British Columbia Investment Management Corporation and help manage the pensions of over 500,000 British Columbia public servants.

[6] The receivership applicant Otera Capital Inc. is a subsidiary of the Caisse de Dépôt et Placement du Québec and is one of Canada's largest real estate lenders. For ease of reference I will refer to all three applicants as the Receivership Applicants.

[7] The Receivership Applicants asked me to appoint PricewaterhouseCoopers Inc. as receiver and manager over all of the undertakings, properties and assets of three residential condominium construction projects known as The Clover, Halo and 33 Yorkville.

[8] The BCIMC parties have advanced loans on all three projects. Otera has advanced loans only on 33 Yorkville where it has shared advances equally with the BCIMC parties.

[9] The Debtors are special-purpose, project-level entities for the development of each of the three projects.

[10] Each of the three projects is affiliated with The Cresford Group, which owns each project through individual, single asset, special purpose corporations. Cresford is a significant developer and builder of residential condominiums in the Toronto area.

[11] Clover and Halo object to the receivership application and have brought their own application to seek protection under the CCAA. The Yorkville project seeks to adjourn the receivership application in respect of it. The parties in the proceeding of each project are the corporate general partner and the corporate limited partnership entity.

(a) The Clover Project

[12] The Clover project is located at 595 Yonge St., north of Wellesley St. in Toronto. It is comprised of two towers; one 44 storeys, the other 18 storeys containing a total of 522 residential units. The Clover project is the most advanced of the three projects. Construction is well underway with the higher floors now under construction.

[13] The Clover Commitment Letter from the Receivership Applicants provides for two non-revolving construction loans in amounts of $172,616,007 and $37,450,668 and a non-revolving letter of credit facility of up to $3,000,000.

[14] As of March 2, 2020, the Receivership Applicants had advanced $107,668,017.82 under the Clover Facilities. In addition, $3,000,000 in letters of credit have been extended. The Receivership Applicants also extended a mezzanine mortgage on Clover, with $34,035,878.69 in principal outstanding.

[15] The obligations are secured by, among other things, a first-ranking security interest in substantially all of the property, assets and undertaking of the Clover Debtors, and by registered first-ranking and third-ranking charges/mortgages in respect of real property.

[16] There are 499 purchasers of units in Clover who have paid a total of approximately $49 million in deposits.

(b) The Halo Project

[17] The Halo project is located at 480 Yonge St. south of Wellesley St. in Toronto. It calls for a 39-storey tower with 413 residential units set-back from the street to accommodate a historic clock tower. Halo is in early stages of construction.

[18] The Halo Commitment Letter provides for two non-revolving construction loans in amounts of $156,850,7747 and $29,292,804, respectively, and a non-revolving letter of credit facility in the amount of up to $2,000,000.

[19] As of March 2, 2020, the Receivership Applicants have advanced $47,429,211.83 in principal. In addition, $1,500,000 in letters of credit have been extended. The Receivership Applicants have also extended a mezzanine mortgage on the Halo project, with $25,725,159.27 in principal outstanding.

[20] The obligations are secured by, among other things, a first-ranking security interest in substantially all of the property, assets and undertaking of the Halo Debtors, and by registered first-ranking and third-ranking charges/mortgages in respect of real property.

[21] There are 388 purchasers of units in Halo who have paid a total of approximately $43 million in deposits.

(c) The Yorkville Project

[22] The Yorkville project is located at 33 Yorkville Ave between Bay and Yonge Streets in Toronto. Current plans call for one 43 and one 69 storey tower with 1,079 residential units and an eight storey podium. Excavation began in 2019 but no construction of the towers has begun.

[23] The Yorkville Commitment Letter provides for a non-revolving construction loan and a non-revolving letter of credit in amounts of up to $571,300,000 and $83,000,000, respectively.

[24] As of March 2, 2020, the Receivership Applicants had advanced $122,432,764.85 under the Facilities. In addition, $79,592,744.24 in letters of credit have been extended.

[25] The obligations are secured by, among other things, a first-ranking security interest in substantially all of the property, assets and undertaking of the Yorkville Debtors, and by registered first-ranking charges/mortgages in respect of real property.

[26] There are 918 purchasers of units in Yorkville who have paid a total of approximately $160 million in deposits.

[27] There are three other major secured creditors on the projects. Aviva Insurance Company of Canada has second and fourth priority mortgages. KingSett Capital Inc. has third ranking mortgages. Construction lien holders have liens of approximately $38,000,000 registered against the properties.

B. Deterioration of the Relationship

[28] In January 2020, the Receivership Applicants became aware of a statement of claim issued by Maria Athanasoulis against the Cresford Group. Ms. Athanasoulis was a former officer of Cresford who made allegations of financial irregularities within the Debtors. As a result, the Receivership Applicants appointed PWC and Altus Group Limited to investigate. Altus is a well-known quantity surveyor and cost consultant. The results of the investigation raised three issues showing a lack of transparency and forthrightness by the Debtors which led the Receivership Applicants to lose all confidence in the Debtors and which led the Receivership Applicants to conclude they no longer wanted anything to do with the projects.

[29] First, at the outset of the lending relationship, Cresford was required to inject equity into each project. It was important for the Receivership Applicants that Cresford had "skin in the game" in order to align Cresford's interests with those of the lenders.

[30] Instead of injecting its own funds, Cresford borrowed money at over 16% interest from a third party and used that loan as "equity" in the project. Cresford then used advances from the Receivership Applicants to pay for the 16% interest on its "equity". Approximately $10.668 million of the lenders' funds have been diverted from the three projects to service the interest on Cresford's "equity".

[31] Second, the projects have maintained two sets of books. A first set of accounting records shows costs that were consistent with the construction budget which had been presented to the lenders. Those records were used to obtain continued advances on the lending facilities. A second set of books records increases over the approved construction budgets. Approximately $ X of increased costs were hidden in this manner.

[32] In furtherance of the two sets of books, the Debtors had certain suppliers issue two invoices for the same supply. The first invoice was consistent with the approved construction budget. It was recorded in the accounting records that were available to the lenders and which showed costs in accordance with the budget. The second invoice from the supplier was for the amount by which the supply exceeded the construction budget. The second invoice was recorded on the second accounting ledger kept for each project and was not disclosed to the lenders.

[33] Third, to help further hide increased costs, the Debtors sold units to suppliers at substantial discounts to their listing prices. Over $ X in discounted sales fall into this category.

[34] The agreements between the Receivership Applicants and the Debtors require the Debtors to inform the Receivership Applicants of any cost overruns, seek consent for material changes, always maintain sufficient financing to complete the projects and to fund any cost overruns with equity. The Debtors failed to do so.

[35] Cost overruns on the three projects come to more than $ X above the lender approved budget. The average rate of increase on each of the three projects is X %. Of those increases, approximately $ X were construction costs that were hidden from the lenders. The amount hidden on Clover was $ X; on Halo $ X and on 33 Yorkville, $ X.

[36] Although the Debtors dispute the precise amounts by which the projects are overbudget and take issue with what they say is an overly conservative approach by PWC, the Debtors' numbers would not change the economic viability of the projects. By way of example, PWC says 33 Yorkville is $ X over budget. The Debtors say PWC's number is overstated by $ X. Even if I assume the Debtors are correct, it would mean the Yorkville Project is over budget by $ X. All three Debtors agree that their projects are economically unviable. The only way to make the projects viable is to disclaim all of the agreements of purchase and sale for the condominium units and to sell the units anew at prices higher than those at which they were originally sold.

[37] In addition to the foregoing breaches, approximately $3.5 million in interest payments to the Receivership Applicants are overdue.

[38] On February 20, 2020, the Applicants made demand on the Debtors and sent notices under section 244 of the BIA giving notice of the Receivership Applicants' intention to enforce against security.

[39] The receivership application first came before me on March 2, 2020. The Debtors asked me to adjourn to enable them to respond to the allegations. At the time, Debtors' counsel suggested the allegations were questionable because the Receivership Applicants had attached the Athanasoulis statement of claim but had not attached the Cresford statement of defence. I adjourned the hearing to March 27, 2020 but indicated that the new hearing date was peremptory.

[40] Although the Debtors have had more than three weeks to respond to the allegations of the improper financial practices that led the Receivership Applicants to lose confidence in them, the Debtors have failed to do so. The Debtors do not deny the allegations. They do not explain them. They do not suggest they were the conduct of a rogue employee. They do not state that the irregularities were unknown to senior management. They remain completely silent about the allegations. In these circumstances I can only assume that the allegations are true and were, at all material times, known to and accepted by senior management.

[41] In referring here to allegations of financial irregularity I am not referring to the allegations contained in Ms. Athanasoulis' statement of claim. I have not even read the statement of claim because it is of no evidentiary worth. Instead, I rely on the affidavits filed by the Receivership Applicants and on the pre-filing reports of PWC. Those materials have evidentiary value and have not been refuted. The allegations in Ms. Athanasoulis' statement of claim form the subject of a separate proceeding. Nothing in these reasons is intended to make any evidentiary findings in that action. The purpose of these reasons is solely to choose between a receivership or a CCAA proceeding based on the evidence before me on these applications.

C. The Prima Facie Right to a Receivership

[42] A receiver may be appointed where it is just and convenient equitable to do so.

[43] Although receivership is generally considered to be an extraordinary remedy, there is ample authority for the proposition that its extraordinary nature is significantly reduced when dealing with a secured creditor who has the right to a receivership under its security arrangements. See for example: RMB Australia Holdings Limited v. Seafield Resources Ltd., 2014 ONSC 5205 (Commercial List), paras. 28-29; Elleway Acquisitions Ltd. v. Cruise Professionals Ltd., 2013 ONSC 6866 at para. 27.

[44] The relief becomes even less extraordinary when dealing with a default under a mortgage: Confederation Life Insurance Co. v. Double Y Holdings Inc., 1991 CarswellOnt 1511 (Ont. S.C.J.(Commercial List) at para. 20.

[45] In Confederation Life, at paras. 19-24 Farley J. set out four additional factors the court may consider in determining whether it is just and convenient to appoint a receiver:

(a) The lenders' security is at risk of deteriorating;

(b) There is a need to stabilize and preserve the debtors' business;

(c) Loss of confidence in the debtors' management;

(d) Positions and interests of other creditors.

[47] Security at risk of deteriorating: There is no doubt that the lenders' security is at risk of deteriorating. All three projects are overbudget. The Debtors acknowledge that the projects are economically unviable in light of the proceeds generated by the agreements of purchase and sale. Work has stopped on the projects. Trades are not being paid. Over $38,000,000 in construction liens have been registered since March 2. $3.5 million of interest is overdue. The lenders are concerned about the risk of further deterioration as a result of liquidity problems that they fear may arise because of the Covid 19 emergency. These various factors make it necessary to gain control of the projects quickly.

[48] The need to stabilize the business: The Debtors agree that there is a need to stabilize the business. The only difference in this regard is whether it should be stabilized through a receivership or a CCAA proceeding.

[49] Loss of confidence in management: Given the length of time during which the financial irregularities have persisted, the deliberate, proactive nature of those irregularities and the deliberate efforts to hide the irregularities, the Receivership Applicants have a legitimate basis for a lack of confidence in management.

[50] Position and interests of other creditors: No other creditor has opposed the receivership application. Kingsett supports the receivership. Aviva has no preference between receivership or CCAA. Two lawyers appeared for limited partners in Yorkville. Mr. Mattalo supported the CCAA application. Ms. Roy was agnostic between the two but submitted that more time should be allowed for a transaction to materialize on the Yorkville project.

[51] In the circumstances, the Receivership Applicants have established a prima facie right to a receivership. The issue is which of a receivership or a CCAA proceeding is preferable.

D. The Debtors' Proposal

[52] The Debtors ask me to afford Clover and Halo CCAA protection and to adjourn the receivership application with respect to 33 Yorkville.

[53] The Debtors propose to sell the shares in the special purpose corporations that own the Clover and Halo projects to Concord Group Developments, one of Canada's leading developers of residential condominiums. It has developed over 150 condominium towers with over 39,000 units in Canada. It currently has more than 50 development projects in various stages of planning and development in Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom.

[54] The share sale to Concord would close on payment of one dollar. An additional $38,000,000 would be paid to a Cresford related person or entity upon completion of the following:

(a) Court approval of CCAA protection for Clover and Halo.

(b) Court approval of the disclaimer of existing condominium unit purchase contracts for Clover and Halo

(c) Completion of construction financing either with the existing lenders or new lenders.

[55] As part of the CCAA process Concord states that it will

(a) provide $20,000,000 of debtor-in-possession financing at a rate of 5%. $7,000,000 would be advanced during the first 10 days.

(b) Negotiate the resolution of creditors' claims.

(c) Offer unit purchasers a right of first refusal to re-purchase their units at "a discount to current market value."

[56] The Receivership Applicants oppose the CCAA application. They have indicated that they will not provide construction financing to Concord. They simply want their money paid and want nothing further to do with the project.

[57] With respect to Yorkville, the Debtor concedes there is nothing as far as advanced there is with Clover and Halo but points to a letter of intent for the purchase of the Yorkville property.

[58] Counsel for the purchaser under the letter of intent appeared on the application and produced a letter it had sent to the Debtor indicating that the letter of intent had expired on its terms but that the purchaser remains interested in pursuing a transaction. That purchaser is indifferent about whether they pursue the transaction through a receivership or a CCAA proceeding.

[59] I decline to grant the adjournment with respect to the Yorkville project. I indicated on March 2 that the March 27 date would be peremptory. I have been given no reason to depart from that direction. Even if there were a CCAA application with respect to the Yorkville project similar to the one for Clover and Halo, I would nevertheless appoint a receiver manager for the same reasons that I have decided to appoint a receiver manager for Clover and Halo.

E. Receivership or CCAA?

[60] In choosing between a receivership or a CCAA process, I must balance the competing interests of the various stakeholders to determine which process is more appropriate: Romspen Investment Corp. v. 6711162 Canada Inc., 2014 ONSC 2781 at para. 61.

[61] The factors addressed in argument relevant to this exercise were as follows:

(a) Payment of the Receivership Applicants

(b) Reputational damage

(c) Preservation of employment

(d) Speed of the process

(e) Protection of all stakeholders

(f) Cost

(g) Nature of the business

(a) Payment of the Receivership Applicants

[62] During the adjournment hearing on March 2, 2020 there was discussion about the desirability of ending the entire dispute by having the Receivership Applicants paid out. The Debtors submit that their proposal does so and is equivalent to having "Pulled a rabbit out of the hat." Unfortunately, I cannot agree.

[63] It was abundantly clear as of February 20, 2020 that the Debtors needed new financing when the Receivership Applicants demanded payment on their loans. As a practical matter it was clear before February 20 that the Debtors needed new financing. As soon as allegations of financial wrongdoing arose, the Debtors would have known that they had engaged in conduct that would likely lead a lender to terminate its relationship with them.

[64] Despite the assertion that the Debtors have "pulled a rabbit out of the hat," the CCAA proposal does not address the Receivership Applicants' concerns. The Receivership Applicants want their money back. What is currently on the table is a purchase agreement with Concord that is close to completion. The Debtors and Concord say it should have been completed on March 26, 2020 but was delayed because of a number of what they describe as "technical issues". Regardless of what the issues are, there is no enforceable agreement on the table although there may be in the near future.

[65] Even if that enforceable agreement materializes, it would not give the Receivership Applicants what they want. There is still no financing in place. Concord admits that it needs construction financing from either the existing lenders or new lenders. The Receivership Applicants will not provide financing.

[66] The Debtors point to a comfort letter from HSBC dated March 25, 2020 as evidence that Concord can obtain financing without difficulty. A closer read of that letter provides little comfort. On the one hand the letter states:

> We wish to confirm that Concord possesses significant capital, liquidity and credit lines, and is considered highly credit worthy, with consistent access to debt capital markets in order to facilitate large asset acquisitions and development projects.

[67] As the applicants point out however, Concord is not prepared to make any of its "significant capital liquidity and credit lines" available to pay out the Receivership Applicants.

Concord is not the buyer of the two projects. The existing sole purpose entities remain the owner of the projects. Concord is simply the new shareholder. It assumes no other liabilities.

[68] Finally, the HSBC letter goes on to state:

> In light of current market and economic conditions surrounding the COVID-19 health crisis, we are unable to comment specifically on financing aspects regarding the subject development projects at this time.

[69] From the perspective of the Receivership Applicants, this is the very problem. Far from pulling a rabbit out of the hat, the Debtors proposal would keep the Receivership Applicants in projects that, at least on the face of the HSBC letter, are currently not capable of obtaining new financing. In those circumstances one can readily expect that any new financing may well be conditional on the Receivership Applicants taking a discount on their debt or being forced to continue financing to avoid such a discount. Concord has not undertaken that the Receivership Applicants will be paid out without discount in any new financing.

[70] I intend no criticism of Concord by these comments. I would not expect them to make their own capital or liquidity available to the project. The whole point of financing through project specific entities is to insulate the assets of a larger group from the risks of a particular project. It is readily understandable and commercially reasonable that Concord would pursue that objective.

[71] At the same time, however, the Receivership Applicants should not necessarily be compelled to remain in the project either permanently or temporarily while they wait for a project specific company to obtain new financing without the Receivership Applicants having any control of the process. Forcing the Receivership Applicants to remain without control of the process is even more unfair when the contracts to which the Debtors agreed give the Receivership Applicants a right to control the process through a receivership.

(b) Reputational Damage

[72] The Debtors submit that a CCAA process is preferable to a receivership because it would cause less reputational damage to Cresford. In the circumstances of this case, that is irrelevant. Any reputational damage to Cresford is of its own making.

[73] One may well have sympathy for a debtor who is caught up in a cycle of increasing construction costs in Toronto's heated construction market. One has less sympathy for a debtor who hides those costs from lenders instead of being transparent and searching for a solution. One has even less sympathy for a debtor who from the outset of the relationship has misled a lender about the nature of the debtor's equity injection and one who uses $10.6 million of the lender's money to fund the interest on the debtor's equity injection. The Receivership Applicants lent money for construction costs. They did not lend money to finance the Debtor's equity injection.

[74] This is a situation where a debtor has acted in a manner which charitably would be described as lacking in transparency from the inception of its relationship with the creditor. The Debtors took a series of proactive steps to hide information from a creditor over a prolonged period.

[75] In those circumstances any reputational damage is of the Debtors' own making. The lenders should not now be required to incur even more risk in order to protect the Debtors' reputation.

[76] The Debtors note that there are many examples of CCAA applications involving Debtors who have engaged in wrongdoing such as Hollinger, YBM, Phillips Services and Enron. I am in no way suggesting that the presence of wrongdoing within a corporation automatically precludes a CCAA application. In many cases it is the presence of wrongdoing that demands and justifies a CCAA application. Whether wrongdoing affects the decision to afford CCAA protection depends on balancing the circumstances before the court in each case.

(c) Preservation of Employment

[77] The Debtors submit that a CCAA process will preserve jobs. They note that Cresford employs approximately 75 people. While CCAA proceedings often preserve jobs, the evidence before me does not support that assertion in this case.

[78] There is no evidence before me about how many of Cresford's 75 employees are devoted exclusively to the projects in issue nor is there any evidence about how many, if any, of those employees will lose their jobs as a result of a receivership. The CCAA proposal is one in which two of the three projects will be owned by Concord. Concord presumably has its own employees who would run the projects. As a result, any job losses within Cresford as a result of a receivership would likely also follow as a result of any sale in the CCAA proceeding. If, on the other hand, that is not the case because there is an arrangement with Concord to continue to use Cresford management, that would only exacerbate the problem from the perspective of the Receivership Applicants. It would mean that their debt remains in place for the foreseeable future and that the project would continue to be administered by the very people who engaged in the financial wrongdoing that created the problem in the first place.

[79] The situation with Yorkville is similar. While the Yorkville project is not being acquired by Concord, there are efforts underway to sell it as well.

[80] The vast majority of the jobs associated with the three projects are construction jobs. Construction personnel are not employed by the Debtors or Cresford but are employed by arms-length contractors that the Debtors have retained to build the projects. Construction contractors will be needed to complete the projects whether a new owner acquires through a receivership or through a CCAA proceeding. At the moment, construction on the projects is halted in any event because of the Covid 19 emergency and lack of financing.

[81] As a result of the foregoing, I do not see any marked difference between a receivership and a CCAA proceeding with respect to either immediate or long term employment.

(d) Speed of the Process

[82] The Debtors submit that the CCAA is faster than a receivership.

[83] During argument, the Debtor's and Concord's counsel described the steps in a CCAA proceeding. They struck me as fairly long and involved.

[84] In all likelihood, the first step in a CCAA proceeding would be to disclaim the sales of condominium units and to re-sell the units. This is the case because any construction financer would probably want to see a certain percentage of units sold before committing to financing.

[85] It will also require a process to negotiate with over 1800 purchasers (887 in the Clover and Halo projects) for new agreements or a process to sell the units to new purchasers. Each of the disclaimer and the approval of new agreements of purchase and sale will require a hearing and a court order. Even if there are no appeals from such orders, that process will take time.

[86] If Cresford and Concord can make arrangements to address the interests of secured creditors more quickly than the receivership takes, it can apply to the court to end the receivership.

(e) Protection of all Stakeholders

[87] The Debtors submit that their CCAA application will protect all stakeholders. The only stakeholder that I see being protected in the CCAA proceeding is Cresford as an equity stakeholder. It will receive $38,000,000 in a transaction beyond the scrutiny of the court. The condominium purchasers will lose their contracts. The employees will be replaced by Concord employees. The construction employees will not have jobs until new financing has been arranged. The creditors will be left to negotiate the best outcome they can in a CCAA proceeding. The only difference is that in a receivership Cresford will not necessarily receive $38,000,000 in cash.

[88] There has been no explanation in the materials before me to justify the receipt of $38,000,000 in cash by an equity holder when creditors like unitholders are certain to have to compromise their rights.

[89] In my view, it would be preferable to have a receiver acting as an officer of the court who can act without being hamstrung by closing a transaction that favours equity over creditors. This is all the more so because a receivership does not preclude the Concord transaction provided the Debtors and Concord can deal with secured creditors in a manner that is satisfactory to them or is at a minimum reasonable in the eyes of the court. If such a transaction is available, the Debtors and Concord can come before me at any time to present it. That transaction must however be concrete, not aspirational.

[90] Although the Debtors and Concord submit that their CCAA proposal would, after the agreements of purchase and sale have been disclaimed, allow former purchasers the opportunity to repurchase the units at a discount to current market value, that is a fairly vague commitment. Both the concepts of "discount" and of "current market value" are subject to considerable elasticity. They are not sufficiently concrete to lead me to prefer a CCAA proceeding over a receivership.

(f) Costs

[91] The Debtors submit that a CCAA proceeding will be less expensive than a receivership because Concord can manage the project less expensively than can PWC. PWC will incur significant fees that will prime other interests. While not stated explicitly, the implicit suggestion is that Concord will not charge fees. There is, however, a significant risk that Concord will charge internal management fees. There is no undertaking from Concord not to do so. Charging management and administration fees is a common way for developers to ensure that they get some of their expenses repaid early on. I accept that even if Concord charges fees, they are likely to be less than PWC's fees. Regardless of whether Concord does or does not charge fees, the risk of PWC's fees provides additional incentive to Cresford and Concord to present a transaction that sees secured creditors paid out quickly.

[92] The costs of financing a receivership or a CCAA proceeding are similar. Concord has offered a DIP loan of $20,000,000 at 5% interest. The Receivership Applicants have offered a loan of $29,000,000 at 5% interest.

[93] CCAA proceedings are inherently expensive. They require regular court attendances, probably with greater frequency than a receivership does. Both the proposed monitor, Ernst & Young and the proposed receiver, PWC and their counsel can be expected to have similar rates. In addition, PWC's work to date is fully recoverable pursuant to the security documents of the Receivership Applicants. In its work to date, PWC has acquired significant knowledge of the affairs of the Debtors, the advantage of which would be lost in a CCAA proceeding.

[94] Even if I accept that a CCAA proceeding will be less expensive than a receivership, that does not outweigh the equitable interests that the creditors have in a receivership by virtue of their lending agreements, the conduct of the Debtors, a CCAA transaction that would put $38,000,000 into the hands of equity holders before giving anything to creditors and the absence of other compelling stakeholder interests.

(g) Nature of the Business

[95] During the hearing before me there was considerable debate about the degree to which a CCAA proceeding was even available for a single-purpose land development company. There was some suggestion that there was a prima facie rule or inclination on the part of courts to the effect that CCAA proceedings were not appropriate for such businesses.

[96] In my view, the case law does not demonstrate a rule or an inclination one way or the other. Rather, the nature of the business and its particular circumstances are factors to take into account in every case when considering whether a CCAA proceeding is appropriate.

[97] More particularly, the cases that are sometimes used to suggest that courts are inclined against using CCAA proceedings for single-purpose land development companies do not turn on the issue of land development. Rather, they turn on the nature of the security and the position of security holders with respect to a CCAA proceeding. Even those factors, however, are not determinative. Rather, they are factors to weigh when determining the best avenue to pursue.

[98] In a much quoted paragraph from Cliffs Over Maple Bay Investments Ltd. v. Fisgard Capital Corp., 2008 BCCA 327 the British Columbia Court of Appeal stated at paragraph 36:

> Although the CCAA can apply to companies whose sole business is a single land development as long as the requirements set out in the CCAA are met, it may be that, in view of the nature of its business and financing arrangements, such companies would have difficulty proposing an arrangement or compromise that was more advantageous than the remedies available to its creditors. The priorities of the security against the land development are often straightforward, and there may be little incentive for the creditors having senior priority to agree to an arrangement or compromise that involves money being paid to more junior creditors before the senior creditors are paid in full. If the developer is insolvent and not able to complete the development without further funding, the secured creditors may feel that they will be in a better position by exerting their remedies rather than by letting the developer remain in control of the failed development while attempting to rescue it by means of obtaining refinancing, capital injection by a new partner or DIP financing.

[99] Although the paragraph refers to the nature of the business, the real thrust of the analysis turns on the nature of the security and the attitudes of the secured creditors.

[100] The proposition articulated in Cliffs Over Maple Bay has been widely accepted. See for example: Romspen at para. 61*; Dondeb Inc., Re*, 2012 ONSC 6087 (Commercial List), at para.16; Octagon Properties Group Ltd., [2009] A.J. No. 936, 2009 CarswellAlta 1325 (Q.B.), at para. 17.

[101] The factors that the British Columbia Court of Appeal articulated in Cliffs Over Maple Bay are apposite here. The Receivership Applicants have a blocking position to any CCAA plan. They have expressed the view that they have no intention of compromising their debt within a CCAA proceeding. Their priorities are straightforward and there is little incentive on them to compromise. They believe they will be in a better position by exerting their receivership remedies than by letting the Debtors remain in control and trying to refinance.

[102] As Justice Kent pointed out in Octagon, as para 17,

> …if I granted CCAA relief, it would be these same mortgagees who would be paying the cost to permit Octagon to buy some time. Second, there is no other reason for CCAA relief such as the existence of a large number of employees or significant unsecured debt in relation to the secured debt. I balance those reasons against the fact that even if the first mortgagees commence or continue in their foreclosure proceedings that process is also supervised by the court and to the extent that Octagon has reasonable arguments to obtain relief under the foreclosure process, it will likely obtain that relief.

[103] Once again it is the nature of the security and the secured creditor's attitude towards a CCAA proceeding that are the factors to consider in arriving at an equitable result.

[104] Here, the Receivership Applicants have indicated that they want nothing to do with the projects. They have a reasonable basis for coming to that view. I underscore, however, that the nature of the security and the secured creditor's views are not determinative. It may well be appropriate for a court to approve CCAA protection in the face of a first ranking secured creditor who expresses no desire to negotiate a compromise depending on the circumstances.

[105] In the case at hand where the breakdown in the relationship is caused by persistent and deliberate wrongdoing by the debtor, where there are no significant differences to the outcome for other stakeholders between a receivership or a CCAA proceeding and where there are no material employment concerns, there is no reason to restrain the exercise of the Receivership Applicants' contractual rights.

[106] The Debtors submit that cases in which receiverships have been preferred over CCAA proceedings in the context of land development companies are distinguishable.

[107] By way of example, the Debtors note that Romspen involved only one piece of development land, no operating business, no significant progress on development like there is with Clover and Halo and few employees. In addition, they point out that in Romspen there was no plan, no purchaser and no financing. Instead, the existing debtor just wanted to carry on.

[108] In my view that is not materially different from what we have here. There is no purchaser of the property and there is no financing. The same single purpose entity that owns the project now will continue to own the project. While the shareholder of the project specific entity might be different, the new shareholder does not have financing. Nor does the new shareholder have a plan. Instead, they have the conceptual outline of a plan that they would like to pursue. As noted earlier, I am not persuaded by the issue of employees for the reasons set out earlier.

Similarly, the state of development is moot because construction is frozen pending financing and the resolution of the Covid 19 emergency. Approval of the CCAA application will not allow construction to resume.

[109] More importantly, while different cases may help in identifying the range of factors to consider when deciding whether to afford CCAA protection, the actual conclusion of courts in different cases is of significantly less assistance unless those cases are pretty much identical to the one at hand. This is because factors assume different degrees of importance depending on the circumstances of each case.

[110] The Debtors also point to Re 2607380 Ontario Inc., a recent unreported endorsement of Justice Conway dated March 6, 2020. The Debtors submit that 260 is relevant because it deals with a development project in which secured creditors preferred a receivership to a CCAA proceeding but one in which the court nevertheless granted CCAA protection. In addition, the Debtors say the case demonstrates that concerns about the debtor remaining in possession, can be addressed through enhanced monitor's powers including prohibitions on any expenditures above a certain threshold without the monitor's approval.

[111] In my view Re 2607380 Ontario Inc. does not assist the Debtors. In that case Conway J recognized that the choice between a receivership and a CCAA application is discretionary and requires the judge to balance competing interests of the various stakeholders to determine which process is more appropriate. In Re 2607380 Ontario Inc., two of the three first ranking secured creditors supported the CCAA procedure. Only the third objected. Moreover, the applicant in that case had a concrete plan with specific timelines and development budget. That is not the case before me.

[112] With respect to the ability to give the monitor enhanced powers, that too depends on the circumstances of the case. If one is dealing with a relatively small operation, giving the monitor enhanced powers to approve low threshold expenditures may be appropriate. Where one is dealing with a large operation with many expenditures and there are significant concerns about how expenditures have been recorded and hidden in the past, enhanced monitor's powers will afford limited protection and be very expensive.

[113] For the reasons already set out above, the circumstances in this case render a receivership preferable to a CCAA procedure.

[114] For the reasons set out above an order will go appointing PWC as a receiver and manager of each of the Clover Halo and Yorkville projects.

REASONS FOR DECISION #2 (REVISED PROPOSAL)

[1] On June 29, 2021, I rejected the debtor's application for approval of its Proposal (identified as "Amended Proposal #2) and provided my detailed reasons for doing so on July 2, 2021. In delivering my reasons, I indicated that that it remained possible for the debtors to amend their Proposal if they so chose. The debtors for their part asked me to adjourn the hearing until July 9, 2021 in order to permit them an opportunity to do so. I granted the requested adjournment.

[2] An amended proposal was filed immediately prior to the hearing on July 9, 2021 entitled "Amended Proposal #3" and I have been asked to consider approving such Amended Proposal. I held a hearing on whether Amended Proposal #3 ought to be approved on July 9, 2021. Amended Proposal #3 was filed only a short while prior to that hearing. I delayed the start of the hearing for an hour to give parties time to review and analyse the document and proceeded to hear their submissions.

[3] As is usual, I called upon the Trustee to give its comments last. The Trustee requested a further week to review the document and to consider its position. I granted that request and the matter was adjourned to July 16, 2021 at 10:00 a.m. This second adjournment was granted – it must be noted – over the objections of the 1st mortgagee Timbercreek whose forbearance agreement with the debtors expired on June 30, 2021 and who has a long-standing hearing date for its receivership application on July 12, 2021. I adjourned the Timbercreek July 12, 2021 hearing to July 16, 2021 as well such that both proceedings were scheduled to appear before me on July 16, 2021.

[4] A term of the adjournment I granted was that the debtors and Timbercreek should both have circulated draft orders (Proposal approval order in the case of the debtors; Receivership Order in the case of Timbercreek) in advance of the hearing on July 16, 2021 with the expectation that I should sign one of the two orders on July 16, 2021.

[5] On July 15, 2021, a second version of Amended Proposal #3 was filed with the Official Receiver and the Trustee issued its Fourth Report commenting on version 2 of Amended Proposal #3. The Trustee's Fourth Report recommended approval of the Proposal as so amended.

[6] This Proposal has been through a few versions and the nomenclature can get confusing. The amendments made in version 2 of Amended Proposal #3 were minor and technical in nature – they did not adversely affect the rights of any Affected Creditor and at least one of them could just as easily have been added to the approval order outside of the Proposal without objection. My references to "Amended Proposal #3" below should be taken as referencing version 2 of Amended Proposal #3 unless the context requires otherwise.

[7] For the reasons that follow, I have decided to approve version 2 of Amended Proposal #3 and I have signed the approval order.

Background facts

[8] I shall not repeat my review of the facts nor my reasons for rejecting Amended Proposal #2 on June 29, 2021. My detailed reasons for that decision were released on July 2, 2021 and should be considered as if incorporated by reference herein.

[9] In broad strokes, the following summarizes the principal amendments made in Amended Proposal #3:

a. Lien claimants who assigned their claims to the Proposal Sponsor ($9.2 million) will not share in the pool of cash available to unsecured creditors under the Proposal – all lien claimants will be treated as Unaffected Creditors;

b. Related party claims ($38.3 million) will be treated as equity claims and not participate in the pool of cash available to unsecured creditors;

c. Unsecured creditors' recoveries will no longer be limited to $0.58 per dollar of proven claim but will share pro rata in the pool of cash available to unsecured creditors up to payment in full;

d. The Proposal Sponsor will fund the full cash pool on Proposal Implementation without reduction should proven claims come in below the amount of the cash pool ($30.9 million);

e. The pool of cash available to unsecured creditors is reduced from $37.7 million to $30.9 million but subject to the above changes reducing the claims eligible to share in the pool;

f. Secured creditors claims – including all construction lien claims – remain unaffected and are assumed by the Proposal Sponsor in purchasing the land and project assets;

g. After Affected Creditor claims have been resolved and all required payments made to them, any residual amount will be returned to the debtor YG Limited Partnership to be dealt with as the partners direct or the court orders; and

h. Proposal Implementation will occur three days after court approval.

[10] The Fourth Report of the Trustee summarized the impact of these changes. Some of the principal points made by the Trustee include the following:

a. Construction lien claimants who agreed to assign their claims to the Proposal Sponsor prior to these amendments might potentially receive less under their assignment agreements than they would under Amended Proposal #3 which had not been made when they agreed to assign their claims. The Trustee contacted the assigning creditors. Two were unable to be contacted but have voiced no objection one way or the other. The remainder of them expressed support for the approval of Amended Proposal #3 or made no objection to it. No assigning creditor was opposed.

b. Version 2 of Amended Proposal #3 contains material improvements to Amended Proposal #2 and addresses concerns raised in my decision of June 29, 2021.

c. Any payments to equity holders are entirely outside of the Proposal.

d. The Trustee has analyzed the known unsecured claims that would share in the $30.9 million pool available to Affected Creditors under Amended Proposal #3. The Trustee's estimate is that Affected Creditors will receive between 71% of their claims and payment in full under version 2 of Amended Proposal #3 as contrasted with between 40% and 58% of their claims under Amended Proposal #2. The lower assumption is based on all known claims being allowed in full as claimed with an identical estimate for claims not yet filed. In the event none of the disputed or contingent claims were allowed, the Affected Creditors would be paid in full and up to $19 million may be available to holders of equity claims.

[11] Amended Proposal #3 came with an additional element that the Proposal Sponsor felt it proper to disclose to the Court and the parties. The Proposal Sponsor made a parallel and entirely voluntary offer to holders of limited partnership units in YG LP as well as other claims found by me to be equity claims (i.e. the related party claims) to sell their equity interests for 12.5% of the value of such interests subject to certain structuring conditions.

[12] I cannot say at this juncture whether any equity holders will take the Plan Sponsor up on this offer. The objecting limited partners have shown little interest in it to date at least. The offer has conditions that may or may not be acceptable to them depending upon their own tax situation and their views of value.

[13] Fifty years after the Carter Commission report, it remains the case that business transactions are invariably structured to minimize tax which continues to impact similar economic transactions differently depending upon the structures used. I am satisfied that the "equity offer" is not a disguised transfer of value from creditors to holders of equity claims – the structures required to be used potentially deliver tax attributes to a buyer of the claims that would not otherwise be available. This proposal has been properly disclosed but I do not view it as being particularly relevant to my assessment of Amended Proposal #3. That proposal delivers additional value to creditors under all scenarios compared to its predecessor. There is no diversion of value from creditors to equity holders to be found here. I concur with the Trustee's assessment that the equity offer is quite independent of the Proposal and does not contravene the BIA provisions against payment to equity ahead of debt even if it turns out that creditors receive less than payment in full (and that would be a fairly speculative assumption to make).

[14] The Trustee's Fourth Report concluded that the Debtors were proceeding with the request for approval of the Amended Proposal #3 in good faith.

Analysis and discussion

[15] This amended proposal is not perfect. The process that led to it was far from ideal. However, as now amended, this Proposal provides a superior outcome for all classes of creditors under every conceivable scenario and addresses all of the concerns raised in my reasons of July 2, 2021 constructively and substantively.

[16] As so amended, I have no hesitation in finding that Amended Proposal #3 is reasonable, it is calculated to benefit the general body of creditors and is being advanced at this juncture in good faith notwithstanding the defects that I found marred the negotiation and presentation of the initial version of the Proposal.

[17] There were some critical foundational findings that I made in my reasons of July 2, 2021 including:

a. whatever breaches of the Limited Partnership Agreement may have occurred in the weeks and months prior to the filing of the NOI, the general partner did have authority to file the NOI;

b. the Affected Creditor vote in support of Amended Proposal #2 was in fact unanimous; and

c. whatever questions there may be regarding the solvency of the debtors from the perspective of the realizable value of their assets, there can be no question of the insolvency of the debtors from a liquidity point of view: secured and unsecured claims alike are overdue and unpaid and the debtors have no means to satisfy their claims in a timely way. Lien claims are more than a year in arrears for the most part while all forbearance periods have expired for the secured debt.

[18] While I found the probative value of the creditor vote to be attenuated somewhat by the factors I listed in those reasons, the vote did and does have probative value and it is material to note that unsecured creditors agreed to accept payment of less than full payment on their claims on June 15, 2021. All of the Affected Creditors will receive a superior outcome under Version 2 of Amended Proposal #3 under any reasonable assumptions. Their approval of the prior version of the Proposal remains as probative in the context of version 2 of Amended Proposal #3 if not more so.

[19] Version 2 of Amended Proposal #3 clearly satisfies the technical requirements of the BIA in that Amended Proposal #2 upon which the creditors did vote authorized the amendments that have been made in Amended Proposal #3 (including version 2 thereof).

[20] Version 2 of Amended Proposal #3 has constructively addressed each of the issues I raised in my June 29 ruling and my July 2 written reasons:

a. The construction lien claims will not dilute the recovery of the unsecured creditors in any way.

b. The related party claims are to be treated as equity claims and disentitled to share in the cash pool.

c. While I expressed grave concerns regarding the lack of good faith and the breaches of fiduciary duty that preceded the filing of the NOI and the entry into the Proposal Sponsor Agreement, those concerns were primarily focused on the efforts made to prefer related party claims over those of other stakeholders in the search for an investor. Amended Proposal #3 cannot undo the past of course but it has addressed those findings constructively. The related party claims are treated as equity claims.

d. There is a strong likelihood that proven creditor claims will be substantially lower than the $30.9 million pool available to satisfy them and Amended Proposal #3 ensures that such surplus is returned to the limited partnership instead of being retained by the Proposal Sponsor.

e. The claims of related parties and their priority relative to limited partners will be dealt with within the limited partnership structure itself, in broad daylight and subject to the full range of remedies open to the limited partners to protect their interests should the need arise. The conflicting interests that marred the development of Amended Proposal #2 have been substantially cured by the amendments effected by Amended Proposal #3. Related parties have been put in their proper place in the claims hierarchy.

[21] The strongest critique levelled at Amended Proposal #3 by the limited partners is that it does not answer the question of what the value of the project might have been had the project been offered on the open market in a competitive process. That is a fair criticism but not one that is sufficient to detract from the overwhelmingly positive attributes of this Proposal.

[22] The past cannot be undone and perfection is not the standard against which a proposal is to be measured. Section 59(2) of the BIA requires that approval of a proposal must be refused if its terms are not shown to be reasonable and calculated to benefit the general body of creditors. The common law has added to this the requirement that a proposal must be advanced in good faith.

[23] Amended Proposal #3 is both reasonable and calculated to benefit the general body of creditors. It provides for substantially improved outcomes to all creditors whose claims were impaired by Amended Proposal #2 under any reasonable assessment of the facts. As noted above, it is quite likely that a surplus will remain to be returned to the limited partnership after all affected unsecured claims have been paid in full to be dealt with as the limited partners direct (or by court order if necessary).

[24] The debtors are insolvent today. They are properly in bankruptcy proceedings. Their creditors have a right to payment and – to the extent reasonably possible – to payment in full as soon as possible. Amended Proposal #3 offers payment in full to most secured creditors within a matter of days following court approval. Unsecured creditor payments will be subject to reasonable reserves for unresolved claims but these too will begin flowing in short order. This contrasts to a delay of many months on the most optimistic of scenarios were a receiver directed to sell the project.

[25] There is a public interest in moving this very substantial project out of the quicksand in which it has become stuck for over a year. Approval of Amended Proposal #3 at this juncture ensures that the Project is in the hands of a solvent entity with the wherewithal and experience necessary to put it back on track as soon as possible.

[26] The real question before me today is whether limited partners have the right to require creditors to run the risk of a sale process producing an inferior outcome to Amended Proposal #3 in order to test the hypothesis that a greater value might emerge from a fresh marketing of the project in a liquidation process that might result in payment of some or all of the limited partners' equity claims. In my view, they do not.

[27] It is possible that higher values could emerge from a liquidation process but that possibility is not a one way street. The dissatisfaction I expressed in my reasons of July 2, 2021 regarding the quality of the appraisal evidence before me does not imply any level of probability that market value today is higher than the values suggested by the April 2021 CBRE appraisal. I was dissatisfied with the quality of all of the appraisal evidence because of the lack of evidence reconciling the differences between them and, in particular, assessing the reasonableness of the assumptions made in each.

[28] It is noteworthy that version 2 of Amended Proposal #3 offers the real prospect that a return on equity of more than 100% of the invested capital of the limited partners may come back to YG LP. The limited partners assent will be needed to any use of those funds unless a court order is obtained. The possible upside to limited partners arising from a new sales process has thus become that much more remote under this last revision to the Proposal compared to the first.

[29] There are costs involved in conducting a receivership that would come ahead of any potential surplus being made available to equity claimants such as the limited partners. Some of the risk of a sale process producing a lower outcome could potentially be insured against by procuring a stalking horse bid to put a floor under the sale process.

There is no guarantee that a stalking horse bid would be available at or near the implied value of Amended Proposal #3. Stalking horse bids come with a price tag in the form of a break fee that is usually calculated as a percentage of the price. That too would stand to reduce the recoveries to unsecured creditors and create an additional hurdle to any prospect of additional recovery to limited partners.

[30] This is a real bankruptcy. There is nothing artificial about it. Creditors have been unpaid for over a year. I have before me a transaction that provides a pathway to payment of creditor claims in full and quickly while leaving a realistic prospect for equity claims to receive some significant recovery. Every other option requires the creditors – who bear no responsibility for the mess that this project has found itself in – being subjected to the real risk of partial non-payment and substantial delay being added to the very lengthy delay to which they have already been subjected in order to test the hypothesis that a few percentage points of additional value might potentially be found. That is not a risk that it is fair to impose on creditors on these facts and having regard to the important favourable changes made to the Proposal.

Disposition

[31] Accordingly, an order shall issue approving version 2 of Amended Proposal #3. I have reviewed the draft form of approval order uploaded and approved and signed same. It was amended slightly to include in the preamble corrected references to the limited partners who appeared and the evidence they filed.

[32] This Proposal satisfies the technical requirements of the BIA. I have concluded that version 2 of Amended Proposal #3 represents a valid amendment to Amended Proposal #2 in accordance with its terms and thus has received the required double majority of creditor approval. The terms of this Proposal are reasonable and calculated to benefit the general body of creditors. The amendments presented have satisfied the concerns raised by me regarding the good faith of the debtors in pursuing this Proposal.

[33] I wish in particular to note that I have included, as requested, an order pursuant to s. 195 of the BIA permitting provisional execution of the approval order notwithstanding appeal. I have made this order in consideration of two primary factors:

a. The secured creditors of YG LP have been deferred and stayed for a very, very long time at this point. Some of that deferral was purchased in the form of forbearance agreements with Timbercreek but the last negotiated extension – an extension that included every possible assurance that no further extensions would be sought – expired on June 30, 2021. I made it clear on July 9, 2021 that I would be approving the Proposal or a Receiver today. It would be unjust to Timbercreek to have its period of limbo indefinitely extended by the simple expedient of filing a Notice of Appeal and forcing Timbercreek to seek a lifting of an automatic stay to enforce its security. This project is, at its core, a hard asset consisting of real estate, a bundle of approvals and a hole in the ground. There is no goodwill to speak of. It has been held in limbo for much more than a year at this point and it must either be put in the hands of someone who will bring it forward to completion under the Proposal or of a Receiver who will find someone who can.

b. Our courts have generally sought to achieve a degree of uniformity of practice as between the CCAA and the BIA. Approval of a CCAA Plan Is not subject to an automatic stay. An automatic stay in this case would operate as a functional veto of the Proposal itself because the result would be an almost certain slide into receivership unless the stay were promptly lifted.

[34] Timbercreek's receivership application was adjourned by me from July 12, 2016 until today. Based upon my approval of the Proposal today and subject to the closing of version 2 of Proposal #3 in accordance with its terms by no later than July 31, 2021, Timbercreek agrees that its application is moot. There is no reason to believe the Proposal will not be completed as planned, however, nothing can be taken for granted. I am adjourning Timbercreek's application to August 9, 2021 when I shall next be sitting. It is adjourned before me.

[35] Assuming (i) the Trustee confirms to me that the version 2 of Amended Proposal #3 has been completed and (ii) Timbercreek does not advise me in advance of August 9 of its intention to proceed, I shall endorse the Timbercreek application as withdrawn without costs on August 9, 2021. No attendances will be necessary from any party in that eventuality. If there is a reason for the application to move forward, I am relying on the Trustee and Timbercreek to so notify me as soon as practicable after July 31, 2021.

[36] A request was made by the limited partners to make submissions to me regarding costs of the bankruptcy proposal proceeding. For the avoidance of doubt, my signing of the order approving version 2 of Amended Proposal #3 has not disposed of the matter of costs of the proposal proceedings. I have made no order as to costs to this point nor have I heard submissions on the point.

[37] Any party seeking an order of costs in their favour shall have ten days from today to file written submissions and an outline of costs. Submissions should not exceed ten pages excluding the outline of costs. Cases need not be included beyond a hyperlinked table of cases. The Debtors and the Proposal Sponsor shall each have a further ten days to respond to any such requests for costs with similar size restrictions. All submissions are to be uploaded to CaseLines and copied to the Trustee. I am asking the Trustee to provide me with a consolidated set of submissions to which the Trustee may – but shall not be required to – add its own additional comments in the form of a brief supplementary report.

[38] Lastly, I need to give some directions regarding the two civil applications that immediately preceded these bankruptcy proceedings brought by the limited partners of YG LP. My reasons of June 29, 2021 made a number of findings in relation to matters raised in those two applications. However, it must also be clear that neither my ruling of June 29, 2021 nor this decision has fully disposed of either civil application.

[39] It is certainly true that I made findings in the context of the bankruptcy proposal proceedings that were and are relevant to the two applications. Even if those findings were made in the context of the bankruptcy proceedings, the three proceedings were to a degree inextricably intertwined. I was asked to issue a formal order in relation to the findings I did make. I declined to do so not because I am resiling from any findings made – I do not – but because I did not and do not have the full scope of the claims of either application fleshed out before me. I directed certain matters to be explored and argued due to the interrelationship between the proceedings but I do not want my rulings in one context to be taken out of context in another.

[40] The safest course in my view is to let my rulings stand as made knowing that res judicata and issue estoppel can be applied as needed to avoid any abuse. I was asked to confirm – and do so now – that costs of those two civil applications have not been dealt with by me at all. They have not. The limited partner applicants in those two proceedings asked to make submissions regarding costs of the bankruptcy proposal proceeding and I have given them leave to do so as provided above. The costs of the two civil applications remain reserved to the judge disposing of them.

Addendum:

As noted, I have reviewed the originally signed reasons and made a small number of clerical and stylistic changes to the text as originally released. As well, I was advised by the Trustee that the transaction was in fact completed on July 22, 2021. Accordingly, I have issued an endorsement today vacating the August 9, 2021 appointment reserved to hear the Timbercreek application and endorsed that matter as being abandoned without costs because moot. No party will be required to appear on August 9, 2021.

ENDORSEMENT

Background to the Proposal Trustee's Motion for Directions

[1] Maria Athanasoulis filed a proof of claim against YG Limited Partnership and YSL Residences Inc. (together, the "Debtor"). The proof of claim was filed in the context of a court approved proposal (the "Proposal") under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 (the "BIA") in respect of unsecured claims she asserts as follows (together, the "Athanasoulis Claim"):

a. $1 million in respect of damages for wrongful dismissal (the "Wrongful Dismissal Claim"); and
b. $18 million in respect of damages for breach of an oral agreement that Ms. Athanasoulis would be paid 20 percent of the profits earned on the YSL Project (the "Profit Share Claim").

[2] The Debtor was developing the YSL Project, which was part of a broader development group controlled by Daniel Casey that used the brand name "Cresford".

[3] As part of the Proposal that was eventually approved by the court on July 16, 2021, Concord Properties Developments Corp. (the "Sponsor") acquired the YSL Project and set aside

$30.9 million to satisfy proven creditor claims, with the balance of that fund to be distributed to equity stakeholders (including the limited partners of the YG Limited Partnership, the "LPs").

[4] My November 1, 2022 endorsement dealt with the Sponsor's obligation to fund administrative fees and expenses incurred by KSV Restructuring Inc. (the "Proposal Trustee") in connection with the resolution of the Athanasoulis Claim: see YG Limited Partnership (Re), 2022 ONSC 6138 (the "Funding Decision").

[5] The Funding Decision determined that the Sponsor was not obligated to fund phase 2 of an arbitration in which Ms. Athanasoulis and the Proposal Trustee had agreed to participate (the "Arbitration"). That determination was made on the basis that phase 2 of the proposed arbitration improperly delegated to the arbitrator the responsibility of determining the Athanasoulis Claim. In phase 2 of the arbitration, the arbitrator was asked to determine any damages payable in respect of the Wrongful Dismissal Claim and/or the Profit Share Claim, based on his findings in phase 1 of the arbitration (the "Phase 1 Arbitration Findings") that: Ms. Athanasoulis was wrongfully terminated (constructively dismissed) in December 2019 and that she had entered into a valid and enforceable oral profit sharing agreement that entitled her to 20 percent of the profits earned on any of Cresford's (including the Debtor's) current and future projects (the "Profit Sharing Agreement").

[6] The Funding Decision determined that the Sponsor is obligated to indemnify the Proposal Trustee for Administrative Fees and Expenses (as defined in the Funding Decision) reasonably incurred to itself determine the Athanasoulis Claim.

[7] The following specific orders and directions were provided in the Funding Decision with respect to the Proposal Trustee's determination of the Athanasoulis claim:

a. The Proposal Trustee shall reasonably determine and value the Athanasoulis Claim in a timely and principled manner. It will be afforded significant deference. All parties agree that it can use the Arbitration Award from phase 1 of the Arbitration and build on it so that time and effort is not wasted.
b. The Proposal Trustee shall, in its discretion, determine an appropriate procedure to receive the further evidence and submissions of Ms. Athanasoulis and other interested stakeholders. The Proposal Trustee may choose to share its proposed procedure with the other participating stakeholders and seek their input.
c. If expert inputs are deemed necessary to determine the Athanasoulis Claim, the Proposal Trustee may choose to invite expert evidence and input from Ms. Athanasoulis and then determine if it needs its own expert to review and comment upon what is provided.
d. The process by which the Proposal Trustee will determine the Athanasoulis Claim may need to account for the fact that the LPs are expected to advance claims that may require determinations from the Proposal Trustee and/or the court regarding the subordination and/or priority of their claims in relation to the Athanasoulis Claim, the enforceability of any proven Athanasoulis Claim as against them and the damages that they claim to be entitled to for alleged breaches of fiduciary and other duties and contractual obligations that they seek to set-off against the Athanasoulis Claim, if the Athanasoulis Claim is allowed.

[8] In the Funding Decision, the court indicated that if the Proposal Trustee chose to share its proposed procedure for the determination of the Athanasoulis Claim with the Sponsor and/or other stakeholders, and if the parties require some further direction and assistance from the court, they may arrange a case conference before me.

[9] The Proposal Trustee engaged in a consultative process with Ms. Athanasoulis, the Sponsor and the LPs about the procedure for determining the Athanasoulis Claim. There were fundamental points of disagreement, largely between Ms. Athanasoulis on one side and the Sponsor and the LPs on the other.

[10] Based on the input received, the Proposal Trustee suggested the following compromise procedure for resolving the Athanasoulis Claim:

a. The Proposal Trustee will issue a notice pursuant to ss. 135(2) and (3) of the BIA, substantially in the form of the draft attached as an appendix to its report (the "Notice of Determination"). Under the draft Notice of Determination, the Proposal Trustee would allow the Wrongful Dismissal Claim in part (in the amount of $880,000) as an unsecured claim but would disallow the Profit Share Claim in its entirety. The Proposal Trustee bases its Notice of Determination upon:
    i. the proof of claim, as filed;
    ii. all material on the record in these proposal proceedings to date, together with all material on the record in the proceedings by the LPs against YSL Residences Inc. et al in court file numbers CV-21-00661386-00CL and CV-21-00661530-00CL and some additional submissions provided by the LPs to the Proposal Trustee (that were initially not shared with Ms. Athanasoulis but eventually were shared with her counsel prior to the January 16, 2023 hearing);
    iii. the partial arbitration award of Mr. William G. Horton (the "Arbitrator") dated March 28, 2022 (the "Partial Award");
    iv. all material filed and produced, and all testimony given, in phase 1 of the Arbitration; and
    v. all responses received by the Proposal Trustee from counsel to the LPs and counsel to Ms. Athanasoulis in respect of any information requests made by the Proposal Trustee.
b. Consistent with the Funding Decision, the Partial Award and factual findings and determinations therein form part of the "factual predicate upon which the determination of [Ms. Athanasoulis'] claim will proceed".
c. Ms. Athanasoulis may file any appeal pursuant to s. 135 of the BIA.
d. In the appeal, Ms. Athanasoulis shall not be required to adduce detailed evidence valuing and quantifying her profit share claim, but may address any issues raised in the Notice of Determination.

e. The LPs shall be entitled only to raise issues in the appeal that pertain directly to: (a) whether the LPs must be repaid in full prior to any payments being made on the Athanasoulis Claim; and (b) the enforceability of any element of the Athanasoulis Claim given the terms of the Limited Partnership Agreement (a point not decided in the Arbitration that may be separately advanced by the LPs if the enforceability is being argued on an appeal).
f. Ms. Athanasoulis will be entitled to make a full response to any materials filed by the LPs in this regard.
g. The LPs shall not be entitled to raise issues relating to any counterclaim or set-off that they may assert against Ms. Athanasoulis. Such issues will be addressed, if necessary, at a future distribution motion (see below), after the LPs breach of contract, tort and other claims against Ms. Athanasoulis have been decided in the separate legal proceedings in which they are being advanced (the "LP's Claims").
h. To the extent that the decision on appeal finds that a debt is owing and payable to Ms. Athanasoulis under her Profit Sharing Agreement, then a summary trial to quantify her damages will be scheduled.
i. Thereafter, if the Profit Share Claim is proven and determined to have any value then the LPs priority, subordination, and set-off arguments (in turn, dependent upon the determination of the LP's Claims against Ms. Athanasoulis being pursued in separate proceedings) can be raised for consideration in the context of any proposed distribution in respect of the Profit Share Claim.

[11] None of the other stakeholders wholly accepted or endorsed the Proposal Trustee's compromise procedure. Thus, the Proposal Trustee requested a case conference (held on December 21, 2022) at which the Proposal Trustee's within motion for directions regarding the procedure for determining the Athanasoulis Claim and related issues was scheduled. Despite the Proposal Trustee's discretion to determine the procedure and impose it on the stakeholders, it was appropriate for the Proposal Trustee bring this motion for directions given the divergent positions and competing interests at stake.

The Competing Positions

[12] Each stakeholder filed extensive materials on this motion. The focus of the motion, the submissions and this endorsement are on the procedure for determining the Profit Share Claim and any appeal therefrom. The procedure for the determination of the Wrongful Dismissal Claim and any appeal therefrom, and the positions of the parties regarding that procedure, will be addressed at the end of this endorsement.

a) The Proposal Trustee's Position

[13] The Proposal Trustee's position, reflected in its suggested, and rejected, compromise, is as follows:

a. The Proposal Trustee says that it does not require any further evidence or submissions to make its determination to disallow the Profit Share Claim. It anticipates that it will disallow the Profit Share Claim for the reasons set out in its draft Notice of Determination, as follows:

i. The Profit Share Claim is, in substance, a claim in equity, rather than in debt, and is therefore not a provable claim under s. 121(1) of the BIA.

ii. The Profit Sharing Agreement was to be based on profits calculated using pro forma budgets, to be paid by the project owner when earned, usually upon the completion of a project (according to the Phase 1 Arbitration Findings). Under the Proposal, the YSL Project was effectively transferred to the Sponsor and the Debtor could no longer earn profits. As of the date of the Proposal, the Debtor had not completed the YSL Project. It was nothing more than a hole in the ground, such that there was no profit earned or to be shared by the Debtor at that time.

iii. Insofar as the Athanasoulis Claim relies on projected future profitability of the YSL Project as a contingent claim as at the date of the Proposal, that contingent and unliquidated claim is too speculative, and the alleged damages are too remote, to be considered a provable claim or subject to any meaningful and reasonable computation. Therefore, the claim is valued at zero dollars.

iv. Any claim by Ms. Athanasoulis for unrealized hypothetical gains (future profitability) of the YSL Project prior to the Proposal, dating back to the date of her wrongful termination, is inconsistent with the Phase 1 Arbitration Findings that profits were only payable under the Profit Sharing Agreement when earned at the completion of the YSL Project.

v. Even if she could predicate her claim on earned but unrealized profits at a point in time, Ms. Athanasoulis has admitted under oath that any entitlement she may have to a profit share would arise only after the LPs are repaid their original investment, and the Profit Share Claim is therefore subordinated to the LP's Claims since the LPs will not be receiving a full return of their equity investment in the YSL Project.

b. On this basis the Proposal Trustee suggests that it should issue its Notice of Determination based on the identified matters of principle and law, Ms. Athanasoulis should then appeal that determination (within the 30 days prescribed under s. 135(4) of the BIA) and the appeal should be decided based on the reasons provided for the disallowance in the Notice of Determination. This defers the significant time and expense that will be incurred to value the aspects of the Athanasoulis Claim that are dependent on the future profitability of the YSL Project (whether as at the date of her wrongful termination in December 2019 or as at the date of the Proposal) that will entail further evidence and expert analysis, at least until it is determined on appeal whether the Profit Share Claim is a provable claim.

c. The valuation of the Athanasoulis Claim, if found on appeal to be provable, will be determined in a summary trial thereafter, only if necessary.

d. The priorities, set-offs and other arguments of the LPs in relation to the Athanasoulis Claim will be determined in a later distribution hearing.

b) Ms. Athanasoulis' Position

[14] Ms. Athanasoulis does not accept the Proposal Trustee's determination that her claim is a claim in equity, although she does not dispute that her appeal of that ground of disallowance could be argued based on the existing record (as defined by the Proposal Trustee).

[15] However, Ms. Athanasoulis does not accept the Proposal Trustee's premise that profits were only payable upon completion of the YSL Project. This leads her to a different view of what is required for the determination of her Profit Share Claim on any appeal, because:

a. She claims that the damages from her Profit Share Claim (in other words, its value) should be calculated as at the date she was wrongfully terminated from her employment (the repudiation date), or as of the Proposal Date, based on the real and significant chance that existed at that time that the YSL Project would ultimately generate profits ("Future Oriented Damages").
b. Alternatively, she maintains that there is a distinction between earned vs. realized profits, and that her Profit Share Claim can be proven and valued based on "earned profits" even if none were realized because of the Proposal. She claims to have already received documents from the Debtor in the Arbitration that establish that, as of the date of the Proposal, the expenses of the YSL Project did not exceed its revenues, which she points to as an indication that it was "profitable" at least in that sense. Further, she claims to have documents evidencing the withdrawal or distribution of funds (profits) to others prior to the date of the Proposal. These are not future oriented profit calculations, and could be proven without the time and expense of significant further evidence, including from experts.

[16] Ms. Athanasoulis seeks to appeal all of the grounds upon which the Proposal Trustee intends to disallow her Profit Share Claim. If successful, she will ask the court to value her entitlements. She says that, while she has some of the necessary documents that she could submit now, she requires further disclosure from the Debtor and/or Cresford and others to establish the value of her Profit Share Claim (which she had anticipating obtaining in phase 2 of the Arbitration process). Ms. Athanasoulis asks that the court either order that disclosure and permit her to complete the evidentiary record before she is required to appeal the disallowance of her Profit Share Claim, or to declare now that the appeal will be de novo and she will be at liberty to put in further evidence on the appeal.

[17] Further, Ms. Athanasoulis challenges the premise of the Proposal Trustee's suggested procedure since its purported efficiency (in terms of time and cost savings) will only be achieved if she loses on appeal. If she wins, there will be at least three separate steps beyond the appeal itself:

a. The valuation of her claim at a summary trial.
b. The determination of the LPs damages in a separate proceeding, and then the determination of any entitlement that they have to set-off.
c. A distribution hearing (at which priorities will be determined).

[18] Ms. Athanasoulis argues that the Proposal Trustee's suggested incremental process is inefficient and not in keeping with the principles of speed, economy and finality that s. 135 of the BIA demands of a trustee in the determination and valuation of claims.

[19] At the hearing of this motion, Ms. Athanasoulis conceded that there might be a way to defer the briefing and argument of her Future Oriented Damages claims until after the determination of the appeal of whether the Profit Share Claim is a provable claim with a value of more than "zero".

[20] Ms. Athanasoulis challenges the LPs standing to participate in the appeal of the disallowance of the Athanasoulis Claim on any matters that are being addressed by the Proposal Trustee. However, she submits that since there is overlap between the priority and subordination issues as between the Profit Share Claim and the LPs allegation against her for breach of contract and misrepresentation, she considers it to be most expeditious for the LP's Claims to be adjudicated all at once in this proceeding to avoid a multiplicity of proceedings in respect of overlapping claims.

c) The LPs' and Sponsor's Positions

[21] The LPs' and the Sponsor's positions are largely aligned. Coming into the motion, they both argued that it was premature and unnecessary for any directions to be provided by the court, in particular (for the LPs) with respect to limiting the scope of the participation in the appeal. However, once at the hearing, all were content to make submissions and receive the court's advice and directions so that the matter can move forward.

[22] The LPs and Sponsor oppose the suggestion that the court can now order that Ms. Athanasoulis' appeal of the disallowance of her claim be heard as a de novo appeal. They contend that under s. 135 of the BIA, an appeal is to be a true appeal, and not de novo, unless the court is satisfied that there was some unfairness in the process of the determination of the claim under appeal.

[23] Neither the Sponsor nor the LPs expect to be providing any further evidence or submissions if the Proposal Trustee's suggested process is adopted. They have no objection to the court allowing Ms. Athanasoulis to file further evidence and submissions addressing the specific grounds of disallowance, the points raised in the LPs further brief and submissions on the issues of enforceability of the Profit Share Agreement under the Limited Partnership Agreement and/or on the issues of subordination and priority. They invite Ms. Athanasoulis to file further evidence relevant to the Proposal Trustee's grounds for its determination to disallow her Profit Share Claim so that the record is complete before the Notice of Determination is formally issued and she can then appeal (a true appeal) based on that record.

[24] The Sponsor and the LPs agree with the Proposal Trustee that the valuation questions (including any further factual or expert evidence to decide those questions) ought to be deferred with further directions to be provided when the appeal is decided, if necessary, as to how the Athanasoulis Claim will be valued and finally determined if the preliminary grounds of disallowance are not found to preclude the proof of her Profit Share Claim. The parties concede that further evidence will be required if the Profit Share Claim is to be valued.

[25] The Proposal Trustee suggests the LPs play a limited role in the appeal process since the stated grounds for disallowance would only engage issues associated with their claims insofar as they relate to their entitlement to be repaid in full prior to any payments being made on the Athanasoulis Claim and the enforceability of any element of the Athanasoulis Claim given the terms of the Limited Partnership Agreement.

[26] Other aspects of the LPs' Claims and their claimed set-off would only arise in the event that the Athanasoulis Claim is allowed and valued above zero (upon or after any appeal). The LPs maintain that the LP's Claims cannot be determined in these bankruptcy proceedings. However, they acknowledge that there may be some overlap with the subordination/priority arguments that they seek to advance in relation to the determination of the Athanasoulis Claim and the LP's Claims being prosecuted outside of these proceedings. To that extent, they recognize that there may be some issues that, if determined in this process, will become res judicata and subject to issue estoppel in the LP's Claims civil proceeding. They are prepared to accept that outcome.

[27] The LPs are not content with the restricted role suggested for them by the Proposal Trustee in the appeal process. They contend that they should have full party standing on all issues if there is to be an appeal. They have also requested the opportunity to respond to any further evidence or submissions provided by Ms. Athanasoulis to the Proposal Trustee in support of her claim.

Analysis and Directions – Profit Share Claim

[28] The following issues require advice and direction from the court regarding the procedure for determining the Profit Share Claim:

a. Can and should the court provide directions now about whether the appeal of the Proposal Trustee's disallowance of the Profit Share Claim will be a true appeal or an appeal de novo?
b. What will the appeal record be comprised of if it is not an appeal de novo?
    i. Should Ms. Athanasoulis be permitted to obtain additional evidence by way of production from the Debtor and/or Cresford or others and an examination for discovery of a representative of them?
    ii. Should Ms. Athanasoulis be permitted to submit additional evidence and make further submissions before a final Notice of Determination is issued so that it is available to be considered by the Proposal Trustee and in the context of any appeal from the Notice of Determination?
c. What issues will the LPs have standing to participate in on the appeal?
d. What directions should the court provided regarding the procedure to be followed for the determination of the Profit Share Claim?

a) True Appeal or Appeal de novo

[29] The default for appeals of a trustee's decision under s. 135 of the BIA is that appeals are to proceed as true appeals, based on the materials relied upon by the trustee in its decision, and not de novo: see e.g. Galaxy Sports Inc. (Re), 2004 BCCA 284, 29 B.C.L.R. (4th) 362, at para. 40; Asian Concepts Franchising Corporation (Re), 2017 BCSC 1452, 51 C.B.R. (6th) 313, at para. 24. This is in keeping with the efficient and cost-effective administration of bankrupt estates and the objective of the BIA to enable parties to have their rights and claims determined in an expeditious fashion: see Credifinance Securities Limited v. DSLC Capital Corp., 2011 ONCA 160, 74 C.B.R. (5th) 161, at para. 26.

[30] The court has discretion to conduct an appeal de novo "if the Trustee committed an error or the interests of justice require it": Bambrick (Re), 2015 ONSC 7488, 32 C.B.R. (6th) 228, at para. 18. An appeal de novo may be ordered where to proceed otherwise would result in an injustice to the creditor: see Credifinance, at paras. 1, 18, 24.

[31] However, there is no basis for finding that there will be an injustice to Ms. Athanasoulis without an appeal de novo, or that the interests of justice require an appeal de novo. She was invited to provide further evidence and make further submissions if she wishes to do so before the Proposal Trustee makes the final determination of whether the Profit Share Claim is provable. No one opposes this. All parties agree that Ms. Athanasoulis should be provided with all material that the Proposal Trustee has received in connection with the Athanasoulis Claim, including material received from the LPs in December 2022 that was not initially provided to her but now has been.

[32] I do not agree with Ms. Athanasoulis' submission that there is an inherent injustice in the claims process simply because the Proposal Trustee originally agreed to arbitrate the entirety of her claim. The court ruled that procedure was an improper delegation of the Proposal Trustee's duty to determine whether the Athanasoulis Claim is provable and, if so, to value it. There is no injustice in the procedure for the determination of her claim being reset now, even if that means that the Profit Share Claim may not be fully valued (in respect of her Future Oriented Damages claims) until the determination of whether it is a provable claim and/or that it does not have a value greater than zero has been appealed and, only then, if she is successful.

[33] Nor do I agree that the Proposal Trustee's participation in phase 1 of the Arbitration and advocating for an outcome that is now reflected in its draft Notice of Determination creates an inherent injustice by allowing the Proposal Trustee to determine that her Profit Share Claim is not provable and should be disallowed. The Proposal Trustee intends to do so on similar grounds to those that it was urging the Arbitrator to consider to reach that same determination in the Arbitration. The fact that the Proposal Trustee had urged the Arbitrator to reach the same determination on the same grounds that the Proposal Trustee has now determined that the Profit Share Claim is not a provable claim, or should be valued at zero, does not derogate from the integrity of that determination. The Proposal Trustee is a court appointed officer. There is nothing in the record before the court to suggest that the Proposal Trustee did not impartially and fairly reach its determination regarding the Profit Share Claim.

[34] Ms. Athanasoulis' concern about the injustice of a true appeal is predicated on her preclusion from filing any further evidence or submissions in support of the Athanasoulis Claim before the Notice of Determination is formally issued. In circumstances where a creditor has not had a full opportunity to put forward its claim or to respond to the disallowance of a trustee, or the interests of justice otherwise require it, an appeal de novo may be appropriate: see Credifinance, at para. 24; Charlestown Residential School, Re, 2010 ONSC 4099, 70 C.B.R. (5th) 13; Poreba, Re, 2014 ONSC 277, at para. 27. See also Bambrick, at paras. 16-18.

[35] In any event, this claimed prejudice can be avoided by the directions that the court provides in this endorsement regarding additional evidence and submissions to be filed by Ms. Athanasoulis before the Notice of Determination is finalized. Ms. Athanasoulis raises a secondary concern about the delay that this procedure will entail while she gathers the necessary evidence. Notably, much of the anticipated delay would be for the retention and instruction of experts in connection with her Future Oriented Damages claims, that she has acknowledged could be deferred until after the appeal as long as her rights are preserved. However, some delay will be inevitable, particularly because, to avoid the prospect of any injustice, the Proposal Trustee will also be required to review and consider any such new evidence filed before making the final decision and issuing its Notice of Determination.

[36] I prefer to provide advice and directions now with a view to avoiding these injustices. In a complicated situation such as this, in which it is acknowledged that there are stakeholders with specific interests and evidence, it makes sense that a process be put in place to create a complete record for the Proposal Trustee's determination and for any appeal.

[37] I am not prepared to provide any directions now about whether any appeal taken from the final Notice of Determination issued by the Proposal Trustee will proceed de novo, rather than presumptively as a true appeal. If some injustice or prejudice ensues, those concerns will have to be raised with the appeal court.

b) The Appeal Record: Further Discovery and Evidence

[38] Section 135(1.1) of the BIA requires the Proposal Trustee to determine whether any contingent claim or unliquidated claim is provable and, if provable, the Proposal Trustee shall value it. The wording of this section at least allows for the possibility that the determination of whether a claim is provable might happen before the claim is valued.

[39] Ms. Athanasoulis was understandably concerned with the suggested procedure for determining the Athanasoulis Claim, in which the Proposal Trustee would issue its Notice of Determination of the Profit Share Claim based on the record to date and Ms. Athanasoulis would appeal that disallowance based on the existing record. When the court concluded that phase 2 of the Arbitration amounted to an improper delegation of the Proposal Trustee's responsibility for determining the Athanasoulis Claim, it was not intended that Ms. Athanasoulis be precluded from relying on any further evidence in support of the proof of her Profit Share Claim. Up until that time, she had quite justifiably assumed that there would be an opportunity for her to support her claim through the agreed upon arbitration process, which was cut short because of my Funding Decision, through no fault of her own.

[40] A trial-like procedure is not something that a claimant in a bankruptcy proceeding is entitled to, nor is it the norm. The proposed expansion of the Arbitration into that type of trial-like process is in part to blame for the court's decision to put an end to that process. The s. 135 claims process under the BIA is "intended to be an efficient and summary process" for the determination of claims: Asian Concepts Franchising Corporation (Re), 2018 BCSC 1022, 62 C.B.R. (6th) 123, at para. 53.

[41] That said, the court recognizes that the Profit Share Claim is the most significant claim in this bankruptcy proceeding and that it is a complex fact-dependent claim. If there is information and documents to support the Athanasoulis Claim that she anticipated having the ability to obtain from the Proposal Trustee or the Debtor and/or Cresford in the context of the Arbitration, it is reasonable to make some accommodation to enable her to access that information and documentation and include it with the material that the Proposal Trustee will be asked to consider and that will be in the record for appeal purposes.

[42] While all parties recognize that there may be some efficiency in carving out the Future Oriented Damages from the Profit Share Claim pending the determination of whether it is a provable claim under s. 135(1.1) of the BIA, there remain aspects of the procedure suggested by the Proposal Trustee that are too limiting and unfair to Ms. Athanasoulis. They include:

a. Having been advised of the grounds upon which the Proposal Trustee intends to determine that the Profit Share Claim is not a provable claim, Ms. Athanasoulis should be permitted to put the evidence that she relies upon to counter the identified grounds for this determination.
b. Similarly, having now just received the materials and submissions provided by the LPs to the Proposal Trustee in respect of the positions they seek to assert on the question of whether the Profit Share Claim is a provable claim and on the question of the subordination of that claim to the LPs' interests which they say should be given priority, fairness requires that Ms. Athanasoulis be given the opportunity to put into the record any evidence and submissions that she relies upon to counter the LPs' positions.

[43] A procedure must be established that will ensure that the evidence that Ms. Athanasoulis seeks to rely upon is available in an established record before the Proposal Trustee makes its determination of whether the Profit Share Claim is provable.

[44] Under a reservation of rights, the valuation of the Future Oriented Damages included in the Profit Share Claim (beyond the ascribed "zero" valuation by the Proposal Trustee for reasons that do not involve an actual valuation) can be deferred, along with all evidence and submissions about the calculation of these Future Oriented Damages, until after the appeal of the Proposal Trustee's determination to disallow it.

[45] As mentioned earlier, during oral argument, counsel for Ms. Athanasoulis agreed that it might be more efficient and economical to defer the valuation of her Future Oriented Damages claims (based on the repudiation date or the date of the Proposal), given that those valuations will be dependent upon expert input, until the appeal of the determination of whether the Profit Share Claim is provable on the principled/legal grounds (equity vs. profit, earned vs. realized profits and subordinated to the LPs' Claims) has been decided (with a reservation of her right to pursue those Future Oriented Damages if the appeal succeeds).

[46] In addition to evidence that Ms. Athanasoulis may already have and that could be compiled for submission to the Proposal Trustee, she has identified further evidence that she may need to obtain from the Debtor (and/or Cresford). For example, evidence to counter the Proposal Trustee's determination that the Profit Share Claim is to be valued at zero predicated on the assumption that there were no profits in the YSL Project at, or at any time prior to, the date of the Proposal (because it was not built). Ms. Athanasoulis is entitled to test that determination. To do so she may need additional production from the Debtor and/or Cresford of historic financial documents, beyond those that she has already received. Insofar as the Proposal Trustee is in control of any of the Debtor's records that Ms. Athanasoulis may ask for, it too may be required to produce documents to Ms. Athanasoulis.

[47] I agree with Ms. Athanasoulis that if the goal is to create a record now that can be used for a true appeal, the issues identified in the Proposal Trustee's draft Notice of Determination warrant an opportunity for a further exchange of materials and some (circumscribed and limited) cross-examinations so that there is a complete record for the appeal.

[48] While the claims process is intended to a summary process and not a full adjudicative process with a trial, this is a complex claim with a multitude of competing interests. Fairness requires that Ms. Athanasoulis be given access to documentary records (and a witness from the Debtor or Cresford who can explain/prove them, if necessary) that she needs to prove her claim and counter the grounds upon which it is expected to be ruled by the Proposal Trustee not to be provable.

[49] The court has the jurisdiction to order this under its general discretionary powers in s. 183(1)(a) of the BIA. See also Toronto-Dominion Bank v. Brad Duby Professional Corporation, 2022 ONSC 6066, at para. 33. In this instance, the use of those powers in the unique circumstances of this case is appropriate to ensure procedural fairness in the determination of the Athanasoulis Claim and any appeals that may arise from the Proposal Trustee's determination.

c) Standing of the LPs on the Appeal of the Profit Share Claim Disallowance

[50] The LP's Claims are not part of this proceeding, except to the extent that they are relevant to the identified grounds for the Proposal Trustee's intended disallowance of the Profit Share Claim. I cannot accede to the request from Ms. Athanasoulis to order the LP's Claims to be adjudicated on their merits in this proceeding, absent the consent of the LPs, which is not forthcoming.

[51] The Proposal Trustee suggests that the LPs be entitled only to raise issues in the appeal that pertain directly to: (a) whether the LPs must be repaid in full prior to any payments being made on the Athanasoulis Claim (the enforceability of the Profit Share Claim as against the LPs, which in turn is tied into preliminary questions of subordination and priority); and (b) the enforceability of any element of the Athanasoulis Claim given the terms of the Limited Partnership Agreement."

[52] The LPs argue that because they would be the ones most immediately and directly impacted by any aspect of the Athanasoulis Claim that is allowed, and by the value ascribed to any allowed claim, they should have full participation rights on all issues. At some level, every creditor has an interest in minimizing or eliminating the claims of other creditors on equal footing. That is not a reason to grant the LPs advance standing on an appeal, or even to give them full standing in the determination of the Athanasoulis Claim.

[53] The Proposal Trustee's suggestion is reasonable and strikes the appropriate balance. Subject, always, to the discretion of the judge hearing the appeal, I see no reason to grant the LPs carte blanche to double down on all the arguments already being made by the Proposal Trustee. The LPs have a legitimate interest in bringing forward any unique evidence, claims and arguments that they can offer, but not to duplicate or pile onto arguments already being made by the Proposal Trustee.

[54] I consider this situation to be distinguishable from another situation that arose in this case, in relation to a different proof of claim: see YG Limited Partnership and YSL Residences Inc., 2022 ONSC 6548 (now under appeal). In that circumstance, the LPs were held not to have any standing to participate in the adjudication of a creditor's claim at the de novo appeal of a claim filed by CBRE involving a contract that the LPs had no involvement in or evidence to offer in respect thereof. The justification for not granting the LPs standing in that situation was fact specific (as it often is). Notably, as well, no one in the circumstances of this case is suggesting that the LPs should have no standing to address any issues on appeal.

[55] Here, the LPs have been afforded standing to provide evidence and make submissions to the Proposal Trustee in connection with the Notice of Determination regarding the "provability" of the Profit Share Claim. They have a unique perspective to offer with respect to their argument that the Profit Share Agreement should be found to be unenforceable because it is contrary to the Limited Partnership Agreement (a ground not relied upon by the Proposal Trustee but raised and therefore forms part of the record for appeal purposes that Ms. Athanasoulis must respond to).

[56] The LPs may also have a unique perspective on the preliminary question of whether the Profit Share Agreement can be enforced in the face of Ms. Athanasoulis' admissions that she agreed with the LPs that they would be paid out before her. These unique perspectives have been placed before the Proposal Trustee; Ms. Athanasoulis will be permitted to respond to and challenge them, and they will be "in play" on any appeal.

[57] Subject to the discretion and views of the judge hearing the appeal, I would anticipate that the LPs will have at least some status at the appeal to address at least these points, but perhaps not beyond them.

[58] Finally, the certainty and finality that the determination of these issues will bring is important because of the LP's Claims outside of this proceeding. The LPs need to be given standing to participate in order for an issue estoppel to arise so as to prevent the re-litigation of the same points in the context of the LP's Claims.

[59] For all these reasons, it is anticipated that the LPs will be afforded an opportunity to participate on the appeal to the extent of any unique or added perspective or submissions that they have that are not advanced by the Proposal Trustee, or that the Proposal Trustee defers to the LPs on. In contrast, the LPs should not expect to be permitted to make submissions on points already being addressed by the Proposal Trustee, such as, the argument that the Profit Share Claim is a claim in equity, not a debt owing by the Debtor.

[60] The LPs asked to be afforded the opportunity to make further submissions in response to Ms. Athanasoulis' further evidence and submissions. I do not consider that to be necessary or appropriate. However, if the Proposal Trustee asks them for further information or documents after receiving the further evidence and submissions from Ms. Athanasoulis, whatever the LPs provide must be given to Ms. Athanasoulis as well.

d) Directions Regarding the Procedure for the Determination of the Profit Share Claim

[61] Having considered all the written and oral submissions received, and in the exercise of my discretion, the following directions are provided in respect of the suggested procedure by the Proposal Trustee for the determination and appeal of the Profit Share Claim:

a. Within one week of the release of this endorsement, Ms. Athanasoulis will be provided with a complete record of all evidence and submissions received from other stakeholders in connection with the Proposal Trustee's draft Notice of Determination with respect to her Profit Share Claim. This may have already occurred by the delivery of materials previously provided by the LPs to the Proposal Trustee just prior to the hearing of this motion; however, in the interests of completeness a further week is being afforded to ensure that she has now been provided with all materials.
b. Within two weeks of the release of this endorsement, Ms. Athanasoulis may make reasonable and targeted document requests from the Proposal Trustee, the Debtor and/or Cresford, or any other participating party for documents that she does not have and claims she needs to support the proof of the Athanasoulis Claim and to establish that it should be valued at more than "zero" (for example, in support of any grounds upon which she challenges the Proposal Trustee's determination that there were no profits in the YSL Project as at the date of the Proposal or at any time prior to that date).
c. Ms. Athanasoulis' requests shall be responded to, and any documents that are in the possession, control or power of the Proposal Trustee or the Debtor and/or Cresford shall be provided, within three weeks of any such request.
d. Within two months of the release of this endorsement, Ms. Athanasoulis shall deliver her submissions and a supplementary record containing any further evidence that she relies upon in support of the Athanasoulis Claim or that she relies upon to challenge any determination that may be made to disallow her Profit Share Claim on the grounds that:

i. it is equity, not debt;
ii. the YSL Project did not generate any profits at, or at any time prior to, the date of the Proposal;
iii. it is to be subordinated to the LPs return of equity (that will inevitably be subject to a shortfall) because of representations to that effect made to the LPs by Ms. Athanasoulis; and/or
iv. it is not enforceable as against the LPs because it was entered into in breach of the Limited Partnership Agreement, breach of fiduciary duties owed to the LPs by the general partner and/or misrepresentations made to the LPs by Ms. Athanasoulis.

e. The Proposal Trustee may request further submissions, evidence or documents in respect of its consideration and assessment of the supplementary material provided by Ms. Athanasoulis, the Debtor, the LPs or elsewhere as it deems appropriate. Any such evidence or documents shall be requested by the Proposal Trustee and provided to Ms. Athanasoulis within four weeks of the delivery of her supplementary record.

f. Within two weeks after the provision of any further evidence or documents received by the Proposal Trustee (or the deadline for so doing),
v. the Proposal Trustee may question (by way of an examination under oath) Ms. Athanasoulis about any evidence or submissions she provides in support of the proof of the Athanasoulis Claim;
vi. Ms. Athanasoulis may examine a representative of the Debtor and/or Cresford under oath on the question of whether there were any profits in the YSL Project as at the date of the Proposal or at any time prior to that date.

g. The Proposal Trustee shall deliver to all interested parties its final Notice of Determination in accordance with s. 135(3) of the BIA (which may, in the Proposal Trustee's discretion, be revised from the draft Notice of Determination previously delivered, taking into account the additional evidence and submissions it receives) within two weeks of the completion of any questioning/cross-examinations (or the date for their completion having lapsed).

h. Ms. Athanasoulis may thereafter appeal the Proposal Trustee's Notice of Determination and its anticipated disallowance of any aspect of the Athanasoulis Claim in the normal course in accordance with s. 135(3) of the BIA.

i. Subject to the discretion of the appeal judge, the LPs standing on the appeal shall be limited to submissions in respect of the impact of the prohibition contained in the Limited Partnership Agreement on non-arm's length agreements (such as the Profit Sharing Agreement), on the question of enforceability of the Profit Share Claim and in respect of the priority/subordination of the Profit Share Claim to the LPs recovery of their initial investment based on alleged breaches of contractual and fiduciary duties and alleged misrepresentations.

j. If the parties require further directions or clarifications from the court as they progress through these steps, a case conference may be requested before me through the Commercial List scheduling office.

[62] I realize that this will result in a number of months delay in the ultimate determination of the Athanasoulis Claim before any appeal; however, it is still a far less cumbersome process than what was contemplated by the Arbitration, and it is a process that places the determination of the provability of the Athanasoulis Claim, and its valuation, in the hands of the Proposal Trustee.

[63] To be clear, it is not expected that there will be any material or submissions at this time regarding the Future Oriented Damages (whether calculated at the repudiation date or the Proposal date). If Ms. Athanasoulis is successful on appeal of any disallowance of the Profit Share Claim, the parties shall make an appointment for a case conference before me (if my schedule permits within the time frame requested) to seek directions about the process for the determination of the more complex valuation question that will likely require expert input.

Analysis and Directions – Wrongful Dismissal Claim

[64] The Proposal Trustee allowed the Wrongful Dismissal Claim in part and valued it at $880,000. $120,000 was discounted because the Proposal Trustee determined that this amount had already been paid to Ms. Athanasoulis in the context of another proceeding. It has not been suggested that there is a need for further evidence or submissions in respect of the Proposal Trustee's determination of this claim reflected in the draft Notice of Determination. If Ms. Athanasoulis has further evidence or submissions on the narrow question of whether she has already received $120,000 on account of this claim, those may be provided to the Proposal Trustee when she delivers her supplementary record in connection with the Profit Share Claim (as indicated in the previous section, to be provided within two months of this endorsement).

[65] The issues raised for the court's consideration in respect of this aspect of the Athanasoulis Claim are:

a. Whether the LPs have standing in respect of the determination of the Wrongful Dismissal Claim.
b. Should the allowed portion of this claim be paid out in a manner consistent with other employee claims, or deferred until the appeal and other steps in the determination of the entire Athanasoulis Claim have been resolved?

[66] The Proposal Trustee is of the view that the LPs have no standing with respect to the Proposal Trustee's determination of the Wrongful Dismissal Claim for the reasons set out in the decision of Osborne J. in respect of the CBRE claim (discussed earlier in this endorsement at paragraph 54, YG Limited Partnership and YSL Residences Inc.). The Proposal Trustee is aware that certain of the LPs have appealed this decision.

[67] There has been no indication that the LPs have any unique perspective or evidence to offer in respect of this issue (unlike the Profit Share Claim, where they do, and have accordingly been afforded rights of participation commensurate with their unique perspective and evidence). I do not see any basis on which they should be involving themselves in the determination or valuation of the Wrongful Dismissal Claim.

[68] It will be a matter for the Proposal Trustee to decide, but it was indicated at the hearing that the "allowed" portion of the Wrongful Dismissal Claim will be treated in same way as "like" employee claims which, if not appealed, have been paid out at 70 cents on the dollar.

Costs and Final Disposition

[69] The Proposal Trustee does not seek costs from any party in respect of this motion.

[70] Ms. Athanasoulis and the LPs asked that the court reserve to the parties the ability to request their costs of this motion if there is a future adjudication of costs in connection with the determination and valuation of the Athanasoulis Claim. That makes sense and I so order.

[71] The Court's orders and directions are set out in paragraph 61 in the previous sections of this endorsement and will not be repeated. This endorsement and the orders and directions contained in it shall have the immediate effect of a court order without the necessity of a formal order being taken out. Any party may take out a formal order by following the procedure under r. 59.

JUDGMENT LIAN M. SCHWANN, Q.C.
November 26, 2009 Registrar in Bankruptcy

[1] There are two matters before me. The first is an appeal under s. 135 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA") by the Business Development Bank of Canada ("BDC") of the trustee's disallowance of its security, and the second is Darrell Pyne's application for discharge from bankruptcy. All parties agreed to adjourn the bankrupt's discharge hearing pending the outcome of the BDC appeal. This is my decision on the appeal.

Factual Backdrop

[2] The bankrupt operated a mobile welding business as a sole proprietor under the business name "Pyne's Welding". He borrowed $50,000 from BDC for purposes of building a welding shop, purchasing tools and equipment and creating working capital for Pyne's Welding.

[3] Pyne executed a general security agreement with BDC on June 20, 2007 ("GSA") to secure repayment of the loan. Pursuant to its terms, security was granted in all of Pyne's present and after acquired personal property, including all trade equipment and goods, and without limitation, all machinery, tools, fixtures, motor vehicles and all parts, components, attachments, accessories, accessions thereto.

[4] The GSA was registered in the Personal Property Registry ("PPR") on June 19, 2007. At no time did BDC take a specific security interest in the bankrupt's 1997 Ford F 350 truck, the subject matter at the core of this appeal, nor did BDC register the truck by serial number at the PPR.

[5] The terms of repayment were generous. Pyne was given a one year grace period with payments to commence in July 2008. No payments were made and the loan fell into default. Pyne assigned into bankruptcy on August 7, 2008.

[6] The truck in question was far more than a mere vehicle as Pyne operated his mobile welding business from it. Welding equipment required to operate his mobile business was affixed in some manner to the truck, with his welding tools also stored in it although not affixed to it. In his affidavit Pyne claims to have maintained continuous possession of the truck and equipment from the time of insolvency until the date of hearing but for the month of June 2009 when he placed the truck at an auction house believing it was non-exempt. Receiving legal advice to the contrary, he reclaimed the truck and has since asserted an exemption over it.

[7] In the Statement of Affairs prepared and signed by Pyne an exemption was claimed over the truck.

[8] Pyne has no other source of income and is dependent on the truck, equipment and tools to earn a living both now and in the future.

[9] BDC filed a proof of claim with the trustee claiming a security interest pursuant to the terms of its GSA. The trustee disallowed the security to the extent of $50,086.78 giving the following reasons:

> The value of your general security agreement is based on assets at the date of bankruptcy and subject to provincial exemptions. We have determined that the value of your security attaches to the non-exempt portion of the tools of trade ($1,500.00). The general security agreement does not attach to furniture and appliances, personal effects, real property or any motorized vehicle that is not registered by serial number.

Position of the Parties

BDC

[10] BDC acknowledges that it did not specifically register its interest by serial number of the truck. As the truck falls under 'equipment' within the meaning of The Personal Property Security Act, 1993, S.S. 1993, c.P-6.2 ("PPSA"), the truck is considered a 'serial numbered good'. They argue that the PPSA is designed to maximize protection for secured creditors who register goods by serial number without forcing them to do so. Failure to register by serial number simply affects priorities under the Act, and a secured creditor who describes equipment in generic terms has priority against the trustee in bankruptcy.

[11] BDC further argues that as its security was properly executed and registered, the trustee's disallowance was improper and should be quashed. The fact Pyne may not have sufficient exigible assets to satisfy the amount of the secured loan does not mean that its security is invalid and consequently disallowed. Disallowance of security results in it being extinguished which is inconsistent with the 'hands off' approach accorded secured creditors under the BIA and prejudicial to its rights.

[12] In the absence of any evidence that the security was not executed or was unperfected, the trustee improperly disallowed it. Instead, they argue, the trustee should have allowed its security but listed BDC as an unsecured creditor for the appropriate amount. By disallowing the security, the trustee has improperly extinguished BDC's rights under the security agreement thereby preventing it from a full and proper exercise of its rights.

[13] With regard to the exemption issue, BDC says Pyne lost this status over the truck because he was no longer engaged in the mobile welding business on the date of assignment. They refer to his Statement of Affairs in which Pyne admits to having ceased business one month prior to assignment. In the alternative, they argue, the 'welding rig' was more akin to 'trade tools' or 'equipment' rather than a motor vehicle. And finally, BDC says that even if the unit was exempt, Pyne voluntarily waived his exemption by delivering the truck to the auctioneer.

The Trustee

[14] When security takes the form of a general security agreement, the trustee typically values available assets and compares that valuation to the amount secured. In disallowing BDC's security, the trustee accepted Pyne's valuation of the truck set out in his Statement of Affairs ($15,000), factored in the exemption and concluded there would be no realization for BDC.

[15] BDC's failure to register its security by serial number against the truck formed the second basis for disallowance. The trustee's position is simple. The PPSA requires serial number registration for vehicles which BDC failed to do, accordingly, in a dispute with the trustee in bankruptcy, BDC loses. The trustee concedes that if the unit constitutes 'tools' as opposed to a 'vehicle', BDC was not required to register by serial number to preserve its priority.

Pyne

[16] Pyne claimed exempt status over the truck in his Statement of Affairs. His counsel claims Pyne's right to exemption must be ascertained at the date of assignment, as reflected in that document. He says Pyne was actively involved in using his truck and equipment to pursue journeyman status as a welder at the time of assignment and throughout his bankruptcy, and continues to utilize his truck and welding equipment to earn income. The fact Pyne may have temporarily placed the truck with an auctioneer for a month following assignment (June 2009) is irrelevant. Nothing happened to the truck; it simply sat on the lot.

[17] For a period of time Pyne worked as an employee of a welding company however was soon laid off. At paragraph 7 of his affidavit Pyne said: "That I intend to continue to operate my welding business using the 1997 Ford F 350 and the welding equipment and tools located on it to earn my living and will need it in the future as an independent welder."

Legislative Backdrop

[18] This appeal arises out of s.135 of the BIA. It provides:

> Trustee shall examine proof
> 135. (1) The trustee shall examine every proof of claim or proof of security and the grounds therefor and may require further evidence in support of the claim or security.
> Determination of provable claims
> (1.1) The trustee shall determine whether any contingent claim or unliquidated claim is a provable claim, and, if a provable claim, the trustee shall value it, and the claim is thereafter, subject to this section, deemed a proved claim to the amount of its valuation.
> Disallowance by trustee
> (2) The trustee may disallow, in whole or in part,
> (a) any claim;
> (b) any right to a priority under the applicable order of priority set out in this Act; or
> (c) any security.
> Notice of determination or disallowance
> (3) Where the trustee makes a determination under subsection (1.1) or, pursuant to subsection (2), disallows, in whole or in part, any claim, any right to a priority or any security, the trustee shall forthwith provide, in the prescribed manner, to the person whose claim was subject to a determination under subsection (1.1) or whose claim, right to a priority or security was disallowed under subsection (2), a notice in the prescribed form setting out the reasons for the determination or disallowance.
> Determination or disallowance final and conclusive
> (4) A determination under subsection (1.1) or a disallowance referred to in subsection (2) is final and conclusive unless, within a thirty day period after the service of the notice referred to in subsection (3) or such further time as the court may on application made within that period allow, the person to whom the notice was provided appeals from the trustee's decision to the court in accordance with the General Rules.
> Expunge or reduce a proof
> (5) The court may expunge or reduce a proof of claim or a proof of security on the application of a creditor or of the debtor if the trustee declines to interfere in the matter. [emphasis added]

Analysis

[19] There are two issues in this appeal:

(a) whether the appeal is on the record or de novo and the appropriate standard of review; and

(b) whether the trustee erred in disallowing BDC's security on the basis that the truck had no value on realization or because BDC failed to register its interest by serial number.

(a) nature of a s. 135 appeal and standard of review

[20] The trustee is required by the BIA to examine each proof of claim. Under s. 135(2), the trustee is empowered to disallow any claim in whole or in part, or to disallow any security. The disallowance is final and conclusive unless appealed pursuant to s. 135(4) within the time permitted for doing so.

[21] An appeal under s. 135 must begin with consideration of whether a s. 135 appeal is a true appeal, in which case fresh evidence cannot be admitted, or if it is to proceed on a de novo basis. Case law is divided on this point. (see: Re Eskasoni Fisheries Ltd. (2000), 16 C.B.R.(4th) 173 (NSSC); Re Galaxy Sports Inc., 2004 BCCA 284, 1 C.B.R. (5th) 20; Johnson v. Erdman, 2005 SKQB 515, 18 C.B.R. (5th) 97 (under appeal to SKCA)).

[22] Subsequent cases have concluded that, notwithstanding the decisions in Galaxy Sports and Johnson, courts may determine this issue on a case by case basis having regard to the facts and circumstances of each. (Re San Juan Resources, Inc., 2009 ABQB 55, 52 C.B.R. (5th) 97; see also Lloyd's Non-Marine Underwriters v. J.J. Lacey Insurance Ltd., 2008 NLTD 9; 41 C.B.R. (5th) 137)

[23] I am prepared to treat this as a de novo appeal. The trustee did not prepare and file a 'record' however several affidavits were filed which effectively served the same purpose as well as providing a foundation for the eventual discharge hearing. There has been no loss of efficiency or increased formality in receiving this material and hearing argument on a de novo basis.

[24] Where the trustee's decision involves a question of law or the interpretation of a statute, the standard of review is correctness. On the other hand, where the matter under consideration is factual in nature or involves a discretionary element, the standard of review is reasonableness. (Eskasoni and Lloyd's Non-Marine Underwriters)

b) disallowance of security because the truck had no realizable value or failure to register by serial number [25] The trustee has a duty to examine every proof of claim and every proof of security along with the grounds in support to determine the validity of each. (s. 135(1)). If further evidence is required for such purpose, the trustee may demand it.

[26] Section 135(2) empowers a trustee to disallow any security in whole or in part. On its face, this provision confers broad discretionary authority on trustees, however this section must be read in light of the overarching scheme of the BIA and other provisions of the Act pertaining to secured creditors.

[27] The interface between trustees acting pursuant to the BIA and secured creditors has been broadly described as follows:

> From its inception, bankruptcy law has been viewed as a regime that does not directly affect the position of secured creditors of the bankrupt. The hands-off approach to security interests in bankrupts' property is highlighted in section 136 of the BIA. This section sets out the priority structure that must be applied by a trustee in bankruptcy when distributing the property of the bankrupt among the various claimants to it. All the priority rules set out in the section are made 'subject to the rights of secured creditors.' This approach is also evident in section 70(1) that states the effect of an assignment or receiving order in bankruptcy on the rights of creditors of the bankrupt. The 'rights of secured creditors' are excepted from the precedence that bankruptcy has over the creditors' rights arising outside of bankruptcy. Section 71(2) vests the bankrupt's property in the trustee 'subject to … the rights of secured creditors.' Section 69.3, which stays enforcement of creditors' rights against a bankrupt, affects secured creditors, but only in very limited circumstances and for only a short period of time. (Cuming, Walsh & Wood, Personal Property Security Law (Toronto: Irwin Law, 2005) at p. 427.)

[28] The power of disallowance of security was added by amendment to the Act in 1992 (S.C. 1992, c. 27, s. 53) and there have been few decided cases. Two issues which have received judicial treatment involve the finality and enforceability of the underlying security interest by a s. 135 determination and the interplay between partial disallowance of security and the redemption / realization provisions of the Act.

[29] The effect of a trustee's disallowance of security and the finality of the s. 135 process arose in the Saskatchewan case of Chaban v. Chaban (Bankrupt) et al. (1998), 165 Sask. R. 114. In a related foreclosure action the plaintiff argued that disallowance of security under s. 135, which he failed to appeal, did not affect his right to realize upon his security (a mortgage) in accordance with provincial law. Rather, he argued, the disallowance simply operated as a bar to claim on estate dividends. Smith, J. (as she then was) held to the contrary in finding that disallowance of security under s. 135 was final and binding which consequently meant the security was extinguished. At para. 8 she said:

> 8 This argument does not succeed. It is true that s. 69.3(2) provides that "the bankruptcy of a debtor does not prevent a secured creditor from realizing or otherwise dealing with his security in the same manner as he would have been entitled to realize or deal with it if this section had not been passed". That provision, however, is expressly subject to ss. 79 and 127 to 135. A review of those sections makes it clear that even if the secured creditor does not seek to participate in the dividends of the estate, the trustee may require a proof of claim, and may take actions that affect the security interest. That power extends to the power set out in s. 135(2)(c) to disallow the security. This provision would be meaningless if the secured creditor were permitted, despite the disallowance, to realize upon the security as against the trustee, as the plaintiff seeks to do in this action. It is my conclusion that the effect of a final and binding disallowance of a security under s. 135 is that the creditor's security is gone and the trustee assumes the bankrupt's interest in that property free of the security interest claimed. This conclusion is supported by the learned authors of Houlden and Morawetz, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada (3rd ed.) Vol. 2, who, at G section 68, have commented on the above noted fiat of Krueger J. in the instant case. They agreed that the court had properly held that to remove the caveat the trustee had to follow the procedure prescribed by The Land Titles Act, but they go on to express the view that, in such an application, the disallowance would be conclusive:
> > If the claim was properly disallowed, the disallowance is final and conclusive, and the creditor's security is gone. If the proper procedure had been followed, the court would have had no discretion but to remove the caveat. The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act governs in this situation, not provincial law.

[The Chaban decision was overturned on appeal on different grounds (177 Sask.R. 139 (Sask.C.A.).]

[30] The other line of cases concerns the apparent overlap and confusion between the trustee's duty to examine the security and the valuation and redemption of it. "The matter of the redemption and sale of security is dealt with in ss. 128(3), 129 and 130. There is no conflict between ss. 128(3), 129, 130 and 135; they are dealing with different matters." Houlden and Morawetz, Bankruptcy & Insolvency Law, looseleaf, fourth ed., vol 2, pages 5-190.

[31] McEwen (Re) (1997), 47 C.B.R. (3d) 64 (N.B.Q.B.) (upheld on appeal at (1997), 193 N.B.R. (2d) 31 (N.B.C.A.) addressed the question of whether the trustee's valuation of security under s. 135 is the same value to be used for purposes of redemption or realization under s. 130 of the Act. In this case the trustee partially disallowed the security to the extent of $349,059, allowing only the market value of the property of roughly $25,335. (The mortgage payout was $374,395.) The bank appealed the partial disallowance but in related proceedings the trustee served a s. 128(1) notice on the bank requiring it to file proof of security. The bank responded by filing its mortgage and valuing the property in question equal to the amount outstanding on the mortgage. Pursuant to s. 130 the bank required the trustee to elect to either redeem the security or require it to be realized. The trustee valued the secured property at the market value of the asset which was substantially less than the bank's mortgage and disallowed the balance under s. 135(2)(c).

[32] The trustee applied for directions on the amount required to be paid to either redeem the security or pay out if the property were sold. The trustee argued that the pay out price on redemption or realization was the same value declared by the trustee in its s. 135(2)(c) determination. In effect, the trustee drew a direct link between the security disallowance process in s. 135 and the redemption process in s. 129. The court did not accept the trustee's position saying the following:

> 21 I am not persuaded by this argument. Section 135 does not go to the value of the security for the purpose of redemption or sale. That section goes to the allowance or disallowance, in whole or in part, of the security itself for the purpose of the distribution of dividends from the bankrupt estate.
> 22 The matters of redemption and sale are dealt with in section 128(3), 129 and 130. Section 128(3) is clear and I do not see where it is repugnant to the intent and purpose of section 135(2). …
>
> 24 This appears to me to be the way the Act contemplates redemption by the Trustee or realization on the security to take place. I find nothing in the election required under section 128(3) to indicate anything to the contrary or to relate values associated with a disallowance under section 134(2) to effect the operation of section 128(3).

> 5 The Judge noted that ss. 128-130 deal with redemption and realization, and that s. 128(3) "is clear and I do not see where it is repugnant to the intent and purpose of section 135(2)." He commented that s. 128(3) permits the Trustee to redeem the security upon payment of either the money owed to the secured creditor or the value of the security as assessed by the secured creditor. Further, if the trustee is dissatisfied with the secured creditor's assessed value, s. 129 provides the Trustee with a procedure to force a sale of the security. The Judge concluded that a disallowance of value under s. 135(2) does not affect the operation of s. 128(3) and, as a result, Trustee elections to redeem or realize under either ss. 128 or 129 of the Act are also not affected.

[34] The decision in St. Anne-Nackawic Pulp Co. (Trustee of) v. New Brunswick (Minister of Business), 2005 NBQB 99, 11 C.B.R. (5th) 296, touches on these same issues. By notice under

s. 128(1) of the BIA the trustee required the secured creditor (Province) to file proof of security along with a valuation of the security on an individual asset basis. The security held by the Province was a 'wrap around' security (debenture and general security agreement) with no specific debt assigned to particular assets. The Court held that because of the nature of the Province's security, s. 128 of the BIA did not require the Province to assign a particular value to each piece of security and only when the secured creditor requires the trustee to make an election under s. 130 is individual valuation required.

Application to the facts of this case

[35] Where a security is disallowed by a trustee, the onus rests with the appellant to prove the validity of the security. (Re Adomako (1998), 5 C.B.R. (4th) 158)

a) valuation of asset ground

[36] Section 135 does not specify the grounds upon which a security can be disallowed or for that matter the information required to be filed by a secured party. Form 31 - Proof of Claim – requires secured creditors to provide a copy of the security documents and full particulars including the date on which the security was given and the value at which the security is assessed.

[37] The trustee did not challenge the validity of BDC's security agreement and accepts that it was registered at the PPR before the date of assignment. Disallowance was based simply on a valuation exercise by comparing the value of the truck (ascertained from the Statement of Affairs) to the amount of BDC's security.

[38] The trustee characterized its 'valuation approach' to security disallowance as accepted practice for both secured creditors and trustees alike in this province. With respect, this approach improperly mixes redemption and sale of assets with proof of security. The New Brunswick Court of Appeal in McEwen made clear that the power of disallowance under s. 135 does not involve an assessment of collateral value. Section 128(3) empowers trustees to redeem the security upon payment of the amount owed to the secured creditor or the value of the security as assessed. If that doesn't prove satisfactory to the trustee, s.129 allows the trustee to force the sale of the collateral.

[39] While the trustee's approach in this case may be a pragmatic one when faced with a GSA and minimal debtor assets, disallowance based purely on the trustee's assessment of available assets and other practicalities unfairly and improperly prejudices BDC's position. As observed in Chaban, disallowance of security under s. 135 is final and conclusive and effectively extinguishes rights of secured creditors absent a successful appeal. This is a stark result with residual effect. As BDC appropriately points out, disallowance eliminates other rights such as subsequent enforcement if Pyne voluntarily sells the truck or recovery of insurance proceeds if the welding rig is damaged or lost.

[40] On its face, and without any suggestion otherwise, BDC's security was properly executed, registered at the PPR before assignment and is in all respects a valid and enforceable security agreement. The trustee's disallowance of security on this ground was improper and is set aside. Because of my conclusion on this ground, it is unnecessary to decide the exemption issue at this time.

b) failure to register by serial number ground

[41] The second ground upon which BDC's security was disallowed is BDC's failure to register the truck by serial number. It is clear that under provincial law, an unperfected security interest is subordinate to the trustee in bankruptcy. (The Personal Property Security Act, 1993, S.S. 1993, c. P-6.2 ("PPSA"), s. 20(2)(a)).

[42] It is common ground that the security interest of BDC was registered in June 2007, a full year before Pyne's assignment into bankruptcy and that BDC did not register by serial number. It is also undisputed that the truck falls under category of 'equipment' for purposes of the PPSA (see s. 2(1)(p)), which is a 'serial numbered good' by virtue of s. 2(1)(u) of The Personal Property Security Regulations.

[43] Failure to register by serial number is not per se fatal but instead affects priorities. The consequence of this failure has been described in this fashion:

> Different consequences are associated with the decision to describe serial numbered equipment in the general collateral description field. When "serial numbered goods" are held by the debtor as equipment or inventory, the secured party has the option to describe the goods in general terms or specifically by serial number. The choice of one method of registration over the other is not without consequence. If the secured party chooses to describe the equipment by serial number in the appropriate field on the financing statement, the maximum level of protection against competing interests is obtained. . . . If the secured party chooses to describe the equipment only in general terms in the general collateral description field of the financing statement, his security interest has priority only with respect to seizing creditors and the trustee in bankruptcy of the debtor. (Cuming and Wood, Saskatchewan and Manitoba Personal Property Security Acts Handbook (Toronto: Carswell, 1994) at pp. 280-81)
> If the secured party fails to describe the equipment by serial number, it will be considered perfected in respect of a competition with a trustee in bankruptcy or an enforcement creditor. However, it will be considered unperfected in competitions with other secured parties, and will risk subordination if the competing secured party has described the equipment by serial number. (Cuming, Walsh & Wood, p. 324; see also PPSA, supra, ss. 30(6), 30(7), 35(4).)

[44] Neither the BIA or provincial law provides the trustee with the status to attack the priority of BDC's description of equipment in generic terms instead of by serial number registration. This is a legal question and therefore the standard of review is correctness. The trustee erred in its interpretation and application of the PPSA on this issue therefore the trustee's disallowance on this ground was improper and should be set aside.

Disposition

[45] The appeal is allowed and the trustee's disallowance of BDC's security is set aside. BDC shall have costs of $500 payable from the estate.

ENDORSEMENT

Introduction

[1] Casimir Capital Ltd. (the "Debtor") moves by way of appeal from or review of the decision of the Proposal Trustee at the July 28, 2014 first meeting of creditors (the "Meeting") permitting certain creditors to vote.

[2] At the Meeting, 93.7% of the creditors, with proofs of claim totaling $1,446,600.13 voted against Casimir's proposal (the "Proposal"). Only 6.3% of creditors, with proofs of claim totaling $97,247.63 voted in favour of the Proposal.

[3] The Debtor now moves pursuant to s. 135(5) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985. C. B-3 as amended ("BIA"), to set aside or annul the deemed assignment in bankruptcy; to set aside the Proofs of Claim of Royal Capital Management Corp. ("RoyCap"), Gowling Lafleur Henderson LLP ("Gowlings"), Adam Thomas ("Thomas") and Fidessa Canada Corp. ("Fidessa") (collectively the "Disputed Creditors") and the votes cast by the Disputed Creditors at the Meeting; and a declaration that the Meeting was ineffective or adjourned.

[4] For the reasons that follow, I dismiss the Debtor's motion. In my view, the Proposal Trustee was correct in permitting the Disputed Creditors to vote on the Proposal at the Meeting. Further, and even if the votes of the Disputed Creditors are set aside, 69.4% of the remaining creditors whose claims were not disputed voted against the Proposal such that it would not have passed in any event.

Background

[5] The following are my findings of fact from the material filed.

[6] The Debtor is an Ontario company and carried on the business as an intermediary or broker of various underwritings and placements. Up until January 31, 2014 when it resigned, it was a member and registered as a securities dealer with the Investment Industry Regulatory Organization of Canada ("IIROC"). It is wholly owned by Casimir Capital Group, LLC, a holding company based in New York, which in turn is owned by Richard Sands ("Sands") who is a director of the Debtor.

[7] On February 11, 2014, the Debtor filed a Notice of Intention to Make a Proposal. Crowe Soberman Inc. was the Proposal Trustee. The Debtor filed the Proposal on March 11, 2014. As part of the Proposal proceedings, the Debtor's creditors filed proofs of claim with the Proposal Trustee. The creditors who filed proofs of claim included RoyCap ($650,000); Gowlings ($246,823.14), Thomas ($103,517.00) and Fidessa ($225,258.68).

[8] At the time of filing its Notice of Intention to make a proposal, the Debtor filed a statement of affairs, sworn by Sands, which listed the assets and liabilities, and included a listing all of the creditors of the Debtor and the amounts owing to them which totaled $3,926,161.05. The listing specifically included the amounts owing to RoyCap, Gowlings, Thomas and Fidessa. The assets listed consisted of cash on hand and accounts receivable and totaled $490,839.26. No amounts were listed for claims against the Disputed Creditors.

[9] On March 18, 2014, the Proposal Trustee sent Notice of the Proposal to all of the Debtor's creditors as listed by it along with a Notice of the First Meeting of Creditors on March 31, 2014, the Proposal Trustee's Report on the Proposal, the Debtor's Statement of Affairs, a Proof of Claim form, voting letter and general proxy.

[10] In deciding whether to allow or disallow a creditor's proof of claim as filed, the Proposal Trustee reviewed the documents accompanying the proof of claim and determined that:

a) The liabilities and the amounts claimed by the creditor had been listed in the statement of affairs sworn by Sands on behalf of the Debtor;

b) The liabilities and amounts claimed by the creditor had been disclosed to the Proposal Trustee by the Debtor at the time of filing the notice of intention to make a proposal;

c) The proof of claim had been completed in accordance with the provisions of the BIA; and

d) The creditor's proof of claim contained the proper supporting documentation that corroborated the amount claimed.

[11] The first meeting of creditors proceeded on March 31, 2014. Counsel for the Debtor tabled a letter containing proposed amendments to the Proposal along with two Notices of Dispute regarding the proofs of claim filed by RoyCap and Gowlings.

[12] The Debtor's Notice of Dispute with respect to the RoyCap claim for $650,000, which is the balance owing on a loan, outlined certain events which the Debtor claimed led to a loss of capital and business in excess of the amount of RoyCap's claim. Specifically the Debtor alleged that RoyCap conspired with Thomas (the Debtor's former CEO) to attempt to acquire the Debtor and gain IIROC approval for repayment of $800,000 to RoyCap; and that RoyCap made a demand for payment of its loan which was contrary to the provisions of the loan agreement. The Debtor claimed damages and asserted an equitable set-off in respect of RoyCap's claim.

[13] The Notice of Dispute with respect to Gowling's claim of $246,823.14, which is for legal services rendered, outlined certain events which the Debtor claimed led to a loss of capital and business in excess of the amount of Gowling's claim. The Debtor alleged that Gowlings ceased acting for it in the spring of 2013 and then represented Thomas and his interests in conflict to the Debtor; that Gowlings deliberately withheld invoices which distorted the Debtor's balance sheet with respect to certain capital requirements mandated by IIROC and permitted a payment to RoyCap which in turn impaired the Debtor's capital. As with RoyCap, the Debtor asserted that it had suffered substantial damages and was entitled to set off any amount found due to Gowlings. No evidence or documents were filed to support either of the claims.

[14] The letter from Debtor's counsel accompanying the two Notices of Dispute stated that if there was no release of directors in the final Proposal "the debtor disputes the claim of Adam Thomas for the reasons reflected in the disputes of the claims of RoyCap and Gowlings."

[15] Following the above noted claims review process, the Proposal Trustee admitted each of the Disputed Creditors' proofs of claim, as filed, and conducted itself through the Proposal proceeding as if the claims had been admitted.

[16] At the first meeting on March 31, 2014, the Debtor entered into discussions with RoyCap and Gowlings with respect to the potential settlement of claims and verbally agreed to provide a settlement proposal within 48 hours. The meeting was then adjourned by the creditors to permit settlement discussions to arrive at an acceptable proposal.

[17] Following the meeting, no settlement offer was forthcoming from the Debtor. Accordingly, on May 22, 2014, the Proposal Trustee sent notice to all creditors reconvening the First Meeting on June 2, 2014. On June 2nd, as a result of continuing discussions between RoyCap, Gowlings and the Debtor, the First Meeting was again adjourned by the creditors to July 11, 2014. On July 11, 2014, the First Meeting was again adjourned due to settlement discussions.

[18] On July 15, 2014, the Proposal Trustee advised the Debtor that a vote would be called at the next meeting of creditors and, based on the votes of the creditors that had been filed with it, the Proposal would be defeated resulting in a deemed bankruptcy pursuant to s. 57(a) of the BIA.

[19] On July 18, 2014, the Proposal Trustee advised the Debtor that the resumption of the first meeting of creditors would take place on July 28, 2014. A notice of the reconvened meeting for July 28, 2014 was sent to all known creditors on July 21, 2014.

[20] On July 24, 2014, counsel for the Debtor wrote to the Proposal Trustee and advised that the Debtor intended to commence proceedings to invalidate the claims of RoyCap, Gowlings and Thomas. No further details were provided but the letter did say that "a detailed analysis with supporting documents substantiating the claims is available … and the documents for your use to conduct an inquiry and investigation of the claims if you are so advised."

[21] In an email the following day, the Debtor's counsel confirmed that the Debtor requested that the Proposal Trustee investigate the circumstances giving rise to RoyCap's, Gowlings' and Thomas' claims. The email ended by stating: "accordingly it would not be appropriate to consider any meeting or administration until the Casimir claim is determined and the disputed creditor claims resolved."

[22] On July 28, 2014, prior to the Meeting, the Proposal Trustee pointed out to counsel for the Debtor that based on the votes received, even if the claims of RoyCap, Gowlings and Thomas were removed, the Proposal would not pass. In response, counsel indicated that the Debtor would also look to invalidate the claims of Fidessa and two other individuals.

[23] At the Meeting, counsel for the Debtor requested the Proposal Trustee to mark the claims of RoyCap, Gowlings and Thomas together with Fidessa and the two other individuals raised that morning as "objected to" and suggested an adjournment in order to allow for the opportunity to seek direction from the court. The request was denied by the creditors in attendance and, following a motion to vote on the Proposal, 93.7% of the creditors with proofs of claim totaling $1,446,600.13 voted against the Proposal. Only 6.3% of creditors with proofs of claim totaling $97,247.63 voted in favour of the Proposal.

[24] The proofs of claim of the Disputed Creditors totaled $1,225,598.82. If those proofs of claim are expunged, creditors with proofs of claim totaling $318,248.94 remain. Of these remaining creditors, 69.4% or $221,001.31 of claims voted against the Proposal.

Position of the Parties

[25] The Debtor submits that in light of its claims for damages against the Disputed Creditors, the Proposal Trustee erred in allowing the Disputed Creditors to vote at the Meeting. The Debtor submits its claims are for amounts that exceed the Disputed Creditors' claims and accordingly, operate to expunge the Disputed Creditors' claims pursuant to equitable set-off. Having marked the proofs of claim "objected to", the Proposal Trustee was obliged to have considered the Debtor's claims which it failed to do.

[26] As part of its submissions to this court, the Debtor has set out the basis of its claims in some detail. It concedes that given the nature of the claims and the credibility issues that the claims raise, that such claims cannot be resolved on this motion. It submits that a trial of an issue should be directed to determine the validity of its claims and, in the event they are successful, whether equitable set-off is available to reduce or expunge the Disputed Claims in their entirety. In the interim, the vote on its Proposal should be held in abeyance.

Discussion

[27] Section 66(1) of the BIA provides that all provisions of the BIA (except Division II which is not applicable) apply to proposals.

[28] Section 108 of the BIA provides as follows:

> 108 (1) The chair of any meeting of creditors has power to admit or reject a proof of claim for the purpose of voting but his decision is subject to appeal to the court.
> (2) Notwithstanding anything in this Act, the chair may, for the purpose of voting, accept any letter or printed matter transmitted by any form or mode of telecommunication as proof of the claim of a creditor.
> (3) Where the chair is in doubt as to whether a proof of claim should be admitted or rejected, he shall mark the proof as objected to and allow the creditor to vote subject to the vote being declared invalid in the event of the objection being sustained.

[29] Section 135(5) of the BIA provides: "The court may expunge or reduce a proof of claim or a proof of security on the application of a creditor or of a debtor if the trustee declines to interfere in the matter."

[30] A proposal under the BIA is a voluntary procedure. It is initiated by an insolvent person or entity. It is clear from the provisions in the BIA dealing with proposals and in particular the time limits provided that the procedure is to be carried out in a timely and cost effective manner.

[31] While the cases are somewhat divided on whether a proceeding under either s. 108 or s. 135(5) of the BIA is an appeal on the record or de novo, in my view, in the circumstances of this case where the challenge relates to a proposal trustee's decision to allow a proof of claim at the first meeting of creditors for the purposes of voting, the review should be on the record and not de novo. See: Re Galaxy Sports Inc., 2004 BCCA 284 (BCCA); Nalcor Energy v. Grant Thornton Poirier Ltd., [2015] N.B.J. No. 26 at paras. 19 to 21.

[32] It makes no sense, particularly in this case where a trial of the issue is required, to proceed with a hearing de novo. Such a procedure will only delay the bankruptcy for an indefinite period while exhausting the limited funds available to the Debtor in expensive legal proceedings. Nor is it appropriate in my view, to allow the Debtor a second kick at the can, so to speak, by placing evidence before the court that was not before the Proposal Trustee at the time. See: Re Canadian Triton International Ltd. (1997), 49 C.B.R. (3d) 192 (Ont. S.C.) at para. 5.

[33] The standard of review in respect of an appeal of the chair's decision to admit or reject a proof of claim for voting under s. 108 of the BIA or the trustee's decision to allow or disallow a proof of claim under s. 135 of the BIA is correctness: Re Galaxy Sports.

[34] In my view, based on the facts of this case, the Debtor's appeal is more appropriately pursuant to s. 108. The issue involves the question of whether the Disputed Creditors should have been permitted to vote at the Meeting which is the subject matter of s. 108. By contrast, s. 135(5) deals with expunging or reducing proofs of claim where the trustee declines to interfere.

[35] Further, and notwithstanding that the Proposal Trustee marked the Disputed Creditors' proofs of claim as "objected to", I consider that the appeal is pursuant to s. 108(1) of the BIA and not s. 108(3). It is clear from the record and I find that the Proposal Trustee had made the decision to admit the Disputed Creditors proofs of claim for the purposes of voting prior to the Meeting. The Debtor provided no new information concerning its claims against the Disputed Creditors at the Meeting. The Proposal Trustee only marked the disputed proofs of claim "objected to" at the request of the Debtor's representative and not because he was in any doubt about them.

[36] Based on the information before the Proposal Trustee leading up to and at the Meeting on July 28 2014, I am satisfied that the Proposal Trustee, as the chair of the Meeting, was correct in allowing the Disputed Creditors to vote.

[37] The Debtor, who was clearly insolvent, voluntarily initiated the proposal proceeding. As part of that proceeding, the Debtor filed a statement of affairs which listed the Debtor's creditors and included the Disputed Creditor's claims without any qualification or listing of its alleged claims against them. In such circumstances, the steps taken by the Proposal Trustee in reviewing and validating the proofs of claims filed, including the Disputed Creditors, for the purpose of voting at the first meeting were more than sufficient.

[38] Further, the Debtor only raised its claims against the Disputed Creditors at the first meeting of creditors on March 31, 2014 and thereafter provided very general information, no back up documentation and took no steps to pursue the claims in the courts although it had more than four months to do so. The claims are contingent and unliquidated. There was simply no way, based on the information and more specifically the lack of information before it, that the Proposal Trustee could have evaluated the claims in order to disallow the Disputed Creditors' proofs of claim and their vote.

[39] If and when a bankruptcy occurs, the Proposal Trustee, then the Trustee in Bankruptcy will have sufficient time to review the bona fides of any claim by the bankrupt in considering whether to allow a Disputed Creditor's claim in the bankruptcy.

[40] In my view, the Debtor or its principal attempted to use the alleged claims to delay the proposal process in order to arrive at a settlement with the Disputed Creditors. It was only when that didn't happen that it has embarked on this motion to annul the Disputed Creditors votes and set aside the Meeting, all to avoid bankruptcy.

[41] The Trustee submits that the Debtor's motion to have its deemed bankruptcy set aside fails in any event given that even if the Disputed Creditors' claims are disallowed and their votes are disregarded, the result of the votes of the remaining creditors establishes the Proposal would not have passed in any event.

[42] The Debtor disagrees. It submits that if the Disputed Creditors' claims are disallowed, a new meeting should be called to consider the acceptance of its Proposal or amended Proposal. It submits that when it went to the Meeting on July 28, 2014, it was under the understanding a settlement had been reached with the creditors. It was blindsided when its settlement was rejected at the meeting and the vote proceeded with. It submits that another meeting, properly constituted, would permit it to place a revised Proposal before all creditors.

[43] I reject the Debtor's submissions that there was any settlement reached prior to the meeting or that it was blindsided at the meeting. There is no evidence in the record of such events. The record does indicate that beginning with the first meeting on March 31, 2014, the Debtors and the creditors were talking settlement. The meeting kept getting adjourned because of settlement discussions. But there is no indication a settlement or even a tentative settlement was ever reached. Any settlement would have to come in the form of an amended Proposal. There is no indication the Debtor ever filed an amended Proposal. Although it lodged $300,000 with the Proposal Trustee in respect of a revised Proposal, on July 25 2014, three days before the Meeting, the Debtor requested the Proposal Trustee return the deposited funds to it. That step, in my view, is more indicative of no settlement being reached. In my view, the Debtor simply wants the opportunity to put an amended Proposal before the creditors. The Debtor had that opportunity up until the Meeting. It has long since passed.

[44] I agree with the Trustee that the Debtor's motion to have its deemed assignment set aside fails in any event because even if the Disputed Creditors votes are set aside, the votes of the remaining creditors still defeat the Proposal.

Conclusion

[45] For the above reasons, therefore, the Debtor's motion is dismissed.

[46] The Proposal Trustee and the Disputed Creditors requested costs. The Debtor has very little funds. To order costs against it would deplete the few assets available to the creditors. The Proposal Trustee's costs should be recovered in the bankruptcy. All parties who opposed submitted that costs should be awarded against Casimir Capital Group, LLC, the Debtor's parent. While I have no doubt that the parent and Sands were the directing minds behind the Debtor's motion, neither is a party to the proceedings. Accordingly, no order as to costs.

Subject: Insolvency; Estates and Trusts

MOTION by trustee in bankruptcy for determination of whether creditor was entitled to hearing de novo when appealing from notice of disallowance.

Reg. Janet E. Mills*:

1 This motion is in respect of a Notice of Disallowance issued by the Trustee in response to a Proof of Claim filed by the Creditor. The preliminary decision to be made is whether the hearing is to be a true appeal of the Disallowance or if it is to be a hearing de novo of the merits of the claim such that new or additional evidence may be adduced in support of the claim. For the reasons set out below, I have concluded that appeals of this nature are generally to proceed as true appeals based on the materials relied upon by the Trustee in the decision to disallow a claim. However, in this particular case, the appeal is to be a hearing de novo as to proceed otherwise would result in an injustice to the creditor.

2 On April 3, 2009 Charlestown Residential School ("Charlestown") made an Assignment in Bankruptcy and listed Mr. Dunster as an unsecured creditor with an estimated claim of $210,000. A Proof of Claim was filed on June 29, 2009 by counsel on behalf of Mr. Dunster, valuing the claim at $397,130.24. Attached to the claim was Schedule A which purported to be a Statement of Accounts, a Canada Life "internal use only" chart of Life Expectancy, a Memorandum of Agreement dated June 30, 2004 (the "Agreement") and a Promissory Note issued the same day by Charlestown to support the Agreement.

3 Mr. Dunster was previously employed by Charlestown for many years as its Executive Director. It was agreed between them that Mr. Dunster would retire effective June 30, 2004 and that he would receive an annual allowance on a gratuitous basis in accordance with a prescribed payment schedule. There was no stated termination date but the Agreement did provide the payments would end immediately on the death of Mr. Dunster or upon his violation of certain covenants contained in the Agreement. The Promissory Note was to stand as collateral security to the undertaking to pay the allowance as contained in the Agreement.

4 The payments were made as contemplated until Charlestown's assignment. In valuing the claim for bankruptcy purposes, Mr. Dunster relied upon the Canada Life chart of Life Expectancy to calculate the years remaining on the Agreement. The chart specifically states that it is for Canada Life internal use only and that is was effective as at June 15, 2001. There was no medical evidence offered to support the current health of Mr. Dunster or whether the chart continued to be relevant for calculating life expectancy in 2009.

5 After reviewing the Proof of Claim, the Trustee concluded there were serious issues related to the Claim and contacted counsel to discuss her concerns. The Trustee invited counsel to provide additional information but none was forthcoming.

6 On September 14, 2009 a Notice of Disallowance was issued by the Trustee disallowing the Claim in whole pursuant to subsection 135(2) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, as amended (the "BIA"). The Disallowance was founded on the basis that the payment of the allowance to Mr. Dunster was characterized in the Agreement as "gratuitous" and therefore was not a debt enforceable at law. Further, the absence of a termination date for the payment obligation made it vague or uncertain and the Promissory Note did not stand as an independent debt instrument. Lastly, the Trustee relied upon the Employment Standards Act and common law for any entitlement Mr. Dunster may have had to reasonable notice for the termination of his employment. For all these reasons, the Claim was disallowed.

7 An appeal of the Notice of Disallowance was issued within the statutory 30 day limitation period as provided in subsection 135(4) of the BIA. Following the commencement of the appeal, the Trustee delivered an Amended Notice of Disallowance to include additional bases upon which her decision was founded, specifically that the Canada Life chart was not appropriate documentation to value the Claim and that the amount of the Claim was not calculated on a current value basis with the appropriate discount for the acceleration of the payments.

8 In her affidavit, the Trustee also states that she reviewed the corporate books and records in her assessment process and as a result of the information contained therein, she concluded the Claim ought to be disallowed. As the information related to the personnel records of Mr. Dunster, the Trustee refused to divulge the particulars of the information without the consent of Mr. Dunster or a court order to ensure his privacy was protected. To the date of the hearing, the information had not been disclosed to Mr. Dunster and it was not made available to the court, although it had apparently influenced the Trustee in her decision to disallow the Claim at first instance and in the amended disallowance.

9 The Creditor has attempted to address the concerns expressed by the Trustee in the Notice of Disallowance by submitting additional evidence to support the Proof of Claim. Counsel for the Trustee objects, maintaining the appeal should be in the form of a true appeal and, in the absence of a motion to adduce fresh evidence, based solely on the evidence presented to the Trustee. Counsel for the creditor submits the appeal is a hearing de novo where the creditor may introduce evidence in addition to that originally put before the Trustee. There are competing lines of case law in the country on this issue.

10 The decision of the Registrar in Eskasoni Fisheries Ltd., Re, 2000 CarswellNS 116 (N.S. S.C.), held that where a creditor appeals to the court from a Trustee disallowance, the appeal is to proceed by way of trial de novo. The Registrar found that the court is not limited to only the information that was before the Trustee, but rather was entitled to accept and consider all relevant information in assessing the admissibility of the claim. If there is then a further appeal taken from the decision of the Registrar or Judge, the appeal is a true appeal and ought to be limited to the court record. The distinction was made on the basis that the Trustee is acting as an administrator of the bankruptcy estate when determining whether to admit or disallow proven claims. There is no hearing and there is no formal record created. To ensure justice is served, the appeal to the Registrar must proceed as a hearing de novo.

11 The countervailing position is taken by the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Galaxy Sports Inc., Re, 2004 CarswellBC 1112 (B.C. C.A.) where it was held that an appeal under s.135(4) of the BIA is not intended to be a trial de novo but a true appeal. The court specifically declined to follow Eskasoni Fisheries Ltd. on the basis that BC law makes it clear that unless the statute that provides for the appeal also states that it is to be in the form of a trial de novo, the appeal will be an ordinary appeal.

12 The Court of Appeal in Galaxy was prepared to grant considerable deference to the experience and expertise of the Trustee in restructurings and insolvency. The Court noted:

> If "fresh evidence" — i.e., evidence not before the trustee or chair at the time of his or her decision — were to be adduced in Supreme Court on appeal as a matter of course, it seems to me that much would be lost in the way of efficiency in the operation of the bankruptcy scheme generally. Creditors who neglected to file proofs of claim in compliance with the requirements of s. 124 would suffer no practical consequences if, in Farley J.'s phrase, they could expect to "cooper up" > their proofs at a later date in court; and the business now conducted at creditors' meetings by trustees (who are generally supervised by inspectors under the BIA) would be largely co-opted to courts of law, with all the attendant expense, delay and formality.

13 The Alberta Court of Queen's Bench appears to have attempted to align the Eskasoni and Galaxy decisions in San Juan Resources Inc., Re, 2009 CarswellAlta 98 (Alta. Q.B.), finding that a hearing de novo ought not be as of right, but rather restricted only to those cases where an injustice might result if the creditor is not permitted to adduce new or fresh evidence.

14 This approach is compelling in so far as it recognizes the experience and expertise of the Trustee who, by the provisions of s. 135 of the BIA, is required to carefully examine every proof of claim and act equitably in determining whether to allow or disallow a claim. Where additional information is needed, the Trustee is entitled to request further documentary support for the Proof of Claim to assist in making a final determination and, in accordance with s. 135(4), the decision of the Trustee is to be final and conclusive unless appealed within thirty days of the notice of disallowance having been served.

15 It is also reasonable to place a positive onus upon a creditor to properly prove his or her claim in bankruptcy at the first instance.

16 By granting a degree of deference to the decision of the Trustee, this appeal process promotes an efficient and cost effective means by which to administer a bankruptcy or insolvency estate while ensuring that an aggrieved creditor is afforded proper justice. An appeal may proceed as a de novo hearing in circumstances where an injustice would be the result if restricted to just the record.

17 Correctness is the appropriate standard of review for the disallowance of a proof of claim; reasonableness is the standard to be applied to factual decisions made by the Trustee exercising his or her discretion, such as the valuation of a contingent or unliquidated claims (Galaxy Sports Inc., Re, supra.).

18 Where an error has been committed by the Trustee or the interests of justice would only be served with an appeal de novo, it is open to the court to direct the appeal proceed accordingly failing which, the appeal of a Notice of Disallowance ought to proceed based on the record before the Trustee.

19 In the case before me, the Trustee appears to have reached out to the creditor's counsel by telephone for additional information but the request was not reduced to writing so it is unclear as to the nature or extent of the information sought. Further, the Trustee reviewed materials not otherwise available to the creditor to assist in formulating her decision to disallow the claim. This alone amounts to an injustice if the appeal was to proceed based solely on the record of the documents submitted by the creditor.

20 In addition, the Trustee relies upon an Amended Notice of Disallowance delivered without leave of the court nor with the consent of the creditor as is required for the amendment of pleadings (Eskasoni Fisheries Ltd., Re, supra.) subsequent to the launching of the appeal from the original Notice of Disallowance. One must conclude that the additional grounds for disallowance were only considered by the Trustee after the appeal was commenced and the Amended Notice of Disallowance was an effort by the Trustee to "cooper up" the original notice. It would be an injustice to allow the Amended Notice of Disallowance to stand and to deny the creditor the opportunity in a hearing de novo to fully respond with all relevant evidence to the grounds for disallowance raised by the Trustee.

21 As such, in the ordinary course, appeals of a Notice of Disallowance issued by a Trustee pursuant to s. 135(4) of the BIA are to proceed as true appeals unless to do so would result in an injustice to the rights of the aggrieved creditor. The appeal of the Notice of Disallowance issued in this Estate shall proceed by way of a hearing de novo before a Registrar in Bankruptcy as, based on the evidence before me, to proceed otherwise would result in an injustice to Mr. Dunster. I am not seized of this matter.

Motion granted.

L'appelant était passager dans le véhicule conduit par N sur une route rurale située sur le territoire de la failed to negotiate a sharp curve on the road and lost control of his vehicle. The appellant was rendered a quadriplegic as a result of the injuries he sustained in the accident. Damages were agreed upon prior to trial in the amount of $2.5 million, but at issue were the respective liabilities, if any, of the municipality, N and the appellant. On the day before the accident, N had attended a party at the T residence not far from the scene of the accident. He continued drinking through the night at another party where he met up with the appellant. The two men drove back to the T residence in the morning where N continued drinking until a couple of hours before he and the appellant drove off in N's truck. N was unfamiliar with the road, but had travelled on it three times in the 24 hours preceding the accident, on his way to and from the T residence. Visibility approaching the area of the accident was limited due to the radius of the curve and the uncleared brush growing up to the edge of the road. A light rain was falling as N turned onto the road from the T property. The truck fishtailed a few times before approaching the sharp curve where the accident occurred. Expert testimony revealed that N was travelling at a speed of between 53 and 65 km/hr when the vehicle entered the curved portion of the road, slightly above the speed at which the curve could be safely negotiated under the conditions prevalent at the time of the accident.

The road was maintained by the municipality and was categorized as a non-designated local access road. On such non-designated roads, the municipality makes the decision to post signs if it becomes aware of a hazard, or if there are several accidents at one spot. The municipality had not posted signs on any portion of the road. Between 1978 and 1987, three other accidents were reported in the area to the east of the site of the appellant's accident. The trial judge held that the appellant was 15 percent contributorily negligent in failing to take reasonable precautions for his own safety in accepting a ride from N, and apportioned the remaining joint and several liability 50 percent to N and 35 percent to the municipality. The Court of Appeal overturned the trial judge's finding that the municipality was negligent.

Held (Gonthier, Bastarache, Binnie and LeBel JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be allowed and the judgment of the trial judge restored.

municipalité intimée. N a été incapable de prendre un virage serré et il a perdu la maîtrise de son véhicule. L'appelant est devenu quadriplégique à la suite des blessures subies dans l'accident. Les parties ont convenu avant le procès du montant des dommages-intérêts, qui ont été fixés à 2,5 millions de dollars. La question en litige était celle de savoir si la municipalité, N et l'appelant étaient responsables et, dans l'affirmative, dans quelles proportions. Le jour qui a précédé l'accident, N avait assisté à une fête à la résidence des T, non loin de la scène de l'accident. Durant la nuit, il a continué de boire à une autre fête, où il a rencontré l'appelant. Le matin, les deux hommes sont retournés en automobile à la résidence des T, où N a continué de boire, cessant de le faire quelques heures avant de prendre la route dans sa camionnette en compagnie de l'appelant. N n'était pas familier avec le chemin en question, mais il l'avait emprunté à trois reprises au cours des 24 heures qui avaient précédé l'accident pour aller et venir de la résidence des T. À l'approche de l'endroit de l'accident, la distance de visibilité était réduite en raison du rayon de courbure du virage et de la présence de broussailles poussant jusqu'au bord du chemin Une faible pluie tombait lorsque N s'est engagé sur le chemin en quittant la résidence des T. L'arrière de la camionnette a zigzagué à plusieurs reprises avant que le véhicule n'arrive aux abords du virage serré où l'accident est survenu. Selon le témoignage d'un expert, N roulait à une vitesse se situant entre 53 et 65 km/h lorsque le véhicule s'est engagé dans la courbe, soit une vitesse légèrement supérieure à celle à laquelle le virage pouvait être pris en sécurité eu égard aux conditions qui existaient au moment de l'accident.

Le chemin, qui était entretenu par la municipalité, appartenait à la catégorie des voies d'accès locales non désignées. La municipalité installe des panneaux de signalisation sur ces chemins si elle constate l'existence d'un danger ou si plusieurs accidents se produisent au même endroit. Elle n'avait installé aucune signalisation le long de cette portion du chemin. On a signalé trois autres accidents survenus de 1978 à 1987 à l'est du lieu de l'accident dont a été victime l'appelant. La juge de première instance a estimé que l'appelant était responsable de négligence concourante dans une proportion de 15 p. 100, du fait qu'il avait omis de prendre des précautions raisonnables pour assurer sa propre sécurité en acceptant de monter à bord du véhicule de N, et elle a réparti le reste de la responsabilité solidairement entre N (50 p. 100) et la municipalité (35 p. 100). La Cour d'appel a infirmé la conclusion de la juge de première instance selon laquelle la municipalité avait été négligente.

Arrêt (les juges Gonthier, Bastarache, Binnie et LeBel sont dissidents) : Le pourvoi est accueilli et la décision de la juge de première instance est rétablie.

Per McLachlin C.J. and L'Heureux-Dubé, Iacobucci, Major and Arbour JJ.: Since an appeal is not a re-trial of a case, consideration must be given to the standard of review applicable to questions that arise on appeal. The standard of review on pure questions of law is one of correctness, and an appellate court is thus free to replace the opinion of the trial judge with its own. Appellate courts require a broad scope of review with respect to matters of law because their primary role is to delineate and refine legal rules and ensure their universal application.

The standard of review for findings of fact is such that they cannot be reversed unless the trial judge has made a "palpable and overriding error". A palpable error is one that is plainly seen. The reasons for deferring to a trial judge's findings of fact can be grouped into three basic principles. First, given the scarcity of judicial resources, setting limits on the scope of judicial review in turn limits the number, length and cost of appeals. Secondly, the principle of deference promotes the autonomy and integrity of the trial proceedings. Finally, this principle recognizes the expertise of trial judges and their advantageous position to make factual findings, owing to their extensive exposure to the evidence and the benefit of hearing the testimony viva voce. The same degree of deference must be paid to inferences of fact, since many of the reasons for showing deference to the factual findings of the trial judge apply equally to all factual conclusions. The standard of review for inferences of fact is not to verify that the inference can reasonably be supported by the findings of fact of the trial judge, but whether the trial judge made a palpable and overriding error in coming to a factual conclusion based on accepted facts, a stricter standard. Making a factual conclusion of any kind is inextricably linked with assigning weight to evidence, and thus attracts a deferential standard of review. If there is no palpable and overriding error with respect to the underlying facts that the trial judge relies on to draw the inference, then it is only where the inference-drawing process itself is palpably in error that an appellate court can interfere with the factual conclusion.

Le juge en chef McLachlin et les juges L'Heureux-Dubé, Iacobucci, Major et Arbour : Étant donné que l'appel ne constitue pas un nouveau procès, il faut se demander quelle est la norme de contrôle applicable en appel à l'égard des diverses questions que soulève le pourvoi. La norme de contrôle applicable aux pures questions de droit est celle de la décision correcte et, en conséquence, il est loisible aux cours d'appel de substituer leur opinion à celle des juges de première instance. Les cours d'appel ont besoin d'un large pouvoir de contrôle à l'égard des questions de droit pour être en mesure de s'acquitter de leur rôle premier, qui consiste à préciser et à raffiner les règles de droit et à veiller à leur application universelle.

Suivant la norme de contrôle applicable aux conclusions de fait, ces conclusions ne peuvent être infirmées que s'il est établi que le juge de première instance a commis une « erreur manifeste et dominante ». Une erreur manifeste est une erreur qui est évidente. Les diverses raisons justifiant la retenue à l'égard des conclusions de fait du juge de première instance peuvent être regroupées sous trois principes de base. Premièrement, vu la rareté des ressources dont disposent les tribunaux, le fait de limiter la portée du contrôle judiciaire a pour effet de réduire le nombre, la durée et le coût des appels. Deuxièmement, le respect du principe de la retenue envers les conclusions favorise l'autonomie et l'intégrité du procès. Enfin, ce principe permet de reconnaître l'expertise du juge de première instance et la position avantageuse dans laquelle il se trouve pour tirer des conclusions de fait, étant donné qu'il a l'occasion d'examiner la preuve en profondeur et d'entendre les témoignages de vive voix. Il faut faire preuve du même degré de retenue envers les inférences de fait, car nombre de raisons justifiant de faire preuve de retenue à l'égard des constatations de fait du juge de première instance valent autant pour toutes ses conclusions factuelles. La norme de contrôle ne consiste pas à vérifier si l'inférence peut être raisonnablement étayée par les conclusions de fait du juge de première instance, mais plutôt si ce dernier a commis une erreur manifeste et dominante en tirant une conclusion factuelle sur la base de faits admis, ce qui suppose l'application d'une norme plus stricte. Une conclusion factuelle — quelle que soit sa nature — exige nécessairement qu'on attribue un certain poids à un élément de preuve et, de ce fait, commande l'application d'une norme de contrôle empreinte de retenue. Si aucune erreur manifeste et dominante n'est décelée en ce qui concerne les faits sur lesquels repose l'inférence du juge de première instance, ce n'est que lorsque le processus inférentiel lui-même est manifestement erroné que la cour d'appel peut modifier la conclusion factuelle.

Questions of mixed fact and law involve the application of a legal standard to a set of facts. Where the question of mixed fact and law at issue is a finding of negligence, it should be deferred to by appellate courts, in the absence of a legal or palpable and overriding error. Requiring a standard of "palpable and overriding error" for findings of negligence made by either a trial judge or a jury reinforces the proper relationship between the appellate and trial court levels and accords with the established standard of review applicable to a finding of negligence by a jury. Where the issue on appeal involves the trial judge's interpretation of the evidence as a whole, it should not be overturned absent palpable and overriding error. A determination of whether or not the standard of care was met by the defendant involves the application of a legal standard to a set of facts, a question of mixed fact and law, and is thus subject to a standard of palpable and overriding error, unless it is clear that the trial judge made some extricable error in principle with respect to the characterization of the standard or its application, in which case the error may amount to an error of law, subject to a standard of correctness.

Here, the municipality's standard of care was to maintain the road in such a reasonable state of repair that those requiring to use it could, exercising ordinary care, travel upon it with safety. The trial judge applied the correct test in determining that the municipality did not meet this standard of care, and her decision should not be overturned absent palpable and overriding error. The trial judge kept the conduct of the ordinary motorist in mind because she stated the correct test at the outset, and discussed implicitly and explicitly the conduct of a reasonable motorist approaching the curve. Further, her apportionment of negligence indicates that she assessed N's conduct against the standard of the ordinary driver as does her use of the term "hidden hazard" and her consideration of the speed at which motorists should have approached the curve.

The Court of Appeal's finding of a palpable and overriding error by the trial judge was based on the erroneous presumption that she accepted 80km/h as the speed at which an ordinary motorist would approach the curve, when in fact she found that a motorist exercising

Les questions mixtes de fait et de droit supposent l'application d'une norme juridique à un ensemble de faits. Lorsque la question mixte de fait et de droit en litige est une conclusion de négligence, il y a lieu de faire preuve de retenue à l'égard de cette conclusion en l'absence d'erreur de droit ou d'erreur manifeste et dominante. Le fait d'exiger l'application de la norme de l'« erreur manifeste et dominante » aux fins de contrôle d'une conclusion de négligence tirée par un juge ou un jury consolide les rapports qui doivent exister entre les juridictions d'appel et celles de première instance et respecte la norme de contrôle bien établie qui s'applique aux conclusions de négligence tirées par les jurys. Si la question litigieuse en appel soulève l'interprétation de l'ensemble de la preuve par le juge de première instance, cette interprétation ne doit pas être infirmée en l'absence d'erreur manifeste et dominante. La question de savoir si le défendeur a respecté la norme de diligence suppose l'application d'une norme juridique à un ensemble de faits, ce qui en fait une question mixte de fait et de droit. Cette question est alors assujettie à la norme de l'erreur manifeste et dominante, à moins que le juge de première instance n'ait clairement commis une erreur de principe en déterminant la norme applicable ou en appliquant cette norme, auquel cas l'erreur peut constituer une erreur de droit, qui est assujettie à la norme de la décision correcte.

En l'espèce, la norme de diligence à laquelle devait se conformer la municipalité consistait à tenir le chemin dans un état raisonnable d'entretien, de façon que ceux qui devaient l'emprunter puissent, en prenant des précautions normales, y circuler en sécurité. La juge de première instance a appliqué le bon critère juridique en concluant que la municipalité n'avait pas respecté cette norme et sa décision ne devrait pas être infirmée en l'absence d'erreur manifeste et dominante. La juge de première instance a eu à l'esprit la conduite de l'automobiliste moyen puisqu'elle a commencé son examen de la norme de diligence en formulant dès le départ le critère approprié, puis elle s'est interrogée, tant explicitement qu'implicitement, sur la façon dont conduirait l'automobiliste raisonnable en s'approchant du virage. De plus, le fait qu'elle a imputé une partie de la responsabilité à N indique qu'elle a évalué sa conduite au regard du critère du conducteur moyen, tout comme l'indique le fait qu'elle a utilisé l'expression « danger caché » et qu'elle s'est demandé à quelle vitesse les automobilistes auraient dû approcher du virage.

La conclusion de la Cour d'appel portant que la juge de première instance avait commis une erreur manifeste et dominante reposait sur la présomption erronée selon laquelle la juge aurait accepté que l'automobiliste moyen approcherait du virage à 80 km/h, alors que dans les faits ordinary care could approach the curve at greater than the speed at which it would be safe to negotiate it. This finding was based on the trial judge's reasonable and practical assessment of the evidence as a whole, and is far from reaching the level of palpable and overriding error.

The trial judge did not err in finding that the municipality knew or ought to have known of the disrepair of the road. Because the hazard in this case was a permanent feature of the road, it was open to the trial judge to draw the inference that a prudent municipal councillor ought to be aware of it. Once this inference has been drawn, then unless the municipality can rebut the inference by showing that it took reasonable steps to prevent such a hazard from continuing, the inference will be left undisturbed. Prior accidents on the road do not provide a direct basis for finding that the municipality had knowledge of the particular hazard, but this factor, together with knowledge of the type of drivers using this road, should have caused the municipality to investigate the road which would have resulted in actual knowledge. To require the plaintiff to provide concrete proof of the municipality's knowledge of the state of disrepair of its roads is to set an impossibly high burden on the plaintiff. Such information was within the particular sphere of knowledge of the municipality, and it was reasonable for the trial judge to draw an inference of knowledge from her finding that there was an ongoing state of disrepair.

The trial judge's conclusion on the cause of the accident was a finding of fact subject to the palpable and overriding error standard of review. The abstract nature of the inquiry as to whether N would have seen a sign had one been posted before the curve supports deference to the factual findings of the trial judge. The trial judge's factual findings on causation were reasonable and thus should not have been interfered with by the Court of Appeal.

Per Gonthier, Bastarache, Binnie and LeBel JJ. (dissenting): A trial judge's findings of fact will not be overturned absent palpable and overriding error principally in recognition that only the trial judge observes witnesses and hears testimony first hand and is therefore better able to choose between competing versions of events. The process of fact-finding involves elle a estimé qu'il était possible qu'un automobiliste prenant des précautions normales s'approche du virage à une vitesse supérieure à la vitesse sécuritaire pour effectuer la manœuvre. Loin de constituer une erreur manifeste et dominante, cette conclusion découlait d'une évaluation raisonnable et réaliste de l'ensemble de la preuve par la juge de première instance.

La juge de première instance n'a pas commis d'erreur en concluant que la municipalité connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le mauvais état du chemin. Étant donné que, en l'espèce, le danger était une caractéristique permanente du chemin, il était loisible à la juge de première instance d'inférer que le conseiller municipal prudent aurait dû être au fait du danger. Dès l'instant où une telle inférence est tirée, elle demeure inchangée à moins que la municipalité ne puisse la réfuter en démontrant qu'elle a pris des mesures raisonnables pour faire cesser le danger. Les accidents survenus antérieurement sur le chemin ne constituent pas une preuve directe permettant de conclure que la municipalité connaissait l'existence du danger particulier en cause, mais ce facteur, conjugué à la connaissance du type de conducteurs utilisant le chemin, aurait dû inciter la municipalité à faire enquête à l'égard du chemin en question, ce qui lui aurait permis de prendre connaissance concrètement de l'existence du danger. Exiger du demandeur qu'il apporte la preuve concrète de la connaissance par la municipalité du mauvais état d'entretien de ses chemins revient à imposer à ce dernier un fardeau inacceptablement lourd. Il s'agit d'information relevant du domaine de connaissance de la municipalité et, selon nous, il était raisonnable que la juge de première instance infère de sa conclusion relative au mauvais état d'entretien persistant du chemin que la municipalité possédait la connaissance requise.

La conclusion de la juge de première instance quant à la cause de l'accident était une conclusion de fait assujettie à la norme de contrôle de l'« erreur manifeste et dominante ». Le caractère théorique de l'analyse de la question de savoir si N aurait aperçu un panneau de signalisation installé avant la courbe justifie de faire montre de retenue à l'égard des conclusions factuelles de la juge de première instance. Les constatations factuelles de cette dernière relativement à la causalité étaient raisonnables et la Cour d'appel n'aurait donc pas dû les modifier.

Les juges Gonthier, Bastarache, Binnie et LeBel (dissidents) : Les conclusions de fait du juge de première instance ne sont pas modifiées en l'absence d'erreur manifeste ou dominante, principalement parce qu'il est le seul à avoir l'occasion d'observer les témoins et d'entendre les témoignages de vive voix, et qu'il est, de ce fait, plus à même de choisir entre deux versions not only the determination of the factual nexus of the case but also requires the judge to draw inferences from facts. Although the standard of review is identical for both findings of fact and inferences of fact, an analytical distinction must be drawn between the two. Inferences can be rejected for reasons other than that the inference-drawing process is deficient. An inference can be clearly wrong where the factual basis upon which it relies is deficient or where the legal standard to which the facts are applied is misconstrued. The question of whether the conduct of the defendant has met the appropriate standard of care in the law of negligence is a question of mixed fact and law. Once the facts have been established, the determination of whether or not the standard of care was met will in most cases be reviewable on a standard of correctness since the trial judge must appreciate the facts within the context of the appropriate standard of care, a question of law within the purview of both the trial and appellate courts.

A question of mixed fact and law in this case was whether the municipality knew or should have known of the alleged danger. The trial judge must approach this question having regard to the duties of the ordinary, reasonable and prudent municipal councillor. Even if the trial judge correctly identifies this as the applicable legal standard, he or she may still err in assessing the facts through the lens of that legal standard, a process which invokes a policy-making component. For example, the trial judge must consider whether the fact that accidents had previously occurred on different portions of the road would alert the ordinary, reasonable and prudent municipal councillor to the existence of a hazard. The trial judge must also consider whether the councillor would have been alerted to the previous accident by an accident-reporting system, a normative issue reviewable on a standard of correctness. Not all matters of mixed fact and law are reviewable according to the standard of correctness, but neither should they be accorded deference in every case.

Section 192 of the Rural Municipality Act, 1989, requires the trial judge to examine whether the portion of the road on which the accident occurred posed a hazard to the reasonable driver exercising ordinary care. Here, the trial judge failed to ask whether a reasonable driver exercising ordinary care would have been able to safely drive the portion of the road on which the accident divergentes d'un même événement. Le processus de constatation des faits exige non seulement du juge qu'il dégage le nœud factuel de l'affaire, mais également qu'il tire des inférences des faits. Bien que la norme de contrôle soit la même et pour les conclusions de fait et pour les inférences de fait, il importe néanmoins de faire une distinction analytique entre les deux. Des inférences peuvent être rejetées pour d'autres raisons que le fait que le processus qui les a produites est lui-même déficient. Une inférence peut être manifestement erronée si ses assises factuelles présentent des lacunes ou si la norme juridique appliquée aux faits est mal interprétée. Dans le contexte du droit relatif à la négligence, la question de savoir si la conduite du défendeur est conforme à la norme de diligence appropriée est une question mixte de fait et de droit. Une fois les faits établis, la décision touchant la question de savoir si le défendeur a respecté ou non la norme de diligence est, dans la plupart des cas, contrôlable selon la norme de la décision correcte, puisque le juge de première instance doit apprécier les faits au regard de la norme de diligence appropriée, question de droit qui relève autant des cours de première instance que des cours d'appel.

En l'espèce, la question de savoir si la municipalité connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le danger dont on alléguait l'existence était une question mixte de fait et de droit. Le juge de première instance doit examiner cette question eu égard aux obligations qui incombent au conseiller municipal moyen, raisonnable et prudent. Même en supposant que le juge de première instance détermine correctement la norme juridique applicable, il lui est encore possible de commettre une erreur lorsqu'il apprécie les faits à la lumière de cette norme juridique, processus qui implique notamment l'établissement de politiques d'intérêt général. Par exemple, il doit se demander si le fait que des accidents se soient déjà produits à d'autres endroits du chemin alerterait le conseiller municipal moyen, raisonnable et prudent de l'existence d'un danger. Il doit également se demander si ce conseiller aurait appris l'existence de l'accident antérieur par un système d'information sur les accidents, question normative qui est contrôlable selon la norme de la décision correcte. Les questions mixtes de fait et de droit ne sont pas toutes contrôlables suivant cette norme, mais elles ne commandent pas systématiquement une attitude empreinte de retenue.

Suivant la norme de diligence énoncée à l'art. 192 de la Rural Municipality Act, 1989, la juge de première instance devait se demander si le tronçon du chemin sur lequel s'est produit l'accident constituait un danger pour le conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales. En l'espèce, la juge de première instance a omis de se demander si un tel conducteur aurait pu rouler occurred. This amounted to an error of law. The duty of the municipality is to keep the road in such a reasonable state of repair that those required to use it may, exercising ordinary care, travel upon it with safety. The duty is a limited one as the municipality is not an insurer of travellers using its streets. Although the trial judge found that the portion of the road where the accident occurred presented drivers with a hidden hazard, there is nothing to indicate that she considered whether or not that portion of the road would pose a risk to the reasonable driver exercising ordinary care. Where an error of law has been found, the appellate court has jurisdiction to take the factual findings of the trial judge as they are and to reassess these findings in the context of the appropriate legal test. Here, the portion of the road on which the accident occurred did not pose a risk to a reasonable driver exercising ordinary care because the condition of the road in general signalled to the reasonable driver that caution was needed.

The trial judge made both errors of law and palpable and overriding errors of fact in determining that the municipality should have known of the alleged state of disrepair. She made no finding that the municipality had actual knowledge of the alleged state of disrepair, but rather imputed knowledge to it on the basis that it should have known of the danger. As a matter of law, the trial judge must approach the question of whether knowledge should be imputed to the municipality with regard to the duties of the ordinary, reasonable and prudent municipal councillor. The question is then answered through the trial judge's assessment of the facts of the case. The trial judge erred in law by approaching the question of knowledge from the perspective of an expert rather than from that of a prudent municipal councillor and by failing to appreciate that the onus of proving that the municipality knew or should have known of the disrepair remained on the plaintiff throughout. She made palpable and overriding errors in fact by drawing the unreasonable inference that the municipality should have known that the portion of the road on which the accident occurred was dangerous from evidence that accidents had occurred on other parts of the road. As the municipality had not received any complaints from motorists respecting the absence of signs on the road, the lack of super-elevation on the curves, or the presence of vegetation along the sides of the road, it had no particular reason to inspect that segment of the road for the presence of hazards. The question of the municipality's knowledge is inextricably linked to the standard of care. A municipality can only be expected to have knowledge of those hazards which pose a risk to the reasonable driver exercising ordinary care, since these are the only hazards for which there is en sécurité sur le tronçon en question. Il s'agissait d'une erreur de droit. Les municipalités ont l'obligation de tenir les chemins dans un état raisonnable d'entretien de façon que ceux qui doivent les emprunter puissent, en prenant des précautions normales, y circuler en sécurité. Il s'agit d'une obligation de portée limitée, car les municipalités ne sont pas les assureurs des automobilistes qui roulent dans leurs rues. Bien que la juge de première instance ait conclu que la portion du chemin où s'est produit l'accident exposait les conducteurs à un danger caché, il n'y a rien qui indique qu'elle s'est demandé si cette portion du chemin présentait un risque pour le conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales. La cour d'appel qui décèle une erreur de droit a compétence pour reprendre telles quelles les conclusions de fait du juge de première instance et les réévaluer au regard du critère juridique approprié. En l'espèce, la portion du chemin où s'est produit l'accident ne présentait pas de risque pour un conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales, car l'état de ce chemin en général avertissait l'automobiliste raisonnable que la prudence s'imposait.

La juge de première instance a commis et des erreurs de droit et des erreurs de fait manifestes et dominantes en statuant que la municipalité intimée aurait dû connaître le mauvais état dans lequel se trouvait, prétendait-on, le chemin. La juge de première instance n'a pas conclu que la municipalité intimée connaissait concrètement le prétendu mauvais état du chemin, mais elle lui a plutôt prêté cette connaissance pour le motif qu'elle aurait dû connaître l'existence du danger. Sur le plan juridique, le juge de première instance doit se demander s'il y a lieu de présumer que la municipalité connaissait ce fait, eu égard aux obligations qui incombent au conseiller municipal moyen, raisonnable et prudent. Il répond ensuite à cette question en appréciant les faits de l'espèce dont il est saisi. Dans la présente affaire, la juge de première instance a fait erreur en droit en examinant la question de la connaissance requise du point de vue du spécialiste plutôt que du point de vue du conseiller municipal prudent et en ne reconnaissant pas que le fardeau de prouver que la municipalité connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le mauvais état du chemin ne cessait jamais d'incomber au demandeur. La juge de première instance a commis une erreur de fait manifeste et dominante en inférant déraisonnablement que la municipalité intimée aurait dû savoir que la partie du chemin où l'accident s'est produit était dangereuse, compte tenu de la preuve que des accidents avaient eu lieu ailleurs sur ce chemin. La municipalité n'avait aucune raison particulière d'aller inspecter cette portion du chemin pour voir s'il y existait des dangers, puisqu'elle n'avait reçu aucune plainte d'automobilistes relativement à l'absence de signalisation, à l'absence de surélévation des courbes ou à la présence d'arbres et de végétation en bordure du a duty to repair. Here, the municipality cannot have been expected to have knowledge of the hazard that existed at the site of the accident, since the hazard did not pose a risk to the reasonable driver. Implicit in the trial judge's reasons was the expectation that the municipality should have known about the accidents through an accident reporting system, a palpable error, absent any evidence of what might have been a reasonable system.

With respect to her conclusions on causation, which are conclusions on matters of fact, the trial judge ignored evidence that N had swerved on the first curve he negotiated prior to the accident, and that he had driven on the road three times in the 18 to 20 hours preceding the accident. She further ignored the significance of the testimony of the forensic alcohol specialist which pointed overwhelmingly to alcohol as the causal factor which led to the accident, and erroneously relied on one statement by him to support her conclusion that a driver at N's level of impairment would have reacted to a warning sign. The finding that the outcome would have been different had N been forewarned of the curve ignores the fact that he already knew the curve was there. The fact that the trial judge referred to some evidence to support her findings on causation does not insulate them from review by this Court. An appellate court is entitled to assess whether or not it was clearly wrong for the trial judge to rely on some evidence when other evidence points overwhelmingly to the opposite conclusion.

Whatever the approach to the issue of the duty of care, it is only reasonable to expect a municipality to foresee accidents which occur as a result of the conditions of the road, and not, as in this case, as a result of the condition of the driver. To expand the repair obligation of municipalities to require them to take into account the actions of unreasonable or careless drivers when discharging this duty would signify a drastic and unworkable change to the current standard.

chemin. La question de la connaissance de l'intimée est intimement liée à celle de la norme de diligence. Une municipalité est uniquement censée avoir connaissance des dangers qui présentent un risque pour le conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales, puisqu'il s'agit des seuls dangers à l'égard desquels existe une obligation d'entretien. En l'espèce, on ne pouvait attendre de l'intimée qu'elle connaisse le danger qui existait à l'endroit où l'accident est survenu, puisque ce danger ne présentait tout simplement pas de risque pour le conducteur raisonnable. Il ressort implicitement des motifs de la juge de première instance que la municipalité aurait censément dû connaître l'existence des accidents grâce à un système d'information en la matière, erreur manifeste en l'absence de quelque élément de preuve indiquant ce qui aurait pu constituer un système raisonnable.

Relativement aux conclusions de la juge de première instance sur le lien de causalité, qui sont des conclusions de fait, celle-ci a fait abstraction de la preuve que le véhicule de N avait fait une embardée dans la première courbe et que ce dernier avait roulé à trois reprises sur le chemin en question au cours des 18 à 20 heures ayant précédé l'accident. La juge de première instance a également omis de tenir compte de l'importance du témoignage du spécialiste judiciaire en matière d'alcool, qui menait irrésistiblement à la conclusion que l'alcool avait été le facteur causal de l'accident, et elle a erronément invoqué une déclaration de celui-ci au soutien de sa conclusion que N aurait réagi à un panneau de signalisation. La conclusion que le résultat aurait été différent si N avait été prévenu de l'existence de la courbe ne tient pas compte du fait qu'il savait déjà qu'elle existait. Le fait que la juge de première instance ait mentionné certains éléments de preuve au soutien de ses conclusions sur le lien de causalité n'a pas pour effet de soustraire ces conclusions au pouvoir de contrôle de notre Cour. Le tribunal d'appel est habilité à se demander si le juge de première instance a clairement fait erreur en décidant comme il l'a fait sur le fondement de certains éléments de preuve alors que d'autres éléments mènent irrésistiblement à la conclusion inverse.

Indépendamment de l'approche choisie à l'égard de la question de l'obligation de diligence, il n'est que raisonnable d'attendre d'une municipalité qu'elle prévoit les accidents qui surviennent en raison de l'état du chemin, et non, comme en l'espèce, ceux qui résultent de l'état du conducteur. Élargir l'obligation d'entretien des municipalités en exigeant qu'elles tiennent compte, dans l'exécution de cette obligation, des actes des conducteurs déraisonnables ou imprudents, entraînerait une modification radicale et irréalisable de la norme actuelle.

I. Introduction

A proposition that should be unnecessary to state is that a court of appeal should not interfere with a trial judge's reasons unless there is a palpable and overriding error. The same proposition is sometimes stated as prohibiting an appellate court from reviewing a trial judge's decision if there was some evidence upon which he or she could have relied to reach that conclusion.

Authority for this abounds particularly in appellate courts in Canada and abroad (see Gottardo Properties (Dome) Inc. v. Toronto (City) (1998), 162 D.L.R. (4th) 574 (Ont. C.A.); Schwartz v. Canada, [1996] 1 S.C.R. 254; Toneguzzo-Norvell (Guardian ad litem of) v. Burnaby Hospital, [1994] 1 S.C.R. 114; Van de Perre v. Edwards, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 1014, 2001 SCC 60). In addition scholars, national and international, endorse it (see C. A. Wright in "The Doubtful Omniscience of Appellate Courts" (1957), 41 Minn. L. Rev. 751, at p. 780; and the Honourable R. P. Kerans in Standards of Review Employed by Appellate Courts (1994); and American Bar Association, Judicial Administration Division, Standards Relating to Appellate Courts (1995), at pp. 24-25).

The role of the appellate court was aptly defined in Underwood v. Ocean City Realty Ltd. (1987), 12 B.C.L.R. (2d) 199 (C.A.), at p. 204, where it was stated:

The appellate court must not retry a case and must not substitute its views for the views of the trial judge according to what the appellate court thinks the evidence establishes on its view of the balance of probabilities.

LES JUGES IACOBUCCI ET MAJOR —

I. Introduction

Il va sans dire qu'une cour d'appel ne devrait modifier les conclusions d'un juge de première instance qu'en cas d'erreur manifeste et dominante. On reformule parfois cette proposition en disant qu'une cour d'appel ne peut réviser la décision du juge de première instance dans les cas où il existait des éléments de preuve qui pouvaient étayer cette décision. 1

Il existe une abondante jurisprudence étayant cette proposition, particulièrement des décisions émanant de cours d'appel, tant au Canada qu'à l'étranger (voir Gottardo Properties (Dome) Inc. c. Toronto (City) (1998), 162 D.L.R. (4th) 574 (C.A. Ont.); Schwartz c. Canada, [1996] 1 R.C.S. 254; Toneguzzo-Norvell (Tutrice à l'instance de) c. Burnaby Hospital, [1994] 1 R.C.S. 114; Van de Perre c. Edwards, [2001] 2 R.C.S. 1014, 2001 CSC 60). En outre, des auteurs, tant à l'échelle nationale qu'internationale, y souscrivent (voir C. A. Wright, « The Doubtful Omniscience of Appellate Courts » (1957), 41 Minn. L. Rev. 751, p. 780; l'honorable R. P. Kerans, Standards of Review Employed by Appellate Courts (1994); et American Bar Association, Judicial Administration Division, Standards Relating to Appellate Courts (1995), p. 24-25). 2

4 While the theory has acceptance, consistency in its application is missing. The foundation of the principle is as sound today as 100 years ago. It is premised on the notion that finality is an important aim of litigation. There is no suggestion that appellate court judges are somehow smarter and thus capable of reaching a better result. Their role is not to write better judgments but to review the reasons in light of the arguments of the parties and the relevant evidence, and then to uphold the decision unless a palpable error leading to a wrong result has been made by the trial judge.

Quoique cette théorie soit généralement acceptée, elle n'est pas appliquée de manière systématique. Le fondement de cette théorie est aussi valide aujourd'hui qu'il l'était il y a 100 ans. Cette théorie repose sur l'idée que le caractère définitif des décisions est un aspect important du processus judiciaire. Personne ne prétend que les juges des cours d'appel seraient, d'une manière ou d'une autre, plus intelligents que les autres et donc capables d'arriver à un meilleur résultat. Leur rôle n'est pas de rédiger de meilleurs jugements, mais de contrôler les motifs à la lumière des arguments des parties et de la preuve pertinente, puis de confirmer la décision à moins que le juge de première instance n'ait commis une erreur manifeste ayant conduit à un résultat erroné.

5 What is palpable error? The New Oxford Dictionary of English (1998) defines "palpable" as "clear to the mind or plain to see" (p. 1337). The Cambridge International Dictionary of English (1996) describes it as "so obvious that it can easily be seen or known" (p. 1020). The Random House Dictionary of the English Language (2nd ed. 1987) defines it as "readily or plainly seen" (p. 1399).

Qu'est-ce qu'une erreur manifeste? Le Trésor de la langue française (1985) définit ainsi le mot « manifeste » : « . . . Qui est tout à fait évident, qui ne peut être contesté dans sa nature ou son existence. [. . .] erreur manifeste » (p. 317). Le Grand Robert de la langue française (2e éd. 2001) définit ce mot ainsi : « Dont l'existence ou la nature est évidente. [. . .] Qui est clairement, évidemment tel. [. . .] Erreur, injustice manifeste » (p. 1139). Enfin, le Grand Larousse de la langue française (1975) donne la définition suivante de « manifeste » : « . . . Se dit d'une chose que l'on ne peut contester, qui est tout à fait évidente : Une erreur manifeste » (p. 3213).

6 The common element in each of these definitions is that palpable is plainly seen. Applying that to this appeal, in order for the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal to reverse the trial judge the "palpable and overriding" error of fact found by Cameron J.A. must be plainly seen. As we will discuss, we do not think that test has been met.

L'élément commun de ces définitions est qu'une chose « manifeste » est une chose qui est « évidente ». Si l'on applique ce critère au présent pourvoi, il faut que l'« erreur manifeste et dominante » décelée par le juge Cameron soit évidente pour que la Cour d'appel de la Saskatchewan puisse infirmer la décision de la juge de première instance. Comme nous le verrons plus loin, nous ne croyons pas qu'on a satisfait à ce critère en l'espèce.

II. The Role of the Appellate Court in the Case at Bar

II. Le rôle de la Cour d'appel en l'espèce

7 Given that an appeal is not a retrial of a case, consideration must be given to the applicable standard of review of an appellate court on the various issues which arise on this appeal. We therefore find it helpful to discuss briefly the standards of review relevant

Étant donné que l'appel ne constitue pas un nouveau procès, il faut se demander quelle est la norme de contrôle applicable en appel à l'égard des diverses questions que soulève le présent pourvoi. Nous estimons donc utile d'examiner brièvement to the following types of questions: (1) questions of law; (2) questions of fact; (3) inferences of fact; and (4) questions of mixed fact and law.

A. Standard of Review for Questions of Law

On a pure question of law, the basic rule with respect to the review of a trial judge's findings is that an appellate court is free to replace the opinion of the trial judge with its own. Thus the standard of review on a question of law is that of correctness: Kerans, supra, at p. 90.

There are at least two underlying reasons for employing a correctness standard to matters of law. First, the principle of universality requires appellate courts to ensure that the same legal rules are applied in similar situations. The importance of this principle was recognized by this Court in Woods Manufacturing Co. v. The King, [1951] S.C.R. 504, at p. 515:

> It is fundamental to the due administration of justice that the authority of decisions be scrupulously respected by all courts upon which they are binding. Without this uniform and consistent adherence the administration of justice becomes disordered, the law becomes uncertain, and the confidence of the public in it undermined. Nothing is more important than that the law as pronounced . . . should be accepted and applied as our tradition requires; and even at the risk of that fallibility to which all judges are liable, we must maintain the complete integrity of relationship between the courts.

A second and related reason for applying a correctness standard to matters of law is the recognized law-making role of appellate courts which is pointed out by Kerans, supra, at p. 5:

> The call for universality, and the law-settling role it imposes, makes a considerable demand on a reviewing court. It expects from that authority a measure of expertise about the art of just and practical rule-making, an expertise that is not so critical for the first court. Reviewing courts, in cases where the law requires settlement, make law for future cases as well as the case under review.

les normes de contrôle se rapportant à chacune des catégories de questions suivantes : (1) les questions de droit; (2) les questions de fait; (3) les inférences de fait; (4) les questions mixtes de fait et de droit.

A. La norme de contrôle applicable aux questions de droit

Dans le cas des pures questions de droit, la règle fondamentale applicable en matière de contrôle des conclusions du juge de première instance est que les cours d'appel ont toute latitude pour substituer leur opinion à celle des juges de première instance. La norme de contrôle applicable à une question de droit est donc celle de la décision correcte : Kerans, op. cit., p. 90.

Au moins deux raisons justifient l'application de la norme de la décision correcte aux questions de droit. Premièrement, le principe de l'universalité impose aux cours d'appel le devoir de veiller à ce que les mêmes règles de droit soient appliquées dans des situations similaires. Notre Cour a reconnu l'importance de ce principe dans Woods Manufacturing Co. c. The King, [1951] R.C.S. 504, p. 515 :

Une deuxième raison, connexe, d'appliquer la norme de la décision correcte aux questions de droit tient au rôle qu'on reconnaît aux cours d'appel en matière de création du droit et qu'a souligné Kerans, op. cit., p. 5 :

Thus, while the primary role of trial courts is to resolve individual disputes based on the facts before them and settled law, the primary role of appellate courts is to delineate and refine legal rules and ensure their universal application. In order to fulfill the above functions, appellate courts require a broad scope of review with respect to matters of law.

B. Standard of Review for Findings of Fact

10 The standard of review for findings of fact is that such findings are not to be reversed unless it can be established that the trial judge made a "palpable and overriding error": Stein v. The Ship "Kathy K", [1976] 2 S.C.R. 802, at p. 808; Ingles v. Tutkaluk Construction Ltd., [2000] 1 S.C.R. 298, 2000 SCC 12, at para. 42; Ryan v. Victoria (City), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 201, at para. 57. While this standard is often cited, the principles underlying this high degree of deference rarely receive mention. We find it useful, for the purposes of this appeal, to review briefly the various policy reasons for employing a high level of appellate deference to findings of fact.

11 A fundamental reason for general deference to the trial judge is the presumption of fitness — a presumption that trial judges are just as competent as appellate judges to ensure that disputes are resolved justly. Kerans, supra, at pp. 10-11, states that:

> If we have confidence in these systems for the resolution of disputes, we should assume that those decisions are just. The appeal process is part of the decisional process, then, only because we recognize that, despite all effort, errors occur. An appeal should be the exception rather than the rule, as indeed it is in Canada.

12 With respect to findings of fact in particular, in Gottardo Properties, supra, Laskin J.A. summarized the purposes underlying a deferential stance as follows (at para. 48):

Ainsi, alors que le rôle premier des tribunaux de première instance consiste à résoudre des litiges sur la base des faits dont ils disposent et du droit établi, celui des cours d'appel est de préciser et de raffiner les règles de droit et de veiller à leur application universelle. Pour s'acquitter de ces rôles, les cours d'appel ont besoin d'un large pouvoir de contrôle à l'égard des questions de droit.

B. La norme de contrôle applicable aux questions de fait

Suivant la norme de contrôle applicable aux conclusions de fait, ces conclusions ne peuvent être infirmées que s'il est établi que le juge de première instance a commis une « erreur manifeste et dominante » : Stein c. Le navire « Kathy K », [1976] 2 R.C.S. 802, p. 808; Ingles c. Tutkaluk Construction Ltd., [2000] 1 R.C.S. 298, 2000 CSC 12, par. 42; Ryan c. Victoria (Ville), [1999] 1 R.C.S. 201, par. 57. On cite souvent cette norme, mais rarement les principes justifiant ce degré élevé de retenue. Pour les besoins du présent pourvoi, nous estimons qu'il est utile d'examiner brièvement les diverses considérations de principe qui incitent les cours d'appel à faire preuve d'un degré élevé de retenue à l'égard des conclusions de fait.

L'une des raisons fondamentales de cette retenue générale à l'égard des conclusions des juges de première instance tient à la présomption d'aptitude à juger — présomption selon laquelle les juges de première instance sont tout aussi aptes que les juges d'appel à apporter des solutions justes aux litiges. Kerans, op. cit., dit ceci aux p. 10-11 :

Pour ce qui est des conclusions de fait en particulier, dans Gottardo Properties, précité, le juge Laskin de la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a résumé ainsi les objectifs qui sous-tendent le principe de la retenue judiciaire (au par. 48) :

Deference is desirable for several reasons: to limit the number and length of appeals, to promote the autonomy and integrity of the trial or motion court proceedings on which substantial resources have been expended, to preserve the confidence of litigants in those proceedings, to recognize the competence of the trial judge or motion judge and to reduce needless duplication of judicial effort with no corresponding improvement in the quality of justice.

Similar concerns were expressed by La Forest J. in Schwartz, supra, at para. 32:

It has long been settled that appellate courts must treat a trial judge's findings of fact with great deference. The rule is principally based on the assumption that the trier of fact is in a privileged position to assess the credibility of witnesses' testimony at trial. . . . Others have also pointed out additional judicial policy concerns to justify the rule. Unlimited intervention by appellate courts would greatly increase the number and the length of appeals generally. Substantial resources are allocated to trial courts to go through the process of assessing facts. The autonomy and integrity of the trial process must be preserved by exercising deference towards the trial courts' findings of fact; see R. D. Gibbens, "Appellate Review of Findings of Fact" (1992), 13 Adv. Q. 445, at pp. 445-48; Fletcher v. Manitoba Public Insurance Co., [1990] 3 S.C.R. 191, at p. 204.

In Anderson v. Bessemer City, 470 U.S. 564 (1985), at pp. 574-75, the United States Supreme Court also listed numerous reasons for deferring to the factual findings of the trial judge:

The rationale for deference to the original finder of fact is not limited to the superiority of the trial judge's position to make determinations of credibility. The trial judge's major role is the determination of fact, and with experience in fulfilling that role comes expertise. Duplication of the trial judge's efforts in the court of appeals would very likely contribute only negligibly to the accuracy of fact determination at a huge cost in diversion of judicial resources. In addition, the parties to a case on appeal have already been forced to concentrate

Le juge La Forest a exprimé des préoccupations semblables dans l'arrêt Schwartz, précité, par. 32 :

Il est établi depuis longtemps que les cours d'appel doivent faire preuve d'une grande retenue à l'égard des conclusions de fait d'un juge de première instance. La règle se justifie principalement par la situation avantageuse dont bénéficie le juge des faits pour ce qui est d'évaluer la crédibilité des témoignages entendus au procès. [. . .] D'autres préoccupations liées à la politique judiciaire ont par ailleurs été invoquées pour justifier la règle. Une intervention illimitée des cours d'appel ferait augmenter considérablement le nombre et la durée des appels en général. D'importantes ressources sont mises à la disposition des tribunaux de première instance pour qu'ils puissent évaluer les faits. Il faut préserver l'autonomie et l'intégrité du procès en faisant preuve de retenue à l'égard des conclusions de fait des tribunaux de première instance; voir R. D. Gibbens, « Appellate Review of Findings of Fact » (1992), 13 Adv. Q. 445, aux pp. 445 à 448; Fletcher c. Société d'assurance publique du Manitoba, [1990] 3 R.C.S. 191, à la p. 204.

[TRADUCTION] La raison d'être de la retenue à l'égard des conclusions de fait du juge de première instance ne se limite pas au fait que ce dernier est mieux placé pour statuer sur la crédibilité. Le rôle principal du juge de première instance est de constater les faits, et l'expérience qu'il acquiert en s'acquittant de ce rôle lui confère son expertise à cet égard. Si les cours d'appel refaisaient le travail du juge de première instance, il est fort possible que ces efforts n'amélioreraient que marginalement l'exactitude des conclusions de fait, malgré their energies and resources on persuading the trial judge that their account of the facts is the correct one; requiring them to persuade three more judges at the appellate level is requiring too much. As the Court has stated in a different context, the trial on the merits should be "the 'main event' . . . rather than a 'tryout on the road.'" . . . For these reasons, review of factual findings under the clearly-erroneous standard — with its deference to the trier of fact — is the rule, not the exception.

14 Further comments regarding the advantages possessed by the trial judge have been made by R. D. Gibbens in "Appellate Review of Findings of Fact" (1991-92), 13 Advocates' Q. 445, at p. 446:

> The trial judge is said to have an expertise in assessing and weighing the facts developed at trial. Similarly, the trial judge has also been exposed to the entire case. The trial judge has sat through the entire case and his ultimate judgment reflects this total familiarity with the evidence. The insight gained by the trial judge who has lived with the case for several days, weeks or even months may be far deeper than that of the Court of Appeal whose view of the case is much more limited and narrow, often being shaped and distorted by the various orders or rulings being challenged.
> The corollary to this recognized advantage of trial courts and judges is that appellate courts are not in a favourable position to assess and determine factual matters. Appellate court judges are restricted to reviewing written transcripts of testimony. As well, appeals are unsuited to reviewing voluminous amounts of evidence. Finally, appeals are telescopic in nature, focussing narrowly on particular issues as opposed to viewing the case as a whole.

15 In our view, the numerous bases for deferring to the findings of fact of the trial judge which are discussed in the above authorities can be grouped into the following three basic principles.

(1) Limiting the Number, Length and Cost of Appeals

16 Given the scarcity of judicial resources, setting limits on the scope of judicial review is to be les ressources judiciaires considérables qui devraient être réaffectées à cette fin. En outre, les parties à un appel ont déjà dû consacrer énergies et ressources à convaincre le juge de première instance de la justesse de leur version des faits; ce serait abuser que de leur demander de convaincre trois autres juges en appel. Comme l'a dit notre Cour dans un contexte différent, le procès sur le fond devrait être considéré comme « "l'épreuve principale" [. . .] plutôt que comme un "banc d'essai" ». [. . .] Pour ces motifs, le contrôle des décisions de fait selon la norme de la décision manifestement erronée — et la retenue envers le juge de première instance qu'elle suppose — est la règle, et non l'exception.

D'autres observations sur les avantages dont disposent le juge de première instance ont été formulées par R. D. Gibbens dans « Appellate Review of Findings of Fact » (1991-92), 13 Advocates' Q. 445, p. 446 :

> [TRADUCTION] On dit que le juge de première instance possède de l'expertise dans l'évaluation et l'appréciation des faits présentés au procès. Il a également entendu l'affaire au complet. Il a assisté à toute la cause et son jugement final reflète cette connaissance intime de la preuve. Cette connaissance, acquise par le juge au fil des jours, des semaines voire des mois qu'a durés l'affaire, peut se révéler beaucoup plus profonde que celle de la cour d'appel, dont la perception est beaucoup plus limitée et étroite, et souvent déterminée et déformée par les diverses ordonnances et décisions qui sont contestées.

Cet avantage reconnu des tribunaux et des juges de première instance a pour corollaire que les cours d'appel ne sont pas dans une position favorable pour évaluer et apprécier les questions de fait. Les juges des cours d'appel n'examinent que la transcription des témoignages. De plus, les appels ne se prêtent pas à l'examen de dossiers volumineux. Enfin, les appels ont un caractère « focalisateur », en ce qu'ils s'attachent à des questions particulières plutôt qu'à l'ensemble de l'affaire.

À notre avis, ces diverses raisons justifiant la retenue à l'égard des conclusions de fait du juge de première instance peuvent être regroupées sous les trois principes de base suivants.

(1) Réduire le nombre, la durée et le coût des appels

Vu la rareté des ressources dont disposent les tribunaux, il faut encourager l'établissement encouraged. Deferring to a trial judge's findings of fact not only serves this end, but does so on a principled basis. Substantial resources are allocated to trial courts for the purpose of assessing facts. To allow for wide-ranging review of the trial judge's factual findings results in needless duplication of judicial proceedings with little, if any improvement in the result. In addition, lengthy appeals prejudice litigants with fewer resources, and frustrate the goal of providing an efficient and effective remedy for the parties.

(2) Promoting the Autonomy and Integrity of Trial Proceedings

The presumption underlying the structure of our court system is that a trial judge is competent to decide the case before him or her, and that a just and fair outcome will result from the trial process. Frequent and unlimited appeals would undermine this presumption and weaken public confidence in the trial process. An appeal is the exception rather than the rule.

(3) Recognizing the Expertise of the Trial Judge and His or Her Advantageous Position

The trial judge is better situated to make factual findings owing to his or her extensive exposure to the evidence, the advantage of hearing testimony viva voce, and the judge's familiarity with the case as a whole. Because the primary role of the trial judge is to weigh and assess voluminous quantities of evidence, the expertise and insight of the trial judge in this area should be respected.

C. Standard of Review for Inferences of Fact

We find it necessary to address the appropriate standard of review for factual inferences because the reasons of our colleague suggest that a lower standard of review may be applied to the inferences of fact drawn by a trial judge. With respect, it is our de limites à la portée du contrôle judiciaire. La retenue à l'égard des conclusions de fait du juge de première instance sert cet objectif d'une manière rationnelle. D'importantes ressources sont allouées aux tribunaux de première instance aux fins d'évaluation des faits. Permettre un large contrôle des conclusions factuelles des juges de première instance entraîne une inutile répétition de procédures judiciaires, tout en n'améliorant que peu ou pas le résultat. En outre, de longs appels causent préjudice aux plaideurs moins bien nantis et compromettent l'objectif qui consiste à mettre à leur disposition des recours efficients et efficaces.

(2) Favoriser l'autonomie du procès et son intégrité

17 L'organisation de notre système judiciaire repose sur la présomption que le juge de première instance est qualifié pour trancher l'affaire dont il est saisi et qu'une solution juste et équitable résultera du procès. Des appels fréquents et illimités affaibliraient cette présomption et saperait la confiance du public dans le processus judiciaire. L'appel est l'exception, non la règle.

(3) Reconnaître l'expertise du juge de première instance et sa position avantageuse

18 Le juge de première instance est celui qui est le mieux placé pour tirer des conclusions de fait, parce qu'il a l'occasion d'examiner la preuve en profondeur, d'entendre les témoignages de vive voix et de se familiariser avec l'affaire dans son ensemble. Étant donné que le rôle principal du juge de première instance est d'apprécier et de soupeser d'abondantes quantités d'éléments de preuve, son expertise dans ce domaine et sa connaissance intime du dossier doivent être respectées.

C. La norme de contrôle applicable aux inférences de fait

19 Nous estimons nécessaire de nous pencher sur la question de la norme de contrôle appropriée quant aux inférences de fait des juges de première instance, parce que les motifs de notre collègue suggèrent qu'une norme de contrôle moins exigeante peut view, that to apply a lower standard of review to inferences of fact would be to depart from established jurisprudence of this Court, and would be contrary to the principles supporting a deferential stance to matters of fact.

20 Our colleague acknowledges that, in Geffen v. Goodman Estate, [1991] 2 S.C.R. 353, this Court determined that a trial judge's inferences of fact and findings of fact should be accorded a similar degree of deference. The relevant passage from Geffen is the following (per Wilson J., at pp. 388-89):

> It is by now well established that findings of fact made at trial based on the credibility of witnesses are not to be reversed on appeal unless it is established that the trial judge made some palpable and overriding error which affected his assessment of the facts . . . . Even where a finding of fact is not contingent upon credibility, this Court has maintained a non-interventionist approach to the review of trial court findings. . . .
> And even in those cases where a finding of fact is neither inextricably linked to the credibility of the testifying witness nor based on a misapprehension of the evidence, the rule remains that appellate review should be limited to those instances where a manifest error has been made. Hence, in Schreiber Brothers Ltd. v. Currie Products Ltd., [1980] 2 S.C.R. 78, this Court refused to overturn a trial judge's finding that certain goods were defective, stating at pp. 84-85 that it is wrong for an appellate court to set aside a trial judgment where the only point at issue is the interpretation of the evidence as a whole (citing Métivier v. Cadorette, [1977] 1 S.C.R. 371).

This view has been reiterated by this Court on numerous occasions: see Palsky v. Humphrey, [1964] S.C.R. 580, at p. 583; Schwartz, supra, at para. 32; Hodgkinson v. Simms, [1994] 3 S.C.R. 377, at p. 426, per La Forest J.; Toneguzzo-Norvell, supra. The United States Supreme Court has taken a similar position: see Anderson, supra, at p. 577.

21 In discussing the standard of review of the trial judge's inferences of fact, our colleague states, at para. 103, that:

être appliquée à cet égard. En toute déférence, nous sommes d'avis que l'application d'une telle norme de contrôle romprait avec la jurisprudence établie de notre Cour en la matière et serait contraire aux principes justifiant le respect d'une attitude empreinte de retenue à l'égard des constatations de fait.

Notre collègue reconnaît que dans l'arrêt Geffen c. Succession Goodman, [1991] 2 R.C.S. 353, notre Cour a jugé qu'il fallait faire preuve du même degré de retenue à l'égard des inférences de fait du juge de première instance qu'à l'égard de ses constatations de fait. Voici le passage pertinent des motifs de madame le juge Wilson (aux p. 388-389) :

> C'est maintenant un principe bien établi que les constatations de fait d'un juge de première instance, fondées sur la crédibilité des témoins, ne doivent pas être infirmées en appel à moins qu'il ne soit prouvé que le juge de première instance a commis une erreur manifeste et dominante qui a faussé son appréciation des faits [. . .] Même si une constatation de fait ne dépend pas de la crédibilité, notre Cour a pour principe de ne pas intervenir pour réviser les constatations des tribunaux de première instance . . .
> Et même dans les cas où une constatation de fait n'est ni liée inextricablement à la crédibilité du témoin ni fondée sur une mauvaise compréhension de la preuve, la règle reste la même : l'examen en appel devrait se limiter aux cas où une erreur manifeste a été commise. C'est pourquoi, dans l'arrêt Schreiber Brothers Ltd. c. Currie Products Ltd., [1980] 2 R.C.S. 78, notre Cour a refusé d'infirmer la conclusion du juge de première instance que certaines marchandises étaient défectueuses, disant, aux pp. 84 et 85, qu'une cour d'appel ne peut à bon droit infirmer une décision de première instance lorsque la seule question en litige porte sur l'interprétation de l'ensemble de la preuve (citant Métivier c. Cadorette, [1977] 1 R.C.S. 371).

Notre Cour a réitéré cette opinion à maintes reprises : voir Palsky c. Humphrey, [1964] R.C.S. 580, p. 583; Schwartz, précité, par. 32; Hodgkinson c. Simms, [1994] 3 R.C.S. 377, p. 426, le juge La Forest; Toneguzzo-Norvell, précité. La Cour suprême des États-Unis a adopté une position semblable : voir Anderson, précité, p. 577.

Dans son examen de la norme de contrôle applicable aux inférences de fait du juge de première instance, notre collègue dit ce qui suit, au par. 103 :

In reviewing the making of an inference, the appeal court will verify whether it can reasonably be supported by the findings of fact that the trial judge reached and whether the judge proceeded on proper legal principles. . . . While the standard of review is identical for both findings of fact and inferences of fact, it is nonetheless important to draw an analytical distinction between the two. If the reviewing court were to review only for errors of fact, then the decision of the trial judge would necessarily be upheld in every case where evidence existed to support his or her factual findings. In my view, this Court is entitled to conclude that inferences made by the trial judge were clearly wrong, just as it is entitled to reach this conclusion in respect to findings of fact. [Emphasis added.]

With respect, we find two problems with this passage. First, in our view, the standard of review is not to verify that the inference can be reasonably supported by the findings of fact of the trial judge, but whether the trial judge made a palpable and overriding error in coming to a factual conclusion based on accepted facts, which implies a stricter standard.

Second, with respect, we find that by drawing an analytical distinction between factual findings and factual inferences, the above passage may lead appellate courts to involve themselves in an unjustified reweighing of the evidence. Although we agree that it is open to an appellate court to find that an inference of fact made by the trial judge is clearly wrong, we would add the caution that where evidence exists to support this inference, an appellate court will be hard pressed to find a palpable and overriding error. As stated above, trial courts are in an advantageous position when it comes to assessing and weighing vast quantities of evidence. In making a factual inference, the trial judge must sift through the relevant facts, decide on their weight, and draw a factual conclusion. Thus, where evidence exists which supports this conclusion, interference with this conclusion entails interference with the weight assigned by the trial judge to the pieces of evidence.

La cour d'appel qui contrôle la validité d'une inférence se demande si celle-ci peut raisonnablement être étayée par les conclusions de fait tirées par le juge de première instance et si celui-ci a appliqué les principes juridiques appropriés. [. . .] Bien que la norme de contrôle soit la même et pour les conclusions de fait et pour les inférences de fait, il importe néanmoins de faire une distinction analytique entre les deux. Si le tribunal de révision ne faisait que vérifier s'il y a des erreurs de fait, la décision du juge de première instance serait alors nécessairement confirmée dans tous les cas où il existe des éléments de preuve étayant les conclusions de fait de ce dernier. Selon moi, notre Cour a le droit de conclure que les inférences du juge de première instance étaient manifestement erronées, tout comme elle peut le faire à l'égard des conclusions de fait. [Nous soulignons.]

En toute déférence, nous estimons que ce passage comporte deux erreurs. Premièrement, selon nous, la norme de contrôle ne consiste pas à vérifier si l'inférence peut être raisonnablement étayée par les conclusions de fait du juge de première instance, mais plutôt si ce dernier a commis une erreur manifeste et dominante en tirant une conclusion factuelle sur la base de faits admis, ce qui suppose l'application d'une norme plus stricte.

Deuxièmement, nous croyons en toute déférence qu'en faisant une distinction analytique entre les conclusions factuelles et les inférences factuelles, le passage précité pourrait amener les cours d'appel à soupeser la preuve à nouveau et sans raison. Bien que nous partagions l'opinion selon laquelle il est loisible à une cour d'appel de conclure qu'une inférence de fait tirée par le juge de première instance est manifestement erronée, nous tenons toutefois à faire la mise en garde suivante : lorsque des éléments de preuve étayent cette inférence, il sera difficile à une cour d'appel de conclure à l'existence d'une erreur manifeste et dominante. Comme nous l'avons dit précédemment, les tribunaux de première instance sont dans une position avantageuse pour apprécier et soupeser de vastes quantités d'éléments de preuve. Pour tirer une inférence factuelle, le juge de première instance doit passer les faits pertinents au crible, en apprécier la valeur probante et tirer une conclusion factuelle. En conséquence, lorsque cette conclusion est étayée par des éléments de preuve, modifier cette conclusion équivaut à modifier le poids accordé à ces éléments par le juge de première instance.

23 We reiterate that it is not the role of appellate courts to second-guess the weight to be assigned to the various items of evidence. If there is no palpable and overriding error with respect to the underlying facts that the trial judge relies on to draw the inference, then it is only where the inference-drawing process itself is palpably in error that an appellate court can interfere with the factual conclusion. The appellate court is not free to interfere with a factual conclusion that it disagrees with where such disagreement stems from a difference of opinion over the weight to be assigned to the underlying facts. As we discuss below, it is our respectful view that our colleague's finding that the trial judge erred by imputing knowledge of the hazard to the municipality in this case is an example of this type of impermissible interference with the factual inference drawn by the trial judge.

24 In addition, in distinguishing inferences of fact from findings of fact, our colleague states, at para. 102, that deference to findings of fact is "principally grounded in the recognition that only the trial judge enjoys the opportunity to observe witnesses and to hear testimony first-hand", a rationale which does not bear on factual inferences. With respect, we disagree with this view. As we state above, there are numerous reasons for showing deference to the factual findings of a trial judge, many of which are equally applicable to all factual conclusions of the trial judge. This was pointed out in Schwartz, supra. After listing numerous policy concerns justifying a deferential approach to findings of fact, at para. 32 La Forest J. goes on to state:

> This explains why the rule [that appellate courts must treat a trial judge's findings of fact with great deference] applies not only when the credibility of witnesses is at issue, although in such a case it may be more strictly applied, but also to all conclusions of fact made by the trial judge. [Emphasis added.]

Nous rappelons qu'il n'appartient pas aux cours d'appel de remettre en question le poids attribué aux différents éléments de preuve. Si aucune erreur manifeste et dominante n'est décelée en ce qui concerne les faits sur lesquels repose l'inférence du juge de première instance, ce n'est que lorsque le processus inférentiel lui-même est manifestement erroné que la cour d'appel peut modifier la conclusion factuelle. La cour d'appel n'est pas habilitée à modifier une conclusion factuelle avec laquelle elle n'est pas d'accord, lorsque ce désaccord résulte d'une divergence d'opinion sur le poids à attribuer aux faits à la base de la conclusion. Comme nous le verrons plus loin, nous estimons en toute déférence que constitue un exemple de ce genre d'intervention inadmissible à l'égard d'une inférence de fait la conclusion de notre collègue selon laquelle la juge de première instance a commis une erreur en prêtant à la municipalité la connaissance du danger dans la présente affaire.

De plus, en établissant une distinction entre les inférences de fait et les conclusions de fait, notre collègue dit, au par. 102, que la retenue à l'égard des secondes « repose principalement sur le fait que, puisqu'il [le juge de première instance] est le seul à avoir l'occasion d'observer les témoins et d'entendre les témoignages de vive voix », justification non pertinente dans le cas des inférences de fait. En toute déférence, nous ne partageons pas cette opinion. Comme nous l'avons dit plus tôt, il existe de nombreuses raisons de faire preuve de retenue à l'égard des constatations de fait du juge de première instance, dont plusieurs valent autant pour toutes ses conclusions factuelles. Cette observation a été faite dans l'arrêt Schwartz, précité. Après avoir énuméré les nombreuses considérations de politique judiciaire invoquées pour justifier la règle de la retenue à l'égard des constatations de fait, le juge La Forest, au par. 32, ajoute :

> Cela explique pourquoi la règle [selon laquelle les cours d'appel doivent faire preuve d'une grande retenue à l'égard des conclusions de fait des juges de première instance] s'applique non seulement lorsque la crédibilité des témoins est en cause, quoiqu'elle puisse alors s'appliquer plus strictement, mais également à toutes les conclusions de fait tirées par le juge de première instance. [Nous soulignons.]

Recent support for deferring to all factual conclusions of the trial judge is found in Toneguzzo-Norvell, supra. McLachlin J. (as she then was) for a unanimous Court stated, at pp. 121-22:

> A Court of Appeal is clearly not entitled to interfere merely because it takes a different view of the evidence. The finding of facts and the drawing of evidentiary conclusions from facts is the province of the trial judge, not the Court of Appeal.
> I agree that the principle of non-intervention of a Court of Appeal in a trial judge's findings of facts does not apply with the same force to inferences drawn from conflicting testimony of expert witnesses where the credibility of these witnesses is not in issue. This does not however change the fact that the weight to be assigned to the various pieces of evidence is under our trial system essentially the province of the trier of fact, in this case the trial judge. [Emphasis added.]

We take the above comments of McLachlin J. to mean that, although the same high standard of deference applies to the entire range of factual determinations made by the trial judge, where a factual finding is grounded in an assessment of credibility of a witness, the overwhelming advantage of the trial judge in this area must be acknowledged. This does not, however, imply that there is a lower standard of review where witness credibility is not in issue, or that there are not numerous policy reasons supporting deference to all factual conclusions of the trial judge. In our view, this is made clear by the underlined portion of the above passage. The essential point is that making a factual conclusion, of any kind, is inextricably linked with assigning weight to evidence, and thus attracts a deferential standard of review.

Although the trial judge will always be in a distinctly privileged position when it comes to

Notre Cour a récemment donné son appui à la règle de la retenue judiciaire à l'égard de l'ensemble des conclusions factuelles du juge de première instance dans l'arrêt Toneguzzo-Norvell, précité. Madame le juge McLachlin (maintenant Juge en chef), qui a rédigé le jugement unanime de notre Cour, a dit ceci, aux p. 121-122 :

> Une cour d'appel n'est manifestement pas autorisée à intervenir pour le simple motif qu'elle perçoit la preuve différemment. Il appartient au juge de première instance, et non à la cour d'appel, de tirer des conclusions de fait en matière de preuve.
> Je reconnais que le principe de non-intervention d'une cour d'appel dans les conclusions de fait d'un juge de première instance ne s'applique pas avec la même vigueur aux conclusions tirées de témoignages d'expert contradictoires lorsque la crédibilité de ces derniers n'est pas en cause. Il n'en demeure pas moins que, selon notre système de procès, il appartient essentiellement au juge des faits, en l'espèce le juge de première instance, d'attribuer un poids aux différents éléments de preuve. [Nous soulignons.]

Nous considérons que ces propos du juge McLachlin signifient que, bien que le même degré élevé de retenue s'applique à l'ensemble des décisions factuelles du juge de première instance, lorsqu'une telle conclusion factuelle repose sur l'appréciation de la crédibilité d'un témoin, il faut reconnaître l'énorme avantage dont jouit le juge de première instance à cet égard. Cela ne veut toutefois pas dire qu'une norme de contrôle moins rigoureuse s'applique lorsque la question en jeu ne porte pas sur la crédibilité d'un témoin, ni qu'il n'existe pas de nombreuses considérations de principe justifiant de faire montre de retenue à l'égard de toutes les conclusions factuelles. À notre avis, cela ressort clairement du passage souligné dans l'extrait précité. Le point essentiel est qu'une conclusion factuelle — quelle que soit sa nature — exige nécessairement qu'on attribue un certain poids à un élément de preuve et, de ce fait, commande l'application d'une norme de contrôle empreinte de retenue.

assessing the credibility of witnesses, this is not the only area where the trial judge has an advantage over appellate judges. Advantages enjoyed by the trial judge with respect to the drawing of factual inferences include the trial judge's relative expertise with respect to the weighing and assessing of evidence, and the trial judge's inimitable familiarity with the often vast quantities of evidence. This extensive exposure to the entire factual nexus of a case will be of invaluable assistance when it comes to drawing factual conclusions. In addition, concerns with respect to cost, number and length of appeals apply equally to inferences of fact and findings of fact, and support a deferential approach towards both. As such, we respectfully disagree with our colleague's view that the principal rationale for showing deference to findings of fact is the opportunity to observe witnesses first-hand. It is our view that the trial judge enjoys numerous advantages over appellate judges which bear on all conclusions of fact, and, even in the absence of these advantages, there are other compelling policy reasons supporting a deferential approach to inferences of fact. We conclude, therefore, by emphasizing that there is one, and only one, standard of review applicable to all factual conclusions made by the trial judge — that of palpable and overriding error.

la crédibilité des témoins, ce n'est pas là le seul domaine où il bénéficie d'un avantage sur les juges des cours d'appel. Parmi les avantages dont jouit le juge de première instance sur le plan des inférences factuelles, mentionnons son expertise relative en matière d'appréciation et d'évaluation de la preuve, de même que la connaissance unique qu'il possède de la preuve souvent abondante produite par les parties. Cette familiarité avec toute la trame factuelle lui est d'une grande utilité lorsque vient le moment de tirer des conclusions de fait. En outre, les considérations relatives au coût, au nombre et à la durée des appels sont tout aussi pertinentes pour ce qui est des inférences de fait que pour ce qui est des conclusions de fait, et justifient l'application aux unes comme aux autres d'une norme empreinte de retenue. En conséquence, nous ne partageons pas l'opinion de notre collègue selon laquelle la raison principale justifiant de faire montre de retenue à l'égard des conclusions de fait est la possibilité qu'a le juge de première instance d'observer les témoins directement. Nous sommes d'avis que le juge de première instance jouit, par rapport aux juges d'appel, de nombreux avantages qui influent sur toutes les conclusions de fait et que, même si ces avantages n'existaient pas, d'autres considérations impérieuses justifient de faire montre de retenue à l'égard des inférences de fait. Par conséquent, nous concluons en soulignant qu'il n'y a qu'une seule et unique norme de contrôle applicable à toutes les conclusions factuelles tirées par le juge de première instance, soit celle de l'erreur manifeste et dominante.

D. Standard of Review for Questions of Mixed Fact and Law

26 At the outset, it is important to distinguish questions of mixed fact and law from factual findings (whether direct findings or inferences). Questions of mixed fact and law involve applying a legal standard to a set of facts: Canada (Director of Investigation and Research) v. Southam Inc., [1997] 1 S.C.R. 748, at para. 35. On the other hand, factual findings or inferences require making a conclusion of fact based on a set of facts. Both mixed fact and law and fact findings often involve drawing inferences; the difference lies in whether the inference drawn is legal

D. La norme de contrôle applicable aux questions mixtes de fait et de droit

D'entrée de jeu, il importe de distinguer les questions mixtes de fait et de droit des conclusions factuelles (qu'il s'agisse de conclusions directes ou d'inférences). Les questions mixtes de fait et de droit supposent l'application d'une norme juridique à un ensemble de faits : Canada (Directeur des enquêtes et des recherches) c. Southam Inc., [1997] 1 R.C.S. 748, par. 35. Par contre, les conclusions ou les inférences de fait exigent que soit tirée une conclusion factuelle d'un ensemble de faits. Tant les questions mixtes de fait et de droit que les questions or factual. Because of this similarity, the two types of questions are sometimes confounded. This confusion was pointed out by A. L. Goodhart in "Appeals on Questions of Fact" (1955), 71 L.Q.R. 402, at p. 405:

> The distinction between [the perception of facts and the evaluation of facts] tends to be obfuscated because we use such a phrase as "the judge found as a fact that the defendant had been negligent," when what we mean to say is that "the judge found as a fact that the defendant had done acts A and B, and as a matter of opinion he reached the conclusion that it was not reasonable for the defendant to have acted in that way."

In the case at bar, there are examples of both types of questions. The issue of whether the municipality ought to have known of the hazard in the road involves weighing the underlying facts and making factual findings as to the knowledge of the municipality. It also involves applying a legal standard, which in this case is provided by s. 192(3) of the Rural Municipality Act, 1989, S.S. 1989-90, c. R-26.1, to these factual findings. Similarly, the finding of negligence involves weighing the underlying facts, making factual conclusions therefrom, and drawing an inference as to whether or not the municipality failed to exercise the legal standard of reasonable care and therefore was negligent.

Once it has been determined that a matter being reviewed involves the application of a legal standard to a set of facts, and is thus a question of mixed fact and law, then the appropriate standard of review must be determined and applied. Given the different standards of review applicable to questions of law and questions of fact, it is often difficult to determine what the applicable standard of review is. In Southam, supra, at para. 39, this Court illustrated how an error on a question of mixed fact and law can amount to a pure error of law subject to the correctness standard:

> . . . if a decision-maker says that the correct test requires him or her to consider A, B, C, and D, but in fact the de fait exigent souvent du tribunal qu'il tire des inférences; la différence réside dans le caractère — juridique ou factuel — de ces inférences. En raison de cette similitude, on confond parfois les deux catégories de questions. Cette confusion a été soulignée par A. L. Goodhart dans « Appeals on Questions of Fact » (1955), 71 L.Q.R. 402, p. 405 :

> [TRADUCTION] La distinction entre [la perception des faits et l'appréciation de ceux-ci] a tendance à être embrouillée parce que nous utilisons la formule « le juge a conclu au fait que le défendeur avait été négligent », alors que ce que nous voulons dire, c'est que « le juge a constaté le fait que le défendeur a commis les actes A et B et, suivant son opinion, il a conclu qu'il n'était pas raisonnable pour ce dernier d'avoir agi ainsi ».

L'affaire qui nous occupe présente des exemples des deux catégories de questions. Pour répondre à la question de savoir si la municipalité aurait dû connaître le danger présenté par le chemin, il faut apprécier les faits à l'origine de l'affaire et tirer des conclusions factuelles relativement à la connaissance de la municipalité. Il faut appliquer à ces conclusions factuelles une norme juridique qui, en l'occurrence, est énoncée au par. 192(3) de la Rural Municipality Act, 1989, S.S. 1989-90, ch. R-26.1. De même, pour pouvoir conclure à la négligence, il faut apprécier les faits essentiels, en tirer des conclusions factuelles puis en dégager une inférence, c'est-à-dire se demander si la municipalité a oui ou non omis de respecter la norme de diligence raisonnable et si elle a, par conséquent, été négligente ou non.

Une fois établi que la question examinée exige l'application d'une norme juridique à un ensemble de faits et qu'il s'agit donc d'une question mixte de fait et de droit, il faut alors déterminer quelle est la norme de contrôle appropriée et l'appliquer. Vu les diverses normes de contrôle qui s'appliquent aux questions de droit et aux questions de fait, il est souvent difficile de déterminer celle qui s'applique. Dans l'arrêt Southam, précité, par. 39, notre Cour a expliqué comment une erreur touchant une question mixte de fait et de droit peut constituer une pure erreur de droit, assujettie à la norme de la décision correcte :

> . . . si un décideur dit que, en vertu du critère applicable, il lui faut tenir compte de A, B, C et D, mais que, dans les decision-maker considers only A, B, and C, then the outcome is as if he or she had applied a law that required consideration of only A, B, and C. If the correct test requires him or her to consider D as well, then the decision-maker has in effect applied the wrong law, and so has made an error of law.

Therefore, what appears to be a question of mixed fact and law, upon further reflection, can actually be an error of pure law.

28 However, where the error does not amount to an error of law, a higher standard is mandated. Where the trier of fact has considered all the evidence that the law requires him or her to consider and still comes to the wrong conclusion, then this amounts to an error of mixed law and fact and is subject to a more stringent standard of review: Southam, supra, at paras. 41 and 45. While easy to state, this distinction can be difficult in practice because matters of mixed law and fact fall along a spectrum of particularity. This difficulty was pointed out in Southam, at para. 37:

> . . . the matrices of facts at issue in some cases are so particular, indeed so unique, that decisions about whether they satisfy legal tests do not have any great precedential value. If a court were to decide that driving at a certain speed on a certain road under certain conditions was negligent, its decision would not have any great value as a precedent. In short, as the level of generality of the challenged proposition approaches utter particularity, the matter approaches pure application, and hence draws nigh to being an unqualified question of mixed law and fact. See R. P. Kerans, Standards of Review Employed by Appellate Courts (1994), at pp. 103-108. Of course, it is not easy to say precisely where the line should be drawn; though in most cases it should be sufficiently clear whether the dispute is over a general proposition that might qualify as a principle of law or over a very particular set of circumstances that is not apt to be of much interest to judges and lawyers in the future.

29 When the question of mixed fact and law at issue is a finding of negligence, this Court has held that faits, il ne prend en considération que A, B, et C, alors le résultat est le même que s'il avait appliqué une règle de droit lui dictant de ne tenir compte que de A, B et C. Si le bon critère lui commandait de tenir compte aussi de D, il a en fait appliqué la mauvaise règle de droit et commis, de ce fait, une erreur de droit.

Par conséquent, ce qui peut paraître une question mixte de fait et de droit peut, après plus ample examen, se révéler en réalité une pure erreur de droit.

Cependant, lorsque l'erreur ne constitue pas une erreur de droit, une norme de contrôle plus exigeante s'impose. Dans les cas où le juge des faits examine tous les éléments de preuve que le droit lui commande de prendre en considération mais en tire néanmoins une conclusion erronée, il commet alors une erreur mixte de fait et de droit, qui est assujettie à une norme de contrôle plus rigoureuse : Southam, précité, par. 41 et 45. Bien que facile à énoncer, cette distinction peut s'avérer difficile à établir en pratique parce que les questions mixtes de fait et de droit s'étalent le long d'un spectre comportant des degrés variables de particularité. Cette difficulté a été soulignée dans l'arrêt Southam, par. 37 :

> . . . il arrive que les faits dans certaines affaires soient si particuliers, de fait qu'ils soient si uniques, que les décisions concernant la question de savoir s'ils satisfont aux critères juridiques n'ont pas une grande valeur comme précédents. Si une cour décidait que le fait d'avoir conduit à une certaine vitesse, sur une route donnée et dans des conditions particulières constituait de la négligence, sa décision aurait peu de valeur comme précédent. Bref, plus le niveau de généralité de la proposition contestée se rapproche de la particularité absolue, plus l'affaire prend le caractère d'une question d'application pure, et s'approche donc d'une question de droit et de fait parfaite. Voir R. P. Kerans, Standards of Review Employed by Appellate Courts (1994), aux pp. 103 à 108. Il va de soi qu'il n'est pas facile de dire avec précision où doit être tracée la ligne de démarcation; quoique, dans la plupart des cas, la situation soit suffisamment claire pour permettre de déterminer si le litige porte sur une proposition générale qui peut être qualifiée de principe de droit ou sur un ensemble très particulier de circonstances qui n'est pas susceptible de présenter beaucoup d'intérêt pour les juges et les avocats dans l'avenir.

Lorsque la question mixte de fait et de droit en litige est une conclusion de négligence, notre a finding of negligence by the trial judge should be deferred to by appellate courts. In Jaegli Enterprises Ltd. v. Taylor, [1981] 2 S.C.R. 2, at p. 4, Dickson J. (as he then was) set aside the holding of the British Columbia Court of Appeal that the trial judge had erred in his finding of negligence on the basis that "it is wrong for an appellate court to set aside a trial judgment where there is not palpable and overriding error, and the only point at issue is the interpretation of the evidence as a whole" (see also Schreiber Brothers Ltd. v. Currie Products Ltd., [1980] 2 S.C.R. 78, at p. 84).

Cour a jugé que les cours d'appel devaient faire preuve de retenue à l'égard de la conclusion du juge de première instance. Dans l'arrêt Jaegli Enterprises Ltd. c. Taylor, [1981] 2 R.C.S. 2, p. 4, le juge Dickson (plus tard Juge en chef) a infirmé la décision de la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique portant que le juge de première instance avait erronément conclu à la négligence, pour le motif qu'« une cour d'appel commet une erreur lorsqu'elle infirme un jugement de première instance s'il n'y a pas une erreur manifeste et dominante, et si l'interprétation de l'ensemble de la preuve est le seul point en litige » (voir aussi l'arrêt Schreiber Brothers Ltd. c. Currie Products Ltd., [1980] 2 R.C.S. 78, p. 84).

This more stringent standard of review for findings of negligence is appropriate, given that findings of negligence at the trial level can also be made by juries. If the standard were instead correctness, this would result in the appellate court assessing even jury findings of negligence on a correctness standard. At present, absent misdirection on law by the trial judge, such review is not available. The general rule is that courts accord great deference to a jury's findings in civil negligence proceedings:

Il convient d'appliquer cette norme de contrôle plus exigeante aux conclusions de négligence, étant donné que de telles conclusions peuvent également être tirées par des jurys en première instance. Si la norme applicable était celle de la décision correcte, il s'ensuivrait que les cours d'appel appliqueraient cette norme pour contrôler même des conclusions de négligence tirées par jurys. Actuellement, il n'y a ouverture à un tel contrôle que si le juge du procès a donné des directives erronées au jury sur le droit applicable. Suivant la règle générale, les tribunaux font montre d'une grande retenue envers les conclusions des jurys dans les procès civils pour négligence :

> The principle has been laid down in many judgments of this Court to this effect, that the verdict of a jury will not be set aside as against the weight of evidence unless it is so plainly unreasonable and unjust as to satisfy the Court that no jury reviewing the evidence as a whole and acting judicially could have reached it.

Adopter la norme de la décision correcte aurait pour effet de modifier le droit et de porter atteinte au rôle traditionnel du jury. Par conséquent, le fait d'exiger l'application de la norme de l'« erreur manifeste et dominante » aux forces the proper relationship between the appellate and trial court levels and accords with the established standard of review applicable to a finding of negligence by a jury.

31 Where, however, the erroneous finding of negligence of the trial judge rests on an incorrect statement of the legal standard, this can amount to an error of law. This distinction was pointed out by Cory J. in Galaske v. O'Donnell, [1994] 1 S.C.R 670, at pp. 690-91:

> The definition of the standard of care is a mixed question of law and fact. It will usually be for the trial judge to determine, in light of the circumstances of the case, what would constitute reasonable conduct on the part of the legendary reasonable man placed in the same circumstances. In some situations a simple reminder may suffice while in others, for example when a very young child is the passenger, the driver may have to put the seat belt on the child himself. In this case, however, the driver took no steps whatsoever to ensure that the child passenger wore a seat belt. It follows that the trial judge's decision on the issue amounted to a finding that there was no duty at all resting upon the driver. This was an error of law.

Galaske, supra, is an illustration of the point made in Southam, supra, of the potential to extricate a purely legal question from what appears to be a question of mixed fact and law. However, in the absence of a legal error or a palpable and overriding error, a finding of negligence by a trial judge should not be interfered with.

32 We are supported in our conclusion by the analogy which can be drawn between inferences of fact and questions of mixed fact and law. As stated above, both involve drawing inferences from underlying facts. The difference lies in whether the inference drawn relates to a legal standard or not. Because both processes are intertwined with the weight assigned to the evidence, the numerous policy reasons which support a deferential stance to the trial judge's inferences of fact, also, to a certain extent, support showing fins de contrôle d'une conclusion de négligence tirée par un juge ou un jury consolide les rapports qui doivent exister entre les juridictions d'appel et celles de première instance et respecte la norme de contrôle bien établie qui s'applique aux conclusions de négligence tirées par les jurys.

Toutefois, lorsque le juge du procès conclut erronément à la négligence par suite d'une formulation incorrecte de la norme juridique, cela peut constituer une erreur de droit. Cette distinction a été faite par le juge Cory dans l'arrêt Galaske c. O'Donnell, [1994] 1 R.C.S. 670, p. 690-691 :

> La définition de la norme de diligence est une question mixte de droit et de fait. Il incombera habituellement au juge du procès de déterminer, compte tenu des circonstances de l'espèce, ce qui constituerait une conduite raisonnable de la part de la personne raisonnable légendaire placée dans la même situation. Dans certains cas, un simple rappel suffira, tandis que dans d'autres, par exemple lorsqu'un très jeune enfant est passager, le conducteur peut avoir à attacher lui-même la ceinture de sécurité de l'enfant. Cependant, en l'espèce, le conducteur n'a pris aucune mesure pour veiller à ce que l'enfant porte sa ceinture de sécurité. Il s'ensuit que la décision du juge du procès sur la question équivalait à une conclusion qu'aucune obligation n'incombait au conducteur, ce qui constituait une erreur de droit.

L'arrêt Galaske, précité, illustre bien l'idée exposée dans l'arrêt Southam, précité, selon laquelle il est possible de dégager une pure question de droit de ce qui paraît être une question mixte de fait et de droit. Toutefois, en l'absence d'erreur de droit ou d'une erreur manifeste et dominante, la conclusion de négligence tirée par un juge de première instance ne doit pas être modifiée.

L'analogie qui peut être établie entre les inférences de fait et les questions mixtes de fait et de droit étaye notre conclusion. Comme nous l'avons dit précédemment, dans les deux cas des inférences doivent être tirées des faits à l'origine de l'affaire. La différence dépend de la question de savoir si l'inférence se rapporte à une norme juridique ou non. Parce que le résultat des deux processus est tributaire du poids accordé à la preuve, les diverses considérations de principe justifiant de faire montre de retenue à l'égard des inférences de deference to the trial judge's inferences of mixed fact and law.

Where, however, an erroneous finding of the trial judge can be traced to an error in his or her characterization of the legal standard, then this encroaches on the law-making role of an appellate court, and less deference is required, consistent with a "correctness" standard of review. This nuance was recognized by this Court in St-Jean v. Mercier, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 491, 2002 SCC 15, at paras. 48-49:

> A question "about whether the facts satisfy the legal tests" is one of mixed law and fact. Stated differently, "whether the defendant satisfied the appropriate standard of care is a question of mixed law and fact" (Southam, at para. 35).
> Generally, such a question, once the facts have been established without overriding and palpable error, is to be reviewed on a standard of correctness since the standard of care is normative and is a question of law within the normal purview of both the trial and appellate courts. [Emphasis added.]

A good example of this subtle principle can be found in Rhône (The) v. Peter A.B. Widener (The), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 497, at pp. 515-16. In that case the issue was the identification of certain individuals within a corporate structure as directing minds. This is a mixed question of law and fact. However, the erroneous finding of the courts below was easily traceable to an error of law which could be extricated from the mixed question of law and fact. The extricable question of law was the issue of the functions which are required in order to be properly identified as a "directing mind" within a corporate structure (pp. 515-16). In the opinion of Iacobucci J. for the majority of the Court (at p. 526):

> With respect, I think that the courts below overemphasized the significance of sub-delegation in this case. The key factor which distinguishes directing minds from normal employees is the capacity to exercise decision-making authority on matters of corporate policy, rather than merely to give effect to such policy on an fait du juge de première instance justifient également, dans une certaine mesure, de faire de même à l'égard de ses inférences mixtes de fait et de droit.

> La question qui consiste « à déterminer si les faits satisfont au critère juridique » est une question mixte de droit et de fait ou, en d'autres termes, « la question de savoir si le défendeur a respecté la norme de diligence appropriée est une question de droit et de fait » (Southam, par. 35).

34 Un bon exemple de ce principe subtil est l'arrêt Rhône (Le) c. Peter A.B. Widener (Le), [1993] 1 R.C.S. 497, p. 515-516. La question en litige dans cette affaire consistait à déterminer si certaines personnes faisaient partie des âmes dirigeantes d'une société. Il s'agit d'une question mixte de droit et de fait. Toutefois, la conclusion erronée des juridictions inférieures était facilement imputable à une erreur de droit qui pouvait être dégagée de la question mixte de droit et de fait. La question de droit ainsi isolable était celle des fonctions que devait remplir une personne pour qu'on puisse à bon droit la considérer comme une « âme dirigeante » de la société (p. 515-516). Le juge Iacobucci s'est exprimé ainsi au nom des juges de la majorité, à la p. 526 :

> En toute déférence, je crois que les juridictions inférieures ont trop insisté sur l'importance de la subdélégation en l'espèce. Le facteur clé qui permet de distinguer les âmes dirigeantes des employés ordinaires est la capacité d'exercer un pouvoir décisionnel sur les questions de politique générale de la personne morale, plutôt que operational basis, whether at head office or across the sea.

35 Stated differently, the lower courts committed an error in law by finding that sub-delegation was a factor identifying a person who is part of the "directing mind" of a company, when the correct legal factor characterizing a "directing mind" is in fact "the capacity to exercise decision-making authority on matters of corporate policy". This mischaracterization of the proper legal test (the legal requirements to be a "directing mind") infected or tainted the lower courts' factual conclusion that Captain Kelch was part of the directing mind. As this erroneous finding can be traced to an error in law, less deference was required and the applicable standard was one of correctness.

36 To summarize, a finding of negligence by a trial judge involves applying a legal standard to a set of facts, and thus is a question of mixed fact and law. Matters of mixed fact and law lie along a spectrum. Where, for instance, an error with respect to a finding of negligence can be attributed to the application of an incorrect standard, a failure to consider a required element of a legal test, or similar error in principle, such an error can be characterized as an error of law, subject to a standard of correctness. Appellate courts must be cautious, however, in finding that a trial judge erred in law in his or her determination of negligence, as it is often difficult to extricate the legal questions from the factual. It is for this reason that these matters are referred to as questions of "mixed law and fact". Where the legal principle is not readily extricable, then the matter is one of "mixed law and fact" and is subject to a more stringent standard. The general rule, as stated in Jaegli Enterprises, supra, is that, where the issue on appeal involves the trial judge's interpretation of the evidence as a whole, it should not be overturned absent palpable and overriding error.

le simple fait de mettre en œuvre ces politiques dans un cadre opérationnel, que ce soit au siège social ou en mer.

En d'autres termes, les juridictions inférieures ont commis une erreur de droit en concluant que la subdélégation était un facteur permettant de qualifier une personne d'« âme dirigeante » d'une société, alors que le facteur juridique applicable à cet égard est en fait « la capacité d'exercer un pouvoir décisionnel sur les questions de politique générale de la personne morale ». Cette formulation erronée du critère juridique approprié (les conditions juridiques requises pour être une « âme dirigeante ») a entaché ou vicié la conclusion factuelle des juridictions inférieures selon laquelle le capitaine Kelch était une âme dirigeante de la société. Comme cette conclusion erronée était imputable à une erreur de droit, un degré moindre de retenue s'imposait et la norme applicable était celle de la décision correcte.

En résumé, la conclusion de négligence que tire le juge de première instance suppose l'application d'une norme juridique à un ensemble de faits et constitue donc une question mixte de fait et de droit. Les questions mixtes de fait et de droit s'étalent le long d'un spectre. Lorsque, par exemple, la conclusion de négligence est entachée d'une erreur imputable à l'application d'une norme incorrecte, à l'omission de tenir compte d'un élément essentiel d'un critère juridique ou à une autre erreur de principe semblable, une telle erreur peut être qualifiée d'erreur de droit et elle est contrôlée suivant la norme de la décision correcte. Les cours d'appel doivent cependant faire preuve de prudence avant de juger que le juge de première instance a commis une erreur de droit lorsqu'il a conclu à la négligence, puisqu'il est souvent difficile de départager les questions de droit et les questions de fait. Voilà pourquoi on appelle certaines questions des questions « mixtes de fait et de droit ». Si le principe juridique n'est pas facilement isolable, il s'agit alors d'une « question mixte de fait et de droit », assujettie à une norme de contrôle plus rigoureuse. Selon la règle générale énoncée dans l'arrêt Jaegli Enterprises, précité, si la question litigieuse en appel soulève l'interprétation de l'ensemble de la preuve par le juge de première instance, cette interprétation ne doit pas être infirmée en l'absence d'erreur manifeste et dominante.

In this regard, we respectfully disagree with our colleague when he states at para. 106 that "[o]nce the facts have been established, the determination of whether or not the standard of care was met by the defendant will in most cases be reviewable on a standard of correctness since the trial judge must appreciate the facts within the context of the appropriate standard of care. In many cases, viewing the facts through the legal lens of the standard of care gives rise to a policy-making or law-setting function that is the purview of both the trial and appellate courts". In our view, it is settled law that the determination of whether or not the standard of care was met by the defendant involves the application of a legal standard to a set of facts, a question of mixed fact and law. This question is subject to a standard of palpable and overriding error unless it is clear that the trial judge made some extricable error in principle with respect to the characterization of the standard or its application, in which case the error may amount to an error of law.

III. Application of the Foregoing Principles to this Case: Standard of Care of the Municipality

A. The Appropriate Standard of Review

We agree with our colleague that the correct statement of the municipality's standard of care is that found in Partridge v. Rural Municipality of Langenburg, [1929] 3 W.W.R. 555 (Sask. C.A.), per Martin J.A., at pp. 558-59:

> The extent of the statutory obligation placed upon municipal corporations to keep in repair the highways under their jurisdiction, has been variously stated in numerous reported cases. There is, however, a general rule which may be gathered from the decisions, and that is, that the road must be kept in such a reasonable state of repair that those requiring to use it may, exercising ordinary care, travel upon it with safety. What is a reasonable state of repair is a question of fact, depending upon all the surrounding circumstances; "repair" is a relative term, and hence the facts in one case afford no fixed rule 37 À cet égard, nous ne pouvons en toute déférence pas souscrire à l'opinion de notre collègue lorsqu'il affirme, au par. 106, qu'« [u]ne fois les faits établis, la décision touchant la question de savoir si le défendeur a respecté ou non la norme de diligence est, dans la plupart des cas, contrôlable selon la norme de la décision correcte, puisque le juge de première instance doit apprécier les faits au regard de la norme de diligence appropriée. Dans bien des cas, l'examen des faits à travers le prisme juridique de la norme de diligence implique l'établissement de politiques d'intérêt général ou la création de règles de droit, rôle qui relève autant des cours de première instance que des cours d'appel ». À notre avis, il est bien établi en droit que la question de savoir si le défendeur a respecté la norme de diligence suppose l'application d'une norme juridique à un ensemble de faits, ce qui en fait une question mixte de fait et de droit. Cette question est assujettie à la norme de l'erreur manifeste et dominante, à moins que le juge de première instance n'ait clairement commis une erreur de principe isolable en déterminant la norme applicable ou en appliquant cette norme, auquel cas l'erreur peut constituer une erreur de droit.

III. Application des principes qui précèdent à l'espèce : la norme de diligence applicable à la municipalité

A. La norme de contrôle appropriée

38 À l'instar de notre collègue, nous sommes d'avis que la norme de diligence applicable à la municipalité a été convenablement énoncée par le juge Martin dans l'arrêt Partridge c. Rural Municipality of Langenburg, [1929] 3 W.W.R. 555 (C.A. Sask.), p. 558-559 :

> [TRADUCTION] L'étendue de l'obligation légale d'entretien qui incombe aux corporations municipales à l'égard des routes qui se trouvent sur leur territoire a été énoncée de diverses façons dans nombre de décisions publiées. Il est toutefois possible de dégager la règle générale suivante de ces décisions : le chemin doit être tenu dans un état raisonnable d'entretien, de façon que ceux qui doivent l'emprunter puissent, en prenant des précautions normales, y circuler en sécurité. La question de savoir en quoi consiste un état raisonnable d'entretien est une question de fait, qui est fonction de toutes by which to determine another case where the facts are different . . . .

However, we differ from the views of our colleague in that we find that the trial judge applied the correct test in determining that the municipality did not meet its standard of care, and thus did not commit an error of law of the type mentioned in Southam, supra. The trial judge applied all the elements of the Partridge standard to the facts, and her conclusion that the respondent municipality failed to meet this standard should not be overturned absent palpable and overriding error.

B. The Trial Judge Did Not Commit an Error of Law

39 We note that our colleague bases his conclusion that the municipality met its standard of care on his finding that the trial judge neglected to consider the conduct of the ordinary motorist, and thus failed to apply the correct standard of care, an error of law, which justifies his reconsideration of the evidence (para. 114). As a starting point to the discussion of the ordinary or reasonable motorist, we emphasize that the failure to discuss a relevant factor in depth, or even at all, is not itself a sufficient basis for an appellate court to reconsider the evidence. This was made clear by the recent decision of Van de Perre, supra, where Bastarache J. says, at para. 15:

. . . omissions in the reasons will not necessarily mean that the appellate court has jurisdiction to review the evidence heard at trial. As stated in Van Mol (Guardian ad Litem of) v. Ashmore (1999), 168 D.L.R. (4th) 637 (B.C.C.A.), leave to appeal refused [2000] 1 S.C.R. vi, an omission is only a material error if it gives rise to the reasoned belief that the trial judge must have forgotten, ignored or misconceived the evidence in a way that affected his conclusion. Without this reasoned belief, the appellate court cannot reconsider the evidence.

les circonstances de l'espèce; le terme « entretien » est une notion relative et, par conséquent, les faits propres à une affaire donnée ne permettent pas de dégager de règle déterminée permettant de trancher une autre affaire présentant des circonstances différentes . . .

Toutefois, contrairement à notre collègue, nous estimons que la juge de première instance a appliqué le bon critère juridique en concluant que la municipalité n'avait pas respecté la norme de diligence à laquelle elle était tenue, et que la juge n'a donc pas commis une erreur de droit du genre de celle décrite dans l'arrêt Southam, précité. La juge de première instance a appliqué aux faits de l'espèce tous les éléments du critère énoncé dans l'arrêt Partridge, et sa conclusion que la municipalité défenderesse n'a pas respecté ce critère ne devrait pas être infirmée en l'absence d'erreur manifeste et dominante.

B. La juge de première instance n'a pas commis d'erreur de droit

Nous soulignons que notre collègue fonde sa décision que la municipalité a respecté la norme de diligence sur sa conclusion que la juge de première instance a négligé de prendre en compte le comportement de l'automobiliste moyen et n'a donc pas appliqué la bonne norme de diligence, commettant ainsi une erreur de droit le justifiant de réexaminer la preuve (par. 114). Pour les besoins de l'analyse du critère de l'automobiliste moyen ou raisonnable, nous tenons au départ à signaler que l'omission d'examiner en profondeur un facteur pertinent, voire de ne pas l'examiner du tout, n'est pas en soi un fondement suffisant pour justifier une cour d'appel de réexaminer la preuve. Ce principe a été clairement énoncé dans l'arrêt récent Van de Perre, précité, où le juge Bastarache a dit ceci, au par. 15 :

. . . des omissions dans les motifs ne signifieront pas nécessairement que la cour d'appel a compétence pour examiner la preuve entendue au procès. Comme le dit l'arrêt Van Mol (Guardian ad Litem of) c. Ashmore (1999), 168 D.L.R. (4th) 637 (C.A.C.-B.), autorisation d'appel refusée [2000] 1 R.C.S. vi, une omission ne constitue une erreur importante que si elle donne lieu à la conviction rationnelle que le juge de première instance doit avoir oublié, négligé d'examiner ou mal interprété la preuve de telle manière que sa conclusion en a été affectée. Faute d'une telle conviction rationnelle, la cour d'appel ne peut pas réexaminer la preuve.

In our view, as we will now discuss, there can be no reasoned belief in this case that the trial judge forgot, ignored, or misconceived the question of the ordinary driver. It would thus be an error to engage in a re-assessment of the evidence on this issue.

The fact that the conduct of the ordinary motorist was in the mind of the trial judge from the outset is clear from the fact that she began her standard of care discussion by stating the correct test, quoting the above passage from Partridge, supra. Absent some clear sign that she subsequently varied her approach, this initial acknowledgment of the correct legal standard is a strong indication that this was the standard she applied. Not only is there no indication that she departed from the stated test, but there are further signs which support the conclusion that the trial judge applied the Partridge standard. The first such indication is that the trial judge did discuss, both explicitly and implicitly, the conduct of an ordinary or reasonable motorist approaching the curve. The second indication is that she referred to the evidence of the experts, Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner, both of whom discussed the conduct of an ordinary motorist in this situation. Finally, the fact that the trial judge apportioned negligence to Mr. Nikolaisen indicates that she assessed his conduct against the standard of the ordinary driver, and thus considered the conduct of the latter.

The discussion of the ordinary motorist is found in the passage from the trial judgment immediately following the statement of the requisite standard of care:

> Snake Hill Road is a low traffic road. It is however maintained by the R.M. so that it is passable year round. There are permanent residences on the road. It is used by farmers for access to their fields and cattle. Young people frequent Snake Hill Road for parties and as such the road is used by those who may not have the same degree of familiarity with it as do residents.

À notre avis, comme nous allons le voir, la présente espèce ne peut faire naître la conviction rationnelle que la juge de première instance a oublié d'examiner la question du conducteur moyen, en a fait abstraction ou l'a mal interprétée. Il serait donc erroné de réexaminer la preuve relative à cette question.

40 Le fait que, dès le départ, la juge de première instance a eu à l'esprit la conduite de l'automobiliste moyen ressort clairement du fait qu'elle a commencé son examen de la norme de diligence en formulant le critère approprié, c'est-à-dire en citant le passage susmentionné de l'arrêt Partridge, précité. En l'absence d'indications claires qu'elle a subséquemment modifié sa méthode d'analyse, cette mention initiale de la norme juridique appropriée constitue un indice solide qu'il s'agit bien de la norme qu'elle a appliquée. Non seulement rien n'indique qu'elle s'est écartée du critère énoncé, mais d'autres indices étayent la conclusion qu'elle a appliqué le critère de l'arrêt Partridge. Le premier de ces indices est que la juge s'est bel et bien interrogée, tant explicitement qu'implicitement, sur la conduite de l'automobiliste moyen ou raisonnable s'approchant du virage. Le deuxième indice est qu'elle a fait état des témoignages des experts, MM. Anderson et Werner, qui ont tous deux analysé le comportement de l'automobiliste moyen se trouvant dans cette situation. Enfin, le fait que la juge de première instance ait imputé une partie de la responsabilité à M. Nikolaisen indique qu'elle a évalué sa conduite eu égard au critère du conducteur moyen, et qu'elle a donc pris en compte la conduite de ce dernier.

> [TRADUCTION] Le chemin Snake Hill est un chemin à faible débit de circulation. Il est néanmoins entretenu par la M.R. à longueur d'année afin de le garder carrossable. Des résidences permanentes sont situées en bordure de celui-ci. Les fermiers l'utilisent pour accéder à leurs champs et à leur bétail. Des jeunes gens empruntent le chemin Snake Hill pour se rendre à des fêtes, de sorte qu'il est utilisé par des conducteurs qui ne le connaissent pas toujours aussi bien que les résidents de l'endroit.

There is a portion of Snake Hill Road that is a hazard to the public. In this regard I accept the evidence of Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner. Further, it is a hazard that is not readily apparent to users of the road. It is a hidden hazard. The location of the Nikolaisen rollover is the most dangerous segment of Snake Hill Road. Approaching the location of the Nikolaisen rollover, limited sight distance, created by uncleared bush, precludes a motorist from being forewarned of an impending sharp right turn immediately followed by a left turn. While there were differing opinions on the maximum speed at which this curve can be negotiated, I am satisfied that when limited sight distance is combined with the tight radius of the curve and lack of superelevation, this curve cannot be safely negotiated at speeds greater than 60 kilometres per hour when conditions are favourable, or 50 kilometres per hour when wet.

. . . where the existence of that bush obstructs the ability of a motorist to be forewarned of a hazard such as that on Snake Hill Road, it is reasonable to expect the R.M. to erect and maintain a warning or regulatory sign so that a motorist, using ordinary care, may be forewarned, adjust speed and take corrective action in advance of entering a dangerous situation. [Underlining added; italics in original.]

42 In our view, this passage indicates that the trial judge did consider how a motorist exercising ordinary care would approach the curve in question. The implication of labelling the curve a "hidden hazard" which is "not readily apparent to users of the road", is that the danger is of the type that cannot be anticipated. This in turn implies that, even if the motorist exercises ordinary care, he or she will not be able to react to the curve. As well, the trial judge referred explicitly to the conduct of a motorist exercising ordinary care: "it is reasonable to expect the R.M. to erect and maintain a warning or regulatory sign so that a motorist, using ordinary care, may be forewarned, adjust speed and take corrective action in advance of entering a dangerous situation" (para. 86 (emphasis added)).

Il y a, sur le chemin Snake Hill, un tronçon qui présente un danger pour le public. À cet égard, je retiens les témoignages de MM. Anderson et Werner. En outre, il s'agit d'un danger qui n'est pas facilement décelable par les usagers du chemin. Il s'agit d'un danger caché. L'endroit où le véhicule de M. Nikolaisen a fait un tonneau est situé sur le tronçon le plus dangereux du chemin Snake Hill. À l'approche de cet endroit, des broussailles réduisent la distance de visibilité de l'automobiliste et l'empêchent de voir l'imminence d'un virage à droite serré, qui est immédiatement suivi d'un virage à gauche. Bien que des opinions divergentes aient été émises quant à la vitesse maximale à laquelle ce virage peut être pris, je suis d'avis que, vu la distance de visibilité réduite, l'existence d'une courbe serrée et l'absence de surélévation du chemin, ce virage ne peut être pris en sécurité à une vitesse supérieure à 60 kilomètres à l'heure dans des conditions favorables, ou 50 kilomètres à l'heure sur chaussée humide.

À notre avis, cet extrait indique que la juge de première instance a effectivement pris en compte la façon dont l'automobiliste prenant des précautions normales s'approcherait du virage en question. Qualifier le virage de [TRADUCTION] « danger caché », danger qui « n'est pas facilement décelable par les usagers du chemin », implique que le danger en est un qu'il est impossible de prévoir. Il s'ensuit que, même si l'automobiliste prend des précautions normales, il ne pourra pas réagir à la présence du virage. Par ailleurs, la juge de première instance a explicitement fait état de la conduite de l'automobiliste prenant des précautions normales : [TRADUCTION] « [I]l est raisonnable de s'attendre à ce que la M.R. installe et maintienne un panneau d'avertissement ou de signalisation afin qu'un automobiliste prenant des précautions normales soit prévenu et puisse réduire sa vitesse et prendre des mesures correctives avant d'arriver à l'endroit dangereux » (par. 86 (nous soulignons)).

With respect to the speed of a motorist approaching the curve, there is also an indication that the trial judge considered the conduct of an ordinary motorist. First, she stated that she accepted the evidence of Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner with respect to the finding that the curve constituted a hazard to the public. The evidence given by these experts suggests that between 60 and 80 km/h is a reasonable speed to drive parts of this road, and at that speed, the curve presents a hazard. Their evidence also indicates their general opinion that the curve was a hazardous one. Mr. Anderson refers to the curve being difficult to negotiate at "normal speeds". Also, Mr. Anderson states that "if you're not aware that this curve is there, the sharp course of the curve, and you enter too far into it before you realize that the curve is there, then you have to do a tighter radius than 118 metres in order to get back on track to be able to negotiate the second curve". He also states that "you could be lulled into thinking you've got an 80 kilometres an hour road until you are too far into the tight curve to be able to respond".

The Court of Appeal found that, given the nature and condition of Snake Hill Road, the contention that this rural road would be taken at 80 km/h by the ordinary motorist was untenable. However, it is clear from the trial judge's reasons that she did not take 80 km/h as the speed at which the ordinary motorist would approach the curve. Instead she found, based on expert evidence, that "this curve cannot be safely negotiated at speeds greater than 60 kilometres per hour when conditions are favourable, or 50 kilometres per hour when wet" (para. 85 (emphasis in original)). From this finding, coupled with the finding that the curve was hidden and unexpected, the logical conclusion is that the trial judge found that a motorist exercising ordinary care could easily be deceived into approaching the curve at speeds in excess of the safe speed for the curve, and subsequently be taken by surprise. Therefore, the trial judge found that the curve was hazardous to the ordinary motorist and it follows that she applied the correct standard of care.

44 La Cour d'appel a jugé que, vu la nature et l'état du chemin Snake Hill, la prétention selon laquelle l'automobiliste moyen roulerait sur cette route rurale à 80 km/h était insoutenable. Toutefois, il ressort clairement des motifs de la juge de première instance qu'elle ne considérait pas que l'automobiliste moyen s'approcherait du virage à 80 km/h. Elle a plutôt conclu, à partir des témoignages des experts, que [TRADUCTION] « ce virage ne peut être pris en sécurité à une vitesse supérieure à 60 kilomètres à l'heure dans des conditions favorables, ou 50 kilomètres à l'heure sur chaussée humide » (par. 85 (en italique dans l'original)). De cette constatation, conjuguée à celle que le virage était caché et imprévu, il est logique de conclure que la juge de première instance a estimé que l'automobiliste prenant des précautions normales pouvait aisément être amené à s'approcher du virage à des vitesses supérieures à la vitesse sécuritaire pour le prendre, et se retrouver ensuite pris au dépourvu. La juge de première

45 In our respectful view, our colleague errs in agreeing with the Court of Appeal's finding that the trial judge should have addressed the conduct of the ordinary motorist more fully (para. 124). At para. 119, he writes:

> A proper application of the test demands that the trial judge ask the question: "How would a reasonable driver have driven on this road?" Whether or not a hazard is "hidden" or a curve is "inherently" dangerous does not dispose of the question.

And later, he states, "In my view, the question of how the reasonable driver would have negotiated Snake Hill Road necessitated a somewhat more in-depth analysis of the character of the road" (para. 125). With respect, requiring the trial judge to have made this specific inquiry in her reasons is inconsistent with Van de Perre, supra, which makes it clear that an omission or a failure to discuss a factor in depth is not, in and of itself, a basis for interfering with the findings of the trial judge and reweighing the evidence. As we note above, it is clear that although the trial judge may not have conducted an extensive review of this element of the Partridge test, she did indeed consider this factor by stating the correct test, then applying this test to the facts.

46 We note that in relying on the evidence of Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner, the trial judge chose not to base her decision on the conflicting evidence of other witnesses. However, her reliance on the evidence of Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner is insufficient proof that she "forgot, ignored, or misconceived" the evidence. The full record was before the trial judge and we can presume that she reviewed all of it, absent further proof that the trial judge forgot, ignored or misapprehended the evidence, leading to an error in law. It is open to a trial judge to prefer the evidence of some witnesses over others:

instance a donc conclu que le virage était dangereux pour l'automobiliste moyen et il s'ensuit qu'elle a appliqué la norme de diligence appropriée.

En toute déférence, notre collègue commet une erreur en souscrivant à la conclusion de la Cour d'appel selon laquelle la juge de première instance aurait dû examiner de manière plus approfondie la conduite de l'automobiliste moyen (par. 124). Il écrit ceci, au par. 119 :

> Pour bien appliquer le critère juridique, le juge de première instance doit se poser la question suivante : « Comment un conducteur raisonnable aurait-il roulé sur ce chemin? » Le fait de conclure qu'il existe ou non un danger « caché » ou qu'une courbe est quelque chose d'« intrinsèquement » dangereux ne vide pas la question.

Plus loin, il dit : « À mon avis, la question de savoir comment un conducteur raisonnable aurait roulé sur le chemin Snake Hill nécessitait un examen un peu plus approfondi de la nature du chemin » (par. 125). En toute déférence, considérer que la juge de première instance aurait dû faire cette analyse particulière dans ses motifs est incompatible avec l'arrêt Van de Perre, précité, lequel établit clairement que l'omission ou le défaut d'analyser un facteur en profondeur ne constitue pas, en soi, une raison justifiant de modifier les conclusions du juge de première instance et de réexaminer la preuve. Comme nous l'avons dit précédemment, il est clair que, quoique la juge de première instance n'ait peut-être pas fait une analyse approfondie de ce volet du critère énoncé dans l'arrêt Partridge, elle a effectivement tenu compte de ce facteur en formulant le critère approprié puis en l'appliquant aux faits de l'espèce.

Nous tenons à souligner que, en s'appuyant sur les témoignages de MM. Anderson et Werner, la juge de première instance a choisi de ne pas fonder sa décision sur les témoignages contradictoires rendus par d'autres témoins. Toutefois, cela ne suffit pas pour établir qu'elle a « oublié, négligé d'examiner ou mal interprété » la preuve. La juge de première instance disposait de l'ensemble du dossier et on peut présumer qu'elle l'a étudié d'un bout à l'autre, en l'absence d'autre indication qu'elle a oublié, négligé d'examiner ou mal interprété la preuve, commettant ainsi une erreur de droit. Le juge de première Toneguzzo-Norvell, supra, at p. 123. Mere reliance by the trial judge on the evidence of some witnesses over others cannot on its own form the basis of a "reasoned belief that the trial judge must have forgotten, ignored or misconceived the evidence in a way that affected his conclusion" (Van de Perre, supra, at para. 15). This is in keeping with the narrow scope of review by an appellate court applicable in this case.

A further indication that the trial judge considered the conduct of an ordinary motorist on Snake Hill Road is her finding that both Mr. Nikolaisen and the municipality breached their duty of care to Mr. Housen, and that the defendant Nikolaisen was 50 percent contributorily negligent. Since a finding of negligence implies a failure to meet the ordinary standard of care, and since Mr. Nikolaisen's negligence related to his driving on the curve, to find that Mr. Nikolaisen's conduct on the curve failed to meet the standard of the ordinary driver implies a consideration of that ordinary driver on the curve. The fact that the trial judge distinguished the conduct of Mr. Nikolaisen in driving negligently on the road from the conduct of the municipality in negligently failing to erect a warning sign is evidence that the trial judge kept the municipality's legal standard clearly in mind in its application to the facts, and that she applied this standard to the ordinary driver, not the negligent driver.

To summarize, in the course of her reasons, the trial judge first stated the requisite standard of care from Partridge, supra, relating to the conduct of the ordinary driver. She then applied that standard to the facts referring again to the conduct of the ordinary driver. Finally, in light of her finding that the municipality breached this standard, she apportioned negligence between the driver and the municipality in a way which again entailed a consideration of the instance peut retenir la déposition de certains témoins de préférence à d'autres : Toneguzzo-Norvell, précité, p. 123. Le fait pour le juge de première instance de s'appuyer sur certains témoignages plutôt que sur d'autres ne peut à lui seul fournir l'assise d'une « conviction rationnelle que le juge de première instance doit avoir oublié, négligé d'examiner ou mal interprété la preuve de telle manière que sa conclusion en a été affectée » (Van de Perre, précité, par. 15). Cette conclusion est compatible avec la portée restreinte de l'examen qu'il convient de faire en appel dans la présente affaire.

47 Une autre indication que la juge de première instance s'est interrogée sur la façon dont conduit l'automobiliste moyen sur le chemin Snake Hill est sa conclusion que M. Nikolaisen et la municipalité ont tous deux manqué à leur obligation de diligence envers M. Housen, et que le défendeur Nikolaisen était responsable de négligence concourante dans une proportion de 50 p. 100. Comme une conclusion de négligence implique un manquement à la norme de diligence habituelle, et comme la négligence de M. Nikolaisen était liée à sa manière de conduire dans le virage, la conclusion que sa conduite à cet endroit ne respectait pas le critère du conducteur moyen suppose qu'on s'est demandé comment ce conducteur s'approcherait du virage. La distinction qu'a établie la juge de première instance entre la négligence dont a fait preuve M. Nikolaisen lorsqu'il roulait sur le chemin et celle dont la municipalité a fait montre en omettant d'installer un panneau d'avertissement prouve qu'elle n'a pas perdu de vue la norme juridique régissant la municipalité et l'application de cette norme aux faits, et que la juge a appliqué cette norme au conducteur moyen, et non au conducteur négligent.

48 En résumé, dans ses motifs la juge de première instance a d'abord énoncé la norme de diligence requise par l'arrêt Partridge, précité, relativement à la conduite de l'automobiliste moyen. Elle a ensuite appliqué cette norme aux faits, se reportant encore une fois à la conduite de l'automobiliste moyen. Enfin, vu sa conclusion que la municipalité avait manqué à cette norme de diligence, elle a réparti la responsabilité entre le conducteur ordinary driver. As such, we are overwhelmingly drawn to the conclusion that the conduct of the ordinary driver was both considered and applied by the trial judge.

49 Thus, we conclude that the trial judge did not commit an error of law with respect to the municipality's standard of care. On this matter, we disagree with the basis for the re-assessment of the evidence undertaken by our colleague (paras. 122-42) and regard this re-assessment to be an unjustified intrusion into the finding of the trial judge that the municipality breached its standard of care. This finding is a question of mixed law and fact which should not be overturned absent a palpable and overriding error. As discussed below, it is our view that no such error exists, as the trial judge conducted a reasonable assessment based on her view of the evidence.

C. The Trial Judge Did Not Commit A Palpable or Overriding Error

50 Despite this high standard of review, the Court of Appeal found that a palpable and overriding error was made by the trial judge ([2000] 4 W.W.R. 173, 2000 SKCA 12, at para. 84). With respect, this finding was based on the erroneous presumption that the trial judge accepted 80 km/h as the speed at which an ordinary motorist would approach the curve, a presumption which our colleague also adopts in his reasons (para. 133).

51 As discussed above, the trial judge's finding was that an ordinary motorist could approach the curve in excess of 60 km/h in dry conditions, and 50 km/h in wet conditions, and that at such speeds the curve was hazardous. The trial judge's finding was not based on a particular speed at which the curve would be approached by the ordinary motorist. Instead, she found that, because the curve was hidden and sharper than would be anticipated, a motorist exercising ordinary care could approach it at greater than et la municipalité d'une manière qui, une fois de plus, atteste la prise en compte du critère du conducteur moyen. En conséquence, nous en venons irrésistiblement à la conclusion que la juge de première instance a pris en compte et appliqué ce critère.

Par conséquent, nous estimons que la juge de première instance n'a pas commis d'erreur de droit en ce qui concerne la norme de diligence à laquelle était tenue la municipalité. Sur ce point, nous ne souscrivons pas aux raisons sur lesquelles se fondent notre collègue pour réexaminer la preuve (aux par. 122 à 142) et nous considérons ce réexamen comme une intervention injustifiée relativement à la conclusion de la juge de première instance portant que la municipalité a manqué à la norme de diligence à laquelle elle était tenue. Cette conclusion porte sur une question mixte de droit et de fait et elle ne peut pas être infirmée en l'absence d'erreur manifeste et dominante. Comme nous le verrons plus loin, nous sommes d'avis qu'aucune erreur de cette nature n'a été commise, car la juge de première instance a fait une analyse raisonnable, fondée sur son appréciation de la preuve.

Malgré cette norme de contrôle sévère, la Cour d'appel a jugé que la juge de première instance avait commis une erreur manifeste et dominante ([2000] 4 W.W.R. 173, 2000 SKCA 12, par. 84). En toute déférence, cette conclusion repose sur la présomption erronée selon laquelle la juge aurait accepté que l'automobiliste moyen approcherait du virage à 80 km/h, présomption qu'adopte également notre collègue dans ses motifs (par. 133).

Comme nous l'avons vu plus tôt, la conclusion de la juge de première instance était que l'automobiliste moyen pourrait s'approcher du virage à une vitesse supérieure à 60 km/h sur chaussée sèche, et 50 km/h sur chaussée humide, mais qu'à ces vitesses le virage était dangereux. Cette conclusion n'était pas fondée sur une vitesse précise à laquelle l'automobiliste moyen s'approcherait du virage. La juge de première instance a plutôt estimé que, parce que le virage est caché et plus serré que ce à quoi on the speed at which it would be safe to negotiate the curve.

As we explain in greater detail below, in our opinion, not only is this assessment far from reaching the level of a palpable and overriding error, in our view, it is a sensible and logical way to deal with large quantities of conflicting evidence. It would be unrealistic to focus on some exact speed at which the curve would likely be approached by the ordinary motorist. The findings of the trial judge in this regard were the result of a reasonable and practical assessment of the evidence as a whole.

In finding a palpable and overriding error, Cameron J.A. relied on the fact that the trial judge adopted the expert evidence of Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner which was premised on a de facto speed limit of 80 km/h taken from The Highway Traffic Act, S.S. 1986, c. H-3.1. However, whether or not the experts based their testimony on this limit, the trial judge did not adopt that limit as the speed of the ordinary motorist approaching the curve. Again, the trial judge found that the curve could not be taken safely at greater than 60 km/h dry and 50 km/h wet, and there is evidence in the record to support this finding. For example, Mr. Anderson states:

If you don't anticipate the curve and you get too far into it before you start to do your correction then you can get into trouble even at, probably at 60. Fifty you'd have to be a long ways into it, but certainly at 60 you could.

It is notable too that both Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner would have recommended installing a sign, warning motorists of the curve, with a posted limit of 50 km/h.

Although clearly the curve could not be negotiated safely at 80 km/h, it could also not be s'attend normalement, il était possible qu'un automobiliste prenant des précautions normales s'en approche à une vitesse supérieure à la vitesse sécuritaire pour prendre le virage.

52 Comme nous allons le préciser plus loin, nous sommes d'avis que non seulement cette appréciation est-elle loin de constituer une erreur manifeste et dominante, mais elle est une réponse judicieuse et logique eu égard à l'abondance d'éléments de preuve contradictoires. Il serait irréaliste de fixer une quelconque vitesse à laquelle l'automobiliste moyen s'approcherait vraisemblablement du virage. Les conclusions de la juge de première instance à cet égard découlent d'une évaluation raisonnable et réaliste de l'ensemble de la preuve.

53 En concluant à l'existence d'une erreur manifeste et dominante, le juge Cameron de la Cour d'appel s'est appuyé sur le fait que la juge de première instance avait retenu les témoignages d'expert de MM. Anderson et Werner, lesquels étaient fondés sur la vitesse limite de facto de 80 km/h prévue par la Highway Traffic Act, S.S. 1986, ch. H-3.1. Toutefois, que le témoignage des experts ait été ou non fondé sur cette limite, la juge de première instance n'a pas retenu cette vitesse comme étant celle à laquelle l'automobiliste moyen s'approche du virage. Rappelons que la juge de première instance a estimé qu'il n'était pas possible d'aborder le virage en sécurité à une vitesse supérieure à 60 km/h sur chaussée sèche et 50 km/h sur chaussée humide, et il existe au dossier des éléments étayant cette conclusion. Par exemple, M. Anderson a dit ceci :

[TRADUCTION] Si vous ne prévoyez pas l'arrivée du virage et que vous vous engagez trop loin dans celui-ci avant d'amorcer votre manœuvre correctrice, vous risquez d'avoir des ennuis même à, probablement à 60. À cinquante il faudrait que vous soyez engagé assez loin, mais à 60 vous pourriez certainement en avoir.

Il convient également de signaler que MM. Anderson et Werner auraient tous deux recommandé l'installation d'un panneau avertissant les automobilistes de l'imminence du virage et fixé la vitesse maximale permise à 50 km/h.

54 Le virage ne pouvait manifestement pas être pris en sécurité à 80 km/h, mais il ne pouvait l'être non negotiated safely at much slower speeds. It should also be noted that the trial judge did not adopt the expert testimony of Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner in its entirety. She stated: "There is a portion of Snake Hill Road that is a hazard to the public. In this regard I accept the evidence of Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner" (para. 85 (emphasis added)). It cannot be assumed from this that she accepted a de facto speed limit of 80 km/h especially when one bears in mind (1) the trial judge's statement of the safe speeds of 50 and 60 km/h, and (2) the fact that both these experts found the road to be unsafe at much lower speeds than 80 km/h.

55 Given that the trial judge did not base her standard of care analysis on a de facto speed limit of 80 km/h, it then follows that the Court of Appeal's finding of a palpable and overriding error cannot stand.

56 Furthermore, the narrowly defined scope of appellate review dictates that a trial judge should not be found to have misapprehended or ignored evidence, or come to the wrong conclusions merely because the appellate court diverges in the inferences it draws from the evidence and chooses to emphasize some portions of the evidence over others. As we are of the view that the trial judge committed no error of law in finding that the municipality breached its standard of care, we are also respectfully of the view that our colleague's re-assessment of the evidence on this issue (paras. 129-42) is an unjustified interference with the findings of the trial judge, based on a difference of opinion concerning the inferences to be drawn from the evidence and the proper weight to be placed on different portions of the evidence. For instance, in the opinion of our colleague, based on some portions of the expert evidence, a reasonable driver exercising ordinary care would approach a rural road at 50 km/h or less, because a reasonable driver would have difficulty seeing the sharp radius of the curve and oncoming traffic (para. 129). However, the trial judge, basing her assessment on other portions of the expert evidence, found that the nature of the road was such that a motorist could be plus à des vitesses beaucoup plus réduites. Il convient également de souligner que la juge de première instance n'a pas retenu intégralement les témoignages d'expert de MM. Anderson et Werner. Elle a dit : [TRADUCTION] « Il y a, sur le chemin Snake Hill, un tronçon qui présente un danger pour le public. À cet égard, je retiens les témoignages de MM. Anderson et Werner » (par. 85 (nous soulignons)). Ces propos ne permettent pas de présumer qu'elle acceptait une vitesse limite de facto de 80 km/h, particulièrement si l'on se rappelle (1) qu'elle a dit qu'on pouvait rouler en sécurité à des vitesses de 50 et de 60 km/h, et (2) que ces deux experts ont considéré que le chemin n'était pas sûr même à des vitesses bien inférieures à 80 km/h.

Puisque la juge de première instance n'a pas fondé son analyse de la norme de diligence sur une vitesse limite de facto de 80 km/h, il s'ensuit que la conclusion de la Cour d'appel relativement à l'existence d'une erreur manifeste et dominante ne saurait être confirmée.

En outre, vu la portée restreinte de la révision en appel, on ne saurait conclure qu'un juge de première instance a négligé d'examiner la preuve, l'a mal interprétée ou est arrivé à des conclusions erronées, simplement parce que le tribunal d'appel tire des inférences divergentes de la preuve et décide d'accorder plus d'importance à certains éléments qu'à d'autres. Étant d'avis que la juge de première instance n'a pas commis d'erreur de droit en concluant que la municipalité avait violé la norme de diligence à laquelle elle était tenue, nous estimons aussi, en toute déférence, que le réexamen de la preuve auquel procède notre collègue sur cette question (aux par. 129 à 142) constitue une intervention injustifiée relativement aux conclusions de la juge de première instance, fondée sur une divergence d'opinions quant aux inférences devant être tirées de la preuve et au poids qu'il convient d'accorder à divers éléments. Par exemple, notre collègue est d'avis, sur la foi de certaines parties des témoignages d'expert, qu'un conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales roulerait sur une route rurale à une vitesse maximale de 50 km/h, parce qu'il aurait de la difficulté à voir que le virage est serré et s'il vient des véhicules en sens inverse (par. 129). Or, se deceived into believing that the road did not contain a sharp curve and thus would approach the road normally, unaware of the hidden danger.

We are faced in this case with conflicting expert evidence on the issue of the correct speed at which an ordinary motorist would approach the curve on Snake Hill Road. The differing inferences from the evidence drawn by the trial judge and the Court of Appeal amount to a divergence on what weight should be placed on various pieces of conflicting evidence. As noted by our colleague, Mr. Sparks was of the opinion that "[if] you can't see around the corner, then, you know, drivers would have a fairly strong signal . . . that due care and caution would be required". Similar evidence of this nature was given by Mr. Nikolaisen, and indeed even by Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner. This is contrasted with evidence such as that given by Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner that a reasonable driver would be "lulled" into thinking that there is an 80 km/h road ahead of him or her.

As noted by McLachlin J. in Toneguzzo-Norvell, supra, at p. 122 and mentioned above, "the weight to be assigned to the various pieces of evidence is under our trial system essentially the province of the trier of fact". In that case, a unanimous Court found that the Court of Appeal erred in interfering with the trial judge's factual findings, on the basis that it was open to the trial judge to place less weight on certain evidence and accept other, conflicting evidence which the trial judge found to be more convincing (Toneguzzo-Norvell, at pp. 122-23). Similarly, in this case, the trial judge's factual findings concerning the proper speed to be used on approaching the curve should not be interfered with. It was open to her to choose to place more weight on certain portions of the evidence of Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner, where the evidence was conflicting. Her assessment of the proper speed was a reasonable inference based on the evidence and does not reach fondant sur d'autres parties des témoignages d'expert, la juge de première instance a estimé que la nature du chemin était telle qu'un automobiliste pourrait être amené à croire que le chemin ne comporte pas de virage serré et, de ce fait, à y rouler normalement, sans soupçonner l'existence du danger caché.

57 En l'espèce, nous sommes en présence de témoignages d'expert contradictoires sur la question de la vitesse à laquelle l'automobiliste moyen s'approcherait du virage du chemin Snake Hill. Les inférences différentes que la juge de première instance et la Cour d'appel tirent de la preuve équivalent à une divergence d'opinion quant au poids à accorder à divers éléments de preuve contradictoires. Le témoin Sparks a émis l'opinion suivante, que cite également notre collègue : [TRADUCTION] « [Si] vous ne pouvez voir, de l'autre côté du virage, alors, vous savez, cela devrait envoyer un message clair aux conducteurs [. . .] que l'attention et la prudence s'imposent ». M. Nikolaisen, et même MM. Anderson et Werner ont d'ailleurs témoigné au même effet. Cela contraste avec l'affirmation de MM. Anderson et Werner selon laquelle un conducteur raisonnable serait [TRADUCTION] « amené » à croire qu'il se trouve sur un chemin où l'on peut rouler à 80 km/h.

58 Comme l'a souligné madame le juge McLachlin, à la p. 122 de l'arrêt Toneguzzo-Norvell, précité, « selon notre système de procès, il appartient essentiellement au juge des faits [. . .] d'attribuer un poids aux différents éléments de preuve ». Dans cette affaire, notre Cour a conclu à l'unanimité que la Cour d'appel avait commis une erreur en modifiant les conclusions de fait du juge de première instance, au motif qu'il était loisible à celui-ci d'accorder un poids moins grand à certains éléments de preuve et à accepter d'autres éléments contradictoires, qu'il considérait plus convaincants. (Toneguzzo-Norvell, p. 122-123). De même, en l'espèce, il n'y a pas lieu de modifier les conclusions de fait de la juge de première instance au sujet de la vitesse à laquelle il faudrait approcher du virage. Il lui était loisible d'accorder plus de poids à certaines parties des témoignages de MM. Anderson et Werner, dans les cas où la preuve était contradictoire. Son the level of a palpable and overriding error. As such, the trial judge's findings with respect to the standard of care should not be overturned.

IV. Knowledge of the Municipality

59 We agree with our colleague that s. 192(3) of The Rural Municipality Act, 1989, requires the plaintiff to show that the municipality knew or should have known of the disrepair of Snake Hill Road before the municipality can be found to have breached its duty of care under s. 192. We also agree that the evidence of the prior accidents, in and of itself, is insufficient to impute such knowledge to the municipality. However, we find that the trial judge did not err in her finding that the municipality knew or ought to have known of the disrepair.

60 As discussed, the question of whether the municipality knew or should have known of the disrepair of Snake Hill Road is a question of mixed fact and law. The issue is legal in the sense that the municipality is held to a legal standard of knowledge of the nature of the road, and factual in the sense of whether it had the requisite knowledge on the facts of this case. As we state above, absent an isolated error in law or principle, such a finding is subject to the "palpable and overriding" standard of review. In this case, our colleague concludes that the trial judge erred in law by failing to approach the question of knowledge from the perspective of a prudent municipal councillor, and holds that a prudent municipal councillor could not be expected to become aware of the risk posed to the ordinary driver by the hazard in question. He also finds that the trial judge erred in law by failing to recognize that the burden of proving knowledge rested with the plaintiff. With respect, we disagree with these conclusions.

appréciation de la vitesse appropriée constituait une inférence raisonnable, fondée sur la preuve, et elle ne constitue pas une erreur manifeste et dominante. Dans ce contexte, il n'y a pas lieu d'écarter ses conclusions concernant la norme de diligence.

IV. Connaissance de la municipalité

À l'instar de notre collègue, nous estimons que le par. 192(3) de la Rural Municipality Act, 1989, oblige le demandeur à démontrer que la municipalité connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le mauvais état du chemin Snake Hill pour qu'il soit possible de conclure qu'elle a manqué à l'obligation de diligence qui lui incombe en vertu de l'art. 192. Nous sommes nous aussi d'avis que la preuve des accidents antérieurs n'est pas, en soi, suffisante pour prêter cette connaissance à la municipalité. Cependant, nous arrivons à la conclusion que la juge de première instance n'a pas commis d'erreur lorsqu'elle a conclu que la municipalité connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le mauvais état du chemin.

Comme nous l'avons vu, la question de savoir si la municipalité connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le mauvais état du chemin Snake Hill est une question mixte de droit et de fait. Il s'agit, d'une part, d'une question de droit en ce que la municipalité est tenue à une norme juridique qui lui impose de connaître la nature du chemin, et, d'autre part, d'une question de fait en ce qu'il faut déterminer si, eu égard aux faits de l'espèce, elle avait la connaissance requise. Comme nous l'avons dit précédemment, en l'absence d'erreur de droit ou de principe isolable, une telle conclusion est assujettie à la norme de contrôle de l'erreur « manifeste et dominante ». En l'espèce, notre collègue conclut que la juge de première instance a commis une erreur de droit en ne considérant pas la question de la connaissance du point de vue du conseiller municipal prudent, et il estime qu'on ne pouvait s'attendre à ce qu'un conseiller municipal prudent s'aperçoive du risque que le danger en question faisait courir au conducteur moyen. Il est également d'avis que la juge de première instance a commis une erreur de droit en ne reconnaissant pas que la charge de prouver la connaissance incombait au demandeur. En toute déférence, nous ne pouvons souscrire à ces conclusions.

The hazard in question is an unsigned and unexpected sharp curve. In our view, when a hazard is, like this one, a permanent feature of the road which has been found to present a risk to the ordinary driver, it is open to the trial judge to draw an inference, on this basis alone, that a prudent municipal councillor ought to be aware of the hazard. In support of his conclusion on the issue of knowledge, our colleague states that the municipality's knowledge is inextricably linked to the standard of care, and ties his finding on the question of knowledge to his finding that the curve did not present a hazard to the ordinary motorist (para. 149). We agree that the question of knowledge is closely linked to the standard of care, and since we find that the trial judge was correct in holding that the curve presented a hazard to the ordinary motorist, from there it was open to the trial judge to find that the municipality ought to have been aware of this hazard. We further note that as a question of mixed fact and law this finding is subject to the "palpable and overriding" standard of review. On this point, however, we restrict ourselves to situations such as the one at bar where the hazard in question is a permanent feature of the road, as opposed to a temporary hazard which reasonably may not come to the attention of the municipality in time to prevent an accident from occurring.

61 Le danger en question est une courbe serrée et soudaine, qui n'est annoncée par aucune signalisation. À notre avis, lorsqu'un danger constitue, comme celui-ci qui nous intéresse, une caractéristique permanente qui, a-t-on jugé, présente un risque pour le conducteur moyen, le juge de première instance peut, pour ce seul motif, inférer qu'un conseiller municipal prudent aurait dû connaître l'existence d'un danger. Pour étayer sa conclusion sur la question de la connaissance, notre collègue affirme que la connaissance de la municipalité est intimement liée à celle de la norme de diligence, et il lie sa conclusion sur la connaissance à sa conclusion selon laquelle la courbe ne constituait pas un danger pour l'automobiliste moyen (par. 149). Nous reconnaissons que la question de la connaissance est étroitement liée à celle de la norme de diligence, et, comme nous estimons que la juge de première instance a eu raison de conclure que la courbe présentait un danger pour l'automobiliste moyen, elle pouvait dès lors juger que la municipalité aurait dû connaître ce danger. Soulignons également que cette conclusion visant une question mixte de fait et de droit est assujettie à la norme de contrôle de l'erreur « manifeste et dominante ». Sur ce point, toutefois, nous limitons la portée de notre opinion aux situations analogues à celle qui nous occupe, où le danger constitue une caractéristique permanente du chemin, par opposition à un danger temporaire dont une municipalité pourrait raisonnablement ne pas être informée en temps utile pour empêcher un accident de survenir.

In addition, our colleague relies on the evidence of the lay witnesses, Craig and Toby Thiel, who lived on Snake Hill Road, and who testified that they had not experienced any difficulties with it (para. 149). With respect, we find three problems with this reliance. First, since the curve was found to be a hazard based on its hidden and unexpected nature, relying on the evidence of those who drive the road on a daily basis does not, in our view, assist in determining whether the curve presented a hazard to the ordinary motorist, or whether the municipality ought to have been aware of the hazard. In addition, in finding that the municipality ought to have known of the disrepair, the trial judge clearly chose not to rely on the above evidence. As we state above, it is open for a trial judge to prefer some parts of the evidence over others, and to re-assess the trial judge's weighing of the evidence, is, with respect, not within the province of an appellate court.

62 Par ailleurs, notre collègue se fonde sur les dépositions de témoins ordinaires, Craig et Toby Thiel, qui habitaient sur le chemin Snake Hill et qui ont témoigné n'avoir jamais éprouvé de difficulté à conduire à cet endroit (par. 149). En toute déférence, nous estimons que le fait de se fonder sur ces témoignages pose trois problèmes. D'abord, vu la conclusion que la courbe constituait un danger à cause de sa nature cachée et imprévue, ce n'est pas en se basant sur le témoignage de ceux qui empruntent quotidiennement le chemin qu'il est possible, à notre avis, de déterminer si cette courbe présentait un danger pour l'automobiliste moyen, ou si la municipalité aurait dû connaître l'existence du danger. De plus, en concluant que la municipalité

63 As well, since the question of knowledge is to be approached from the perspective of a prudent municipal councillor, we find the evidence of lay witnesses to be of little assistance. In Ryan, supra, at para. 28, Major J. stated that the applicable standard of care is that which "would be expected of an ordinary, reasonable and prudent person in the same circumstances" (emphasis added). Municipal councillors are elected for the purpose of managing the affairs of the municipality. This requires some degree of study and of information gathering, above that of the average citizen of the municipality. Indeed, it may in fact require consultation with experts to properly meet the obligation to be informed. Although municipal councillors are not experts, to equate the "prudent municipal councillor" with the opinion of lay witnesses who live on the road is incorrect in our opinion.

64 It is in this context that we view the following comments of the trial judge, at para. 90:

> If the R.M. did not have actual knowledge of the danger inherent in this portion of Snake Hill Road, it should have known. While four accidents in 12 years may not in itself be significant, it takes on more significance given the close proximity of three of these accidents, the relatively low volume of traffic, the fact that there are permanent residences on the road and the fact that the road is frequented by young and perhaps less experienced drivers. I am not satisfied that the R.M. has established that in these circumstances it took reasonable steps to prevent this state of disrepair on Snake Hill Road from continuing.

aurait dû connaître le mauvais état du chemin, la juge de première instance a clairement choisi de ne pas se fonder sur les témoignages susmentionnés. Comme nous l'avons dit précédemment, le juge de première instance peut préférer certaines parties de la preuve à d'autres, et, en toute déférence, il n'appartient pas au tribunal d'appel de procéder à nouveau à l'appréciation de la preuve, tâche déjà accomplie par le juge du procès.

Qui plus est, étant donné que la question de la connaissance doit être considérée du point de vue du conseiller municipal prudent, nous estimons que le témoignage des témoins ordinaires est peu utile. Dans l'arrêt Ryan, précité, par. 28, le juge Major a dit que la norme de diligence qui s'applique est celle de la personne agissant aussi diligemment que « le ferait une personne ordinaire, raisonnable et prudente placée dans la même situation » (nous soulignons). Les conseillers municipaux sont élus pour gérer les affaires de la municipalité. Pour s'acquitter de cette tâche, il leur faut, dans un cas donné, examiner la situation et recueillir de l'information, faire davantage que ce que fait le simple citoyen de la municipalité. De fait, ils peuvent avoir à consulter des experts pour respecter leur obligation d'être informés. Bien que les conseillers municipaux ne soient pas des experts, il est à notre avis erroné d'assimiler le point de vue du « conseiller municipal prudent » à l'opinion de témoins ordinaires qui habitent sur le chemin.

C'est à la lumière de ce contexte que nous interprétons les commentaires suivants de la juge de première instance (au par. 90) :

> [TRADUCTION] Si la M.R. ne connaissait pas concrètement le danger intrinsèque que comporte cette portion du chemin Snake Hill, elle aurait dû le connaître. Le fait que quatre accidents se soient produits en 12 ans n'est peut-être pas significatif en soi, mais il le devient si l'on considère que trois de ces accidents sont survenus à proximité, qu'il s'agit d'une route à débit de circulation relativement faible, que des résidences permanentes sont situées en bordure de celle-ci et que le chemin est fréquenté par des conducteurs jeunes et peut-être moins expérimentés. Je ne suis pas convaincue que la M.R. a établi avoir, dans ces circonstances, pris des mesures raisonnables pour remédier au mauvais état du chemin Snake Hill.

From this statement, we take the trial judge to have meant that, given the occurrence of prior accidents on this low-traffic road, the existence of permanent residents, and the type of drivers on the road, the municipality did not take the reasonable steps it should have taken in order to ensure that Snake Hill Road did not contain a hazard such as the one in question. Based on these factors, the trial judge drew the inference that the municipality should have been put on notice and investigated Snake Hill Road, in which case it would have become aware of the hazard in question. This factual inference, grounded as it was on the trial judge's assessment of the evidence, was in our view, far from reaching the requisite standard of palpable and overriding error, proper.

Selon notre interprétation, la juge de première instance a voulu dire que, compte tenu des accidents antérieurs sur ce chemin à faible débit de circulation, de la présence de résidents permanents et du type de conducteurs qui empruntent le chemin, la municipalité n'a pas pris les mesures raisonnables qu'elle aurait dû prendre pour faire en sorte que le chemin Snake Hill ne comporte pas de danger comme celui en cause. À partir de ces éléments, la juge de première instance a inféré que la municipalité aurait dû être informée de la situation sur le chemin Snake Hill et aurait dû faire enquête à cet égard, ce qui lui aurait permis de prendre connaissance de l'existence du danger. Cette inférence factuelle, qui repose sur l'appréciation de la preuve faite par la juge de première instance, était selon nous fondée et loin de constituer l'erreur manifeste et dominante requise par la norme pertinente.

Although we agree with our colleague that the circumstances of the prior accidents in this case do not provide a direct basis for the municipality to have had knowledge of the particular hazard in question, in the view of the trial judge, they should have caused the municipality to investigate Snake Hill Road, which in turn would have resulted in actual knowledge. In this case, far from causing the municipality to investigate, the evidence of Mr. Danger, who had been the municipal administrator for 20 years, was that, until the time of the trial, he was not even aware of the three accidents which had occurred between 1978 and 1987 on Snake Hill Road. As such, we do not find that the trial judge based her conclusion on any perspective other than that of a prudent municipal councillor, and therefore that she did not commit an error of law in this respect. Moreover, we do not find that she imputed knowledge to the municipality on the basis of the occurrence of prior accidents on Snake Hill Road. The existence of the prior accidents was simply a factor which caused the trial judge to find that the municipality should have been put on notice with respect to the condition of Snake Hill Road (para. 90).

65 À l'instar de notre collègue, nous estimons que les circonstances des accidents survenus antérieurement, en l'espèce, ne constituent pas une preuve directe que la municipalité aurait dû avoir connaissance du danger particulier en cause, mais, selon la juge de première instance, ces circonstances auraient dû inciter la municipalité à faire enquête à l'égard du chemin Snake Hill, ce qui lui aurait permis de prendre connaissance concrètement du danger. Dans la présente affaire, les accidents antérieurs sont loin d'avoir incité la municipalité à faire enquête. D'ailleurs, M. Danger, administrateur de la municipalité pendant 20 ans, a témoigné que, jusqu'au procès, il n'était même pas au fait des trois accidents survenus entre 1978 et 1987 sur le chemin Snake Hill. En conséquence, nous n'estimons pas que la juge de première instance a fondé sa conclusion sur quelque autre point de vue autre que celui du conseiller municipal prudent, et elle n'a donc pas commis d'erreur de droit à cet égard. De plus, nous sommes d'avis qu'elle n'a pas prêté à la municipalité la connaissance requise sur la base des accidents antérieurs. L'existence de ces accidents ne constituait rien de plus qu'un des éléments qui l'ont amenée à conclure que la municipalité aurait dû être au fait de l'état du chemin Snake Hill (par. 90).

We emphasize that, in our view, the trial judge did not shift the burden of proof to the municipality on this issue. Once the trial judge found that there was a permanent feature of Snake Hill Road which presented a hazard to the ordinary motorist, it was open to her to draw an inference that the municipality ought to have been aware of the danger. Once such an inference is drawn, then, unless the municipality can rebut the inference by showing that it took reasonable steps to prevent such a hazard from continuing, the inference will be left undisturbed. In our view, this is what the trial judge did in the above passage when she states: "I am not satisfied that the R.M. has established that in these circumstances it took reasonable steps to prevent this state of disrepair on Snake Hill Road from continuing" (para. 90 (emphasis added)). The fact that she drew such an inference is clear from the fact that this statement appears directly after her finding that the municipality ought to have known of the hazard based on the listed factors. Thus, it is our view that the trial judge did not improperly shift the burden of proof onto the municipality in this case.

la preuve à la municipalité sur cette question. Dès lors qu'elle a conclu qu'il existait sur le chemin Snake Hill une caractéristique permanente présentant un danger pour l'automobiliste moyen, il lui était loisible d'inférer que la municipalité aurait dû être au fait du danger. Dès l'instant où une telle inférence est tirée, elle demeure inchangée à moins que la municipalité ne puisse la réfuter en démontrant qu'elle a pris des mesures raisonnables pour faire cesser le danger. Selon nous, c'est ce que la juge de première instance a fait dans l'extrait précité lorsqu'elle dit : [TRADUCTION] « Je ne suis pas convaincue que la M.R. a établi avoir, dans ces circonstances, pris des mesures raisonnables pour remédier au mauvais état du chemin Snake Hill » (par. 90 (nous soulignons)). L'existence de cette inférence ressort clairement du fait que le passage précité suit immédiatement la conclusion de la juge de première instance selon laquelle, pour les raisons qu'elle énumère, la municipalité aurait dû connaître l'existence du danger. Par conséquent, nous sommes d'avis que la juge de première instance n'a pas fait erreur et transféré le fardeau de la preuve à la municipalité en l'espèce.

67 As well, although the circumstances of the prior accidents in this case do not provide strong evidence that the municipality ought to have known of the hazard, proof of prior accidents is not a necessary condition to a finding of breach of the duty of care under s. 192 of The Rural Municipality Act, 1989. If this were so, the first victim of an accident on a negligently maintained road would not be able to recover, whereas subsequent victims in identical circumstances would. Although under s. 192(3) the municipality cannot be held responsible for disrepair of which it could not have known, it is not sufficient for the municipality to wait for an accident to occur before remedying the disrepair, and, in the absence of proof by the plaintiff of prior accidents, claim that it could not have known of the hazard. If this were the case, not only would the first victim of an accident suffer a disproportionate evidentiary burden, but municipalities would also be encouraged not to collect information pertaining to accidents on its roads, as this would make it more difficult for the plaintiff in a motor vehicle accident to prove that the

De même, bien que les accidents survenus antérieurement en l'espèce ne constituent pas une preuve solide que la municipalité aurait dû connaître l'existence du danger, la preuve d'accidents antérieurs n'est pas une condition nécessaire pour qu'un tribunal puisse conclure à la violation de l'obligation de diligence prévue par l'art. 192 de la Rural Municipality Act, 1989. Si c'était le cas, la première victime d'un accident sur une route négligemment entretenue ne pourrait obtenir réparation, alors que les victimes subséquentes d'accidents survenant dans des circonstances identiques le pourraient. Bien que, au regard du par. 192(3), la municipalité ne puisse être tenue responsable du mauvais état d'une route dont elle n'aurait pu avoir connaissance, elle ne saurait se contenter d'attendre qu'un accident se produise avant de remédier au mauvais état de la route et, si un demandeur n'apporte pas la preuve de l'existence d'accidents antérieurs, soutenir qu'elle n'aurait pu connaître l'existence du danger. Dans cette hypothèse, non seulement imposerait-on à la première victime d'un accident un fardeau de preuve disproportionné, mais on encouragerait aussi

Although in this case the trial judge emphasized the prior accidents that the plaintiff did manage to prove, in our view, it is not necessary to rely on these accidents in order to satisfy s. 192(3). For the plaintiff to provide substantial and concrete proof of the municipality's knowledge of the state of disrepair of its roads, is to set an impossibly high burden on the plaintiff. Such information was within the particular sphere of knowledge of the municipality, and in our view, it was reasonable for the trial judge to draw an inference of knowledge from her finding that there was an ongoing state of disrepair.

To summarize our position on this issue, we do not find that the trial judge erred in law either by failing to approach the question from the perspective of a prudent municipal councillor, or by improperly shifting the burden of proof onto the defendant. As such, it would require a palpable and overriding error in order to overturn her finding that the municipality knew or ought to have known of the hazard, and, in our view, no such error was made.

V. Causation

We agree with our colleague's statement at para. 159 that the trial judge's conclusions on the cause of the accident was a finding of fact: Cork v. Kirby MacLean, Ltd., [1952] 2 All E.R. 402 (C.A.), at p. 407, quoted with approval in Matthews v. MacLaren (1969), 4 D.L.R. (3d) 557 (Ont. H.C.), at p. 566. Thus, this finding should not be interfered with absent palpable and overriding error.

les municipalités à ne pas recueillir d'informations concernant les accidents survenant sur leurs routes, puisqu'il serait en conséquence plus difficile à la victime d'un accident d'automobile qui intente des poursuites de prouver que la municipalité visée connaissait le mauvais état de la route ou aurait dû le connaître.

69 Pour résumer notre position sur cette question, nous ne pouvons conclure que la juge de première instance a commis une erreur de droit soit parce qu'elle aurait omis d'examiner la question du point de vue du conseiller municipal prudent, soit parce qu'elle aurait à tort transféré le fardeau de la preuve à la défenderesse. Par conséquent, il faudrait une erreur manifeste et dominante pour écarter sa conclusion que la municipalité connaissait le danger ou aurait dû le connaître et, selon nous, aucune erreur de cette nature n'a été commise.

V. Lien de causalité

70 Nous faisons nôtres les propos énoncés par notre collègue, au par. 159, selon lesquels la conclusion de la juge de première instance quant à la cause de l'accident était une conclusion de fait : Cork c. Kirby MacLean, Ltd., [1952] 2 All E.R. 402 (C.A.), p. 407; cité et approuvé dans Matthews c. MacLaren (1969), 4 D.L.R. (3d) 557 (H.C. Ont.), p. 566. En conséquence, cette conclusion ne doit pas être modifiée en l'absence d'erreur manifeste et dominante.

71 The trial judge based her findings on causation on three points (at para. 101):

> (2) even if there had been a sign, Mr. Nikolaisen's degree of impairment did increase his risk of not reacting, or reacting inappropriately, to a sign;
> (3) even so, Mr. Nikolaisen was not driving recklessly such that one would have expected him to have missed or ignored a warning sign. Moments before, on departing the Thiel residence, he had successfully negotiated a sharp curve which he could see and which was apparent to him.

The trial judge concluded that, on a balance of probabilities, Mr. Nikolaisen would have reacted and possibly avoided an accident, if he had been given advance warning of the curve. However she also found that the accident was partially caused by the conduct of Mr. Nikolaisen, and apportioned fault accordingly, with 50 percent to Mr. Nikolaisen and 35 percent to the Rural Municipality (para. 102).

72 As noted above, this Court has previously held that "an omission is only a material error if it gives rise to the reasoned belief that the trial judge must have forgotten, ignored or misconceived the evidence in a way that affected his conclusion" (Van de Perre, supra, at para.15). In the present case, it is not clear from the trial judge's reasons which portions of the evidence of Mr. Laughlin, Craig and Toby Thiel and Paul Housen she relied upon, or to what extent. However, as we have already stated, the full evidentiary record was before the trial judge and, absent further proof that the omission in her reasons was due to her misapprehension or neglect, of the evidence, we can presume that she reviewed the evidence in its entirety and based her factual findings

> (1) l'accident est survenu à un endroit dangereux du chemin, où un panneau de signalisation aurait dû être installé pour avertir les automobilistes du danger caché;
>
> (2) même s'il y avait eu un panneau de signalisation, le degré d'ébriété de M. Nikolaisen avait accru chez lui le risque qu'il ne réagisse pas du tout ou de façon inappropriée à une signalisation;
> (3) malgré cela, M. Nikolaisen ne conduisait pas de façon si téméraire qu'il était à prévoir qu'il ne voit pas un panneau de signalisation ou n'en tienne pas compte. Quelques instants plus tôt, à son départ de la résidence des Thiel, il avait pris avec succès un virage serré qu'il pouvait clairement voir.

La juge de première instance a estimé que, selon la prépondérance des probabilités, M. Nikolaisen aurait réagi et peut-être évité l'accident si on lui avait signalé à l'avance la présence de la courbe. Toutefois, elle a également conclu que l'accident avait été causé en partie par la conduite de M. Nikolaisen, et elle a réparti la responsabilité en conséquence, soit dans une proportion de 50 p. 100 à M. Nikolaisen et de 35 p. 100 à la municipalité rurale (par. 102).

Comme nous l'avons indiqué précédemment, notre Cour a jugé, dans une autre affaire, qu'« une omission ne constitue une erreur importante que si elle donne lieu à la conviction rationnelle que le juge de première instance doit avoir oublié, négligé d'examiner ou mal interprété la preuve de telle manière que sa conclusion en a été affectée » (Van de Perre, précité, par. 15). En l'espèce, les motifs de la juge de première instance n'indiquent pas clairement sur quelles parties des témoignages de M. Laughlin, de Craig et Toby Thiel et de Paul Housen elle s'est appuyée, ni dans quelle mesure elle l'a fait. Cependant, comme nous l'avons dit plus tôt, la juge de première instance disposait de l'ensemble de la preuve et, en l'absence d'autre élément on this review. This presumption, absent sufficient evidence of misapprehension or neglect, is consistent with the high level of error required by the test of "palpable and overriding" error. We reiterate that it is open to the trial judge to prefer the testimony of certain witnesses over others and to place more weight on some parts of the evidence than others, particularly where there is conflicting evidence: Toneguzzo-Norvell, supra, at pp. 122-23. The mere fact that the trial judge did not discuss a certain point or certain evidence in depth is not sufficient grounds for appellate interference: Van de Perre, supra, at para. 15.

indiquant que cette omission dans ses motifs résulte du fait qu'elle aurait mal interprété des éléments de la preuve ou négligé d'en examiner certains, nous pouvons présumer qu'elle a examiné l'ensemble de la preuve et que ses conclusions de fait reposaient sur cet examen. En l'absence de preuve établissant de façon suffisante qu'il y a eu mauvaise interprétation d'éléments de preuve ou négligence d'examiner certains de ceux-ci, cette présomption permet de conclure à l'absence d'erreur importante du type de celle requise pour satisfaire au critère de l'erreur « manifeste et dominante ». Nous tenons à rappeler que le juge de première instance peut préférer le témoignage de certains témoins et accorder plus de poids à certaines parties de la preuve qu'à d'autres, particulièrement en présence de preuves contradictoires : Toneguzzo-Norvell, précité, p. 122-123. Le simple fait que la juge de première instance n'a pas analysé en profondeur un point donné ou un élément de preuve particulier ne constitue pas un motif suffisant pour justifier l'intervention des tribunaux d'appel : Van de Perre, précité, par. 15.

For these reasons, we do not feel it appropriate to review the evidence of Mr. Laughlin and the lay witnesses de novo. As we concluded earlier, the trial judge's finding of fact that a hidden hazard existed at the curve should not be interfered with. The finding of a hidden hazard that requires a sign formed part of the basis of her findings concerning causation. As her conclusions on the existence of a hidden hazard had a basis in the evidence, her conclusions on causation grounded in part on the hidden hazard finding also had a basis in the evidence.

73 Pour ces motifs, nous n'estimons pas opportun d'examiner à nouveau les dépositions de M. Laughlin et des témoins ordinaires. Comme nous l'avons affirmé précédemment, il n'y a pas lieu de modifier la conclusion de fait de la juge de première instance selon laquelle la courbe présentait un danger caché. Ses conclusions touchant le lien de causalité reposent en partie sur cette conclusion relative à l'existence d'un danger caché nécessitant l'installation d'un panneau d'avertissement. Tout comme ses conclusions relatives à l'existence d'un danger caché, celles touchant le lien de causalité — fondées en partie sur le danger caché — avaient elles aussi des assises dans la preuve.

As for the silence of the trial judge on the evidence of Mr. Laughlin, we observe only that the evidence of Mr. Laughlin appears to be general in nature and thus of limited utility. Mr. Laughlin admitted that he could only provide general comments on the effects of alcohol on motorists, but could not provide specific expertise on the actual effect of alcohol on an individual driver. This is significant, as the level of tolerance of an individual driver plays a key role in determining the actual effect of alcohol on the motorist; an experienced drinker, although dangerous, will probably perform better on the road than an inexperienced drinker. It is noteworthy that the trial judge believed the evidence of Mr. Anderson that Mr. Nikolaisen's vehicle was travelling at the relatively slow speed of between 53 to 65 km/h at the time of impact with the embankment. It was also permissible for the trial judge to rely on the evidence of lay witnesses that Mr. Nikolaisen had successfully negotiated an apparently sharp curve moments before the accident, rather than relying on the evidence of Mr. Laughlin, which was of a hypothetical and unspecific nature. Indeed, the hypothetical nature of Mr. Laughlin's evidence reflects the entire inquiry into whether Mr. Nikolaisen would have seen a sign and reacted, or the precise speed that would be taken by a reasonable driver upon approaching the curve. The abstract nature of such inquiries supports deference to the factual findings of the trial judge, and is consistent with the stringent standard imposed by the phrase "palpable and overriding error".

75 Therefore we conclude that the trial judge's factual findings on causation were reasonable and thus do not reach the level of a palpable and overriding error, and therefore should not have been interfered with by the Court of Appeal.

VI. Common Law Duty of Care

76 As we conclude that the municipality is liable under The Rural Municipality Act, 1989, we find it unnecessary to consider the existence of a common law duty in this case.

VII. Disposition

77 As we stated at the outset, there are important reasons and principles for appellate courts not to interfere improperly with trial decisions. Applying joue un rôle essentiel dans la détermination de l'effet concret de l'alcool sur cet automobiliste; bien que dangereuse, la personne qui a l'habitude de boire se débrouillera probablement mieux sur la route qu'une personne qui n'en a pas l'habitude. Il convient de souligner que la juge de première instance a cru le témoignage de M. Anderson selon lequel le véhicule de M. Nikolaisen roulait à une vitesse relativement faible, soit entre 53 et 65 km/h, au moment de l'impact avec le remblai. Il lui était également permis de retenir les dépositions des témoins ordinaires selon lesquelles M. Nikolaisen avait réussi à prendre un virage apparemment serré quelques instants avant l'accident, plutôt que le témoignage de M. Laughlin, lequel était de nature hypothétique et générale. De fait, la nature hypothétique du témoignage de M. Laughlin est représentative de toute l'analyse de la question de savoir si M. Nikolaisen aurait aperçu un panneau de signalisation et aurait réagi en conséquence, ou à quelle vitesse précise un conducteur raisonnable s'approcherait du virage. Le caractère théorique de ces analyses justifie de faire montre de retenue à l'égard des conclusions factuelles de la juge de première instance et permet d'affirmer qu'on n'a pas satisfait à la norme rigoureuse imposée par l'expression « erreur manifeste et dominante ».

Par conséquent, nous estimons que les constatations factuelles de la juge de première instance concernant la causalité étaient raisonnables, qu'elles ne constituent donc pas une erreur manifeste et dominante et, partant, que la Cour d'appel n'aurait pas dû les modifier.

VI. Obligation de diligence prévue par la common law

Puisque nous concluons à la responsabilité de la municipalité en vertu de la Rural Municipality Act, 1989, nous n'estimons pas nécessaire de nous demander s'il existe en l'espèce une obligation de diligence prévue par la common law.

VII. Dispositif

Comme nous l'avons dit au départ, d'importantes raisons et d'importants principes commandent aux tribunaux d'appel de ne pas modifier indûment these reasons and principles to this case, we would allow the appeal, set aside the judgment of the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal, and restore the judgment of the trial judge, with costs throughout.

I. Introduction

This appeal arises out of a single-vehicle accident which occurred on July 18, 1992, on Snake Hill Road, a rural road located in the Municipality of Shellbrook, Saskatchewan. The appellant, Paul Housen, a passenger in the vehicle, was rendered a quadriplegic by the accident. At trial, the judge found that the driver of the vehicle, Douglas Nikolaisen, was negligent in travelling Snake Hill Road at an excessive rate of speed and in operating his vehicle while impaired. The trial judge also found the respondent, the Municipality of Shellbrook, to be at fault for breaching its duty to keep the road in a reasonable state of repair as required by s. 192 of The Rural Municipality Act, 1989, S.S. 1989-90, c. R-26.1. The Court of Appeal overturned the trial judge's finding that the respondent municipality was negligent. At issue in this appeal is whether the Court of Appeal had sufficient grounds to intervene in the decision of the lower court. The respondent has also asked this Court to overturn the trial judge's finding that the respondent knew or ought to have known of the alleged disrepair of Snake Hill Road and that the accident was caused in part by the negligence of the respondent. An incidental question is whether a common law duty of care exists alongside the statutory duty imposed on the respondent by s. 192.

les décisions des tribunaux de première instance. Appliquant ces raisons et principes à la présente espèce, nous sommes d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi, d'infirmer le jugement de la Cour d'appel de la Saskatchewan et de rétablir la décision de la juge de première instance, avec dépens devant toutes les cours.

LE JUGE BASTARACHE (dissident) —

I. Introduction

Le présent pourvoi découle d'un accident impliquant un seul véhicule survenu le 18 juillet 1992 sur le chemin Snake Hill, route rurale située dans la municipalité de Shellbrook, en Saskatchewan. L'appelant, Paul Housen, qui était passager dans le véhicule, est devenu quadriplégique à la suite de cet accident. Au procès, la juge a conclu que le conducteur du véhicule, Douglas Nikolaisen, avait fait preuve de négligence en roulant à une vitesse excessive sur le chemin Snake Hill et en conduisant son véhicule pendant que ses facultés étaient affaiblies. La juge de première instance a également estimé que l'intimée, la municipalité de Shellbrook, avait commis une faute en manquant à l'obligation de tenir le chemin dans un état raisonnable d'entretien comme le lui impose l'art. 192 de la loi intitulée la Rural Municipality Act, 1989, S.S. 1989-90, ch. R-26.1. La Cour d'appel a infirmé la décision de la juge de première instance concluant à la négligence de la municipalité intimée. La question en litige dans le présent pourvoi consiste à déterminer si la Cour d'appel avait des motifs suffisants pour modifier la décision du tribunal de première instance. L'intimée demande également à notre Cour d'infirmer les conclusions de la juge de première instance portant que l'intimée connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le mauvais état dans lequel se trouvait, prétend-on, le chemin Snake Hill, et que l'accident a été causé en partie par sa négligence. Il faut également répondre à la question incidente de savoir si une obligation de diligence de common law coexiste avec l'obligation légale imposée à l'intimée par l'art. 192.

79 I conclude that the Court of Appeal was correct to overturn the trial judge's finding that the respondent was negligent. Though I would not interfere with the trial judge's factual findings on this issue, I find that she erred in law by failing to apply the correct standard of care. I would also overturn the trial judge's conclusions with regard to knowledge and causation. In coming to the conclusion that the respondent knew or should have known of the alleged disrepair of Snake Hill Road, the trial judge erred in law by failing to consider the knowledge requirement from the perspective of a prudent municipal councillor and by failing to be attentive to the fact that the onus of proof was on the appellant. In addition, the trial judge drew an unreasonable inference by imputing knowledge to the respondent on the basis of accidents that occurred on other segments of the road while motorists were travelling in the opposite direction. The trial judge also erred with respect to causation. She misapprehended the evidence before her, drew erroneous conclusions from that evidence and ignored relevant evidence. Finally, I would not interfere with the decision of the courts below to reject the appellant's argument that a common law duty existed. It is unnecessary to impose a common law duty of care where a statutory duty exists. Moreover, the application of common law negligence principles would not affect the outcome in these proceedings.

J'estime que la Cour d'appel a eu raison d'infirmer la conclusion de la juge de première instance selon laquelle la municipalité intimée a été négligente. Je ne modifierais pas les conclusions de fait de la juge de première instance sur cette question, mais je suis d'avis qu'elle a commis une erreur de droit en n'appliquant pas la norme de diligence appropriée. J'infirmerais également ses conclusions en ce qui concerne la question de la connaissance et le lien de causalité. En concluant que l'intimée connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le mauvais état dans lequel se trouvait, prétend-on, le chemin Snake Hill, la juge de première instance a commis une erreur de droit en n'appréciant pas l'exigence relative à la connaissance du point de vue du conseiller municipal prudent et en ne tenant pas compte du fait que le fardeau de la preuve incombait à l'appelant. De plus, la juge de première instance a tiré une inférence déraisonnable en prêtant à l'intimée la connaissance requise, en raison d'accidents survenus sur d'autres tronçons du chemin alors que des automobilistes circulaient en sens inverse. La juge de première instance a également commis une erreur relativement au lien de causalité. Elle a mal interprété la preuve qui lui était soumise, elle en a tiré des conclusions erronées et elle n'a pas tenu compte d'éléments de preuve pertinents. Enfin, je ne modifierais pas la décision des juridictions inférieures ayant rejeté l'argument de l'appelant selon lequel il existait une obligation de diligence de common law. Il est inutile d'imposer une obligation de common law lorsqu'il existe une obligation légale. Qui plus est, l'application des principes de la common law en matière de négligence n'aurait aucune incidence sur l'issue de la présente instance.

II. Factual Background

80 The sequence of` events which culminated in this tragic accident began to unfold some 19 hours before its occurrence on the afternoon of July 18, 1992. On July 17, Mr. Nikolaisen attended a barbeque at the residence of Craig and Toby Thiel, located on Snake Hill Road. He arrived in the late afternoon and had his first drink of the day at approximately 6:00 p.m. He consumed four or five drinks before leaving the Thiel residence at approximately

II. Les faits

La suite d'événements ayant abouti au tragique accident a commencé quelque 19 heures avant l'accident lui-même, dans l'après-midi du 18 juillet 1992. Le 17 juillet, M. Nikolaisen a participé à un barbecue à la résidence de Craig et Toby Thiel, sur le chemin Snake Hill. Arrivé en fin d'après-midi, il a pris son premier verre de la journée vers 18 h. Il en a pris quatre ou cinq avant de quitter la résidence des Thiel vers 22 h ou 22 h 30. Après avoir passé

10:00 or 10:30 p.m. After returning home for a few hours, Mr. Nikolaisen proceeded to the Sturgeon Lake Jamboree, where he met up with the appellant. At the jamboree, Mr. Nikolaisen consumed eight or nine double rye drinks and several beers. The appellant was also drinking during this event. The appellant and Mr. Nikolaisen partied on the grounds of the jamboree for several hours. At approximately 4:30 a.m., the appellant left the jamboree with Mr. Nikolaisen. After travelling around the back roads for a period of time, they returned to the Thiel residence. It was approximately 8:00 a.m. The appellant and Mr. Nikolaisen had several more drinks over the course of the morning. Mr. Nikolaisen stopped drinking two or three hours before leaving the Thiel residence with the appellant at approximately 2:00 p.m.

A light rain was falling when the appellant and Mr. Nikolaisen left the Thiel residence, travelling eastbound with Mr. Nikolaisen behind the wheel of a Ford pickup truck. The truck swerved or "fish-tailed" as it turned the corner from the Thiel driveway onto Snake Hill Road. As Mr. Nikolaisen continued on his way over the course of a gentle bend some 300 metres in length, gaining speed to an estimated 65 km/h, the truck again fish-tailed several times. The truck went into a skid as Mr. Nikolaisen approached and entered a sharper right turn. Mr. Nikolaisen steered into the skid but was unable to negotiate the curve. The left rear wheel of the truck contacted an embankment on the left side of the road. The vehicle travelled on the road for approximately 30 metres when the left front wheel contacted and climbed an 18-inch embankment on the left side of the road. This second contact with the embankment caused the truck to enter a 360-degree roll with the passenger side of the roof contacting the ground first.

When the vehicle came to rest, the appellant was unable to feel any sensation. Mr. Nikolaisen climbed out the back window of the vehicle and ran to the Thiel residence for assistance. Police later accompanied Mr. Nikolaisen to the Shellbrook Hospital where a blood sample was taken. Expert testimony estimated Mr. Nikolaisen's blood alcohol level to be quelques heures chez lui, M. Nikolaisen s'est rendu au jamboree de Sturgeon Lake, où il a rencontré l'appelant. Sur les lieux du jamboree, M. Nikolaisen a consommé huit ou neuf ryes doubles et plusieurs bières. L'appelant buvait lui aussi. L'appelant et M. Nikolaisen ont fait la fête sur les lieux du jamboree pendant plusieurs heures. Vers 4 h 30, l'appelant a quitté le jamboree en compagnie de M. Nikolaisen. Après avoir roulé sur des routes de campagne pendant un certain temps, ils sont retournés à la résidence des Thiel. Il était environ 8 h. L'appelant et M. Nikolaisen ont pris plusieurs autres verres au cours de la matinée. M. Nikolaisen a cessé de boire deux ou trois heures avant de quitter la résidence des Thiel en compagnie de l'appelant vers 14 h.

81 Une faible pluie tombait lorsque l'appelant et M. Nikolaisen ont quitté la résidence des Thiel et pris la route, en direction est, à bord d'une camionnette Ford conduite par M. Nikolaisen. L'arrière de la camionnette a zigzagué lorsque le véhicule a tourné à l'intersection de l'entrée de la résidence des Thiel et du chemin Snake Hill. Alors que M. Nikolaisen prenait un léger virage d'une longueur de quelque 300 mètres, tout en accélérant à 65 km/h environ, l'arrière de sa camionnette a zigzagué à nouveau à plusieurs reprises. La camionnette s'est mise à déraper lorsque M. Nikolaisen a amorcé un virage plus serré vers la droite. Il a donné un coup de volant, mais n'a pas réussi à prendre le virage. La roue arrière gauche de la camionnette a heurté un remblai situé du côté gauche du chemin. Le véhicule a continué sa course sur une distance d'environ 30 mètres, puis sa roue avant gauche est montée sur un remblai de 18 pouces du côté gauche du chemin, après l'avoir heurté. Sous la force du second impact, la camionnette a fait un tonneau complet, le toit du côté du passager touchant le sol en premier.

between 180 and 210 milligrams in 100 millilitres of blood at the time of the accident, well over the legal limits prescribed in The Highway Traffic Act, S.S. 1986, c. H-3.1, and the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46.

83 Mr. Nikolaisen had travelled on Snake Hill Road three times in the 24 hours preceding the accident, but had not driven it on any earlier occasions. The road was about a mile and three quarters in length and was flanked by highways to the north and to the east. Starting at the north end, it ran south for a short distance, dipped between open fields, then curved to the southeast and descended in a southerly loop down and around Snake Hill, past trees, bush and pasture, to the bottom of the valley. There it curved sharply to the southeast as it passed the Thiels' driveway. Once it passed the driveway, it curved gently to the south east for about 300 metres, then curved more distinctly to the south. It was on this stretch that the accident occurred. From that point on, the road crossed a creek, took another curve, then ascended a steep hill to the east, straightened out, and continued east for just over half a mile, past tree-lined fields and another farm site, to an approach to the highway.

84 Snake Hill Road was established in 1923 and was maintained by the respondent municipality for the primary purpose of providing local farmers access to their fields and pastures. It also served as an access road for the two permanent residences and one veterinary clinic located on it. The road at its northernmost end, coming off the highway, is characterized as a "Type C" local access road under the provincial government's scheme of road classification. This means that it is graded, gravelled and elevated above the surrounding land. The portion of the road east of the Thiel residence, on which the accident occurred, is characterized as "Type B" bladed trail, essentially a prairie trail that has been bladed to remove the ruts and to allow it to be driven on. Bladed trails follow the path of least resistance through the surrounding land and are not elevated or gravelled. The que, au moment de l'accident, l'alcoolémie de M. Nikolaisen se situait entre 180 et 210 milligrammes par 100 milligrammes, taux largement supérieur à la limite permise par la loi intitulée la Highway Traffic Act, S.S. 1986 ch. H-3.1, et par le Code criminel, L.R.C. 1985, ch. C-46.

M. Nikolaisen avait emprunté le chemin Snake Hill à trois reprises au cours des 24 heures ayant précédé l'accident, mais il n'y avait jamais circulé auparavant. Ce chemin, flanqué de routes au nord et à l'est, fait environ un mille et trois quarts de longueur. À partir de son extrémité nord, il franchit une courte distance en direction sud, traverse des champs, puis tourne vers le sud-est pour ensuite descendre en lacet vers le sud autour du mont Snake Hill, passant devant des arbres, buissons et pâturages, jusqu'au fond de la vallée. De là, il tourne brusquement vers le sud-est devant l'entrée de la résidence des Thiel. Tout de suite après, il tourne doucement vers le sud-est sur une distance d'environ 300 mètres, puis décrit une courbe plus prononcée vers le sud. C'est à cet endroit que l'accident s'est produit. De là, le chemin traverse un ruisseau, tourne encore, puis monte une pente raide vers l'est, se redresse et continue vers l'est sur une distance d'un peu plus d'un demi mille et passe devant des champs bordés d'arbres et une autre ferme, jusqu'à une voie d'accès à la route.

Construit en 1923, le chemin Snake Hill est entretenu par la municipalité intimée dans le but premier de permettre aux fermiers de la région d'accéder à leurs champs et pâturages. Il sert également de voie d'accès à deux résidences permanentes et à une clinique vétérinaire. Le tronçon nord du chemin, dont l'extrémité part de la route, est considéré comme un chemin d'accès local de « type C » selon le système provincial de classification des routes. Cela signifie qu'il est nivelé, gravelé et possède une chaussée surélevée. Le tronçon du chemin situé à l'est de la résidence des Thiel et sur lequel l'accident s'est produit est considéré comme un chemin nivelé de « type B », c'est-à-dire essentiellement un chemin dont les ornières ont été remplies pour le rendre carrossable. Les chemins nivelés suivent le tracé qui présente le moins d'obstacle à travers le terrain environnant et ne sont ni surélevés ni gravelés. La province of Saskatchewan has some 45,000 kilometres of bladed trails.

According to the provincial scheme of road classification, both bladed trails and local access roads are "non-designated", meaning that they are not subject to the Saskatchewan Rural Development Sign Policy and Standards. On such roads, the council of the rural municipality makes a decision to post signs if it becomes aware of a hazard or if there are several accidents at one specific spot. Three accidents had occurred on Snake Hill Road between 1978 and 1987. All three accidents occurred to the east of the site of the Nikolaisen rollover, with drivers travelling westbound. A fourth accident occurred on Snake Hill Road in 1990 but there was no evidence as to where it occurred. There was no evidence that topography was a factor in any of these accidents. The respondent municipality had not posted signs on any portion of Snake Hill Road.

III. Relevant Statutory Provisions

192(1) Every Council shall keep in a reasonable state of repair all municipal roads, dams and reservoirs and the approaches to them that have been constructed or provided by the municipality or by any person with the permission of the council or that have been constructed or provided by the province, having regard to the character of the municipal road, dam or reservoir and the locality in which it is situated or through which it passes.

(2) Where the council fails to carry out its duty imposed by subsections (1) and (1.1), the municipality is, subject to The Contributory Negligence Act, civilly liable for all damages sustained by any person by reason of the failure.

province de Saskatchewan compte quelque 45 000 kilomètres de chemins nivelés.

85 Selon le système de classification des routes, tant les chemins nivelés que les chemins d'accès local sont [TRADUCTION] « non désignés », c'est-à-dire qu'ils ne sont pas visés par le document intitulé Saskatchewan Rural Development Sign Policy and Standards (« Politique et normes de signalisation routière en milieu rural en Saskatchewan »). Le conseil de la municipalité rurale installe des panneaux de signalisation sur ces chemins s'il constate l'existence d'un danger ou si plusieurs accidents se produisent au même endroit. Trois accidents sont survenus sur le chemin Snake Hill de 1978 à 1987. Tous ces accidents se sont produits à l'est de l'endroit où la camionnette de Nikolaisen a fait un tonneau et les véhicules concernés circulaient en direction ouest. Un quatrième accident s'est produit sur le chemin Snake Hill en 1990, mais aucune preuve indiquant l'endroit exact de l'accident n'a été présentée. Rien ne permettait de conclure que la topographie des lieux était à l'origine de l'un ou l'autre de ces accidents. La municipalité intimée n'avait installé aucun panneau signalisateur le long du chemin Snake Hill.

III. Les dispositions législatives pertinentes

[TRADUCTION]

192(1) Le conseil tient dans un état raisonnable d'entretien tous les chemins municipaux, barrages et réservoirs, ainsi que les accès à ces ouvrages qui ont été construits ou sont fournis par la municipalité ou par toute autre personne avec la permission du conseil ou qui ont été construits ou sont fournis par le gouvernement de la province, eu égard à la nature de l'ouvrage en question et à la localité où il est situé ou qu'il traverse.

(2) Lorsque le conseil omet de s'acquitter des obligations qui lui incombent en vertu des paragraphes (1) et (1.1), la municipalité est, sous réserve de la Contributory Negligence Act [Loi sur le partage de la responsabilité], civilement responsable des dommages subis par toute personne à la suite de ce manquement.

(3) Default under subsections (1) and (1.1) shall not be imputed to a municipality in any action without proof by the plaintiff that the municipality knew or should have known of the disrepair of the municipal road or other thing mentioned in subsections (1) and (1.1).

The Highway Traffic Act, S.S. 1986, c. H-3.1

33(1) Subject to the other provisions of this Act, no person shall drive a vehicle on a highway:

(a) at a speed greater than 80 kilometres per hour; or

(b) at a speed greater than the maximum speed indicated by any signs that are erected on the highway . . . .

(2) No person shall drive a vehicle on a highway at a speed greater than is reasonable and safe in the circumstances.

44(1) No person shall drive a vehicle on a highway without due care and attention.

(3) En cas d'action reprochant un manquement visé aux paragraphes (1) et (1.1) la responsabilité de la municipalité concernée n'est engagée que si le demandeur établit que cette dernière connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le mauvais état du chemin municipal ou autre ouvrage mentionné aux paragraphes (1) et (1.1).

The Highway Traffic Act, S.S. 1986, ch. H-3.1

[TRADUCTION]

33(1) Sous réserve des autres dispositions de la présente loi, il est interdit de conduire sur une voie publique à une vitesse supérieure, selon le cas :

a) à 80 kilomètres à l'heure;

b) à la vitesse maximale indiquée par la signalisation routière le long de la voie publique en question . . .

(2) Il est interdit de conduire un véhicule sur une voie publique à une vitesse supérieure à celle qui est raisonnable et sécuritaire dans les circonstances.

44(1) Il est interdit de conduire un véhicule sur une voie publique sans faire preuve de la prudence et de l'attention nécessaires.

IV. Judicial History

A. Saskatchewan Court of Queen's Bench, [1998] 5 W.W.R. 523

87 Wright J. found the respondent negligent in failing to erect a sign to warn motorists of the sharp right curve on Snake Hill Road, which she characterized as a "hidden hazard". She also found Mr. Nikolaisen negligent in travelling Snake Hill Road at an excessive speed and in operating his vehicle while impaired. The appellant was held to be contributorily negligent in accepting a ride with Mr. Nikolaisen. Fifteen percent of the fault was apportioned to the appellant, and the remainder was apportioned jointly and severally 50 percent to Mr. Nikolaisen and 35 percent to the respondent.

88 Wright J. found that s. 192 of The Rural Municipality Act, 1989 imposed a statutory duty of care on the respondent toward persons travelling on Snake Hill Road. She then considered whether the respondent met the standard of care as delineated in

IV. L'historique des procédures judiciaires

A. Cour du Banc de la Reine de la Saskatchewan, [1998] 5 W.W.R. 523

La juge Wright a conclu que l'intimée avait fait preuve de négligence en omettant d'installer un panneau signalant aux automobilistes l'existence du virage à droite serré sur le chemin Snake Hill, virage qu'elle a qualifié de [TRADUCTION] « danger caché ». Elle a également estimé que M. Nikolaisen avait été négligent en roulant à une vitesse excessive sur le chemin Snake Hill et en conduisant son véhicule pendant qu'il avait les facultés affaiblies. L'appelant a été tenu responsable de négligence concourante parce qu'il avait accepté de monter à bord du véhicule de M. Nikolaisen. La responsabilité a été partagée ainsi : 15 p. 100 à l'appelant, le reste étant réparti solidairement entre M. Nikolaisen (50 p. 100) et l'intimée (35 p. 100).

La juge Wright a d'abord conclu que l'art. 192 de la Rural Municipality Act, 1989 imposait à l'intimée une obligation légale de diligence envers les personnes circulant sur le chemin Snake Hill. Elle s'est ensuite demandée si l'intimée s'était

s. 192 and the jurisprudence interpreting that section. She referred specifically to Partridge v. Rural Municipality of Langenberg, [1929] 3 W.W.R. 555 (Sask. C.A.), in which it was stated at p. 558 that "the road must be kept in such a reasonable state of repair that those requiring to use it may, exercising ordinary care, travel upon it with safety". She also cited Shupe v. Rural Municipality of Pleasantdale, [1932] 1 W.W.R. 627 (Sask. C.A.), at p. 630: "[R]egard must be had to the locality . . . the situation of the road therein, whether required to be used by many or by few; . . . to the number of roads to be kept in repair; to the means at the disposal of the council for that purpose, and the requirements of the public who use the road." Relying on Galbiati v. City of Regina, [1972] 2 W.W.R. 40 (Sask. Q.B.), Wright J. observed that although the Act does not mention an obligation to erect warning signs, the general duty of repair nevertheless includes the duty to warn motorists of a hidden hazard.

conformée à la norme de diligence énoncée à l'art. 192 et dans la jurisprudence portant sur l'interprétation de cet article. Elle a fait état, en particulier, de l'arrêt Partridge c. Rural Municipality of Langenberg, [1929] 3 W.W.R. 555, dans lequel la Cour d'appel de la Saskatchewan a déclaré, à la p. 558, que [TRADUCTION] « le chemin doit être tenu dans un état raisonnable d'entretien, de façon que ceux qui doivent l'emprunter puissent, en prenant des précautions normales, y circuler en sécurité ». Elle a également cité le passage suivant de l'affaire Shupe c. Rural Municipality of Pleasantdale, [1932] 1 W.W.R. 627 (C.A. Sask.), p. 630 : [TRADUCTION] « [I]l faut tenir compte de la localité où est situé le chemin, [. . .] de son emplacement dans celle-ci, se demander s'il sera beaucoup ou peu fréquenté; [. . .] du nombre de chemins à entretenir; des ressources budgétaires dont dispose le conseil à cette fin et des besoins du public qui emprunte ce chemin ». Se fondant sur l'affaire Galbiati c. City of Regina, [1972] 2 W.W.R. 40 (B.R. Sask.), la juge Wright a fait observer que, bien que la Loi ne mentionne pas explicitement l'obligation d'installer des panneaux d'avertissement, l'obligation générale d'entretien comporte néanmoins celle de signaler aux automobilistes l'existence d'un danger caché.

Having laid out the relevant case law, Wright J. went on to discuss the character of the road. Relying primarily on the evidence of two experts at trial, Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner, she found that the sharp right turning curve was a hazard that was not readily apparent to the users of the road. From their testimony she concluded (at para. 85):

Après avoir fait état de la jurisprudence pertinente, la juge Wright a poursuivi en examinant la nature du chemin. S'appuyant principalement sur les témoignages donnés par deux experts au procès, MM. Anderson et Werner, elle a conclu que le virage à droite serré constituait un danger que les usagers du chemin ne pouvaient voir aisément. De leurs témoignages, elle a tiré la conclusion suivante (au par. 85) :

It is a hidden hazard. The location of the Nikolaisen rollover is the most dangerous segment of Snake Hill Road. Approaching the location of the Nikolaisen rollover, limited sight distance, created by uncleared bush, precludes a motorist from being forewarned of an impending sharp right turn immediately followed by a left turn. While there were differing opinions on the maximum speed at which this curve can be negotiated, I am satisfied that when limited sight distance is combined with the tight radius of the curve and lack of superelevation, this curve cannot be safely negotiated at speeds greater than 60 kilometres per hour when conditions are favourable, or 50 kilometres per hour when wet. [Emphasis in original.]

virage ne peut être pris en sécurité à une vitesse supérieure à 60 kilomètres à l'heure dans des conditions favorables, ou 50 kilomètres à l'heure sur chaussée humide. [En italique dans l'original.]

Wright J. then noted that, while it would not be reasonable to expect the respondent to construct the road to a higher standard or to clear all of the bush away, it was reasonable to expect the respondent to erect and maintain a warning or regulatory sign "so that a motorist, using ordinary care, may be forewarned, adjust speed and take corrective action in advance of entering a dangerous situation" (para. 86).

La juge Wright a ensuite précisé que, bien qu'on ne puisse raisonnablement exiger de l'intimée qu'elle construise le chemin selon une norme plus élevée ou qu'elle enlève toutes les broussailles, il était raisonnable de s'attendre à ce qu'elle installe et maintienne un panneau d'avertissement ou de signalisation [TRADUCTION] « afin qu'un automobiliste prenant des précautions normales soit prévenu et puisse réduire sa vitesse et prendre des mesures correctives avant d'arriver à l'endroit dangereux » (par. 86).

90 Wright J. then considered s. 192(3) of the Act, which provides that there is no breach of the statutory standard of care unless the municipality knew or should have known of the danger. Wright J. observed that between 1978 and 1990, there were four accidents on Snake Hill Road, three of which occurred "in the same vicinity" as the Nikolaisen rollover, and two of which were reported to the authorities. On the basis of this information, she held that "[i]f the R.M. [Rural Municipality] did not have actual knowledge of the danger inherent in this portion of Snake Hill Road, it should have known" (para. 90). Wright J. also found significant the relatively low volume of traffic on the road, the fact that there were permanent residences on the road, and the fact that the road was frequented by young and perhaps less experienced drivers.

La juge Wright a ensuite analysé le par. 192(3) de la Loi, qui prévoit qu'il n'y a manquement à l'obligation de diligence que si la municipalité connaissait ou aurait dû connaître l'existence du danger. Elle a rappelé que quatre accidents étaient survenus sur le chemin Snake Hill de 1978 à 1990. Trois de ceux-ci se sont produits [TRADUCTION] « aux environs » de l'endroit où le véhicule de M. Nikolaisen a fait un tonneau, et deux ont été signalés aux autorités. Sur la base de cette information, elle a conclu que [TRADUCTION] « [s]i la M.R. [municipalité rurale] ne connaissait pas concrètement le danger intrinsèque que comporte cette portion du chemin Snake Hill, elle aurait dû le connaître » (par. 90). La juge Wright a également accordé de l'importance au débit relativement faible de la circulation sur le chemin, au fait que des résidences permanentes étaient situées en bordure de celui-ci et au fait que le chemin était fréquenté par des conducteurs jeunes et peut-être moins expérimentés.

91 In respect to causation, Wright J. found that it was probable that a warning sign would have enabled Mr. Nikolaisen to take corrective action to maintain control of his vehicle despite the fact of his impairment. She concluded (at para. 101):

En ce qui concerne le lien de causalité, la juge Wright a estimé qu'un panneau de signalisation aurait probablement permis à M. Nikolaisen de prendre des mesures correctives et de conserver la maîtrise de son véhicule, même si ses facultés étaient affaiblies. Elle a aussi tiré la conclusion suivante, au par. 101 :

Mr. Nikolaisen's degree of impairment only served to increase the risk of him not reacting, or reacting inappropriately to a sign. Mr. Nikolaisen was not driving recklessly such that he would have intentionally disregarded a warning or regulatory sign. He had moments earlier, when departing the Thiel residence, successfully negotiated a sharp curve which he could see and which was apparent to him.

Wright J. also addressed the appellant's argument that the municipality was in breach of a common law duty of care which was not qualified or limited by any of the restrictions set out under s. 192. She held that Just v. British Columbia, [1989] 2 S.C.R. 1228, and the line of authority both preceding and following that decision did not apply to the case before her given the existence of the statutory duty of care. She also found that any qualifying words in s. 192 of the Act pertained to the standard of care and did not impose limitations on the statutory duty of care.

B. Saskatchewan Court of Appeal, [2000] 4 W.W.R. 173, 2000 SKCA 12

On appeal, Cameron J.A., writing for a unanimous court, dealt primarily with the trial judge's finding that the respondent's failure to place a warning sign or regulatory sign at the site of the accident constituted a breach of its statutory duty of road repair. He did not find it necessary to rule on the issue of causation given his conclusion that the trial judge erred in finding the respondent negligent.

Cameron J.A. characterized the trial judge's conclusion that the respondent had breached the statutory duty of care as a matter of mixed fact and law. He noted that an appellate court is not to interfere with a trial judge's findings of fact unless the judge made a "palpable and overriding error" which affected his or her assessment of the facts. With respect to errors of law, however, Cameron J.A. remarked that the ability of an appellate court to overturn the finding of the trial judge is "largely unbounded". Regarding errors of mixed fact and law, Cameron J.A. noted that these are typically subject to the same standard of review as findings aurait intentionnellement fait abstraction d'un panneau d'avertissement ou de signalisation. Quelques instants plus tôt, au moment de quitter la résidence des Thiel, il avait pris avec succès un virage serré qu'il pouvait clairement voir.

92 La juge Wright s'est également penchée sur l'argument de l'appelant voulant que la municipalité ait manqué à une obligation de diligence de common law qui ne serait pas atténuée ou restreinte par l'une ou l'autre des dispositions de l'art. 192. Elle a estimé que l'arrêt Just c. Colombie-Britannique, [1989] 2 R.C.S. 1228, ainsi que la jurisprudence antérieure et postérieure à cette décision ne s'appliquaient pas à l'affaire dont elle était saisie, vu l'existence de l'obligation légale de diligence. Elle a également jugé que les termes restrictifs de l'art. 192 de la Loi visaient la norme de diligence et n'avaient pas pour effet de limiter la portée de l'obligation légale de diligence.

B. Cour d'appel de la Saskatchewan, [2000] 4 W.W.R. 173, 2000 SKCA 12

93 En appel, exprimant la décision unanime de la cour, le juge Cameron s'est attaché principalement à la conclusion de la juge de première instance portant que, en omettant d'installer un panneau d'avertissement ou de signalisation à l'endroit de l'accident, l'intimée avait manqué à son obligation légale d'entretien des routes. Il n'a pas jugé nécessaire de se prononcer sur la question du lien de causalité, vu sa conclusion que la juge de première instance avait commis une erreur en déclarant l'intimée responsable de négligence.

94 Le juge Cameron a qualifié la conclusion de la juge de première instance que l'intimée avait manqué à son obligation légale de diligence de conclusion portant sur une question mixte de fait et de droit. Il a souligné qu'une cour d'appel ne doit pas modifier les conclusions de fait du juge de première instance à moins que ce dernier n'ait commis une « erreur manifeste et dominante » ayant faussé son appréciation des faits. Pour ce qui est des erreurs de droit, toutefois, le juge Cameron a fait remarquer que le pouvoir d'une cour d'appel d'infirmer la conclusion du juge de première instance est [TRADUCTION] « presque illimité ». En ce qui concerne les erreurs of fact. One exception to this, according to Cameron J.A., occurs where the trial judge identifies the correct legal test, yet fails to apply one branch of that test to the facts at hand. As support for this proposition, Cameron J.A. cited (at para. 41) Iacobucci J. in Canada (Director of Investigation and Research) v. Southam Inc., [1997] 1 S.C.R. 748, at para. 39:

> [I]f a decision-maker says that the correct test requires him or her to consider A, B, C, and D, but in fact the decision-maker considers only A, B, and C, then the outcome is as if he or she had applied a law that required consideration of only A, B, and C. If the correct test requires him or her to consider D as well, then the decision-maker has in effect applied the wrong law, and so has made an error of law.

95 Turning to the applicable law in this case, Cameron J.A. acknowledged that the standard of care set out in the Act and the jurisprudence interpreting it requires municipalities to post warning signs to warn of hazards that prudent drivers, using ordinary care, would be unlikely to appreciate. Based on the jurisprudence, Cameron J.A. set out (at para. 50) an analytical framework to be used in order to assess if a municipality has breached its duty in this regard. This framework requires the judge:

> 1. To determine the character and state of the road at the time of the accident. This, of course, is a matter of fact that entails an assessment of the material features of the road where the accident occurred, as well as those factors going to the maintenance standard, namely the location, class of road, patterns of use, and so on.
> 2. To assess the issue of whether persons requiring to use the road, exercising ordinary car[e], could ordinarily travel upon it safely. This is essentially a reasonable person test, one concerned with how a mixtes de fait et de droit, le juge Cameron a précisé qu'elles sont normalement assujetties à la même norme de contrôle que les conclusions de fait. Selon le juge Cameron, cette règle générale souffre une exception, qui s'applique dans les cas où, bien que le juge du procès ait retenu le bon critère juridique applicable, il omet d'en appliquer un élément aux faits de l'affaire dont il est saisi. Au soutien de cette affirmation, le juge Cameron a cité, au par. 41, les propos suivants du juge Iacobucci dans l'arrêt Canada (Directeur des enquêtes et recherches) c. Southam Inc., [1997] 1 R.C.S. 748, par. 39 :

> [Si] un décideur dit que, en vertu du critère applicable, il lui faut tenir compte de A, B, C et D, mais que, dans les faits, il ne prend en considération que A, B et C, alors le résultat est le même que s'il avait appliqué une règle de droit lui dictant de ne tenir compte que de A, B et C. Si le bon critère lui commandait de tenir compte aussi de D, il a en fait appliqué la mauvaise règle de droit et commis, de ce fait, une erreur de droit.

Relativement au droit applicable en l'espèce, le juge Cameron a reconnu que la norme de diligence énoncée dans la Loi et dans la jurisprudence portant sur l'interprétation de cette loi exige des municipalités qu'elles installent des panneaux de mise en garde pour signaler les dangers que les conducteurs prudents et prenant des précautions normales ne pourraient vraisemblablement pas mesurer. Se fondant sur la jurisprudence, le juge Cameron a établi, au par. 50, un cadre analytique permettant de déterminer si une municipalité a manqué à son obligation à cet égard. Suivant ce cadre, le juge doit examiner les aspects suivants :

> 1. Le juge doit déterminer la nature et l'état du chemin au moment de l'accident. Il s'agit, bien sûr, d'une question de fait, qui nécessite une appréciation des caractéristiques physiques du chemin à l'endroit où l'accident s'est produit, ainsi que de tous les facteurs se rapportant à la norme d'entretien, à savoir l'emplacement du chemin, le type de chemin dont il s'agit, les utilisations habituelles de celui-ci, et ainsi de suite.
> 2. Il soit se demander si les personnes qui devaient emprunter le chemin pouvaient généralement, en prenant des précautions normales, y circuler en sécurité. Il s'agit essentiellement du critère de la reasonable driver on that particular road would have conducted himself or herself. It is necessary in taking this step to take account of the various elements noted in the authorities referred to earlier, namely the locality of the road, the character and class of the road, the standard to which the municipality could reasonably have been expected to maintain the road, and so forth. These criteria fall to be balanced in the context of the question: how would a reasonable driver have driven upon this particular road? Since this entails the application of a legal standard to a given set of facts, it constitutes a question of mixed fact and law.

3. To determine either tha[t] the road was in a reasonable state of repair or that it was not, depending upon the assessment made while using the second step. If it is determined that the road was not in a reasonable state of repair, then it becomes necessary to go on to determine whether the municipality knew or should have known of the state of disrepair before imputing liability.

According to Cameron J.A., the trial judge did not err in law by failing to set out the proper legal test. She did, however, make an error in law of the type identified by Iacobucci J. in Southam, supra. In his view, when applying the law to the facts of the case, the trial judge failed to assess the manner in which a reasonable driver, exercising ordinary care, would ordinarily have driven on the road, and the risk, if any, that the unmarked curve might have posed for the ordinary driver. As noted by Cameron J.A., the trial judge "twice alluded to the matter, but failed to come to grips with it" (para. 57).

Cameron J.A. also found that the trial judge had made a "palpable and overriding" error of fact in determining that the respondent had breached the standard of care. According to Cameron J.A., the trial judge's factual error stemmed from her reliance on the expert testimony of Mr. Werner and Mr. Anderson. Cameron J.A. found that the evidence of both experts was based on the fundamental premise personne raisonnable, qui sert à déterminer comment se serait comporté un conducteur raisonnable sur ce chemin en particulier. À cette étape, il faut tenir compte des nombreux facteurs énoncés dans la jurisprudence mentionnée précédemment, c'est-à-dire l'emplacement du chemin, la nature et le type du chemin, la norme d'entretien à laquelle on pouvait raisonnablement s'attendre d'une municipalité, et ainsi de suite. Ces facteurs doivent être soupesés dans le contexte de la question suivante : Comment un conducteur raisonnable aurait-il conduit son véhicule sur ce chemin en particulier? Puisque cette question suppose l'application d'une norme juridique à un ensemble donné de faits, elle constitue une question mixte de fait et de droit.

3. Il doit déterminer si le chemin était dans un état raisonnable d'entretien, compte tenu des conclusions tirées à la deuxième étape. S'il est établi que le chemin ne se trouvait pas dans un état raisonnable d'entretien, il faut alors déterminer si la municipalité connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le mauvais état d'entretien avant de conclure à la responsabilité de celle-ci.

96 Selon le juge Cameron, la juge de première instance n'a pas commis d'erreur de droit en ce qui concerne le critère juridique applicable. Elle a cependant commis une erreur de droit du genre de celle exposée par le juge Iacobucci dans l'arrêt Southam, précité. À son avis, lorsqu'elle a appliqué le droit aux faits de l'espèce, la juge de première instance a omis, d'une part, de se demander comment un conducteur raisonnable, faisant montre de prudence normale, aurait conduit son véhicule sur ce chemin, et, d'autre part, d'évaluer le risque, s'il en est, que le virage non annoncé aurait pu constituer pour le conducteur moyen. Comme l'a souligné le juge Cameron de la Cour d'appel, la juge de première instance [TRADUCTION] « a évoqué la question à deux reprises, mais elle ne l'a pas abordée » (par. 57).

97 Le juge Cameron a également estimé que la juge de première instance avait commis une erreur de fait « manifeste et dominante » en concluant que l'intimée n'avait pas exercé le degré de diligence requis. Selon le juge Cameron, cette erreur de fait découlait de l'importance accordée par la juge Wright aux témoignages d'experts de MM. Werner et Anderson. À son avis, les témoignages de ces deux experts that the ordinary driver could be expected to travel the road at a speed of 80 km/h. In his view, this premise was misconceived and unsupported by the evidence.

98 Cameron J.A. concluded that although the trial judge was free to accept the evidence of some witnesses over others, she was not free to accept expert testimony that was based on an erroneous factual premise. According to Cameron J.A., had the trial judge found that a prudent driver, exercising ordinary care for his or her safety, would not ordinarily have driven this section of Snake Hill Road at a speed greater than 60 km/h, then she would have had to conclude that no hidden hazard existed since the curve could be negotiated safely at this speed.

99 Cameron J.A. agreed with the trial judge that a common law duty of care was not applicable in this case. His remarks in this respect are found at para. 44 of his reasons:

> Concerning the duty of care, it might be noted that unlike statutory provisions empowering municipalities to maintain roads, but imposing no duty upon them to do so, the duty in this instance owes its existence to a statute, rather than the neighbourhood principle of the common law: Just v. British Columbia, [1989] 2 S.C.R. 1228 (S.C.C.). The duty is readily seen to extend to all who travel upon the roads.

V. Issues

100 A. Did the Court of Appeal properly interfere with the trial judge's finding that the respondent was in breach of its statutory duty of care?

B. Did the trial judge err in finding the respondent knew or should have known of the alleged danger?

C. Did the trial judge err in finding that the accident was caused in part by the respondent's negligence?

reposaient sur la prémisse fondamentale qu'on pouvait s'attendre à ce que le conducteur moyen circule sur le chemin à une vitesse de 80 km/h. Selon lui, cette prémisse était erronée et n'était pas étayée par la preuve.

Le juge Cameron a conclu que, bien qu'il fût loisible à la juge de première instance d'accorder davantage foi à certains témoignages qu'à d'autres, il ne lui était pas loisible de retenir un témoignage d'expert fondé sur une prémisse factuelle erronée. Selon lui, si la juge de première instance avait estimé qu'un conducteur prudent prenant des précautions normales pour assurer sa sécurité n'aurait généralement pas roulé sur cette portion du chemin Snake Hill à plus de 60 km/h, alors elle aurait dû conclure à l'absence de danger caché puisque le virage pouvait être pris en sécurité à cette vitesse.

Le juge Cameron a souscrit à l'opinion de la juge de première instance que l'obligation de diligence de common law ne s'appliquait pas en l'espèce. Il a fait les commentaires suivants à ce sujet, au par. 44 de ses motifs :

V. Les questions en litige

A. La Cour d'appel a-t-elle eu raison de modifier la conclusion de la juge de première instance portant que l'intimée avait manqué à son obligation légale de diligence?

B. La juge de première instance a-t-elle commis une erreur en concluant que l'intimée connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le danger allégué?

C. La juge de première instance a-t-elle commis une erreur en concluant que l'accident a été en partie causé par la négligence de l'intimée?

D. Does a common law duty of care coexist alongside the statutory duty of care?

VI. Analysis

A. Did the Court of Appeal Properly Interfere with the Decision at Trial?

(1) The Standard of Review

Although the distinctions are not always clear, the issues that confront a trial court fall generally into three categories: questions of law, questions of fact, and questions of mixed law and fact. Put briefly, questions of law are questions about what the correct legal test is; questions of fact are questions about what actually took place between the parties; and questions of mixed law and fact are questions about whether the facts satisfy the legal tests (Southam, supra, at para. 35).

Of the three categories above, the highest degree of deference is accorded to the trial judge's findings of fact. The Court will not overturn a factual finding unless it is palpably and overridingly, or clearly wrong (Southam, supra, at para. 60; Stein v. The Ship "Kathy K", [1976] 2 S.C.R. 802, at p. 808; Toneguzzo-Norvell (Guardian ad litem of) v. Burnaby Hospital, [1994] 1 S.C.R. 114, at p. 121). This deference is principally grounded in the recognition that only the trial judge enjoys the opportunity to observe witnesses and to hear testimony first-hand, and is therefore better able to choose between competing versions of events (Schwartz v. Canada, [1996] 1 S.C.R. 254, at para. 32). It is however important to recognize that the making of a factual finding often involves more than merely determining the who, what, where and when of the case. The trial judge is very often called upon to draw inferences from the facts that are put before the court. For example, in this case, the trial judge inferred from the fact of accidents having occurred on Snake Hill Road

VI. L'analyse

A. La Cour d'appel a-t-elle eu raison de modifier la décision de la juge de première instance?

(1) La norme de contrôle

102 De ces trois catégories, ce sont les conclusions de fait du juge de première instance qui commandent le degré le plus élevé de retenue. La Cour ne modifie les conclusions de fait du juge de première instance que si celui-ci a commis une erreur manifeste ou dominante ou si la conclusion est manifestement erronée (Southam, précité, par. 60; Stein c. Le navire « Kathy K », [1976] 2 R.C.S. 802, p. 808; Toneguzzo-Norvell (Tutrice à l'instance de) c. Burnaby Hospital, [1994] 1 R.C.S. 114, p. 121). Cette retenue repose principalement sur le fait que, puisqu'il est le seul à avoir l'occasion d'observer les témoins et d'entendre les témoignages de vive voix, le juge de première instance est en conséquence plus à même de choisir entre deux versions divergentes d'un même événement (Schwartz c. Canada, [1996] 1 R.C.S. 254, par. 32). Cependant, il est important de reconnaître que tirer une conclusion de fait implique souvent davantage que le simple fait de déterminer qui a fait quoi, ainsi que où et quand il l'a fait. Le juge de première instance est très souvent appelé à faire des inférences à partir des faits qui lui sont that the respondent knew or should have known of the hidden danger.

103 This Court has determined that a trial judge's inferences of fact should be accorded a similar degree of deference as findings of fact (Geffen v. Goodman Estate, [1991] 2 S.C.R. 353). In reviewing the making of an inference, the appeal court will verify whether it can reasonably be supported by the findings of fact that the trial judge reached and whether the judge proceeded on proper legal principles. I respectfully disagree with the majority's view that inferences can be rejected only where the inference-drawing process itself is deficient: see Toronto (City) Board of Education v. O.S.S.T.F., District 15, [1997] 1 S.C.R. 487, at para. 45:

> When a court is reviewing a tribunal's findings of fact or the inferences made on the basis of the evidence, it can only intervene "where the evidence, viewed reasonably, is incapable of supporting a tribunal's findings of fact": Lester (W. W.) (1978) Ltd. v. United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry, Local 740, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 644, at p. 669 per McLachlin J.

An inference can be clearly wrong where the factual basis upon which it relies is deficient or where the legal standard to which the facts are applied is misconstrued. My colleagues recognize themselves that a judge is often called upon to make inferences of mixed law and fact (para. 26). While the standard of review is identical for both findings of fact and inferences of fact, it is nonetheless important to draw an analytical distinction between the two. If the reviewing court were to review only for errors of fact, then the decision of the trial judge would necessarily be upheld in every case where evidence existed to support his or her factual findings. In my view, this Court is entitled to conclude that inferences made by the trial judge were clearly wrong, just as it is entitled to reach this conclusion in respect to findings of fact.

présentés. En l'espèce, par exemple, la juge de première instance a inféré du fait que des accidents s'étaient produits sur le chemin Snake Hill que l'intimée connaissait ou aurait dû connaître l'existence du danger caché.

Notre Cour a jugé qu'il fallait appliquer aux inférences de fait du juge de première instance le même degré de retenue qu'à ses conclusions de fait (Geffen c. Succession Goodman, [1991] 2 R.C.S. 353). La cour d'appel qui contrôle la validité d'une inférence se demande si celle-ci peut raisonnablement être étayée par les conclusions de fait tirées par le juge de première instance et si celui-ci a appliqué les principes juridiques appropriés. En toute déférence, je ne partage pas l'opinion de la majorité selon laquelle des inférences ne peuvent être rejetées que dans les cas où le processus qui les a produites est lui-même déficient : voir Conseil de l'éducation de Toronto (Cité) c. F.E.E.E.S.O., district 15, [1997] 1 R.C.S. 487, par. 45 :

> Lorsqu'une cour de justice contrôle les conclusions de fait d'un tribunal administratif ou les inférences qu'il a tirées de la preuve, elle ne peut intervenir que « lorsque les éléments de preuve, perçus de façon raisonnable, ne peuvent étayer les conclusions de fait du tribunal » : Lester (W.W.) (1978) Ltd. c. Association unie des compagnons et apprentis de l'industrie de la plomberie et de la tuyauterie, section locale 740, [1990] 3 R.C.S. 644, à la p. 669, le juge McLachlin.

Une inférence peut être manifestement erronée si ses assises factuelles présentent des lacunes ou si la norme juridique appliquée aux faits est mal interprétée. Mes collègues eux-mêmes reconnaissent qu'un juge est souvent appelé à tirer des inférences mixtes de fait et droit (par. 26). Bien que la norme de contrôle soit la même et pour les conclusions de fait et pour les inférences de fait, il importe néanmoins de faire une distinction analytique entre les deux. Si le tribunal de révision ne faisait que vérifier s'il y a des erreurs de fait, la décision du juge de première instance serait alors nécessairement confirmée dans tous les cas où il existe des éléments de preuve étayant les conclusions de fait de ce dernier. Selon moi, notre Cour a le droit de conclure que les inférences du juge de première instance étaient manifestement erronées, tout comme elle peut le faire à l'égard des conclusions de fait.

My colleagues take issue with the above statement that an appellate court will verify whether the making of an inference can reasonably be supported by the trial judge's findings of fact, a standard which they believe to be less strict than the "palpable and overriding" standard. I do not agree that a less strict standard is implied. In my view there is no difference between concluding that it was "unreasonable" or "palpably wrong" for a trial judge to draw an inference from the facts as found by him or her and concluding that the inference was not reasonably supported by those facts. The distinction is merely semantic.

By contrast, an appellate court reviews a trial judge's findings on questions of law not merely to determine if they are reasonable, but rather to determine if they are correct; Moge v. Moge, [1992] 3 S.C.R. 813, at p. 833; R. v. Nova Scotia Pharmaceutical Society, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 606, at p. 647; R. P. Kerans, Standards of Review Employed by Appellate Courts (1994), at p. 90. The role of correcting errors of law is a primary function of the appellate court; therefore, that court can and should review the legal determinations of the lower courts for correctness.

105 En revanche, une cour d'appel ne contrôle pas les conclusions tirées par le juge de première instance à l'égard des questions de droit simplement pour déterminer si elles sont raisonnables, mais plutôt pour déterminer si elles sont correctes : Moge c. Moge, [1992] 3 R.C.S. 813, p. 833; R. c. Nova Scotia Pharmaceutical Society, [1992] 2 R.C.S. 606, p. 647; R. P. Kerans, Standards of Review Employed by Appellate Courts (1994), p. 90. Un des rôles principaux d'une cour d'appel consiste à corriger les erreurs de droit et, par conséquent, cette cour peut et doit vérifier si les conclusions juridiques de la juridiction inférieure sont correctes.

In the law of negligence, the question of whether the conduct of the defendant has met the appropriate standard of care is necessarily a question of mixed fact and law. Once the facts have been established, the determination of whether or not the standard of care was met by the defendant will in most cases be reviewable on a standard of correctness since the trial judge must appreciate the facts within the context of the appropriate standard of care. In many cases, viewing the facts through the legal lens of the standard of care gives rise to a policy-making or law-setting function that is the purview of both the trial and appellate courts. As stated by Kerans, supra, at p. 103, "[t]he evaluation of facts as meeting or not meeting a legal test is a process that involves law-making. Moreover, it is probably correct to say that every new attempt to apply a legal rule to a set of facts involves some measure of interpretation of that rule, and thus more law-making" (emphasis in original).

107 In a negligence case, the trial judge is called on to decide whether the conduct of the defendant was reasonable under all the circumstances. While this determination involves questions of fact, it also requires the trial judge to assess what is reasonable. As stated above, in many cases, this will involve a policy-making or "law-setting" role which an appellate court is better situated to undertake (Kerans, supra, at pp. 5-10). For example, in this case, the degree of knowledge that the trial judge should have imputed to the reasonably prudent municipal councillor raised the policy consideration of the type of accident-reporting system that a small rural municipality with limited resources should be expected to maintain. This law-setting role was recognized by the United States Supreme Court in Bose Corp. v. Consumers Union of U.S., Inc., 466 U.S. 485 (1984), at note 17, within the context of an action for defamation:

> A finding of fact in some cases is inseparable from the principles through which it was deduced. At some point, the reasoning by which a fact is "found" crosses the line between application of those ordinary principles of logic and common experience which are ordinarily entrusted to the finder of fact into the realm of a legal rule upon which the reviewing court must exercise its own independent judgment. Where the line is drawn varies according to the nature of the substantive law at issue. Regarding certain largely factual questions in some areas of the law, the stakes — in terms of impact on future cases and future conduct — are too great to entrust them finally to the judgment of the trier of fact.

question de savoir si les faits satisfont ou non à un critère juridique donné est un processus qui implique une fonction créatrice de droit. Qui plus est, il est probablement exact d'affirmer que chaque nouvelle tentative d'appliquer une règle de droit à un ensemble de faits emporte une certaine interprétation de cette règle et, partant, l'élaboration de règles de droit additionnelles » (en italique dans l'original).

Dans une affaire de négligence, le juge de première instance est appelé à décider si la conduite du défendeur était raisonnable eu égard à toutes les circonstances. Bien que la prise de cette décision demande l'examen de questions de fait, elle exige également du juge de première instance qu'il établisse ce qui est raisonnable. Comme il a été mentionné plus tôt, dans bien des cas cette décision implique l'établissement de politiques d'intérêt général ou la « création de règles de droit », rôle qu'une cour d'appel est mieux placée pour remplir (Kerans, op. cit., p. 5 à 10). En l'espèce, par exemple, le degré de connaissance que la juge de première instance aurait dû prêter au conseiller municipal raisonnablement prudent soulevait une considération participant d'une politique d'intérêt général, savoir le genre de système d'information sur les accidents qu'une petite municipalité rurale aux ressources budgétaires limitées est censée tenir. Ce rôle créateur de droit a été reconnu par la Cour suprême des États-Unis dans l'arrêt Bose Corp. c. Consumers Union of U.S., Inc., 466 U.S. 485 (1984), à la note 17, dans le contexte d'une action en diffamation :

My colleagues assert that the question of whether or not the standard of care was met by the defendant in a negligence case is subject to a standard of palpable and overriding error unless it is clear that the trial judge made some extricable error in principle with respect to the characterization of the standard or its application, in which case the error may amount to an error of law (para. 36). I disagree. In many cases, it will not be possible to "extricate" a purely legal question from the standard of care analysis applicable to negligence, which is a question of mixed fact and law. In addition, while some questions of mixed fact and law may not have "any great precedential value" (Southam, supra, at para. 37), such questions often necessitate a normative analysis that should be reviewable by an appellate court.

Consider again the issue of whether the municipality knew or should have known of the alleged danger. As a matter of law, the trial judge must approach the question of whether knowledge should be imputed to the municipality having regard to the duties of the ordinary, reasonable and prudent municipal councillor. If the trial judge applies a different legal standard, such as the reasonable person standard, it is an error of law. Yet even if the trial judge correctly identifies the applicable legal standard, he or she may still err in the process of assessing the facts through the lens of that legal standard. For example, there may exist evidence that an accident had previously occurred on the portion of the road on which the relevant accident occurred. In the course of considering whether or not that fact satisfies the legal test for knowledge the trial judge must make a number of normative assumptions. The trial judge must consider whether the fact that one accident had previously occurred in the same location would alert the ordinary, reasonable and prudent municipal councillor to the existence of a hazard. The trial judge must also consider whether the ordinary, reasonable and prudent councillor would have been alerted to the previous accident by an accident-reporting system. In my view, the question of whether the fact of a previous accident having occurred fulfills the applicable knowledge requirement is a question of mixed fact and law and it is artificial to characterize it as anything else. As is apparent from the example given, the question may also raise normative issues which should be reviewable by an appellate court on the correctness standard.

109 Revenons maintenant à la question de savoir si la municipalité connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le danger allégué. Sur le plan juridique, le juge de première instance doit se demander s'il y a lieu de prêter cette connaissance à la municipalité eu égard aux obligations qui incombent au conseiller municipal moyen, raisonnable et prudent. Si le juge de première instance applique une autre norme juridique, par exemple celle de la personne raisonnable, il commet une erreur de droit. Cependant, même en supposant que le juge de première instance détermine correctement la norme juridique à appliquer, il lui est encore possible de commettre une erreur lorsqu'il apprécie les faits à la lumière de cette norme juridique. Par exemple, il peut exister une preuve indiquant qu'un accident s'était déjà produit sur le tronçon de chemin en cause. Le juge de première instance qui se demande si ce fait satisfait ou non au critère juridique applicable à la question de la connaissance doit poser un certain nombre d'hypothèses normatives. Il doit se demander si le fait qu'un accident se soit déjà produit au même endroit alerterait le conseiller municipal moyen, raisonnable et prudent de l'existence d'un danger. Il doit également se demander si ce conseiller aurait appris l'existence de l'accident antérieur par un système d'information sur les accidents. Selon moi, la question de savoir si le fait qu'un accident se soit produit antérieurement

110 I agree with my colleagues that it is not possible to state as a general proposition that all matters of mixed fact and law are reviewable according to the standard of correctness: citing Southam, supra, at para. 37 (para. 28). I disagree, however, that the dicta in Southam establishes that a trial judge's conclusions on questions of mixed fact and law in a negligence action should be accorded deference in every case. This Court in St-Jean v. Mercier, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 491, 2002 SCC 15, a medical negligence case, distinguished Southam on the issue of the standard applicable to questions of mixed fact and law where the tribunal has no particular expertise. Gonthier J., writing for a unanimous Court, stated at paras. 48-49:

> A question "about whether the facts satisfy the legal tests" is one of mixed law and fact. Stated differently, "whether the defendant satisfied the appropriate standard of care is a question of mixed law and fact" (Southam, at para. 35).
> Generally, such a question, once the facts have been established without overriding and palpable error, is to be reviewed on a standard of correctness since the standard of care is normative and is a question of law within the normal purview of both the trial and appellate courts. Such is the standard for medical negligence. There is no issue of expertise of a specialized tribunal in a particular field which may go to the determination of facts and be pertinent to defining an appropriate standard and thereby call for some measure of deference by a court of general appeal (Southam, supra, at para. 45; and Nova Scotia Pharmaceutical Society, supra, at p. 647).

111 I also disagree with my colleagues that Jaegli Enterprises Ltd. v. Taylor, [1981] 2 S.C.R. 2, is authority for the proposition that when the question satisfait à l'exigence de connaissance applicable est une question mixte de fait et de droit, et il serait artificiel de la qualifier autrement. Comme l'indique clairement l'exemple qui précède, cette question peut également soulever des questions normatives que devrait pouvoir contrôler une cour d'appel selon la norme de la décision correcte.

Je partage l'opinion de mes collègues selon laquelle on ne peut poser comme principe général que toutes les questions mixtes de fait et de droit sont assujetties à la norme de la décision correcte : citant Southam, précité, par. 37 (par. 28). Cependant, je ne crois pas que l'opinion formulée dans Southam signifie que, dans une affaire de négligence, les conclusions du juge de première instance sur des questions mixtes de fait et de droit commandent systématiquement une attitude empreinte de retenue. Dans l'arrêt St-Jean c. Mercier, [2002] 1 R.C.S. 491, 2002 CSC 15, affaire de négligence médicale, notre Cour a différencié cette affaire de l'arrêt Southam sur la question de la norme de contrôle applicable aux questions mixtes de fait et de droit dans les cas où le tribunal ne possède d'expertise particulière. Exposant la décision unanime de la Cour, le juge Gonthier a dit ceci, aux par. 48 et 49 :

Je ne peux non plus me ranger à l'avis de mes collègues selon lequel l'arrêt Jaegli Enterprises Ltd. c. Taylor, [1981] 2 R.C.S. 2, permet d'affirmer of mixed fact and law at issue is a finding of negligence, that finding should be deferred to by appellate courts. In that case the trial judge found that the conduct of the defendant ski instructor met the standard of care expected of him. Moreover, the trial judge found that the accident would have occurred regardless of what the ski instructor had done (Taylor v. The Queen in Right of British Columbia (1978), 95 D.L.R. (3d) 82). Seaton J.A. of the British Columbia Court of Appeal disagreed with the trial judge that the ski instructor had met the applicable standard of care (Taylor (Guardian ad litem of) v. British Columbia (1980), 112 D.L.R. (3d) 297). Seaton J.A. recognized nevertheless that the "final question" was whether "the instructor's failure to remain was a cause of the accident" (p. 307). On the issue of causation, a question of fact, Seaton J.A. clearly substituted his opinion for that of the trial judge's without regard to the appropriate standard of review. His concluding remarks on the issue of causation at p. 308 highlight his lack of deference to the trial judge's conclusion on causation:

> On balance, I think that the evidence supports the plaintiffs' claim against the instructor, that his conduct in leaving the plaintiff below the crest was one of the causes of the accident.

This Court, which restored the finding of the trial judge, did not clearly state whether it did so on the basis that the appellate court was wrong to interfere with the trial judge's finding of negligence or whether it did so because the appellate court wrongly interfered with the trial judge's conclusions on causation. The reasons suggest the latter. The only portion of the trial judgment that this Court referred to was the finding on causation. Dickson J. (as he then was) remarks in Jaegli Enterprises, supra, at p. 4:

> At the end of a nine-day trial Mr. Justice Meredith, the presiding judge, delivered a judgment in which he que, lorsque la question mixte de fait et de droit en litige est la conclusion de négligence tirée par le juge de première instance, les cours d'appel doivent faire preuve de retenue à l'égard de cette conclusion. Dans cette affaire, le juge de première instance avait conclu que le défendeur, un instructeur de ski, avait respecté la norme de diligence à laquelle il était tenu. Il avait aussi conclu que l'accident serait survenu, indépendamment de la conduite de l'instructeur de ski (Taylor c. The Queen in Right of British Columbia (1978), 95 D.L.R. (3d) 82). Le juge Seaton de la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique a exprimé son désaccord avec la conclusion du juge de première instance que l'instructeur de ski avait respecté la norme de diligence applicable (Taylor (Guardian ad litem of) c. British Columbia (1980), 112 D.L.R. (3d) 297). Il a néanmoins reconnu que [TRADUCTION] « l'ultime question » consistait à se demander si « l'omission de l'instructeur de rester près de la demanderesse avait été une cause de l'accident » (p. 307). Sur la question du lien de causalité, qui est une question de fait, le juge Seaton a clairement substitué son opinion à celle du juge de première instance sans tenir compte de la norme de contrôle appropriée. Ses remarques finales sur la question de la causalité, à la p. 308, font ressortir son absence de retenue à l'égard de la conclusion du juge de première instance sur ce point :

112 En rétablissant la décision du juge de première instance, notre Cour n'a pas précisé si elle le faisait parce que la cour d'appel avait eu tort de modifier la conclusion de ce dernier sur la négligence ou parce qu'elle avait erronément modifié ses conclusions sur la causalité. Les motifs donnent à penser que la dernière proposition est la bonne. La seule partie du jugement de première instance mentionnée par notre Cour se rapporte à la conclusion sur le lien de causalité. Le juge Dickson (plus tard Juge en chef) a fait les remarques suivantes dans l'arrêt Jaegli Enterprises, précité, à la p. 4 :

> À la fin d'un procès de neuf jours, le juge Meredith, qui a présidé le procès, a rendu un jugement dans lequel il a very carefully considered all of the evidence and concluded that the accident had been caused solely by Larry LaCasse and that the plaintiffs should recover damages, in an amount to be assessed, against LaCasse. The claims against Paul Ankenman, Jaegli Enterprises Limited and the other defendants were dismissed with costs.

113 The Court went on to cite a number of cases, some of which did not involve negligence (see Schreiber Brothers Ltd. v. Currie Products Ltd., [1980] 2 S.C.R. 78), for the general proposition that "it [is] wrong for an appellate court to set aside a trial judgment where [there is not palpable and overriding error, and] the only point at issue [was] the interpretation of the evidence as a whole" (p. 84). Given that the Court focussed on the issue of causation, a question of fact alone, I do not think that Jaegli Enterprises establishes that a finding of negligence by the trial judge should be deferred to by appellate courts. In my view, the Court in Jaegli Enterprises merely affirmed the longstanding principle that an appellate court should not interfere with a trial judge's finding of fact absent a palpable and overriding error.

(2) Error of Law in the Reasons of the Court of Queen's Bench

114 The standard of care set out in s. 192 of The Rural Municipality Act, 1989, as interpreted within the jurisprudence, required the trial judge to examine whether the portion of Snake Hill Road on which the accident occurred posed a hazard to the reasonable driver exercising ordinary care. Having identified the correct legal test, the trial judge nonetheless failed to ask herself whether a reasonable driver exercising ordinary care would have been able to safely drive the portion of the road on which the accident occurred. To neglect entirely one branch of a legal test when applying the facts to the test is to misconstrue the law (Southam, supra, at para. 39). The Saskatchewan Court of Appeal was therefore right to characterize this failure as an error of law and to consider the factual findings made by the trial judge in light of the appropriate legal test.

examiné soigneusement toute la preuve et a conclu que l'accident était imputable uniquement à Larry LaCasse et que les demandeurs pouvaient recouvrer de LaCasse des dommages-intérêts pour un montant à déterminer. Les réclamations contre Paul Ankenman, Jaegli Enterprises Limited et les autres défendeurs ont été rejetées avec dépens.

La Cour a ensuite cité quelques décisions, dont certaines ne traitent pas de négligence (voir Schreiber Brothers Ltd. c. Currie Products Ltd., [1980] 2 R.C.S. 78), au soutien de la proposition générale qu'« une cour d'appel ne peut à bon droit infirmer une décision de première instance lorsque la seule question en litige porte sur l'interprétation de l'ensemble de la preuve » (p. 84). Étant donné que la Cour s'est attachée à la question du lien de causalité, question de fait seulement, je ne crois pas que l'arrêt Jaegli Enterprises établisse que les cours d'appel doivent faire montre de retenue lorsque le juge de première instance conclut à la négligence. À mon avis, dans l'arrêt Jaegli Enterprises, la Cour n'a fait que confirmer le principe bien établi portant qu'une cour d'appel ne doit pas modifier une conclusion de fait du juge de première instance en l'absence d'erreur manifeste et dominante.

Suivant la norme de diligence énoncée à l'art. 192 de la Rural Municipality Act, 1989, telle qu'elle a été interprétée dans la jurisprudence, la juge de première instance devait se demander si le tronçon du chemin Snake Hill sur lequel s'est produit l'accident constituait un danger pour le conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales. Après avoir déterminé quel était le critère juridique applicable, la juge de première instance a toutefois omis de se demander si un tel conducteur aurait pu rouler en sécurité sur le tronçon en question. Le fait d'omettre entièrement une étape d'un critère juridique, dans l'application de celui-ci aux faits de l'espèce, équivaut à mal interpréter le droit (Southam, précité, par. 39). Par conséquent, la Cour d'appel de la Saskatchewan a donc eu raison de qualifier cette omission d'erreur de droit et de contrôler les conclusions de fait tirées par la juge de première instance à la lumière du critère juridique approprié.

The long line of jurisprudence interpreting s. 192 of The Rural Municipality Act, 1989 and its predecessor provisions clearly establishes that the duty of the municipality is to keep the road "in such a reasonable state of repair that those requiring to use it may, exercising ordinary care, travel upon it with safety" (Partridge, supra, at p. 558; Levey v. Rural Municipality of Rodgers, No. 133, [1921] 3 W.W.R. 764 (Sask. C.A.), at p. 766; Diebel Estate v. Pinto Creek No. 75 (Rural Municipality) (1996), 149 Sask. R. 68 (Q.B.), at pp. 71-72). Legislation in several other provinces establishes a similar duty of care and courts in these provinces have interpreted it in a similar fashion (R. v. Jennings, [1966] S.C.R. 532, at p. 537; County of Parkland No. 31 v. Stetar, [1975] 2 S.C.R. 884, at p. 892; Fafard v. City of Quebec (1917), 39 D.L.R. 717 (S.C.C.), at p. 718). This Court, in Jennings, supra, interpreting a similar provision under the Ontario Highway Improvement Act, R.S.O. 1960, c. 171, remarked at p. 537 that: "[i]t has been repeatedly held in Ontario that where a duty to keep a highway in repair is imposed by statute the body upon which it is imposed must keep the highway in such a condition that travellers using it with ordinary care may do so with safety".

115 La jurisprudence de longue date portant sur l'interprétation de l'art. 192 de la Rural Municipality Act, 1989 et des dispositions qu'il a remplacées établit clairement que les municipalités ont l'obligation de tenir les chemins [TRADUCTION] « dans un état raisonnable d'entretien de façon que ceux qui doivent l[es] emprunter puissent, en prenant des précautions normales, y circuler en sécurité » (Partridge, précité, p. 558; Levey c. Rural Municipality of Rodgers, No. 133, [1921] 3 W.W.R. 764 (C.A. Sask.), p. 766; Diebel Estate c. Pinto Creek No. 75 (Rural Municipality) (1996), 149 Sask. R. 68 (B.R.), p. 71 et 72). Plusieurs autres provinces ont adopté des lois établissant une obligation de diligence semblable, et les tribunaux de ces provinces ont interprété cette obligation de la même façon (R. c. Jennings, [1966] R.C.S. 532, p. 537; Comté de Parkland nº 31 c. Stetar, [1975] 2 R.C.S. 884, p. 892; Fafard c. City of Quebec (1917), 39 D.L.R. 717 (C.S.C.), p. 718). Interprétant une disposition similaire de la Highway Improvement Act de l'Ontario, R.S.O. 1960, ch. 171, notre Cour a indiqué, dans l'arrêt Jennings, précité, p. 537, qu'[TRADUCTION] « [i]l a été décidé à maintes reprises en Ontario que, lorsque l'obligation de maintenir une route en bon état d'entretien est légalement imposée à un organisme, celui-ci doit maintenir la route dans un état permettant à ceux qui l'empruntent en prenant des précautions normales d'y circuler en sécurité ».

There is good reason for limiting the municipality's duty to repair to a standard which permits drivers exercising ordinary care to proceed with safety. As stated by this Court in Fafard, supra, at p. 718: "[a] municipal corporation is not an insurer of travellers using its streets; its duty is to use reasonable care to keep its streets in a reasonably safe condition for ordinary travel by persons exercising ordinary care for their own safety". Correspondingly, appellate courts have long held that it is an error for the trial judge to find a municipality in breach of its duty merely because a danger exists, regardless of whether or not that danger poses a risk to the ordinary user of the road. The type of error to be guarded against was described by Wetmore C.J. in Williams v.

> The question in an action of this sort, whether or not the road is kept in such repair that those requiring to use it may, using ordinary care, pass to and fro upon it in safety, is, it seems to me, largely one of fact . . . I would hesitate about setting aside a finding of fact of the trial Judge if he had found the facts necessary for the determination of the case, but he did not so find. He found that the crossing was a "dangerous spot without a light, and that if the utmost care were used no accident might occur, but it was not in such proper or safe state as to render such accident unlikely to occur." He did not consider the question from the standpoint of whether or not those requiring to use the road might, using ordinary care, pass to and fro upon it in safety. The mere fact of the crossing being dangerous is not sufficient . . . . [Emphasis added.]

117 From the jurisprudence cited above, it is clear that the mere existence of a hazard or danger does not in and of itself give rise to a duty on the part of the municipality to erect a sign. Even if a trial judge concludes on the facts that the conditions of the road do, in fact, present a hazard, he or she must still go on to assess whether that hazard would present a risk to the reasonable driver exercising ordinary care. The ordinary driver is often faced with inherently dangerous driving conditions. Motorists drive in icy or wet conditions. They drive at night on country roads that are not well lit. They are faced with obstacles such as snow ridges and potholes. These obstacles are often not in plain view, but are obscured or "hidden". Common sense dictates that motorists will, however, exercise a degree of caution when faced with dangerous driving conditions. A municipality is expected to provide extra cautionary measures only where the conditions of the road and the surrounding circumstances do not signal to the driver the possibility that a hazard is present. For example, the ordinary driver expects a dirt road to become slippery when wet. By contrast, paved manque à son obligation du seul fait qu'un danger existe, indépendamment de la question de savoir si ce danger présente ou non un risque pour l'usager ordinaire du chemin. Le genre d'erreur qu'il faut éviter a été décrit ainsi par le juge en chef Wetmore dans l'affaire Williams c. Town of North Battleford (1911), 4 Sask. L.R. 75 (in banco), p. 81 :

Il ressort clairement de la jurisprudence susmentionnée que la simple existence d'un risque ou danger ne fait pas en soi naître pour la municipalité l'obligation d'installer un panneau de signalisation. Même si, à partir des faits, le juge de première instance arrive à la conclusion que l'état du chemin crée effectivement un risque, il doit poursuivre son analyse et se demander si ce risque présente un danger pour le conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales. Le conducteur moyen rencontre souvent des conditions de conduite intrinsèquement dangereuses. Les automobilistes conduisent leur véhicule sur des chaussées glacées ou humides. Ils roulent la nuit sur des chemins de campagne mal éclairés. Ils rencontrent des obstacles comme des bancs de neige et des nids-de-poule. Souvent ces obstacles ne sont pas visibles, car ils sont dissimulés ou « cachés ». Le bon sens suggère que les automobilistes font toutefois preuve d'une certaine prudence en présence de conditions de conduite dangereuses. On n'attend de la municipalité qu'elle prenne des mesures d'avertissement supplémentaires que lorsque l'état du chemin et l'ensemble des bridge decks on highways are often slick, though they appear completely dry. Consequently, signs will be posted to alert drivers to this unapparent possibility.

autres circonstances ne signalent pas au conducteur la possibilité qu'un danger existe. Par exemple, le conducteur moyen s'attend à ce qu'un chemin de terre devienne glissant lorsqu'il est mouillé. À l'opposé, les tabliers de pont asphaltés qui se trouvent sur les routes sont souvent glissants, bien qu'ils paraissent complètement secs. Par conséquent, des panneaux sont installés pour alerter les conducteurs de cette possibilité non apparente.

The appellant in this case argued, at para. 27 of his factum, that the trial judge did, in fact, assess whether a reasonable driver using ordinary care would find the portion of Snake Hill Road on which the accident occurred to pose a risk. He points in particular to the trial judge's comments at paras. 85-86 that:

> There is a portion of Snake Hill Road that is a hazard to the public. In this regard I accept the evidence of Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner. Further, it is a hazard that is not readily apparent to users of the road. It is a hidden hazard. . . .
> . . . where the existence of . . . bush obstructs the ability of a motorist to be forewarned of a hazard such as that on Snake Hill Road, it is reasonable to expect the R.M. to erect and maintain a warning or regulatory sign so that a motorist, using ordinary care, may be forewarned, adjust speed and take corrective action in advance of entering a dangerous situation. [Emphasis added.]

118 En l'espèce, l'appelant a plaidé, au par. 27 de son mémoire, que la juge de première instance s'était, en fait, demandé si un conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales considérerait que le tronçon du chemin Snake Hill où s'est produit l'accident constitue un risque. Il souligne en particulier les commentaires suivants de la juge de première instance, aux par. 85 et 86 :

The appellant's argument suggests that the trial judge discharged her duty to apply the facts to the law merely by restating the facts of the case in the language of the legal test. This was not, however, sufficient. Although it is clear from the citation above that the trial judge made a factual finding that the portion of Snake Hill Road on which the accident occurred presented drivers with a hidden hazard, there is nothing in this portion of her reasons to suggest that she considered whether or not that portion of the road would pose a risk to the reasonable driver exercising ordinary care. The finding that a hazard, or even that a hidden hazard, exists does not automatically give rise to the conclusion that the reasonable driver exercising ordinary care could not travel through it safely. A proper application of the test demands that the trial judge ask the question: "How would a reasonable driver have driven on this road?" Whether or not a hazard is "hidden" or a curve is "inherently" dangerous does not dispose of the question. My colleagues state that it was open to the trial judge to draw an inference of knowledge of the hazard simply because the sharp curve was a permanent feature of the road (para. 61). Here again, there is nothing in the reasons of the trial judge to suggest that she drew such an inference or to explain how such an inference accorded with the legal requirements concerning the duty of care.

120 Nor did the trial judge consider the question in any other part of her reasons. Her failure to do so becomes all the more apparent when her analysis (or lack thereof) is compared to that in cases in which the courts applied the appropriate method. The Court of Appeal referred to two such cases by way of example. In Nelson v. Waverley (Rural Municipality) (1988), 65 Sask. R. 260 (Q.B.), the plaintiff argued that the defendant municipality should have posted signs warning of a ridge in the middle of the road that resulted from the grading of the road by the municipality. The trial judge concluded that if the driver had exercised ordinary care, he could have travelled along the roadway with safety. Instead, he drove too fast and failed to keep an adequate lookout considering the maintenance that was being performed on the road. In Diebel Estate, supra, the issue was whether the municipality had a duty under s. 192 to post a sign warning motorists that a rural road ended abruptly in a T-intersection. The question of how a reasonable driver exercising ordinary care would have driven on that road was asked and answered by the trial judge in the following passage at p. 74:

His [the expert's] conclusions as to stopping are, however, mathematically arrived at and never having been on raisonnable prenant des précautions normales ne peut pas y circuler en sécurité. Pour bien appliquer le critère juridique, le juge de première instance doit se poser la question suivante : « Comment un conducteur raisonnable aurait-il roulé sur ce chemin? » Le fait de conclure qu'il existe ou non un danger « caché » ou qu'une courbe est quelque chose d' « intrinsèquement » dangereux ne vide pas la question. Mes collègues affirment que la juge de première instance pouvait inférer la connaissance du danger du seul fait que la courbe serrée constituait une caractéristique permanente du chemin (par. 61). Ici encore, rien dans les motifs de la juge de première instance n'indique qu'elle a tiré une telle inférence ou n'explique en quoi une telle inférence satisfaisait aux conditions juridiques relatives à l'obligation de diligence.

La juge de première instance n'a pas non plus examiné cette question ailleurs dans ses motifs. Son omission à cet égard devient encore plus évidente lorsqu'on compare son analyse (ou son absence d'analyse) à celle des affaires où les tribunaux ont appliqué la bonne démarche. La Cour d'appel a donné comme exemple deux de ces affaires. Dans Nelson c. Waverley (Rural Municipality) (1988), 65 Sask. R. 260 (B.R.), le demandeur prétendait que la municipalité défenderesse aurait dû installer des panneaux signalant la présence, au milieu du chemin, d'un sillon résultant de travaux municipaux de nivellement. Le juge de première instance a estimé que, si le conducteur avait pris des précautions normales, il aurait pu rouler en sécurité sur la chaussée. Au lieu de cela, il a roulé trop vite et manqué de vigilance compte tenu des travaux d'entretien qui étaient effectués sur le chemin. Dans Diebel Estate, précité, il s'agissait de déterminer si la municipalité avait, en vertu de l'art. 192, l'obligation d'installer un panneau avertissant les automobilistes qu'une route rurale se terminait de façon abrupte à un croisement en T. Le juge de première instance s'est demandé comment un conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales aurait roulé sur ce chemin, et il a répondu ainsi à cette question, à la p. 74 :

the road, from what was described in the course of the trial, I would think the intersection could be a danger at night to a complete stranger to the area, depending on one's reaction time and the possibility of being confused by what one saw rather than recognizing the T intersection to be just that. On the other hand I would think a complete stranger in the area would be absolutely reckless to drive down a dirt road of the nature of this particular road at night at 80 kilometres per hour. [Emphasis added; emphasis in original deleted.]

The conclusion that Wright J. erred in failing to apply a required aspect of the legal test does not automatically lead to a rejection of her factual findings. This Court's jurisdiction to review questions of law entitles it, where an error of law has been found, to take the factual findings of the trial judge as they are, and to assess these findings anew in the context of the appropriate legal test.

In my view, neither Wright J.'s factual findings nor any other evidence in the record that she might have considered had she asked the appropriate question, support the conclusion that the respondent was in breach of its duty. The portion of Snake Hill Road on which the accident occurred did not pose a risk to a reasonable driver exercising ordinary care because the conditions of Snake Hill Road in general and the conditions with which motorists were confronted at the exact location of the accident signalled to the reasonable motorist that caution was needed. Motorists who appropriately acknowledged the presence of the several factors which called for caution would have been able to navigate safely the so-called "hidden hazard" without the benefit of a road sign.

The question of how a reasonable driver exercising ordinary care would have driven on Snake Hill Road necessitates a consideration of the nature and locality of the road. A reasonable motorist will not approach a narrow gravel road in the country in the same way that he or she will approach a paved highway. It is reasonable to expect a motorist to drive more slowly and to pay greater attention to the potential presence of hazards when driving on a toutefois d'opérations mathématiques et bien que je n'aie jamais emprunté le chemin en question, d'après les descriptions faites au procès, je suis d'avis que le croisement pourrait constituer un danger la nuit pour quelqu'un qui ne connaît absolument pas l'endroit, eu égard à la vitesse de réaction de chacun et à la possibilité que quelqu'un confonde le croisement en T avec quelque chose d'autre. Par ailleurs, j'estime que quelqu'un ne connaissant aucunement l'endroit agirait de façon tout à fait téméraire en roulant à 80 kilomètres à l'heure la nuit sur un chemin de terre comme celui qui nous intéresse. [Je souligne; soulignement dans l'original omis.]

122 Selon moi, ni les faits retenus par la juge Wright ni aucun autre élément de preuve au dossier qu'elle aurait pu prendre en considération si elle s'était posé la bonne question n'appuient sa conclusion que l'intimée a manqué à son obligation. La portion du chemin Snake Hill où s'est produit l'accident ne présentait pas de risque pour un conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales, car l'état de ce chemin en général et les conditions auxquelles les automobilistes doivent faire face à l'endroit précis de l'accident avertissent l'automobiliste raisonnable que la prudence s'impose. Les automobilistes sachant reconnaître les divers facteurs qui appellent à la prudence auraient pu franchir le soi-disant [TRADUCTION] « danger caché » sans l'aide d'un panneau de signalisation.

123 Pour savoir comment un conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales aurait conduit son véhicule sur le chemin Snake Hill, il faut tenir compte de la nature du chemin et de la configuration des lieux. Un automobiliste raisonnable ne roulera pas sur une étroite route de campagne gravelée de la même façon que sur une route asphaltée. Il est raisonnable de s'attendre à ce qu'un automobiliste conduise moins vite et soit plus attentif à la présence road that is of a lower standard, particularly when he or she is unfamiliar with it.

124 While the trial judge in this case made some comments regarding the nature of the road, I agree with the Court of Appeal's findings that "[s]he might have addressed the matter more fully, taking into account more broadly the terrain through which the road passed, the class and designation of the road in the scheme of classification, and so on . . . " (para. 55). Instead, the extent of her analysis of the road was limited to the following comments, found at para. 84 of her reasons:

> Snake Hill Road is a low traffic road. It is however maintained by the R.M. so that it is passable year round. There are permanent residences on the road. It is used by farmers for access to their fields and cattle. Young people frequent Snake Hill Road for parties and as such the road is used by those who may not have the same degree of familiarity with it as do residents.

125 In my view, the question of how the reasonable driver would have negotiated Snake Hill Road necessitated a somewhat more in-depth analysis of the character of the road. The trial judge's analysis focussed almost entirely on the use of the road, without considering the sort of conditions it presented to drivers. It is perhaps not surprising that the trial judge did not engage in this fuller analysis, given that she did not turn her mind to the question of how a reasonable driver would have approached the road. Had she considered this question, she likely would have engaged in the type of assessment that was made by the Court of Appeal at para. 13 of its judgment:

> The road, about 20 feet in width, was classed as "a bladed trail," sometimes referred to as "a land access road," a classification just above that of "prairie trail". As such, it was not built up, nor gravelled, except lightly at one end of it, but simply bladed across the terrain following the path of least resistance. Nor was it in any way signed.

de dangers potentiels sur un chemin de catégorie inférieure, particulièrement s'il n'est pas familier avec celui-ci.

Bien que, en l'espèce, la juge de première instance ait fait certains commentaires sur la nature du chemin, je souscris à la conclusion de la Cour d'appel selon laquelle [TRADUCTION] « [e]lle aurait pu examiner la question de manière plus approfondie, en tenant davantage compte du type de terrain que le chemin traversait, de la nature et de la désignation du chemin selon le système de classification des routes et ainsi de suite . . . » (par. 55). Au lieu de cela, son analyse s'est limitée aux commentaires suivants, au par. 84 de ses motifs :

> [TRADUCTION] Le chemin Snake Hill est un chemin à faible débit de circulation. Il est néanmoins entretenu par la M.R. à longueur d'année afin de le garder carrossable. Des résidences permanentes sont situées en bordure de celui-ci. Les fermiers l'utilisent pour accéder à leurs champs et à leur bétail. Des jeunes gens empruntent le chemin Snake Hill pour se rendre à des fêtes, de sorte qu'il est utilisé par des conducteurs qui ne le connaissent pas toujours aussi bien que les résidents de l'endroit.

À mon avis, la question de savoir comment un conducteur raisonnable aurait roulé sur le chemin Snake Hill nécessitait un examen un peu plus approfondi de la nature du chemin. Dans son analyse, la juge de première instance s'est attachée presque exclusivement à l'utilisation qui est faite du chemin, sans prendre en compte le genre de conditions qu'il présente aux conducteurs. Il n'est peut-être pas surprenant qu'elle ne se soit pas livrée à cette analyse approfondie, puisqu'elle ne s'est pas demandé comment un conducteur raisonnable aurait roulé sur ce chemin. Si elle s'était posé cette question, elle aurait vraisemblablement procédé à une évaluation analogue à celle qu'a faite la Cour d'appel au par. 13 de son jugement :

Given the fact that Snake Hill Road is a low standard road, in a category only one or two levels above a prairie trail, one can assume that a reasonable driver exercising ordinary care would approach the road with a certain degree of caution.

Comme le chemin Snake Hill est une route de catégorie inférieure, à peine un ou deux niveaux au-dessus d'un chemin de prairie, on peut présumer qu'un conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales y roulerait avec une certaine prudence.

Having considered the character of the road in general, and having concluded that by its very nature it warranted a certain degree of caution, it is nonetheless necessary to consider the material features of the road at the point at which the accident occurred. Even on roads which are of a lower standard, a reasonable driver exercising due caution may be caught unaware by a particularly dangerous segment of the road. That was, in fact, the central argument that the appellant put forward in this case. According to the appellant's "dual nature" theory, at para. 8 of his factum, the fact that the curvy portion of Snake Hill Road where the accident occurred was flanked by straight segments of road created a risk that a motorist would be lulled into thinking that the curves could be taken at speeds greater than that at which they could actually be taken.

While it is not clear from her reasons that the trial judge accepted the appellant's "dual nature" theory, it appears that her conclusion that the municipality did not meet the standard of care required by it was based largely on her observation of the material features of the road at the location of the Nikolaisen rollover. Relying on the evidence of two experts, Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner, she found the portion of the road on which the accident occurred to be a "hazard to the public". In her view, the limited sight distance created by the presence of uncleared bush precluded a motorist from being forewarned of the impending sharp right turn immediately followed by a left turn. Based on expert testimony, she concluded that the curve could not be negotiated at speeds greater than 60 km/h under favourable conditions, or 50 km/h under wet conditions.

127 Bien que les motifs de la juge de première instance n'indiquent pas clairement si elle a retenu la thèse de la « nature hybride » du chemin, il semble que sa conclusion selon laquelle la municipalité a manqué à son obligation d'entretien ait reposé largement sur son examen des caractéristiques physiques du chemin, à l'endroit où le véhicule de M. Nikolaisen a fait un tonneau. S'appuyant sur les témoignages de deux experts, MM. Anderson et Werner, elle a estimé que la portion du chemin où s'est produit l'accident constituait un [TRADUCTION] « danger pour le public ». Selon elle, le fait que la distance de visibilité ait été réduite par la présence de broussailles empêchait les automobilistes de voir l'imminence d'un virage à droite serré, qui est immédiatement suivi d'un virage à gauche. Sur la base des témoignages d'experts, elle a conclu que le virage ne pouvait être pris à une vitesse supérieure à 60 km/h dans des conditions favorables, ou 50 km/h sur chaussée humide.

Again, I would not reject the trial judge's factual finding that the curve presented motorists with an inherent hazard. The evidence does not, however, support a finding that a reasonable driver exercising ordinary care would have been unable to negotiate the curve with safety. As I explained earlier, the municipality's duty to repair is implicated only when an objectively hazardous condition exists, and where it is determined that a reasonable driver arriving at the hazard would be unable to provide for his or her own security due to the features of the hazard.

129 I agree with the trial judge that part of the danger posed by the presence of bushes on the side of the road was that a driver would not be able to predict the radius of the sharp right-turning curve obscured by them. In my view, however, the actual danger inherent in this portion of the road was that the bushes, together with the sharp radius of the curve, prevented an eastbound motorist from being able to see if a vehicle was approaching from the opposite direction. Given this latter situation, it is highly unlikely that any reasonable driver exercising ordinary care would approach the curve at speeds in excess of 50 km/h, a speed which was found by the trial judge to be a safe speed at which to negotiate the curve. Since a reasonable driver would not approach this curve at speeds in excess of which it could safely be taken, I conclude that the curve did not pose a risk to the reasonable driver.

130 One need only refer to the series of photographs of the portion of Snake Hill Road on which the accident occurred to appreciate the extent to which visual clues existed which would alert a driver to approach the curve with caution (Respondent's Record, vol. II, at pp. 373-76). The photographs, which indicate what the driver would have seen on entering the curve, show the presence of bush extending well into the road. From the photographs, it is clear that a motorist approaching the curve would not fail to appreciate the risk presented by the curve, which is simply that it is impossible to see around it and to gauge what may be coming in the opposite direction. In addition, the danger posed intrinsèque pour les automobilistes. Toutefois, il n'y a rien dans la preuve qui permette de conclure qu'un conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales aurait été incapable de prendre le virage en sécurité. Comme je l'ai expliqué plus tôt, l'obligation d'entretien des municipalités n'est en cause que lorsqu'il existe une situation objectivement dangereuse et qu'il est établi qu'un conducteur raisonnable s'approchant du danger serait incapable d'assurer sa sécurité en raison des caractéristiques de ce danger.

Je partage l'opinion de la juge de première instance selon laquelle une partie du danger créé par les broussailles se trouvant en bordure de la route tenait au fait qu'un conducteur ne pourrait deviner le rayon de courbure prononcé du virage à droite serré qu'elles dissimulaient. À mon sens, toutefois, le véritable danger intrinsèque de ce tronçon du chemin résidait dans le fait que les broussailles, ainsi que le court rayon de courbure du virage, empêchent les automobilistes circulant en direction est de voir si un véhicule s'approche en sens inverse. Par conséquent, il est très peu probable qu'un conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales approcherait de ce virage à une vitesse supérieure à 50 km/h, vitesse à laquelle la juge de première instance a conclu qu'il était possible de le prendre en sécurité. Étant donné qu'un conducteur raisonnable n'approcherait pas de ce virage à une vitesse supérieure à celle lui permettant de le prendre en sécurité, je conclus que le virage ne constituait pas un risque pour le conducteur raisonnable.

Il suffit d'examiner les photos du tronçon du chemin Snake Hill où l'accident est survenu pour constater à quel point il existait des indices visuels propres à inciter les conducteurs à s'approcher du virage avec prudence (dossier de l'intimée, vol. II, p. 373-376). Les photos, qui montrent ce que voit le conducteur sur le point d'amorcer le virage, laissent voir la présence de broussailles s'avançant considérablement au-dessus du chemin. Il ressort clairement de ces photographies qu'un automobiliste approchant du virage ne manquerait pas pressentir le risque que présente celui-ci, savoir qu'il est tout simplement impossible de voir de l'autre côté de la courbe ce qui peut arriver en sens inverse. De plus, by the inability to see what is approaching in the opposite direction is somewhat heightened by the fact that this road is used by farm operators. At trial, the risk was described in the following terms by Mr. Sparks, an engineer giving expert testimony:

> . . . if you can't, if you can't see far enough down the road to, you know, if there's somebody that's coming around the corner with a tractor and a cultivator and you can't see around the corner, then, you know, drivers would have a fairly strong signal, in my view, that due care and caution would be required.

The expert testimony relied on by the trial judge does not support a finding that the portion of Snake Hill Road on which the accident occurred would pose a risk to a reasonable driver exercising ordinary care. When asked at trial whether motorists, exercising reasonable care, would enter the curve at a slow speed because they could not see what was coming around the corner, Mr. Werner agreed that he, himself, drove the corner "at a slower speed" and that it would be prudent for a driver to slow down given the limited sight distance. Similarly, Mr. Anderson admitted to having taken the curve at 40-45 km/h the first time he drove it because he "didn't want to get into trouble with it". When asked if the reason he approached the curve at that speed was because he could not see around it, he replied in the affirmative: "[t]hat's why I approached it the way I did."

Perhaps most tellingly, Mr. Nikolaisen himself testified that he could not see if a vehicle was coming in the opposite direction as he approached the curve. The following exchange which occurred during counsel's cross-examination of Mr. Nikolaisen at trial is instructive:

> Q. . . . You told my learned friend, Mr. Logue, that your view of the road was quite limited, that is correct? The view ahead on the road is quite limited, is that right?

le danger que constitue l'incapacité de voir ce qui arrive en sens inverse est d'une certaine manière exacerbé par le fait que le chemin est utilisé par des exploitants agricoles. Au procès, ce risque a été décrit ainsi par M. Sparks, ingénieur, qui témoignait à titre d'expert :

> [TRADUCTION] . . . si vous ne pouvez pas voir, si vous ne pouvez pas voir assez loin sur le chemin pour, vous savez, savoir si quelqu'un arrive en sens inverse avec un tracteur tirant une herse et que vous ne pouvez voir, de l'autre côté du virage, alors, vous savez, cela devrait envoyer un message clair aux conducteurs, selon moi, que l'attention et la prudence s'imposent.

131 Le témoignage d'expert retenu par la juge de première instance n'étaye pas sa conclusion que la portion du chemin Snake Hill où s'est produit l'accident présente un risque pour un conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales. Lorsqu'on lui a demandé si un automobiliste prenant des précautions normales amorcerait le virage à vitesse réduite étant donné qu'il ne peut voir ce qui l'attend au détour du chemin, M. Werner a reconnu que lui-même prend le virage [TRADUCTION] « à vitesse réduite » et qu'il serait prudent que les conducteurs ralentissent en raison de la distance de visibilité limitée. De même, M. Anderson a admis avoir pris le virage à 40-45 km/h la première fois qu'il est passé par là, car il [TRADUCTION] « ne voulait pas se placer dans une situation difficile ». Lorsqu'on lui a demandé s'il avait pris le virage à cette vitesse parce qu'il ne pouvait pas voir ce qui l'attendait, il a répondu par l'affirmative : [TRADUCTION] « [c']est la raison pour laquelle je l'ai approché comme je l'ai fait. »

132 Fait encore plus révélateur peut-être, M. Nikolaisen lui-même a témoigné qu'il ne pouvait pas savoir si un véhicule venait en sens inverse lorsqu'il s'approchait du virage. L'échange suivant, durant le contre-interrogatoire de M. Nikolaisen au procès par l'avocat de la partie adverse, est éclairant :

[TRADUCTION]

> Q. . . . Vous avez dit à mon savant collègue, M. Logue, que votre visibilité était plutôt réduite, est-ce exact? La visibilité sur le chemin est plutôt réduite, n'est-ce pas?

A. As in regards to travelling through the curves, yes, that's right, yeah.

Q. Yes. And you did not know what was coming as you approached the curve, that is correct?

A. That's correct, yes.

Q. There might be a vehicle around that curve coming towards you or someone riding a horse on the road, that is correct?

A. Or a tractor or a cultivator or something, that's right.

Q. Or a tractor or a cultivator. You know as a person raised in rural Saskatchewan that all of those things are possibilities, that is right?

A. That's right, yeah, that is correct.

133 Nor do I accept the appellant's submission that the "dual nature" of the road had the effect of lulling drivers into taking the curve at an inappropriate speed. This theory rests on the assumption that the motorists would drive the straight portions of the road at speeds of up to 80 km/h, leaving them unprepared to negotiate suddenly appearing curves. Yet, while the default speed limit on the road was 80 km/h, there was no evidence to suggest that a reasonable driver would have driven any portion of the road at that speed. While Mr. Werner testified that a driver "would be permitted" to drive at a maximum of 80 km/h, since this was the default (not the posted) speed limit, he later acknowledged that bladed trails in the province are not designed to meet 80 km/h design criteria. I agree with the Court of Appeal that the evidence is that "Snake Hill Road was self-evidently a dirt road or bladed trail" and that it "was obviously not designed to accommodate travel at a general speed of 80 kilometres per hour". As I earlier remarked, the locality of the road and its character and class must be considered when determining whether the reasonable driver would be able to navigate it safely.

R. Lorsqu'on se trouve dans les courbes, oui, c'est exact.

Q. Oui. Et vous ne saviez pas ce qui s'en venait lorsque vous approchiez du virage, est-ce exact?

R. C'est exact, oui.

Q. Il aurait pu y avoir un véhicule venant dans votre direction de l'autre côté de la courbe ou quelqu'un se promenant à cheval sur le chemin, est-ce exact?

R. Ou un tracteur, un cultivateur ou autre chose, c'est vrai.

Q. Ou un tracteur ou un cultivateur. Vous savez, puisque vous avez grandi en milieu rural en Saskatchewan, que toutes ces situations sont autant de possibilités, n'est-ce pas?

R. C'est vrai, oui.

Je ne retiens pas non plus l'argument de l'appelant portant que la « nature hybride » du chemin avait pour effet d'amener les conducteurs à prendre le virage à une vitesse inappropriée. Cette théorie repose sur l'hypothèse que les automobilistes roulent sur les portions en ligne droite du chemin à une vitesse pouvant atteindre 80 km/h, et qu'ils se trouvent en conséquence pris de court lorsqu'ils doivent prendre un virage soudain. Pourtant, bien que la vitesse permise sur le chemin soit 80 km/h, rien dans la preuve n'indiquait qu'un conducteur raisonnable aurait roulé à cette vitesse à quelque endroit du chemin. Après avoir témoigné que les conducteurs [TRADUCTION] « étaient autorisés » à rouler à une vitesse maximale de 80 km/h, cette vitesse étant la vitesse permise par défaut (et non la vitesse affichée), M. Werner a reconnu que les chemins nivelés de la province ne sont pas conçus pour permettre la circulation à une vitesse de 80 km/h. À l'instar de la Cour d'appel, je suis d'avis que la preuve établit que [TRADUCTION] « le chemin Snake Hill était manifestement un chemin de terre ou un chemin nivelé » et qu'il « n'était clairement pas conçu pour permettre une vitesse générale de 80 kilomètres à l'heure ». Comme je l'ai souligné précédemment, la configuration du chemin, de même que sa nature et sa catégorie doivent être prises en considération pour décider si le conducteur raisonnable aurait pu y rouler en sécurité.

Furthermore, the evidence at trial did not suggest that drivers were somehow fooled by the so-called "dual nature" of the road. The following exchange between counsel for the respondent and Mr. Werner at trial is illustrative of how motorists would view the road:

Q. Now, Mr. Werner, would you not agree that the change in the character of this road as you proceeded from east to west was quite obvious?

A. It was straight, and then you came to a hill, and you really didn't know what might lie beyond the hill.

Q. That's right. But I mean, the fact that the road went from being straight and level to suddenly there was a hill and you couldn't see -- you could see from the point of the top of the hill that the road didn't continue in a straight line, couldn't you?

A. Yes, you could, from the top of the hill, it's a very abrupt hill, yes.

Q. And as you proceeded down though the hill it became quite obvious, did it not, that the character of the road changed?

A. Yes, it changed, yes.

Q. Now you were faced with something other than a straight road?

A. M'hm. Yes.

Q. Now you were on -- and at some point along there the surface of the road changed, did it not?

A. Yes.

Q. And, of course, the road was no longer, I use the term built-up to refer to a road that has grade and it has some drainage. As you proceeded from west to east, you realized, you could see, it was obvious that this was not longer a built-up road?

A. It was a road essentially that was cut out of the topography and had no ditches, and there was an abutment or shoulder right to the driving surface. It was different than the first part.

Q. Yes. And all those differences were obvious, were they not?

134

En outre, rien dans la preuve présentée au procès n'indiquait que les conducteurs avaient été trompés de quelque façon par la soi-disant « nature hybride » du chemin. L'échange suivant, entre l'avocat de l'intimée et M. Werner, illustre bien la façon dont les automobilistes perçoivent le chemin :

[TRADUCTION]

Q. Maintenant M. Werner, ne seriez-vous pas d'accord pour dire que le changement dans la nature de ce chemin lorsque vous rouliez d'est en ouest était très évident?

R. On roulait en ligne droite, puis on descendait une colline, et on ne savait vraiment pas ce qui pouvait se trouver de l'autre côté de la colline.

Q. C'est vrai. Mais je veux dire, le fait que le chemin suivait d'abord un tracé horizontal et en ligne droite pour soudainement devenir une colline et que vous ne pouviez pas voir -- vous pouviez voir du haut de la colline que le chemin ne continuait pas en ligne droite, n'est-ce pas?

R. Oui, vous pouviez, du haut de la colline, c'est une colline très abrupte, oui.

Q. Et au fur et à mesure que vous descendiez la colline il devenait assez évident, n'est-ce pas, que la nature du chemin changeait?

R. Oui, ça changeait, oui.

Q. Vous vous trouviez alors devant autre chose qu'un chemin en ligne droite?

R. M'hm. Oui.

Q. Vous étiez maintenant sur -- et à un moment donné la surface du chemin changeait, n'est-ce pas?

R. Oui.

Q. Et, évidemment, le chemin n'était plus, j'utilise le terme aménagé pour désigner un chemin possédant une certaine élévation et qui est dans une certaine mesure drainé. Au fur et à mesure que vous rouliez d'ouest en est, vous constatiez, vous pouviez voir, il était évident, qu'il ne s'agissait plus d'un chemin aménagé?

R. Il s'agit essentiellement d'un chemin tracé suivant la topographie des lieux et sans fossés, et il y avait un accotement à droite du conducteur. C'était différent de la portion précédente.

Q. Oui. Et toutes ces différences étaient évidentes, n'est-ce pas?

A. Well, I -- they were clear, satisfactorily clear to me, yes. [Emphasis added.]

135 Although they may be compelling factors in other cases, in this case the "dual nature" of the road, the radius of the curve, the surface of the road, and the lack of superelevation do not support the conclusion of the trial judge. The question of how a reasonable driver exercising ordinary care would approach this road demands common sense. There was no necessity to post a sign in this case for the simple reason that any reasonable driver would have reacted to the presence of natural cues to slow down. The law does not require a municipality to post signs warning motorists of hazards that pose no real risk to a prudent driver. To impose a duty on the municipality to erect a sign in a case such as this is to alter the character of the duty owed by a municipality to drivers. Municipalities are not required to post warnings directed at drunk drivers and thereby deal with their inability to react to the cues that alert the ordinary driver to the presence of a hazard.

136 My colleagues assert that the trial judge properly considered all aspects of the applicable legal test, including whether the curve would pose a risk to the reasonable driver exercising ordinary care. They say that the trial judge did discuss, both explicitly and implicitly, the conduct of an ordinary or reasonable motorist approaching the curve. Secondly, they note that she referred to the evidence of the experts, Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner, both of whom discussed the conduct of an ordinary motorist in this situation. Thirdly, the fact that the trial judge apportioned negligence to Nikolaisen indicates, in their view, that she assessed his conduct against the standard of the ordinary driver, and thus considered the conduct of the latter (para. 40).

Bien qu'ils puissent constituer des facteurs concluants dans d'autres affaires, la « nature hybride » du chemin, le rayon de courbure du virage, le revêtement du chemin et l'absence d'élévation n'étayent pas en l'espèce la conclusion de la juge de première instance. Pour répondre à la question de savoir comment un conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales roulerait sur ce chemin, il faut faire appel au bon sens. Il n'était pas nécessaire d'installer un panneau de signalisation en l'espèce, et ce pour la simple raison que n'importe quel conducteur raisonnable aurait réagi aux indices naturels l'invitant à ralentir. Le droit n'oblige pas les municipalités à installer des panneaux signalant aux automobilistes des dangers qui ne font pas courir de risque véritable aux conducteurs prudents. Imposer à la municipalité l'obligation d'installer un panneau dans un cas comme celui qui nous occupe équivaut à modifier la nature de l'obligation qu'ont les municipalités envers les conducteurs. Les municipalités ne sont pas tenues d'aménager des panneaux d'avertissement à l'intention des conducteurs en état d'ébriété et, ainsi, de remédier à leur incapacité de réagir aux indices qui alertent le conducteur moyen de la présence d'un danger.

Mes collègues affirment que la juge de première instance a dûment pris en considération tous les aspects du critère juridique applicable, y compris la question de savoir si la courbe présentait un risque pour le conducteur moyen qui prend des précautions normales. Ils disent que la juge de première instance a effectivement examiné, explicitement et implicitement, la conduite de l'automobiliste moyen ou raisonnable qui s'approche du virage. Ils font ensuite remarquer qu'elle a fait état du témoignage des experts MM. Anderson et Werner, qui ont tous deux analysé la conduite de l'automobiliste moyen se trouvant dans cette situation. Enfin, le fait qu'elle ait imputé une partie de la responsabilité à M. Nikolaisen indique, à leur avis, qu'elle a évalué sa conduite au regard à la norme du conducteur moyen, et qu'elle a donc pris en compte la façon dont ce dernier aurait conduit (par. 40).

I respectfully disagree that it is explicit in the trial judge's reasons that she considered whether the portion of the road on which the accident occurred posed a risk to the ordinary driver exercising reasonable care. As I explained above, the fact that the trial judge restated the legal test in the form of a conclusion in no way suggests that she turned her mind to the issue of whether the ordinary driver would have found the curve to be hazardous.

Nor do I agree that a discussion of the conduct of an ordinary motorist in the situation was somehow "implicit" in the trial judge's reasons. In my view, it is highly problematic to presume that a trial judge made factual findings on a particular issue in the absence of any indication in the reasons as to what those findings were. While a trial judge is presumed to know the law, he or she cannot be presumed to have reached a factual conclusion without some indication in the reasons that he or she did in fact come to that conclusion. If the reviewing court is willing to presume that a trial judge made certain findings based on evidence in the record absent any indication in the reasons that the trial judge actually made those findings, then the reviewing court is precluded from finding that the trial judge misapprehended or neglected evidence.

In my view, my colleagues have throughout their reasons improperly presumed that the trial judge reached certain factual findings based on the evidence despite the fact that those findings were not expressed in her reasons. On the issue of whether the curve presented a risk to the ordinary driver, my colleagues note that "in relying on the evidence of Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner, the trial judge chose not to base her decision on the conflicting evidence of other witnesses" (para. 46). The problem with this statement is that although the trial judge relied on the evidence of Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner to conclude that the portion of Snake Hill Road on which the accident occurred was a hazard, it is impossible from her reasons to discern what, if any, evidence she relied on to reach the conclusion that the curve presented a risk to the ordinary driver exercising reasonable care. In the absence of any indication that she considered this issue, I am not willing to presume that she did.

138 Je n'estime pas non plus que l'examen de la façon de conduire de l'automobiliste moyen dans cette situation ressorte « implicitement » des motifs de la juge de première instance. À mon avis, il est très problématique de présumer qu'un juge de première instance a tiré des conclusions de fait à l'égard d'une question précise alors qu'il n'y a aucune indication dans ses motifs quant à la nature de ces conclusions. Bien que le juge de première instance soit censé connaître le droit, on ne peut présumer qu'il a tiré à une conclusion factuelle en l'absence d'indication dans ses motifs qu'il est effectivement arrivé à cette conclusion. Si le tribunal de révision est prêt à supposer que le juge de première instance a tiré certaines conclusions, sur la foi de la preuve figurant au dossier, bien que rien dans les motifs n'indique qu'il a vraiment tiré ces conclusions, alors le tribunal de révision ne saurait conclure que le juge de première instance a mal interprété des éléments de preuve ou a négligé d'en tenir compte.

139 À mon avis, tout au long de leurs motifs, mes collègues ont à tort présumé que la juge de première instance était arrivée à certaines conclusions de fait fondées sur la preuve, malgré le fait que ces conclusions ne soient pas formulées dans ses motifs. Quant à la question de savoir si le virage présentait un risque pour le conducteur moyen, mes collègues ont fait remarquer qu'« en s'appuyant sur les témoignages de MM. Anderson et Werner, la juge de première instance a choisi de ne pas fonder sa décision sur les témoignages contradictoires rendus par d'autres témoins » (par. 46). Le problème que pose cet énoncé est que, même si la juge de première instance s'est appuyée sur les témoignages de MM. Anderson et Werner

140 My colleagues similarly presume findings of fact when discussing the knowledge of the municipality. On this issue, they reiterate that "it is open for a trial judge to prefer some parts of the evidence over others, and to re-assess the trial judge's weighing of the evidence, is, with respect, not within the province of an appellate court" (para. 62). At para. 64 of their reasons, my colleagues review the findings of the trial judge on the issue of knowledge and conclude that the trial judge "drew the inference that the municipality should have been put on notice and investigated Snake Hill Road, in which case it would have become aware of the hazard in question". I think that it is improper to conclude that the trial judge made a finding that the municipality's system of road inspection was inadequate in the absence of any indication in her reasons that she reached this conclusion. My colleagues further suggest that the trial judge did not impute knowledge to the municipality on the basis of the occurrence of prior accidents on Snake Hill Road (para. 65). They even state that it was not necessary for the trial judge to rely on the accidents in order to satisfy s. 192(3) (para. 67). This, in my view, is a reinterpretation of the trial judge's findings that stands in direct contradiction to the reasons that were provided by her. The trial judge discusses other factors pertaining to knowledge only to heighten the significance that she attributes to the fact that accidents had previously occurred on other portions of the road (at para. 90):

pour conclure que la portion du chemin Snake Hill où s'est produit l'accident constituait un danger, il est impossible, à partir de ses motifs, de dire si elle s'est appuyée sur un témoignage — et, dans l'affirmative, sur lequel de ceux-ci — pour conclure que la courbe présentait un risque pour le conducteur moyen qui prend des précautions raisonnables. En l'absence de toute indication que la juge de première instance s'est penchée sur cette question, je ne suis pas disposé à présumer qu'elle l'a fait.

De même, mes collègues supposent l'existence de conclusions factuelles dans leur examen de la question de la connaissance incombant à la municipalité. Sur ce point, ils réitèrent que « le juge de première instance peut préférer certaines parties de la preuve à d'autres, et, en toute déférence, il n'appartient pas au tribunal d'appel de procéder à nouveau à l'appréciation de la preuve, tâche déjà accomplie par le juge de procès » (par. 62). Au paragraphe 64 de leurs motifs, mes collègues examinent les conclusions de la juge de première instance sur la question de la connaissance et concluent qu'elle « a inféré que la municipalité aurait dû être informée de la situation sur le chemin à Snake Hill et aurait dû faire enquête à cet égard, ce qui lui aurait permis de prendre connaissance de l'existence du danger ». Je ne crois pas qu'on puisse à juste titre conclure que la juge de première instance est arrivée à la conclusion que le système d'inspection routière de la municipalité était inadéquat, alors que rien dans ses motifs n'indique qu'elle a tiré cette conclusion. Mes collègues estiment en outre que la juge de première instance n'a pas prêté à la municipalité la connaissance requise sur la base des accidents survenus antérieurement sur le chemin Snake Hill (par. 65). Ils disent même qu'il n'était pas nécessaire de s'appuyer sur ces accidents pour satisfaire aux exigences du par. 192(3) (par. 67). À mon avis, ils donnent à ces conclusions une nouvelle interprétation, qui contredit directement les motifs qu'elle a exposés. La juge de première instance examine d'autres facteurs qui touchent à la connaissance requise, uniquement pour souligner l'importance qu'elle accorde au fait que des accidents sont survenus antérieurement ailleurs sur le chemin (au par. 90) :

If the R.M. did not have actual knowledge of the danger inherent in this portion of Snake Hill Road, it should have known. While four accidents in 12 years may not in itself be significant, it takes on more significance given the close proximity of three of these accidents, the relatively low volume of traffic, the fact that there are permanent residences on the road and the fact that the road is frequented by young and perhaps less experienced drivers. [Emphasis added.]

My colleagues refer to the decision of Van de Perre v. Edwards, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 1014, 2001 SCC 60, in which I stated that "an omission [in the trial judge's reasons] is only a material error if it gives rise to the reasoned belief that the trial judge must have forgotten, ignored or misconceived the evidence in a way that affected his conclusion" (para. 15). This case is however distinguishable from Van de Perre. In Van de Perre, the appellate court improperly substituted its own findings of fact for the trial judge's clear factual conclusions on the basis that the trial judge had not considered all of the evidence. By contrast, in this case my colleagues assert that this Court should not interfere with the "findings of the trial judge" even where no findings were made and where such findings must be presumed from the evidence. The trial judge's failure in this case to reach any conclusion on whether the ordinary driver would have found the portion of the road on which the accident occurred hazardous, in my view, gives rise to the reasoned belief that she ignored the evidence on the issue in a way that affected her conclusion.

Finally, I do not agree that the trial judge's conclusion that Mr. Nikolaisen was negligent equates to an assessment of whether a motorist exercising ordinary care would have found the curve on which the accident occurred to be hazardous. It is clear from the trial judge's reasons that she made a factual finding that the curve could be driven safely at 60 km/h in dry conditions and 50 km/h in wet conditions and that Mr. Nikolaisen approached the curve at an

142 Enfin, je ne peux souscrire à l'opinion que la conclusion de la juge de première instance selon laquelle M. Nikolaisen a fait preuve de négligence vaut examen de la question de savoir si l'automobiliste moyen prenant des précautions normales aurait estimé que la courbe où s'est produit l'accident était dangereuse. Il ressort clairement des motifs de la juge de première instance qu'elle a tiré les conclusions de fait suivantes : il était possible de prendre excessive speed. As earlier stated, what she failed to consider was whether the ordinary driver exercising reasonable care would have approached the curve at a speed at which it could be safely negotiated, or, stated differently, whether the curve posed a real danger to the ordinary driver.

B. Did the Trial Judge Err in Finding that the Respondent Municipality Knew or Should Have Known of the Danger Posed by the Municipal Road?

143 Pursuant to s. 192(3) of The Rural Municipality Act, 1989, fault is not to be imputed to the municipality in the absence of proof by the plaintiff that the municipality "knew or should have known of the disrepair".

144 The trial judge made no finding that the respondent municipality had actual knowledge of the alleged state of disrepair, but rather imputed knowledge to the respondent on the basis that it should have known of the danger. This is apparent in her findings on knowledge at paras. 89-91 of her reasons:

> Breach of the statutory duty of care imposed by section 192 of the Rural Municipality Act, supra, cannot be imputed to the R.M. unless it knew of or ought to have known of the state of disrepair on Snake Hill Road. Between 1978 and 1990 there were four accidents on Snake Hill Road. Three of these accidents occurred in the same vicinity as the Nikolaisen rollover. The precise location of the fourth accident is unknown. While at least three of these accidents occurred when motorists where travelling in the opposite direction of the Nikolaisen vehicle, they occurred on that portion of Snake Hill Road which is the most dangerous — where the road begins to curve, rather than where it is generally straight and flat. At least two of these accidents were reported to authorities.

> If the R.M. did not have actual knowledge of the danger inherent in this portion of Snake Hill Road, it should have known. While four accidents in 12 years may not in itself be significant, it takes on more significance le virage en sécurité à 60 km/h à l'heure sur chaussée sèche et à 50 km/h sur chaussée humide, et M. Nikolaisen s'est approché du virage à une vitesse excessive. Comme je l'ai indiqué plus tôt, elle a omis de se demander si le conducteur moyen qui prend des précautions normales se serait approché du virage à une vitesse qui lui aurait permis de le prendre en sécurité ou, autrement dit, si la courbe présentait un danger réel pour le conducteur moyen.

B. La juge de première instance a-t-elle commis une erreur en concluant que la municipalité intimée connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le danger que présentait le chemin municipal?

Conformément au par. 192(3) de la Rural Municipality Act, 1989, aucune faute n'est imputée à la municipalité à moins que le demandeur n'établisse que celle-ci « connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le mauvais état du chemin ».

La juge de première instance n'a pas conclu que la municipalité intimée connaissait concrètement le mauvais état dans lequel se trouvait, prétend-on, le chemin, mais elle lui a plutôt prêté cette connaissance pour le motif qu'elle aurait dû connaître l'existence du danger. C'est ce qui ressort de ses conclusions à cet égard, aux par. 89 à 91 de ses motifs :

> Si la M.R. ne connaissait pas concrètement le danger intrinsèque que comporte cette portion du chemin Snake Hill, elle aurait dû le connaître. Le fait que quatre accidents se soient produits en 12 ans n'est peut-être pas given the close proximity of three of these accidents, the relatively low volume of traffic, the fact that there are permanent residences on the road and the fact that the road is frequented by young and perhaps less experienced drivers. I am not satisfied that the R.M. has established that in these circumstances it took reasonable steps to prevent this state of disrepair on Snake Hill Road from continuing.

I find that by failing to erect and maintain a warning and regulatory sign on this portion of Snake Hill Road the R.M. has not met the standard of care which is reasonable in the circumstances. Accordingly, it is in breach of its duty of care to motorists generally, and to Mr. Housen in particular. [Emphasis added.]

Whether the municipality should have known of the disrepair (here, the risk posed in the absence of a sign) involves both questions of law and questions of fact. As a matter of law, the trial judge must approach the question of whether knowledge should be imputed to the municipality with regard to the duties of the ordinary, reasonable and prudent municipal councillor (Ryan v. Victoria (City), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 201, at para. 28). The question is then answered through the trial judge's assessment of the facts of the case.

I find that the trial judge made both errors of law and palpable and overriding errors of fact in determining that the respondent municipality should have known of the alleged state of disrepair. She erred in law by approaching the question of knowledge from the perspective of an expert rather than from the perspective of a prudent municipal councillor. She also erred in law by failing to appreciate that the onus of proving that the municipality knew or should have known of the alleged disrepair remained on the plaintiff throughout. The trial judge clearly erred in fact by drawing the unreasonable inference that the respondent municipality should have known that the portion of the road on which the accident occurred was dangerous from evidence that accidents had occurred on other parts of Snake Hill Road.

significatif en soi, mais il le devient si l'on considère que trois de ces accidents sont survenus à proximité, qu'il s'agit d'une route à débit de circulation relativement faible, que des résidences permanentes sont situées en bordure de celle-ci et que le chemin est fréquenté par des conducteurs jeunes et peut-être moins expérimentés. Je ne suis pas convaincue que la M.R. a établi avoir, dans ces circonstances, pris des mesures raisonnables pour remédier au mauvais état du chemin Snake Hill.

J'estime que, en omettant d'installer et de maintenir un panneau d'avertissement ou de signalisation dans cette partie du chemin Snake Hill, la M.R. n'a pas satisfait à la norme de diligence qui est raisonnable dans les circonstances. Par conséquent, elle ne s'est pas acquittée de son obligation de diligence à l'égard des automobilistes en général et à l'égard de M. Housen en particulier. [Je souligne.]

145 La question de savoir si la municipalité aurait dû connaître le mauvais état du chemin (en l'occurrence, le risque que présentait l'absence de signalisation) soulève à la fois des questions de droit et des questions de fait. Sur le plan juridique, le juge de première instance doit se demander s'il y a lieu de présumer que la municipalité connaissait ce fait, au regard des obligations qui incombent au conseiller municipal ordinaire, raisonnable et prudent (Ryan c. Victoria (Ville), [1999] 1 R.C.S. 201, par. 28). Le juge de première instance répond ensuite à la question en appréciant les faits de l'espèce dont il est saisi.

147 The trial judge's failure to determine whether knowledge should be imputed to the municipality from the perspective of what a prudent municipal councillor should have known is implicit in her reasons. The respondent could not be held, for the purposes of establishing knowledge under the statutory test, to the standard of an expert analysing the curve after the accident. Yet this is precisely what the trial judge did. She relied on the expert evidence of Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner to reach the conclusion that the curve presented a hidden hazard. She also implicitly accepted that the risk posed by the curve was not one that would be readily apparent to a lay person. This is evident in the portion of her judgment where she accepts as a valid excuse for not filing a timely claim against the respondent the appellant counsel's explanation that he did not believe the respondent to be at fault until expert opinions were obtained. The trial judge stated in this regard: "[i]t was only later when expert opinions were obtained that serious consideration was given to the prospect that the nature of Snake Hill Road might be a factor contributing to the accident" (para. 64). Her failure to consider the risk to the prudent driver is also apparent when one considers that she ignored the evidence concerning the way in which the two experts themselves had approached the dangerous curve (see para. 54 above).

Il ressort implicitement des motifs de la juge de première instance qu'elle n'a pas décidé s'il fallait prêter à la municipalité la connaissance requise en considérant cette question du point de vue du conseiller municipal prudent. Pour trancher la question de la connaissance requise suivant le critère prévu par la loi, l'intimée ne pouvait être tenue aux mêmes normes qu'un spécialiste analysant la courbe après l'accident. Pourtant, c'est exactement ce qu'a fait la juge de première instance. Elle s'est fondée sur les témoignages d'expert donnés par MM. Anderson et Werner pour conclure que la courbe présentait un danger caché. Elle a également reconnu implicitement que le risque visé par la courbe n'était pas un risque facilement décelable par un profane. Cela ressort clairement du passage de son jugement où elle considère comme une excuse valable pour justifier le dépôt tardif de l'action contre l'intimée l'explication de l'avocat de l'appelant selon laquelle il ne croyait pas que l'intimée était dans son tort jusqu'à ce qu'il prenne connaissance des opinions des experts. La juge de première instance a dit ceci à cet égard : [TRADUCTION] « [c]e n'est que plus tard, après avoir obtenu l'opinion des experts, que la possibilité que la nature du chemin Snake Hill puisse avoir été un facteur ayant contribué à l'accident a été sérieusement envisagée » (par. 64). Son omission de s'interroger sur le risque que courrait le conducteur prudent apparaît elle aussi clairement, lorsqu'on considère qu'elle n'a pas tenu compte de la preuve concernant la façon dont les deux experts avaient eux-mêmes pris le virage dangereux (voir le par. 54 qui précède).

148 Had the trial judge considered the question of whether the municipality should have known of the alleged disrepair from the perspective of the prudent municipal councillor, she would necessarily have reached a different conclusion. There was no evidence that the road conditions which existed posed a risk that the respondent should have been aware of. The respondent had no particular reason to inspect that segment of the road for the presence of hazards. It had not received any complaints from motorists respecting the absence of signs on the road, the lack of superelevation on the curves, or the presence of trees and vegetation which grew up along the sides of the road.

Si la juge de première instance avait répondu à la question de savoir si la municipalité aurait dû connaître le mauvais état dans lequel se trouvait, prétend-on, le chemin en se plaçant du point de vue du conseiller municipal prudent, elle serait nécessairement arrivée à une conclusion différente. Il n'y avait aucune preuve établissant que le danger existant créait un risque que l'intimée aurait dû connaître. Cette dernière n'avait aucune raison particulière d'aller inspecter cette portion du chemin pour voir s'il y existait des dangers. Elle n'avait reçu aucune plainte d'automobilistes relativement à l'absence de signalisation, à l'absence de surélévation des

In addition, the question of the respondent's knowledge is linked inextricably to the standard of care. A municipality can only be expected to have knowledge of those hazards which pose a risk to the reasonable driver exercising ordinary care, since these are the only hazards for which there is a duty to repair. The trial judge should not have expected the respondent in this case to have knowledge of the road conditions that existed at the site of the Nikolaisen rollover since that road condition simply did not pose a risk to the reasonable driver. In addition to the evidence that was discussed above in the context of the standard of care, this conclusion is supported by the testimony of the several lay witnesses that testified at trial. Craig Thiel, a resident on the road, testified that he was not aware that Snake Hill Road had a reputation of being a dangerous road, and that he himself had never experienced difficulty with the portion of the road on which the accident occurred. His wife, Toby, also testified that she had experienced no problems with the road.

The trial judge also clearly erred in fact by imputing knowledge to the municipality on the basis of the four accidents that had previously occurred on Snake Hill Road. While her factual findings regarding the accidents themselves have a sound basis in the evidence, these findings simply do not support her conclusion that a prudent municipal councillor ought to have known that a risk existed for the normal prudent driver. As such, the trial judge erred in drawing an unreasonable inference from the evidence that was before her. As stated above, the standard of review for inferences of fact is, above all, one of reasonableness. This is reflected in the following passage from Joseph Brant Memorial Hospital v. Koziol, [1978] 1 S.C.R. 491, at pp. 503-4:

. . . "it is a well-known principle that appellate tribunals should not disturb findings of fact made by a trial judge courbes ou à la présence d'arbres et de végétation en bordure du chemin.

149 En outre, la question de la connaissance de l'intimée est intimement liée à celle de la norme de diligence. Une municipalité est uniquement censée avoir connaissance des dangers qui présentent un risque pour le conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales, puisqu'il s'agit des seuls dangers à l'égard desquels existe une obligation d'entretien. En l'espèce, la juge de première instance n'aurait pas dû attendre de l'intimée qu'elle connaisse le danger qui existait à l'endroit où le véhicule de M. Nikolaisen a fait un tonneau, puisque ce danger ne présentait tout simplement pas de risque pour le conducteur raisonnable. Outre les éléments de preuve examinés précédemment relativement à la norme de diligence, les témoignages de plusieurs témoins ordinaires qui ont déposé au procès étayent cette conclusion. Craig Thiel, qui habite le long de ce chemin, a témoigné qu'il ne savait pas que le chemin Snake Hill avait la réputation d'être dangereux et qu'il n'avait lui-même jamais éprouvé de difficulté à conduire à l'endroit du chemin où est survenu l'accident. Sa conjointe, Toby, a également dit ne pas avoir connu de problème sur ce chemin.

150 La juge de première instance a clairement commis une autre erreur de fait en présumant, sur la foi des quatre accidents survenus auparavant sur le chemin Snake Hill, que la municipalité connaissait l'existence du danger. Bien que ses conclusions de fait relativement aux accidents eux-mêmes soient solidement étayées par la preuve, elles n'appuient tout simplement pas sa conclusion qu'un conseiller municipal prudent aurait dû savoir qu'il existait un risque pour le conducteur prudent. En conséquence, la juge de première instance a fait erreur en tirant une inférence déraisonnable de la preuve qui lui était soumise. Comme il a été indiqué plus tôt, la norme de contrôle applicable aux inférences de fait est, d'abord et avant tout, celle de la décision raisonnable. Les propos suivants du juge Spence dans l'arrêt Joseph Brant Memorial Hospital c. Koziol, [1978] 1 R.C.S. 491, p. 503-504, illustrent bien ce principe :

. . . « c'est un principe bien connu que les tribunaux d'appel ne doivent pas remettre en cause les conclusions

if there were credible evidence before him upon which he could reasonably base his conclusion". [Emphasis added.]

151 As I stated above, there was no evidence to suggest that the respondent had actual knowledge that accidents had previously occurred on Snake Hill Road. To the contrary, Mr. Danger, the administrator of the municipality, testified that the first he heard of the accidents was at the trial.

152 Implicit in the trial judge's reasons, then, was the expectation that the municipality should have known about the accidents through an accident-reporting system. The appellant put forward that argument explicitly before this Court, placing significant emphasis on the fact that respondent "has no regularized approach to gathering this information, whether from councillors or otherwise". The argument suggests that, had the municipality established a formal system to find out whether accidents had occurred on a given road, it would have known that accidents had occurred on Snake Hill Road and would have taken the appropriate corrective action to ensure that the road was safe for travellers.

153 I find the above argument to be flawed in two important respects. First, the argument that the other accidents on Snake Hill Road were relevant in this case is based on the assumption that there was an obligation on the respondent municipality to have a "regularized" accident-reporting system, and that the informal system that was in place was somehow deficient. In my view, the appellant did not meet its onus to show that the system relied on by the municipality to discharge its obligations under s. 192 of the The Rural Municipality Act, 1989 was deficient. The evidence shows that, prior to 1988, there was no formal system of accident reporting in place. There was, nonetheless, an informal system whereby the municipal councillors were responsible for finding out if there were road hazards. Information that hazards existed came to the attention of the councillors via complaints, and from their own familiarity de fait du juge de première instance, s'il existait des témoignages dignes de foi sur lesquels le juge pouvait raisonnablement fonder ses conclusions ». [Je souligne.]

Comme je l'ai mentionné précédemment, il n'y avait aucune preuve indiquant que l'intimée savait concrètement que d'autres accidents étaient survenus auparavant sur le chemin Snake Hill. Au contraire, M. Danger, l'administrateur de la municipalité, a témoigné qu'il avait entendu parler de ces accidents pour la première fois au procès.

Par conséquent, il ressort implicitement des motifs de la juge de première instance que la municipalité aurait censément dû connaître l'existence des accidents grâce à un système d'information en la matière. L'appelant a expressément plaidé cet argument devant notre Cour, insistant fortement sur le fait que l'intimée [TRADUCTION] « ne dispose pas d'un mécanisme structuré de collecte de cette information, que ce soit par l'entremise des conseillers ou d'autres personnes ». Suivant cet argument, on prétend que, si la municipalité avait établi un système officiel lui permettant de savoir si des accidents sont survenus sur une route donnée, elle aurait su que des accidents s'étaient produits sur le chemin Snake Hill et elle aurait pris les mesures correctives appropriées pour faire en sorte que le chemin soit sécuritaire pour les usagers.

J'estime que l'argument susmentionné présente deux lacunes importantes. Premièrement, l'argument selon lequel les autres accidents survenus sur le chemin Snake Hill étaient pertinents en l'espèce repose sur la présomption que la municipalité intimée avait l'obligation d'avoir un système « structuré » d'information sur les accidents, et que le système informel en place était d'une certaine manière déficient. À mon avis, l'appelant ne s'est pas acquitté du fardeau qui lui incombait de démontrer que le système sur lequel la municipalité se fondait pour remplir ses obligations au titre de l'art. 192 de la Rural Municipality Act, 1989, était déficient. La preuve établit que, avant 1988, il n'existait pas de système officiel d'information sur les accidents. Il existait néanmoins, un système informel dans le cadre duquel les conseillers municipaux étaient chargés de s'enquérir de l'existence de dangers with the roads within the township under their jurisdiction. The trial judge made a palpable error in finding that this informal system was deficient in the absence of any evidence of the practice of other municipalities at the time that the accidents occurred and what might have been a reasonable system, particularly given the fact that the rural municipality in question had only six councillors. There is no evidence that a rural municipality of this type requires the sort of sophisticated information-gathering process that may be required in a city, where accidents occur with greater frequency and where it is less likely that word of mouth will suffice to bring hazards to the attention of the councillors.

sur les routes. Les conseillers étaient informés de l'existence de dangers par suite des plaintes qu'ils recevaient et par leur propre expérience des routes situées dans les cantons qu'ils représentaient. La juge de première instance a commis une erreur manifeste en concluant que ce système informel était déficient, alors qu'aucune preuve n'indiquait quelles étaient les pratiques suivies par d'autres municipalités à cet égard au moment des accidents, ni n'expliquait en quoi aurait consisté un système raisonnable, compte tenu particulièrement du fait que la municipalité rurale concernée ne comptait que six conseillers. Il n'y a aucune preuve indiquant qu'une municipalité rurale de ce genre a besoin du genre de mécanisme élaboré de collecte de renseignements dont peut avoir besoin une grande ville, où les accidents sont plus fréquents et où il est peu probable que le bouche à oreille soit suffisant pour porter les dangers à l'attention des conseillers.

The respondent municipality now has a more formalized system of accident reporting. Since 1988, Saskatchewan Highways and Transportation annually provides the municipalities with a listing of all motor vehicle accidents which occur within the municipality and which are reported to the police. While I agree that this system may provide the municipality with a better chance of locating hazards in some circumstances, I do not accept that the adoption of this system is relevant on the facts of this case. Only one accident, which occurred in 1990, was reported to the respondent under this system. The appellant adduced no evidence to suggest that this accident occurred at the same location as the Nikolaisen rollover, or that this accident occurred as a result of the conditions of the road rather than the negligence of the driver.

Secondly, and perhaps more importantly, it was simply illogical for the trial judge to infer from the fact of the earlier accidents that the respondent should have known that the site of the Nikolaisen rollover posed a risk to prudent drivers. The three accidents, which took place in 1978, 1985, and 1987, occurred on different curves, while the vehicles involved were proceeding in the opposite direction. The accidents of 1978 and 1987 occurred on the first right-turning curve in the road with the drivers travelling westbound, at the bottom of the hill. The accident in 1985 took place on the next curve in the road with the driver also travelling westbound, again on a different curve from the one where the Nikolaisen rollover took place. If anything, these accidents signal that the municipality should have been concerned with the curves that were, when travelling westbound, to the east of the site of the Nikolaisen rollover. The evidence disclosed no accidents that had occurred at the precise location of the accident that is the subject of this case.

— se sont produits dans des courbes différentes, et les véhicules concernés circulaient en sens inverse. L'accident de 1978 et celui de 1987 ont eu lieu dans le premier virage à droite au pied de la colline, les automobilistes roulant alors en direction ouest. L'accident de 1985 s'est produit dans la deuxième courbe, toujours en direction ouest, encore une fois dans une courbe différente de celle où le véhicule de M. Nikolaisen a fait un tonneau. Si ces accidents indiquent quoi que ce soit, c'est plutôt que la municipalité aurait dû se préoccuper des courbes qui, pour les véhicules circulant en direction ouest, se trouvent à l'est de l'endroit où le véhicule de M. Nikolaisen a fait un tonneau. La preuve n'a révélé aucun accident qui se serait produit à l'endroit précis où est survenu l'accident qui nous intéresse.

156 Furthermore, the mere occurrence of an accident does not in and of itself indicate a duty to post a sign. In many cases, accidents happen not because of the conditions of the road, but rather because of the negligence of the driver. Illustrative in this regard is Mr. Agrey's accident on Snake Hill Road in 1978. Mr. Agrey testified that, just prior to the accident, he had turned his attention away from the road to talk to one of the passengers in the vehicle. Another passenger shouted to him to "look out", but by the time he was alerted it was too late to properly navigate the turn. Mr. Agrey was charged and fined for his carelessness. As was discussed in the context of the standard of care, a municipality is not obligated to make safe the roads for all drivers, regardless of the care and attention that they are exercising when driving. It need only keep roads in such a state of repair as will allow a reasonable driver exercising ordinary care to drive with safety.

Qui plus est, le simple fait qu'un accident se produise n'emporte pas en soi l'obligation d'installer un panneau signalisateur. Dans bien des cas, les accidents surviennent non pas à cause de l'état de la route, mais plutôt à cause de la négligence du conducteur. Un bon exemple de cela est l'accident dont a été victime M. Agrey sur le chemin Snake Hill en 1978. Ce dernier a témoigné que, juste avant l'accident, il avait quitté des yeux la route pour parler à l'un des passagers du véhicule. Un autre passager lui a crié de faire attention, mais il était déjà trop tard pour bien exécuter le virage. Accusé de conduite imprudente, M. Agrey a été déclaré coupable et condamné à une amende. Comme on l'a vu plus tôt, dans le contexte de la norme de diligence, une municipalité n'a pas l'obligation de rendre les chemins sécuritaires pour tous les conducteurs, indépendamment de la prudence et de l'attention avec lesquelles ils conduisent. Elle est seulement tenue de maintenir les chemins dans un état propre à permettre au conducteur raisonnable qui prend des précautions normales d'y circuler en sécurité.

157 In addition to the substantial errors discussed above, I would also note that, in my view, the trial judge was inattentive to the onus of proof on this issue. When reviewing the evidence pertaining to other accidents on Snake Hill Road, the trial judge remarked, at para. 31: "Cst. Forbes does not recall any other accident on Snake Hill Road during her time at the Shellbrook RCMP Detachment, from 1987 until 1996. Cpl. Healey had heard of one other accident. Forbes and Healey are only two of nine members of the RCMP Detachment at Shellbrook" (emphasis added). By this comment, the trial judge seems to imply that there may have been more accidents on Snake Hill Road that had been reported and that the respondent should have known about this. With all due respect to the trial judge, if there had been accidents other than the ones that were raised at trial, it was up to the appellant to bring evidence of these accidents forward, either by calling the RCMP members to whom they had been reported, or by calling those who were involved in the accidents, or by any other available means. Furthermore, the significance that the trial judge attributed to the other accidents that occurred on Snake Hill Road was dependent on her assumption that the respondent should have had a formal accident-reporting system in place. The respondent did not bear the onus of demonstrating that it was not obliged to have such a system; there was, rather, a positive onus on the appellant to demonstrate that such a system was required and that the informal reporting system was inadequate.

Outre les erreurs substantielles examinées précédemment, je tiens également à souligner que, selon moi, la juge de première instance ne s'est pas souciée du fardeau de preuve sur cette question. Lorsqu'elle a examiné la preuve relative aux autres accidents survenus sur le chemin Snake Hill, la juge

C. Did the Trial Judge Err in Finding that the Accident was Caused in Part by the Failure of the Respondent Municipality to Erect a Sign Near the Curve?

The trial judge's findings on causation are found at para. 101 of her judgment, where she states:

I find that this accident occurred as a result of Mr. Nikolaisen entering the curve on Snake Hill Road at a speed slightly in excess of that which would allow successful negotiation. The accident occurred at the most dangerous segment of Snake Hill Road where a warning or regulatory sign should have been erected and maintained to warn motorists of an impending and hidden hazard. Mr. Nikolaisen's degree of impairment only de première instance a fait les remarques suivantes au par. 31 : [TRADUCTION] « La gendarme Forbes ne se souvient pas de quelque autre accident sur le chemin Snake Hill durant la période où elle était affectée au détachement de la GRC de Shellbrook, de 1987 à 1996. Le caporal Healey avait entendu parler d'un autre accident. Forbes et Healey ne sont que deux des neuf membres du détachement de la GRC à Shellbrook » (je souligne). Par cette remarque, la juge de première instance semble laisser entendre que d'autres accidents sur le chemin Snake Hill ont pu avoir été signalés et que l'intimée aurait dû le savoir. En toute déférence pour la juge de première instance, s'il y avait eu d'autres accidents que ceux qui ont été mentionnés au procès, il appartenait à l'appelant d'en faire la preuve, soit en faisant témoigner les membres de la GRC à qui les accidents avaient été signalés ou encore les personnes en cause dans ces accidents, soit en utilisant tout autre moyen à sa disposition. En outre, l'importance que la juge de première instance a accordée aux autres accidents survenus sur le chemin Snake Hill dépendait du postulat que l'intimée aurait dû posséder un système officiel d'information sur les accidents. L'intimée n'était pas tenue de prouver qu'elle n'avait pas l'obligation de disposer d'un tel système. Il incombait plutôt à l'appelant d'établir que ce genre de système était nécessaire et que le système informel existant était insuffisant.

C. La juge de première instance a-t-elle commis une erreur en concluant que l'accident avait été causé, en partie, par le défaut de la municipalité intimée d'installer un panneau de signalisation près de la courbe?

158 Les conclusions de la juge de première instance au sujet du lien de causalité figurent au par. 101 de son jugement, où elle dit ceci :

served to increase the risk of him not reacting, or reacting inappropriately to a sign. Mr. Nikolaisen was not driving recklessly such that he would have intentionally disregarded a warning or regulatory sign. He had moments earlier, when departing the Thiel residence, successfully negotiated a sharp curve which he could see and which was apparent to him. I am satisfied on a balance of probabilities that had Mr. Nikolaisen been forewarned of the curve, he would have reacted and taken appropriate corrective action such that he would not have lost control of his vehicle when entering the curve.

159 The trial judge's above findings in respect to causation represent conclusions on matters of fact. Consequently, this Court will only interfere if it finds that in coming to these conclusions she made a manifest error, ignored conclusive or relevant evidence, misunderstood the evidence, or drew erroneous conclusions from it (Toneguzzo-Norvell, supra, at p. 121).

160 In coming to her conclusion on causation, the trial judge made several of the types of errors that this Court referred to in Toneguzzo-Norvell. To the extent that the trial judge relied on the evidence of Mr. Laughlin, the only expert to have testified on the issue of causation, I find that she either misunderstood his evidence or drew erroneous conclusions from it. The only other testimony in respect to causation was anecdotal evidence pertaining to Mr. Nikolaisen's level of impairment provided by Craig Thiel, Toby Thiel and Paul Housen. Although their testimonies provided some evidence in respect to causation, for reasons I will discuss, it was not evidence on which the trial judge could reasonably rely. Nor do I find that the trial judge was entitled to rely on evidence that Mr. Nikolaisen successfully negotiated the curve from the Thiel driveway onto Snake Hill Road. The inference that the trial judge drew from this fact was unreasonable and ignored evidence that Mr. Nikolaisen swerved even on this curve. In addition, the trial judge clearly erred by ignoring other relevant evidence in respect to causation, in particular the fact that Mr. Nikolaisen had driven on the l'imminence d'un danger caché. Le degré d'ébriété de M. Nikolaisen n'a fait qu'accroître le risque qu'il ne réagisse pas du tout ou encore de façon inappropriée à une signalisation. M. Nikolaisen ne conduisait pas de façon si téméraire qu'il aurait intentionnellement fait abstraction d'un panneau d'avertissement ou de signalisation. Quelques instants plus tôt, au moment de quitter la résidence des Thiel, il avait pris avec succès un virage serré qu'il pouvait clairement voir. Je suis convaincue, selon la prépondérance des probabilités, que si on avait prévenu M. Nikolaisen de l'existence de la courbe, il aurait réagi et pris des mesures appropriées, qui l'auraient empêché de perdre la maîtrise de son véhicule en s'engageant dans le virage.

Les conclusions susmentionnées de la juge de première instance touchant le lien de causalité sont des conclusions portant sur des questions de fait. Par conséquent, notre Cour n'interviendra que si elle estime que, pour arriver à ses conclusions, la juge a commis une erreur manifeste, n'a pas tenu compte d'un élément de preuve déterminant ou pertinent, a mal compris la preuve ou en a tiré des conclusions erronées (Toneguzzo-Norvell, précité, p. 121).

En arrivant à sa conclusion sur le lien de causalité, la juge de première instance a commis plusieurs des erreurs mentionnées par notre Cour dans l'arrêt Toneguzzo-Norvell, précité. Dans la mesure où la juge de première instance s'est fondée sur le témoignage de M. Laughlin, le seul expert à avoir témoigné sur la question du lien de causalité, j'estime qu'elle a mal interprété son témoignage ou qu'elle en a tiré des conclusions erronées. Les éléments anecdotiques des témoignages de Craig Thiel, Toby Thiel et Paul Housen concernant le degré d'ébriété de M. Nikolaisen constituent la seule autre preuve testimoniale sur le lien de causalité. Bien que leurs témoignages aient fourni quelques éléments de preuve touchant cette question, il ne s'agit pas, pour des raisons que j'examinerai plus loin, d'éléments sur lesquels la juge de première instance pouvait raisonnablement s'appuyer. Je n'estime pas non plus qu'elle pouvait se fonder sur la preuve que M. Nikolaisen avait réussi à prendre le virage permettant d'accéder au chemin Snake Hill depuis l'entrée des Thiel. L'inférence que la juge de première instance a tirée de ce fait était déraisonnable et faisait abstraction de la preuve selon laquelle road three times in the 18 to 20 hours preceding the accident.

I cannot agree with the trial judge that the testimony of Mr. Laughlin, a forensic alcohol specialist employed by the RCMP supports the finding that Mr. Nikolaisen would have reacted to a sign forewarning of the impending right-turning curve on which the accident occurred. The preponderance of Mr. Laughlin's testimony establishes that persons at the level of impairment which Mr. Nikolaisen was found to be at when the accident occurred would be unlikely to react to a warning sign. In addition, Mr. Laughlin's testimony points overwhelmingly to the conclusion that alcohol was the causal factor which led to this accident. The trial judge erred by misapprehending one comment in Mr. Laughlin's testimony and ignoring the significance of his testimony when taken as a whole.

Based on blood samples obtained by Constable Forbes approximately three hours after the accident occurred, Mr. Laughlin predicted that Mr. Nikolaisen's blood alcohol level at the time of the accident ranged from 180 to 210 milligrams percent. Mr. Laughlin commented at length on the effect that this level of blood alcohol could be expected to have on a person's ability to drive, testifying:

> Well, My Lady, this alcohol level that I've calculated here is a very high alcohol level. The critical mental faculties [that] are important in operating a motor vehicle will be impaired by the alcohol. And any skill that depends on these mental faculties will be affected. These include anticipation, judgment, attention, concentration, the ability to divide attention among two or more areas of interest. Because these are affected to such a degree, it would be unsafe for anybody to operate a motor vehicle with this level of alcohol in their body.

le véhicule de M. Nikolaisen avait fait une embardée même dans cette courbe. En outre, la juge de première instance a clairement commis une erreur en ne prenant pas en considération d'autres éléments de preuve pertinents concernant le lien de causalité, en particulier le fait que M. Nikolaisen avait roulé à trois reprises sur le chemin en question au cours des 18 à 20 heures ayant précédé l'accident.

161 Je ne partage pas l'avis de la juge de première instance voulant que le témoignage de M. Laughlin, spécialiste judiciaire en matière d'alcool au service de la GRC, étaye la conclusion que M. Nikolaisen aurait réagi à un panneau lui signalant l'imminence du virage droite où s'est produit l'accident. Le témoignage de M. Laughlin établit de façon prépondérante que des personnes dans un état d'ébriété aussi avancé que celui de M. Nikolaisen au moment de l'accident ne réagiraient vraisemblablement pas à un panneau d'avertissement. De plus, le témoignage de M. Laughlin mène irrésistiblement à la conclusion que l'alcool a été le facteur causal de l'accident. La juge de première instance a commis une erreur à cet égard, car elle a mal interprété un élément de la déposition de M. Laughlin et elle a omis de tenir compte de l'importance de son témoignage, considéré globalement.

162 À la lumière des échantillons de sang prélevés par la gendarme Forbes environ trois heures après l'accident, M. Laughlin a estimé que, au moment de l'accident, l'alcoolémie de M. Nikolaisen se situait entre 180 et 210 mg par 100 ml de sang. Dans son témoignage, M. Laughlin a commenté en détail l'incidence d'une telle alcoolémie sur la capacité d'une personne de conduire :

When asked about his knowledge of research pertaining to the effects of alcohol on the risk of being involved in an automobile accident, Mr. Laughlin had this to say:

> At this level the moderate user of alcohol risk of causing crash is tremendously high, probably 100 times that of a sober driver, or even higher. And in some cases at this level, I've seen scientific literature indicating that the risk of causing a fatal crash is 2 to 300 times that of a sober driver. . . . if an impaired person is an experienced drinker there — it won't be that high. However, there will be an increased risk compared to a sober state. . . . But above 100 milligrams percent, regardless of tolerance, a person will be impaired with respect to driving ability.

Interrogé sur l'état des recherches touchant l'incidence de l'alcool sur le risque d'accident automobile, voici ce qu'a dit M. Laughlin :

> [TRADUCTION] À ce taux-là, le risque qu'une personne qui consomme modérément de l'alcool provoque un accident est extrêmement élevé, probablement 100 fois plus élevé que le conducteur à jeun, ou plus encore. Et dans certains cas, à ce taux-là, j'ai lu des textes scientifiques dans lesquels on indiquait que le risque de provoquer un accident mortel est de 200 à 300 fois plus élevé que celui d'un conducteur à jeun. [. . .] [S]i la personne en état d'ébriété est quelqu'un qui a l'habitude de boire, le risque n'est pas aussi élevé. Cependant, il est plus grand que si la personne avait été à jeun. [. . .] Mais au dessus de 100 mg par 100 ml de sang, peu importe le degré de tolérance à l'alcool, une personne a les facultés affaiblies pour ce qui concerne sa capacité de conduire.

Following these comments, Mr. Laughlin discussed the ability of a severely impaired person to react to the presence of a hazard when driving:

> My Lady, I would like to add that the driving task is a demanding one and involves many multi-various tasks occurring at the same time. The hazard for a person under the influence of alcohol is it takes longer to notice a hazard or danger if one should occur; it takes longer to decide what corrective action is appropriate, and it takes longer to execute that decision and the person may tend to make incorrect decisions. So there is increased risk in that process. As well, if the impairment has progressed to the point where the motor skills are affected, the execution of that decision is impaired. So it's not a very graceful attempt at a corrective action. As well, some people tend to make more risks under the influence of alcohol. They do not apply sound reasoning and judgment. They are not able to properly assess the impairment of their driving skills, they are not able to properly assess the risk, not able to properly assess the changing road and weather conditions and adjust for that. But even if they do recognize those as hazards, they may tend to take more risks than a sober driver would.

Après avoir fait ces remarques, M. Laughlin a décrit la capacité d'une personne en état d'ébriété avancé de réagir à la présence d'un danger lorsqu'elle conduit.

> [TRADUCTION] Madame, j'aimerais ajouter que conduire un véhicule est une activité exigeante, qui demande d'accomplir une multiplicité de tâches simultanément. Le danger pour la personne qui conduit en état d'ébriété réside dans le fait qu'il lui faut plus de temps pour déceler la présence d'un risque ou d'un danger; il lui faut plus de temps pour décider quelle mesure corrective est requise, et elle prend plus de temps à mettre cette décision à exécution; de plus, une telle personne peut avoir tendance à prendre de mauvaises décisions. Ce processus accroît donc le risque. Aussi, si l'ébriété est avancée au point où les habiletés motrices sont affaiblies, l'exécution de la décision s'en trouve compromise. Il s'ensuit donc une tentative plutôt malhabile de corriger la situation. De plus, certaines personnes tendent à prendre davantage de risques lorsqu'elles sont en état d'ébriété. Elles ne font pas preuve de discernement et de jugement. Elles sont incapables d'évaluer correctement les changements dans l'état de la route et les conditions météorologiques et d'adapter leur conduite en conséquence. Mais même si elles reconnaissent qu'il s'agit effectivement de dangers, elles peuvent avoir tendance à prendre davantage de risques que le conducteur à jeun.

163 The above comments support the conclusion that the accident occurred as a result of Mr. Nikolaisen's impairment and not as a result of any failure on the part of the respondent. Indeed, when the portions of Mr. Laughlin's testimony that the trial judge relied on are considered in their context, they do not support her conclusion that Mr. Nikolaisen would have been able to react to a sign had one been posted. When asked by counsel whether it was possible for an individual with Mr. Nikolaisen's blood alcohol level to perceive and react to a road sign, Mr. Laughlin responded:

Les remarques qui précèdent étayent la conclusion que l'accident s'est produit en raison de l'état d'ébriété de M. Nikolaisen et non de quelque manquement de la part de l'intimée. De fait, lorsque les extraits du témoignage de M. Laughlin sur lesquels

> Yes, it's possible that a person will see and react to it and maybe react properly. It's possible that they will react improperly or may miss it altogether. I think what's key here is that at this level of alcohol, it's more likely that the person under this level of alcohol will either miss the sign or not react properly compared to the sober driver. That the driver with this level of alcohol will make more mistakes than will the sober driver. [Emphasis added.]

In the passage above, it is clear that Mr. Laughlin is merely admitting that anything is possible, while solidly expressing the view that drivers at this level of intoxication are more likely to not react to a sign or other warning. This view is also apparent in the following passage, in which Mr. Laughlin expands on the ability of an intoxicated driver to react to signs and other road conditions:

> What happens with respect to perception under the influence of alcohol is a driver tends to concentrate on the central field of vision, and miss certain indicators on the periphery, that's called tunnel vision. As well, drivers tend to concentrate on the lower part of that central field of view and therefore they don't have a very long preview distance in the course of operating a motor vehicle and looking down the road. And so studies indicate that under the influence of alcohol drivers tend to miss more signs, warnings, indicators, especially those in the peripheral field of view or farther down the road. [Emphasis added.]

In argument before this Court, the appellant emphasized that although Mr. Laughlin was the only expert to testify with respect to causation, lay witnesses testified that Mr. Nikolaisen was not visibly impaired prior to leaving the Thiel residence.

s'est fondée la juge de première instance sont examinés dans leur contexte, ils n'appuient pas la conclusion de cette dernière que M. Nikolaisen aurait été capable de réagir à un panneau de signalisation s'il y en avait eu un. Répondant à la question d'un avocat lui demandant s'il était possible qu'une personne ayant l'alcoolémie de M. Nikolaisen voit un panneau de signalisation et y réagisse, M. Laughlin a dit ceci :

Il est clair, dans le passage qui précède, que M. Laughlin reconnaît simplement que tout est possible, tout en avançant avec conviction qu'il y a une plus forte probabilité que les conducteurs ayant atteint ce degré d'ébriété ne réagissent pas à un panneau de signalisation ou à une autre mesure d'avertissement. Cette opinion ressort également clairement de l'extrait suivant, où il donne des précisions supplémentaires sur la capacité d'une personne en état d'ébriété de réagir aux panneaux de signalisation et à d'autres éléments sur les routes :

Au cours des plaidoiries devant notre Cour, l'appelant a souligné que, bien que M. Laughlin ait été le seul expert entendu au sujet du lien de causalité, les témoins ordinaires ont attesté que M. Nikolaisen n'avait pas les facultés visiblement

It is not clear from the trial judge's reasons that she relied on testimony to this effect given by Craig Thiel, Toby Thiel and Paul Housen. To the extent that she did rely on such evidence to establish that the accident was caused in part by the respondent's negligence, I find this reliance to be unreasonable. Whereas the lay witnesses in this case were qualified to give their opinion on whether they, as ordinary drivers, could safely negotiate the segment of Snake Hill Road on which the accident occurred, they were not qualified to assess the degree of Mr. Nikolaisen's impairment. The reason for their lack of qualification in this regard was explained by Mr. Laughlin in the following response to counsel's question on whether it is possible to draw a conclusion from the fact that an individual does not exhibit any impairment of their motor skills and speech:

> No, Your Honour, because, My Lady, when you're looking at motor skill impairment or for signs of motor skill impairment, you're looking for signs of intoxication, not impairment. Remember I mentioned that the first components affected by alcohol are cognitive and mental faculties. These are all important in driving. However, it is very difficult when you look at an individual who has been consuming alcohol to tell that they have impaired in attention or divided attention, or concentration, or judgment. So as an indicator of impairment, motor skills are not reliable. And if you think about the Criminal Code process, they've been abandoned 30 years ago as a useful indicator of impairment. No longer do we rely on police officers subjective assessment of person's motor skills to determine impairment. [Emphasis added.]

165 It is also clear from the trial judge's reasons that she relied to some extent on evidence that Mr. Nikolaisen successfully negotiated the curve at the point where the driveway to the Thiel residence intersected the road. I agree with the respondent that this fact is simply not relevant. The ability of Mr. Nikolaisen to negotiate this curve does not establish that his driving ability was not impaired. As noted by the respondent, at para. 101 of its factum, he may affaiblies avant de quitter la résidence des Thiel. Les motifs de la juge de première instance n'indiquent pas clairement si elle s'est appuyée sur les témoignages de Craig Thiel, Toby Thiel et Paul Housen à cet égard. Dans la mesure où elle se serait fondée sur cette preuve pour conclure que l'accident avait été causé en partie par la négligence de l'intimée, j'estime qu'il était déraisonnable de le faire. En l'espèce, bien que compétents pour exprimer leur opinion sur la question de savoir s'ils pourraient, en tant que conducteurs moyens, manœuvrer en toute sécurité sur le tronçon du chemin Snake Hill où l'accident s'est produit, les témoins ordinaires n'étaient pas compétents pour évaluer le degré d'ébriété de M. Nikolaisen. La raison de leur absence de compétence à cet égard a été expliquée en ces termes par M. Laughlin, dans la réponse suivante qu'il a donnée à l'un des avocats qui lui demandait s'il était possible de tirer des conclusions du fait qu'une personne ne démontre ni signe d'affaiblissement de ses habiletés motrices ni problème d'élocution :

Il appert également des motifs de la juge de première instance qu'elle s'est dans une certaine mesure fondée sur la preuve indiquant que M. Nikolaisen avait réussi à prendre le virage à l'intersection de l'entrée de la résidence des Thiel et du chemin Snake Hill. Je partage l'avis de l'intimée selon lequel ce fait n'est tout simplement pas pertinent. La capacité de M. Nikolaisen de prendre ce virage n'établit pas que sa capacité de conduire have been driving more slowly at this point, or he may simply have been lucky. More importantly, this evidence contributes nothing to the issue of whether or not Mr. Nikolaisen would have reacted to a sign on the curve where the accident occurred, had one been present. There was no sign on the curve one faces upon leaving the driveway, just as there was no sign on the curve where the accident took place.

n'était pas affaiblie. Comme l'a souligné l'intimée, au par. 101 de son mémoire, il a pu réduire sa vitesse à cet endroit, ou simplement avoir eu de la chance. Facteur plus important encore cette preuve n'aide d'aucune façon à déterminer si M. Nikolaisen aurait réagi à un panneau placé à l'approche de la courbe où s'est produit l'accident, si un tel panneau avait existé. Il n'y avait aucun panneau aux abords de la courbe située à la sortie de l'entrée, tout comme il n'y en avait pas aux abords de celle où s'est produit l'accident.

At any rate, the trial judge's reliance on Mr. Nikolaisen's successful negotiation of the curve at the location of the Thiel driveway ignores relevant evidence that he had swerved or "fish-tailed" when leaving the Thiel residence. A reasonable inference to be drawn from this evidence is that while Mr. Nikolaisen was able to negotiate this curve, he did not do so free from difficulty. While this evidence may not be significant in and of itself, it should have been enough to alert the trial judge to the problems inherent in the inference she drew from his ability to navigate this earlier curve.

166 Quoi qu'il en soit, en se fondant sur le fait que M. Nikolaisen avait pris avec succès le virage devant l'entrée des Thiel, la juge de première instance a fait abstraction de l'élément de preuve pertinent indiquant que l'arrière de son véhicule avait zigzagué à son départ de la résidence des Thiel. On peut raisonnablement inférer de cette preuve que, quoique M. Nikolaisen ait été en mesure de prendre ce virage, il n'y est pas parvenu sans difficulté. Bien que cette preuve ne soit pas nécessairement importante en soi, elle aurait dû néanmoins alerter la juge de première instance quant aux problèmes intrinsèques de l'inférence qu'elle tirait de la capacité de M. Nikolaisen de prendre ce premier virage.

In addition to ignoring the relevant evidence of the fish-tail marks, the trial judge failed to consider the relevance of the fact that Mr. Nikolaisen had travelled Snake Hill Road three times in the 18 to 20 hours preceding the accident. In her review of the evidence, she noted at para. 8 of her reasons that: "Mr. Nikolaisen was unfamiliar with Snake Hill Road. While he had in the preceding 24 hours travelled the road three times, only once was in the same direction that he was travelling upon leaving the Thiel residence."

167 En plus de ne pas avoir tenu compte de la preuve pertinente que constituaient les traces des zigzags, la juge de première instance n'a pas considéré pertinent le fait que M. Nikolaisen avait circulé sur le chemin Snake Hill à trois reprises au cours des 18 à 20 heures ayant précédé l'accident. Dans son examen de la preuve, elle a souligné, au par. 8 de ses motifs, que [TRADUCTION] « M. Nikolaisen ne connaissait pas bien le chemin Snake Hill. Bien qu'il ait emprunté ce chemin à trois reprises au cours des 24 heures précédentes, il ne l'a fait qu'une seule fois dans la même direction que celle qu'il a prise en quittant la résidence des Thiel. »

I simply cannot see how the trial judge found accidents which occurred when motorists were travelling in the opposite direction relevant to the issue of the respondent's knowledge of a risk to motorists while at the same time suggesting that the fact that Mr. Nikolaisen had driven the road in the opposite direction twice was irrelevant to the issue of whether or not he would have recognized that the curve posed a risk or that he would have reacted to a warning sign. This discrepancy aside, I find the fact that Mr. Nikolaisen had travelled Snake Hill Road in the same direction when he left the Thiel residence to go to the Jamboree the evening before the accident highly relevant to the causation issue. The finding that the outcome would have been different had Mr. Nikolaisen been forewarned of the curve ignores the fact that he already knew that the curve was there. I agree with the respondent that the obvious reason Mr. Nikolaisen was unable to safely negotiate the curve on the afternoon of the 18th, despite having negotiated this curve and others without difficulty in the preceding 18 to 20 hours was the combined effect of his drinking, lack of sleep and lack of food.

168 Je ne vois tout simplement pas comment la juge de première instance a pu conclure que les accidents qu'ont eu des automobilistes circulant en sens inverse étaient pertinents pour statuer sur la connaissance par l'intimée de l'existence d'un risque d'accident, tout en suggérant du même souffle que le fait que M. Nikolaisen ait roulé à deux reprises

169 In conclusion on the issue of causation, I wish to clarify that the fact that the trial judge referred to some evidence to support her findings on this issue does not insulate those findings from review by this Court. The standard of review for findings of fact is reasonableness, not absolute deference. Such a standard entitles the appellate court to assess whether or not it was clearly wrong for the trial judge to rely on some evidence when other evidence points overwhelmingly to the opposite conclusion. The logic of this approach was aptly explained by Kerans, supra, in the following passage at p. 44:

> The key to the problem is whether the reviewer is to look merely for "evidence to support" the finding. Some evidence might indeed support the finding, but other evidence may point overwhelmingly the other way. A court might be able to say that reliance on the "some" in the face of the "other" was not what the reasonable trier of fact would do; indeed, it might say that, in all the circumstances it was convinced that to rely on the one in the face of the other was quite unreasonable. To say that "some evidence" is enough, then, without regard to that "other en sens inverse sur le chemin en question n'était pas pertinent pour déterminer s'il aurait reconnu que la courbe présentait un risque ou s'il aurait réagi à un panneau d'avertissement. Indépendamment de cette contradiction, j'estime que le fait que M. Nikolaisen ait roulé dans la même direction sur le chemin Snake Hill après avoir quitté la résidence des Thiel pour se rendre au jamboree, la veille de l'accident, est fort pertinent en ce qui concerne le lien de causalité. La conclusion que le résultat aurait été différent si une signalisation avait prévenu M. Nikolaisen de l'existence de la courbe ne tient pas compte du fait qu'il savait déjà qu'elle existait. Je souscris à l'opinion de l'intimée que la raison évidente pour laquelle M. Nikolaisen n'a pas réussi à prendre le virage en toute sécurité dans l'après-midi du 18, alors qu'il avait déjà pris ce virage et d'autres sans difficulté au cours des 18 à 20 heures précédentes, était l'effet combiné de sa consommation d'alcool, de son manque de sommeil et du fait qu'il n'avait pas mangé.

Pour conclure sur la question du lien de causalité, j'aimerais préciser que le fait que la juge de première instance ait mentionné certains éléments de preuve au soutien de ses conclusions sur ce point n'a pas pour effet de soustraire ces conclusions au pouvoir de contrôle de notre Cour. La norme de contrôle applicable aux conclusions de fait est celle de la décision raisonnable et non celle de la retenue absolue. Cette norme permet au tribunal d'appel de se demander si le juge de première instance a clairement fait erreur en décidant comme il l'a fait sur le fondement de certains éléments de preuve alors que d'autres éléments mènent irrésistiblement à la conclusion inverse. Kerans, op. cit., p. 44, a habilement exposé la logique de cette démarche dans le passage suivant :

> [TRADUCTION] La solution au problème réside dans la réponse à la question de savoir si le tribunal de révision doit simplement se demander s'il existe « des éléments de preuve étayant » la conclusion. Il est possible que certains éléments de preuve étayent effectivement la conclusion alors que d'autres éléments conduisent irrésistiblement à la conclusion inverse. Un tribunal pourrait être en mesure de dire qu'un juge des faits raisonnable ne s'appuierait pas sur « certains » éléments vu l'existence des « autres »; de fait, il pourrait dire que, eu égard à evidence" is to turn one's back on review for reasonableness.

D. Did the Courts Below Err in Finding that no Common Law Duty of Care Exists Alongside the Statutory Duty Imposed Under Section 192 of The Rural Municipality Act, 1989?

The appellant urges this Court to find that a common law duty of care exists alongside the statutory duty of care imposed on the respondent by s. 192 of The Rural Municipality Act, 1989. According to the appellant, the application of the common law duty of care would free the Court from the need to focus on how a reasonable driver exercising ordinary care would have navigated the road in question. The appellant submits that the Court would instead apply the "classic reasonableness formulation" which, in its view, would require the Court to take into account the likelihood of a known or foreseeable harm, the gravity of that harm, and the burden or cost of preventing that harm. The appellant argues that the respondent would be held liable under this test.

The courts below rejected the above argument when it was put to them by the appellant. I would not interfere with their ruling on this issue for the reason that it is unnecessary for this Court to impose a common law duty of care where a statutory one clearly exists. In any event, the application of the common law test would not affect the outcome in these proceedings.

I agree with the respondent's submissions that in this case, where the legislature has clearly imposed a statutory duty of care on the respondents, it would be redundant and unnecessary to find that a common law duty of care exists. The two-part test to establish a common law duty of care set out in Kamloops (City of) v. Nielsen, [1984] 2 S.C.R. 2, simply has no application where the legislature has defined a statutory duty. As was stated by this Court in Brown l'ensemble des circonstances, il est convaincu qu'il était tout à fait déraisonnable de se fonder sur certains éléments compte tenu des autres. En conséquence, affirmer que « certains éléments de preuve » suffisent, sans égard aux « autres éléments », revient à abandonner l'examen du caractère raisonnable.

D. Les juridictions inférieures ont-elles commis une erreur en concluant qu'aucune obligation de diligence de common law ne coexiste avec l'obligation légale imposée par l'art. 192 de la Rural Municipality Act, 1989?

170 L'appelant invite notre Cour à conclure qu'une obligation de diligence de common law coexiste avec l'obligation légale de diligence imposée à l'intimée par l'art. 192 de la Rural Municipality Act, 1989. Selon l'appelant, l'application de l'obligation de diligence de common law dispenserait la Cour de la nécessité de se demander comment un conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales aurait roulé sur le chemin en cause. L'appelant soutient que la Cour pourrait plutôt appliquer le [TRADUCTION] « critère classique de la conduite raisonnable », lequel, à son avis, l'obligerait à tenir compte des éléments suivants : la probabilité qu'un préjudice connu ou prévisible survienne, la gravité de ce préjudice et le fardeau ou le coût qu'il faudrait assumer pour le prévenir. L'appelant prétend que, suivant ce critère, l'intimée serait tenue responsable.

172 Je souscris à l'argument de l'intimée selon lequel, en l'espèce, il serait redondant et inutile de conclure qu'elle est assujettie à une obligation de diligence de common law alors que le législateur lui a clairement imposé une obligation légale de diligence. Le critère à deux volets énoncé dans l'arrêt Kamloops (Ville de) c. Nielsen, [1984] 2 R.C.S. 2, pour statuer sur l'existence d'une obligation de diligence de common law, ne s'applique tout

v. British Columbia (Minister of Transportation and Highways), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 420, at p. 424:

> . . . if a statutory duty to maintain existed as it does in some provinces, it would be unnecessary to find a private law duty on the basis of the neighbourhood principle in Anns v. Merton London Borough Council, [1978] A.C. 728. Moreover, it is only necessary to consider the policy/operational dichotomy in connection with the search for a private law duty of care.

All of the authorities cited by the appellant as support for the imposition of an independent common law duty of care can be distinguished from the case at hand on the basis that no statutory duty of care existed (Just, supra; Brown, supra; Swinamer v. Nova Scotia (Attorney General), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 445; Ryan, supra).

173 In addition, I find that the outcome in this case would not be different if the case were determined according to ordinary negligence principles. First, were the Court to engage in a common law analysis, it would still look to the statutory standard of care as laid out in The Rural Municipality Act, 1989, as interpreted by the case law in order to assess the scope of liability owed by the respondent to the appellant. As this Court stated in Ryan, supra, at para. 29:

> Statutory standards can, however, be highly relevant to the assessment of reasonable conduct in a particular case, and in fact may render reasonable an act or omission which would otherwise appear to be negligent. This allows courts to consider the legislative framework in which people and companies must operate, while at the same time recognizing that one cannot avoid the underlying obligation of reasonable care simply by discharging statutory duties.

174 Moreover, even under the common law analysis, this Court would be called upon to question the type of hazards that the respondent, in this case, ought to have foreseen. Whatever the approach, it is only reasonable simplement pas lorsque le législateur a prescrit l'obligation dans la loi. Comme l'a indiqué notre Cour dans l'arrêt Brown c. Colombie-Britannique (Ministre des Transports et de la Voirie), [1994] 1 R.C.S. 420, p. 424 :

> . . . s'il existait une obligation d'entretien imposée par la loi comme c'est le cas dans certaines provinces, il serait inutile de rechercher une obligation en droit privé en se fondant sur le principe du prochain établi dans l'arrêt Anns c. Merton London Borough Council, [1978] A.C. 728. En outre, il est nécessaire d'examiner la dichotomie politique générale-opérations seulement en ce qui concerne la recherche d'une obligation de diligence en droit privé.

Tous les arrêts invoqués par l'appelant pour justifier sa prétention que la municipalité devrait être assujettie à une obligation indépendante de diligence de common law peuvent être distingués de la présente affaire, étant donné qu'il n'existait aucune obligation légale de diligence dans ces affaires (Just, précitée; Brown, précitée; Swinamer c. Nouvelle-Écosse (Procureur général), [1994] 1 R.C.S. 445; Ryan, précitée).

En outre, j'estime que le résultat serait le même en l'espèce si l'affaire était tranchée d'après les principes ordinaires de la négligence. Tout d'abord, si la Cour faisait l'analyse prévue par la common law, elle appliquerait quand même la norme légale de diligence établie dans la Rural Municipality Act, 1989, telle qu'elle a été interprétée par la jurisprudence, pour déterminer l'étendue de la responsabilité de l'intimée envers l'appelant. Comme l'a dit notre Cour dans l'arrêt Ryan, précité, par. 29 :

> Cependant, les normes législatives peuvent être hautement pertinentes pour déterminer ce qui constitue une conduite raisonnable dans un cas particulier, et elles peuvent, en fait, rendre raisonnable un acte ou une omission qui, autrement, paraîtrait négligent. En conséquence, les tribunaux peuvent examiner le cadre législatif dans lequel les personnes et les sociétés doivent agir, tout en reconnaissant qu'il est impossible de se soustraire à l'obligation sous-jacente de diligence raisonnable simplement en s'acquittant de ses obligations légales.

De plus, même dans le cadre de l'analyse requise par la common law, notre Cour devrait s'interroger sur le type de dangers que l'intimée aurait dû prévoir en l'espèce. Indépendamment de l'approche choisie, sonable to expect a municipality to foresee accidents which occur as a result of the conditions of the road, and not, as in this case, as a result of the condition of the driver.

The courts have long restricted the standard of care under the statutory duty to require municipalities to repair only those hazards which would pose a risk to the reasonable driver exercising ordinary care. Compelling reasons exist to maintain this interpretation. The municipalities within the province of Saskatchewan have some 175,000 kilometres of roads under their care and control, 45,000 kilometres of which fall within the "bladed trail" category. These municipalities, for the most part, do not boast large, permanent staffs with extensive time and budgetary resources. To expand the repair obligation of municipalities to require them to take into account the actions of unreasonable or careless drivers when discharging this duty would signify a drastic and unworkable change to the current standard. Accordingly, it is a change that I would not be prepared to make.

VII. Disposition

In the result, the judgment of the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal is affirmed and the appeal is dismissed with costs.

Appeal allowed with costs, GONTHIER, BASTARACHE, BINNIE and LEBEL JJ. dissenting.

Solicitors for the appellant: Robertson Stromberg, Saskatoon; Quon Ferguson MacKinnon, Saskatoon.

Solicitors for the respondent: Gerrand Rath Johnson, Regina.

il n'est que raisonnable d'attendre d'une municipalité qu'elle prévoit les accidents qui surviennent en raison de l'état du chemin, et non, comme en l'espèce, ceux qui résultent de l'état du conducteur.

175 Depuis longtemps, les tribunaux limitent l'étendue de la norme de diligence découlant de l'existence d'un devoir légal de diligence à l'obligation pour les municipalités d'éliminer seulement les dangers qui présenteraient un risque pour le conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales. Des raisons impérieuses militent en faveur du maintien de cette interprétation. Les municipalités de la province de la Saskatchewan assument l'entretien et la surveillance de quelque 175 000 kilomètres de route, dont 45 000 kilomètres font partie de la catégorie des « chemins nivelés ». La plupart de ces municipalités ne disposent ni d'effectifs permanents considérables ni de ressources importantes en temps et en argent. Élargir l'obligation d'entretien des municipalités en exigeant qu'elles tiennent compte, dans l'exécution de cette obligation, des actes des conducteurs déraisonnables ou imprudents, entraînerait une modification radicale et irréalisable de la norme actuelle. Il s'agit en conséquent d'un changement que je ne serais pas disposé à apporter.

VII. Dispositif

176 En définitive, le jugement de la Cour de l'appel de la Saskatchewan est confirmé et le pourvoi est rejeté avec dépens.

ON APPEAL FROM THE FEDERAL COURT OF APPEAL

Intellectual property — Copyright — Right to communicate a work to the public by telecommunication — Copyright Board certifying tariff for communication rights in copyrighted music contained in video games sold for download on Internet — Whether transmission of musical works contained in a video game through an Internet download is a communication to the public — Copyright Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-42, s. 3(1)(f).

The appellants ESA represent a coalition of video game publishers and distributors who enable customers to download copies of video games from the Internet. These copies are identical to copies purchased in stores or shipped to customers by mail. The video games contain copyrighted musical works. The royalties for the reproduction of those musical works are negotiated before the games are sold to the public. The respondent SOCAN, which administers the right to "communicate" musical works on behalf of copyright owners, applied to the Copyright Board for a tariff covering downloads of musical works over the Internet. The Copyright Board concluded that the download of a file containing a musical work is a communication to the public by telecommunication within the meaning of s. 3(1)(f) of the Copyright Act, entitling SOCAN's members to compensation in accordance with an approved tariff. On judicial review, the Federal Court of Appeal upheld the Copyright Board's decision.

Held (LeBel, Fish, Rothstein and Cromwell JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be allowed.

Per McLachlin C.J. and Deschamps, Abella, Moldaver and Karakatsanis JJ.: The Copyright Board's conclusion that the Internet delivery of a permanent copy of a video game containing musical works amounted to a "communication" under s. 3(1)(f) of the Copyright Act should be set aside.

The Board's conclusion that a separate, "communication" tariff applies to downloads of musical works violates the principle of technological neutrality. This principle requires that the Act apply equally between traditional and more technologically advanced media forms. There is no practical difference between buying a durable copy of the work in a store, receiving a copy in the mail, or downloading an identical copy using the Internet. ESA has already paid reproduction royalties to the copyright owners for the video games. Absent evidence of Parliamentary intent to the contrary, we interpret the Act in a way that avoids imposing an additional layer of protections and fees based solely on the method of delivery of the work to the end user. To do otherwise would effectively impose a gratuitous cost for the use of more efficient, Internet-based technologies. The Internet should be seen as a technological taxi that delivers a durable copy of the same work to the end user. The traditional balance in copyright between promoting the public interest in the encouragement and dissemination of works and obtaining a just reward for the creators of those works should be preserved in the digital environment.

The term "communicate" in s. 3(1)(f) is not defined in the Act, but the legislative history of the Act demonstrates that the right to "communicate" is historically connected to the right to perform a work and not the right to reproduce permanent copies of the work. The 1988 amendment in the Act from "communicate . . . by radio communication" to "communicate . . . by telecommunication" does not demonstrate Parliament's intent to remove all reference in s. 3(1)(f) to conventional performance or broadcasting activities, or to expand the communication right to technologies such as downloading that involve transmitting data in a way that gives end users a permanent copy of the work. Instead, the replacement of the words "radio communication" with "telecommunication" should be understood as merely expanding the means of communicating a work — that is, from radio waves to cable and other future technologies. By substituting the word "telecommunication" in 1988, Parliament did not intend to change the fundamental nature of the communication right, which has been concerned with performance-based activities for over 50 years.

Applying the dictionary definition of the word "communicate" has the effect of ignoring a solid line of legislative history connecting the term "communicate" to performance-based activities. The term "communicate" in s. 3(1)(f) should not be transformed by the use of the word "telecommunication" in a way that would capture activities that resemble reproduction. Such transformation would result in abandoning the traditional distinction in the Act between performance-based rights and rights of reproduction.

Per LeBel, Fish, Rothstein and Cromwell JJ. (dissenting): The creators of works downloaded from the Internet are entitled to both communication and reproduction rights. Copyright is a creature of statute comprised of a bundle of independent statutory rights. Although a technologically neutral copyright law is desirable, the Act cannot be interpreted in a manner that divests these rights of their independent content. The right of reproduction continues to apply to copies made through downloads notwithstanding that they are digital copies and the communication right continues to apply to digital communications notwithstanding that they may differ from traditional broadcasting technologies.

The general rules of statutory interpretation require that the words of the Act are to be read in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament. The word "communicate" is not defined in the Act. Parliament is presumed to use words in their ordinary meaning and dictionary definitions give "communicate" and "transmit" overlapping meanings. Nothing in the context in which the words are used in the Act indicates that "communicate" is distinct in meaning from "transmit" or is limited to transmissions of information in a humanly perceptible form for immediate perceiving and listening.

The communication right set out in s. 3(1)(f) of the Act is a self-standing right that is independent of the performance right set out in the introductory portion of s. 3(1). The rights listed in paragraphs 3(1)(a) to 3(1)(i) are in addition to the rights to produce or reproduce, perform or publish. Nor does the legislative history of s. 3(1)(f) confine the communication right to being only a variation of the performance right. Although there is an historic relationship between the right of public performance and the right to communicate to the public, the legislation has evolved. By adopting the word "telecommunication", Parliament removed the historic reference to conventional broadcasting and encompassed evolving technologies. The current language of the Act does not support a conclusion that s. 3(1)(f) only applies to traditional broadcasting technologies.

The application of the communication right does not depend on the purpose of the communication. The fact that the Internet transmission delivers a copy of a video game, which contains a musical work, does not change the fact that there is an Internet communication requiring authorization of the copyright holder.

No policy concern arises because the reproduction right and the communication right are distinct and separate rights. The fact that there are two protected rights does not restrict the protection afforded by each right. To characterize an Internet transmission as a mere "method of delivery" of a work and limit the copyright to reproduction rights would pre-empt the application of the communication right. Inferring limits into the communication right for policy reasons is beyond the function of the courts.

The judgment of McLachlin C.J. and Deschamps, Abella, Moldaver and Karakatsanis JJ. was delivered by [1] ABELLA AND MOLDAVER JJ. — In the video game publishing industry, the royalties for the reproduction of any musical works which are incorporated into the games are currently negotiated before the games are packaged for public sale.

Once these rights have been negotiated, the owner of the copyright in the musical work has no further rights when the game is sold. The question in this appeal is whether the rights are nonetheless revived when the work is sold over the Internet instead of in a store. In our view, it makes little sense to distinguish between the two methods of selling the same work.

[2] The Copyright Board concluded that video games containing a musical work, the royalties to which have already been negotiated with the copyright owner, were nonetheless subject to a new fee when sold over the Internet ((2007), 61 C.P.R. (4th) 353). Its decision was upheld by the Federal Court of Appeal (2010 FCA 221, 406 N.R. 288). In our respectful view, the Board's decision misconstrues the provisions at issue in the Copyright Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-42, ignoring decades of legislative history, and violates the principle of technological neutrality, which requires that the Act apply equally notwithstanding the technological diversity of different forms of media.

Analysis

[3] The provision at issue in this appeal is s. 3(1)(f) of the Copyright Act, which states that copyright owners have the sole right > in the case of any literary, dramatic, musical or artistic work, to communicate the work to the public by telecommunication . . . .

[4] The focus of this appeal is on the meaning of the word "communicate" in s. 3(1)(f), a term which is not defined in the Act. The Society of Composers, Authors and Music Publishers of Canada (SOCAN), which administers the right to "communicate" musical works on behalf of copyright owners, applied to the Board for a tariff under this provision to cover downloads of musical works over the Internet. The Entertainment Software Association and the Entertainment Software Association of Canada (collectively, ESA), which represent a broad coalition of video game publishers and distributors, objected to the tariff, arguing that "downloading" a video game containing musical works did not amount to "communicating" that game to the public by telecommunication under s. 3(1)(f). Instead, a "download" is merely an additional, more efficient way to deliver copies of the games to customers. The downloaded copy is identical to copies purchased in stores or shipped to customers by mail, and the game publishers already pay copyright owners reproduction royalties for all of these copying activities.

[5] We agree with ESA. In our view, the Board's conclusion that a separate, "communication" tariff applied to downloads of musical works violates the principle of technological neutrality, which requires that the Copyright Act apply equally between traditional and more technologically advanced forms of the same media: Robertson v. Thomson Corp., [2006] 2 S.C.R. 363, at para. 49. The principle of technological neutrality is reflected in s. 3(1) of the Act, which describes a right to produce or reproduce a work "in any material form whatever". In our view, there is no practical difference between buying a durable copy of the work in a store, receiving a copy in the mail, or downloading an identical copy using the Internet. The Internet is simply a technological taxi that delivers a durable copy of the same work to the end user.

[6] This argument is echoed by David Vaver in his book, Intellectual Property Law: Copyright, Patents, Trade-marks (2nd ed. 2011), where he appears to criticize the Board's decision in this particular case:

> In principle, substitute delivery systems should compete on their merits: either both or neither should pay. Copyright law should strive for technological neutrality.
> . . .
> In the past, whether a customer bought a sound recording or video game physically at a store or ordered it by mail made no difference to the copyright holder: it got nothing extra for the clerk's or courier's handover of the record to the customer. Now, because of the telecommunication right, copyright holders can and do charge extra for electronic delivery of identical content acquired off websites. [Emphasis added; pp. 172-73.]

[7] ESA's argument is also consistent with this Court's caution in Théberge v. Galerie d'Art du Petit Champlain inc., [2002] 2 S.C.R. 336, that the balance in copyright between promoting the public interest in the encouragement and dissemination of works and obtaining a just reward for the creator requires recognizing the "limited nature" of creators' rights:

> The proper balance among these and other public policy objectives lies not only in recognizing the creator's rights but in giving due weight to their limited nature. In crassly economic terms it would be as > inefficient to overcompensate artists and authors for the right of reproduction as it would be self-defeating to undercompensate them. Once an authorized copy of a work is sold to a member of the public, it is generally for the purchaser, not the author, to determine what happens to it. [Emphasis added; para. 31.]

[8] The traditional balance between authors and users should be preserved in the digital environment: Carys Craig, "Locking Out Lawful Users: Fair Dealing and Anti-Circumvention in Bill C-32", in Michael Geist, ed., From "Radical Extremism" to "Balanced Copyright": Canadian Copyright and the Digital Agenda (2010), 177, at p. 192.

[9] SOCAN has never been able to charge royalties for copies of video games stored on cartridges or discs, and bought in a store or shipped by mail. Yet it argues that identical copies of the games sold and delivered over the Internet are subject to both a fee for reproducing the work and a fee for communicating the work. The principle of technological neutrality requires that, absent evidence of Parliamentary intent to the contrary, we interpret the Copyright Act in a way that avoids imposing an additional layer of protections and fees based solely on the method of delivery of the work to the end user. To do otherwise would effectively impose a gratuitous cost for the use of more efficient, Internet-based technologies.

[10] The Board's misstep is clear from its definition of "download" as "a file containing data . . . the user is meant to keep as his own" (para. 13). The Board recognized that downloading is a copying exercise that creates an exact, durable copy of the digital file on the user's computer, identical to copies purchased in stores or through the mail. Nevertheless, it concluded that delivering a copy through the Internet was subject to two fees — one for reproduction and one for communication — while delivering a copy through stores or mail was subject only to reproduction fees. In coming to this conclusion, the Board ignored the principle of technological neutrality.

[11] Justice Rothstein argues (at para. 126) that the Board can avoid such "double-dipping" by copyright owners by adjusting the two fees in a way that "divides the pie" between the collective societies administering reproduction rights, on the one hand, and communication rights, on the other. However, this seems to us to undermine Parliament's purpose in creating the collective societies in the first place, namely to efficiently manage and administer different copyrights under the Act. This inefficiency harms both end users and copyright owners:

> When a single economic activity implicates more than one type of right and each type is administered by a separate collective, the multiplicity of licences required can lead to inefficiency. . . . The result is that the total price the user has to pay for all complements is too high . . . .
>
> . . . the fragmentation of licences required for single activities among several monopolist-collectives generates inefficiencies, from which copyright owners as a whole also suffer . . . .

[12] In our view, the Board improperly concluded that the Internet delivery of copies of video games containing musical works amounts to "communicating" the works to the public. This view is evidenced by the legislative history of the Copyright Act, which demonstrates that the right to "communicate" is historically connected to the right to perform a work and not the right to reproduce permanent copies of the work.

[13] As this Court held in Bishop v. Stevens, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 467, at pp. 473-74, the 1921 Canadian Copyright Act was based on, and designed to implement, the following provisions of the 1886 Berne Convention for the Protection of Literary and Artistic Works, as revised in the 1908 Berlin Revision:

>
> The stipulations of the present Convention shall apply to the public representation of dramatic or dramatico-musical works and to the public performance of musical works, whether such works be published or not.
> . . .
>
>
> The authors of musical works shall have the exclusive right of authorizing (1) the adaptation of those works to instruments which can reproduce them mechanically; (2) the public performance of the said works by means of these instruments.
> . . .
>
> Authors of literary, scientific or artistic works shall have the exclusive right of authorizing the reproduction and public representation of their works by cinematography.

[14] These articles were reflected in the introductory paragraph to s. 3(1) of the Copyright Act, 1921, S.C. 1921, c. 24, which granted > the sole right to produce or reproduce the work or any substantial part thereof in any material form whatsoever, to perform, or in the case of a lecture to deliver, the work or any substantial part thereof in public; if the work is unpublished, to publish the work or any substantial part thereof; . . .

[15] In the 1921 Act, "performance" was defined in s. 2(q) as > any acoustic representation of a work and any visual representation of any dramatic action in a work, including such a representation made by means of any mechanical instrument;

[16] The right to perform historically presupposed a live audience that would be present at the site where the performance took place. With the advent of radio broadcasting, however, a debate emerged about how this new technology should be treated under copyright law, reminiscent of the current debate over Internet technologies. The international consensus was that radio broadcasting should be treated as an extension of the existing performance right, in order to cover distant audiences: Paul Goldstein and P. Bernt Hugenholtz, International Copyright: Principles, Law, and Practice (2nd ed. 2010), at §9.1.4.3; Pierre-Emmanuel Moyse, Le droit de distribution: analyse historique et comparative en droit d'auteur (2007), at pp. 309-10. The Rome Revision (1928) of the Berne Convention therefore extended the Article 11 performance right. The new Article 11*bis* conferred on authors the "exclusive right of authorizing the communication of their works to the public by radiocommunication".

> (f) In case of any literary, dramatic, musical or artistic work, to communicate such work by radio communication.
> (Copyright Amendment Act, 1931, S.C. 1931, c. 8, s. 3)

[18] At the same time, the 1931 Copyright Amendment Act amended the definition of "performance" to accommodate this new concept of performances at a distance:

> "performance" means any acoustic representation of a work . . . including a representation made by means of any mechanical instrument or by radio communication. [s. 2(3)]

[19] Like a performance, communicating a work by radio communication (i.e., a radio broadcast) under s. 3(1)(f) involved an "acoustic representation" of a work. Also like a performance, communication under s. 3(1)(f) did not contemplate the delivery of permanent copies of the work, since such a delivery was not possible through the means of Hertzian radio waves.

[20] This interpretation of the original s. 3(1)(f) is supported by the legislative debates. In explaining the purpose of this provision to Parliament, the Minister responsible for the amendments, C. H. Cahan, stated that s. 3(1)(f) was intended to bring the Copyright Act into conformity with the Rome Revision of the Berne Convention (House of Commons Debates, vol. 1, 2nd Sess., 17th Parl., April 23, 1931, at pp. 899-900), and that "radio communication" was a form of performance:

> In England, the courts have decided that radio communication comes within the meaning of the word performance; but in order to make it clear that the author's rights include not only the right of performance by acoustic representation and so forth, but also by radio communication, we have added those words "or by radio communication" to the present definition of performances as contained in the act. . . . I am simply adding the words "or by radio communication" to make it clear that in respect of radio communication the author has exactly the same rights as he has in relation to other performances of his work. [Emphasis added.]

[21] This was also the interpretation of the original s. 3(1)(f) by this Court in Composers, Authors and Publishers Assoc. of Canada Ltd. v. CTV Television Network Ltd., [1968] S.C.R. 676. The Court held that signals transmitted from CTV to its affiliates did not communicate "musical works" — at the time defined as "reduced to writing" — but instead communicated a "performance" of the works. In obiter, the Court went on to hold that Article 11*bis* of the Rome Convention, on which s. 3(1)(f) was based, was intended to cover public performances by radio broadcasting (pp. 680-82). Moreover, it held that "communication" is "apt to include performances in its meaning" (p. 681). As a result, the Court concluded that s. 3(1)(f) must include the exclusive right of public performance by radio broadcasting.

[22] After 1931, there were no changes to s. 3(1)(f) until 1988. In 1988, s. 3(1)(f) was amended to read as follows:

> (f) in the case of any literary, dramatic, musical or artistic work, to communicate the work to the public by telecommunication. . . .
> (Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement Implementation Act, S.C. 1988, c. 65, s. 62)

[23] SOCAN argues that the 1988 amendment from "radio communication" to "telecommunication" demonstrates Parliament's intent to remove all reference in s. 3(1)(f) to conventional performance or broadcasting activities, and to expand the communication right to technologies that involve transmitting data in a way that gives end users a permanent copy of the work.

[24] With respect, we disagree. The 1988 amendments to the Copyright Act found at ss. 61 to 65 of the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement Implementation Act, were enacted in order to give effect to Articles 2005 and 2006 of the 1987 Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement (CUFTA): see Canadian Wireless Telecommunications Assn. v. Society of Composers, Authors and Music Publishers of Canada, 2008 FCA 6, [2008] 3 F.C.R. 539 (CWTA v. SOCAN), at para. 27. Before CUFTA, Canadian courts had held that "radio communication" under the former s.

3(1)(f) was limited to Hertzian radio waves and did not extend to communication by co-axial cables: Canadian Admiral Corp. v. Rediffusion, Inc., [1954] Ex. C.R. 382, at p. 410. CUFTA, however, required Canada to compensate copyright owners for the retransmission of television signals that were sent over cable lines. The amendments were therefore designed to ensure that cable companies, and not just radio broadcasters, would also be captured under s. 3(1)(f): John S. McKeown, Fox on Canadian Law of Copyright and Industrial Designs (4th ed. (loose-leaf)), at pp. 21-86, 21-87 and 29-1.

[25] In this context, the replacement of the words "radio communication" with "telecommunication" should be understood as merely expanding the means of communicating a work — that is, from radio waves ("by radio communication") to cable and other future technologies ("to the public by telecommunication"). In our view, by substituting the word "telecommunication" in 1988, Parliament did not intend to change the fundamental nature of the communication right, which had for over 50 years been concerned with performance-based activities. Instead, Parliament only changed the means of transmitting a communication. The word "communicate" itself was never altered.

[26] Parliament's addition of the phrase "to the public" to s. 3(1)(f) also supports this interpretation of the 1988 amendments. Before 1988, there was no doubt that all communications were "to the public", as the nature of a broadcast through radio waves was necessarily public. The term "telecommunication", however, risked introducing ambiguity into the Act, as telecommunication could also include private communications. By adding the phrase "to the public" with the term "telecommunication" in 1988, Parliament clarified its intent to maintain the communication right as a category of performance right.

[27] Therefore, we agree with Rothstein J. (at para. 98) that there is a "historic relationship" between the performance right and the communication right in the Copyright Act, but we disagree with his conclusion that Parliament intended to sever this relationship based on the 1988 amendments. In our view, this historical connection between communication and performance still exists today. With respect, the Board ignored this connection when it concluded that transmitting a download of a musical work over the Internet could amount to a "communication".

[28] The Board's conclusion was based in part on its erroneous view that a "download" is indistinguishable from a "stream". Although a download and a stream are both "transmissions" in technical terms (they both use "data packet technology"), they are not both "communications" for purposes of the Copyright Act. This is clear from the Board's definition of a stream as "a transmission of data that allows the user to listen or view the content at the time of transmission and that is not meant to be reproduced" (para. 15). Unlike a download, the experience of a stream is much more akin to a broadcast or performance.

[29] The Board also appears to have relied on Binnie J.'s observation in Society of Composers, Authors and Music Publishers of Canada v. Canadian Assn. of Internet Providers, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 427 (SOCAN v. CAIP), that a work has necessarily been "communicated" when, "[a]t the end of the transmission, the end user has a musical work in his or her possession that was not there before" (at para. 45), and on CWTA v. SOCAN, where Sharlow J.A. evoked SOCAN v. CAIP to hold that "[t]he word 'communication' connotes the passing of information from one person to another" (paras. 19-20).

[30] As noted by Justice Rothstein, however, the comments in SOCAN v. CAIP were obiter, as the meaning of "communicate" in s. 3(1)(f) was not directly in issue in that case. Neither SOCAN v. CAIP nor CWTA v. SOCAN examined the legislative history behind the term "communicate" or the connection between communication and performance.

[31] For the same reason, we cannot agree with Justice Rothstein's dependence on the dictionary definition of the word "communicate" to mean any transmission of data, including a download which provides the user with a durable copy of the work. Dictionaries, while often offering a useful range of definitional options, are of little assistance in identifying what a word means when it is orphaned from its context: Ruth Sullivan, Sullivan and Driedger on the Construction of Statutes (4th ed. 2002), at p. 27; see also Ontario v. Canadian Pacific Ltd., [1995] 2 S.C.R. 1031, at para. 67 (per Gonthier J.). In our view, using dictionary definitions in this case has the effect of ignoring a solid line of legislative history connecting the term "communicate" to performance-based activities.

[32] The Board's interpretation of s. 3(1)(f) also ignores the historic distinction between performance-based rights and reproduction-based rights, improperly extending the term "communicate" to capture the Internet delivery of permanent copies of a work. In our view, this interpretation goes far beyond what the term "communicate" was ever intended to capture.

[33] In enacting s. 3(1), Parliament distinguished between rights of reproduction and performance:

> 3. (1) For the purposes of this Act, "copyright" means the sole right to produce or reproduce the work or any substantial part thereof in any material form whatsoever, to perform, or in the case of a lecture to deliver, the work or any substantial part thereof in public . . . .
> (Copyright Act, 1921)

[34] This distinction between reproduction and performance in s. 3(1) has been maintained all the way through to the current version of the Act.

[35] Performing a work is fundamentally different than reproducing it. As this Court concluded in Bishop v. Stevens, a performance is impermanent in nature, and does not leave the viewer or listener with a durable copy of the work:

> The right to perform (including radio broadcast), and the right to make a recording, are separately enumerated in s. 3(1). They are distinct rights in theory and in practice . . . . [T]he rights to perform and to record a work are considered sufficiently distinct that they are generally assigned separately, and administered by different entities.
> . . . A performance is by its very nature fleeting, transient, impermanent. When it is over, only the memory remains. . . . Furthermore, no imitation of a performance can be a precise copy. A recording, on the other hand, is permanent. It may be copied easily, privately, and precisely. Once a work has been recorded, the recording takes on a life of its own. . . . Once the composer has made or authorized a recording of his work, he has irrevocably given up much of his control over its presentation to the public. These are the reasons why the rights to perform and to record are recognized as distinct in the Act, and why in practice a composer may wish to authorize performances but not recordings of his work. [Emphasis added; pp. 477-79.]

[36] In Bishop, the alleged infringer argued that the "right to broadcast" a musical work under s. 3(1)(f) included the incidental right to make an ephemeral copy for the sole purpose of facilitating the broadcast. This Court ultimately concluded that the right to perform — including the right to communicate — could not be understood to include the right to reproduce, since performing and communicating are different in nature from making a recording.

[37] Even though Bishop interpreted the pre-1988 version of the Copyright Act (before the "telecommunication" amendment), the distinction between performance-based and reproduction-based rights established in s. 3(1) is evidenced in the provisions of the current Act. For example, in s. 2.2(1), the term "publication" includes "making copies", but expressly excludes "the performance in public, or the communication to the public by telecommunication" of a work. Similarly, the educational institutions exception in s. 29.4(2) refers to the right to "reproduce" and the right to "communicate by telecommunication to the public" as distinct rights. The same is true of s. 15(1), which categorizes neighbouring rights under the Act into two categories: the right to "communicate" and "perform" a performance, and the right to "reproduce" a fixation of the performance.

[38] The distinction between performance and communication rights on the one hand and reproduction rights on the other is also evident in the collective administration of copyright tariffs under the Copyright Act. In 1993, SOCAN — a performing rights society — was put in charge of administering the communication right in s. 3(1)(f) in relation to musical works: S.C. 1993, c. 23, s. 3: see McKeown, at pp. 3-12, 27-2 and 27-3. These provisions are contained in a section of the Act entitled "Collective Administration of Performing Rights and of Communication Rights": ss. 67 to 68.2 (S.C. 1997, c. 24, s. 45): see McKeown, at p. 26-3. Even the Copyright Board itself categorizes its decisions relating to musical works into two categories: "Public Performance of Music" and "Reproduction of Musical Works": http://www.cb-cda.gc.ca/decisions/index-e.html.

[39] Therefore, the term "communicate" in s. 3(1)(f), which has historically been linked to the right to perform, should not be transformed by the use of the word "telecommunication" in a way that would capture activities akin to reproduction. Such transformation would result in abandoning the traditional distinction in the Act between performance-based rights and rights of reproduction. There is no evidence either in 1988 or in subsequent amendments to the Act that Parliament intended such abandonment.

[40] SOCAN submits that the distinction between reproduction and performance rights in Bishop actually supports its view that downloading a musical work over the Internet can attract two tariffs. Since reproduction and performance-based rights are two separate, independent rights, copyright owners should be entitled to a separate fee under each right. This is based on the Court's reliance in Bishop, at p. 477, on a quote from Ash v. Hutchinson & Co. (Publishers), Ltd., [1936] 2 All E.R. 1496 (C.A.), at p. 1507, per Greene L.J.:

> Under the Copyright Act, 1911 [on which the Canadian Act was based], . . . the rights of the owner of copyright are set out. A number of acts are specified, the sole right to do which is conferred on the owner of the copyright. The right to do each of these acts is, in my judgment, a separate statutory right, and anyone who without the consent of the owner of the copyright does any of these acts commits a tort; if he does two of them, he commits two torts, and so on. [Emphasis added.]

[41] In our view, the Court in Bishop merely used this quote to emphasize that the rights enumerated in s. 3(1) are distinct. Bishop does not stand for the proposition that a single activity (i.e., a download) can violate two separate rights at the same time. This is clear from the quote in Ash v. Hutchinson, which refers to "two acts". In Bishop, for example, there were two activities: 1) the making of an ephemeral copy of the musical work in order to effect a broadcast, and 2) the actual broadcast of the work itself. In this case, however, there is only one activity at issue: downloading a copy of a video game containing musical works.

[42] Nor is the communication right in s. 3(1)(f) a sui generis right in addition to the general rights described in s. 3(1). The introductory paragraph defines what constitutes "copyright". It states that copyright "means" the sole right to produce or reproduce a work in any material form, to perform a work in public, or to publish an unpublished work. This definition of "copyright" is exhaustive, as the term "means" confines its scope. The paragraph concludes by stating that copyright "includes" several other rights, set out in subsections (a) through (i). As a result, the rights in the introductory paragraph provide the basic structure of copyright. The enumerated rights listed in the subsequent subparagraphs are simply illustrative: Sunny Handa, Copyright Law in Canada (2002), at p. 195; see also Apple Computer Inc. v. Mackintosh Computers Ltd., [1987] 1 F.C. 173 (T.D.), at p. 197. The rental rights in s. 3(1)(i) referred to by Justice Rothstein, for example, can fit comfortably into the general category of reproduction rights.

[43] In our view, therefore, the Board's conclusion that the Internet delivery of a permanent copy of a video game containing musical works amounted to a "communication" under s. 3(1)(f) should be set aside.

[44] We would therefore allow the appeal with costs.

The reasons of LeBel, Fish, Rothstein and Cromwell JJ. were delivered by [45] ROTHSTEIN J. (dissenting) — Under the Copyright Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-42 (the "Act"), s. 3(1)(f), a copyright holder has the sole right to "communicate [his or her] work to the public by telecommunication" and to authorize any such communication. The question in this case is whether a musical work is "communicate[d] . . . by telecommunication" when a file containing the musical work is downloaded from the Internet.

[46] When files containing copyright protected works are downloaded, copyright holders are entitled to compensation for the reproduction of their works. This appeal concerns musical works contained in video games which may be downloaded from the Internet. The appellants, the Entertainment Software Association and the Entertainment Software Association of Canada (collectively, the "ESA"), argue that works transmitted over the Internet by downloading should not give rise to further compensation under s. 3(1)(f). The respondent, Society of Composers, Authors and Music Publishers of Canada ("SOCAN"), says that reproduction and communication are different and independent rights under the Act and that copyright holders are entitled to remuneration for the communication of their works through Internet downloading.

[47] My colleagues Abella and Moldaver JJ. part company with me on some fundamental principles of copyright law. In my view, precedents of this Court have established the principles that must govern the analysis in this appeal. Copyright is a creature of statute (Théberge v. Galerie d'Art du Petit Champlain inc., 2002 SCC 34, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 336, at para. 5; Compo Co. v. Blue Crest Music Inc., [1980] 1 S.C.R. 357, at p. 373; Bishop v. Stevens, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 467, at p. 477). Copyright is comprised of a bundle of independent statutory rights (Bishop v. Stevens, at p. 477; Compo Co. v. Blue Crest Music Inc., at p. 373). Courts must give effect to these independent rights as provided by Parliament. While courts must bear in mind that the Copyright Act "is . . . a balance between promoting the public interest in the encouragement and dissemination of works of the arts and intellect and obtaining a just reward for the creator", which balance requires "not only . . . recognizing the creator's rights but in giving due weight to their limited nature" (Théberge, at paras. 30-31), courts must still respect the language chosen by Parliament — not override it.

[48] In my respectful opinion, my colleagues' approach sweeps away these well-established principles. They start from the proposition that once the reproduction rights in the musical work contained in a video game are negotiated, "the owner of the copyright in the musical work has no further rights when the game is sold" (Abella and Moldaver JJ., at para. 1). They support their argument by reference to the principle of technological neutrality: because the production and sale of a hard copy of the video game would only engage the right to reproduce the musical works it contains, the sale of a digital copy of the game, by transmission over the Internet, must also not trigger protected rights other than the right to reproduce. For my colleagues, the "Internet is simply a technological taxi that delivers a durable copy of the same work to the end user" (para. 5). They say that the question in this appeal is "whether the rights are nonetheless revived when the work is sold over the Internet instead of in a store" (para. 1).

[49] Generally, a technologically neutral copyright law is desirable. However, technological neutrality is not a statutory requirement capable of overriding the language of the Act and barring the application of the different protected rights provided by Parliament. My colleagues' basic propositions pre-empt the application of other rights of the copyright holder to this set of facts and divest these rights of their independent content. There is no need to revive rights that have never been exhausted.

[50] In many respects, the Internet may well be described as a technological taxi; but taxis need not give free rides.

I. Facts and Procedural History

[51] On judicial review, the Federal Court of Appeal ("FCA") upheld the determination by the Copyright Board that the download of a file containing a musical work is a "communicat[ion] . . . to the public by telecommunication" within the meaning of s. 3(1)(f) of the Act, entitling SOCAN members to compensation in accordance with an approved tariff. The ESA appeals to this Court from the decision of the FCA.

[52] The ESA is a coalition of video game publishers and distributors. Video games are entertainment software consisting of millions of lines of software code. When installed and run on a computer, the software generates audiovisual effects in response to commands by the user. The audio component may include musical works as part of the game's soundtrack.

[53] Video games can be sold over the Internet. Customers navigate to the website of an online game provider where the video game program is offered for sale, pay the purchase price and download the program. The site transmits a permanent copy of the software to the customer's hard drive. This mode of delivery of the purchased program competes with the traditional model, where the video game is stored on a CD or in a cartridge, requiring the customer to buy it at a store.

[54] The customer must then install the program, either downloaded from the Internet or contained on the CD, on his or her computer. Only after the installation is complete may the customer run the game, at which point, the audio and the visual effects of the software become perceptible. The game and its audio and visual effects are not perceptible during the transmission of the file from the vendor to the video game user, a fact that is said to be of crucial significance in this case.

[55] It is standard practice within the video game publishing industry to negotiate clearance of copyright for the reproduction of the musical works incorporated in the games prior to their publication. There is no dispute that once reproduction rights are cleared, the owner of copyright in the musical work would have no further rights when the video game is sold to a customer at a bricks-and-mortar store or if a CD containing the game is shipped through regular mail.

[56] SOCAN is a collective society of composers, authors and publishers of music. It administers the right to perform in public and the right to communicate to the public by telecommunication the works covered by its members' copyrights. It files proposed tariffs with the Board and collects royalties, as set by the Board, on behalf of its members.

[57] These proceedings involve proposed tariffs first filed by SOCAN in 1995 for various uses of musical works constituting, in SOCAN's view, copyright protected communication of musical works to the public over the Internet. There were objections to the filed proposals. In 1996, the Board decided to deal with legal issues separately from the determination of the actual tariffs. The first step was to "determine which activities on the Internet, if any, constitute a protected use [of SOCAN's repertoire of music] targeted in the tariff" (SOCAN Statement of Royalties, Public Performance of Musical Works 1996, 1997, 1998 (Tariff 22, Internet) (Re) (1999), 1 C.P.R. (4th) 417 ("Tariff 22 decision"), at p. 424).

[58] On October 27, 1999 (the Tariff 22 decision), the Board issued what it termed its Phase I decision, dealing with legal and jurisdictional issues. The Tariff 22 decision was ultimately appealed to this Court, but not on the issue of communication to the public by telecommunication now before this Court. However, in Society of Composers, Authors and Music Publishers of Canada v. Canadian Assn. of Internet Providers, 2004 SCC 45, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 427 ("SOCAN v. CAIP"), at para. 30, Binnie J. noted the Board's conclusion that "an Internet communication occurs at the time the work is transmitted from the host server to the computer of the end user, regardless of whether it is played or viewed at that time, or later, or never" (see Tariff 22 decision, at p. 450). He found that this particular issue was "no longer contested".

[59] In 2005, SOCAN modified its proposed Tariff to divide it into seven categories, each dealing with a different Internet-based activity. The sixth category applies to "Game Sites" and covers "communications of musical works as part of games, including gambling, from Sites or Services that consist predominantly of games . . ." (Statement of Proposed Royalties to Be Collected by SOCAN for the Public Performance or the Communication to the Public by Telecommunication, in Canada, of Musical or Dramatico-Musical Works (2005), 139 Can. Gaz. I (Supp.), at p. 18). When the Board proceeded to Phase II of the process to establish a tariff for the communication of musical works over the Internet for the years 1996 to 2006, the ESA argued that since the users can neither see, nor hear game software while it is being downloaded, "[t]he transmission solely involves a distribution of a copy of a work that is identical to copies available on discs in stores. The transmission [is] thus not a 'communication to the public'" (A.F., at para. 20 (emphasis in original)).

[60] The Board's Phase II determination was rendered in two decisions. In the first, issued on October 18, 2007 (61 C.P.R. (4th) 353) (the "Tariff 22.A decision"), the Board rejected the ESA's argument and confirmed its prior conclusion that a download is a "communication". While the Tariff 22.A decision dealt with the details of the tariffs applicable to uses of music by online music services that offer catalogues of songs for downloading upon payment of the purchase price, the Board held that the legal principles established in that decision would also apply to other uses of music on the Internet. The Board's second Phase II decision, issued on October 24, 2008, SOCAN Statement of Royalties, Internet — Other Uses of Music, 1996-2006 (Tariffs 22.B-22.G) (2008), 70 C.P.R. (4th) 81 (the "Tariff 22.B-G decision"), established the details of the tariffs applicable to other uses of music on the Internet, including use by game sites at issue in this appeal (Tariff 22.G).

[61] A number of objectors applied to the FCA for judicial review on different issues, which the FCA dealt with in separate decisions. Bell Canada v. Society of Composers, Authors and Music Publishers of Canada, 2010 FCA 220, 409 N.R. 102 ("Bell Canada"), was an appeal by online music services contesting the Board's determination in the Tariff 22.A decision that a download of a music file from the online music service's website by the end consumer is a "communication to the public". The FCA held that the Board's determination was a reasonable interpretation of s. 3(1)(f) of the Act. The FCA considered that SOCAN v. CAIP had fully answered the question of what constitutes a "communication" and accordingly confirmed that a download is a communication (para. 5).

[62] As stated above, the ESA's application for judicial review of the Tariff 22.B-G decision was dismissed by the FCA. On the issue of whether downloads of video games are communications to the public of the musical works they contain, the FCA referred to its reasons in Bell Canada, that is, that a download of a file containing a musical work is a communication to the public by telecommunication (2010 FCA 221, 406 N.R. 288, at para. 13).

II. Issue

[63] The issue in this appeal is whether the transmission of a video game through an Internet download is a "communication" to the public within the meaning of s. 3(1)(f) of the Act. If it is, SOCAN is entitled to royalties for the communication of the included musical works.

III. Analysis

A. Overview

[64] The ESA submits that on reading s. 3(1)(f) in its entirety, considering it in the context of the entire Act and in light of its legislative history, the provision "creates an exclusive right of public performance (or representation for works that are not publicly performed) delivered by means of telecommunication". They say that to "communicate" must mean "to cause information in humanly perceivable form to be imparted to another person for immediate listening or viewing" (A.F., at para. 33 (emphasis added)). The communication right was never meant to cover situations where durable copies of the copyrighted works are made available, which are already covered by the reproduction right and for which copyright holders are already compensated. Since the users can neither see nor hear game software while it is being downloaded, the transmission from the online game provider to the user does not constitute a communication to the public. The ESA further argues that the Act uses both the terms "communicate" and "transmit" and that the two cannot have the same meaning. In their submission, the act of a game being downloaded by a user constitutes a transmission and not a communication. The ESA also relies on American jurisprudence and raises some "unintended consequences" of the decisions below.

[65] In this appeal, the ESA does not advance arguments on whether, should the transmissions be found to be "communications" within the meaning of s. 3(1)(f), such transmissions would be communications "to the public"; this issue is dealt with in the companion case Rogers Communications Inc. v. Society of Composers, Authors and Music Publishers of Canada, 2012 SCC 35, [2012] 2 S.C.R. 283.

[66] SOCAN says that the decisions of the Board and of the FCA were correctly decided. In SOCAN's view, to communicate means simply "to transmit, impart, make known or convey information" (R.F., at para. 32 (emphasis deleted)) and the ESA's submissions would artificially restrict the ordinary meaning of the word. Further, SOCAN says that the ESA's argument ignores the basic principle of copyright law that the copyrights granted in s. 3(1) for reproduction, performance and communication of a work are separate and distinct rights (R.F., at para. 9).

B. Standard of Review

[67] For the reasons explained in Rogers, at paras. 10-16, the applicable standard of review is correctness.

C. Whether Transmitting Musical Works Through Downloads Over the Internet Is "Communicating"

(1) Section 3(1)(f) and Section 2

[68] This appeal requires defining the right to "communicate . . . by telecommunication" in the Copyright Act. The ESA urges a definition of "communicate . . . by telecommunication" as "to cause information in humanly perceivable form to be imparted to another person for immediate listening or viewing" (A.F., at para. 33 (emphasis added)).

[69] The exclusive right of the copyright holder to "communicate . . . to the public by telecommunication" is provided in s. 3(1)(f) of the Act:

> 3. (1) For the purposes of this Act, "copyright", in relation to a work, means the sole right to produce or reproduce the work or any > substantial part thereof in any material form whatever, to perform the work or any substantial part thereof in public or, if the work is unpublished, to publish the work or any substantial part thereof, and includes the sole right

> . . .
>
> (f) in the case of any literary, dramatic, musical or artistic work, to communicate the work to the public by telecommunication,
>
> . . .
> and to authorize any such acts.

[70] Section 2 of the Act defines "telecommunication":

> "telecommunication" means any transmission of signs, signals, writing, images or sounds or intelligence of any nature by wire, radio, visual, optical or other electromagnetic system;

It is not disputed that transmissions in the digital environment are "telecommunications".

(2) The Approach to Statutory Interpretation

[71] The Copyright Act must be interpreted in accordance with the general rules of statutory interpretation: "the words of an Act are to be read in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament" (CCH Canadian Ltd. v. Law Society of Upper Canada, 2004 SCC 13, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 339, at para. 9, citing E. A. Driedger, Construction of Statutes (2nd ed. 1983), at p. 87).

(3) The Precedents

[72] The word "communicate" is not defined in the Act. I therefore start with the dictionary meaning of the word. The Oxford English Dictionary (online) defines the verb "communicate" as "[t]o impart (information, knowledge, or the like) . . .; to impart the knowledge or idea of (something), to inform a person of; to convey, express; to give an impression of, put across". The Shorter Oxford English Dictionary on Historical Principles (6th ed. 2007), vol. 1, at p. 466, includes the following definition: to "[i]mpart, transmit". The Merriam-Webster's Collegiate Dictionary entry is defined as "to convey knowledge of or information about: make known" ((11th ed. 2003), at p. 251). There is no suggestion in these definitions that "to communicate" cannot mean "to transmit", and indeed, the Shorter Oxford English Dictionary expressly includes in the definition of "communicate", "transmit".

[73] Although the question was not directly in issue in that case (see para. 30), Binnie J. in SOCAN v. CAIP endorsed the ordinary definition of "communicate" as the appropriate interpretation of the word in s. 3(1)(f) of the Copyright Act:

> The Board ruled that a telecommunication occurs when the music is transmitted from the host server to the end user. I agree with this.
> . . .
> The word "communicate" is an ordinary English word that means to "impart" or "transmit" (Shorter Oxford English Dictionary on Historical Principles (5th ed. 2002), vol. 1, at p. 463). [paras. 42 and 46]

[74] Since SOCAN v. CAIP, the FCA has had the occasion to deal directly with the meaning of the right to "communicate" under s. 3(1)(f) in Canadian Wireless Telecommunications Assn. v. Society of Composers, Authors and Music Publishers of Canada, 2008 FCA 6, [2008] 3 F.C.R. 539, leave to appeal refused, [2008] 2 S.C.R. vi ("CWTA"). The question in that case, answered in the affirmative, was whether a person communicates to the public the musical works contained in ringtones when members of the public download the ringtones for their mobile phones. Sharlow J.A. rejected the argument that a transmission is not the same thing as a communication because "'communication' must be understood to include only a transmission that is intended to be heard or perceived by the recipient simultaneously with or immediately upon the transmission" (para. 18). She wrote:

> In my view, the applicants are proposing a meaning of the word "communication" that is too narrow. The word "communication" connotes the passing of information from one person to another. A musical ringtone is information in the form of a digital audio file that is capable of being communicated. The normal mode of communicating a digital audio file is to transmit it. The wireless transmission of a musical ringtone to a cellphone is a communication, whether the owner of the cellphone accesses it immediately in order to hear the music, or at some later time. The fact that the technology used for the transmission does not permit the cellphone owner to listen to the music during the transmission does not mean that there is no communication. In my view, in the context of a wireless transmission, it is the receipt of the transmission that completes the communication.
> This conclusion accords with the [SOCAN v. CAIP] case (cited above). In that case Justice Binnie, writing for the majority, said that the transmission of information over the Internet is a communication once the information is received (see paragraph 45). . . . [I]t is undoubtedly a true statement. [Emphasis added; paras. 19-20.]

(4) The ESA's Arguments for Not Following SOCAN v. CAIP and CWTA

[75] The ESA argues that SOCAN v. CAIP (to the extent that it addressed the issue) and CWTA should not be followed.

(a) "Communicate" and "Transmit"

[76] The ESA first argues that there must be some difference between the words "communicate" and "transmit". The two words are not used interchangeably in the Act and if Parliament used both words, it intended them to have different meanings. On this basis, the ESA submits that to "communicate to the public" means "more than the [mere] transmission of a file from one point to another point without that file being seen or heard" (A.F., at para. 73). Therefore, a download is not a communication within the meaning of s. 3(1)(f), but a mere transmission.

[77] I do not find this argument compelling. Parliament is presumed to use words in their ordinary meaning: R. Sullivan, Statutory Interpretation (2nd ed. 2007), at p. 49. As noted above, to "communicate" means to "impart" or "transmit". The Oxford English Dictionary (online) defines "transmit" as: "[t]o cause (a thing) to pass, go, or be conveyed to another person, place, or thing; to send across an intervening space; to convey, transfer; . . . [t]o convey or communicate (usually something immaterial) to another or others" (emphasis added); and, in a more technical sense: "[t]o send out electric signals or electromagnetic waves corresponding to (an image, a programme, etc.)." The definitions of "transmit" in the Merriam-Webster's Collegiate Dictionary are:

> to send or convey from one person or place to another . . .
> to send out (a signal) either by radio waves or over a wire.

I see no reason why, having regard to context, the meaning of both words cannot overlap.

[78] As set out above, s. 2 of the Act defines "telecommunication" as "any transmission of signs, signals, writing, images or sounds or intelligence of any nature by wire, radio, visual, optical or other electromagnetic system". This definition equates the term "telecommunication" with the transmission of certain subject matter by electromagnetic system. The prefix "tele" simply means "to a distance". So, "telecommunication" means communicating to a distance by the means specified in the Act. It would seem odd that "telecommunication" and transmission by electromagnetic system are interchangeable in the Act but that "to communicate" and "to transmit" would not be. The more obvious interpretation would be that for the purposes of s. 3(1)(f) of the Act, the exclusive right of the copyright holder to communicate works to the public by telecommunication is simply to transmit those works to the public by electromagnetic system, including the Internet.

[79] The above definitions of "communicate" and "transmit" and the context in which the words are used in the Act do not support the ESA's conclusion that to "communicate" in s. 3(1)(f) must necessarily mean to transmit information in a humanly perceptible form for immediate perceiving and listening. Even accepting that to communicate means to impart an idea, there is no requirement that the idea be perceived and heard immediately.

[80] The ESA supports its argument that the words "transmit" and "communicate" must have different meanings primarily by reference to s. 2.4(1)(c). Section 2.4(1)(c) provides:

> 2.4 (1) For the purposes of communication to the public by telecommunication,
>
> . . .
>
> (c) where a person, as part of
>
> (i) a network, within the meaning of the Broadcasting Act, whose operations result in the communication of works or other subject-matter to the public, or
>
> (ii) any programming undertaking whose operations result in the communication of works or other subject-matter to the public,
> transmits by telecommunication a work or other subject-matter that is communicated to the public by another person who is not a retransmitter of a signal within the meaning of subsection 31(1), the transmission and communication of that work or other subject-matter by those persons constitute a single communication to the public for which those persons are jointly and severally liable.

[81] The ESA argues that the words "transmit" and "transmission" appear twice and the word "communicate" five times, and that this means that they must have different meanings. It says that transmitting is merely delivery or receipt of information or data being conveyed; that the term "communicate" pertains to what happens after transmission; and that this implies that the difference is that a transmission is not the conveyance of information in a humanly perceivable form. As a result, a transmission does not implicate s. 3(1)(f), because s. 3(1)(f) uses the term communicate which, by contrast, does imply conveyance in humanly perceivable form. Therefore, since the communication only occurs after the transmission, a download does not give rise to any entitlement under s. 3(1)(f).

[82] This argument ignores the context and purpose of s. 2.4(1)(c). This section was introduced in 1988 in order to reverse the holding in Composers, Authors and Publishers Assoc. of Canada Ltd. v. CTV Television Network Ltd., [1968] S.C.R. 676 ("CAPAC"), that CTV's transmissions of programs to its affiliated stations, for further broadcasting to the public by the affiliated stations, did not engage the right to communicate to the public in s. 3(1)(f), because such transmissions remained within the private realm (see J. S. McKeown, Fox on Canadian Law of Copyright and Industrial Designs (4th ed. (loose-leaf)), at p. 21-90). In the context of s. 2.4(1)(c), a "transmission" describes conveying works within a network or programming undertaking before the work is conveyed to the public, while a "communication" is the conveyance of the work "to the public" by another actor within the network or programming undertaking. Without s. 2.4(1)(c), only the latter act — the communication to the public — would engage s. 3(1)(f); but a private transmission between affiliates would remain outside of copyright protection. The effect of s. 2.4(1)(c), where it applies, is to make the transmission and the communication a single act of communication to the public, so that both the person who transmits the work and the person who communicates the work to the public are jointly and severally liable for the act of communication to the public.

[83] All that can be teased out of s. 2.4(1)(c) is that "communication to the public" is the phrase used to designate instances where copyright protection is engaged, and not that "communication" means a conveyance of information in a humanly perceivable form. On the other hand, "transmit" or "transmission" are terms designating situations that do not engage copyright protection under s. 3(1)(f). I agree with the ESA that s. 2.4(1)(c) suggests that under the Act, the words "communicate" and "transmit" are not used interchangeably. But the provision does not suggest that the words refer to different types of conveyances. Rather, the distinction is that the words are used in conjunction with different types of recipient and different legal significance. Unless the transmission is combined with a communication to the public, s. 3(1)(f) would not attach to the transmission. When the transmission is ultimately a communication to the public, s. 2.4(1)(c) provides that the transmission and the communication to the public are a single communication to the public which does attract copyright under s. 3(1)(f). Indeed, the word "communicate" is consistently used in conjunction with the words "to the public" throughout the Act. The ESA's separating the word "communicate" from the words "to the public" to give it an independent meaning different from that of "transmit" is not supported by Parliament's intention in enacting s. 2.4(1)(c). The words of s. 2.4(1)(c), when read in context, do not support the distinction argued by the ESA.

(b) The CAPAC Decision

[84] The ESA relies on this Court's decision in CAPAC for the proposition that to communicate means disseminating performances to the public for immediate listening and not merely sending signals that may be perceived later. However, this jurisprudence is of little avail to the ESA.

[85] As noted above, in CAPAC, this Court was asked to determine whether the transmission of television programs containing musical works by CTV to its affiliated stations, for broadcasting to the public by the affiliates, constituted "communicating the same by radio communication" (at p. 679), an act protected under s. 3(1)(f) as it read at that time.

[86] It should first be noted that CAPAC interpreted provisions of the Act that have since been amended in a way relevant to the scope of s. 3(1)(f), as will be discussed later. In any event, in CAPAC, the ratio of the Court's decision was that CTV's transmissions of recorded TV programs containing music to its affiliates were not communications of musical works by radio-communication. Rather, as CTV was transmitting performances of musical works (e.g., in an ordinary TV program) and not the musical works themselves (e.g., the sheet of music), s. 3(1)(f), which did not apply to performances of musical works, was not engaged. It is important to note that this distinction arose from the definition of "musical work" in the Act as it read at the time and is no longer applicable.

[87] Nonetheless, the ESA relies on some comments of Pigeon J., at pp. 681-82 of CAPAC, involving an analysis of Article 11*bis* of the Berne Convention for the Protection of Literacy and Artistic Works, 828 U.N.T.S. 221, on which s. 3(1)(f) was based. The ESA says that this analysis demonstrates that a communication is more than sending signals, which is all that occurs when works are downloaded as in the case now before the Court. Rather, the ESA says that Article 11*bis* contemplates public performances by broadcasting, in other words, communications in humanly perceptible form. Therefore, a "communicat[ion]" within the meaning of s. 3(1)(f) must also be a conveyance of information in humanly perceptible form.

[88] However, the passages of Pigeon J.'s judgment note that "'communication' does not usually mean 'a performance' [but that] it is apt to include performances" (p. 681 (emphasis added)). The necessary implication of these words is that "communication" is a broader term than "performance". Therefore, Pigeon J.'s analysis does not support the ESA's contention that a communication is necessarily a performance or necessarily more than sending signals.

(5) Whether "Communicating" is "Performing" a Work at a Distance

[89] The ESA further argues, based on the legislative history of s. 3(1)(f), that the communication right is only a variation of the performance right, being the right to perform a work to a distant audience. Because a performance, in the ESA's submission, is, by nature, a transient event that cannot result in the transmission of a durable copy of the work to the audience, downloads cannot be performances and, therefore, cannot be communications.

[90] I digress briefly to point out that the structure of s. 3(1) implies that the communication right in paragraph (f) is a self-standing right independent of the performance right in the introduction of the section. The first lines of the English version of s. 3(1) provide that

> "copyright" . . . means the sole right to produce or reproduce the work . . ., to perform the work . . . in public or . . . to publish the work . . . and includes the sole right . . .

There then follow specific rights listed as paragraphs (a) to (i). Paragraph (f) provides for the sole right to "communicate the work to the public by telecommunication".

[91] While the use of the word "includes" could indicate that the rights listed in paragraphs (a) to (i) are instances of one of the rights in the opening words of s. 3(1), the context indicates otherwise. Several of the listed rights are clearly outside of the right to produce or reproduce, perform or publish. For example, paragraph (i) provides for the right to rent out a sound recording embodying a musical work. It is difficult to see how this right fits within the right to produce or reproduce, perform or publish the work. Indeed, it would be contrary to Théberge, in particular at paras. 42 and 45, where the majority of this Court held that a "reproduction" within the meaning of the Act requires a multiplication of copies. All the prerogatives of the copyright holder in s. 3(1) are better considered as separate and distinct rights (Bishop v. Stevens, at p. 477, per McLachlin J.; Compo Co. v. Blue Crest Music Inc., at p. 373, per Estey J.).

[92] This interpretation of the English version of s. 3(1) is consistent with the French version of the text, which states that "[l]e droit d'auteur sur l'œuvre comporte le droit exclusif de produire ou reproduire . . . l'œuvre, [de la représenter ou de la publier]; ce droit comporte, en outre, [les droits énumérés aux al. a) à i)]." The use of the phrase "en outre" — in addition — indicates paras. (a) to (i) are in addition to those in the opening words.

[93] Nonetheless, the ESA relies on legislative history in order to confine the scope of the right to communicate to the public to performing a work to a public in a distant place, in a humanly perceptible form, as distinct from a download.

[94] The Canadian Act was based on the Berne Convention of 1886, as revised in Berlin in 1908 (see Bishop v. Stevens, at p. 473). The revised Berne Convention comprised certain public performance rights in certain types of works. However, the advent of the radio warranted another revision of the Convention. In 1928, Article 11*bis* was added to the text, which guaranteed that:

Article 11*bis*

> (1) Authors of literary and artistic works shall enjoy the exclusive right of authorizing the communication of their works to the public by radiocommunication.

[95] In 1931, Canada implemented the revision through the then s. 3(1)(f), which provided for a right, "[i]n case of any literary, dramatic, musical or artistic work, to communicate such work by radio communication" (Copyright Amendment Act, 1931, S.C. 1931, c. 8) (see CAPAC, at pp. 680-81).

[96] Section 3(1)(f) was again amended in 1988. According to Canadian Admiral Corp. v. Rediffusion, Inc., [1954] Ex. C.R. 382, the radiocommunication right extended to radio and traditional over-the-air television broadcasting, leaving transmissions by cable outside of copyright protection. This technology-specific communication right was amended to the technologically neutral right to "communicate . . . to the public by telecommunication" to reflect the obligations entered into by Canada under the North American Free Trade Agreement, Can. T.S. 1994 No. 2 (Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement Implementation Act, S.C. 1988, c. 65, ss. 61 and 62). The change from radiocommunication to telecommunication and further amendments in 1993 meant that Canadian cable companies which previously avoided any payment of royalties under the "radiocommunication" right, and other users, were now caught by the Act: S. Handa, Copyright Law in Canada (2002), at p. 320; D. Vaver, Intellectual Property Law: Copyright, Patents, Trade-marks (2nd ed. 2011), at p. 90.

[97] The ESA argues that from the outset, s. 3(1)(f), as well as its Berne progenitor Article 11*bis*, were meant to provide broadcasting rights the nature of which is "to deliver content [i.e. performances of works] to a public audience for immediate listening or viewing" (A.F., at para. 40). In the ESA's submission, the 1988 amendment from "radiocommunication" to "telecommunication" did not change the fundamental nature of the communication right, that is, that it was concerned with broadcasting. The word "communicate" in the English version was not amended, although the means by which the communication may be made were expanded (A.F., at para. 52). The verb "transmettre", used in the French version of s. 3(1)(f) prior to the 1988 amendments, was replaced by "communiquer".

[98] There is little doubt that a historic relationship between the right of public performance and the right to communicate to the public did exist:

> . . . as performance before a live audience was one of the first forms of exploitation to be covered by copyright, it made sense to create a right to provide protection when the performance took place at a distance through the use of Hertzian (radio) waves and the other types of communication technologies invented since then (television, cable, satellite and the internet).

(E. F. Judge and D. J. Gervais, Intellectual Property: The Law in Canada (2nd. ed. 2011), at pp. 166-67)

[99] The legislation has evolved to recognize the evolution of technologies. In 1988, the relevance of including transmissions by cable within the communication right had become obvious due to the prevalence of that mode of telecommunication.

[100] Even though the advent of cable may have been the catalyzing force for the 1988 amendment, the amendment did not only cover cable communications, in addition to radiocommunications, but adopted neutral language to encompass evolving but then unknown technological advances. In adopting the neutral language of "telecommunication", Parliament removed all reference to conventional broadcasting. The fact that in 1988 Parliament did not foresee, or could not have foreseen, the way in which modern technologies would evolve should not serve to limit the scope of the communication right when it is applied to one such new technology.

[101] On this basis, the historic relationship of s. 3(1)(f) with broadcasting-type industries does not support reading into the Act restrictions which are not apparent from and are even inconsistent with the current language of the Act. In particular, the historic relationship does not support adopting the ESA's proposition to read into the language of the Act the significant restriction that the transmission must be in a "humanly perceivable form for immediate viewing or listening" (A.F., at para. 74). While the rationale for the 1988 change from radio to "telecommunication" was concerned with the technical means by which the communication to the public was made, nothing supports concluding that s. 3(1)(f) could not also apply to new technologies which operate in a manner different from traditional broadcasting. This includes a communication occurring in a manner which also provides durable copies of the works that the users may view at a later time. When transmitted over the Internet, whether works are perceptible immediately or at a later moment or whether or not the technology used involves producing temporary copies, as in the case of streams, or permanent copies of the work is irrelevant to whether a communication has occurred and the work will, or has the potential to be, viewed or listened to by the receiver. As stated at para. 45 of SOCAN v. CAIP:

> At the end of the transmission, the end user has a musical work in his or her possession that was not there before. The work has necessarily been communicated . . . . To hold otherwise would . . . fly in the face of the ordinary use of language . . . .

(6) American Jurisprudence

[102] The ESA relies on the decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in United States v. American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, 627 F.3d 64 (2010) ("U.S. v. ASCAP"), certiorari denied (U.S.S.C., Octobre 3, 2011, No. 10-1337), where the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit decided that the download of a copy of a work did not come within the scope of the right to perform in public, as defined in the U.S. Copyright Act, 17 U.S.C. §§ 101 and 106(4).

[103] This decision is of no avail to the ESA. The United States copyright law does not include an exclusive right in the copyright holder to communicate to the public. Rather, it recognizes a right of public performance (17 U.S.C. § 106(4)), which has been understood to include situations such as radio or television broadcasting where performances are made available to a distant public. This is a fundamental difference with the right to communicate a work by telecommunication in s. 3(1)(f) of the Canadian Act, as explained above. The two cannot be equated.

[104] This Court has recognized in the past important differences both in wording and in policy between Canadian and American copyright legislation. It has cautioned that "United States court decisions, even where the factual situations are similar, must be scrutinized very carefully" (see Compo Co. v. Blue Crest Music Inc., at p. 367). The difference in statutory wording between the provisions of the American legislation and of the Canadian Copyright Act is sufficient to render the U.S. decisions of no assistance in the interpretive exercise engaged here. Indeed, following the American jurisprudence in interpreting Canada's copyright legislation would, in this case, amount to rewriting the Canadian Act.

(7) The Application of Section 3(1)(f) Does not Depend on the Purpose of the Communication

[105] The ESA's argument that the sole purpose of the transmissions in the case of downloads is just to deliver copies to the customers is not an answer to the fact that a transmission by telecommunication to the public, and therefore, a communication within the meaning of s. 3(1)(f), effectively occurs.

[106] A similar argument was made in Bishop v. Stevens. That case dealt with whether a TV station that had paid the appropriate royalties for the right to broadcast a performance of a musical work had also acquired the right to make an "ephemeral" recording of the performance for the sole purpose of facilitating the broadcast. It was held that the right to perform did not include the right to make a recording, albeit an "ephemeral" one made only for technical reasons. McLachlin J. held that "s. 3(1)(d) contains no mention of purpose" (p. 479):

> Interpretation of a statute must always begin with the ordinary meaning of the words used, and nothing in this section restricts its application to recordings made for the purpose of reproduction and sale. A recording may be made for any purpose, even one not prejudicial to the copyright holder, but if it is not authorized by the copyright holder then it is an infringement of his rights. [p. 480]

[107] Similarly, the fact that the work is transmitted over the Internet, and therefore, "communicate[d] . . . by telecommunication" within the ordinary meaning of the words, for the purpose of delivering a copy of the video game containing the musical work to the user, does not change the fact that there is an Internet communication requiring authorization of the copyright holder.

(8) Unintended Consequences

[108] The ESA raises a number of "unintended consequences" that would flow from accepting that downloads are communications within s. 3(1)(f) of the Act.

[109] The ESA first refers to s. 2.2(1) of the Act, which defines the concept of "publication" for the purposes of the Act. Section 2.2(1) provides:

> 2.2 (1) For the purposes of this Act, "publication" means
>
> (a) in relation to works,
>
> (i) making copies of a work available to the public,
>
> . . .
>
> but does not include
> (c) the performance in public, or the communication to the public by telecommunication, of a literary, dramatic, musical or artistic work or a sound recording, or . . .

[110] The ESA argues that adopting the "broad interpretation of 'communicate to the public' to include distribution of durable copies over networks" would mean that where copies of works are "distributed" over the Internet, these works would not be considered as "published", because publication, as defined by s. 2.2(1) of the Act, excludes works communicated to the public by telecommunication (A.F., at paras. 102-10).

[111] In my opinion, no conclusion concerning the scope of the right to communicate to the public by telecommunication in s. 3(1)(f) can be drawn on the basis of s. 2.2(1). Section 2.2(1) is only relevant in understanding the scope of publication, in those sections where it appears in the Act. Where that word is used, the definition in s. 2.2(1) provides that it means "making copies of a work available to the public", but does not include the communication of a work to the public by telecommunication. On the other hand, s. 2.2(1) does not provide a comprehensive definition for all purposes of the Act whereby "making copies of a work available to the public" can never occur in connection with communication to the public by telecommunication. It cannot be inferred that the independent right of communication to the public by telecommunication in s. 3(1)(f) cannot be engaged where, at the same time, copies of a work are made available.

[112] As for the ESA's argument that this may render publication technologically non-neutral, as works distributed only by making them available for download on the Internet would not be considered as published, whether this is the inescapable conclusion about the meaning of s. 2.2(1) remains to be seen in a case where the issue arises. Indeed, there is some authority suggesting that "[w]ork available online or sitting in a public database may therefore be considered 'published'", and this notwithstanding the fact that a work conveyed over the Internet constitutes a communication to the public by telecommunication (Vaver, at pp. 157 and 172-73).

[113] ESA also argues that extending the s. 3(1)(f) right to include "digital delivery of copies of a work" would make the secondary infringement provisions in s. 27(2) "largely redundant" in the electronic environment (A.F., at para. 117). It says there would be little need for the secondary infringement provisions related to the electronic distribution of copies of works. I would note that this argument assumes that communication is equivalent to distribution under the Act without any supporting justification on the point. While it appears that such a redundancy point is a policy argument that should be addressed by Parliament if there is a view that any alleged overlap in the provisions is considered undesirable, I will deal with it briefly.

[114] The basic difference between primary and secondary infringement is that primary infringement under s. 3(1) may occur without the infringer knowing that infringement is occurring while secondary infringement only applies where the person has actual or constructive knowledge that what is being distributed constitutes an infringing copy of a work. Section 27(2) provides in relevant part for purposes of this case:

> It is an infringement of copyright for any person to
> . . .
>
> (b) distribute to such an extent as to affect prejudicially the owner of the copyright,
>
> . . .
> a copy of a work . . . that the person knows or should have known infringes copyright . . . .

[115] A secondary infringer may be the same person as the primary infringer, but need not be. The purpose of s. 27(2) is to widen the net for copyright infringement beyond those who engage in primary infringement to those who, with knowledge or constructive knowledge, distribute to such an extent as to prejudicially affect the owner of the copyright, a copy of a work that already infringes copyright. A distributor who knows or should know that he is distributing an infringing copy of a work, for example because it was reproduced without authority of the copyright holder, may be liable for infringement even though he did not engage in the primary infringement. However, a distributor who distributes an authorized copy of the work will not be found liable under s. 27(2)(b).

[117] ESA has structured its examples in support of its redundancy argument carefully. However, they do not cover the facts of this case. Here the communication or distribution is of prior authorized copies, not infringing copies. Only s. 3(1)(f) is engaged, not s. 27(2).

(9) Policy Considerations

[118] The policy concern raised by the ESA is that a copyright holder should not be entitled to both a reproduction and a communication right in the context of Internet downloads.

[119] The answer to this concern is straightforward: the rights of copyright holders under s. 3(1) are distinct and separate rights. Bishop v. Stevens re-affirmed (at p. 477) the holding in Compo Co. v. Blue Crest Music Inc., at p. 373, per Estey J., that the rights listed in s. 3(1) are distinct and separate rights:

> It is clear from an examination of s. 3(1) that it lists a number of distinct rights belonging to the copyright holder. As stated in Ash v. Hutchinson & Co. (Publishers), Ltd., [1936] 2 All E.R. 1496 (C.A.), at p. 1507, per Greene L.J.:
> Under the Copyright Act, 1911 [on which the Canadian Act was based], s. 1(2), the rights of the owner of copyright are set out. A number of acts are specified, the sole right to do which is conferred on the owner of the copyright. The right to do each of these acts is, in my judgment, a separate statutory right, and anyone who without the consent of the owner of the copyright does any of these acts commits a tort; if he does two of them, he commits two torts, and so on. [Emphasis added.]

[120] The occurrence of one infringement therefore does not preclude the finding of another. As "[i]nfringement is the single act of doing something which 'only the owner of the copyright has the right to do'" (Compo Co. v. Blue Crest Music Inc., at p. 375), if two protected acts occur without authorization of the copyright holder, there are two infringements. The fact that there are two protected rights does not restrict the protection afforded by each right.

[121] I cannot agree with my colleagues that the "principle of technological neutrality requires that … we interpret the Copyright Act in a way that avoids imposing an additional layer of protections and fees based solely on the method of delivery of the work to the end user" (para. 9 (emphasis in original)). Characterizing the Internet transmission as a mere "method of delivery" of the work pre-empts the application of the right to communicate by telecommunication in s. 3(1)(f). Further, the proposition is inconsistent with the approach to media neutrality as described by the majority of this Court in Robertson v. Thomson Corp., 2006 SCC 43, [2006] 2 S.C.R. 363, at para. 49, per LeBel and Fish JJ.:

> Media neutrality means that the Copyright Act should continue to apply in different media, including more technologically advanced ones. But it does not mean that once a work is converted into electronic data anything can then be done with it. . . . Media neutrality is not a licence to override the rights of authors — it exists to protect the rights of authors and others as technology evolves.

[122] A media neutral application of the Act to the facts of this case would mean that the right of reproduction continues to apply to copies made through downloads, notwithstanding the fact that they are digital copies. It would also support the proposition that the communication right must continue to apply to digital communications, notwithstanding that they may differ from traditional broadcasting technologies. A media neutral application of the Act, however, does not imply that a court can depart from the ordinary meaning of the words of the Act in order to achieve the level of protection for copyright holders that the court considers is adequate.

[123] Any concerns arising from the independent protected rights in the digital context are concerns of policy, which are properly within the domain of Parliament in defining the scope of copyright. "The Copyright Act is usually presented as a balance between promoting the public interest in the encouragement and dissemination of works of the arts and intellect and obtaining a just reward for the creator" (Théberge, at para. 30). While the "courts should strive to maintain an appropriate balance between these two goals" (CCH Canadian Ltd., at para. 10), inferring limits into the communication right in the present case would be beyond the function of the courts. "In Canada, copyright [remains] a creature of statute . . ." (SOCAN v. CAIP, at para. 82). See also CCH, at para. 9; Théberge, at para. 5; Bishop v. Stevens, at p. 477; Compo Co. v. Blue Crest Music Inc., at p. 373.

[124] Indeed, it would be hazardous for the courts to delimit the scope of broadly defined rights in the digital environment without the benefit of a global picture of the implications for all the parties involved. Binnie J. wrote in SOCAN v. CAIP, at para. 40:

> The capacity of the Internet to disseminate "works of the arts and intellect" is one of the great innovations of the information age. Its use should be facilitated rather than discouraged, but this should not be done > unfairly at the expense of those who created the works of arts and intellect in the first place.

[125] In light of these considerations, providing exceptions to the right to communicate by telecommunication is properly left to Parliament. History has shown that Parliament will indeed legislate when it considers copyright protection to be improperly balanced (for example, it introduced the ephemeral recordings exception in s. 30.8(1), following the ruling in Bishop (S.C. 1997, c. 24, s. 18); McKeown, at pp. 21-82 to 21-83).

[126] In addition, it should be borne in mind that SOCAN merely proposes tariffs, which must then be authorized by the Board. In doing so, it is within the power of the Board to adjust proposed royalty rates in a manner that it considers appropriate for a particular use. Specifically, when the same activity engages two protected rights, the Board is in a position to consider each of these rights in light of the type of use that causes users to engage in the activity. This is consistent with the core of the Board's mandate as an economic regulatory agency, which consists of "working out . . . the details of an appropriate royalty tariff" (SOCAN v. CAIP, at para. 49) based on the economic value of the different ways in which copyrighted works may be used. The Board's authority to determine royalty rates in factual circumstances addresses concerns about the relative value of services as between online game providers and bricks and mortar stores, and the overlapping of rights and alleged "double-dipping" by copyright holders.

IV. Conclusion — Meaning of "Communicate" in Section 3(1)(f)

[127] Communicating works to the public by telecommunication is an independent and distinct right from other rights in s. 3(1) that are included within copyright. It is complete when the communication is received, in this case, when the file is downloaded to the user's computer, even though it can be perceived only after the transmission, or whether or not it is ever perceived. As put by Professor Vaver, "[s]ending works by radio, television, cable, fax, modem, satellite, or microwave involves telecommunication"; if, in addition, the communication is "to the public", it will attract liability (p. 172).

[128] I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

Cour d'appel fédérale, juges Gauthier, Stratas et Gleason, J.C.A.—Vancouver, 21 septembre; Ottawa, 8 novembre 2016.

Douanes et Accise — Appel interjeté à l'encontre d'une décision de la Cour canadienne de l'impôt qui a confirmé une cotisation établie à l'égard de la TPS/TVH impayée sur les frais de scolarité facturés par l'appelante en 2010 — La Cour de l'impôt a conclu que l'appelante devait percevoir et verser la TPS/TVH parce qu'elle n'était pas visée par l'exonération prévue à l'art. 7 de la partie III de l'annexe V de la Loi sur la taxe d'accise (la Loi) — L'appelante est un collège privé à but lucratif — L'annexe V de la Loi dresse une longue liste d'exonérations à l'obligation de percevoir et de verser la TPS/TVH — La seule partie de l'exonération susmentionnée qui pouvait s'appliquer à l'appelante était le terme « université » défini à l'art. 123(1) de la Loi — La Cour de l'impôt a conclu que, pour relever de la définition d'« université », l'institution devait être reconnue à titre d'université par les autorités provinciales compétentes et décerner des diplômes sanctionnant des études de premier cycle au moins — Étant donné que l'appelante ne remplissait aucun de ces critères, la Cour de l'impôt a conclu, entre autres, que l'appelante ne satisfaisait pas à la définition traditionnelle d'une « université » — Il s'agissait de savoir si la Cour de l'impôt a commis une erreur dans son interprétation de la Loi — Les dispositions pertinentes en l'espèce étaient sans ambiguïté — L'exonération prévue à l'art. 7 s'applique aux « universités »; ce terme est défini de manière définitive à l'art. 123(1) de la Loi puisque le législateur a utilisé le mot « means » (« s'entend de ») dans la version anglaise de la Loi lorsqu'il a défini le terme « university » (« université ») — Compte tenu des divergences entre les versions anglaise et française dans la définition du terme « université », la Cour a eu recours à la règle du sens commun; le sens de la définition anglaise l'a emporté en l'espèce — Contrairement à la conclusion de la Cour de l'impôt, il s'agirait d'une interprétation large inadmissible de la teneur de la Loi ayant pour effet de limiter la définition d'une « université » aux seules institutions qui sont reconnues comme telles par une loi provinciale, ou à celles qui sont habilitées à décerner des diplômes de baccalauréat ou de cycle supérieur — En l'absence d'une définition du terme « diplôme » dans la Loi, il convient de tenir compte de la définition que lui donnent les lois provinciales — En Colombie-Britannique, les lois applicables prévoient les diplômes d'associé, qui peuvent être décernés par les universités et certains collèges — Ainsi, pour être visée par la définition d'« université » aux fins de la Loi, l'institution doit être habilitée à décerner des diplômes — Étant donné que l'appelante a été autorisée à décerner des diplômes par la province de la Colombie-Britannique, elle est visée par l'exonération prévue à l'art. 7 — En conclusion, la Cour de l'impôt a mal interprété la Loi — Appel accueilli.

This was an appeal from a Tax Court of Canada decision confirming an assessment for unpaid GST/HST on student fees charged by the appellant in 2010. The Tax Court found that the appellant was required to collect and remit GST/HST since it did not fall within the applicable exemption set out in section 7 of Part III, Schedule V of the Excise Tax Act.

Il s'agissait d'un appel interjeté à l'encontre d'une décision de la Cour canadienne de l'impôt qui a confirmé une cotisation établie à l'égard de la TPS/TVH impayée sur les frais de scolarité facturés par l'appelante en 2010. La Cour de l'impôt a conclu que l'appelante devait percevoir et verser la TPS/TVH parce qu'elle n'était pas visée par l'exonération prévue à l'article 7 de la partie III de l'annexe V de la Loi sur la taxe d'accise.

Schedule V of the Act sets out a long list of exemptions from the requirement to charge and remit GST/HST and the relevant exemption in this case was section 7, which covers certain types of educational services. It was common ground between the parties that the only portion of the foregoing exemption that might be applicable to the appellant was the term "university" since the appellant is a private for-profit college. The term "university" is defined in subsection 123(1), Part IX of the Act. The appellant argued, inter alia, that it was a "university" within the meaning of that definition because it is authorized to grant two-year associate degrees under provincial legislation, namely in British Columbia. However, the Tax Court rejected this assertion and held that to come within the scope of the definition of "university", an institution needed to be recognized as a university by the relevant provincial authorities and also needed to grant degrees at least at the baccalaureate level. Because the appellant met neither criterion, the Tax Court found it did not fall within the applicable exemption. The Tax Court reached this conclusion for a number of reasons, in particular, because it held that the wording used to define "university" in subsection 123(1) of the Act suggests a distinction between an "institution" and colleges or research bodies associated with such an "institution". Given this, it concluded that an "institution" must refer only to a "university". Thus, the appellant would qualify for the exemption only if it were a traditional degree-granting university. The Tax Court found that the appellant did not fit the traditional definition of a "university" because it is subject to constant third-party monitoring for the purposes of maintaining its capacity to grant associate degrees unlike traditional universities that self-monitor.

L'annexe V de la Loi dresse une longue liste d'exonérations à l'obligation de percevoir et de verser la TPS/TVH et l'exonération visée en l'espèce est prévue à l'article 7, qui s'applique à certains types de services d'enseignement. Les parties ont convenu que la seule partie de l'exonération susmentionnée qui pourrait s'appliquer à l'appelante était le terme « université », puisque l'appelante est un collège privé à but lucratif. Le terme « université » est défini au paragraphe 123(1) de la partie IX de la Loi. L'appelante a fait valoir, entre autres, qu'elle est une « université » au sens de cette définition puisqu'elle est habilitée à décerner des diplômes d'associé sanctionnant des études de deux ans en vertu de la loi provinciale, soit en Colombie-Britannique. Cependant, la Cour de l'impôt a réfuté cette prétention et a conclu que, pour relever de la définition d'« université », une institution devait être reconnue à titre d'université par les autorités provinciales compétentes et décerner des diplômes sanctionnant des études de premier cycle au moins. Étant donné que l'appelante ne remplissait aucun de ces critères, la Cour de l'impôt a jugé qu'elle n'était pas visée par l'exonération en question. La Cour de l'impôt a tiré cette conclusion pour un certain nombre de raisons, plus particulièrement, parce qu'elle a jugé que la formulation employée pour définir le mot « université » au paragraphe 123(1) de la Loi laisse entendre qu'il existe une distinction entre une « institution » et les collèges ou instituts de recherche associés à une telle institution. Compte tenu de ce qui précède, elle a conclu que le terme « institution » ne devait viser qu'une « université ». Ainsi, l'appelante serait admissible à l'exonération seulement si elle était une université traditionnelle qui décernait des diplômes. La Cour de l'impôt a conclu que l'appelante ne satisfaisait pas à la définition traditionnelle d'une « université » puisqu'elle est assujettie à une surveillance constante d'un tiers afin de pouvoir continuer à décerner des diplômes d'associé, au contraire des universités traditionnelles qui se contrôlent elles-mêmes.

The issue was whether the Tax Court of Canada erred in its statutory interpretation.

Held, the appeal should be allowed.

It had to be determined whether the relevant provisions of the Act were ambiguous in that they were open to more than one reasonable interpretation. This question was answered in the negative since the relevant provisions were unambiguous and had to be interpreted in the way the appellant submitted. More specifically, the section 7 exemption applies to "universities". That term is conclusively defined in subsection 123(1) of the Act as Parliament used the word "means" in setting out the definition of "university" for the purposes of the Act and the use of this word in a statutory definition reflects Parliament's intention that the definition be exhaustive. Thus, for the purposes of the Act, what is determinative is whether an institution falls within the statutory definition in the Act, which provides in relevant part that a university means a "recognized degree-granting institution" or an organization that operates a "college affiliated with … such an institution."

On its face, the English version of the first portion of the definition of a "university" in the Act requires that an institution merely be recognized as one that is empowered to grant degrees to qualify as a university. The argument that the French version might be read in the same way or could be read as providing that it is the institution as opposed to its degree-granting status that must be recognized was rejected and the interpretation that the appellant urged was adopted. Given the differences in the French and English versions herein, the shared meaning rule was applied whereby the meaning that is shared by the English and French versions is presumed to be the meaning intended by the legislature. The singular meaning of the English version of the definition, which states that a qualifying institution need merely be recognized as one that is empowered to grant degrees, is encompassed in the French definition if it is equivocal. Applying the first step of the shared meaning rule, the meaning of the English definition had to govern. As well, the shared meaning was also consistent with the broader scheme of the Act and Parliament's intent. Thus, contrary to what the Tax Court held, it would constitute an impermissible reading-in of additional elements to limit the "university" definition to only those institutions that are recognized as such under provincial law or to those that are empowered to grant baccalaureate degrees or higher.

Il s'agissait de savoir si la Cour canadienne de l'impôt a commis une erreur dans son interprétation de la Loi.

Arrêt : l'appel doit être accueilli.

La Cour devait se demander si les dispositions pertinentes de la Loi étaient ambiguës, parce qu'elles étaient sujettes à plus d'une interprétation raisonnable. La Cour a répondu à cette question par la négative puisque les dispositions pertinentes étaient sans ambiguïté et devaient être interprétées de la manière proposée par l'appelante. Plus précisément, l'exonération prévue à l'article 7 s'applique aux « universités ». Ce terme est défini de manière définitive au paragraphe 123(1) de la Loi puisque le législateur a utilisé le mot « means » (« s'entend de ») dans la version anglaise de la Loi lorsqu'il a défini le terme « university » (« université ») aux fins de cette dernière et l'utilisation de ce mot dans une définition traduit l'intention du législateur de donner une définition exhaustive d'un terme. Par conséquent, aux fins de la Loi, l'essentiel est de déterminer si la définition législative donnée dans la Loi s'applique à une institution en particulier, dont la disposition pertinente donne la définition suivante du mot « université » : « [i]nstitution reconnue qui décerne des diplômes » ou organisation qui administre une « école affiliée […] d'une telle institution ».

Selon son libellé, la version anglaise de la première partie de la définition du terme « university » donnée dans la Loi exige qu'une institution soit simplement reconnue comme étant habilitée à décerner des diplômes pour être considérée comme une université. L'argument voulant que la version française soit lue de la même façon ou puisse être lue comme prévoyant que c'est l'institution et non sa capacité à décerner des diplômes qui doit être reconnue a été rejeté et l'interprétation que l'appelante préconisait a été adoptée. Compte tenu des divergences entre les versions anglaise et française en l'espèce, la Cour a eu recours à la règle du sens commun, selon laquelle le sens qui est commun aux versions française et anglaise sera présumé être celui correspondant à l'intention du législateur. En cas d'ambiguïté, le sens unique de la version anglaise de la définition, qui prévoit simplement qu'une institution est admissible si elle est reconnue comme étant autorisée à décerner des diplômes, est englobé dans la définition française. Si la première étape de la règle du sens commun est appliquée, le sens de la définition anglaise devait l'emporter. De plus, ce sens commun respectait en outre l'économie générale de la Loi et l'intention du législateur. Contrairement à la conclusion de la Cour canadienne de l'impôt, il s'agirait d'une interprétation large inadmissible de la teneur de la Loi ayant pour effet de limiter la définition d'une « université » aux seules institutions qui sont reconnues comme telles par une loi provinciale, ou à celles qui sont habilitées à décerner des diplômes de baccalauréat ou de cycle supérieur.

In the absence of a definition of "degree" in the Act, regard should be given to how the term is defined in provincial legislation since the provinces determine what degrees may be granted by which institutions through their jurisdiction over education. In British Columbia, the relevant legislation provides for associate degrees which may be granted both by universities and certain colleges. Thus to come within the definition of a "university" for purposes of the Act, the institution must be empowered to grant degrees as the same are defined in the relevant provincial legislation. However, the definition of a "university" for purposes of the Act cannot also be tied to how that term is defined in provincial legislation since the Act defines the term "university". Based on this analysis, the appellant is authorized to grant degrees by a relevant authority (province of British Columbia) and it therefore followed that it fell within the scope of the exemption in section 7 of Part III, Schedule V of the Act. Resort to a contextual and purposive analysis to discern the meaning of "university" for purposes of these provisions in the Act led to the same result for several reasons, which were discussed.

In conclusion, the Tax Court incorrectly interpreted the Act and the appellant fell within the section 7 exemption.

En l'absence d'une définition du terme « diplôme » dans la Loi, il convient de tenir compte de la définition que lui donnent les lois provinciales, car la compétence en matière d'éducation appartient aux provinces et ce sont elles qui déterminent les diplômes qu'une institution est habilitée à décerner. En Colombie-Britannique, les lois applicables prévoient les diplômes d'associé, qui peuvent être décernés par les universités et certains collèges. Ainsi, pour être visée par la définition d'« université » aux fins de la Loi, l'institution doit être habilitée à décerner des diplômes tel que définis dans les lois provinciales applicables. Cependant, étant donné que la Loi contient une définition du terme « université », on ne peut pas faire de lien entre la définition de ce terme aux fins de l'application de la Loi et sa définition dans une loi provinciale. D'après cette analyse, l'appelante est autorisée à décerner des diplômes par une autorité compétente (la province de la Colombie-Britannique) et par conséquent, il s'ensuivait qu'elle est visée par l'exonération prévue à l'article 7 de la partie III de l'annexe V de la Loi. Recourir à une analyse contextuelle et téléologique pour discerner le sens du terme « université » aux fins de ces dispositions de la Loi a donné le même résultat, pour plusieurs raisons, lesquelles ont été discutées.

En conclusion, la Cour de l'impôt a mal interprété la Loi et l'appelante était visée par l'exonération prévue à l'article 7.

[1] LA JUGE GLEASON, J.C.A. : L'appelante, Alexander College Corp., demande l'annulation du jugement du of the Tax Court of Canada [Tax Court] in Alexander College Corp. v. The Queen, 2015 TCC 238, [2015] G.S.T.C. 118 (Alexander College), which confirmed an assessment for unpaid GST/HST on student fees charged by the College in 2010. The Tax Court found that Alexander College was required to collect and remit GST/HST as it did not fall within the applicable exemption set out in section 7 of Part III, Schedule V of the Excise Tax Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. E-15 (the ETA). For the reasons that follow, I believe that the Tax Court incorrectly interpreted the ETA and that Alexander College falls within the section 7 exemption. I would accordingly allow this appeal, with costs.

I. The Decision of the Tax Court in Alexander College

[2] Schedule V of the ETA sets out a long list of exemptions from the requirement to charge and remit GST/HST. The relevant exemption in the present case is in section 7 of Part III, Schedule V and covers certain types of educational services. It exempts:

> 7 A supply made by a school authority, public college or university of a service of instructing individuals in, or administering examinations in respect of, courses for which credit may be obtained toward a diploma or degree.

[3] It was common ground between the parties before the Tax Court and remains undisputed before this Court that the only portion of the foregoing exemption that might be applicable to Alexander College is the term "university" as the appellant is a private for-profit college. The term "university" is defined in subsection 123(1), Part IX of the ETA as follows:

> university means a recognized degree-granting institution or an organization that operates a college affiliated with, or a research body of, such an institution; (université)

2 octobre 2015 prononcé par la Cour canadienne de l'impôt dans la décision Alexander College Corp. c. La Reine, 2015 CCI 238 (décision Alexander College), qui confirmait une cotisation établie à l'égard de la TPS/TVH impayée sur les frais de scolarité facturés par le collège en 2010. La Cour canadienne de l'impôt a conclu que l'appelante, Alexander College, devait percevoir et verser la TPS/TVH parce qu'elle n'est pas visée par l'exonération prévue à l'article 7 de la partie III de l'annexe V de la Loi sur la taxe d'accise, L.R.C. (1985), ch. E-15 (la LTA). Pour les motifs exposés ci-dessous, j'estime que la Cour canadienne de l'impôt a mal interprété la LTA et que Alexander College est bel et bien visée par l'exonération prévue à l'article 7. En conséquence, j'accueillerais l'appel avec dépens.

I. La décision Alexander College de la Cour canadienne de l'impôt

[2] L'annexe V de la LTA dresse une longue liste d'exonérations à l'obligation de percevoir et de verser la TPS/TVH. L'exonération visée en l'espèce est prévue à l'article 7 de la partie III de l'annexe V et s'applique à certains types de services d'enseignement. L'exonération vise :

> 7 La fourniture, effectuée par une administration scolaire, un collège public ou une université, d'un service consistant à donner à des particuliers des cours ou des examens qui mènent à un diplôme.

[3] Les parties ont convenu devant la Cour canadienne de l'impôt, et cela demeure incontesté devant la Cour, que la seule partie de l'exonération susmentionnée qui pourrait s'appliquer à Alexander College est le terme « université », puisque l'appelante est un collège privé à but lucratif. Le terme « université » est défini comme suit au paragraphe 123(1) de la partie IX de la LTA :

> université Institution reconnue qui décerne des diplômes, y compris l'organisation qui administre une école affiliée à une telle institution ou l'institut de recherche d'une telle institution. (university)

[4] Alexander College argues that it is a "university", within the meaning of the foregoing definition, because it is authorized to grant two-year associate degrees under provincial legislation, namely British Columbia's Degree Authorization Act, S.B.C. 2002, c. 24 (the Degree Authorization Act). It also notes (and it is undisputed) that in British Columbia at least some traditional universities grant identical associate degrees and recognize Alexander College's courses for credit towards a four-year baccalaureate degree. Alexander College further underscores that in British Columbia there are both public and privately-funded universities as well as public and privately-funded colleges and vocational schools (as is contemplated by the Degree Authorization Act; British Columbia's University Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 468; British Columbia's College and Institute Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 52 and several statutes applicable to particular institutions, namely, Royal Roads University, Thompson Rivers University, Trinity Western University and Sea to Sky University [now called Quest University]).

[5] The Tax Court rejected Alexander College's assertion that it fell within the scope of the definition of a "university" for purposes of the ETA and held that to come within the scope of that definition an institution needed to be recognized as a university by the relevant provincial authorities and also needed to grant degrees at least at the baccalaureate level. Because Alexander College met neither criterion, the Tax Court found it did not fall within the applicable exemption and was therefore required to collect and remit the disputed GST/HST. The Tax Court offered several reasons in support of this conclusion.

[5] Réfutant la prétention de Alexander College selon laquelle elle entrait dans la définition d'« université » au sens de la LTA, la Cour canadienne de l'impôt a conclu que cette définition s'appliquait seulement aux institutions qui sont reconnues à titre d'université par les autorités provinciales compétentes et qui décernent des diplômes sanctionnant des études de premier cycle au moins. Étant donné que Alexander College ne remplit aucun de ces critères, la Cour canadienne de l'impôt a jugé que l'appelante n'était pas visée par l'exonération en question et qu'elle était par conséquent tenue de percevoir et de verser la TPS/TVH contestée. La Cour canadienne de l'impôt fonde sa conclusion sur plusieurs motifs.

[6] First, the Tax Court held that the wording used to define "university" in subsection 123(1) of the ETA suggests a distinction between an "institution" and colleges or research bodies associated with such an "institution". Given this, the Tax Court concluded that an "institution" must refer only to a "university". Consequently, Alexander College would qualify for the exemption only if it were a traditional degree-granting university. The Tax Court found that Alexander College does not fit the traditional definition of a "university" because it is subject to constant third-party monitoring for the purposes of maintaining its capacity to grant associate degrees, unlike traditional universities, which self-monitor (Alexander College, at paragraphs 51, 53, 62).

[7] Second, the Tax Court reviewed the holdings of this Court in Klassen v. Canada, 2007 FCA 339, [2008] 2 C.T.C. 16 (Klassen) and of the Tax Court in Zailo v. The Queen, 2014 TCC 60, 2014 D.T.C. 1087 (Zailo), which determined that the distinguishing feature between a university and a foreign college was the level of degree awarded. In both cases, a university—for the purposes of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C., 1985 (5th Supp.), c. 1 (the ITA)—was deemed to be an institution that grants at least baccalaureate degrees. The Tax Court applied this reasoning to Alexander College and held that only institutions offering baccalaureate degrees or higher qualify as "recognized degree-granting institution[s]", within the scope of the definition of "university" contained in subsection 123(1) of the ETA (Alexander College, at paragraphs 65–68).

[8] Third, the Tax Court reasoned that including private colleges within the definition of "university" would be illogical given the wording and structure of the provisions in the ETA. More specifically, the Tax Court held that the "college affiliated with" option under the definition of "university" in subsection 123(1) of the ETA would be redundant and absurd if the affiliated institution could be another college as it makes no sense to speak of a college being affiliated with another college. The Tax Court further held that the interpretation entendre qu'il existe une distinction entre une « institution » et les collèges ou instituts de recherche associés à une telle institution. Compte tenu de ce qui précède, la Cour canadienne de l'impôt a conclu que le terme « institution » ne devait viser qu'une « université ». En conséquence, Alexander College serait admissible à l'exonération seulement si elle était une université traditionnelle qui décernait des diplômes. La Cour canadienne de l'impôt a conclu que Alexander College ne satisfaisait pas à la définition traditionnelle d'une « université » puisqu'elle est assujettie à une surveillance constante d'un tiers afin de pouvoir continuer à décerner des diplômes d'associé, au contraire des universités traditionnelles qui se contrôlent elles-mêmes (décision Alexander College, aux paragraphes 51, 53 et 62).

urged by Alexander College would result in the section 7 exemption offending the presumption against tautology. It reasoned that such a reading would mean that private colleges would be subsumed within "university", whereas public colleges would be segregated out. The Tax Court held that such a reading would render Parliament's choice to identify "public college[s]" within the provision superfluous (Alexander College, at paragraphs 70–74).

[9] Finally, the Tax Court offered in a footnote to its reasons the suggestion that the interpretation advanced by Alexander College would offend the scheme of the ETA as it would result in the College being exempt in terms of its supplies but not entitled to claim either input tax credits or the public service body rebate. The Tax Court noted that "[t]his result seems contrary to the scheme of the ETA which is structured so that an entity making taxable supplies is entitled to claim input tax credits and an entity making exempt supplies such as a university is entitled to a rebate" (Alexander College, at footnote 22).

II. Analysis

[10] This appeal raises a single question of statutory interpretation. On a question of law like statutory interpretation in the tax appeals context, the standard of review is correctness: Housen v. Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235, at paragraphs 8 and 9; Redeemer Foundation v. M.N.R., 2006 FCA 325, [2007] 3 F.C.R. 40, at paragraph 24 (affirmed without comment on this point in 2008 SCC 46, [2008] 2 S.C.R. 643); Bozzer v. Canada, 2011 FCA 186, 333 D.L.R. (4th) 385, at paragraph 3.

[11] The appropriate methodology for statutory interpretation is well-known; courts must read the words of an Act "in their entire context and in their grammatical canadienne de l'impôt a en outre jugé que l'interprétation que préconisait Alexander College conduirait l'exonération prévue à l'article 7 à nuire à la présomption d'absence de tautologie. Selon la Cour canadienne de l'impôt, une telle interprétation signifierait que les collèges privés seraient inclus dans la définition d'« université », alors que les collèges publics en seraient exclus. La Cour canadienne de l'impôt a jugé qu'une telle interprétation rendrait superflu le choix du législateur d'inclure l'expression « collège public » dans la disposition (décision Alexander College, aux paragraphes 70 à 74).

II. Analyse

[10] Le présent appel soulève une seule question d'interprétation législative. Dans le cadre d'un appel en matière fiscale, les questions d'interprétation législative sont assujetties à la norme de contrôle de la décision correcte : arrêt Housen c. Nikolaisen, 2002 CSC 33, [2002] 2 R.C.S. 235, aux paragraphes 8 et 9; arrêt Redeemer Foundation c. M.R.N., 2006 CAF 325, [2007] 3 R.C.F. 40, au paragraphe 24 (confirmé sans remarque sur ce point par l'arrêt 2008 CSC 46, [2008] 2 R.C.S. 643); arrêt Bozzer c. Canada, 2011 CAF 186, au paragraphe 3.

[11] La méthode appropriée en matière d'interprétation législative est bien connue : les tribunaux doivent lire les termes d'une loi « dans leur contexte global en and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament": Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 27, at paragraph 21; Bell ExpressVu Limited Partnership v. Rex, 2002 SCC 42, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 559, at paragraph 26. This approach requires courts to consider the text, context and purpose of the statutory provision.

[12] While the foregoing approach applies to the interpretation of tax statutes, the Supreme Court of Canada has indicated that it is often appropriate to place greater emphasis on a textual interpretation when interpreting a taxation provision given the "degree of precision and detailed characteristics of many tax provisions": A.Y.S.A. Amateur Youth Soccer Association v. Canada (Revenue Agency), 2007 SCC 42, [2007] 3 S.C.R. 217, at paragraph 16; Placer Dome Canada Ltd. v. Ontario (Minister of Finance), 2006 SCC 20, [2006] 1 S.C.R. 715 (Placer Dome), at paragraph 23; and Canada Trustco Mortgage Co. v. Canada, 2005 SCC 54, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 601 (Canada Trustco), at paragraph 11. The Supreme Court of Canada further instructs that if the text of a taxation provision gives rise to "more than one reasonable interpretation", recourse to a contextual and purposive analysis should be employed to resolve ambiguities (Placer Dome, at paragraph 23; Canada Trustco, at paragraph 10). However, where a taxation provision "admits of no ambiguity in its meaning or in its application to the facts, [the provision] must simply be applied" (Placer Dome, at paragraph 23).

[13] Under the foregoing analytical framework, one must ask whether the relevant provisions are ambiguous in that they are open to more than one reasonable interpretation. In my view, this question must be answered in the negative in the present appeal as the relevant provisions are unambiguous and must be interpreted in the way Alexander College submits.

[14] More specifically, the section 7 exemption applies to "universities". That term is conclusively defined in subsection 123(1) of the ETA as Parliament used the word "means" in setting out the definition of "university" for the purposes of the ETA. As Alexander College suivant le sens ordinaire et grammatical qui s'harmonise avec l'esprit de la loi, l'objet de la loi et l'intention du législateur » (arrêt Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re), [1998] 1 R.C.S. 27, au paragraphe 21; arrêt Bell ExpressVu Limited Partnership c. Rex, 2002 CSC 42, [2002] 2 R.C.S. 559, au paragraphe 26). Cette méthode oblige les tribunaux à examiner le texte, le contexte et l'objet de la disposition législative.

[12] Bien que la méthode qui précède s'applique à l'interprétation des lois fiscales, la Cour suprême du Canada a indiqué qu'il est souvent approprié d'insister sur l'interprétation textuelle lorsqu'il faut interpréter une disposition fiscale étant donné le « degré de précision et [les] caractéristiques particulières de nombreuses dispositions fiscales » : arrêt A.Y.S.A. Amateur Youth Soccer Association c. Canada (Agence du revenu), 2007 CSC 42, [2007] 3 R.C.S. 217, au paragraphe 16; arrêt Placer Dome Canada Ltd. c. Ontario (Ministre des Finances), 2006 CSC 20, [2006] 1 R.C.S. 715 (arrêt Placer Dome), au paragraphe 23; et arrêt Hypothèques Trustco Canada c. Canada, 2005 CSC 54, [2005] 2 R.C.S. 601 (arrêt Hypothèques Trustco), au paragraphe 11. La Cour suprême précise que, si le libellé de la disposition fiscale peut « recevoir plus d'une interprétation raisonnable », une analyse contextuelle et téléologique s'impose pour lever toute ambiguïté (arrêt Placer Dome, au paragraphe 23; arrêt Hypothèques Trustco, au paragraphe 10). Toutefois, « [l]orsque le sens d'une […] disposition [fiscale] ou son application aux faits ne présente aucune ambiguïté, il suffit de l'appliquer » (arrêt Placer Dome, au paragraphe 23).

[14] Plus précisément, l'exonération prévue à l'article 7 s'applique aux « universités ». Ce terme est défini de manière définitive au paragraphe 123(1) de la LTA puisque le législateur a utilisé le mot « means » (« s'entend de ») dans la version anglaise de la Loi correctly notes, it is a well-accepted principle of statutory interpretation that the use of the word "means" in a statutory definition reflects Parliament's intention that the definition be exhaustive and therefore may well displace the ordinary meaning for a defined term: Ruth Sullivan, Statutory Interpretation, 3rd ed. (Toronto: Irwin Law Inc., 2016) (Sullivan), at pages 79 and 80; Entertainment Software Association v. Society of Composers, Authors and Music Publishers of Canada, 2012 SCC 34, [2012] 2 S.C.R. 231, at paragraph 42; Yellow Cab Ltd. v. Board of Industrial Relations et al., [1980] 2 S.C.R. 761, at page 768; Sheldon Inwentash and Lynn Factor Charitable Foundation v. Canada, 2012 FCA 136, 2012 D.T.C. 5090, at paragraph 28.

[15] Thus, for the purposes of the ETA, it matters neither how an ordinary person might understand the term "university" nor how that term might be defined in provincial legislation. Rather, what is determinative is whether an institution falls within the statutory definition in the ETA. That definition provides in relevant part that a university means a "recognized degree-granting institution" or an organization that operates a "college affiliated with … such an institution".

[16] On its face, the English version of the first portion of the definition of a "university" in the ETA requires that an institution merely be recognized as one that is empowered to grant degrees to qualify as a university.

[17] The respondent argues that the French version might be read in the same way or could be read as providing that it is the institution as opposed to its degree-granting status that must be recognized as the French version of the definition provides that a university means "[i]nstitution reconnue qui décerne des diplômes, y compris l'organisation qui administre une école affiliée à une telle institution". I disagree as it is not clear for what the institution would be recognized other than for its capacity to grant degrees in the French version of the provision; if Parliament meant to convey the idea that what is required is that the institution be lorsqu'il a défini le terme « university » (« université ») aux fins de cette dernière. Or, comme le souligne à juste titre Alexander College, il existe un principe bien établi en matière d'interprétation législative selon lequel l'utilisation du mot « means » dans une définition traduit l'intention du législateur de donner une définition exhaustive d'un terme, qui peut supplanter son sens ordinaire : Ruth Sullivan, Statutory Interpretation, 3e éd., Toronto : Irwin Law Inc., 2016 (Sullivan), aux pages 79 et 80; arrêt Entertainment Software Association c. Société canadienne des auteurs, compositeurs et éditeurs de musique, 2012 CSC 34, [2012] 2 R.C.S. 231, au paragraphe 42; arrêt Yellow Cab Ltd. c. Board of Industrial Relations et autres, [1980] 2 R.C.S. 761, à la page 768; arrêt Sheldon Inwentash and Lynn Factor Charitable Foundation c. Canada, 2012 CAF 136, au paragraphe 28.

recognized as a university, additional words would have been required in the French text to add an expression like "comme telle" after the word "reconnue".

[18] However, even if I were to assume that the French text may also be read as suggested, the meaning that Alexander College urges still must be adopted. When interpreting statutory provisions that appear to differ in their French and English versions, courts often employ the shared meaning rule. Under this rule "the meaning that is shared by the French and English versions is presumed to be the meaning intended by the legislature" (Sullivan, at page 98). The Supreme Court of Canada in R. v. Daoust, 2004 SCC 6, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 217 (Daoust) explained that applying the rule involves two steps. The first step is to determine if there is a shared meaning between the two versions. The Court stated that where one version is clear and the other might be ambiguous, as the respondent argues is the case here, the shared meaning is the version that is "plain and not ambiguous" (Daoust, at paragraph 28). Once a common meaning is identified, the second step is to identify whether that meaning is, "according to the ordinary rules of statutory interpretation, consistent with Parliament's intent" (Daoust, at paragraph 30). For example, a reviewing court should consider the scheme of the legislation to determine if the shared meaning actually expresses the intention of Parliament as reflected elsewhere in the statute: R. v. Compagnie Immobilière BCN Ltée, [1979] 1 S.C.R. 865, at pages 872–874; Canada (Attorney General) v. Frye, 2005 FCA 264, 338 N.R. 382, at paragraph 28.

[19] The singular meaning of the English version of the definition, which states that a qualifying institution need merely be recognized as one that is empowered to grant degrees, is encompassed in the French definition, if it is equivocal. Therefore, applying the first step of the shared meaning rule as per Daoust, the meaning of the English definition must govern. I believe that this shared meaning is also consistent with the broader scheme of the ETA and the intent of Parliament, which I discuss in detail below.

l'institution devait être reconnue à titre d'université, il aurait fallu ajouter une expression du genre « comme telle » après « reconnue » dans la version française.

[18] Même si j'admettais que la définition française peut aussi s'interpréter de la manière proposée, la signification que Alexander College préconise doit cependant être adoptée. Lorsqu'ils sont appelés à interpréter des dispositions législatives dont les versions anglaise et française semblent diverger, les tribunaux recourent souvent à la règle du sens commun. Suivant cette règle, [TRADUCTION] « le sens qui est commun aux versions française et anglaise sera présumé être celui correspondant à l'intention du législateur » (Sullivan, à la page 98). Dans l'arrêt R. c. Daoust, 2004 CSC 6, [2004] 1 R.C.S. 217 (arrêt Daoust), la Cour suprême du Canada a expliqué que la règle en question s'applique en deux étapes. La première étape consiste à établir s'il existe un sens commun aux deux versions. La Cour a déclaré que, s'il y a ambiguïté dans une version et pas dans l'autre, comme c'est le cas en l'espèce d'après l'intimée, le sens commun favorisera la version qui n'est pas « ambiguë, la version qui est claire » (arrêt Daoust, au paragraphe 28). Une fois que le sens commun a été trouvé, la deuxième étape consiste à vérifier si celui-ci est « conforme à l'intention législative suivant les règles ordinaires d'interprétation » (arrêt Daoust, au paragraphe 30). Ainsi, une cour de révision doit tenir compte de l'économie générale de la loi afin de déterminer si le sens commun traduit réellement l'intention du législateur, telle qu'elle est énoncée ailleurs dans la loi : arrêt R. c. Compagnie Immobilière BCN Ltée, [1979] 1 R.C.S. 865, aux pages 872 à 874; arrêt Canada (Procureur général) c. Frye, 2005 CAF 264, au paragraphe 28.

[20] Thus, contrary to what the Tax Court held, I believe it would constitute an impermissible reading-in of additional elements to limit the "university" definition to only those institutions that are recognized as such under provincial law or to those that are empowered to grant baccalaureate degrees or higher.

[21] Indeed, the respondent did not rely on the latter argument before this Court and, in my view, was well-advised to abandon it as the argument stems from the decisions in Klassen and Zailo, which are wholly inapplicable to the ETA. As noted, both cases arose under the ITA. The provisions in the ITA that were at issue in Klassen and Zailo are fundamentally different from those in the ETA.

[22] Klassen and Zailo dealt with the income deduction for tuition fees and the education credit provided for in paragraphs 118.5(1)(b) and 118.6(1)(b) of the ITA, which apply to claims concerning "universit[ies] outside Canada". However, unlike the ETA, the ITA contains no definition of "university". Moreover, the ITA casts the comparable deduction and credit for Canadian institutions in sub-paragraphs 118.5(1)(a)(i), 118.5(1)(c)(i) and paragraph 118.6(1)(c) more broadly and makes them applicable not only to universities, but also to "college[s] or other educational institution[s] providing courses at a post-secondary school level". Based on this distinction, this Court and the Tax Court found that a foreign university means an institution granting degrees at the baccalaureate level or higher. Given the entirely different statutory context, this holding is inapplicable under the ETA.

[23] Thus, there is no reason to interpret the term "degree" in subsection 123(1) of the ETA as being limited to baccalaureate degrees or higher. In the absence of a definition of "degree" in the ETA, regard should be given to how the term is defined in provincial legislation as the provinces determine what degrees may be granted by which institutions through their jurisdiction over education. As noted, in British Columbia, the relevant legislation provides for associate degrees, which

[21] L'intimée n'a en effet pas invoqué cet argument devant la Cour et, à mon avis, elle a bien fait d'y renoncer puisqu'il découle de l'arrêt Klassen et de la décision Zailo, qui ne s'appliquent pas du tout à la LTA. Comme il a été mentionné, les deux affaires se rapportaient à la LIR. Les dispositions de la LIR qui étaient en cause dans l'arrêt Klassen et dans la décision Zailo sont fondamentalement différentes de celles de la LTA.

may be granted both by universities and certain colleges. Thus, to come within the definition of a "university" for purposes of the ETA, the institution must be empowered to grant degrees as the same are defined in the relevant provincial legislation.

[24] However, one cannot go on to also tie the definition of a "university" for purposes of the ETA to how that term is defined in provincial legislation as the ETA defines the term "university". Had Parliament wished to define a "university" for the purposes of the ETA to mean only those institutions which are granted such status under provincial law, it would have been easy for it to have so defined the term or to have left it undefined. Parliament chose not to do this but rather elected to tie the definition of a "university" to an institution's recognized ability to grant degrees.

[25] Thus, to come within the definition of "university" within the meaning of subsection 123(1), Part IX of the ETA all that is required is that the institution be empowered to grant degrees by a relevant authority such as the province of British Columbia. Alexander College is so authorized. It therefore follows that Alexander College falls within the scope of the exemption in section 7 of Part III, Schedule V of the ETA.

[26] Resort to a contextual and purposive analysis to discern the meaning of "university" for purposes of these provisions in the ETA leads to the same result for several reasons.

[27] In the first place, as both parties concur, the final reason offered by the Tax Court in footnote 22 to its reasons is without merit as private universities—which are several in number in British Columbia—find themselves in precisely the same position that Alexander College would be in if it were found to be a "university" within the meaning of subsection 123(1) of the ETA. More specifically, these private universities are exempt in terms of enumerated supplies but are not entitled to claim either input tax credits or the public service body rebate. Thus, a similar result in the case of private

Comme il a été mentionné, en Colombie-Britannique, les lois applicables prévoient les diplômes d'associé, qui peuvent être décernés par les universités et certains collèges. Ainsi, pour être visée par la définition d'« université » aux fins de la LTA, l'institution doit être habilitée à décerner des diplômes tel que définis dans les lois provinciales applicables.

[25] Ainsi, pour être visée par la définition d'« université » au sens du paragraphe 123(1) de la partie IX de la LTA, il suffit que l'institution soit habilitée à décerner des diplômes par une autorité compétente comme la province de la Colombie-Britannique. C'est le cas de Alexander College. Il s'ensuit donc que Alexander College est visée par l'exonération prévue à l'article 7 de la partie III de l'annexe V de la LTA.

[26] Recourir à une analyse contextuelle et téléologique pour discerner le sens du terme « université » aux fins de ces dispositions de la LTA donne le même résultat, pour plusieurs raisons.

[27] En premier lieu, comme en conviennent les deux parties, le dernier motif exposé par la Cour canadienne de l'impôt dans la note de bas de page 22 de ses motifs est sans fondement puisque les universités privées — il y en a plusieurs en Colombie-Britannique — se trouvent dans la même situation que Alexander College si elle était considérée comme une « université » au sens du paragraphe 123(1) de la LTA. Plus précisément, ces universités privées sont exonérées au titre des fournitures énumérées, mais elles ne peuvent pas demander de crédit de taxe sur les intrants ni un remboursement colleges like Alexander College cannot be said to be contrary to the scheme of the ETA.

[28] Secondly, contrary to what the Tax Court found, there is no reason to view the second portion of the definition of "university" that incorporates affiliated colleges and research bodies as circumscribing the term "institution" to only mean universities as so recognized under provincial legislation. There is nothing necessarily anomalous in a college being affiliated with another college, and there was no evidence before the Tax Court to indicate whether such affiliations have actually occurred. There is accordingly nothing absurd in understanding a "university" to include a degree-granting college because it is possible that such a college might well be affiliated with another college.

[29] Moreover, the term "institution" is used broadly elsewhere in the ETA and thus conflicts with the narrowing of the term in the "university" definition adopted by the Tax Court.

[30] For example, the word "institution" is often used in relation to a "financial institution" in Part IX of the ETA, which is defined in section 149 to include virtually any person engaged in a financial services business. Similarly, a "public institution" is defined in subsection 123(1), Part IX of the ETA as follows:

> public institution means a registered charity (within the meaning assigned by subsection 248(1) of the Income Tax Act) that is a school authority, a public college, a university, a hospital authority or a local authority determined under paragraph (b) of the definition municipality to be a municipality; (institution publique)

This definition includes much more than a single type of institution. Likewise, paragraph 68.26(a) of the ETA provides for a partial rebate of Part VI tax to "a school, university or other similar educational institution". Once à titre d'organismes de services publics. La même conclusion appliquée aux collèges privés tels que Alexander College ne pourrait donc être jugée incompatible avec l'économie générale de la LTA.

> institution publique Organisme de bienfaisance enregistré, au sens du paragraphe 248(1) de la Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu, qui est une administration scolaire, un collège public, une université, une administration hospitalière ou une administration locale qui a le statut de municipalité aux termes de l'alinéa b) de la définition de municipalité. (public institution)

La définition comprend bien plus qu'un seul type d'institution. Il en va de même de l'alinéa 68.26a) de la LTA, qui prévoit un remboursement partiel de la taxe payée en vertu de la partie VI par « une école, une université again, the term "institution" is used broadly in this context to mean any type of organization.

[31] Given the broad way the term "institution" is used elsewhere in the ETA, there is no reason to circumscribe it in the definition of "university" in subsection 123(1).

[32] Thirdly, contrary to what the Tax Court found, reading the "university" definition as including a private degree-granting college does not render the listing of a public college in section 7 of Part III, Schedule V of the ETA superfluous and thus the interpretation of Alexander College does not offend the presumption against tautology. There is considerable overlap between the various educational suppliers who are covered by the exemptions in Part III, Schedule V of the ETA and, therefore, nothing tautological about a supplier coming within more than one definition in the Schedule.

[33] Indeed, this overlap is apparent in the definition of a university, itself. Encompassed within the definition, as noted, are affiliated colleges. These colleges may well be publicly-funded and, if so, are twice mentioned in the provisions—once in the section 7 exemption as a "public college" and again as coming within the definition of "university" in subsection 123(1) of the ETA as an affiliated college.

[34] Another example of a similar overlap arises out of the definitions for "public college" and "vocational school" [in section 1 of Part III, Schedule V of the ETA]. They are defined as follows:

Part IX

Goods and Services Tax

ou une autre semblable institution d'enseignement ». Une fois de plus, dans ce contexte, le terme « institution » est employé dans son sens large pour désigner un type quelconque d'organisme.

[32] En troisième lieu, contrairement à la conclusion de la Cour canadienne de l'impôt, interpréter la définition d'« université » comme incluant un collège privé qui décerne des diplômes ne rend pas superflue la mention de collège privé à l'article 7 de la partie III de l'annexe V de la LTA et, par conséquent, l'interprétation de Alexander College n'est pas contraire à la présomption d'absence de tautologie. Comme il existe un recoupement important entre les divers fournisseurs de services d'enseignement visés par les exonérations prévues dans la partie III de l'annexe V de la LTA, la possibilité qu'un fournisseur corresponde à plus d'une définition donnée dans l'annexe n'a donc rien de tautologique.

[33] En effet, ce recoupement est manifeste dans la définition même d'université. Comme il a été mentionné, la définition comprend les écoles affiliées (ou « affiliated colleges » dans la version anglaise). Ces écoles (« colleges » dans la version anglaise) peuvent bien être financées par des fonds publics, auquel cas elles sont mentionnées deux fois dans les dispositions, c'est-à-dire une fois à titre de « collège public » visé par l'exonération prévue à l'article 7, et une autre fois à titre d'école affiliée (« affiliated college » en anglais) entrant dans la définition d'« université » au sens du paragraphe 123(1) de la LTA.

[34] Un autre exemple d'un recoupement analogue découle des définitions des termes « collège public » et « école de formation professionnelle » [à l'article 1 de la partie III de l'annexe V de la LTA]. Ils sont définis comme suit :

[35] Tant les « collège[s] public[s] » que les « école[s] de formation professionnelle » sont mentionnés séparément dans les exonérations de la partie III de l'annexe V de la LTA. Notamment, l'article 8 est libellé ainsi :

8 La fourniture, sauf une fourniture détaxée, effectuée par un gouvernement, une administration scolaire, une école de formation professionnelle, un collège public ou une université, d'un service consistant à donner à des particuliers des cours ou des examens qui mènent à des certificats, diplômes, permis ou documents semblables, ou à des classes ou des grades conférés par un permis, attestant la compétence de particuliers dans l'exercice d'un métier, sauf si le fournisseur a fait un choix en application du présent article en la forme déterminée par le ministre et contenant les renseignements requis par celui-ci.

[36] An institution that receives public funding and operates primarily to provide vocational programming at the post-secondary level would qualify as both a public college and a vocational school.

[36] Une institution qui reçoit des fonds publics et qui est administrée principalement pour offrir des programmes de formation professionnelle de niveau postsecondaire pourrait être considérée autant comme un collège public que comme une école de formation professionnelle.

[37] There is thus no absurdity in the overlap of educational suppliers and no impermissible redundancy in understanding the term "university" in subsection 123(1) of the ETA to include a college merely because a "public college" is separately listed in section 7 of Part III, Schedule V to the ETA.

[38] Fourthly, the exemptions, which cover school authorities, public colleges, universities and vocational schools, demonstrate an intent to exempt all forms of education from the requirement to charge and remit GST/HST if there is some governmental input into the quality of the programs offered. The definitions of "school authority" and "university" in subsection 123(1), Part IX of the ETA build in the requirement to provide instruction to a provincially-regulated standard. The former provides:

school authority means an organization that operates an elementary or secondary school in which it provides instruction that meets the standards of educational instruction established by the government of the province in which the school is operated; (administration scolaire)

123 (1) […]

administration scolaire Institution qui administre une école primaire ou secondaire dont le programme d'études est conforme aux normes en matière d'enseignement établies par le gouvernement de la province où l'école est administrée. (school authority)

Similarly, the university definition requires recognition of the degree-granting status of the institution.

[39] In the case of public colleges, governmental oversight over the quality of the programming is accomplished through the requirement that the institutions receive public funding. Finally, the exemptions relating to vocational schools outlined in sections 6 and 8 of Part III of Schedule V contain within them the requirement that the courses offered lead to recognized accreditations. In addition to section 8, reproduced above, section 6 exempts:

> 6 A supply of
>
> (a) a service of instructing individuals in courses leading to, or for the purpose of maintaining or upgrading, a professional or trade accreditation or designation recognized by a regulatory body, or
>
> (b) a certificate, or a service of administering an examination, in respect of a course, or in respect of an accreditation or designation described in paragraph (a),
> where the supply is made by a professional or trade association, government, vocational school, university or public college or by the regulatory body, except where the supplier has made an election under this section in prescribed form containing prescribed information.

[40] This intent is reflected in what the Minister of Finance stated when the provisions were being debated before Parliament. Schedule V to the ETA was adopted in 1990 along with other amendments. In respect of the suite of amendments that concerned the taxation of educational services, the Minister of Finance stated as follows (House of Commons Debates, 34th Parl., 2nd Sess., Vol. 8 (11 May 1990), at page 1271 (Hon. Michael Wilson, Minister of Finance)):

De même, la définition d'université exige que l'institution soit reconnue comme étant habilitée à décerner des diplômes.

[39] Dans le cas des collèges publics, la supervision de la qualité des programmes par le gouvernement est assurée par la voie d'une exigence liée à l'octroi d'une aide publique. En dernier lieu, pour qu'une école de formation professionnelle puisse se prévaloir d'une exonération prévue aux articles 6 et 8 de la partie III de l'annexe V, elle doit offrir des cours menant à une accréditation reconnue. Outre l'article 8, reproduit ci-dessus, l'article 6 prévoit l'exonération des fournitures suivantes :

> 6 La fourniture, effectuée par une association professionnelle, un gouvernement, une école de formation professionnelle, une université, un collège public ou un organisme de réglementation, des services ou certificats suivants, sauf si le fournisseur fait un choix en application du présent article, en la forme déterminée par le ministre et contenant les renseignements requis par celui-ci :
> a) un service consistant à donner à des particuliers des cours qui mènent à une accréditation ou à un titre professionnel reconnus par l'organisme ou qui permettent de conserver ou d'améliorer une telle accréditation ou un tel titre;
> b) un certificat, ou un service consistant à donner un examen, concernant un cours, une accréditation ou un titre mentionné à l'alinéa a).

[40] Cette intention ressort des arguments invoqués par le ministre des Finances lorsque les dispositions ont été débattues devant le Parlement. L'annexe V de la LTA a été adoptée en 1990, de concert avec d'autres modifications. Relativement à la série de modifications touchant l'imposition des services d'enseignement, le ministre des Finances a déclaré ce qui suit (Débats de la Chambre des communes, 34e lég., 2e sess., vol. 8 (11 mai 1990), à la page 1258 (l'hon. Michael Wilson, ministre des Finances)) :

> … Madam Speaker, there is no tax on education. There is no GST on educational services. That is a simple part of the legislation.

[41] It is consistent with this purpose that private colleges like Alexander College be exempt from the requirement to collect and remit GST/HST.

[42] Finally, as Alexander College convincingly argues, the interpretation offered by the Tax Court leads to an absurd result. Students taking the same courses at a British Columbia university and Alexander College or pursuing associate degrees at the two institutions would be subject to different tax treatment. Under the Tax Court's interpretation, students would not have to pay GST/HST on their course fees in the former case while in the latter they would. There is no principled basis for such differentiation and, for the reasons discussed above, such a result is not required under a textual, contextual or purposive reading of the relevant provisions. Rather, when properly read, the provisions in issue lead to the conclusion that Alexander College falls within the exemption in section 7 of Part III, Schedule V of the ETA.

III. Proposed Disposition

[43] It therefore follows that I would allow this appeal with costs, set aside the judgment of the Tax Court, and, making the decision that the Tax Court ought to have made, would allow the appeal in 2012-3854(GST)G with costs and vacate the assessment dated July 4, 2011 for the reporting period from July 1, 2010 to September 30, 2010.

GAUTHIER J.A.: I agree.

STRATAS J.A.: I agree.

> […] Madame la Présidente, il n'y a pas de taxe sur l'éducation. La TPS ne s'applique pas aux services d'enseignement. C'est clairement indiqué dans le projet de loi.

[41] C'est conforme à l'objectif voulant que les collèges privés comme Alexander College soient exonérés de l'obligation de percevoir et de verser la TPS/TVH.

III. Décision proposée

[43] Il s'ensuit donc que j'accueillerais l'appel avec dépens, j'annulerais la décision de la Cour canadienne de l'impôt et, rendant la décision que la Cour canadienne de l'impôt aurait dû rendre, j'accueillerais l'appel dans le dossier 2012-3854(GST)G avec dépens et j'annulerais la cotisation établie le 4 juillet 2011 pour la période de déclaration comprise entre le 1er juillet et le 30 septembre 2010.

LA JUGE GAUTHIER, J.C.A. : Je suis d'accord.

LE JUGE STRATAS, J.C.A. : Je suis d'accord.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT OF THE HONOURABLE MADAM JUSTICE PICARD

Introduction

[1] This appeal raises the issue of whether the bankruptcy of an employer, after it has wrongfully terminated an employment contract with an employee, affects the quantum of damages to which the employee is entitled.

[2] The appellant, Noble, was employed by Principal Consultants Ltd. (Principal) for over 18 years. At the time of his termination, in August of 1987, he was Senior Vice-President, Finance, Prairie Region. He was terminated without cause and without notice or compensation. In October of 1987, Principal made an assignment in bankruptcy. KPMG Inc., (KPMG) became the trustee in bankruptcy and is the respondent in this action.

[3] There was an agreed statement of facts which included the following:

> (a) the appellant was entitled at common law to 18 months' notice of termination, or payment in lieu thereof;
> (b) the appellant's salary was based on the following formula:
> > (i) base salary of $5,000 per month,
> > (ii) bonuses calculated on the basis of increased sales in his region.

[4] KPMG takes the position that a bankruptcy limits the quantum of common law damages because, upon that event, Noble would no longer have been employed by Principal. That is, KPMG says that the notice period is reduced to 2 months and 6 days. In support, it refers to the results in cases where employees have become disabled or died after being unlawfully dismissed and to statements in Dunlop v. British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority, [1988] 32 B.C.L.R. 334 (2d) (B.C.C.A.) and Rizzo and Rizzo Shoes (Re), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 27.

[5] Noble argues that upon Principal unlawfully dismissing him, Principal breached its contract with him and he became entitled, at common law, to damages equivalent to 18 months' compensation. Noble says Principal's bankruptcy is not an event that reduces that quantum, that the proper quantification of his common law damages against the bankrupt is compensation based on 18 months' notice, and that he has the right to file a claim for those damages as an unsecured creditor of Principal. Noble distinguishes the disabled/death cases and says the analysis in Dunlop and statements in Rizzo support his case.

[6] The chambers judge agreed with KPMG. While he distinguished the disabled/death cases, he found support for his conclusion in both the Dunlop and Rizzo cases.

The Law

[7] Upon a breach of contract, the injured party is entitled to damages to place him, so far as possible, in the same position he would have been if the contract had been performed. Wertheim v. Chicoutimi Pulp Co., [1911] A.C. 301.

[8] In an employment contract, there is an implied term that an employer will give an employee reasonable notice of termination. The employee may be given the opportunity to work until the end of the period of notice (working notice) or, he may be given damages in lieu of notice if dismissed summarily without just cause (unlawful dismissal). In the latter case, the dismissed employee has the responsibility of mitigating the loss. Bardal v. Globe & Mail Ltd., [1960] O.W.N. 253 (Ont. H.C.)

[9] The general rule regarding damages for breach of contract is that damages are assessed at the date of breach. Fridman, The Law of Contract, 3rd ed. (Scarborough, Ontario: Carswell, 1994), at p. 754. Over the years qualifications have been made to this rule, for example, in cases involving the sale of goods or land where specific performance may be in issue and price fluctuations could greatly affect damages. See, Johnson v. Agnew, [1980] A.C. 367 (H.L.); Asamera Oil Corp. Ltd. v. Sea Oil and General Corp, [1979] 1 S.C.R. 633. No factors justifying a qualification are present in this case, thus the general rule would apply.

[10] When assessing damages for breach of contract, two distinct issues arise, remoteness and quantification. See Fridman, at p.711. Remoteness is a question of whether the damage suffered is properly recoverable in an action for breach of contract. The test for remoteness is founded in Hadley v. Baxendale, (1854) 156 E.R. 145 (Ex.) which says that damages for breach of contract are limited to the ordinary natural consequences of a breach or for consequences that might reasonably have been in the contemplation of both parties when they made the contract. See Fridman, p. 712. In the case of the breach of a contract of employment, damages in lieu of notice are not too remote.

[11] Quantifying damages often presents a challenge because of a myriad of factors and forces, including the intention of the parties and events subsequent to the contract. In this case, KPMG raises the bankruptcy of the employer as a basis for terminating the common law notice period as of the date of the bankruptcy. KPMG also seeks to reduce the quantum of the award by challenging the bonus portion of the salary payment that is based on sales.

[12] It appears that there are no reported cases considering the effect of a subsequent bankruptcy of the employer on common law damages for unlawful dismissal.

[13] In the Dunlop case, after being terminated without cause and without notice, the employee suffered an injury that disabled him for 12 months. The trial judge found that reasonable notice was 20 months but deducted 12 months on the basis that the employer would not have paid him for that period, had he been in its employment on a working notice basis. (It appears that the employee would have been paid during that time by a disability plan.) Writing for the British Columbia Court of Appeal, Justice Lambert reversed that decision on the basis that the employee's disability did not have any effect on the period of reasonable notice. He found it was not a factor that should reduce the quantum of the claim, which was based on compensation equivalent to 20 months' salary.

[14] In a contract of employment, there is an implied term that each party must give reasonable notice to the other. There is not an implied term that the employer may pay damages in lieu of notice. The employee is entitled to damages because the employer is liable to the employee for breaching the implied term that it must give reasonable notice. The employer cannot characterize such a payment as compliance with an implied term that it can breach the contract so long as it pays because there is no such implied term.

[15] The issue in Dunlop was the effect to be given to an event that occurred after the dismissal and that would have prevented the dismissed employee from earning income if he had remained as an employee serving out a working notice. Justice Lambert's statements about the effect to be given to such subsequent events were relied on by the chambers judge in this case.

> ...in considering the significance of events following the dismissal, the proper principle, in my opinion, is that an event which occurs after a wrongful dismissal and before trial, or before the end of the notice period, whichever comes first, may be considered in assessing damages actually suffered by the dismissed employee. The legal significance to be attached to the event will depend on the nature of the event and on other relevant factors in the case. But, to the extent that the damages are derived from a determination of the proper notice period, that notice period is determinable once and for all at the time of the breach of the contract and is not, itself, affected by subsequent events.

[17] In applying his test, Justice Lambert concluded that the employee's disability did not have any effect on the period of reasonable notice because the employer, who had breached the contract, could not rely on the employee's disability to diminish or deny his claim. Specifically, Justice Lambert refused to apply the "working notice" model to the breach situation. He found that after the breach of contract, the subsequent events were of no consequence. He said that when the employer broke the contract it lost its right to rely on the provision in the contract that no salary would be paid with respect to a period of disability.

[18] In summary, Justice Lambert held that the notice period is to be determined at the time of the breach and is not affected by subsequent events. He left the door open for the consideration of an event in assessing damages actually suffered in so far as they are not derived from a notice period. In the case before him, however, he did not accept the employer's argument that, because it would not have had to pay the employee during a period that he was disabled had he been given working notice, it did not have to pay him for the equivalent period as part of the damages based on the period of reasonable notice.

> ...an employee who is wrongfully dismissed without adequate notice of termination is entitled to damages consisting of the salary the employee would have earned had the employee worked during the notice period. The fact that an employee could not have worked during the notice period is irrelevant to the assessment of these damages. They are based on the premise that the employee would have worked during the notice period.

[20] Both parties to this appeal find comfort in the Rizzo decision. The Supreme Court of Canada interpreted the Employment Standards Act (ESA) of Ontario and determined the rights it gave employees terminated by the bankruptcy of their employer. The liability of an employer to an employee under common law was not in issue. The ratio of the case is that an employee who is terminated as a consequence of the bankruptcy of his employer is entitled to the minimal award as provided in the legislation. In the course of arriving at his decision, Justice Iacobucci discussed the policy behind such legislation and used an analogy in which he compared the situation of two employees: one dismissed just before, and one as a consequence of, the bankruptcy. Noble refers to the discussion of policy to support his position that employees' rights are paramount while the KPMG seeks an interpretation of the analogy that would restrict compensation of the employee dismissed before a bankruptcy.

[21] Justice Iacobucci's judgment is replete with policy considerations that support the protection of the interests of employees. He referred to an earlier decision, Machtinger v. HOJ Industries Ltd., [1992] 1 S.C.R. 986, where the Court recognized the importance that our society accords to employment and the fundamental role it has assumed in the life of the individual. He noted that, in Wallace v. United Grain Growers Ltd., [1997] 3 S.C.R. 701, the Court said that the manner in which employment can be terminated was equally important. He used these principles in giving the ESA a broad interpretation.

[22] His observations about the objective of termination and severance pay apply equally to those terminated at common law. He said one of the primary purposes of notice is to provide employees with an opportunity to take preparatory measures and seek alternate employment. He characterized termination pay in lieu of notice as a “cushion” for employees against the adverse effects of economic dislocation likely to follow from the absence of an opportunity to search for alternate employment. (Christie, England, Cotter, Employment Law in Canada (2nd 3e. 1993) at p. 572-81)

[23] Justice Iacobucci quoted with approval the statements of other courts that severance pay recognizes an employee’s investment in his employer’s business, the extent of which is directly related to years of service and seniority. It follows that long-serving employees suffer special losses when their employment terminates.

The Decision

[24] The chambers judge agreed with the submissions of the KPMG. He held that the bankruptcy limited Noble’s right to common law damages. He found that Noble was entitled to damages for lost wages after the date of the bankruptcy but only for the time period and only in the amount permitted by the Employment Standards Code, S.A. 1996, c.E-10.3. As for the period from the date of termination by the employer to the date of the bankruptcy, he found that Noble was entitled to damages for the amount of his base salary plus the bonuses. However, he held that Noble was not entitled to damages for “theoretical sales or profitability which did not occur”.

Analysis

[25] The chambers judge fell into error in two ways. Firstly, he characterized the bankruptcy as an event that reduced the notice period and, using the model of working notice, found it reduced the time Noble might have been employed by Principal. Secondly, he determined that, upon the bankruptcy, the status of Noble changed from that of a person unlawfully terminated by his employer months before, to that of a person terminated by the bankruptcy. He arrived at this determination from a misinterpretation of the analogy used by Justice Iacobucci in Rizzo.

[26] The chambers judge accepted the general statement of the law as to the assessment of damages for breach of contract including that an employee must be placed in the same position as he would have been in if the contract had been performed. This statement is the basis for the quantification of damages after a breach. However, the chambers judge accepted KPMG’s argument that it means that the employee should be placed in the same position he would have been in had he worked during the period of notice, which opportunity to work would have been terminated by the bankruptcy. Such an interpretation confuses termination by dismissal and termination by working notice. Since Noble was terminated by dismissal, which was a breach of contract by the employer, he had the right to damages at that date. It is true that, in quantifying those damages, the court should look at the loss from the perspective of the contract having been performed. However, such an analysis does not support shifting the legal position of the employee who has been unlawfully dismissed without notice to that of a person who has been given working notice. To do so is to err in law.

[27] The chambers judge cited with approval the statements of Justice Lambert in Dunlop. In applying them, he found that the bankruptcy was an event that should be considered, and that its effect was to reduce Noble's right to common law damages from the agreed notice period of 18 months to two months. But a close analysis of the statement of Justice Lambert, set out in paragraph 16 of these reasons, does not support this view. The notice period is determinable once and for all at the time of the breach of the employment contract.

[28] Even assuming that the bankruptcy could be considered an event that affected the actual damages suffered by Noble, it is clear that the bankruptcy of Principal not only did not reduce the damages suffered by Noble but also, to the extent that, as an unsecured creditor, his recovery will be less than the full amount awarded, it exacerbated them. The "cushion" will be smaller and therefore the means to recuperate from a dislocation will be less. This case is not similar to those reviewed by the chambers judge where damages actually suffered were reduced by the subsequent event of the payment of benefits or death. Thus, the chambers judge erred in characterizing the bankruptcy in this case as an event that could reduce the period of notice and, even if looked at through the perspective of the effect it had on Noble's damages, it provides no basis to reduce them.

[29] The chambers judge was correct when, in commenting on the Rizzo case, he said, at paragraph 27 of his memorandum of judgment;

> The decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Rizzo was that liability for the wage claims of the employees existed under the Employment Standards Act, R.S.O. 1980, c.137. No liability was attributed under the common law either by the Ontario Court of Appeal or the Supreme Court of Canada.

[30] But he erred when he went on to conclude:

> The decision therefore provides support for the argument of the trustee that liability for the losses of Mr. Noble at common law ceased at the date of bankruptcy.

[31] The chambers judge arrived at that conclusion because of a misinterpretation of comments by Justice Iacobucci about consistent treatment of employees. The chambers judge concluded that the claims of all dismissed employees, even those with common law rights, must be restricted to that available under the ESA.

[32] Justice Iacobucci said, at paragraph 28:

> ...if the ESA termination and severance pay provisions do not apply in circumstances of bankruptcy, those employees "fortunate" enough to have been dismissed the day before a bankruptcy would be entitled to such payments, but those terminated on the day the bankruptcy becomes final would not be so entitled.

Justice Iacobucci said such a result would be absurd.

[33] In other words, to require that the dismissal be employer-initiated before the ESA would apply would be unfair. The statement cannot be tortured to say that an employee who might have a common law claim, having been dismissed before the bankruptcy by the employer, loses it because of the bankruptcy. It does say that such an employee would be entitled to make a claim under the ESA.

[34] Concluding comments by Justice Iacobucci, at paragraph 41 are helpful.

> In my view, the impetus behind the termination of employment has no bearing upon the ability of the dismissed employee to cope with the sudden economic dislocation caused by the unemployment. As all dismissed employees are equally in need of the protections provided by the ESA, any distinction between employees whose termination resulted from the bankruptcy of their employer and those who have been terminated for some other reason would be arbitrary and inequitable.

[35] This statement was not meant to limit the quantification of the claim of an employee with entitlement to common law damages because of a prior breach of the employment contract but to establish the entitlement of the employee, whose employment contract was breached by the event of the bankruptcy, to ESA benefits. It would be a strange result indeed if Justice Iacobucci's decision were used to restrict the protection given to a long-term employee terminated without cause and without notice or compensation.

[36] There can be no argument that the recovery by the employee entitled to common law damages be based on his status as an unsecured creditor in the bankruptcy, while that of the employee entitled to damages because of the event of the bankruptcy be based in the provisions of the ESA.

[37] Thus, the chambers judge erred in law in finding that Noble's entitlement to common law damages was limited by the bankruptcy. The appeal must be allowed so that Noble is entitled to make a claim for damages based on 18 months' notice.

Damages

[38] Damages were acknowledged to be the equivalent of 18 months' salary, which had two components: a base amount of $5,000 per month and bonuses based on increased sales. There is an issue as to whether Noble is entitled to the bonus monies. KPMG argues that he is not because the increases upon which they would have been based never occurred. The chambers judge found that no damages could be claimed with respect to what he called "theoretical sales or profitability".

[39] The evidence before the court was limited to an agreed statement of facts and an affidavit of the trustee. The following facts emerge from those sources. Noble agreed to compensation that had two parts: one certain, the base salary, and one to be determined, the bonuses. These terms were in an employment contract of June of 1986, approximately 14 months before the termination. By that time, Noble had been employed by Principal for 17 years and was a Senior Vice-President of Finance for the prairie region. Noble himself sold securities and investments to the public and supervised others' doing so.

[40] One bonus was calculated on the basis of increased monthly sales compared to those of the previous year. The other was based on new salespersons reaching certain quotas. Although the term "bonus" was used to describe the payment Noble would receive flowing from all sales, in reality it was payment for incentive-based performance.

[41] Applying the basic principles of law set out earlier, Noble is entitled to compensation for lost bonus monies that were part of his income and therefore, upon his unlawful dismissal, became damages to which he was entitled based on the premise that he would have received them had the contract been performed. The probability is that, during the notice period, had the contract been performed, the incentive compensation would have been earned. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, it is an implied term of the employment contract that an employer will carry on its business in its normal course. In this case, the parties have agreed on the quantum of damages for the bonus component of Noble's salary for the notice period being: 18 x $7261.62 = $129,899.16. There is no evidence as to the basis for the monthly bonus amount used in that calculation. It must be assumed that it was based on sales records prior to the bankruptcy.

[42] Case law cited by the parties indicates that some courts have approved of using past performance in the calculation of bonuses and have awarded bonuses even where the fortunes of the employer company have diminished. Rosscup v. Westfair Foods Ltd., [1999] A.J. No. 944 (Alta. Q.B.); Beach v. Ikon Office Solutions Inc., [1999] B.C.J. No. 1574 (S.C.); see also, England, Christie and Christie, Employment Law in Canada (3rd Ed., Toronto: Butterworths, 1999) at 16.27.

[43] Returning to the judgment of Justice Iacobucci in Rizzo, it is important to remember that the objective of termination pay is to provide a "cushion" against dislocation and to recognize the special losses suffered by long-term employees.

[44] It is agreed that in 1988 Noble commenced his own business and earned a net income of $11,658.61 and that in 1989 his net income from the business was $42,429.98. The parties agree that those figures must be taken into account in the final calculations as mitigation of the loss. It would appear that Noble's experience and ability permitted him to shoulder the responsibility of mitigating his loss in a fairly timely and effective manner.

Conclusion

[45] The appeal is allowed. Noble is entitled to damages for breach of contract equivalent to 18 months' notice to include base salary and bonus payments. The parties have agreed that these amounts are $90,000 and $129,899.16, respectively. Appropriate adjustments are to be made for the unpaid wages and mitigation of loss. The parties advise they have agreed on interest. The final figure arrived at after the necessary adjustments is a valid claim in the bankruptcy of Principal.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT OF

---

[46] I have had the advantage of reading in draft form the Reasons for Judgment of my colleague, Picard, J.A. The first and rather narrow issue in this appeal is whether the bankruptcy of an employer deprives an earlier dismissed employee of the damages to which he or she would otherwise be entitled for wrongful dismissal. While I agree with the conclusion reached by my colleague on that issue, I approach the matter in a somewhat different fashion.

[47] The second issue pertains to the Appellant's claim that he is entitled to damages that include a "bonus". In that regard, I respectfully disagree with the opinion of the majority.

[48] The legal analysis is premised on facts that are not in dispute. They are adequately set out in the Reasons for Judgment of my colleague and need not be repeated.

[49] The nature of the implied term in a contract of employment informs the issues at bar. The implied term compels each party to give reasonable notice of termination to the other. Payment of salary or wages in lieu of notice is not an implied term. Dunlop v. British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority [1988] B.C.J. No. 1963 (B.C.C.A.).

[50] A breach of the implied term occurs on the day of summary termination. The failure to provide notice, in other words, is a breach of the employment contract entitling the employee to damages. The question to be decided is whether those damages crystalize on the day of termination such that an assessment of those damages made after bankruptcy is not affected by that bankruptcy.

[51] What then is the significance, if any, of events following summary dismissal? Damages are derived from a determination of the proper notice period. The proper notice period is determinable once and for all at the time of the breach of contract and is not, itself, affected by subsequent events. Dunlop v. British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority, supra, (at para 17).

[52] That having being said, it is vital to distinguish between the determination of the notice period and the assessment of damages actually suffered by the dismissed employee. I respectfully agree with the following statement of Lambert, J.A. in Dunlop (at para. 17):

> "I add that, in considering the significant of events following the dismissal, the proper principle, in my opinion, is that an event which occurs after a wrongful dismissal and before trial, or before > the end of the notice period, whichever comes first, may be considered in assessing the damages actually suffered by the dismissed employee. The legal significance to be attached to the event will depend on the nature of the event and on the other relevant factors in the case."

[53] It follows that in Dunlop, the Court was of the view that the employer could not avail itself of the disability of its employee which arose after the contract had been broken. Breach of contract made that event "inconsequential". As Lambert, J.A. put it "When B.C. Hydro broke the contract of employment it lost its right to rely on the provision in that contract that no salary would be paid with respect to a period of disability."

[54] This is precisely the interpretation of Dunlop, supra, given by other courts. By way of illustration, McKeown, J. in Card Estate v. John A. Robertson Mechanical Contractors (1985) Ltd., [1989] O.J. No. 1129 S.C. Ont. - High Court of Justice said this:

> "The sole issue before the B.C. Court of Appeal was whether actual events which occurred after the dismissal and would have prevented the employee from earning income had he served out the notice period would prevent him from being compensated for his wrongful dismissal. The court held that events which might have occurred had the employer given reasonable notice, but which hadn't actually happened, could not determine the quantum of damage arising from the dismissal. The employer was not entitled to raise hypothetical alternatives which might have arisen but for its breach of contract."

See also Woodlock v. Novacorp International Consulting Inc., [1990] 6 W.W.R. 454, 72 D.L.R. (4th) 347 (B.C.C.A.), McGarry v. Bosco Homes Edmonton, [1992] A.J. No. 1202.

[55] The Respondent argues that the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in Rizzo v. Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 27, [1998] S.C.J. No. 2 places employees terminated before bankruptcy in the same position as those "terminated" by the act of bankruptcy. The Respondent submits that in Rizzo, the Court was motivated by the unfairness that would result if employees whose termination resulted from a bankruptcy were treated differently than those whose employment had been terminated for some other reason. The Respondent says that the corollary must also be the case. Counsel for the Respondent argues that it would be equally "arbitrary and inequitable", to use the words of Iacobucci, J. at para. 41 of Rizzo, to give the Appellant a much larger claim in the bankruptcy than those employees who are terminated as a result of the bankruptcy simply because the Appellant's termination occurred a short time prior to the bankruptcy.

[56] I do not read Rizzo in quite that way. The issue there was entitlement to statutory benefits under the Employment Standards Act. In my view, the case is authority for the proposition that "any distinction" that would deprive some employees of minimum protections will not be countenanced. That is not the situation in the case at bar. Giving the Appellant his full common law damages will not deprive other employees of their minimum protections under the Employment Standards Act. The Appellant, it is true, will fare better than other employees who remained employed to the date of bankruptcy. But that is precisely what the legal framework contemplates. The principle that emerges from Rizzo is not that all employees will be treated alike. It is only authority for the proposition that all employees must be accorded their minimum statutory protections. It follows that the Appellant is entitled to 18 months salary in lieu of notice of termination having regard to the length of employment and other factors recited in the agreed statement of facts.

[57] As to the Appellant's claim for a "bonus", reference must first be made to the contract of employment. For purposes of analysis, but without deciding the point, I am prepared to assume that the bonus awarded in prior years forms an integral part of the Appellant's salary.

[58] In the case at bar, the employment contract (as evidenced by letter dated June 12, 1986) sets out a formula for calculating the bonus:

> "Bonuses will be based upon sales improvements within your [the Appellant's] Region:
>
> > a) You will receive $36 for each percentage point increase per month, this month's 3MMA sales volume over last year this month's 3MMA sales volume.
> > i.e. July 1986 3MMA volume in the Prairie region is $15,000,000.
> > July 1985 3MMA volume in the Prairie region is $10,000,000.
> > $15,000,000/10,000,000 equals a 50% increase in volume;
> > therefore, 50 x $36 = $1,800 would be the bonus for July 1986.
> > b) You will receive $500 for each new salesman, in your region, that reaches the qualified consultant status of 500 QPR career volume during the first year of employment."

[59] At the time of this letter agreement, the Appellant had been employed with Principal Consultants Ltd. for a period in excess of 17 years. The record makes clear that the Appellant knew his employer and its business very well. He must be taken to have appreciated that the sales of securities and investments to the public was a business with some considerable risk to it.

Fortunes are made and lost in that financial world. The Appellant's fortunes were tied to his performance, the performance of the sales people under his supervision, and that of the company. He knew full well that the marketplace and its exigencies would play an important role.

[60] Accordingly, it makes sense that the formula for the calculation of bonus would be based on the sales and performance of the company on a monthly basis. On the facts of this case, if that formula were used, the Appellant would receive a bonus for the months following his termination but prior to the assignment in bankruptcy (assuming there was an increase in sales for that period). For the period following bankruptcy, the Appellant would not receive any bonus as the company ceased to have any sales.

> "Where a bonus during the notice period was unlikely or nonexistent due to the employer's lack of profits, financial situation or general business conditions, no damages will be awarded unless the bonus has been 'guaranteed' or otherwise made part of the employee's basic compensation. Similarly, the fact that the employer did well financially, leading to higher bonuses for other employees, has been considered in assessing damages."

[62] The learned author refers to a number of authorities including Weldon v. Com Cor Chemical Ltd. (1993), T.L.W. 1244-021 (B.C.S.C.), where payment of bonus was dependent on profits and there was no evidence of profits; Ashdown v. Jumbo Video Inc. (1993), R.L.W. 1309-010 (Ont. Gen. Div.), where bonus payment was dependent on the company receiving its target and there was no evidence that it did; Ryshpan v. Burns Fry Ltd. (1995), 10 C.C.E.L. (2d) 235 (Ont. Gen. Div.), aff'd 20 C.C.E.L. (2d) 104 (Ont. C.A.), where the court considered the employer's improved financial situation in assessing the amount of the bonus; and Knox v. Interprovincial Engineering Ltd. (1993), 120 N.S.R. (2d) 288, where the evidence established that bonuses related to the financial success of the company and the court award was so premised. In an earlier Alberta decision, Stadler v. Terrace Corp. (Construction) Ltd. et al. (1983), 41 A.R. 587 (Q.B.), the employee was denied a bonus where there was a provision for a bonus if the hotel or Lake Eden Resort realized a profit and there was no evidence that either did.

[63] The Appellant cites yet another principle in support of the claim for a bonus. On the authority of Sylvester v. British Columbia, [1997] 2 S.C.R. 315, he argues that damages should be awarded on the basis that the employee would have worked during the notice period. In particular, reference is made to the comments of Major, J. in Sylvester at para. 9:

> "The fact that an employee could not have worked during the notice period is irrelevant to the assessment of these damages.

> They are based on the premise that the employee would have worked during the notice period. Therefore, an employee who is wrongfully dismissed while working and an employee who is wrongfully dismissed while receiving disability benefits are both entitled to damages consisting of the salary the employee would have earned had the employee worked during the notice period."

[64] This passage would, at first blush, tend to support the proposition that a court should not look to events following the date of breach to assess the damages. It will be remembered, however, that in Sylvester the Court looked to post-breach events to quantify the damages. The issue on appeal was whether the disability benefits received by the Respondent during the notice period should be deducted from the salary he would have earned during the notice period. Major, J. held that the question of deductibility turns on the terms of the employment contract and the intention of the parties. He found that based on the employment contract, the payments were deductible as the parties did not intend the employee to receive both disability payments and damages. It follows that Major J.'s statement in Sylvester regarding "assessment of damages" refers, in fact, to the employee's entitlement to damages, rather than the quantification of damages.

[65] The same contract-based approach to quantify damages must be used in the case at bar. The relevant inquiry is: what did the parties intend in respect of the bonus payment?

[66] In my view, a plain reading of the contract makes clear that the parties intended a bonus to be paid only where there was an actual increase of sales by the company. This would make sense. Suppose the employer had managed to stay afloat for another 18 months, but earned no profits. Had that occurred, the formula agreed upon would not have generated a bonus for the Appellant.

[67] This approach is consistent with the principle that an employee who is wrongfully dismissed without adequate notice of termination is entitled to damages consisting of the salary that the employee would have earned had the employee worked during the notice period. In the case at bar, had the Appellant worked during that period, he would not have received a bonus for the period following bankruptcy. To ignore the bankruptcy and to award a bonus is to place the Appellant in a better situation than if the company had not gone bankrupt but had made no sales. This Court ought not to re-write the contractual arrangement between the parties to achieve such a result.

[68] For these reasons, I would allow the appeal and award the Appellant damages in lieu of notice premised upon 18 months salary together with a bonus for the period following dismissal, but prior to bankruptcy, to be calculated in accordance with the letter agreement of June 12, 1986.

[69] This judgment is styled "Reasons for Judgment Reserved". The label "Reserved" no longer has the significance it once had. The Court's policy set out in Hutterian Brethren Church of Starland v. Starland No. 47 (Municipal District), (1993) 9 Alta.L.R. (3d) 1, at 15 and R. v. Bonneteau (1995), 24 Alta.L.R. (3d) 153, at 158 was abolished on September 1, 1999.

[70] The effect of the new policy, which still permits circulation of draft reasons to members of the Court off the panel (for comment only), was stated as follows by Hetherington, J.A. in R. v. Fash [1999] A.J. No. 1086:

> "In the past this court has said that, so far as statements of law or principle are concerned, a reserved judgment which is not a dissenting judgment sets out views accepted by a majority of the members of the court. (See Hutterian Brethren Church of Starland v. Starland No. 47 (Municipal District) (1993), 9 Alta. L.R. (3d) 1, at 15, and R. v. Bonneteau (1994), 24 Alta. L.R. (3d) 153, at 158.) However, this is no longer the case. The practices of the court have changed. Now so far as statements of law or principle are concerned, a reserved judgment which is not a dissenting judgment sets out the views of a majority of the panel which heard the appeal. It can not be inferred that a majority of the members of the court share those views."

ENDORSEMENT

Overview

[1] Sino-Forest Corporation ("SFC" or the "Applicant") seeks an order directing that claims against SFC, which result from the ownership, purchase or sale of an equity interest in SFC, are "equity claims" as defined in section 2 of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act ("CCAA") including, without limitation: (i) the claims by or on behalf of current or former shareholders asserted in the proceedings listed in Schedule "A" (collectively, the "Shareholder Claims"); and (ii) any indemnification claims against SFC related to or arising from the Shareholder Claims, including, without limitation, those by or on behalf of any of the other defendants to the proceedings listed in Schedule "A" (the "Related Indemnity Claims").

[2] SFC takes the position that the Shareholder Claims are "equity claims" as defined in the CCAA as they are claims in respect of a monetary loss resulting from the ownership, purchase or sale of an equity interest in SFC and, therefore, come within the definition. SFC also takes the position that the Related Indemnity Claims are "equity claims" as defined in the CCAA as they are claims for contribution or indemnity in respect of a claim that is an equity claim and, therefore, also come within the definition.

[3] On March 30, 2012, the court granted the Initial Order providing for the CCAA stay against SFC and certain of its subsidiaries. FTI Consulting Canada Inc. was appointed as Monitor.

[4] On the same day, the Sales Process Order was granted, approving Sales Process procedures and authorizing and directing SFC, the Monitor and Houlihan Lokey to carry out the Sales Process.

[5] On May 14, 2012, the court issued a Claims Procedure Order, which established June 20, 2012 as the Claims Bar Date.

[6] The stay of proceedings has since been extended to September 28, 2012.

[7] Since the outset of the proceedings, SFC has taken the position that it is important for these proceedings to be completed as soon as possible in order to, among other things, (i) enable the business operated in the Peoples Republic of China ("PRC") to be separated from SFC and put under new ownership; (ii) enable the restructured business to participate in the Q4 sales season in the PRC market; and (iii) maintain the confidence of stakeholders in the PRC (including local and national governmental bodies, PRC lenders and other stakeholders) that the business in the PRC can be successfully separated from SFC and operate in the ordinary course in the near future.

[8] SFC has negotiated a Support Agreement with the Ad Hoc Committee of Noteholders and intends to file a plan of compromise or arrangement (the "Plan") under the CCAA by no later than August 27, 2012, based on the deadline set out in the Support Agreement and what they submit is the commercial reality that SFC must complete its restructuring as soon as possible.

[9] Noteholders holding in excess of $1.296 billion, or approximately 72% of the approximately $1.8 billion of SFC's noteholders' debt, have executed written support agreements to support the SFC CCAA Plan as of March 30, 2012.

Shareholder Claims Asserted Against SFC

(i) Ontario

[10] By Fresh as Amended Statement of Claim dated April 26, 2012 (the "Ontario Statement of Claim"), the Trustees of the Labourers' Pension Fund of Central and Eastern Canada and other plaintiffs asserted various claims in a class proceeding (the "Ontario Class Proceedings") against SFC, certain of its current and former officers and directors, Ernst & Young LLP ("E&Y"), BDO Limited ("BDO"), Poyry (Beijing) Consulting Company Limited ("Poyry") and SFC's underwriters (collectively, the "Underwriters").

[11] Section 1(m) of the Ontario Statement of Claim defines "class" and "class members" as:

> All persons and entities, wherever they may reside who acquired Sino's Securities during the Class Period by distribution in Canada or on the Toronto Stock Exchange or other secondary market in Canada, which securities include those acquired over the counter, and all persons and entities who acquired Sino's Securities during the Class Period who are resident of Canada or were resident of Canada at the time of acquisition and who acquired Sino's Securities outside of Canada, except the Excluded Persons.

[12] The term "Securities" is defined as "Sino's common shares, notes and other securities, as defined in the OSA". The term "Class Period" is defined as the period from and including March 19, 2007 up to and including June 2, 2011.

[13] The Ontario Class Proceedings seek damages in the amount of approximately $9.2 billion against SFC and the other defendants.

[14] The thrust of the complaint in the Ontario Class Proceedings is that the class members are alleged to have purchased securities at "inflated prices during the Class Period" and that absent the alleged misconduct, sales of such securities "would have occurred at prices that reflected the true value" of the securities. It is further alleged that "the price of Sino's Securities was directly affected during the Class Period by the issuance of the Impugned Documents".

(ii) Quebec

[15] By action filed in Quebec on June 9, 2011, Guining Liu commenced an action (the "Quebec Class Proceedings") against SFC, certain of its current and former officers and directors, E&Y and Poyry. The Quebec Class Proceedings do not name BDO or the Underwriters as defendants. The Quebec Class Proceedings also do not specify the quantum of damages sought, but rather reference "damages in an amount equal to the losses that it and the other members of the group suffered as a result of purchasing or acquiring securities of Sino at inflated prices during the Class Period".

[16] The complaints in the Quebec Class Proceedings centre on the effect of alleged misrepresentations on the share price. The duty allegedly owed to the class members is said to be based in "law and other provisions of the Securities Act", to ensure the prompt dissemination of truthful, complete and accurate statements regarding SFC's business and affairs and to correct any previously-issued materially inaccurate statements.

(iii) Saskatchewan

[17] By Statement of Claim dated December 1, 2011 (the "Saskatchewan Statement of Claim"), Mr. Allan Haigh commenced an action (the "Saskatchewan Class Proceedings") against SFC, Allen Chan and David Horsley.

[18] The Saskatchewan Statement of Claim does not specify the quantum of damages sought, but instead states in more general terms that the plaintiff seeks "aggravated and compensatory damages against the defendants in an amount to be determined at trial".

[19] The Saskatchewan Class Proceedings focus on the effect of the alleged wrongful acts upon the trading price of SFC's securities:

> The price of Sino's securities was directly affected during the Class Period by the issuance of the Impugned Documents. The defendants were aware at all material times that the effect of Sino's disclosure documents upon the price of its Sino's [sic] securities.

(iv) New York

[21] SFC contends that the New York Class Proceedings focus on the effect of the alleged wrongful acts upon the trading price of SFC's securities.

[22] The plaintiffs in the various class actions have named parties other than SFC as defendants, notably, the Underwriters and the auditors, E&Y, and BDO, as summarized in the table below. The positions of those parties are detailed later in these reasons.

	Ontario	Quebec	Saskatchewan	New York

E&Y LLP	X	X	-	X
E&Y Global	-	-	-	X
BDO	X	-	-	-

Legal Framework

[23] Even before the 2009 amendments to the CCAA dealing with equity claims, courts recognized that there is a fundamental difference between shareholder equity claims as they relate to an insolvent entity versus creditor claims. Essentially, shareholders cannot reasonably expect to maintain a financial interest in an insolvent company where creditor claims are not being paid in full. Simply put, shareholders have no economic interest in an insolvent enterprise: Blue Range Resource Corp. (Re), (2004) 4 W.W.R. 738 (Alta. Q.B.) [Blue Range Resources]; Stelco Inc. (Re), (2006) CanLII 1773 (Ont. S.C.J.) [Stelco]; Royal Bank of Canada v. Central Capital Corp. (1996), 27 O.R. (3d) 494 (C.A.).

[24] The basis for the differentiation flows from the fundamentally different nature of debt and equity investments. Shareholders have unlimited upside potential when purchasing shares. Creditors have no corresponding upside potential: Nelson Financial Group Limited (Re), 2010 ONSC 6229 [Nelson Financial].

[25] As a result, courts subordinated equity claims and denied such claims a vote in plans of arrangement: Blue Range Resource, supra; Stelco, supra; EarthFirst Canada Inc. (Re) (2009), 56 C.B.R. (5th) 102 (Alta. Q.B.) [EarthFirst Canada]; and Nelson Financial, supra.

[26] In 2009, significant amendments were made to the CCAA. Specific amendments were made with the intention of clarifying that equity claims are subordinated to other claims.

[27] The 2009 amendments define an "equity claim" and an "equity interest". Section 2 of the CCAA includes the following definitions:

> "Equity Claim" means a claim that is in respect of an equity interest, including a claim for, among others, (…)
>

> (e) contribution or indemnity in respect of a claim referred to in any of paragraphs (a) to (d);
>
> "Equity Interest" means
>
> (a) in the case of a company other than an income trust, a share in the company – or a warrant or option or another right to acquire a share in the company – other than one that is derived from a convertible debt,

[28] Section 6(8) of the CCAA prohibits a distribution to equity claimants prior to payment in full of all non-equity claims.

[29] Section 22(1) of the CCAA provides that equity claimants are prohibited from voting on a plan unless the court orders otherwise.

Position of Ernst & Young

[30] E&Y opposes the relief sought, at least as against E&Y, since the E&Y proof of claim evidence demonstrates in its view that E&Y's claim:

(a) is not an equity claim;

(b) does not derive from or depend upon an equity claim (in whole or in part);

(c) represents discreet and independent causes of action as against SFC and its directors and officers arising from E&Y's direct contractual relationship with such parties (or certain of such parties) and/or the tortious conduct of SFC and/or its directors and officers for which they are in law responsible to E&Y; and

(d) can succeed independently of whether or not the claims of the plaintiffs in the class actions succeed.

[31] In its factum, counsel to E&Y acknowledges that during the periods relevant to the Class Action Proceedings, E&Y was retained as SFC's auditor and acted as such from 2007 until it resigned on April 5, 2012.

[32] On June 2, 2011, Muddy Waters LLC ("Muddy Waters") issued a report which purported to reveal fraud at SFC. In the wake of that report, SFC's share price plummeted and Muddy Waters profited from its short position.

[33] E&Y was served with a multitude of class action claims in numerous jurisdictions.

[34] The plaintiffs in the Ontario Class Proceedings claim damages in the aggregate, as against all defendants, of $9.2 billion on behalf of resident and non-resident shareholders and noteholders. The causes of action alleged are both statutory, under the Securities Act (Ontario) and at common law, in negligence and negligent misrepresentation.

[35] In its factum, counsel to E&Y acknowledges that the central claim in the class actions is that SFC made a series of misrepresentations in respect of its timber assets. The claims against E&Y and the other third party defendants are that they failed to detect these misrepresentations and note in particular that E&Y's audit did not comply with Canadian generally accepted accounting standards. Similar claims are advanced in Quebec and the U.S.

[36] Counsel to E&Y notes that on May 14, 2012 the court granted a Claims Procedure Order which, among other things, requires proofs of claim to be filed no later than June 20, 2012. E&Y takes issue with the fact that this motion was then brought notwithstanding that proofs of claim and D&O proofs of claim had not yet been filed.

[38] E&Y takes the position that it has contractual claims of indemnification against SFC and its subsidiaries and has statutory and common law claims of contribution and/or indemnity against SFC and its subsidiaries for all relevant years. E&Y contends that it has stand-alone claims for breach of contract and negligent and/or fraudulent misrepresentation against the company and its directors and officers.

[39] Counsel submits that E&Y's claims against Sino-Forest and the SFC subsidiaries are:

(a) creditor claims;

(b) derived from E&Y retainers by and/or on behalf of Sino-Forest and the SFC subsidiaries and E&Y's relationship with such parties, all of which are wholly independent and conceptually different from the claims advanced by the class action plaintiffs;

(c) claims that include the cost of defending and responding to various proceedings, both pre- and post-filing; and

(d) not equity claims in the sense contemplated by the CCAA. E&Y's submission is that equity holders of Sino-Forest have not advanced, and could not advance, any claims against SFC's subsidiaries.

[40] Counsel further contends that E&Y's claim is distinct from any and all potential and actual claims by the plaintiffs in the class actions against Sino-Forest and that E&Y's claim for contribution and/or indemnity is not based on the claims against Sino-Forest advanced in the class actions but rather only in part on those claims, as any success of the plaintiffs in the class actions against E&Y would not necessarily lead to success against Sino-Forest, and vice versa. Counsel contends that E&Y has a distinct claim against Sino-Forest independent of that of the plaintiffs in the class actions. The success of E&Y's claims against Sino-Forest and the SFC subsidiaries, and the success of the claims advanced by the class action plaintiffs, are not co-dependent. Consequently, counsel contends that E&Y's claim is that of an unsecured creditor.

[41] From a policy standpoint, counsel to E&Y contends that the nature of the relationship between a shareholder, who may be in a position to assert an equity claim (in addition to other claims) is fundamentally different from the relationship existing between a corporation and its auditors.

Position of BDO Limited

[42] BDO was auditor of Sino-Forest Corporation between 2005 and 2007, when it was replaced by E&Y.

[43] BDO has a filed a proof of claim against Sino-Forest pursuant to the Claims Procedure Order.

[44] BDO's claim against Sino-Forest is primarily for breach of contract.

[45] BDO takes the position that its indemnity claims, similar to those advanced by E&Y and the Underwriters, are not equity claims within the meaning of s. 2 of the CCAA.

[46] BDO adopts the submissions of E&Y which, for the purposes of this endorsement, are not repeated.

Position of the Underwriters

[47] The Underwriters take the position that the court should not decide the equity claims motion at this time because it is premature or, alternatively, if the court decides the equity claims motion, the equity claims order should not be granted because the Related Indemnity Claims are not "equity claims" as defined in s. 2 of the CCAA.

[48] The Underwriters are among the defendants named in some of the class actions. In connection with the offerings, certain Underwriters entered into agreements with Sino-Forest and certain of its subsidiaries providing that Sino-Forest and, with respect to certain offerings, the Sino-Forest subsidiary companies, agree to indemnify and hold harmless the Underwriters in connection with an array of matters that could arise from the offerings.

[49] The Underwriters raise the following issues:

(i) Should this court decide the equity claims motion at this time?

(ii) If this court decides the equity claims motion at this time, should the equity claims order be granted?

[50] On the first issue, counsel to the Underwriters takes the position that the issue is not yet ripe for determination.

[51] Counsel submits that, by seeking the equity claims order at this time, Sino-Forest is attempting to pre-empt the Claims Procedure Order, which already provides a process for the determination of claims. Until such time as the claims procedure in respect of the Related Indemnity Claims is completed, and those claims are determined pursuant to that process, counsel contends the subject of the equity claims motion raises a merely hypothetical question as the court is being asked to determine the proper interpretation of s. 2 of the CCAA before it has the benefit of an actual claim in dispute before it.

[52] Counsel further contends that by asking the court to render judgment on the proper interpretation of s. 2 of the CCAA in the hypothetical, Sino-Forest has put the court in a position where its judgment will not be made in the context of particular facts or with a full and complete evidentiary record.

[53] Even if the court determines that it can decide this motion at this time, the Underwriters submit that the relief requested should not be granted.

Position of the Applicant

[54] The Applicant submits that the amendments to the CCAA relating to equity claims closely parallel existing U.S. law on the subject and that Canadian courts have looked to U.S. courts for guidance on the issue of equity claims as the subordination of equity claims has long been codified there: see e.g. Blue Range Resources, supra, and Nelson Financial, supra.

[55] The Applicant takes the position that based on the plain language of the CCAA, the Shareholder Claims are "equity claims" as defined in s. 2 as they are claims in respect of a "monetary loss resulting from the ownership, purchase or sale of an equity interest".

[56] The Applicant also submits the following:

(a) the Ontario, Quebec, Saskatchewan and New York Class Actions (collectively, the "Class Actions") all advance claims on behalf of shareholders.

(b) the Class Actions also allege wrongful conduct that affected the trading price of the shares, in that the alleged misrepresentation "artificially inflated" the share price; and

(c) the Class Actions seek damages relating to the trading price of SFC shares and, as such, allege a "monetary loss" that resulted from the ownership, purchase or sale of shares, as defined in s. 2 of the CCAA.

[57] Counsel further submits that, as the Shareholder Claims are "equity claims", they are expressly subordinated to creditor claims and are prohibited from voting on the plan of arrangement.

[58] Counsel to the Applicant also submits that the definition of "equity claims" in s. 2 of the CCAA expressly includes indemnity claims that relate to other equity claims. As such, the Related Indemnity Claims are equity claims within the meaning of s. 2.

[59] Counsel further submits that there is no distinction in the CCAA between the source of any claim for contribution or indemnity; whether by statute, common law, contractual or otherwise. Further, and to the contrary, counsel submits that the legal characterization of a contribution or indemnity claim depends solely on the characterization of the primary claim upon which contribution or indemnity is sought.

[60] Counsel points out that in Return on Innovation Capital v. Gandi Innovations Limited, 2011 ONSC 5018, leave to appeal denied, 2012 ONCA 10 [Return on Innovation] this court characterized the contractual indemnification claims of directors and officers in respect of an equity claim as "equity claims".

[61] Counsel also submits that guidance on the treatment of underwriter and auditor indemnification claims can be obtained from the U.S. experience. In the U.S., courts have held that the indemnification claims of underwriters for liability or defence costs constitute equity claims that are subordinated to the claims of general creditors. Counsel submits that insofar as the primary source of liability is characterized as an equity claim, so too is any claim for contribution and indemnity based on that equity claim.

[62] In this case, counsel contends, the Related Indemnity Claims are clearly claims for "contribution and indemnity" based on the Shareholder Claims.

Position of the Ad Hoc Noteholders

[63] Counsel to the Ad Hoc Noteholders submits that the Shareholder Claims are "equity claims" as they are claims in respect of an equity interest and are claims for "a monetary loss resulting from the ownership, purchase or sale of an equity interest" per subsection (d) of the definition of "equity claims" in the CCAA.

[64] Counsel further submits that the Related Indemnity Claims are also "equity claims" as they fall within the "clear and unambiguous" language used in the definition of "equity claim" in the CCAA. Subsection (e) of the definition refers expressly and without qualification to claims for "contribution or indemnity" in respect of claims such as the Shareholder Claims.

[65] Counsel further submits that had the legislature intended to qualify the reference to "contribution or indemnity" in order to exempt the claims of certain parties, it could have done so, but it did not.

[66] Counsel also submits that, if the plain language of subsection (e) is not upheld, shareholders of SFC could potentially create claims to receive indirectly what they could not receive directly (i.e., payment in respect of equity claims through the Related Indemnity Claims) – a result that could not have been intended by the legislature as it would be inconsistent with the purposes of the CCAA.

[67] Counsel to the Ad Hoc Noteholders also submits that, before the CCAA amendments in 2009 (the "CCAA Amendments"), courts subordinated claims on the basis of:

(a) the general expectations of creditors and shareholders with respect to priority and assumption of risks; and

(b) the equitable principles and considerations set out in certain U.S. cases: see e.g. Blue Range Resources, supra.

[68] Counsel further submits that, before the CCAA Amendments took effect, courts had expanded the types of claims characterized as equity claims; first to claims for damages of defrauded shareholders and then to contractual indemnity claims of shareholders: see Blue Range Resources, supra and EarthFirst Canada, supra.

[69] Counsel for the Ad Hoc Noteholders also submits that indemnity claims of underwriters have been treated as equity claims in the United States, pursuant to section 510(b) of the U.S. Bankruptcy Code. This submission is detailed at paragraphs 20-25 of their factum which reads as follows:

> 20. The desire to more closely align the Canadian approach to equity claims with the U.S. approach was among the considerations that gave rise to the codification of the treatment of equity claims. Canadian courts have also looked to the U.S. law for guidance on the issue of equity claims where codification of the subordination of equity claims has been long-standing.

22. U.S. appellate courts have interpreted the statutory language in § 510(b) broadly to subordinate the claims of shareholders that have a nexus or causal relationship to the purchase or sale of securities, including damages arising from alleged illegality in the sale or purchase of securities or from corporate misconduct whether predicated on pre or post-issuance conduct.

23. Further, U.S. courts have held that indemnification claims of underwriters against the corporation for liability or defence costs when shareholders or former shareholders have sued underwriters constitute equity claims in the insolvency of the corporation that are subordinated to the claims of general creditors based on: (a) the plain language of § 510(b), which references claims for "reimbursement or contribution" and (b) risk allocation as between general creditors and those parties that play a role in the purchase and sale of securities that give rise to the shareholder claims (i.e., directors, officers and underwriters).

24. In Mid-American, the Court stated the following with respect to the "plain language" of § 510(b), its origins and the inclusion of "reimbursement or contribution" claims in that section:

> ... I find that the plain language of § 510(b), its legislative history, and applicable case law clearly show that § 510(b) intends to subordinate the indemnification claims of officers, directors, and underwriters for both liability and expenses incurred in connection with the pursuit of claims for rescission or damages by purchasers or sellers of the debtor's securities. The meaning of amended § 510(b), specifically the language "for reimbursement or contribution . . . on account of [a claim arising from rescission or damages arising from the purchase or sale of a security]," can be discerned by a plain reading of its language.
> ... it is readily apparent that the rationale for section 510(b) is not limited to preventing shareholder claimants from improving their position vis-a-vis general creditors; Congress also made the decision to subordinate based on risk allocation. Consequently, when Congress amended § 510(b) to add reimbursement and contribution claims, it was not radically departing from an equityholder claimant treatment provision, as NatWest suggests; it simply added to the subordination treatment new classes of persons and entities involved with the securities transactions giving rise to the rescission and damage claims. The 1984 amendment to § 510(b) is a logical extension of one of the rationales for the original section — because Congress intended the holders of securities law claims to be subordinated, why not also subordinate claims of other parties (e.g., officers and directors and underwriters) who play a role in the purchase and sale transactions which give rise to the securities law claims? As I view it, in 1984 Congress made a legislative judgment that claims emanating from tainted securities law transactions should not have the same priority as the claims of general creditors of the estate. 25. Further, the U.S. courts have held that the degree of culpability of the respective parties is a non-issue in the disallowance of claims for indemnification of underwriters; the equities are meant to benefit the debtor's direct creditors, not secondarily liable creditors with contingent claims.

[70] Counsel submits that there is no principled basis for treating indemnification claims of auditors differently than those of underwriters.

Analysis

Is it Premature to Determine the Issue?

[71] The class action litigation was commenced prior to the CCAA Proceedings. It is clear that the claims of shareholders as set out in the class action claims against SFC are "equity claims" within the meaning of the CCAA.

[72] In my view, this issue is not premature for determination, as is submitted by the Underwriters.

[73] The Class Action Proceedings preceded the CCAA Proceedings. It has been clear since the outset of the CCAA Proceedings that this issue – namely, whether the claims of E&Y, BDO and the Underwriters as against SFC, would be considered "equity claims" – would have to be determined.

[74] It has also been clear from the outset of the CCAA Proceedings, that a Sales Process would be undertaken and the expected proceeds arising from the Sales Process would generate proceeds insufficient to satisfy the claims of creditors.

[75] The Claims Procedure is in place but, it seems to me that the issue that has been placed before the court on this motion can be determined independently of the Claims Procedure. I do not accept that any party can be said to be prejudiced if this threshold issue is determined at this time. The threshold issue does not depend upon a determination of quantification of any claim. Rather, its effect will be to establish whether the claims of E&Y, BDO and the Underwriters will be subordinated pursuant to the provisions of the CCAA. This is independent from a determination as to the validity of any claim and the quantification thereof.

Should the Equity Claims Order be Granted?

[76] I am in agreement with the submission of counsel for the Ad Hoc Noteholders to the effect that the characterization of claims for indemnity turns on the characterization of the underlying primary claims.

[77] In my view, the claims advanced in the Shareholder Claims are clearly equity claims. The Shareholder Claims underlie the Related Indemnity Claims.

[78] In my view, the CCAA Amendments have codified the treatment of claims addressed in pre-amendment cases and have further broadened the scope of equity claims.

[79] The plain language in the definition of "equity claim" does not focus on the identity of the claimant. Rather, it focuses on the nature of the claim. In this case, it seems clear that the Shareholder Claims led to the Related Indemnity Claims. Put another way, the inescapable conclusion is that the Related Indemnity Claims are being used to recover an equity investment.

[80] The plain language of the CCAA dictates the outcome, namely, that the Shareholder Claims and the Related Indemnity Claims constitute "equity claims" within the meaning of the CCAA. This conclusion is consistent with the trend towards an expansive interpretation of the definition of "equity claims" to achieve the purpose of the CCAA.

[81] In Return on Innovation, Newbould J. characterized the contractual indemnification claims of directors and officers as "equity claims". The Court of Appeal denied leave to appeal. The analysis in Return on Innovation leads to the conclusion that the Related Indemnity Claims are also equity claims under the CCAA.

[82] It would be totally inconsistent to arrive at a conclusion that would enable either the auditors or the Underwriters, through a claim for indemnification, to be treated as creditors when the underlying actions of the shareholders cannot achieve the same status. To hold otherwise would indeed provide an indirect remedy where a direct remedy is not available.

[83] Further, on the issue of whether the claims of E&Y, BDO and the Underwriters fall within the definition of equity claims, there are, in my view, two aspects of these claims and it is necessary to keep them conceptually separate.

[84] The first and most significant aspect of the claims of E&Y, BDO and the Underwriters constitutes an "equity claim" within the meaning of the CCAA. Simply put, but for the Class Action Proceedings, it is inconceivable that claims of this magnitude would have been launched by E&Y, BDO and the Underwriters as against SFC. The class action plaintiffs have launched their actions against SFC, the auditors and the Underwriters. In turn, E&Y, BDO and the Underwriters have launched actions against SFC and its subsidiaries. The claims of the shareholders are clearly "equity claims" and a plain reading of s. 2(1)(e) of the CCAA leads to the same conclusion with respect to the claims of E&Y, BDO and the Underwriters. To hold otherwise, would, as stated above, lead to a result that is inconsistent with the principles of the CCAA. It would potentially put the shareholders in a position to achieve creditor status through their claim against E&Y, BDO and the Underwriters even though a direct claim against SFC would rank as an "equity claim".

[85] I also recognize that the legal construction of the claims of the auditors and the Underwriters as against SFC is different than the claims of the shareholders against SFC. However, that distinction is not, in my view, reflected in the language of the CCAA which makes no distinction based on the status of the party but rather focuses on the substance of the claim.

[86] Critical to my analysis of this issue is the statutory language and the fact that the CCAA Amendments came into force after the cases relied upon by the Underwriters and the auditors.

[87] It has been argued that the amendments did nothing more than codify pre-existing common law. In many respects, I accept this submission. However, I am unable to accept this submission when considering s. 2(1) of the CCAA, which provides clear and specific language directing that "equity claim" means a claim that is in respect of an equity interest, including a claim for, among other things, "(e) contribution or indemnity in respect of a claim referred to in any of paragraphs (a) to (d)".

[88] Given that a shareholder claim falls within s. 2(1)(d), the plain words of subsections (d) and (e) lead to the conclusions that I have set out above.

[89] I fail to see how the very clear words of subsection (e) can be seen to be a codification of existing law. To arrive at the conclusion put forth by E&Y, BDO and the Underwriters would require me to ignore the specific words that Parliament has recently enacted.

[90] I cannot agree with the position put forth by the Underwriters or by the auditors on this point. The plain wording of the statute has persuaded me that it does not matter whether an indemnity claim is seeking no more than allocation of fault and contribution at common law, or whether there is a free-standing contribution and indemnity claim based on contracts.

[91] However, that is not to say that the full amount of the claim by the auditors and Underwriters can be characterized, at this time, as an "equity claim".

[92] The second aspect to the claims of the auditors and underwriters can be illustrated by the following hypothetical: if the claim of the shareholders does not succeed against the class action defendants, E&Y, BDO and the Underwriters will not be liable to the class action plaintiffs. However, these parties may be in a position to demonstrate that they do have a claim against SFC for the costs of defending those actions, which claim does not arise as a result of "contribution or indemnity in respect of an equity claim".

[93] It could very well be that each of E&Y, BDO and the Underwriters have expended significant amounts in defending the claims brought by the class action plaintiffs which, in turn, could give rise to contractual claims as against SFC. If there is no successful equity claim brought by the class action plaintiffs, it is arguable that any claim of E&Y, BDO and the Underwriters may legitimately be characterized as a claim for contribution or indemnity but not necessarily in respect of an equity claim. If so, there is no principled basis for subordinating this portion of the claim. At this point in time, the quantification of such a claim cannot be determined. This must be determined in accordance with the Claims Procedure.

[94] However, it must be recognized that, by far the most significant part of the claim, is an "equity claim".

[95] In arriving at this determination, I have taken into account the arguments set forth by E&Y, BDO and the Underwriters. My conclusions recognize the separate aspects of the Related Indemnity Claims as submitted by counsel to the Underwriters at paragraph 40 of their factum which reads:

> …it must be recognized that there are, in fact, at least two different kinds of Related Indemnity Claims:
>
> (a) indemnity claims against SFC in respect of Shareholder Claims against the auditors and the Underwriters; and
>
> (b) indemnity claims against SFC in respect of the defence costs of the auditors and the Underwriters in connection with defending themselves against Shareholder Claims.

Disposition

[96] In the result, an order shall issue that the claims against SFC resulting from the ownership, purchase or sale of equity interests in SFC, including, without limitation, the claims by or on behalf of current or former shareholders asserted in the proceedings listed in Schedule "A" are "equity claims" as defined in s. 2 of the CCAA, being claims in respect of monetary losses resulting from the ownership, purchase or sale of an equity interest. It is noted that counsel for the class action plaintiffs did not contest this issue.

[97] In addition, an order shall also issue that any indemnification claim against SFC related to or arising from the Shareholders Claims, including, without limitation, by or on behalf of any of the other defendants to the proceedings listed in Schedule "A" are "equity claims" under the CCAA, being claims for contribution or indemnity in respect of a claim that is an equity claim. However, I feel it is premature to determine whether this order extends to the aspect of the Related Indemnity Claims that corresponds to the defence costs of the Underwriters and the auditors in connection with defending themselves against the Shareholder Claims.

[98] A direction shall also issue that these orders are made without prejudice to SFC's rights to apply for a similar order with respect to (i) any claims in the statement of claim that are in respect of securities other than shares and (ii) any indemnification claims against SFC related thereto.

Introduction

[1] The petitioner in this insolvency proceeding, All Canadian Investment Corporation ("ACIC"), seeks to determine competing priority claims amongst its preferred shareholders. Its application is brought under the statute governing this proceeding, the Companies Creditors' Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 [CCAA].

[2] ACIC is incorporated pursuant to the Business Corporations Act, S.B.C. 2002, c. 57 [BCA].

[3] Prior to its insolvency, ACIC carried on business as a registered mortgage investment corporation ("MIC") since 1998. Its business was to loan funds to third party owners of commercial and residential property, mostly to be secured by mortgages, from a pool of funds it received from time to time from individuals and corporations who invested in ACIC by purchasing preferred shares.

[4] Some of ACIC's preferred shareholders delivered redemption notices to the company prior to the commencement of this proceeding in an effort to be paid an amount equal in value to their original share subscription price. Some, but not all of them, are before the Court on this application. I refer to those who are as the "redeeming preferred shareholders", claim to be creditors of ACIC. They assert that all of ACIC's other shareholders, both preferred and common, rank lower in priority since they are equity claimants.

[5] For ease of identification, I collectively refer to to the preferred shareholders who did not deliver redemption notices or did not deliver them prior to the commencement of this proceeding, as the "non-redeeming preferred shareholders".

[6] The core issue on this application is whether the redeeming preferred shareholders are creditors of ACIC as opposed to equity claimants, so as to share rateably in the distribution of proceeds paid under any court-approved plan of arrangement with the company's other creditors, and in priority to the non-redeeming preferred shareholders and ACIC's common shareholders.

[7] The redeeming preferred shareholders' claim is opposed by ACIC, two of its creditors, and the non-redeeming preferred shareholders. The common shareholders did not appear on the application.

[8] ACIC agreed to take the lead in seeking a determination of the priority issue and brought this application seeking declaratory relief.

[9] The priority claim advanced by the redeeming preferred shareholders must be determined before a suitable plan of arrangement, which would include a claims process and plan for distribution of ACIC's assets, can be submitted for court approval.

[10] It will serve no purpose in these reasons to comment on the length of time it has taken to get to this point in the proceeding. It will suffice to say that at this juncture, all stakeholders are anxious to have a plan presented to the court for approval in this liquidating CCAA.

[11] The facts set out in these reasons are my findings of fact.

Positions of the Parties

[12] The redeeming preferred shareholders' position on this application is that they were never equity investors. They assert that when the nature of ACIC's business as a MIC is considered, they are properly characterized as lenders from the outset who are debt claimants because their funds were pooled by ACIC and then loaned out to borrowers. They argue that their individual redemption requests should be viewed as akin to demands on a promissory note. In their submissions, they distinguish themselves from the non-redeeming preferred shareholders on the basis of the redemption notices they delivered to ACIC prior to the commencement of this CCAA proceeding.

[13] They also advance an alternative position if they are characterized as equity investors when they purchased their preferred shares. They submit that they later became creditors of ACIC. They rely on what they characterize as the purported contractual effect of various communications from ACIC, including its promotional materials, to potential and existing investors, in an attempt to establish that the nature of their relationship with ACIC changed.The redeeming preferred shareholders acknowledge that ACIC's Articles and various offering memoranda concerning potential subscriptions for preferred shares ("Offering Memoranda") clearly state that ACIC's obligation to honour redemption requests from preferred shareholders is wholly discretionary, resting with ACIC's directors, which throughout was only one, Mr. Donald Bergman. However, they maintain that those communications altered their contractual relationship with ACIC so as to provide for contractually enforceable guaranteed redemption rights that ACIC was obliged to honour at specific points in time. As a result, they say that ACIC can no longer rely on the discretionary provisions in the Articles and the Offering Memoranda and that ACIC contractually bound itself to pay those redemptions as debts. In the result, the redeeming preferred shareholders submit that their relationship with ACIC changed to become creditors.

[14] In the further alternative, those redeeming preferred shareholders whose redemption requests were partially paid before this proceeding was commenced submit that if they were equity claimants at the outset and if ACIC's communications do not constitute an enforceable contractual right to redemption sufficient to change their relationship with ACIC, then the status of their particular claims has changed, such that any redemption amounts owing are debts owed by ACIC.

[15] The redeeming preferred shareholders concede that the right of each of them to recover as a debt claimant depends on ACIC's financial circumstances at the time their individual redemption notices were delivered since a redemption right is unenforceable per s. 79(1) of the BCA, if it means that redemption would render ACIC insolvent:

> 79 (1) A company must not make a payment or provide any other consideration to redeem any of its shares if there are reasonable grounds for believing that
> (a) the company is insolvent, or
>
> (b) making the payment or providing the consideration would render the company insolvent.

[16] Language mirroring s. 79 is found in the Offering Memoranda.

[17] The redeeming preferred shareholders acknowledge that at this juncture it is not known which redemption notices were delivered to ACIC at a time when reasonable grounds did not exist to believe that either ACIC was insolvent at the time of the request or that honouring the request would cause it to become insolvent.

[18] Consequently, the redeeming preferred shareholders submit that if they succeed in their claim to be creditors, a further, highly specific and lengthy factual inquiry, involving Mr. Bergman's knowledge when each redemption notice was delivered to ACIC, will have to be made to determine whether s. 79 of the BCA is engaged.

[19] The non-redeeming preferred shareholders disagree that the redeeming preferred shareholders are debt claimants. Their position is that all preferred shareholders are equity claimants from the outset and that nothing has changed to alter their status.

[20] Included within the non-redeeming preferred shareholders' submissions is the argument that mirroring the common law, the BCA establishes a presumption of equality amongst all shareholders. Each share of a class of shares (in this case, preferred shares) "must have attached to it the same special rights or restrictions as are attached to every other share": ss. 59(4); see also ss. 59(3), 61. Rights related to a share attach to the share, and not to the shareholder: Gower's Principles of Modern Company Law, 4th ed. (London: Stevens and Sons, 1979), at 403; Bowater Canadian Ltd. v. R.L. Crain Inc. (1987), 46 D.L.R. (4th) 161 at 16 (Ont. C.A.). The presumption is even stronger, they argue, in a CCAA proceeding given the broad and flexible authority conferred on the supervising judge to determine a fair and efficient resolution of competing claims in circumstances where there are insufficient financial resources to meet all of them: CCAA, s. 11.

[21] In addition, and relying on Century Services Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2010 SCC 60 at paras. 13-15 and Bul River Mineral Corporation (Re), 2014 BCSC 1732, at paras. 100-101, the non-redeeming preferred shareholders submit that if the redeeming preferred shareholders' position is correct, the inquiry called for would be unduly protracted and further delay this CCAA proceeding, so as to impede any realistic prospect to achieve the statutory objective of an efficient resolution of competing claims.

[22] The non-redeeming preferred shareholders also say that they will be significantly prejudiced because they will recover little to nothing if the redeeming preferred shareholders' claim to be debt claimants prevails.

[23] Some of ACIC's creditors attended the hearing of the application and opposed the redeeming preferred shareholders' claim as well, since there are insufficient assets to pay them out in full if the latter are treated as debt claimants.

[24] ACIC's position on this application is that regardless of any redemption requests, whether paid or unpaid in whole or in part, all preferred shareholders are equity claimants within the meaning of s. 2(1) of the CCAA. ACIC seeks a declaration to that effect plus ancillary relief.

[25] For the reasons that follow, I reject the claim advanced by the redeeming preferred shareholders. I have determined that they, along with all of ACIC's preferred shareholders, are equity claimants.

Background Facts

[26] ACIC's shareholders are divided into two groups: common voting shareholders and preferred shareholders. There are currently outstanding four issued common shares and approximately 37,277 preferred shareholders and 15,647 warrants attached to the preferred shares. The preferred shares are stated to be non-voting, "unless otherwise provided for" (and none was).

[27] ACIC issued preferred shares and attached warrants between 1998 and 2015, all in accordance with its articles in force throughout the material time ("Articles").

[28] Draft subscription agreements for the purchase of preferred shares are contained in the various Offering Memoranda issued by ACIC over the years.

[29] Each preferred shareholder acquired units comprised of one preferred share and one warrant (referred to by ACIC by the singular term, “Unit”) by signing a subscription agreement. I refer to them collectively as “Subscription Agreements”. The subscription price for each Unit was fixed at $1,000. Each warrant granted a preferred shareholder a non-transferable option to acquire additional preferred shares for the same price. The total capital value for all issued Units is approximately $37,277,000.

[30] ACIC’s preferred shares contain numerous rights, including a right of redemption (also known as a right of retraction) to receive a return of the purchase price paid for shares, as well as the right to receive dividends so long as an investing subscriber remains a preferred shareholder.

[31] Preferred shareholders were paid dividends from time to time. Between 2005 and 2014, ACIC issued dividends with annual returns ranging between 6.25% and 8%. The return on dividends reduced in 2015 to approximately 2.5%, and to 1% in 2016. ACIC has not issued dividends since 2016.

[32] The redeeming preferred shareholders advise that the earliest redemption requests in issue on the application date back to 2013.

[33] Approximately 540 of ACIC’s preferred shareholders, comprising 27,587 preferred shares with a capital value of $27,587,000, issued redemption notices to ACIC before this CCAA proceeding was commenced. As mentioned, not all of those who did are before the Court on this application.

[34] Some redeeming preferred shareholders requested redemption of all of their shares prior to the commencement of this CCAA proceeding, while others only requested partial redemptions. Some of those who delivered redemption notices were paid in full, others only in part, and some were not paid at all.

[35] According to ACIC, preferred shares to the value of $1,380,500 were redeemed and paid out prior to the initial order in this proceeding, issued by Madam

Justice Adair on November 10, 2017, leaving a balance of unsatisfied share redemptions of $26,207,000.

[36] Sadly, many of ACIC's preferred shareholders are elderly individuals who invested most if not all of their life's savings with ACIC.

[37] Due to defaults on loans it made to certain third parties, ACIC was unable to pay all of the redemption notices it received from preferred shareholders. It sought protection under the CCAA.

[38] In addition to the claims asserted by the redeeming preferred shareholders, when ACIC commenced this proceeding on November 8, 2017, it faced approximately $1.785 million in secured claims and $3.96 million in unsecured claims.

[39] It is now evident that this proceeding is in effect a liquidating CCAA as there is no reasonable prospect that ACIC's business can be saved. Its primary asset is its loans portfolio. ACIC maintains an office in this province in Salmon Arm, with two staff members. It is also evident that at the moment, ACIC's creditors and shareholders are better off under the CCAA as opposed to a bankruptcy under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 [BIA].

[40] Although ACIC has yet to submit a plan of arrangement, the Monitor has been actively engaged in pursuing loan recoveries and operating ACIC's business as per court appointed powers akin to those of a super monitor. Although the Monitor expects to recover a substantial amount of ACIC's loan portfolio, possibly to a maximum of approximately $37.277 million, the Monitor advises that there will be insufficient funds to pay the amounts owed to ACIC's creditors and to return the capital invested by its preferred shareholders.

Overview: Equity vs. Debt Claimants

[41] In a proposed plan of arrangement or compromise submitted for court approval under the CCAA, a debtor company may divide its creditors into different classes. Equity claimants are treated as a single class, unless otherwise ordered: ss. 22(1), 22.1. They rank behind creditors.

[42] Historically, in insolvency matters debt claimants have taken priority to equity claimants. The reasoning behind this approach was explained by Justice Morawetz (as he then was) in Sino-Forest Corporation (Re), 2012 ONSC 4377 at paras. 23-25, aff'd 2012 ONCA 816:

> 23 … Essentially, shareholders cannot reasonably expect to maintain a financial interest in an insolvent company where creditor claims are not being paid in full. Simply put, shareholders have no economic interest in an insolvent enterprise… [citations omitted]
> 24 The basis for the differentiation flows from the fundamentally different nature of debt and equity investments. Shareholders have unlimited upside potential when purchasing shares. Creditors have no corresponding upside potential… [citations omitted]
> 25 As a result, courts subordinated equity claims and denied such claims a vote in plans of arrangement… [citations omitted]

[43] Because of the superior position of debt claimants over equity claimants, it has become necessary for courts to distinguish between the two. The general approach for determining whether a party was a debt or equity claimant was set out in Canadian Deposit Insurance Corp. v. Canadian Commercial Bank, [1992] 3 S.C.R. 558 [CDIC], which was helpfully summarized by Madam Justice Fitzpatrick in Bul River at para. 69:

> … In [CDIC], the issue was whether money advanced to the debtor bank was in the nature of a loan or a capital investment for the purpose of determining whether the creditors advancing the funds ranked pari passu with other unsecured creditors in a winding-up proceeding. Mr. Justice Iacobucci stated that the approach was to determine the "substance" or "true nature" of the transaction (563, 588). His oft quoted statements are found at 590-91, the relevant principles of which can be summarized as follows:
> a) the fact that a transaction contains both debt and equity features does not, in itself, determine its characterization as either debt or equity;
>
> b) the characterization of a transaction under review requires the determination of the intention of the parties;
> c) it does not follow that each and every aspect of a "hybrid" debt and equity transaction must be given the exact same weight when addressing a characterization issue; and

[44] The reference to a "hybrid" debt and equity transaction in the above noted excerpt includes preferred shares, which are one form of investment that has proven particularly challenging for courts to categorize. Preferred shares are regarded in the case authorities as hybrid instruments that may contain rights and conditions attributable to both equity and debt: Royal Bank of Canada v. Central Capital Corp. [1996] O.J. (3d) No. 359 at para. 127 (C.A.).

[45] The Ontario Court of Appeal said in Sino-Forest, at para. 53, that the 2009 amendments to the CCAA significantly expanded the definition of equity claims in a manner that "altered" common law. The Court of Appeal determined that the definition extends beyond a holder of an equity interest, and now includes persons that might not otherwise be within its plain meaning (such as advancing claims for contribution or indemnity against the company).

[46] In Sino-Forest, shareholders made claims within the CCAA proceeding against the company's auditors who in turn sought indemnity from the company. Even though the auditors were never shareholders, their indemnity claim was characterized as an equity claim. I have excerpted what I consider to be guiding language in the Court of Appeal's reasons:

> [1] In 2009, the [CCAA] was amended to expressly provide that general creditors are to be paid in full before an equity claim is paid.
> [2] This appeal considers the definition of "equity claim" in s. 2(1) of the CCAA. More particularly, the central issue is whether claims by auditors and underwriters against the respondent debtor, Sino-Forest Corporation ("Sino-Forest"), for contribution and indemnity fall within that definition. The claims arise out of proposed shareholder class actions for misrepresentation.
>
> [37] We agree with the supervising judge that the definition of equity claim focuses on the nature of the claim, and not the identity of the claimant. In our view, the appellants' claims for contribution and indemnity are clearly equity claims.
>
> [39] The definition [of equity claim] incorporates two expansive terms.

> [40] First, Parliament employed the phrase "in respect of" twice in defining equity claim: in the opening portion of the definition, it refers to an equity claim as a "claim that is in respect of an equity interest", and in para. (e) it refers to "contribution or indemnity in respect of a claim referred to in any of paragraphs (a) to (d)"…
>
>
> [46] "Equity claim" is not confined by its definition, or by the definition of "claim", to a claim advanced by the holder of an equity interest. Parliament could have, but did not, include language in para. (e) restricting claims for contribution or indemnity to those made by shareholders.
>

[47] Taking the same approach as the Court of Appeal and Mr. Justice Morawitz (as he then was) in the court below (at paras. 86-90) in Sino-Forest, Fitzpatrick J. noted in Bul River, following a most helpful and thorough discussion of case authorities and the relevant 2009 amendments to the CCAA, that in one sense, the amendments codified previous case law concerning equity claims, but also provided for a broader yet more concrete definition of equity claims.

[48] Relying on the reasons of Laskin J.A. in Central Capital, Fitzpatrick J. also pointed out that in the context of a CCAA proceeding, particularly in light of the 2009 amendments, the mere existence of redemption rights does not equate preferred shareholders as creditors:

> [105] In the same manner, the new equity provisions in the CCAA reinforce that it remains an important policy objective that equity claims be subordinated to debt claims. In Sino-Forest Corporation, the Court of Appeal focused on the purpose of the 2009 amendments and stated:
> > [56] In our view, in enacting s. 6(8) of the CCAA, Parliament intended that a monetary loss suffered by a shareholder (or other holder of an equity interest) in respect of his or her equity interest not diminish the assets of the debtor available to general creditors in a restructuring. If a shareholder sues auditors and underwriters in respect of his or her loss, in addition to the debtor, and the auditors or underwriters assert claims of contribution or indemnity against the debtor, the assets of the debtor available to general creditors would be > diminished by the amount of the claims for contribution and indemnity.

>
>
> [107] I see no principled basis upon which a different approach should be taken in respect of an equity claimant who has had the foresight, energy or just plain luck to seek and obtain a judgment prior to the filing date.

[49] Accordingly, while the 2009 amendments did represent in part a codification of the previous case law concerning equity claims, they also represent a more concrete definition of "equity claims" and by such definition a broadening and more expansive definition of such claims: Sino-Forest (ONCA) at paras. 24, 34-60. Parliament has now clearly cast the net widely in terms of the broad definition of equity claims such that claims that might previously escaped such characterization will now by caught by the CCAA.

CCAA

Introductory Remarks

[50] The provisions of the CCAA greatly assist in the analysis. The expanded definition of equity claim and the definition of equity interest clearly suggest that ACIC's preferred shares, which include rights of redemption and to receive dividends, constitute equity interests and provide strong support for the position taken by ACIC and the non-redeeming shareholders that all preferred shareholders in this CCAA proceeding must be treated as equity claimants.

[51] An appropriate starting point in the analysis is with a brief discussion of the key provisions and objectives of the CCAA, particulary in light of ACIC's submission that the priority issue is easily resolved in favour of its position on the application from the broad definition of "equity clamant" and "equity interest" in the statute without the need for a detailed analysis of the underlying transaction documents.

Statutory Definition of Equity Claim

[52] As a result of the 2009 amendments to the CCAA, an "equity claim" is defined in s. 2(1) and includes redemption claims:

> 2(1)
>
> equity claim means a claim that is in respect of an equity interest, including a claim for, among others,
>
> (a) a dividend or similar payment,
>
> (b) a return of capital,
>
> (c) a redemption or retraction obligation,
>
> (d) a monetary loss resulting from the ownership, purchase or sale of an equity interest or from the rescission, or, in Quebec, the annulment, of a purchase or sale of an equity interest, or
>
> (e) contribution or indemnity in respect of a claim referred to in any of paragraphs (a) to (d)…
>

[53] An "equity interest" is also defined, and includes a share in the company and a warrant to acquire additional shares:

> 2(1) equity interest means
>
> (a) in the case of a company other than an income trust, a share in the company — or a warrant or option or another right to acquire a share in the company — other than one that is derived from a convertible debt, and
> (b) in the case of an income trust, a unit in the income trust — or a warrant or option or another right to acquire a unit in the income trust — other than one that is derived from a convertible debt;

No Statutory Definition of Creditor

[54] Unlike the BIA, there is no definition of creditor in the CCAA. In the BIA, a creditor is defined in s. 2 as "a person having a claim provable as a claim".

[55] The CCAA contains a broad definition of "claim" in s. 2, which incorporates the definition in the BIA:

> claim means any indebtedness, liability or obligation of any kind that would be a claim provable within the meaning of section 2 of the [BIA].

[56] A "provable claim" is defined in s. 2 of the BIA as follows:

> claim provable in bankruptcy, provable claim or claim provable includes any claim or liability provable in proceedings under this Act by a creditor.

[57] Section 121 of the BIA speaks to the meaning of a "provable claim". It provides that all debts and liabilities, including those payable at a future date, to which the bankrupt is subject on the date of bankruptcy by reason of an obligation incurred before bankruptcy.

[58] In Bul River, Madam Justice Fitzpatrick points out, at para. 39, that the definition of "claim" found in s. 2 of both statutes "represents a point of convergence consistent with the harmonization of certain aspects of insolvency law under both the CCAA and BIA: Century Services at para. 24.

[59] In the past, the claims and rights of shareholders have not been treated as provable claims and ranked behind creditors of an insolvent corporation in liquidation: Nelson Financial Group Ltd., 2010 ONSC 6229 at para. 25. That remains the case under the current CCAA. No plan or arrangement may be sanctioned by the court where equity claimants have priority to creditors. Section 6(8) of the CCAA states:

> Compromises to be sanctioned by court
> 6 …
>
> Payment — equity claims
> (8) No compromise or arrangement that provides for the payment of an equity claim is to be sanctioned by the court unless it provides that all claims that are not equity claims are to be paid in full before the equity claim is to be paid.

[60] The rationale is that equity claimants (commonly thought of as investors) are considered to take a higher degree of risk in a company's economic fortunes than creditors who do not share in any upside in the profits or value of the company and the risk of failure.

[61] The following excerpt from Nelson Financial aptly describes the distinction between debt and equity claimants:

> [25] … As noted by Laskin J.A. in Re Central Capital Corporation, on the insolvency of a company, the claims of creditors have always ranked ahead > of the claims of the shareholders for the return of their capital. This principle is premised on the notion that shareholders are understood to be higher risk participants who have chosen to tie their investment to the fortunes of the corporation. In contrast, creditors choose a lower level of exposure, the assumption being that they will rank ahead of shareholders in an insolvency. Put differently, amongst other things, equity investors bear the risk relating to the integrity and character of management.

[62] Creditors' claims, including repayment terms and any rates of interest are typically governed by specific, fixed terms: Bul River at paras. 65-66; Nelson Financial at para. 25; Sino-Forest (ONCA) at para. 30.

[63] Although not a CCAA case, the Court of Appeal's discussion of the nature of a debt relationship in Coast Capital Savings Credit Union v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2011 BCCA 20 provides guidance for the issues in this case, particularly in the absence of a statutory definition. At para. 57, Madam Justice Newbury adopted the following definition, which she noted was also found in numerous Canadian and English authorities:

> A debt is defined to be a sum of money which is certainly, and at all events, payable without regard to the fact whether it be payable now or at a future time.

[64] At para. 23, Newbury J.A. also referred to a definition of debt in a case authority cited by the chambers judge in that case - A. Valin Petroleums Ltd. v. Imperial Oil Ltd., 2007 ABQB 134 at paras. 39-40:

> 39 The word "equity" is not ambiguous. It is a word of ordinary use, particularly in the commercial context….
>
> 40 Debt and equity are distinct concepts. Debt is a claim on the assets of the corporation and is created when money is borrowed. With it arises an obligation on the corporation to repay that money. Corporate equity, however, is comprised of the corporation's total assets unencumbered by debt or other liabilities. It is the "residual economic interest in the corporation's assets, after all outstanding debts have been satisfied." See C. Nicholls, Corporate Finance and Canadian Law (Toronto: Carswell, 2000 at page 9).

[65] Similar definitions, drawn from Black's Law Dictionary, Jowitt's Dictionary of the English Language, and The Shorter Oxford Dictionary, are referred to by the Ontario Court of Appeal in Central Capital at 508, which again involved a CCAA proceeding.

[66] There is some conflict in the case authorities as to whether a claim can be considered a debt claim where it is unenforceable: see, e.g. Bul River at para. 40; Central Capital at 531-534. However, I do not need to decide that issue in order to determine the status of the redeeming preferred shareholders' claims.

Further Analysis is Required

[67] As I said at the outset of this section, the CCAA provides considerable guidance in determining the claim of the redeeming preferred shareholders. I agree with ACIC that the 2009 amendments show Parliament's intention to broaden the scope of equity claimants to include shareholders with redemption claims.

[68] However, redeemable preferred shares are viewed in the case law to be "somewhat different than conventional equity capital": Central Capital at para. 128; Coast Capital at para. 49. In Central Capital, Mr. Justice Laskin, in his reasons (concurring with Madam Justice Weiler in the majority), described preferred shares as "compromise securities" and "financial mongrels" with rights analogous to rights of creditors:

> 127 Preferred shares have been called "compromise securities" and even "financial mongrels: Grover and Ross, Materials and Corporate Finance (1975), at p. 49. Invariably the conditions attaching to preferred shares contain attributes of equity and, at least in an economic sense, attributes of debt. Over the years financiers and corporate lawyers have blurred the distinction between equity and debt by endowing preferred shareholders with rights analogous to the rights of creditors. One example is the right of redemption -- the right of the corporation to compel preferred shareholders to sell their shares back to the corporation. Another example, and it is the case before us, is the right of retraction -- the right of shareholders to compel the corporation to buy back their shares on a specific date for a specific price.
> 128 I acknowledge, therefore, that redeemable or retractable preferred shares are somewhat different from conventional equity capital. What makes the appeals before us difficult is that although the appellants appear to hold equity, their right of retraction appears to be a basic characteristic of a debtor-creditor relationship: see Grover and Ross, supra, at pp. 47-49; Buckley, Gillen and Yalden, Corporations: Principles and Policies, 3d ed. (1995), at pp. 938-40.

[69] The fact that a hybrid instrument contains elements of both equity and debt is not an obstacle to determining its true nature: CDIC at 590. In Central Capital, Laskin J.A. described the nature of the inquiry in this way:

> 129 If the certificate or instrument contains features of both equity and debt – in other words if it is hybrid in character - then the court must determine the "substance" of the relationship between the holder of the certificate and the company. …
> 130 In determining the substance of the relationship, as in any other case of contract interpretation, the court looks to what the parties intended. In CDIC v. CCB, supra, Iacobucci J. put this proposition as follows at p. 588:
>
> > As in any case involving contractual interpretation, the characterization issue facing this Court must be decided by determining the intention of the parties to the support agreements. This task, perplexing as it sometimes proves to be, depends primarily on the meaning of the words chosen by the parties to reflect their intention. When the words alone are insufficient to reach a conclusion as to the true nature of the agreement, or when outside support for a particular characterization is required, a consideration of admissible surrounding circumstances may be appropriate.

[70] Consequently, the focus of the inquiry is to determine whether in substance the redeeming preferred shareholders' claims are debt or equity. They cannot be both.

Determining the Substance of the Relationship

Overview

[71] The inquiry focuses on the transaction documents at the time the relationship was created. It is, generally speaking, informed by the words chosen by the parties to reflect their intentions in conjunction with the principles underpinning insolvency legislation, which in this case includes the remedial purposes of the CCAA. Where the words are insufficient to determine the true nature of the agreement, admissible evidence of surrounding circumstances may be considered: CDIC at 588, 590; Central Capital at paras. 38, 67, 126, 129-130, 135-136.

[72] Section 2(1) of the CCAA is clear that in the context of a CCAA proceeding, a redemption claim is not indicative of a debt relationship. As well, redemption rights on their own do not create a debtor-creditor relationship. They are to be considered, along with risk-taking, profit sharing, and the right to participate in the assets of the company on liquidation after creditors are paid, as "hallmarks" of a shareholder relationship and an equity interest. To establish a debt relationship, either or both the company's articles or the transaction documents must make it clear that a shareholder's redemption is repayment of a loan: Central Capital at paras. 70, 97, 135-136; Bul River at para. 109; Dexior Financial Inc. (Re), 2011 BCSC 348 at paras. 12-13,16.

[73] As Weiler J.A. explained in Central Capital, language consistent with a debt obligation upon redemption must be reflected in the transaction documents:

> 97 Looked at another way, after the retraction date and at the time of the reorganization, the common features of a debtor-creditor relationship are not in evidence in Central Capital's articles. The agreements between the parties contain no express provision that the redemption of the shares is in repayment of a loan. The corporation was not obliged to create any fund or debt instrument to ensure that it could redeem the shares on the retraction date. There is no indemnity in the event that the money is not repaid on the retraction date. There is no provision for the payment of any interest after the retraction date in the event that the money is not repaid on the retraction date. There is no provision that after the retraction date and in the event of insolvency, the appellants would have the right to have the company wound up. (See R v. Imperial General Properties Ltd., [1985] 2 S.C.R. 288, 21 D.L.R (4th) 741, for a case where the articles of the company contained this right.) There is no provision that upon a winding-up or insolvency the parties are entitled to rank pari passu with the creditors as was the case in Canada Deposit Insurance Corp. v. Canadian Commercial Bank, supra.

[74] In Central Capital, the parties' intention was (according to the two concurring reasons in the majority) reflected "mainly" in the share purchase agreements, conditions attaching to the shares, the company's articles, and the manner in which Central Capital recorded the shares in its financial statements. They did not establish a debt obligation on the part of the company: see, e.g., para. 131.

[75] Incidental or secondary aspects of a transaction, such as mechanisms for enforcement, should not distract the inquiry: CDIC at paras. 46-54; Earthfirst Canada Inc. (Re), ABQB at para. 5.

Examples

[76] Useful guidance for the inquiry into the true nature or substance of the relationship between preferred shareholders and ACIC can also be drawn from some of the cases cited by the parties in submissions.

[77] In Bul River, Fitzpatrick J. rejected the claim of certain preferred shareholders that their equity claims converted into debt claims simply because they had obtained (default) judgment for their redemptions against one of the insolvent companies: paras. 85-98, 103-117.

[78] In Return on Innovations Capital Ltd. v. Gandi Innovations Ltd., 2011 ONSC 5018, it did not matter that a claim by a shareholder seeking recovery of share purchase proceeds in the amount USD $50 million was founded on breach of contract and fraud. The legal basis for the claim was not the “deciding factor”. Nor were the “legal tools” used by the claimant, because, Mr. Justice Newbould said, at para. 59, they were being used to recover an equity investment.

[79] In Nelson Financial, which was a CCAA proceeding, Madam Justice Pepall (as she then was) disagreed that the preferred shareholders were debt claimants. In that case, the company raised money by two different means: from lenders to whom it issued promissory notes with an annual rate of return of 12% and from investors to whom it issued non-voting preferred shares with an annual dividend of 10%. The company’s articles provided the company with unilateral redemption rights on payment of the purchase price plus accrued dividends. At least one investor negotiated a right of redemption and two redemption requests were outstanding as of the CCAA filing date. The company’s financial statements also treated the shareholders as equity investors and distinguished them from its creditors.

[80] After referring to the distinction between debt and equity claimants, Pepall J. discussed the broad scope ascribed to the meaning of an equity claim or interest:

> [26] This treatment also has been held to encompass fraudulent misrepresentation claims advanced by a shareholder seeking to recover his investment: Re Blue Range Resource Corp. In that case, Romaine J. held that the alleged loss derived from and was inextricably intertwined with the shareholder interest. … National Bank of Canada v. Merit Energy Ltd. and Earthfirst Canada Inc. both treated claims relating to agreements that were collateral to equity claims as equity claims. These cases dealt with separate indemnification agreements and the issuance of flow through shares. The separate agreements and the ensuing claims were treated as part of one integrated transaction in respect of an equity interest. The case law has also recognized the complications and delay that would ensue if CCAA proceedings were mired in shareholder claims.

[81] In addition to reviewing the articles of the company and the share certificates, Pepall J. considered the following evidence of surrounding circumstances at para. 31:

(a) investors' right to receive dividends (said to be "a well recognized right of a shareholder");

(b) investors were given the option of investing in promissory notes or preference shares and opted for the latter;

(c) on liquidation, dissolution, or winding up, preferred shareholders ranked ahead of common shareholders; and

(d) shares were treated as equity in the company's financial statements and in its books and records.

[82] In the result, and although she found characteristics of both debt and equity claims in the relationship, she concluded that the substance of the relationship between the preferred shareholders and the company was equity, not debt: paras. 31-32.

[83] In the CCAA case of JED Oil Inc. (Re), 2010 ABQB 295, the analysis focused on the relationship at the time the shares were issued when considering the true nature of the claims of preferred shareholders for unpaid dividends. Madam Justice Kent rejected the shareholders' claim as creditors of debt claims. There was no language in the share certificates to establish that dividends were declared and owing on the date the shares were issued. She found that the substance of the relationship at the time the shares were purchased was not creditor-debtor. The shareholders, she said at para. 16, "are risk-takers, not creditors. For them to become creditors from the time they are issued the shares would require more explicit wording than is contained in these shares."

[84] Lastly, in Dexior Financial, which involved a BIA proceeding, the fact that a redemption notice was issued prior to bankruptcy "does not change the original intention or substance of the claim": para. 16.

Summary

[85] To summarize, courts take into account a number of factors when determining the substance of the relationship when assessing the status of preferred shareholders. Examples include:

(a) The specific language contained in the company's articles and the transaction documents.

(b) The right of a shareholder to redeem their shares. The absence of this right is inconsistent with a creditor relationship. A right of redemption is particularly compelling as an indicia of a creditor relationship where the articles or transaction documents expressly provide that the redemption is for the repayment of a loan.

(c) Whether the shareholder had upside potential in the return of their investment, which indicates an equity relationship and also shared in the downside risk of a lower return.

(d) Whether the shareholder had the right to receive dividends, which is a strong indicia of an equity relationship.

(e) Treatment on liquidation, dissolution, or winding up.

(f) Whether the shares are treated as equity or debt in the financial statements of the corporation.

[86] The mechanism used to enforce redemption rights is irrelevant. The legal basis for any claim brought to collect on a redemption request is as well.

The Relationship between ACIC and Its Preferred Shareholders

Overview

[87] As mentioned at the outset of these reasons, I reject the redeeming preferred shareholders' claim that they are debt creditors of ACIC. None of ACIC's preferred shareholders are debt claimants. The redeeming preferred shareholders were not lenders ab initio as opposed to investors. They are equity claimants and rank together with all other preferred shareholders and are to be treated as such in the same class in this CCAA proceeding.

[88] The relationship between ACIC and its preferred shareholders is comprised of the Articles, the various Subscription Agreements, Offering Memoranda, and applicable legislation such as the BCA. The inquiry in this particular case is also governed by the CCAA. From them those sources, the substance of the relationship between ACIC and its preferred shareholders, including those who have delivered redemption requests, can be readily ascertained.

[89] The Articles, Offering Memoranda, and Subscription Agreements are clear that the relationship between ACIC and its preferred shareholders is an equity relationship. The preferred shareholders are clearly identified as investors who purchased non-voting preferred shares with rights to receive dividends at various rates dependent on ACIC's financial performance and with redemption rights which throughout may or may not be honoured as determined by ACIC's directors in their sole discretion.

[90] There is no language in the Articles suggesting, directly or indirectly, that a share redemption is in respect of a repayment of a debt. There is also no language, direct or indirect, in the Articles suggesting that preferred shareholders are lenders or that their investment is secured by a promissory note or something akin to it. Article 27.1 defines preferred shares as "without par value in the capital of the Company".

[92] The risks of the investment are clearly outlined to potential investors. The Offering Memoranda characterized the "investment" as both "risky" and "speculative". Each Offering Memoranda contains a detailed discussion (including warnings) of numerous risk factors associated with an investment with ACIC, including its speculative nature, the absence of a market to transfer or assign shares and warrants, and no guarantee that dividends would be declared or paid. The Offering Memoranda also advise that their contents had not been reviewed by any regulatory authority.

[93] The Offering Memoranda also describe the purchase of preferred shares as a speculative risk that should be considered only by subscribers who are able to withstand the loss of their total investment:

> Item 8 Risk Factors
>
> The purchase of Units involves a number of significant risk factors. Any or all of these risks, or other as yet unidentified risks, may have a material adverse effect on the Company's business, the value of the Preferred Shares and/or the return to Preferred Shareholders.
>
> (a) Investment Risk
>
> (i) Speculative Nature of Investment
>
> This is a speculative offering. The purchase of Units involves a number of significant risk factors and is suitable only for Subscribers who are aware of the risks inherent in mortgage investments and the real estate industry and who have the ability and willingness to accept the risk of the total loss of their invested capital and who have no immediate need for liquidity.
>
> [All emphasis in original.]

[94] In some of the Offering Memoranda, ACIC's capital structure is described and shown to be comprised of common and preferred shares and is specifically distinguished from debt.

[95] The Subscription Agreements also contain language making it clear that each subscriber for preferred shares is making an investment, e.g.:

> 2. REPRESENTATIONS, ACKNOWLEDGMENTS AND CONVENANTS
>
> 2.1. The Subscriber acknowledges represents and covenants that:
>
>
> (j) the Subscriber is purchasing the Units as principal for investment only and not with the view to the resale or distribution thereof;
>
> [Bold in original]

[96] A subscriber for preferred shares is required to sign a Form 20A per the Securities Act, R.S.B.C. 1996 c. 418 confirming, inter alia:

> 4. I acknowledge that:
>
> (c) I may lose all of my investment; …

[97] There is no language in the Subscription Agreements suggesting that a subscriber for preferred shares is a lender or creditor through any other capacity.

[98] I disagree with the redeeming preferred shareholders' submission that a key indicia of an equity investor is defined in part by the word "unlimited" in respect of the opportunity to participate in the financial upside of the company if "unlimited" signifies there can be no possible limit on the rate of return.

[99] They rely on a reading of the reasons in Sino-Forest (ONSC) at para. 30 and argue that given the exigencies of the mortgage lending market, it was never possible for them to participate in an "unlimited financial upside" of ACIC. They point to what they characterize as a cap on their highest rate of return for dividends and say that in effect, their relationship with ACIC was akin to creditor and debtor.

[101] For ACIC, the rates of return, and hence its revenues and profits, depended on market conditions and were not fixed to any maximum. Preferred shareholders always retained the opportunity to share in higher rates of return if market conditions changed to allow for higher lending rates. Conversely, they also took the risk of lower rates of return resulting from potential adverse market conditions and impediments to ACIC's ability to collect on its loan portfolio (both of which have occurred). I agree with the submission of the creditors who appeared on the application that the investment made by the preferred shareholders is akin to an investment in a fluctuating commodity.

[102] I also disagree with the redeeming preferred shareholders that the fact that ACIC pooled investors' funds indicates a debt relationship or establishes the preferred shareholders as lenders. Pooling from investors is the means by which a MIC such as ACIC is able to carry on business to lend funds to third party borrowers.

[103] I will conclude this section with this observation. If the redeeming preferred shareholders' position that the nature of their relationship from the outset is one of creditor is correct, then it would defeat their claim to be contrasted from the non-redeeming preferred shareholders since all of ACIC's preferred shareholders would be debt as opposed to equity claimants and rank alongside ACIC's other creditors.

Redemption Rights Do Not Affect the Outcome

[104] The redeeming preferred shareholders place significant reliance on their redemption rights (to seek the return of their principal investment amount) as indicia of a debt relationship.

[105] In this case, when considered in context, the mere presence of redemption rights do not establish a debt relationship. The intention of ACIC and the preferred shareholders expressed in the Articles and the transaction documents does not establish a debt relationship. There is no language in the Articles, the various Offering Memoranda, and the Subscription Agreements that indicates that the redemption is in repayment of a debt. Furthermore, preferred shareholders were advised throughout that their redemption rights were not guaranteed.

[106] The redemption provisions do not state or suggest that subscribers for preferred shares are lenders. Nor do they state or suggest that preferred shares are given as security akin to a promissory note. Unlike a promissory note, which typically contains a promise to pay by a certain date or the happening of a certain event(s), ACIC's obligation to honour redemption requests was always in the sole discretion of its directors, who may also clarify or establish terms and conditions for redemption should they consent to a request.

[107] The BCA requires that all rights attached to shares be set out in a company's articles: ss. 11(h), 12(2)(b), 48. The Articles state that redemption is in the sole discretion of ACIC's directors. As noted in the previous section, the redemption provisions in the Articles are found in article 27.4. According to Mr. Bergman, ACIC's sole director throughout, ACIC's redemption policy remained unchanged since it began issuing preferred shares in 1998.

[108] Article 27.4 specifically deals with redemption requests from preferred shareholders. Mr. Bergman's sole discretion to consent to or reject redemption requests is clear:

> 27.4 Redemption of Preferred Shares
>
> A Preferred Share will be redeemed by the Company if and only if:
>
> (a) the Company has received written notice from the registered holder of the Preferred Share that he wishes the Company to redeem the Preferred Share;
>
> (b) the Directors, in their sole discretion, consent to the redemption by the Company of the Preferred Share pursuant to terms and conditions set by the Directors in their sole discretion; and
>
> (c) the Preferred Shareholder who requested that his Preferred Share be redeemed, accepts the terms and conditions of redemption set by the Directors.
>
> The Directors will not be obligated to provide any reasons for not consenting to a Preferred Shareholder's request to have his Preferred Shares redeemed by the Company.

[109] Further, and in contrast to Nelson Financial, there are no provisions in the Articles or transaction documents obliging ACIC to buy back shares. To the contrary, Article 8.2 provides that if ACIC proposes at its option to redeem some but not all of the shares of any class or series, then it is in the discretion of its directors subject to special rights and restrictions attached to each share. ACIC's directors are given the discretion whether to decide the manner in which the shares to be redeemed are selected and whether the redemption is pro rata.

[110] Turning to the Offering Memoranda, those documents contain detailed information concerning the redemption process and restrictions on redemption requests. Mr. Bergman's discretion to consent or refuse to honour redemption requests is a pervasive theme in the various Offering Memoranda.

[111] For example, ACIC's first Offering Memoranda issued in 1998 warns potential subscribers that redemptions are not guaranteed and may never be honoured:

> Redemption of Preferred Shares: The Director of the Company has adopted a Policy regarding the redemption of Preferred Shares. A copy of such policy is available from the Company upon request.
>
> Pursuant to such policy, a Preferred Share will be redeemable by the Company in certain circumstances. Although the Company will use its best commercial efforts to ensure that all requestsfor redemption are fulfilled, depending on such circumstances the Company cannot guarantee that any or all of the Preferred Shares in respect of which requests for redemption are received will be redeemed in any fiscal year. See Item 8 – "Risk Factors" – Limited Redemption Rights.
>
>
> The Company will no redeem any Preferred Shares if at the time of such redemption the Company is insolvent or if such redemption will render the Company insolvent, if such redemption will reduce the Company's cash reserves below a level which the Directors determine, in their sole discretion, to be prudent, or if such redemption will cause the Company to breach the requirement that at least 50% of the cost amount of its property must consist of bank deposits or mortgage loans made in respect of residential properties.
> [All emphasis in original.]

[112] In addition to the the sole discretion to honour a redemption request vesting with the director, the Offering Memoranda spell out other limitations on redemptions, e.g., adverse financial circumstances including liquidity issues:

> No Guaranteed Dividends
>
> The dividends in which the Preferred Shareholders are entitled to participate are not cumulative and will not be paid unless such dividends have been declared by the Directors. The Directors have the sole discretion as to whether or not any such dividends are declared. Therefore, there is no guarantee that dividends payable to Preferred Shareholders will be declared.
>

[113] The Offering Memoranda issued in 2001 and 2002 provide another example. They are clear that redemption depends on the consent of the directors in their "sole discretion" pursuant to "terms and conditions set by the Directors". Subscribers are advised that the "Directors will not be obliged to provide any reasons for not consenting to a Preferred Shareholders' request to have their Preferred Shares redeemed by the Company".

[114] Commencing in 2003, the Offering Memoranda referred to a redemption policy and included a summary making it clear that redemption remained in the discretion of its directors to amend or cancel it, adopt an alternative policy, or refuse to consent to a redemption.

[115] This example is taken from the 2003-2006 and 2015 Offering Memoranda:

> Redemption of Preferred Shares: The Company has adopted a policy regarding the redemption of Preferred Shares. A copy of such policy is available from the Company upon request.
>
> Pursuant to such policy, a Preferred Shareholder will be redeemable by the Company in certain circumstances. Although the Company will use its best commercial efforts to ensure that all requests for redemption are fulfilled, depending on such circumstances the Company cannot guarantee that any or all of the Preferred Shares in respect of which requests for redemption are received will be redeemed in any given fiscal year. …
>
>
> The Company will not redeem any Preferred Shares if at the time of such redemption the Company is insolvent or if such redemption will render the Company insolvent, if such redemption will reduce the Company's cash reserves below a level which the Company's directors (the "Directors") determine, in their sole discretion, to be prudent, or if such redemption will cause the Company to breach the requirement that at least 50% of the cost amount of its property must consist of bank deposits or mortgage loans made in respect of residential properties.
>
> Further, in any calendar quarter, the Company will not redeem any more than that number of Preferred Shares which is equal to 2 1/2 % of the outstanding Preferred Shares at the end of the immediately preceding calendar quarter. ...
>
>
> The adoption of its policy regarding the redemption of Preferred Shares does not fetter the discretion of the Directors of the Company from time to time to amend or cancel such policy in whole or in part or to adopt an alternative policy with respect to the redemption of Preferred shares, or to refuse to consent to a Requesting Shareholder's request to have their Preferred Shares redeemed by the Company.
>

[116] Nothing in ACIC's redemption policies removed or otherwise constrained Mr. Bergman's unfettered discretion to consent or refuse to honour redemption requests.

[117] The redemption policy that ACIC adopted (in accordance with s. 27.4 of the Articles) on December 1, 2006 serves as a useful example of its ongoing retention of discretion to honour redemption requests. The policy language is clear that ACIC's new policy did not fetter the discretion of its director from time to time to amend or cancel it in whole or in part or refuse to consent to a redemption request:

> B. Pursuant to Section 27.4 of the Articles of the Company, Preferred Shares are redeemable by the holder provided that:
>
> 2. The Company's Director, in his sole discretion consents to such redemption pursuant to terms and conditions set by the Director in his sole discretion; and
>
> 3. The holder accepts the terms and conditions of redemption set by the Director.
>
> The Director is not required to provide any reasons for not consenting to a request for redemption of Preferred Shares.
> 7. The adoption of this Preferred Share Redemption Policy does not fetter the discretion of the Director from time to time to amend or cancel this policy in whole or in part or to adopt an alternative policy with respect to the redemption of Preferred Shares, or to refuse to consent to a Requesting Shareholder's request to have their Preferred Shares redeemed by the Company.

[118] Another redemption policy (undated) in evidence from Mr. Bergman, attached as Exhibit "D" to his affidavit sworn November 7, 2017, is to a similar effect, making it clear that redemptions may not be honoured:

> Redemption of Preferred Shares:
>
> The Company has adopted a policy regarding the redemption of Preferred Shares. A copy of such policy is available from the Company upon request. Pursuant to such policy, a Preferred Share will be redeemable by the Company in certain circumstances. Although the Company will use its best commercial efforts to ensure that all requests for redemption are fulfilled, depending on such circumstances the Company cannot guarantee that any or all of the Preferred Shares in respect of which requests for redemption are received will be redeemed in any given fiscal year.

> The adoption of its policy regarding the redemption of Preferred Shares does not fetter the discretion of the Directors of the Company from time to time to amend or cancel such policy in whole or in part or to adopt an alternative policy with respect to the redemption of Preferred shares, or to refuse to consent to a Requesting Shareholder's request to have their Preferred Shares redeemed by the Company.
> There are times when redemption requests may not be processed in a timely manner and shareholders may have to wait longer than expected to receive their redemption request. The source of funds used to process redemptions may be from new capital raised and/or loans being repaid. There is no guarantee that funds will be available to meet all redemption requests.

Unsatisfied Redemption Requests Are Not Debt

[119] The redeeming preferred shareholders place great importance on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re East Chilliwack Agricultural Cooperative (1989), 74 C.B.R. (N.S.) (B.C.C.A.), to support their claim to be debt claimants when they delivered their redemption notices. The decision in that case has been the subject of adverse comment or distinguished in other case authorities in this province and others. However, it is sufficient for my determination to note that the facts of that case are clearly distinguishable from the instant proceeding.

[120] In that case, farmers who owned shares in an agricultural cooperative gave notice to the co-op of their intention to have their shares redeemed. Thereafter, and before they were paid, the Superintendent of Co-operatives suspended the right of the co-op to redeem its shares due to liquidity issues. Mr. Justice Hutcheon, writing for the majority, determined that they were entitled to be treated as creditors. However, as is noted at the outset of his reasons, the effect of the Superintendent's order was not argued on the appeal. More importantly for the issues raised on the present application, by virtue of the Cooperative's constating documents, the claimant shareholders in East Chilliwack, ceased to be shareholders when they served their redemption notices.

[121] As previously discussed, in the case at bar, redeeming preferred shareholders whose redemption requests were not honoured, either in whole or in part, retained their rights and privileges as shareholders. They continued to receive a share of the profits of ACIC from dividend payments through to 2016. Also unlike East Chilliwack, ACIC's obligation to honour the redemption notices and to buy back shares remained discretionary throughout. In the present case, ACIC's obligation to redeem was always premised, at a minimum, on a best efforts basis and dependent on its liquidity.

[122] Thus, the decision in East Chilliwack is not authority for a general proposition that unpaid redemption requests are indicia of debt. Unsatisfied redemption requests do not of themselves change the substance of the relationship from an equity interest to a debt claim. In Central Capital, the preferred shareholders' claim that they were debt claimants on the basis of their unsatisfied rights of redemption was rejected by the majority: paras. 97, 135-136.

[123] In some instances, ACIC made partial payment of a redemption request and indicated in documents provided to certain redeeming preferred shareholders that the remaining unpaid redemption amounts were "o/s", or outstanding. During oral submissions, the possibility was raised that this advice from ACIC might reflect a change in the relationship between those particular redeeming shareholders and the company. In my opinion, it does not. In Bul River, the fact that redeeming shareholders had gone one step further and obtained judgment to recover unpaid redemption amounts was insufficient to convert their equity interest to a debt claim.

Winding-Up Provisions Do Not Affect the Result

[124] The redeeming preferred shareholders rely on the decision in Coast Capital, which treated similar winding up language in the Articles as indicia of a debt relationship, to support their position that they are debt claimants.

[125] I disagree that the reasons in Coast Capital support the position articulated by the redeeming preferred shareholders.

[126] At issue in that case was the tax treatment of shares issued by the credit union labelled "non-equity shares". The case involved statutory interpretation of provisions in the Corporation Capital Tax Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 73, the Financial Institutions Act, R.S.B.C. 1966, c. 141 [FIA], and the Credit Union Incorporation Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 82, as well as the certain provisions of the rules promulgated by Coast Capital respecting the impugned shares (described as "non-equity" shares). Disimilar to the case at bar, the FIA defines a non-equity share (in s. 1(1)) issued by a credit union as one evidencing indebtedness of the credit union to the holder of the share that does not represent an equity interest in the credit union.

[127] The outcome in Coast Capital turned on its own facts, which are significantly different and thus distinguishable from the case at bar. For example, and unlike the case at bar, the shares in issue in Coast Capital were restricted to a 6% non-cumulative dividend in addition to the amount paid on winding up or dissolution. In addition, the credit union was required to redeem those shares on a fixed date. The Court of Appeal engaged in an analysis of the legal substance of those shares and determined that they reflected a debt interest.

[128] The statutory objectives and considerations in that case also differ from those concerning the CCAA. In her reasons in Coast Capital, Newbury J.A. observed that the case before the Court of Appeal did not concern bankruptcy of insolvency law: paras. 7, 53-56.

[129] In the case at bar, and unlike CDIC, there is no provision in the Articles or Offering Memoranda stating or even suggesting that upon a winding-up or insolvency, ACIC's preferred shareholders, let alone any who have sought redemption, are entitled to rank pari passu with its creditors: CDIC at 563; Central Capital at para. 132.

[130] Section 27.5 of the Articles provides a procedure for distribution of ACIC's assets upon winding up or liquidation. ACIC's assets will be distributed to the Preferred Shareholders in priority to the Common Shareholders as follows:

> Upon the winding up or dissolution or liquidation of the Company, the Company's assets will be distributed to the Preferred Shareholders in priority to the Common Shareholders as follows:
> - first to the Preferred Shareholders on a pro rata basis among the Preferred Shareholders until each Preferred Shareholder has received the lesser of: (i) the original subscription price for each Preferred

> Share for which the Preferred Shareholder is the registered holder and all dividends that have been declared but for which the Preferred Shareholder has yet to be paid; and (ii) the book value of the Preferred Shares, for which the Preferred Shareholder is the registered holder, as determined in the upcoming year-end audited financial statements; and
> - the balance to the Common Shareholders on a pro rata basis among the Common Shareholders, to the exclusion of the Preferred Shareholders.

[131] In Central Capital, Weiler J.A. pointed out that winding up and liquidation are other forms of insolvency. Both, she said, are "methods for secured creditors to enforce their claims by seizing the assets in which they hold security interests": para. 99. In the same paragraph, however, she said that in light of s. 173 of the governing statute in that case - the Canada Business Corporations Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-44 - whose provisions are similar to those found in Part 9 of the BCA, the interests of preferred shareholders with redemption rights are subordinated to creditors.

[132] Laskin J.A. took a similar view. As is the case in the instant proceeding, he found that even after redemption rights are exercised, preferred shareholders continue to be entitled to dividends until their shares are in fact redeemed. On a liquidation, shareholders rank as equity claimants and not as creditors (even though in that case, and unlike the facts of this case, their redemption rights allowed shareholders to compel the company to redeem so long as it was solvent). Redemption, Laskin J.A. explained, is a return of capital not a repayment of a loan: paras. 134-135.

No Alteration to Establish a Contractual Right to Compel Redemption Exists

[134] In their alternative argument, the redeeming preferred shareholders submit that if they were equity claimants at the outset, then their contractual relationship with ACIC changed as a result of its later redemption policies and certain communications that ACIC published or delivered to potential and existing shareholders. They submit that ACIC's redemption policies moved away from a discretionary right held by Mr. Bergman and became an enforceable contractual right held by each preferred shareholder to compel redemption during specific windows of time and upon certain conditions being met.

[135] I disagree. The redeeming preferred shareholders have not established that their contractual relationship with ACIC changed so as to become debt creditors.

[136] The redemption policies that ACIC issued starting in 2006 did not provide an unconditional promise that redemption notices would be honoured. Those policies were clear that ACIC's right to honour a redemption request was always at the discretion of its directors.

[137] The communcations from ACIC also do not alter the contractual relationship. The examples provided by the redeeming preferred shareholders consist, for the most part, of marketing materials, executive summaries, and standard form answers to "FAQs" (frequently asked questions). Many of the impugned communications appear on their face to be intended to induce investment in ACIC through subscriptions of Units.

[138] ACIC's communications do not convey an intention to enter into a binding agreement: Aubrey v. Teck Highland Valley Copper Partnership, 2017 BCCA 144 at paras. 47- 48.

[139] As I have found, ACIC's communications with its preferred shareholders concerning redemptions and redemption policies and terms were clearly stated throughout to be subject to the sole discretion of its directors. ACIC continued to make it clear to its preferred shareholders throughout that in addition to its right to refuse to honour a redemption request, it retained the right to alter, amend, or cancel its redemption policy at any time. In some communications, ACIC advised that its ability to honour a redemption request depends on the company's liquidity.

[140] Each preferred shareholder was required to sign a Subscription Agreement in order to purchase Units. They contained language confirming the subscriber's decision to purchase Units was based solely upon the information contained in the Offering Memoranda and any agreements or documents incorporated in them. There is no room to incorporate into the Subscription Agreements any representations that might have been made and relied upon by the redeeming preferred shareholders either at the time of subscription or afterward.

[141] ACIC's redemption policies and communications cannot purport to change the rights attached to shares, such as redemption rights, as set out in the Articles, which is a foundation document governing the contractual rights of preferred shareholders. The Articles can only be amended by special resolution and in strict compliance with the BCA, which did not occur in this case: BCA, ss. 2(2)(b), 54(3), 58(2), 61. For example, s. 61 of the BCA provides that special rights and restrictions attached to a share are not varied or deleted until a company's articles have been altered to reflect the variation or deletion:

> 61. A right or special right attached to issued shares must not be prejudiced or interfered with under this Act or under the memorandum, notice of articles or articles unless the shareholders holding shares of the class or series of shares to which the right or special right is attached consent by a special separate resolution of those shareholders.

[142] Further, based on the evidence adduced on this application, mass communications sent from or given by ACIC to potential and existing preferred shareholders do not establish a change in the relationship.

[143] In any event, even if it could be said that there was an elimination of unfettered and at will discretion to redeem on the part of ACIC's director, the substance of the relationship between ACIC and its preferred shareholders did not change from equity to debt as a result.

[144] Lastly, it is not an issue on this application whether the redeeming preferred shareholders can look beyond the four corners of their Subscription Agreements, such as to advance a claim for inducement to purchase shares or any delay in requesting a redemption through a representation(s) made by on or behalf of ACIC. The answer to that question also has no bearing on the characterization of the nature of the redeeming preferred shareholders' status in this CCAA insolvency proceeding.

[145] For these reasons, I do not need to consider the redeeming preferred shareholders' submission, based on Rosas v. Toca, 2018 BCCA 191, that no consideration is necessary to support the alleged change in their contractual relationship with ACIC.

Treatment in Financial Records

[146] Since surrounding circumstances are referred to by the redeeming preferred shareholders, it is useful to refer to the manner in which ACIC treated its preferred shareholders in its financial records. Reference to treatment in financial records was considered in some of the case authorities I have cited (e.g., Central Capital). In considering this evidence, I am mindful of the caution in CDIC (at para. 61) that a company's treatment in its financial records is to be accorded limited weight.

[147] ACIC's financial records describe the preferred shares as "Share Capital" and not as debt. There are separate, specific line items for short term and long term debt and debentures, which do not include the monies paid by subscribers for their Units. For example, the 2015 financial statements state that there is "No Long Term Debt". Capital from share subscriptions is described as "Shareholders' equity" in financial statements prepared by ACIC's third party accounting firm, BDO Dunwoody, under a line item entitled, "Liabilities and Shareholders' Equity".

Conclusion

[148] The preferred shareholders' investment in ACIC was in respect of an equity interest. Their claims are not debt claims. They are claims that only a shareholder can make. The redemption rights attached to ACIC's preferred shares are in substance rights to the return of a capital invested in a MIC with significant risks.

[149] ACIC's deteriorating financial position led to its inability to honour the outstanding redemption requests delivered by certain preferred shareholders. It is a risk that all preferred shareholders were clearly informed of before purchasing their shares.

[150] A declaration shall issue that the claims of all of its preferred shareholders fall within the ambit of equity claims as defined in s. 2 of the CCAA.

Introduction

[1] These are longstanding proceedings under the *Companies' Creditors Arrangement A*ct, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-36 (the "CCAA"), having been commenced some three and a half years ago in May 2011. Since that time, the petitioners have made slow and steady progress toward the goal of presenting a plan of arrangement to their creditors and certain equity participants.

[2] The principal petitioners, being Bul River Mineral Corporation ("Bul River") and Gallowai Metal Mining Corporation ("Gallowai"), are the owners of certain mining properties and related assets in the Kootenay region of British Columbia. As a result of these proceedings, Bul River and Gallowai now have some indication that the mine is viable. This has been accomplished mainly due to the participation of CuVeras, LLC ("CuVeras") who has, since late 2011, provided interim financing which allowed this further development work to continue to this point in time.

[3] Some years ago, Bul River and Gallowai completed a claims process to identify not only trade creditors but also claims of its common and preferred shareholders. Now that Bul River and Gallowai, with the assistance and sponsorship of CuVeras, are on the cusp of preparing a plan of arrangement for consideration by the stakeholders, those claims have become of central importance.

[4] Some of the claims that were advanced through the claims process were not critically considered by either the petitioners or the court-appointed monitor, Deloitte Restructuring Inc. (the "Monitor"). However, at this late date, the characterization of certain claims and the validity of certain claims have been put in issue and will have a profound impact on the manner in which these restructuring proceedings go forward.

[5] At present, the general intention is that the restructuring will take place along the lines of a Letter of Agreement between the petitioners and CuVeras dated May 23, 2014. By that agreement, a newly formed British Columbia entity ("Newco") will be created and the shares in Newco will be distributed to CuVeras and other related parties and also to non-voting preferred shareholders. Trade creditors will also participate in Newco. This Letter of Agreement is the product of some history, sometimes contentious, between the petitioners and CuVeras which was discussed in the court's earlier reasons: Bul River Mineral Corporation (Re), 2014 BCSC 645.

[6] One of the claims is that advanced by Gordon and Carol Preston (the "Preston Claim"), which CuVeras contends is an equity claim as opposed to a debt claim. Another claim is that advanced by Eldon Stafford (the "Stafford Claim"), which CuVeras contends is not a valid claim against Bul River or Gallowai. The substance of the issue before the court therefore is two-fold: (a) the proper categorization of the Preston Claim and (b) whether the Stafford Claim is a valid claim against the petitioners.

[7] As will become apparent from the discussion below, the resolution of these issues will significantly impact how any restructuring plan can be crafted and will also impact all stakeholders in terms of how the Newco shares will be distributed between the various stakeholders. There is some urgency in resolving these last issues before the restructuring can proceed. All involved, including the Monitor, state that it is necessary for the petitioners to exit this CCAA proceeding as quickly as possible. At this time, a plan of arrangement sponsored by CuVeras is the only option available to the petitioners so as to avoid a liquidation and bankruptcy.

Background

[8] The petitioners are also known as the Stanfield Mining Group (the "Group"). The Group carried on the business of developing a mining property situated near the Bull River just outside of Fernie, British Columbia. It is effectively controlled by the estate of Ross Stanfield ("Stanfield") which holds 100% and 99.9% of the voting common shares in the parent companies, Zeus Mineral Corporation and Fort Steele Mineral Corporation, respectively. As stated above, the two principal companies involved in the development and operation of the mine within the Group are Bul River and Gallowai.

[9] The mine, known as the Gallowai Bul River Mine, is not currently in production. There has been significant underground development to this point such that the petitioners and CuVeras consider that with a relatively modest further investment the mine could be placed into production.

[10] Bul River and Gallowai were incorporated in the 1980s. Commencing in the mid-1990s, Stanfield began raising funds for the development of the mine. The marketing program focused on "sophisticated investors" which are, through securities regulation statutes, defined as persons with a net worth in excess of $1 million willing to invest a minimum of $100,000 in a given venture. The persons targeted by Stanfield's marketing campaign were farmers in Alberta, particularly around Edmonton, Red Deer and Medicine Hat, as well as farmers from the area around Regina, Saskatchewan.

[11] Until 2010, Stanfield engaged in a sophisticated marketing program to sell redeemable preferred non-voting shares to these investors. Over that period of time, approximately $229 million was invested in consideration of which preferred shares in Bul River and Gallowai were issued.

[12] The marketing program involved repeated representations as to the ore content of the mine. Stanfield continually referred to the mine as an "elephant" mine, meaning that the mineral resources were enormous. Over the years, the program included visits to the mine site and presentations to potential investors by Stanfield. Those presentations referred to the history of the mine and the future prospects of the mine, including development plans and the levels of ore content (copper, gold and platinum). The presentations also involved discussion as to when production would commence and typically production was forecast to commence within a foreseeable period of time, be it one or two years from the date of the meeting.

[13] The same representations were also made in written materials, including a report from Phillip De Souza ("De Souza"), a professional engineer.

[14] Some potential investors executed subscription agreements for shares during those visits to the mine or immediately thereafter. Some returned to the mine for subsequent tours and subsequent purchases. In some instances, Stanfield recruited current investors to further market the preferred shares to other investors.

[15] These representations by Stanfield were made in the face of contemporaneous reports which questioned the value of the resources announced by the Group. These included papers published by the British Columbia Ministry of Energy and Mines in 2000 in which it was reported that they were unable to confirm the gold grades reported by the Group. In 2006, a professional conduct hearing in Alberta was held arising from charges that De Souza's report was "deficient and misleading". The panel issued reasons which were published in January 2008 in which it concluded that De Souza's conduct constituted unskilled practice and unprofessional conduct.

[16] Eventually, Stanfield's activities caught the attention of various provincial securities regulators. In May 2010, the British Columbia Securities Commission (the "Commission") issued a Notice of Hearing against Stanfield, Bul River and Gallowai seeking to order them to produce an independently prepared technical report fully compliant with NI 43-101 (Standards of Disclosure for Mineral Projects) that would include an estimate of the mineral resources available at the mine.

[17] Ross Stanfield died on August 3, 2010.

[18] By the fall of 2010, in addition to being faced with the Commission proceedings, certain preferred shareholders had taken legal action against the Group in light of the failure to comply with redemption obligations arising in respect of the preferred shares. Stanfield's grandson, George Hewison, is the sole beneficiary of Stanfield's estate. He stepped in to continue the work of the Group as best he could. In late 2010 or early 2011, undertakings were given to the securities regulators in British Columbia and Alberta by which the petitioners agreed not to issue any new securities without their consent.

[19] The evidence would later establish that the representations made by Stanfield regarding the mine resources were false. A technical report was later prepared by Rosco Postle and Associates Inc. ("RPA") in March 2011 that provided some review of the available mineral resources at the mine. Both the RPA report and a later report prepared by Snowden Mining Industry Consultants in March 2013 would indicate that while there is valuable ore in the mine, the quantity of the resources is markedly less than what was indicated in the representations made to investors.

[20] On May 26, 2011, the Group sought and obtained creditor protection pursuant to the CCAA and an Initial Order was granted at that time.

[21] At the time of the CCAA filing, the Class A common voting shares in Bul River and Gallowai were held by the Stanfield estate. Other Class B and Class E common non-voting shares were held by investors.

[22] As of the date of filing, the petitioners had no secured creditors. The petition referenced debt obligations of $904,000 to trade suppliers and two unsecured judgments totalling $386,135. Various preferred non-voting shares were held by investors in Classes C, D and F. The petition materials indicated that amounts owing for "redeemable shares" (i.e., the preferred shares) were approximately $137,718,557. The holders of both common and preferred shares comprise some 3,500 individual investors.

[23] The subscription agreements for the preferred shares provided that the shares were redeemable at the end of five years from the date of the subscription together with a "preferred cumulative annual dividend" of 12.75%. There is no evidence of any significant redemption of the preferred shares. Rather, as redemption dates arose, preferred shareholders were approached to execute extension agreements extending their redemption rights from a given date to a date defined by the commencement of production from the mine. Many preferred shareholders signed those extension agreements, some did not. For those who did not, some of them demanded redemption of their shares. For the most part, those investors were told that there was no money to redeem the shares.

[24] Accordingly, the largest liability faced by the petitioners is that arising from the preferred shares. The preferred shareholders appear to have certain claims arising from their holdings. Firstly, they have a claim for payment of the redemption amount plus the accumulated dividend. Secondly, they may have a claim for misrepresentation against the Group, giving rise to potential remedies of rescission of their subscription agreements, damages, or both.

The Claims Process

[25] In August 2011, the Group prepared a list of creditors (the "Creditor List") in support of seeking a claims process order. The list actually included not only trade claims but also shareholder claims. Not surprisingly, the purpose of the claims process was to assist the Group in developing its restructuring plan.

[26] On August 19, 2011, the court approved a Claims Process Order, which authorized the petitioners to conduct a claims process for the determination of any and all claims against them (the "Claims Process"). The Claims Process Order defined "claims" that were to be determined in the Claims Process as follows:

> … indebtedness, liability or obligation (including an equity obligations arising from the ownership of equity shares) …
> … all obligations of or ownership interests in the Petitioners or any of them arising from or relating to the holding of a Share.

[27] Under the Claims Process Order, all "Known Creditors" (defined in the Claims Process Order as all creditors shown on the books and records of the petitioners as having a claim in excess of $250), including holders of shares, were to receive a claims package from the petitioners that included an instruction letter, a Notice of Dispute, a Proof of Claim, and a copy of the Claims Process Order (the "Claims Package"). The Claims Process was also advertised in certain publications. The Creditor List indicating such Known Creditors was posted on the Monitor's website, as was noted in the Claims Package, such that both creditors and shareholders were able to view it. The process of determining claims was as follows:

a) all creditors and shareholders were given the opportunity to review the Creditor List;

b) in the event a creditor or shareholder agreed with the "Claim Particulars" listed in the Creditor List (which included the number and class of shares), the creditor or shareholder did not need to file a Proof of Claim with the petitioners. In that event, the Claim Particulars in the Creditor List would be deemed to be the creditor or shareholder's proven claim for voting and distribution purposes under any restructuring plan subsequently filed by the petitioners;

c) in the event a creditor or shareholder objected to the Claim Particulars in the Creditor List, or wished to advance another claim, the creditor or shareholder had to, on or before October 17, 2011 (the "Claims Bar Date"), deliver to the petitioners, with a copy to the Monitor, a notice of such objection in the form of a Notice of Dispute, together with a Proof of Claim and supporting documentation;

d) in the event a Notice of Dispute was not submitted on or before the Claims Bar Date, the creditor or shareholder was deemed to have accepted the amount owing and all other Claim Particulars set out in the Creditor List, and was forever barred from advancing any other claim against the petitioners or participating in any plan subsequently filed by the petitioners;

e) where a Notice of Dispute and/or Proof of Claim was filed by a creditor or shareholder, the petitioners were deemed to have accepted it unless they delivered to the creditor or shareholder a Notice of Disallowance on or before October 31, 2011 (later extended to November 15, 2011); and

f) in the event of the petitioners delivering a Notice of Disallowance, a creditor or shareholder had 21 days to seek a determination from the court of the validity and value of and particulars of the claim by filing and serving > the petitioners and the Monitor with application materials. A creditor or shareholder who failed to file and serve such materials by the deadline was deemed to have accepted the particulars of its claim set out in the Notice of Disallowance.

[28] The Claims Process Order did not contemplate the appointment of a claims officer or the participation of the Monitor in the process of assessing the validity of the Proofs of Claim and/or Notices of Dispute submitted to the petitioners through the Claims Process. Nor did the Claims Process allow any independent review of claims submitted by other creditors of the petitioners or by CuVeras as the interim financier.

(i) Jurisdiction of the Court

[29] Before turning to claims process orders specifically, it is important to keep in mind the broad remedial objectives of the CCAA to facilitate a restructuring rather than a liquidation of assets: Century Services Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2010 SCC 60 at paras. 15-18, 56. As the Supreme Court of Canada has noted, it is now well recognized that a supervising judge of a CCAA proceeding has a "broad and flexible authority" or statutory jurisdiction to makes such orders as are necessary to achieve those objectives: Century Services at paras. 19, 57-66.

[30] The discretionary authority of the court is confirmed by s. 11 of the CCAA which provides that the court may make any order that it considers "appropriate in the circumstances". As Madam Justice Deschamps observed in Century Services, whether an order will be appropriate is driven by the policy objectives of the CCAA:

> [70] The general language of the CCAA should not be read as being restricted by the availability of more specific orders. However, the requirements of appropriateness, good faith, and due diligence are baseline considerations that a court should always bear in mind when exercising CCAA authority. Appropriateness under the CCAA is assessed by inquiring whether the order sought advances the policy objectives underlying the CCAA. The question is whether the order will usefully further efforts to achieve the remedial purpose of the CCAA — avoiding the social and economic losses resulting from liquidation of an insolvent company. I would add that appropriateness extends not only to the purpose of the order, but also to the means it employs. Courts should be mindful that chances for > successful reorganizations are enhanced where participants achieve common ground and all stakeholders are treated as advantageously and fairly as the circumstances permit.

[31] Claims process orders are an important step in most restructuring proceedings. In Timminco Limited (Re), 2014 ONSC 3393, Mr. Justice Morawetz reviewed the "first principles" relating to claims process orders and their purpose within CCAA proceedings:

> [41] It is also necessary to return to first principles with respect to claims-bar orders. The CCAA is intended to facilitate a compromise or arrangement between a debtor company and its creditors and shareholders. For a debtor company engaged in restructuring under the CCAA, which may include a liquidation of its assets, it is of fundamental importance to determine the quantum of liabilities to which the debtor and, in certain circumstances, third parties are subject. It is this desire for certainty that led to the development of the practice by which debtors apply to court for orders which establish a deadline for filing claims.
> [42] Adherence to the claims-bar date becomes even more important when distributions are being made (in this case, to secured creditors), or when a plan is being presented to creditors and a creditors' meeting is called to consider the plan of compromise. These objectives are recognized by s. 12 of the CCAA, in particular the references to "voting" and "distribution".
> [43] In such circumstances, stakeholders are entitled to know the implications of their actions. The claims-bar order can assist in this process. By establishing a claims-bar date, the debtor can determine the universe of claims and the potential distribution to creditors, and creditors are in a position to make an informed choice as to the alternatives presented to them. If distributions are being made or a plan is presented to creditors and voted upon, stakeholders should be able to place a degree of reliance in the claims bar process.

[32] The overall objective of achieving certainty within the restructuring proceedings - for both debtor and creditor - is what drives this process. In this vein, counsel makes an effort to draft a claims process order to achieve these objectives. A claims bar date is typically set. The process is typically designed with some idea of the issues that either have arisen or might arise in the restructuring. My comments in Steels Industrial Products Ltd. (Re), 2012 BCSC 1501 are apposite:

> [38] Similar issues often arise in CCAA proceedings where counsel and the Court must be mindful of issues that may arise in relation to the determination of claims in that proceeding. There are no set rules, but care must be taken in the drafting of the claims process order to ensure that the process by which claims are determined is fair and reasonable to all > stakeholders, including those who will be directly affected by the acceptance of other claims. In Winalta Inc. (Re), 2011 ABQB 399, Madam Justice Topolniski stated that "[p]ublic confidence in the insolvency system is dependent on it being fair, just and accessible".

> [39] Many CCAA proceedings provide for an independently run claims process (for example, by the monitor), the cost of which again would be borne by the general body of creditors: see for example, Pine Valley Mining Corp. (Re), 2008 BCSC 356. To this extent, the statutory procedure under the BIA and the claims process under the CCAA will have similar features, which is understandable since the overriding intention under both is to conduct a proper claims process: see Century Services Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2010 SCC 60 at paras. 24 and 47.

[33] Nevertheless, issues can and do arise that no one is able to foresee at the time of the claims process order. In that event, the court retains its discretion to address the application of the claims process order: Timminco at para. 38. In that case, the claims process order specifically allowed the court to order a further claims bar date. No such provision is found in the Claims Process Order but I do not consider that its absence is sufficient to oust the statutory jurisdiction of the court in appropriate circumstances.

[34] This, of course, is a different issue in that by the failure of the petitioners to deliver a Notice of Disallowance in respect of the claims in issue, they were deemed to have been accepted by the petitioners. This is not a case where a creditor is seeking to avoid the consequences of not filing materials by the time of the Claims Bar Date. Nevertheless, in my view, the court still retains the statutory jurisdiction to consider the validity of claims that might otherwise, by the Claims Process Order, be deemed to have been accepted.

[35] The Prestons and Mr. Stafford do not suggest that the court lacks the jurisdiction to reconsider the issues that arise in relation to their claims. The Prestons do, however, contend that it is not appropriate that any reconsideration take place at this time.

(ii) Review of the Claims

[36] The stated purpose of the CCAA is to facilitate compromises and arrangements between companies and their creditors (see also s. 6 of the CCAA). In accordance with that fundamental objective or purpose, it is axiomatic that it is necessary to determine what are the true claims of the creditors as might be compromised or arranged.

[37] A "creditor" is not defined in the CCAA, unlike the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.B-3 (the "BIA") where it is defined as meaning "a person having a claim provable as a claim" under that Act (s. 2). Both the CCAA and the BIA define "claim" by reference to liabilities "provable" under the BIA. Specifically, s. 2(1) of the CCAA defines "claim" as meaning:

> any indebtedness, liability or obligation of any kind that would be a claim provable within the meaning of section 2 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

Section 2 of the BIA defines a "claim provable in bankruptcy" as "any claim or liability provable in proceedings under this Act by a creditor".

[38] Section 121(1) of the BIA addresses which claims are "provable claims":

> 121(1) All debts and liabilities, present or future, to which the bankrupt is subject on the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt or to which the bankrupt may become subject before the bankrupt's discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt shall be deemed to be claims provable in proceedings under this Act.

[39] In substance, this same statutory definition is applied in the CCAA and represents a point of convergence consistent with the harmonization of certain aspects of insolvency law under both the CCAA and BIA: Century Services at para. 24. In addition, as noted by CuVeras, this definition is essentially used in the Claims Process Order by its definition of "Claim".

[40] Various authorities establish that a "provable debt" must be due either at law, or in equity, by the bankrupt to the person seeking to prove a claim and must be recoverable by legal process: Excelsior Electric Dairy Machinery Ltd. (Re), [1923] 2 C.B.R. 599 (Ont. S.C.), 3 D.L.R. 1176; Farm Credit Corporation v. Dunwoody Limited, [1988] 68 C.B.R. (N.S.) 255 (Alta. C.A.), 51 D.L.R. (4th) 501, leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused, 73 C.B.R. (N.S.) xxvii (note), 100 60 D.L.R. (4th) vii (note);

Central Capital Corp. (Re), [1995] 29 C.B.R. (3d) 33 (Ont. Gen. Div.), O.J. No. 19 ("Central Capital"), aff'd [1996] 27 O.R. (3d) 494 (C.A.), 38 C.B.R. (3d) 1 ("Central Capital (ONCA)"); Negus v. Oakley's General Contracting (1996), 40 C.B.R. (3d) 270 (N.S.S.C.), 152 N.S.R. (2d) 172.

[41] In a CCAA proceeding, a claims process order is the means by which the "claims" of the creditors are determined. By reason of that process, the debtor is able to determine the nature and extent of its debts and liabilities so as to enable it to formulate a plan of arrangement. There are no rules as to when a claims process may be implemented although it is usually early in the process in anticipation of a plan and distributions to creditors. In that respect, a debtor company will be seeking some certainty regarding the determination of claims for that purpose.

[42] In Timminco, the Court, prior to citing relevant authorities at para. 52, outlined many of the factors that might be considered by the court in relation to deciding whether to allow claims to be advanced after the claims bar date:

> [51] Counsel to Mr. Walsh submit that courts have historically considered the following factors in determining whether to exercise their discretion to consider claims after the claims-bar date: (a) was the delay caused by inadvertence and, if so, did the claimant act in good faith? (b) what is the effect of permitting the claim in terms of the existence and impact of any relevant prejudice caused by the delay[?] (c) if relevant prejudice is found, can it be alleviated by attaching appropriate conditions to an order permitting late filing? and (d) if relevant prejudice is found which cannot be alleviated, are there any other considerations which may nonetheless warrant an order permitting late filing?

[43] As I have stated above, the broad jurisdiction of the court under s. 11 of the CCAA allows the court to make such orders as are "appropriate". While the above factors have been considered in the past, there is no finite list that detracts from a consideration of all relevant circumstances. Nevertheless, the general considerations of delay and prejudice typically arise, just as they do in this case.

[44] I return to the factual circumstances relating to the Claims Process and the Claims Process Order. The petitioners were themselves responsible for reviewing the Proofs of Claim and/or Notices of Dispute submitted in the Claims Process. The principal individual involved in the review was Mr. Hewison who did so with the assistance of counsel. It is apparent that the only factors considered in his review included whether a claim related to a trade debt or whether it related to an equity interest in the petitioners.

[45] The Prestons argue that the Claims Process was well known to everyone and that its purpose was to establish the amount and nature of all claims. This is clearly self-evident, but back in late 2011, it was the case that the course of the restructuring proceedings was anything but certain. In fact, the ability of the petitioners to continue the proceedings was tenuous and they were scrambling to find interim financing which they eventually secured with CuVeras in November 2011. By that time, the Claims Process was essentially completed. Even so, understandably, the parties were concerned to proceed as quickly as possible to obtain further technical reports on the proven or inferred mine resources in order to determine whether a viable mine even existed. They did receive those later reports, which included a further RPA report and the Snowden report. In these circumstances, Mr. Hewison did not undertake any substantive review of the claims.

[46] The Prestons further say that, since they faithfully complied with the Claims Process Order, it would be patently unfair to now revisit the characterization of their claim. While they raise the matter of the three year plus delay, no elements of prejudice have been alleged. In my view, the delay, while relevant, will have little effect on the ability of the parties to address the substance of the matter. Nor have any rights been extinguished or compromised by reason of any delay. Accordingly, the objective of certainty has less force in this case where the plan of arrangement has yet to be formulated and the claimants have yet to consider that plan and vote on it. I note that similar considerations were at play in Timminco where it was apparent that no plan would ever be put to the creditors.

[47] Finally, the Prestons argue that the Claims Process Order constituted the sole form of adjudication of the validity and nature of the claims submitted. It is true, of course, that the petitioners had an opportunity to consider these claims.

[48] As discussed below, the petitioners did not forward any Notice of Disallowance in respect of the Proofs of Claim later filed by the Prestons and Mr. Stafford. Mr. Hewison considered that the Stafford Claim should be categorized as an "investment" in the mine. Further, with respect to the Preston Claim, he was not aware of the significance of the distinction between an equity claim and a debt claim. In retrospect, and now knowing what type of plan of arrangement is possible, Mr. Hewison recognizes that this was in error. It appears that a combination of factors - including Mr. Hewison's lack of familiarity with the past transactions, inadequate record keeping, lack of resources and distraction in terms of larger issues more relevant to the survival of the mine - all contributed to a less rigorous review and analysis of these claims.

[49] It is the case, however, that the petitioners were acting in good faith, albeit without a full appreciation of the issues arising in respect of these claims and the also the consequences of their inaction.

[50] More importantly, aside from the petitioners, other stakeholders have a significant interest in whether a claim is valid or not and that any claim be properly characterized. Based on the anticipated form of the restructuring plan, the inclusion of the Stafford Claim and characterization of the Preston Claim will impact the recovery of these stakeholders. These other creditors or stakeholders of the petitioners did not have any opportunity up to this point in time to review the claims. I would again note that the Claims Process Order did not contemplate any review of the claims by these other stakeholders, such as was the case in Steels Products (see paras. 13-15).

[51] Nor has the Monitor participated in any review of these claims. I do not say this as any criticism of the Monitor as the Claims Process Order did not expressly provide for any such independent review. Nor does the Claims Process Order contemplate that any other independent review of the claims be completed which might have highlighted the issues. The Monitor did report on the Claims Process from time to time (particularly, its report from June 2012 and January 2013), however, no such issues were identified. As such, the Monitor did not conduct a critical review of the claims, similar to what a trustee in bankruptcy might have done under s. 135 of the BIA.

[52] In these circumstances, and in retrospect, the Claims Process lacked procedural safeguards that might have avoided this problem: Steels Products at paras. 38-39.

[53] In these circumstances, I disagree with the Prestons that the Claims Process Order constitutes an adjudication of these issues by which CuVeras or any other stakeholder is estopped in bringing these issues forward. It is clear that to this point, no such adjudication has occurred.

[54] As I have indicated above, a Claims Process Order is intended to be a fair, reasonable and transparent method of determining and resolving claims against the estate. In certain circumstances, these objectives fail to be achieved through no fault of the participants. That does not preclude the court from considering the issues on their merits so as to achieve the fundamental objective under the CCAA to facilitate a restructuring based on valid claims. This would also include a consideration of the proper characterization of the Preston's claim: Steels Products at para. 42.

[55] Simply put, if the Claims Process results in a claim being advanced which is not truly a debt of the petitioners or results in a claim being improperly characterized, the fairness and transparency of these proceedings are inevitably compromised such that the objectives of the CCAA will not be fulfilled.

[56] My comments in Steels Products apply equally here:

> [46] In conclusion, an independent review of these claims is necessary in the circumstances. An adequate review of these related party claims has not been made. The consequences of a successful challenge to some or all of these claims would have significant financial repercussions to the Disputing Creditors and other unsecured creditors who have also proved their claims. To deny an independent review at this time would be to deny any creditor the fair, reasonable and transparent process that is expected in insolvency proceedings in determining claims before any distribution of estate assets is made.

[57] Even at this late stage in the proceedings, and considering the ongoing supervisory role of the court, I consider that it is appropriate to address the issues relating to both the Preston Claim and the Stafford Claim on their merits. This is particularly so given the significant repercussions to other stakeholders and the lack of any prejudice to the Prestons and Mr. Stafford.

Discussion

(a) The Preston Claim

[58] The Preston Claim is advanced as a debt claim in these proceedings, a position that is disputed by CuVeras who contends that in fact, it is an equity claim as defined in the CCAA.

(i) The Proof of Claim

[59] The Creditor List referenced the Prestons as holding various Class E (2,102) and Class F (2,400) preferred shares.

[60] In October 2011, the Prestons, through their counsel, submitted a Proof of Claim and Notice of Dispute.

[61] The genesis of the claim was as described in a Statement of Claim filed in the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench against Gallowai on May 27, 2010. The claim was as follows: in October 2004, the Prestons subscribed for 2,400 Class F preferred shares in Gallowai in consideration of the payment to Gallowai of $120,000; Gallowai is alleged to have covenanted to redeem the preferred shares at the expiry of five years after the allotment date; the Prestons demanded redemption of the shares and the payment of dividends which was to be by way of issuance of Class E shares; Gallowai refused to respond to their demands; and the Prestons claimed the right to redeem the Class F preferred shares for $120,000 plus either dividends in the form of Class E common shares or, alternatively, cash payment of dividends at 12.75% per annum.

[62] On November 19, 2010, default judgment was granted in favour of the Prestons for the claimed amount of $120,000 plus the cash dividend interest rate for a total judgment of $214,527.10 including court ordered costs. The Prestons attempted to register their judgment in British Columbia in June 2011 after the court ordered a stay arising under the Initial Order, but nothing turns on that step.

[63] The Proof of Claim indicates that the Prestons were advancing both a trade claim for the judgment amount and also a claim for non-voting shares arising from the allegation that they continue to hold the 2,102 Class E shares noted on the Creditor List.

(ii) Historical Approach to Equity Claims

[64] Before I turn to the current statutory regime arising from amendments to the CCAA and BIA in 2009, I will review the authorities which applied before these amendments were enacted.

[65] Historically, equity and debt claims have been treated differently in an insolvency proceeding given the fundamental difference in the nature of such claims. That different treatment resulted in the subordination of equity to debt claims. The basis for this judicially developed principle was that equity investors are understood to be higher risk participants. Creditors, on the other hand, have been held by the courts to have chosen a lower level of risk exposure that should generally result in priority over equity investors in an insolvency context.

[66] In Sino-Forest Corporation, 2012 ONCA 816, affirming 2012 ONSC 4377, the Court of Appeal commented with approval on the analysis of Morawetz J. in the court below:

> [30] Even before the 2009 amendments to the CCAA codified the treatment of equity claims, the courts subordinated shareholder equity claims to general creditors' claims in an insolvency. As the supervising judge described [at paras. 23-25]:
>
> > Essentially, shareholders cannot reasonably expect to maintain a financial interest in an insolvent company where creditor claims are not being paid in full. Simply put, shareholders have no economic interest in an insolvent enterprise.
> >
> > The basis for the differentiation flows from the fundamentally different nature of debt and equity investments. Shareholders have unlimited > upside potential when purchasing shares. Creditors have no corresponding upside potential.

>
> As a result, courts subordinated equity claims and denied such claims a vote in plans of arrangement [citations omitted].

[67] See also Central Capital at paras. 41-42; Central Capital (ONCA) at 510-11, 519.

[68] In light of that key distinction, courts in the past have embarked upon a consideration as to the true characterization of certain claims in an insolvency context. There is considerable authority that in making that determination, the court will consider the true substantive nature or character of the claim, rather than the form of the claim.

[69] The leading case is the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in Canada Deposit Insurance Corp. v. Canadian Commercial Bank, [1992] 3 S.C.R. 558 ("CDIC"). In that case, the issue was whether money advanced to the debtor bank was in the nature of a loan or a capital investment for the purpose of determining whether the creditors advancing the funds ranked pari passu with other unsecured creditors in a winding-up proceeding. Mr. Justice Iacobucci stated that the approach was to determine the "substance" or "true nature" of the transaction (563, 588). His oft quoted statements are found at 590-91, the relevant principles of which can be summarized as follows:

a) the fact that a transaction contains both debt and equity features does not, in itself, determine its characterization as either debt or equity;

b) the characterization of a transaction under review requires the determination of the intention of the parties;

c) it does not follow that each and every aspect of a "hybrid" debt and equity transaction must be given the exact same weight when addressing a characterization issue; and

d) a court should not too easily be distracted by aspects of a transaction which are, in reality, only incidental or secondary in nature to the main thrust of the agreement.

[70] One type of financial instrument that typically has elements of both equity and debt are preferred shares, where arguably rights of redemption and rights to payment of dividends evidence debt characteristics.

[71] The issue of the characterization of preferred shareholder claims in an insolvency context was addressed in Central Capital (ONCA). In that case, the court had to characterize a claim arising from the right of retraction in respect of certain preferred shares. Although differing in the result, the majority opinions and the dissenting opinion at the appellate court level were consistent in an approach toward determining the substance of the claim in terms of whether it was a "provable debt". In dissent, Finlayson J.A. stated:

> … I do not think that describing the documents as preferred shares is conclusive as to what instrument the parties thought they were creating. In the second place, it is not what the parties call the documents that is determinative of their identity, but rather it is what the facts require the court to call them. The character of the instrument is revealed by the language creating it and the circumstances of its creation.
> (at 509).
>
> ...
>
> Thus, in looking at the substance of the transaction that led to the issuance of the preference shares, it appears to me that the retraction clauses were promises by Central Capital to pay fixed amounts on definite dates to the appellants. They evidenced a debt to the appellants.
> (at 512).

Justice Laskin specifically addressed the "substance of the relationship" at 535-36. In addition, Weiler J.A. focused on the "true nature" of the transaction or relationship:

> In order to decide whether the obligation of Central Capital to redeem the preferred shares of the appellants is a claim provable in bankruptcy, it is necessary to characterize the true nature of the transaction. The court must look to the surrounding circumstances to determine whether the true nature of the relationship is that of a shareholder who has equity in the company or whether it is that of a creditor owed a debt or liability by the company: Canada Deposit Insurance Corp. v. Canadian Commercial Bank, [1992] 3

> S.C.R. 558, 97 D.L.R. (4th) 385. In this case, the decision is not an easy one. Where, as here, the agreements between the parties are reflected in the articles of the corporation, it is necessary to examine them carefully to characterize the true relationship. It is not disputed that if the true nature of the relationship is that of a shareholder-equity relationship after the retraction date and at the time of the reorganization, then the appellants do not have a claim provable in bankruptcy. Consequently, they will not have a claim under the CCAA.

[72] In Blue Range Resource Corp. (Re), 2000 ABQB 4, Madam Justice Romaine found that a shareholder's claim for alleged share loss, transaction costs and cash share purchase damages was in substance an equity claim or a claim by the shareholder for a return of its investment. See also EarthFirst Canada Inc. (Re), 2009 ABQB 316.

[73] In Return on Innovation v. Gandi Innovations , 2011 ONSC 5018, leave to appeal refused, 2012 ONCA 10, the Court was characterizing indemnity claims advanced by certain individual directors and officers against the debtor, the Gandi Group. That indemnity claim arose by reason of a claim by TA Associates Inc. against them for damages for claims relating in part to TA's US$50 million equity investment in the Gandi Group. Mr. Justice Newbould at the Ontario Superior Court concluded that TA's claim was an equity claim and that therefore, the indemnity claim was also, in substance, an equity claim.

[74] I have also been referred to Dexior Financial Inc. (Re), 2011 BCSC 348. Mr. Justice Masuhara there found the claim to be an equity claim even though the shareholder had given notice of an intention to seek retraction of the shares prior to the filing. Citing CDIC and Central Capital (ONCA), the Court found that the notice did not change the original intention or substance of the claim.

(iii) The New Statutory Approach

[75] In September 2009, Parliament enacted substantial amendments to the BIA and CCAA in relation to the treatment of claims arising from equity in an insolvency proceeding.

[76] One of the principle amendments was the prohibition that the court may not sanction a plan of arrangement unless all debt claims are to be paid in full before payment of any "equity claims". Section 6(8) of the CCAA provides:

> (8) No compromise or arrangement that provides for the payment of an equity claim is to be sanctioned by the court unless it provides that all claims that are not equity claims are to be paid in full before the equity claim is to be paid.

[77] The definitions of "equity claim" and "equity interest" are found in the CCAA, s. 2(1):

> "equity claim" means a claim that is in respect of an equity interest, including a claim for, among others,
>
> (a) a dividend or similar payment,
>
> (b) a return of capital,
>
> (c) a redemption or retraction obligation,
>
> (d) a monetary loss resulting from the ownership, purchase or sale of an equity interest or from the rescission, or, in Quebec, the annulment, of a purchase or sale of an equity interest, or
>
> (e) contribution or indemnity in respect of a claim referred to in any of paragraphs (a) to (d);
>
> "equity interest" means
>
> (a) in the case of a company other than an income trust, a share in the company — or a warrant or option or another right to acquire a share in the company — other than one that is derived from a convertible debt[.]

[78] Section 22.1 further restricts the right of creditors having equity claims from voting on a plan of arrangement:

> 22.1 Despite subsection 22(1), creditors having equity claims are to be in the same class of creditors in relation to those claims unless the court orders otherwise and may not, as members of that class, vote at any meeting unless the court orders otherwise.

[79] Substantially these same amendments were made to the BIA in respect of proposal proceedings under that Act in ss. 2, 54(2)(d) and 60(1.7).

[80] The effect of the amendments was considered by Pepall J. (as she then was) in Nelson Financial Group Ltd. (Re), 2010 ONSC 6229. In that case, the court had no difficulty in finding that the claims of preferred shareholders for declared but unpaid dividends and requests for redemption were equity claims within the above definition. In addition, the approach of the courts in the past in looking at the substance or true nature of the claim was applied in finding that related claims for compensatory damages or amounts due on rescission were caught by the definition of "equity claim": paras. 32-34. As such, all the claims were not provable debts under the CCAA.

[81] The court in Nelson Financial Group noted that the introduction of section 6(8) in the CCAA provided greater certainty in the treatment to be accorded equity claims and lessened the "judicial flexibility" that previously prevailed in characterizing such claims.

[82] Accordingly, while the 2009 amendments did represent in part a codification of the previous case law concerning equity claims, it also represented a more concrete definition of "equity claims" and by such definition a broadening and more expansive definition of such claims: Sino-Forest Corporation (ONCA) at paras. 24, 34-60. Parliament has now clearly cast the net widely in terms of the broad definition of equity claims such that claims that might have previously escaped such characterization will now be caught by the CCAA.

[83] The claim of the Prestons is set out in their Statement of Claim. The claim is for the return of their capital investment under the redemption rights of the preferred shares. Their claim also included a claim to unpaid dividends, whether by cash payment or the issuance of other shares, being Class E common shares. It is clear that their claims, as evidenced by the Statement of Claim, fall within the definition of "equity claim" in subparas. (a)-(c).

[84] The Prestons do not dispute that their claim, as described and but for one qualification, would fall within the definition. They contend, however, that by reason of their obtaining default judgment against Gallowai, they have transformed their equity claim into a debt claim that is a provable claim in the CCAA proceeding.

(iv) The Effect of the Judgment

[85] The 2009 amendments have not affected the ability of the court to continue to analyze the substance of the claims, albeit in the context of the expanded definition of "equity claim". This is evident from the approach of the court in Nelson Financial Group at paras. 28 and 34.

[86] In Sino-Forest Corporation, the court found that certain Shareholder Claims for damages claimed in a class action lawsuit clearly fell within the definition of "equity claims": ONSC at para. 84. Further, certain Related Indemnity Claims were also advanced against the estate by the auditors who were named in the class action lawsuit. These auditors also faced claims for damages relating to their role in what were said to be misrepresentations in the financial statements that led to the loss of equity by the class members. Again, consistent with the historical approach of the courts, Morawetz J. focused on the "substance" of the claim: para. 85. He stated:

> [79] The plain language in the definition of "equity claim" does not focus on the identity of the claimant. Rather, it focuses on the nature of the claim. In this case, it seems clear that the Shareholder Claims led to the Related Indemnity Claims. Put another way, the inescapable conclusion is that the Related Indemnity Claims are being used to recover an equity investment.
> [80] The plain language of the CCAA dictates the outcome, namely, that the Shareholder Claims and the Related Indemnity Claims constitute "equity claims" within the meaning of the CCAA. This conclusion is consistent with the trend towards an expansive interpretation of the definition of "equity claims" to achieve the purpose of the CCAA.
>
> [82] It would be totally inconsistent to arrive at a conclusion that would enable either the auditors or the Underwriters, through a claim for indemnification, to be treated as creditors when the underlying actions of the shareholders cannot achieve the same status. To hold otherwise would indeed provide an indirect remedy where a direct remedy is not available.

The Court of Appeal upheld this approach: Sino-Forest Corporation (ONCA) at paras. 37, 58.

[87] I would note in this regard that the Claims Process Order expressly provided:

> THIS COURT ORDERS that the categorization of Claims into Trade Claims, non-voting Shares, and Voting Shares does not in any way set classes or categories for the purposes of priority or voting on a restructuring plan issued by the Creditors and shall not prejudice any party or the Petitioners from applying at a later date to set such classes or priorities in connection with voting on a plan;

[88] The Prestons argue that their obtaining of a judgment against Gallowai has resulted in a replacement or transformation of their equity claim with a debt claim.

[89] The Prestons place considerable reliance on the decision in I. Waxman & Sons Ltd. (Re), [2008] 89 O.R. (3d) 427 (S.C.), 40 C.B.R. (5th) 307, which was decided prior to the 2009 amendments to the CCAA. In that case, Morris sued I. Waxman & Sons Limited ("IWS") for lost profits, profit diversions and improper distributions for bonuses paid. He obtained judgment against IWS and asserted that claim in the later bankruptcy proceedings.

[90] The court began by noting that Morris' claim was not for his share of his current equity in IWS, but was, in substance, a claim related to dividends and diverted profits by way of bonuses. Justice Pepall found that the judgment was a debt claim:

> [24] There is support in the case law for the proposition that equity may become debt. For example, declared dividends are treated as constituting a debt that is provable in bankruptcy. As Laskin J.A. stated in Central Capital Corp. (Re), "It seems to me that these appellants must be either shareholders or creditors. Except for declared dividends, they cannot be both." And later, "Moreover, as Justice Finlayson points out in his reasons, courts have always accepted the proposition that when a dividend is declared, it is a debt on which each shareholder can sue the corporation." Similarly, in that same decision, Weiler J.A. stated, "As I understand it, counsel does not question that when a dividend has been lawfully declared by a corporation, it is a debt of the corporation and each shareholder is entitled to sue the corporation for his [portion]: see Fraser and Stewart, supra, at p. 220 for a list of authorities." In East Chilliwack Fruit Growers Co-operative (Re), the B.C. Court of Appeal held that an agricultural co-operative member who had exercised a right of redemption and remained only to be paid was an unsecured creditor with a provable debt. Declared bonuses may also sometimes constitute debt: Stuart v. Hamilton Jockey Club [footnotes omitted].
> [25] Secondly, the claims advanced by Morris are judgment debts. As stated by Weiler J.A. in Central Capital, ". . . in order to be a provable claim within the meaning of s.121 of the BIA, the claim must be one recoverable by legal process: Farm Credit Corp. v. Holowach (Trustee of)." Clearly a > judgment constitutes a claim recoverable by legal process. By virtue of the judgment, the money award becomes debt and it is properly the subject of a proof of claim in bankruptcy. In this regard, the facts in this case are unlike those in Re Blue Range Resource Corp. (Re), or National Bank of Canada v. Merit Energy Ltd. Those cases involved causes of action that had been asserted in court proceedings, but in neither case had judgment been rendered [footnotes omitted].

[91] In my view, Waxman is of little assistance to the Prestons.

[92] Firstly, the facts are distinguishable by reason of the fact that the Preston Claim is for recovery of their capital or equity, rather than simply a return on capital as was the case in Waxman. I would note that the Preston default judgment obtained in 2010 does include the dividend interest on the preferred shares. What is somewhat anomalous is that this was claimed in the alternative to the issuance of the Class E common shares. Even so, the Prestons in their Statement of Claim did advance a claim for 2,102 Class E common shares and continue to do so by their Proof of Claim, all consistent with what the petitioners had ascribed to them in the Creditor List. It is not clear to me how they can advance both claims.

[93] Secondly, in para. 24 of Waxman, the Court focused on the prevailing authority at the time prior to the amendments by which declared dividends were considered debt as opposed to equity. At present, the 2009 amendments make clear that this type of claim now clearly falls within the definition of “equity claim” in subpara. (a): CCAA, s.2(1).

[94] With respect to the comments of the Court in Waxman, para. 25, I agree with CuVeras that the Court was simply observing that a judgment debt will normally satisfy the requirements of the claim being recoverable by legal process, one of the requirements of a “provable claim”, as noted above. These comments do nothing more than note the obvious - that in ordinary circumstances, a judgment is a claim recoverable by legal process. I do not interpret these comments as obviating an analysis of the true nature of a claim, whether represented by a judgment or not.

[95] Accordingly, I do not view Waxman as standing for the proposition advanced by the Prestons, namely that a judgment transforms an equity claim into a debt claim such that no further analysis or characterization by the court is necessary. This would have applied even before the enactment of the 2009 amendments, but certainly is more evident now given the expansive definition now contained in the CCAA.

[96] Indeed, the later comments of Justice Pepall in Nelson Financial Group suggest that she only decided in Waxman that by reason of a judgment, an equity claim may become debt:

> [32] The substance of the arrangement between the preferred shareholders and Nelson was a relationship based on equity and not debt. Having said that, as I observed in I. Waxman & Sons. there is support in the case law for the proposition that equity may become debt. For instance, in that case, I held that a judgment obtained at the suit of a shareholder constituted debt. An analysis of the nature of the claims is therefore required. If the claims fall within the parameters of section 2 of the CCAA, clearly they are to be treated as equity claims and not as debt claims [footnotes omitted].

[97] The Court in Dexior Financial at para. 16 commented on Waxman but those comments were clearly obiter as no judgment had been obtained in that case. See also EarthFirst Canada at para. 4.

[98] At its core, the issue before the court is a narrow one - namely, whether a shareholder, having an equity claim but who obtains a judgment before the filing, has become a debt claimant rather than an equity claimant for the purposes of the insolvency proceeding? In my view, they do not, for the reasons below.

[99] In light of the dearth of authority on the issue, I consider that the court must start from first principles.

[100] I return to the comments in Century Services regarding the remedial purposes of the CCAA and the broad and flexible authority of this court to facilitate a restructuring that is fair, reasonable and equitable in accordance with either the express will of Parliament, as specifically dictated in the CCAA, or as might be reasonably interpreted as falling within those broad purposes.

[101] At its core, the policy objectives of the CCAA are a fair and efficient resolution of competing claims in a situation (insolvency) where all obligations or expectations cannot be fulfilled. What is "fair" is a flexible or uncertain concept and needless to say, what is fair will likely be differently interpreted depending on which stakeholder you ask. Nevertheless, Parliament has clearly signalled that the policy objectives continue to be that equity will take a back seat in terms of any recovery where there are outstanding debt claims. This was so before September 2009 and is even more decidedly so now, given the express and expansive statutory treatment of equity claims that now applies.

[102] In my view, the characterization of claims by the court continues to have an important role in fulfilling that purpose. I have already outlined the considerable authority from Canadian courts in respect of such claims, both pre- and post-amendments. Particularly, the court continues to have a role in applying these new equity claims provisions by considering the true nature or substance of those claims. In many cases, the matter is now considerably clearer given the definition of "equity claims". What is most important, however, is that form will still not trump substance in the consideration of this issue.

[103] As was noted by counsel for CuVeras, the obtaining of a judgment does not necessarily mean that it will be recognized as a debt for the purpose of an insolvency proceeding. There are many provisions of the BIA and CCAA which allow for the challenge of certain pre-filing transactions or events that may be the basis for supposed rights in the proceeding. For example, the payment of a dividend and redemption of shares may be attacked (BIA, s. 101). Another example is that either the granting of a judgment against the debtor or payment of monies such as redemption amounts that resulted in a preference being obtained may be challenged (BIA, s. 95). Both of these provisions apply in a CCAA proceeding: CCAA, s 36.1.

[104] These types of provisions reflect the policy choices of Parliament in terms of allowing for the recovery of assets transferred away from the debtor even before the filing so that those assets are brought back into the estate for the benefit of the entire stakeholder group to be distributed in accordance with the legislation. Similarly, some established rights may be challenged in certain circumstances (such as by way of the preference provisions).

[105] In the same manner, the new equity provisions in the CCAA reinforce that it remains an important policy objective that equity claims be subordinated to debt claims. In Sino-Forest Corporation, the Court of Appeal focused on the purpose of the 2009 amendments and stated:

> [56] In our view, in enacting s. 6(8) of the CCAA, Parliament intended that a monetary loss suffered by a shareholder (or other holder of an equity interest) in respect of his or her equity interest not diminish the assets of the debtor available to general creditors in a restructuring. If a shareholder sues auditors and underwriters in respect of his or her loss, in addition to the debtor, and the auditors or underwriters assert claims of contribution or indemnity against the debtor, the assets of the debtor available to general creditors would be diminished by the amount of the claims for contribution and indemnity.

[106] This same recognition of the sound policy objectives of insolvency legislation was noted by Laskin J.A. in Central Capital (ONCA). He commented at 546 that "[p]ermitting preferred shareholders to be turned into creditors by endowing their shares with retraction rights runs contrary to this policy of creditor protection."

[107] I see no principled basis upon which a different approach should be taken in respect of an equity claimant who has had the foresight, energy or just plain luck to seek and obtain a judgment prior to the filing date.

[108] Some arguments were advanced by CuVeras and the Prestons as to the timing of the judgment. Indeed, the Preston judgment was obtained well in advance of the filing, by some six months. The Prestons cite Blue Range at para. 38 in respect of the importance of timing. However, the timing issue there was the filing of the insolvency proceeding, not the granting of a judgment. I agree that the filing of the proceeding is a significant crystallizing event, however, what is important in this case is the ability of the court to analyze the true nature of the claim. Further, whether a judgment is obtained on the eve of the filing or even years before, I consider that it is a distinction without a difference in terms of the court's role in ensuring that a proper characterizing of the claim has taken place in accordance with the CCAA.

[109] The fact remains that there are thousands of other preferred shareholders holding shares in Bul River and Gallowai whose claims are in essence the same - namely, for a return of their capital and the promised return on that capital (and perhaps other damage claims). The evidence indicates that many of them had also made demand for a return of their preferred share investments and their return on capital well before the filing date. Those claims are clearly equity claims. From the perspective of the policy objective of treating similar claims in a similar fashion (i.e., fairness), it makes little sense to me that a similarly situated preferred shareholder without a judgment should be treated differently than one who does.

[110] Nor does it accord with the policy objectives particularly identified in s. 6(8) of the CCAA that by the simple mechanism of obtaining a judgment an equity claimant should be elevated to a debt claimant which would inevitably diminish the recovery of other "true" debt claimants.

[111] The Prestons argue that this will open the floodgates to an endless analysis of claims reduced to judgments resulting in increased cost and inefficiencies in these types of proceedings. I see no merit in this submission given that this decision relates to only equity claims and by no stretch of the imagination has the previous litigation on the point overwhelmed the court system across Canada. In any event, if that is the will of Parliament, then there is little ability in this court to take a different approach.

[112] The courts have not been hesitant in preventing claimants from recharacterizing their claims such that an equity claim is indirectly advanced where no direct claim could be made: Sino-Forest Corporation, ONSC at para. 84 (although the Court of Appeal preferred to express the same sentiment in terms of the purpose of the CCAA). In Return on Innovation, Newbould J. stated, consistent with the "substance over form" approach that the court's decision will not be driven by the form of the legal action:

> [59] The Claimants assert that the claim for US $50 million by TA Associates cannot be an equity claim because it is based on breaches of contract, torts and equity. I do not see that as being the deciding factor. TA Associates seeks the return of its US $50 million equity investment because of various wrongdoings alleged against the Claimants and the fact that the claim is based on these causes of action does not make it any less a claim in equity. The legal tools that are used [are] not the important thing. It is the fact that they are being used to recover an equity investment that is important.

[113] Similarly, in addition to the "legal tools" not being determinative, neither are the legal forms of recovery determinative, such as the obtaining of a judgment.

[114] In summary, the CCAA policy objectives in relation to equity claims are clear. In my view, those objectives are best achieved by the continued approach of the court, both pre- and post-CCAA amendments, to consider the substance or true nature of the claim. This accords with the ongoing supervisory jurisdiction of the court to exercise its statutory discretion to achieve the purposes of the CCAA. In particular, the court's fundamental role is to facilitate a restructuring that is fair and reasonable to all stakeholders in accordance with the now very clearly stated objective of allowing recovery to debt claimants before any recovery of equity claims. Section 6(8) reflects that the court has no ability to proceed otherwise.

[115] Within those broad objectives, in my view, it is of no importance that prior to the court filing, a claimant with an equity claim has obtained a judgment. That judgment still, in substance, reflects a recovery of that equity claim and therefore, the claim comes within the broad and expansive definition in the CCAA. Accordingly, for the purposes of the CCAA, that claim or judgment must still, of necessity, bear that characterization in terms of any recovery sought within this proceeding. I conclude that any contrary interpretation, such as advanced by the Prestons, would result in the clear policy objectives under the CCAA being defeated.

[116] Nor I do not accept that, as argued by the Prestons, applying this characterization amounts to a collateral attack or an "undoing" of the judgment from the Alberta court. As noted by CuVeras, the obtaining of a judgment by a creditor does not mean that insolvency laws do not apply to it. Judgments are affected by insolvency proceedings all the time. Recoveries of judgments are stayed by such proceedings and as stated above, they can be attacked as fraudulent preferences. All that results from my conclusions is that notwithstanding the granting of the judgment, within these CCAA proceedings, the judgment is to be characterized in accordance with the true nature of the underlying claim, which is an equity claim.

[117] For the above reasons, I conclude that the Preston Claim is an equity claim within the meaning of the CCAA.

(b) The Stafford Claim

[118] The Stafford Claim is advanced as a debt claim in these proceedings. That position is disputed by CuVeras who contends that, in fact, it is a claim owed by Stanfield personally and not by either Bul River or Gallowai such that it cannot be advanced in this CCAA proceeding.

(i) The Proof of Claim

[119] The Creditor List referenced Mr. Stafford as holding Class B common shares (3,340), Class D preferred shares (4,200) and Class E preferred shares (17,548). He therefore received a Claims Package from the petitioners.

[120] Mr. Stafford took no issue with the shareholdings alleged to be held by him in accordance with the Creditor List. However, on October 14, 2011, a Notice of Dispute and Proof of Claim were submitted on behalf of Mr. Stafford. This was done by Carol Morrison, who was exercising a power of attorney for Mr. Stafford by reason of his mental and physical incapacity that occurred at least as early as November 2010.

[121] The Notice of Dispute refers to “claim not listed” as the “reason for dispute”. The Proof of Claim submitted by Mr. Stafford notes the “type of claim” as “other – loan and accrued interest 50% Bul River Mineral Corp. and 50% Gallowai Metal Mining Corp.” The Stafford Claim submitted is for outstanding principal and interest under a loan in the total amount of $2,587,174.

[122] The supporting documentation submitted for Mr. Stafford includes a copy of a loan agreement between Stanfield in his personal capacity, as borrower, and Mr. Stafford, as lender, dated June 12, 1990, 21 years before the CCAA filing (the "Stafford Loan Agreement"). The Stafford Loan Agreement references a loan in the principal amount of $150,000, accruing interest in the amount of 20% per annum "on the Principal", calculated yearly and not in advance.

[123] Pursuant to the terms of the Stafford Loan Agreement, Stanfield borrowed these funds for the purpose of "investing the funds in the costs of the ongoing research and development of a Process" with "Process" being defined as a "new improved method or process for extracting precious metals from ore". Paragraphs 6 and 8 of the Stafford Loan Agreement provided for a bonus payable to Mr. Stafford equal to the amount of the Principal, if the "Process" proved successful (as declared by an independent metallurgical consultant). As CuVeras submits, on its face, this was not a loan directly related to the mine or the petitioners.

(ii) Dealings in Respect of the Stafford Loan Agreement

[124] For obvious reasons, the death of Ross Stanfield and the incapacity of Mr. Stafford result in a situation where no individual is in a position to shed light on the intentions of the parties in relation to this loan. Mr. Hewison is similarly unable to provide any evidence about the loan, save for referring to such documents as have been found in relation to this loan. Those documents do provide some indication as to the how Stanfield, Bul River and Gallowai addressed this loan up to the time of the CCAA filing.

[125] There are two resolutions of the directors of Bul River, dated October 1994 and February 1996 respectively, that are essentially the same. Both refer to the "need of major amounts of additional financing" and authorize Stanfield to negotiate, on behalf of Bul River, potential sources of debt or equity financing, to settle the terms of the financing, and to sign, seal and deliver any agreements necessary to secure funding required by the company. I agree that these resolutions on their face clearly do not authorize Stanfield to act as an agent for Bul River. They merely authorize him to act directly in the name of the company with the company as principal in respect to those transactions. These resolutions also do not reference any loan by Mr. Stafford to Stanfield made years before in June 1990.

[126] Bul River also appears to have prepared a schedule of loan payments as of December 31, 2006. That schedule shows payment of interest to Mr. Stafford by Stanfield personally from June 1995 to September 1998 totalling approximately $183,000. In 1999 and 2000, Gallowai appears to have made interest payments of $40,000 and from that time forward, some person (unidentified) made interest payments of $25,000 for 2001 and 2002. From 2004 to 2006, it appears that Bul River made interest payments of $22,500 and principal payments of $26,000 to Mr. Stafford. Mr. Stafford's own calculations show further payments of interest from 2007 to 2009 totalling $58,000.

[127] Accordingly, in respect of his $150,000 loan, as of 2009, Mr. Stafford had received $328,100 in interest payments and $26,000 in principal payments for a total recovery of $354,100.

[128] Leaving aside the interest and principal payments referred to above, the involvement of Bul River and Gallowai in respect of the Stafford Loan Agreement arose, from a corporate perspective, in 2003. At that time, various resolutions were passed by the directors of Bul River. Mr. Stafford places great reliance on these resolutions and as will become apparent from the discussion below, the issue largely turns on the legal effect of these resolutions. As such, I will describe the resolutions in some detail.

[129] The first resolution is dated May 13, 2003. It provides:

>
> A. Loans, loan repayments and principal and interest payments which were property for the benefit of, or were the responsibility of, the Company have for some years been done, as a matter of convenience, in the name of the Company's President, [Stanfield] - and as a result debit and credit entries have improperly been posted to Stanfield's Shareholder Loan Account.
> B. Stanfield has requested that the situation described above be corrected…

> C. The Companies' accountant has examined the financial records and has verified that the said situation has occurred with respect to the Company as well as Gallowai…
>
> D. Management has proposed, based on professional advice, that for convenience and simplicity the various Loan Accounts involving Stanfield, the Company and the Other Companies be consolidated in the books of the Company.
>
>
> NOW THEREFORE, IT IS RESOLVED:
>
> 1. THAT the Loan Accounts and payments referred to above be recognized as solely the responsibility of the Company and it be confirmed that Stanfield was, in being named in the transactions, acting solely on behalf of the Company and that he had no personal, legal or beneficial interest in, or any liabilities as a result of, any of the transactions.
>
> 2. THAT the Agreement dated this May 13, 2003 between the Company, Stanfield and the Other Companies be approved and that Stanfield or any other officer or director of the Company be authorized to sign and deliver it on behalf of the Company.
> 3. THAT the Company assume the obligations of the Other Companies to Stanfield pursuant to the shareholder account in their records, to be offset by inter-company accounts whereby each of the Other Companies will be indebted to the Company for the amount of shareholders accounts assumed by the Company.

[130] The second resolution of Bul River is dated October 20, 2003 and relates to the May 2003 resolution. The resolution references that Stanfield is having difficulty providing full documentary verification and back-up for his expenditures for which he was requesting reimbursement. In addition, the preamble to the resolution states in part:

> D. Acceptance of liability to Stanfield at this date poses some special problems due to the fact that some of the disbursements that he has requested to be reimbursed for precede the last date that the financial statements of the company were audited – and such statements did not include the expenditures.

Concern was expressed whether or not the acceptance of these responsibilities would be acceptable to Bul River's auditors. The resolution authorizes the engagement of the auditors for the purpose of conducting a special audit of the expenditures made by Stanfield. There is no evidence as to the result of that special audit or if it even took place.

[131] The third resolution of Bul River is dated November 30, 2003 and is of particular significance. It reads as follows:

> WHEREAS:
>
> A. Ross Stanfield …has submitted various claims for recognition of corporate liabilities to third parties ... as shareholder's loans for transactions undertaken as agent on behalf of the Company, Gallowai … to finance the exploration of the British Columbia properties owned by the Companies ("Properties").
>
> B. Stanfield and the Companies signed an Agreement dated May 13, 2003 recognizing the fact that Stanfield has acted as agent on behalf of the Companies since 1972 and had personally undertaken a variety of transactions as agent for the Companies to finance the exploration of the Properties.
>
> C. Stanfield has submitted the following claims pursuant to the Agreement for the Director's consideration and approval.
>
> 1. Exploration Loans
>
> These loans were negotiated between 1983 and 2002 personally by Stanfield, as the agent of the Company, and all funds were advanced to the Companies as shareholders loans from him. Payments were made on the loans with his own personal funds or shareholdings. The Directors were provided with a summary of individual loans and accrued interest for review. Files have been prepared for corporate record keeping purposes that include the documentation and amortization schedules supporting each loan.
>
> Balances as at December 31, 2002
>
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | Loan principal | $1,886,413 |
> | Accrued interest | $6,281,004 |
>
> NOW THEREFORE, the undersigned acting as a group excluding … [Stanfield], RESOLVE:
>
> 1. THAT the loans, accrued interest and share subscriptions detailed in paragraph C.1 above, negotiated by Stanfield as agent on behalf of the Companies, be accepted as liabilities of the Companies.
>
> 3. THAT the resolution passed by the full Board dated May 13, 2003 that the Company accept all of the above described liabilities on behalf of the other Companies – to be offset by inter-company accounts whereby each of the other Companies will be indebted to the Company for the amounts assumed by the Company – be further approved and ratified.

[132] It should be noted that the agreement between Stanfield and Bul River (and perhaps others) dated May 13, 2003 has not been located. Nor have any similar resolutions from the directors of Gallowai been found.

[133] In addition, no one has been able to locate a copy of the summary of the loans as of December 2002 referred to in paragraph C.1 of the November 2003 resolution. Mr. Hewison refers in his evidence to a spreadsheet in the name of Bul River referencing "Mine Development Loans" for the year ended December 2003 which indicates a loan from Mr. Stafford of $150,000 with accrued interest of $899,236.39. The total interest figure for all loans is slightly different (lower) than the interest amount referenced in the November 2003 resolution which was as of December 31, 2002. In any event, CuVeras does not dispute that Mr. Stafford would likely have been on the list referred to in the November 2003 resolution.

[134] No audited financial statements have been produced pre-2003, as might have been amended arising from the special audit authorized in October 2003.

[135] Also in evidence are various letters from Bul River to Mr. Stafford concerning these loans.

[136] On April 23, 2007, a letter was sent to Mr. Stafford's accountant enclosing various amended 2006 T5 (Statement of Investment Income) forms or slips that were apparently issued to Mr. Stafford by Gallowai and Bul River, each as to 50% of interest paid or payable pursuant to the Stafford Loan Agreement. The letter indicates that as of 2006, the amount of such interest was just over $1.5 million (which included the $150,000 bonus amount supposedly due pursuant to the Stafford Loan Agreement).

[137] On March 6, 2008, Mr. Stafford received correspondence from Bul River's controller concerning the 2006 T5s slips from Bul River and Gallowai. Later letters from the controller dated April 2, 2008, February 12, 2009 and January 19, 2010 refer to T5 slips being issued by Bul River and Gallowai for 2007, 2008 and 2009 relating to accrued interest on the Stafford Loan Agreement. Finally, T5 slips for 2010 appear to have been issued by Bul River and Gallowai for that taxation year.

[138] There is no evidence that Mr. Stafford knew anything about the 2003 resolutions by Bul River. It does appear to be the case that he began receiving interest payments from Gallowai in 1999 and these would continue together with the payment of some principal by either Gallowai or Bul River to 2009. Bul River would also later send Mr. Stafford, commencing in 2007 and continuing to 2010, certain details or statements relating to the loan and the T5 slips.

(iii) Legal Basis for the Stafford Claim

[139] For the reasons set out below, CuVeras submits that the Stafford Claim is not a debt claim against Bul River and Gallowai and ought to be expunged from the Creditor List. CuVeras argues that Mr. Stafford cannot satisfy the onus placed upon him to prove his claim against those petitioners.

[140] At the outset, it is clear that Mr. Stafford advanced his loan to Stanfield personally, and not to either Bul River or Gallowai. The 2003 resolutions confirm that such was the case and, indeed, the amounts were noted in the books of Bul River and Gallowai as shareholder loans owing to Stanfield personally in that respect.

[141] CuVeras made substantial arguments on the later involvement of Bul River and Gallowai in terms of whether those petitioners became the principal obligants under the Stafford Loan Agreement. These arguments related to whether or not there had been a valid assignment of the Stafford Loan Agreement from Stanfield to Bul River and Gallowai. While Mr. Stafford agreed with these submissions, it is helpful to set out these issues and arguments in order to put in focus the later arguments of Mr. Stafford (which are contested by CuVeras).

[142] I agree that there is no basis upon which Mr. Stafford can contend that Stanfield assigned the Stafford Loan Agreement to Bul River and Gallowai. There is no evidence that Gallowai agreed to anything, since the resolutions were only that of Bul River's directors.

[143] Even assuming that the November 2003 resolution was intended to effect a valid assignment of the obligations under the Stafford Loan Agreement from Stanfield to Bul River and Gallowai, it is of no legal effect in that it purports to assign the burden of Stanfield's obligations to Bul River and Gallowai. It is trite law that neither the common law nor equity has ever permitted a debtor to unilaterally assign the burdens or obligations (as opposed to the benefits) of a contract to a third party without the consent of the creditor. Rather, in that case a novation is required: Mills v. Triple Five Corp. 1992 CanLII 6204 (Alta. Q. B.) at paras. 13-14, [1992] 136 A.R. 67.

[144] Novation involves the substitution of a new contract or obligation for an old one which is thereby extinguished: Royal Bank of Canada v. Netupsky, 1999 BCCA 561. In Netupsky at paras. 11-13, the court set out the essential elements that must be established to satisfy the test to establish novation:

> 1. the new debtor must assume complete liability for the debt;
>
> 2. the creditor must accept the new debtor as a principal debtor, and not merely as an agent or guarantor; and
> 3. the creditor must accept the new contract in full satisfaction and substitution for the old contract.

[145] Mr. Stafford bears the burden of proving novation which the Court in Netupsky described as a "heavy onus". Further, while the courts may look at the surrounding circumstances, including the conduct of the parties, they will not infer that a novation has occurred in the face of ambiguous evidence as to the parties' intention to effect a new agreement with the substituted party.

[146] As is noted by CuVeras, it is somewhat ironic to suppose that Mr. Stafford might have advanced this issue since he is the creditor and as noted in Netupsky, it is usually the "unwilling creditor" who is objecting to any suggestion of a novation. In any event, in this case there is no evidence to suggest that:

a) Mr. Stafford had any knowledge of the 2003 resolutions or was in any other way even advised by Stanfield, Bul River or Gallowai that it was intended that Bul River and Gallowai would assume the obligations under the Stafford Loan Agreement in place of Stanfield; and

b) Stanfield, Bul River, Gallowai and Mr. Stafford reached a consensus with respect to the terms upon which any purported new or substituted agreement would operate.

[147] Accordingly, it is clear, as agreed by CuVeras and Mr. Stafford, that novation did not occur such that Bul River and Gallowai assumed the obligations of Stanfield under the Stafford Loan Agreement with the consensus of Mr. Stafford. In addition, no privity of contract arose simply by reason of later payments to Mr. Stafford or issuance of T5 slips by Bul River and Gallowai. That Mr. Stafford was not directly involved in any such new contractual arrangements and that he only later "assumed" that Bul River and Gallowai were involved is made evident by his own loan summary attached to his Proof of Claim:

> Commencing in 2006, T5 slips were issued by Bul River Mineral Corporation and Gallowai Metal Mining Corporation (50% each). Assumption is therefore that ½ of Grand Total is receivable from each.
> [Emphasis added].

[148] Nor is there any suggestion that Bul River or Gallowai provided a guarantee of the Stafford Loan Agreement to Mr. Stafford. Finally, Mr. Stafford does not argue that Bul River and Gallowai are somehow estopped from denying that they are debtors of Mr. Stafford, particularly by reason of the interest and principal payments made by them and the T5 slips prepared by them which were then forwarded to Mr. Stafford.

[149] Having confirmed the agreement of CuVeras and Mr. Stafford on the above issues, I turn to Mr. Stafford's position, which is solely rooted in agency:

> The corporate minutes of Bul River Mineral Corporation confirm that the actions of Ross Hale Stanfield were as agent for the company and associated companies and confirmed by resolution to accept liability of agreements signed by Stanfield as legitimate debts of a company and acted on it accordingly[.]

[150] Essentially, Mr. Stafford's argument is that Stanfield was retroactively appointed as the agent of Bul River and Gallowai by reason of the November 2003 resolution such that he had the express or implied authority to bind Bul River and Gallowai at the time of the loan. He relies in particular on s. 193(2) and (4) of the Business Corporations Act, S.B.C. 2002, c. 57:

> 193 (2) A contract that, if made between individuals, would, by law, be required to be in writing and signed by the parties to be charged, may be made for a company in writing signed by a person acting under the express or implied authority of the company and may, in the same manner, be varied or discharged.
> (4) A contract made according to this section is effectual in law and binds the company and all other parties to it.

[151] It seems to be common ground that Stanfield was not acting as the agent of Bul River and Gallowai in 1990 when the loan was made. The Stafford Loan Agreement does not reference Stanfield acting as an agent and the Proof of Claim does not allege an agency relationship at the time of the Stafford Loan Agreement. Nor was Stanfield acting as the agent of Bul River and Gallowai during the ensuing 13 years when the loan was being administered. The allegation is that changes only occurred in 2003 when Stanfield decided he wanted to be reimbursed by Bul River and Gallowai for certain loans he had earlier made.

[152] I was referred to only one authority on the agency issue by CuVeras, being Spidell v. LaHave Equipment Ltd., 2014 NSSC 255.

[153] In Spidell, LaHave Equipment Ltd. was a dealer for Case Canada Limited. The plaintiff Spidell purchased a Case Canada excavator from LeHave which was financed by Case Credit Limited. Spidell alleged that employees of LaHave made representations to him about the performance of the equipment. Spidell believed LaHave was a representative or agent or dealer for Case Canada. Spidell did not make the required payments to Case Credit and the equipment was repossessed. Spidell sued LaHave claiming damages for alleged misrepresentations. LaHave defended the action but subsequently went into bankruptcy. Only then did Spidell amend his pleading to add Case Credit and Case Canada as defendants, claiming LaHave was their agent. The issue on the summary trial was whether LaHave was in fact the agent of the Case companies.

[154] Mr. Justice Coughlan reviewed the law of agency, as follows:

> [21] In Halsbury's Laws of Canada First Edition, "Agency" paragraph HAY-2 the three essential ingredients of an agency relationship are:
>
> "1. The consent of both the principal and the agent.
>
> 2. Authority given to the agent by the principal, allowing the former to affect the latter's legal position.
>
> 3. The principal's control of the agent's actions."
>
> And at Agency paragraph HAY -11 the manner in which an agency relationship may be created are set out:
>
> "1. the express or implied consent of principal and agent,
>
> 2. by implication of law from the conduct or situation of the parties or from the necessities of the case,
>
> 3. by subsequent ratification by the principal of the agent's act done on the principal's behalf, whether the person doing the act was an agent exceeding his authority or was a person having no authority to act for the principal at all,
>
> 4. by estoppel, or
>
> 5. by operation of the principles of law."
>
> [Emphasis added].

[155] Mr. Stafford relies in particular on the creation of agency by ratification as referred to above. Justice Coughlan said this about agency by ratification:

> [25] The conditions for an agency by ratification to be established were set out in Halsbury's Laws of Canada, supra, at Agency HAY-22 as follows:
> "Three Conditions. Actions by a principal after the agent has purported to act on the principal's behalf may amount to creation of agency by ratification. For this to occur, three conditions must be satisfied. First, the agent whose act is sought to be ratified must have purported to act for the principal; second, at the time the act was done the agent must have had a competent principal; and third, at the time of the ratification the principal must be legally capable of doing the act himself.["]

[156] The key consideration from the above quote is the first requirement. In this case, there is no evidence that Stanfield "purported to act" for Bul River and Gallowai as principals in 1990 when he entered into the Stafford Loan Agreement. In fact, the evidence is to the contrary in that he acted in his personal capacity and not as agent.

[157] I agree with CuVeras that agency by ratification assumes that there exists a relationship (even though perhaps mistaken) between the principal and agent at the time of the transaction which must later be ratified. One example is as noted in the Halsbury's quote above, namely where the agent exceeded his or his authority but later the unauthorized transaction is ratified or adopted by the principal. That is not what occurred in this case. Ratification of an agent's actions in that case cannot occur when no agency relationship existed in the first place. The second example of ratification described in Halsbury's (where the person had no authority to act but their actions were later ratified) still requires that the actions be done by the agent "on the principal's behalf" in purported furtherance of an agency relationship.

[158] Accordingly, the concept of ratification by Bul River and Gallowai of Stanfield's actions concerning the Stafford Loan Agreement as their agent has no application in this case.

[159] What occurred in this case is that many years later, in 2003, Stanfield, Bul River and Gallowai agreed that the companies would take over responsibility for payment of the Stafford Loan Agreement in place of Stanfield. But those arrangements were only between Bul River, Gallowai and Stanfield and not Mr. Stafford.

[160] Accordingly, we start from the proposition that there was no agency relationship between Stanfield and Bul River and Gallowai in 1990. The only parties to the Stafford Loan Agreement are Stanfield and Mr. Stafford.

[161] The only evidence suggesting any link between Mr. Stafford and Bul River and Gallowai arise from the fact that, commencing in April 2007, Mr. Stafford began to receive T5 slips from them. Payments were also made by Bul River and Gallowai commencing in 1999. Mr. Stafford argues that by reason of such actions, Bul River and Gallowai treated the Stafford Loan Agreement as their debt since they could not have issued T5 slips for someone else's debt. The 2003 resolutions are, of course, an internal document of Bul River but do indicate that Bul River at least intended to accept the Stafford Loan Agreement as its obligation. The basis upon which Bul River was able to accept this obligation on behalf of Gallowai is unclear and not substantiated.

[162] Mr. Stafford argues that these events confirm that Bul River and Gallowai had assumed the obligations of Stanfield. But this argument brings us back to the legal bases for any liability on the part of Bul River and Gallowai that CuVeras raised and I discussed above (assignment, novation, guarantee and estoppel) and which arguments Mr. Stafford agreed did not apply.

[163] I agree with the submissions of CuVeras that these later actions of Bul River and Gallowai evidence an intention on the part of Bul River (and perhaps Gallowai) to take over or assume payment of the obligations of Stanfield under the Stafford Loan Agreement. In that sense, and without a novation, in substance these arrangements amount to Bul River and Gallowai agreeing to indemnify Stanfield in respect of his obligations to pay the Stafford Loan Agreement amounts and nothing more.

[164] I conclude that Mr. Stafford has not met the onus of proving that the amounts under the Stafford Loan Agreement are obligations or "provable debts" of Bul River and Gallowai.

[165] Both CuVeras and Mr. Stafford made submissions concerning the issue as to whether the Stafford Loan Agreement provided for compound interest or not. In light of my conclusions above, it is not necessary to address that issue.

Conclusion

[166] In accordance with the above reasons, the Court declares that:

a) the Preston Claim is an equity claim for the purposes of this CCAA proceeding; and

b) the Stafford Claim is not a debt claim as against Bul River and Gallowai. It follows that the Creditor List should be amended accordingly and that > Mr. Stafford is not entitled to vote on or receive any distribution under any plan of arrangement as may subsequently be filed by those petitioners.

[167] If any party is seeking costs, then written submissions should be delivered to the court and the party against whom costs are sought within 30 days of delivery of these reasons. Any response shall be delivered within 15 days and any reply to that response shall be delivered with seven days of that date.

[1] This is a motion brought by BDO Canada Limited in its capacity as the Court-appointed Monitor of Gandi Innovations Limited, Gandi Innovations Holdings LLC, Gandi Innovations LLC, Gandi Innovations Hold Co, and Gandi Special Holdings LLC (the "Gandi Group") for advice and directions, and particularly to determine preliminary issues in connection with the indemnity claims made by Hary Gandy, James Gandy and Trent Garmoe (the “Claimants”) against all of the Gandi Group.

[2] The Gandi Group is under CCAA protection. The Monitor was appointed in the Initial Order on May 8, 2009.

[3] The business and assets of the Gandi Group have been sold with court approval. The proceeds from the sale are being held by the Monitor for eventual distribution to unsecured creditors pursuant to a plan of compromise and arrangement.

Arbitration proceedings and indemnity claims

[4] Gandi Innovations Holdings LLC ("Gandi Holdings") was incorporated pursuant to the laws of the State of Delaware on August 24, 2007. On September 12, 2007, the Gandi Group re-organized their business structure so that Gandi Holdings became the direct or indirect parent of the other various entities comprising the Gandi Group.

[5] TA Associates Inc. is a general partner for a number of TA partners. In conjunction with the reorganization of Gandi Holdings, it advanced approximately US $75 million on September 12, 2007 by way of debt and equity to the Gandi Group. The advance consisted of:

> (i) an equity investment in the amount of US $50 million made pursuant to the terms of a Membership Interest Purchase Agreement in respect of Gandi Holdings dated as of September 12, 2007 made between, among others, Gandi Holdings, TA Associates and the Claimants in their personal capacities; and
> (ii) an unsecured loan in the amount of US $25 million which amount was guaranteed by other members of the Gandi Group.

[6] In January 2009, TA Associates commenced an arbitration proceeding against the Claimants. In the arbitration TA Associates claim damages against the Claimants in an amount of US $75 million with interest, being the total amount of TA Associates’ investment in the Gandi Group. The arbitration has not yet been heard on its merits.

[7] On December 20, 2010, the Monitor received proofs of claim of Hary Gandy and James Gandy against the Gandi Group in the approximate amount of $76 million and a proof of claim of Trent Garmoe against the Gandi Group in an approximate amount of $88 million. The Claimants assert an entitlement to indemnification by the Gandi Group in respect of any award of damages which may be made against them in the arbitration together with all legal fees incurred by the Claimants in defending the arbitration.

[8] The proofs of claim filed by the Claimants rely on indemnity provisions set out in the Amended and Restated Limited Liability Company Agreement of Gandi Holdings and a separate Indemnification Agreement made by Gandi Holdings entered into in connection with the Membership Agreement made at the time of the TA Associates investment with Gandi Holdings. Gandi Holdings is the only Gandi entity that is a party to these indemnity agreements.

[9] On March 11, 2011 the Monitor disallowed the indemnity claims and advised the Claimants that based on the evidence filed in support of the indemnity claims, any indemnity claim would be solely against Gandi Holdings.

[10] The Claimants have served notices of dispute and have provided to the Monitor a memorandum of articles of Association of Gandi Canada which provides an indemnity in favour of directors and officers of Gandi Canada in certain circumstances.

[11] There is also an indemnity of Gandi Innovations Hold Co ("Gandi Hold Co"). At the relevant times James Gandy was the sole director of the company.

[12] There has been an extensive search for corporate documents. The Monitor made inquiries of Jaffe Raitt Heuer & Weiss Inc., former corporate counsel of the Gandi Group, and learned that all of corporate governance documents of the Gandi Group, at Hary Gandy’s request, had been sent to Stikeman Elliot LLP, insolvency counsel for the Gandi Group, following the CCAA filing date. Counsel for the Monitor attended at the offices of Stikeman Elliott and reviewed the corporate governance documents in its possession.

[13] In addition the Monitor contacted counsel for Agfa, the purchaser of the assets of the Gandi Group, to inquire if it has in its possession copies of the Gandi Group's corporate governance records. The Monitor was advised by counsel for Agfa that Agfa was not able to find any corporate governance documents of the Gandi Group entities.

[14] The Monitor also reviewed the books and records of the Gandi Group in storage. In addition, the Monitor advised the Claimants that should they wish to undertake a review of the Gandi Group's records in storage, the Claimants were invited to contact the Monitor and arrange for such review. The review was arranged and conducted by the Claimants on June 3, 2011.

[15] It is a fact that there are not in existence documents that support the Claimants all being entitled to indemnities from each corporate entity in the Gaudi Group.

Issues

[16] Whether the Claimants will ever be with held liable in the arbitration is not yet known. However, whether the Claimants have rights to indemnification against all of the Gandi Group or against only Gandi Holdings and Gandi Hold Co will assist the Monitor in determining whether to proceed with a consolidated plan of arrangement or file an alternative plan excluding Gandi Holdings and/or Gandi Hold Co which would enable the Monitor to make a meaningful distribution to unsecured creditors prior to the completion of the arbitration.

[17] There is another preliminary issue. In the arbitration, TA Associates seeks to recover against the Claimants their equity investment of US $50 million, for which the Claimants in turn have sought indemnification from the Gandi Group. The Monitor seeks a preliminary determination as to whether these claims for indemnification relating to the claim by TA Associates for its equity investment constitute "equity claims" under the CCAA. A determination of this issue will assist the Monitor in determining the maximum amount which can be claimed by the Claimants and may facilitate an earlier distribution of funds available to unsecured creditors.

Discussion

(a) Indemnity agreements

[18] An Amended and Restated Limited Liability Company Agreement of Gandi Holdings dated September 12, 2007 provides for an indemnity by Gandi Holdings in section 6.8(a) for board members and officers. There is no dispute that the Claimants were officers and board members of Gandi Holdings. It also contains in section 7.6 an indemnity for Members as follows:

> (a) Without limitation of any other provision of this Agreement executed in connection herewith, the Company agrees to defend, indemnify and hold each Member, its affiliates and their respective direct and indirect partners (including partners of partners and stockholders and members of partners), members, stockholders, directors, officers, employees and agents and each person who controls any of them…

[19] Superwide Limited Partnership is a Member and the Claimants are partners of Superwide. Thus the Claimants are indemnified by Gandi Holdings by that provision as well.

[20] There is a form on indemnity agreement made between Gandi Holdings and indemnitees. The form in the record is an unsigned copy dated September 11, 2007. Neither the monitor nor any of the parties have been able to locate any of these agreements signed in favour of the Claimants. Hary Gandi, who swore an affidavit for the Claimants, said that a copy of this agreement was signed between Gandi Holdings and each of the Claimants on September 12, 2007. It contains the following:

> WHEREAS, the Company desires to provide Indemnitee with specific contractual assurance of Indemnitee's rights to full indemnification against litigation risks and related expenses (regardless, among other things, of any amendment to or revocation of the Company's LLC Agreement or any change in the ownership of the Company or the composition of its Board of Managers) . . .
> 3. Agreement to indemnify… if Indemnitee was or is a party or is threatened to be made a party to any Proceeding by reason of Indemnitee's Corporate Status, Indemnitee shall be indemnified by the Company against all Expenses and Liabilities incurred . . . ."

[21] Assuming that this form of indemnity agreement was signed by Gandi Holdings and the Claimants, they would be covered by it.

[22] The Claimants contend that each of the corporate entities in the Gandi Group signed an indemnity in favour of each of them. This is based on a statement in the affidavit of Hary Gandy that Gandi Holdings and the other CCAA Respondents provided additional indemnities to him, James Gandy and Trent Garmoe dated September 12, 2007. He attached to his affidavit a form of the indemnification agreement to be signed by Gandi Holdings. No affidavit was filed from James Gandy or Trent Garmoe.

[23] There is no form of indemnity agreement in existence which names an indemnifier other than Gandi Holdings.

[24] The date of September 12, 2007, said to be the date that all of the entities in the Gandi Group signed indemnities in favour of each of the claimants, was the date of the investment by TA Associates in which it purchased a membership interest in Gandi Holdings only. Representatives of TA Associates received identical indemnities from Gandi Holdings. There is no evidence that any indemnities from any of the other Gandi Group entities were made at that time. To the contrary, the Membership Interest Purchase Agreement under which TA Associates purchased its membership interest in Gandi Holdings contained as a condition to closing a requirement that Gandi Holdings sign an indemnification agreement. The indemnification was only to be given by Gandi Holdings. There was no requirement for an indemnity to be given by any other entity in the Gandi Group,.

[25] I do not accept the bald statement of Hary Gandy that all of the entities in the Gandi Group gave indemnities at the time. The only indemnities that were given were by Gaudi Holdings.

(b) Memorandum and articles of Gandi Hold Co

[26] In the course of its investigation, the Monitor did locate an indemnity granted by Gandi Hold Co in its Memorandum and Articles in favour of its directors and officers. Those articles contain an indemnity in the same terms as the indemnity in the Gandi Innovations Limited articles, as discussed below. As the Monitor does not seek a determination regarding indemnities given by Gandi Hold Co, I need not discuss whether one or more of the Claimants is entitled to be indemnified by these articles.

(c) Articles of Association of Gandi Innovations Limited (Gandi Canada)

[27] The articles of this company contain an indemnity as follows:

> Every director or officer, former director or officer, or person who acts or acted at the Company's request, as a director or officer of the Company, a body corporate, partnership or other association of which the Company is or was a shareholder, partner, member or creditor and the heirs and legal representatives of such person, in absence of any dishonesty on the part of such persons shall be indemnified by the Company…in respect of any claim made against such person … by reason of being or having been a director or officer of the Company. [emphasis added]

[28] The corporate records sent to the Monitor by the corporate solicitors who incorporated the company name James Gandy as the president, treasurer and secretary and as the sole director. Hary Gandy stated at the outset of his affidavit filed on behalf of the claimants that he was the president and chief executive officer and chairman of the board of the companies that made up the Gandi Group. There are no corporate records that support that assertion and on his cross-examination he acknowledged he had no documents, including board resolutions, contracts or appointment letters to show that he was ever a director or officer of Gandi Innovations Limited. He said that he was directing the business of all of the entities. On his cross-examination, he said that as far as he was concerned, James Handy and Trent Garmoe were directors and officers of the company.

[29] James Gandy did not file any affidavit to say that he was not the president, treasurer and secretary of the company, as shown in the corporate records. Trent Garmoe did not file any affidavit. I think it fair to draw an adverse inference that their evidence would not have been helpful to their case.

[30] The affidavit of Bruce Johnston filed on behalf of TA Associates states that Hary Gandy and Trent Garmoe were not directors or officers of Gandi Innovations Limited and that a document printed from the Nova Scotia Registry of Joint Stock Companies which was included in the closing documents for TA Associates' investment showed that James Gandy was the only director and officer of Gandi Innovations Limited.

[31] There has been an extensive search for corporate documents but none have been found that would support Hary Gundy or Trent Garmoe as being an officer or director of Gandi Innovations Limited.

[32] It is argued that the indemnity in the articles of Gandi Innovations Limited is in favour not only of officers and directors, but also "persons who acted at the Company's request as a director or officer of the Company", and that Hary Gandy and Trent Garmoe acted as directors and officers at the Company's request. There is certainly no documentary evidence of that. Presumably the request would have had to come from James Gandy, who is the sole officer and director according to the corporate records. There is no evidence from any of the Claimants that any request was made to Hary Gandy or Trent Garmoe to act as an officer or director of Gandi Innovations Limited, which one would have expected if the assertion was to be made.

[33] It is also argued that the board of managers (the Delaware concept of a board of directors) of Gandi Holdings operated the subsidiaries as if they were officers and directors of the subsidiaries. Again, there is no documentary evidence of that and no evidence from any of the Claimants to support the assertion. While Hary Gandy may have operated the business in a functional sense, that does not mean that he was acting as an officer or director of any subsidiary in the corporate sense. This is not mere semantics. TA Associates made a large investment, and one of the corporate documents provided on closing was the Nova Scotia Registry of Joint Stock Companies that showed only James Gandy as an officer and director. If all of the Claimants are entitled to be indemnified by Gandi Innovations Limited, it will impact the claim of TA Associates in the CCAA proceedings.

[34] In the circumstances, I find that the only person entitled to indemnification from Gandi Innovations Limited is James Gandy.

[35] However, in connection with the financing provided by TA Associates, James Gandy executed a Subordination Agreement dated as of September, 12, 2007 under which he agreed that any liability or obligations of Gandi Canada to him, present or in the future, would be deferred, postponed and subordinated in all respects to the repayment in full by Gandi Innovations of all indebtedness, liabilities and obligations owing to TA Associates in connection with the purchase by TA Associates of US $25million in notes. Until that obligation to pay the notes in full with interest has been fulfilled, any claim by James Gandy under the indemnity from Gandi Innovations Limited is subordinated to the claim of TA Associates.

[36] The debt claim of TA Associates of $46,733,145 has been accepted by the Monitor. Assuming that the purchase price on the sale of the assets to Agfa is received in full, the monitor expects a distribution to unsecured creditors of approximately 27% of the value of their claims. In such circumstances, James Gundy will have no right to receive any payment from Gandi Innovations Limited in respect of his indemnity claim.

(d) Other Gaudi Group entities

[37] It was asserted by the Claimants that because the Gandi companies operated essentially as one integrated company, it should be inferred that the constating documents of the other entities in the Gandi Group contained the same indemnity as contained in the bylaws of Gandi Innovations Limited and Gandi Hold Co. I do not agree.

[38] Gandi Innovations LLC is a Texas company. Its Amended and Restated Operating Agreement contains the types of things normally contained in a general bylaw of an Ontario corporation. It contains no provision for indemnities. It was argued that as no articles were obtained from Texas, it could be assumed that the articles contained an indemnity provision similar to that contained in the bylaws of Gandi Innovations Limited and Gandi Hold Co. I asked counsel to obtain whatever documentation was available in Texas, and subsequently the Monitor received from its US counsel, Vinson & Elkins LLP, a copy of articles of organization for Gandi Innovations LLC dated August 2, 2004. There is nothing in these articles dealing with indemnities. Vinson & Elkins LLP advised that these articles, together with amending articles already in the possession of the Monitor, are the only corporate governance documents on file with the State of Texas.

[39] Gandi Special Holdings LLC is a Delaware corporation. The Limited Liability Company Agreement of Gandi Special Holdings LLC, like the Texas company, contains the types of things normally contained in a general bylaw of an Ontario corporation. It contains no provision for indemnities. Following the hearing, the Monitor obtained through Vinson & Elkins LLP a Delaware Certificate of Formation of Gandi Special Holdings LLC. This document contains no provision for indemnities. A certificate of the Secretary of State of Delaware confirms that there were no other relevant documents on file and this was confirmed by Vinson & Elkins LLP.

[40] I find that there is no indemnity in favour of the Claimants in the corporate documentation of Gandi Innovations LLC and Gandi Special Holdings LLC.

[41] It is also argued on behalf of the Claimants that the Gandi Group have acknowledged an obligation to indemnify the Claimants and it is said that this arises from a meeting of the board of Gandi Holdings. It is argued that the Gandi Group through the Monitor is thus estopped from denying an indemnity for all of the Gandi Group companies. A document said to be minutes of a meeting of the board of managers of Gandi Holdings held on March 4, 2009 is relied on. That document contains the following paragraph:

> The next item on the agenda was the indemnification of the officers. It was generally agreed that all parties would follow the Purchase Agreement between Gandi Innovations and TA Resources dated September 12, 2007: Counsel for TA had previously expressed the opinion that indemnification was not allowed under the purchase agreement. Counsel for James Gandy, Hary Gandy and Trent Garmoe together with the Corporate Counsel, Matthew Murphy had previously expressed verbal opinions that the indemnification of the officers was permitted under the Purchase Agreement. Lydia Garay, as the only member not involved in the dispute between TA and the key holders, voted to follow the advice of Corporate Counsel, Matthew Murphy. To avoid any misunderstanding, Corporate Counsel would be requested to express that opinion in writing.

[42] I do not see this paragraph in the informal minutes as assisting the Claimants. It is a meeting of the board of Gandi Holdings. It says that it was generally agreed that all parties would follow the purchase agreement between Gandi Holdings and TA resources dated September 12, 2007. That purchase agreement provides for an indemnity by only Gandi Holdings. Assuming that the minutes reflect a desire of some board members to indemnify officers of subsidiary corporations, and assuming that the Claimants thought they were officers of all of the subsidiary corporations, it is quite clear from the paragraph that there was a difference of view. The minute states that counsel for TA Associates had previously expressed the opinion that indemnification was not allowed under the purchase agreement and that counsel for the Claimants together with corporate counsel, Matthew Murphy, expressed the opposite opinion. The minute states that Lydia Garay, the only member not involved in the dispute between TA Associates and the key holders, voted to follow the advice of Corporate Counsel Terry Murphy and to avoid any misunderstanding, corporate counsel would be requested to express that opinion in writing.

[43] The affidavit of Bruce Johnston on behalf of TA Associates, who attended that meeting of the board of managers of Gandi Holdings swears that the Claimants voted to place Lydia Garay, a longtime employee and officer of Gandi Holdings, on the board despite a verbal agreement that he had with the Claimants to leave that board seat vacant and to work with him to appoint an outside independent board member. He stated Ms. Garay was completely reliant on the Gandy family for her job security and compensation.

[44] Mr. Johnston also states in his affidavit that the indemnification of the Claimants was discussed and that he and Mr. Taylor took the position that indemnification was not permitted. He said the Claimants took the position that indemnification was permitted, despite the language of the purchase agreement, and took the position that corporate counsel for Gandi Holdings had previously given a verbal opinion that indemnification was permitted under the purchase agreement. After hearing that, and during the meeting, Mr. Johnston sent an e-mail to Mr. Murphy who two minutes later responded that he had not advised on the question of an indemnity under the purchase agreement. Mr. Johnson states that he then read that e-mail at the meeting. I accept his evidence on this.

[45] Whether or not Ms. Garay was a disinterested or proper member of the board of management of Gandi Holdings, the minute states that she voted to follow the advice of corporate counsel. At the next board meeting on May 4, 2009, Ms. Garay said that she had sought the written opinion of corporate counsel but had not received it. To date no opinion from Mr. Murphy has surfaced. On the face of those minutes from March 4, 2009, there has been no approval of any indemnities in favour of the Claimants for other corporations. I cannot find on the evidence that there was any agreement that the Claimants would be indemnified by subsidiary corporations, nor is there any evidence that any subsidiary corporation ever enacted any documentation of any kind to provide such indemnities. The opposite is the case, as has been discussed.

[46] Finally, the Claimants allege that the Gandi Group has previously acknowledged their liability to indemnify the Claimants for any damage, award or legal costs incurred by the following actions:

(i) certain Gandi entities made payments of defence costs in connection with the arbitration both pre-and post the CCAA filing; and
(ii) the Monitor allegedly approved payment of post-filing defence costs.

[47] Until the sale of the Gandi Group to Agfa was completed, this CCAA proceeding was a debtor in possession restructuring with the business and affairs of the Gandi Group being managed by their officers and directors, specifically Hary Gundy and Trent Garmoe. Payments of legal fees to Langley and Banack Inc., U.S. lawyers for the Gandi Group and the Claimants, were made by or on authorization of Trent Garmoe.

[48] Pursuant to the terms of the Initial Order, the Monitor was required to approve all expenditures over $10,000 before payment was made. The Monitor approved payment of legal fees to counsel for the Gandi Group on the general understanding that such fees were incurred by the Gandi Group in connection with the Gandi Group's insolvency proceeding and for general corporate work for the Gandi Group.

[49] I accept the statement of the Monitor that it did not knowingly approve the payment of the Claimants' defence costs in connection with the arbitration.

[50] Subsequent to the completion of the sale to Agfa, the Monitor learned that a nominal amount of the legal fees approved by the Monitor was subsequently allocated to cover the costs of the arbitration. I accept the statement of the Monitor that it had no input, knowledge or control over such allocation, and had it been consulted, would have been opposed to such allocation as it did not involve any member of the Gandi Group.

[51] In the circumstances there is no basis for the assertion that the Monitor is somehow estopped by reason of the payment of legal fees from denying that there are other indemnities in favour of the Claimants.

(e) Are the Claimants claims debt or equity claims?

[52] This involves the application of provisions of the CCAA to the claims asserted by TA Associates in the arbitration.

[53] Section 6(8) of the CCAA provides:

> No compromise or arrangement that provides for the payment of an equity claim is to be sanctioned by the court unless it provides that all claims that are not equity claims are to be paid in full before the equity claim is to be paid.

[54] In s. 2(1) of the CCAA, equity claims are defined as follows:

> "equity claim" means a claim that is in respect of an equity interest, including a claim for, among others,
> (a) a dividend or similar payment,
> (b) a return of capital,
> (c) a redemption or retraction obligation,
> (d) a monetary loss resulting from the ownership, purchase or sale of an equity interest or from the rescission, or, in Quebec, the annulment, of a purchase or sale of an equity interest, or
> (e) contribution or indemnity in respect of a claim referred to in any of paragraphs (a) to (d);

[55] This definition of equity claim came into force on September 18, 2009. Although this provision does not apply to the Gandi Group's CCAA proceedings which commenced shortly prior to the legislative amendments, courts have noted that the amendments codified existing case law relating to the treatment of equity claims in insolvency proceedings. In Re Nelson Financial Group Lrd., (2010) 75 B.L.R. (4th) 302, Pepall J. stated:

> The amendments to the CCAA came into force on September 18, 2009. It is clear that the amendments incorporated the historical treatment of equity claims. The language of section 2 is clear and broad. Equity claim means a claim in respect of an equity interest and includes, amongst other things, a claim for rescission of a purchase or sale of an equity interest. Pursuant to sections 6(8) and 22.1, equity claims are rendered subordinate to those of creditors.

[56] If the claims in the arbitration commenced by TA Associates against the Claimants are equity claims, the claims by the Claimants in the CCAA process for contribution or indemnity in respect of those claims would be equity claims. The Claimants contend that the claims in the arbitration are not equity claims.

[57] The claims in the arbitration by TA Associates against the creditors include claims for various breaches of contract, fraud, rescission, or in the alternative, recissory damages, negligent misrepresentation, breach of fiduciary duty and tortious interference with advantageous business relationships and prospective economic advantage.

[58] In the arbitration TA Associates seeks to recover the investment that it made in Gandi Holdings, including the US $25 million debt secured by promissory notes and the US $50 million equity investment made by way of a membership subscription in Gandi Holdings.

[59] The Claimants assert that the claim for US $50 million by TA Associates cannot be an equity claim because it is based on breaches of contract, torts and equity. I do not see that as being the deciding factor. TA Associates seeks the return of its US $50 million equity investment because of various wrongdoings alleged against the Claimants and the fact that the claim is based on these causes of action does not make it any less a claim in equity. The legal tools that are used is not the important thing. It is the fact that they are being used to recover an equity investment that is important.

[60] In Re Nelson Financial Group Lrd., supra, at Peppall J. stated that historically, the claims and rights of shareholders were not treated as provable claims and ranked after creditors of an insolvent corporation in a liquidation. She also stated:

> This treatment also has been held to encompass fraudulent misrepresentation claims advanced by a shareholder seeking to recover his investment: *Re Blue Range Resource Corp.*In that case, Romaine J. held that the alleged loss derived from and was inextricably intertwined with the shareholder interest. Similarly, in the United States, the Second Circuit Court of Appeal in Re Stirling Homex Corp. concluded that shareholders, including those who had allegedly been defrauded, were subordinate to the general creditors when the company was insolvent.

[61] As the amendments to the CCAA incorporated the historical treatment of equity claims, in my view the claims of TA Associates in the arbitration to be compensated for the loss of its equity interest of US $50 million is to be treated as an equity claim and that the claims of the Claimants for indemnity against that claim is also to be treated as an equity claim in this CCAA proceeding.

Order

[62] An order in the form of a declaration shall go in accordance with these reasons.

Introduction

[1] These reasons address two civil actions (the "Civil Actions") and three appeals of notices of disallowance of bankruptcy claims (the "Bankruptcy Appeals") involving the parties to a successful subdivision project at the corner of 130th Street and 60th Avenue in Surrey, British Columbia (the "Project"). The ultimate question to be resolved is how the proceeds from the Project should be divided among the parties to these proceedings.

[2] Several of the parties have the last name "Sangha". To distinguish among them, I will refer to them by their first names after I have identified them. I intend no disrespect to any of them by so doing.

[3] The Project was conceived and managed by Jaswant Sangha ("Jaswant"), who is (i) a defendant in the Civil Actions; (ii) the bankrupt in one of the Bankruptcy Appeals; and (iii) the sole shareholder and director of two companies, 690174 B.C. Ltd. ("690174") and Panorama Parkview Homes Ltd. ("Panorama"), both of which are defendants in the Civil Actions as well as being the bankrupt companies in the other two Bankruptcy Appeals.

[4] Beginning in the 1990s, Jaswant became involved in acquiring, subdividing and selling properties located mostly in Surrey and other jurisdictions in the Fraser Valley. Jaswant usually involved other persons in the ownership of these projects. The evidence as to how the earlier projects were structured is incomplete. Some of the projects were profitable. Jaswant used the profits and the contacts he had made as a result of the earlier subdivisions to promote and pursue the Project.

[5] Jaswant began pursuing the Project in 2006. Ultimately, the Project produced a very significant profit. Despite this, Jaswant, 690174, and Panorama (the "Bankrupts") all ended up in bankruptcy (the "Bankruptcies"), in large part because of other businesses in which they were engaged.

[6] The legal and factual issues that must be addressed to determine the ultimate question of the rights of the parties to the Project's proceeds are complex and hotly disputed. The key underlying legal issues involve the nature of the relationships created to develop the Project and the effect of the Bankruptcies on those relationships.

The Proceedings

[7] The proceedings before me are:

1. Vancouver Registry No. S151275 (the "Garcha Action"), in which Daljit Singh Garcha and Jaswinder Kaur Garcha (the "Garchas") are plaintiffs and Jaswant, 690174, Panorama, Parmjit Sangha ("Parmjit"), Raveen Sangha ("Raveen"), Ranjit Singh Sangha ("Ranjit"), Svender Singh Sangha ("Svender"), Douglas William Wills and Balbir Kaur Dale ("Wills and Dale"), Grewal Management Ltd. ("Grewal Management"), Jasprit Singh Grewal ("Mr. Grewal"), and Crowe MacKay & Company Ltd. in its capacity as Trustee in Bankruptcy of Jaswant Singh Sangha, Panorama Parkview Homes Ltd. and 690174 B.C. Ltd. (the "Trustee") are defendants;

2. Vancouver Registry No. S142529 (the "Grewal Action"), in which 0731431 B.C. Ltd. ("0731431"), Daljit Singh Mattu ("Mr. Mattu"), 0892995 B.C. Ltd. ("0892995"), Rajpreet Singh Sangha ("Rajpreet"), Grewal Management, and Mr. Grewal are plaintiffs and Panorama, 690174, Jaswant, Parmjit, Ranjit, Svender and the Trustee are defendants;

3. Vancouver Registry No. B150826 in the Matter of the Bankruptcy of Jaswant Singh Sangha (the "Jaswant Bankruptcy"), being appeals of notices of disallowance of proofs of claim filed by the plaintiffs in the Civil Actions in that bankruptcy;

4. Vancouver Registry No. B160406 in the Matter of the Bankruptcy of 690174 B.C. Ltd. (the "690174 Bankruptcy"), being appeals of notices of disallowance of proofs of claim filed in that bankruptcy by the same plaintiffs; and

5. Vancouver Registry No. B160405 in the Matter of the Bankruptcy of Panorama Parkview Holdings Ltd. (the "Panorama Bankruptcy"), being appeals of notices of disallowance of proofs of claim filed by the same plaintiffs in that bankruptcy (proceedings 3 to 5 are referred to collectively as the "Bankruptcy Appeals").

The Joint Ventures

[8] The Project involved the acquisition of five contiguous lots, referred to in the evidence as Lots 1 to 5 (the "Lots"). The Lots were acquired over a period of several years and developed through a series of joint ventures, some of which were formalized through the execution of a corresponding written joint venture agreement ("JVA").

The written joint venture agreements

[9] The relevant written joint venture agreements are:

1. 2007 JVA – an agreement dated October 5, 2007, between the Garchas, Onkar Malli and Manmeet Malli (the "Mallis"), Joginder Chahal, Malkait Bains, Harjinder Bassi, Gurcharan Singh Sandhu, Sarbjit Kaur Basraon and Balraj Basraon, Gurmit Singh and Manisha Sidhu, Sumit Sidhu, and 690174 (the "2007 Joint Venturers") to acquire and subdivide Lot 1 and to sell the subdivided lots created by that subdivision (the "2007 Joint Venture"). The 2007 JVA was amended in January 2010 to correct what appears to have been a clerical error in the original document.

2. October 2010 JVA – an agreement dated October 20, 2010, between 0892995 (a company owned by Rajpreet), 0731431 (a company owned by Mr. Mattu), and Panorama (the "October 2010 Joint Venturers") to acquire, build homes on, and sell lots created by the Project (the "October 2010 Joint Venture"). Although the numbered companies were the nominal parties to the October 2010 JVA, I find that the parties made no distinction between their personal dealings and dealings through their private companies with respect to the Project.

3. November 2010 JVA – an agreement dated November 15, 2010, to subdivide Lots 1 to 5 and sell the subdivided lots (the "November 2010 Joint Venture"). The parties to the November 2010 JVA were 690174, Panorama, Jaswant, Wills and Dale, Parmjit, Ranjit, and Svender (the "November 2010 Joint Venturers").

4. 2011 JVA – an agreement dated June 30, 2011, replacing the November 2010 JVA, whereby Grewal Management was added as a joint venturer to the November 2010 JVA (Grewal Management and the other parties to this agreement will be referred to as the "2011 Joint Venturers") to pursue the objects of the November 2010 Joint Venture (the "2011 Joint Venture").

The alleged oral joint venture agreements

[10] In addition to the written joint venture agreements, Grewal Management, Mr. Mattu, and Rajpreet allege that they entered into oral joint venture agreements with Jaswant pursuant to which they invested in the Project. Their position is that these oral joint venture agreements modified or superseded the terms of the written joint venture agreements.

The Parties

[11] Jaswant is the central figure in all of the matters before me. He was born and educated in India but has lived in Canada for many years. He is obviously astute in business. As the Trustee observed in his testimony, Jaswant had the ability to identify and develop properties that could be profitably subdivided.

[12] Jaswant is married to Parmjit. They have a daughter, Raveen. Raveen is the registered owner of the home in which Jaswant and Parmjit have lived for a number of years. Parmjit is a defendant in the Grewal Action and both Parmjit and Raveen are defendants in the Garcha Action.

[13] The Garchas are long-term residents of Surrey who got to know Jaswant and Parmjit through attending community events.

[14] Ranjit and Svender are Jaswant's brother and nephew.

[15] Wills and Dale are a married couple who were long-time family friends of Jaswant and Parmjit. Wills and Dale became involved in real estate projects being managed by Jaswant in the 1990s. They allege that they invested in those projects and that the proceeds of those previous investments were invested in the November 2010 Joint Venture.

[16] Mr. Grewal is the sole shareholder and director of Grewal Management. Although it is a member of the 2011 Joint Venture, Grewal Management alleges that its investment in the Project was made pursuant to an oral joint venture agreement made in June 2011 that entitled it to a greater share of the proceeds from the Project than is allocated to it in the 2011 JVA.

[17] Mr. Mattu was a long-time acquaintance of Jaswant's. He alleges that he invested in the Project through an oral joint venture agreement with Jaswant and his companies.

[18] Rajpreet was introduced to Jaswant by Mr. Mattu. He invested in the October 2010 Joint Venture through 0892995 and alleges he later agreed with Jaswant that this investment and an additional $600,000 he provided to Jaswant would be invested in the Project pursuant to an oral agreement similar to the one alleged by Mr. Mattu. He was initially represented by the same counsel as Mr. Grewal and Mr. Mattu. However, he filed a notice of intention to act in person in July 2019 and represented himself and 0892995 at trial thereafter.

[19] The Trustee is the Trustee in Bankruptcy of Jaswant, 690174, and Panorama, who has conducted a defence of the Garcha and Grewal Actions on their behalf.

Positions of the Parties

[20] In the Garcha Action, the Garchas seek an order that they are entitled to share in the proceeds from the Project by virtue of being the beneficial owners of an undivided 7/22 interest in Lot 1. The Garchas frame this claim both as a direct beneficial proprietary interest pursuant to the 2007 JVA and as a remedy for alleged breaches of fiduciary duty on the part of Jaswant and 690174 as managers of the 2007 Joint Venture's affairs. The Garchas' position is that the 2007 JVA is binding and that it provides the basis for granting them a proprietary remedy against the proceeds of the Project. The Garchas also claim against the members of the 2011 Joint Venture based on knowing assistance of 690174's breaches of fiduciary duty and knowing receipt of property obtained from these breaches.

[21] The Trustee's position is that the 2007 JVA is binding and that 690174 initially held title to Lot 1 as bare trustee for the 2007 Joint Venturers, but that the trust came to an end due to subsequent events. The Trustee therefore argues that the rights of the 2007 Joint Venturers to receive profits from the 2007 Joint Venture are purely contractual.

[22] The Grewal plaintiffs conceded at trial that the 2007 JVA was binding, but took the position that it did not create any trust in favour of the Garchas over the proceeds of the Project.

[23] In the Grewal Action, Mr. Grewal, Mr. Mattu, Rajpreet, and their respective companies seek orders that they are entitled to constructive trusts over the net proceeds of sale of the subdivided lots created by the Project. They allege that they made direct financial contributions to the costs of the Project pursuant to oral joint venture agreements with Jaswant stipulating that their financial contributions would entitle them to a proprietary interest the Project.

[24] Rajpreet also bases his claim to a constructive trust on alleged breaches of fiduciary duty by Jaswant and Panorama with respect to funds Rajpreet and 0892995 provided to them pursuant to the October 2010 JVA.

[25] In the Bankruptcy Appeals, the plaintiffs in the Civil Actions seek to set aside the Trustee's disallowances of the claims they filed in the Bankruptcies. They rely on the same grounds advanced in the Civil Actions, arguing that their interests in the Project do not form part of the bankrupt estates' assets divisible among their creditors and that they are not equity claims. Their position is that the issues raised in the Bankruptcy Appeals should be decided de novo in these proceedings.

[26] In all proceedings, the Trustee takes the position that the claims of the plaintiffs are equity claims as defined in the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C.

1985, c. B-3 [BIA], and are therefore postponed to the claims of all other creditors of the Bankrupts pursuant to s. 140.1 of the BIA. The Trustee says there are insufficient funds remaining in the bankrupt estates to satisfy prior ranking claims and that any claims that the plaintiffs can establish are therefore moot.

[27] In all proceedings, the defendants take the position that the plaintiffs have not established any claim to equitable relief by way of a constructive trust or otherwise, and that the net proceeds of the Project should be distributed in accordance with the terms of the 2011 JVA.

[28] For the reasons that follow I have decided that the plaintiffs' claims are not equity claims as defined in the BIA, and that the Garchas, Mr. Mattu, Rajpreet, and their companies are entitled to equitable remedies with respect to the proceeds of sale of the subdivided lots. However, I find that the claim of Mr. Grewal and Grewal Management must be dismissed except insofar as Grewal Management is entitled to its share of the net proceeds of the 2011 Joint Venture.

[29] In these reasons I will first deal with a number of procedural issues. I will then address the credibility of the witnesses and make findings of fact, following which I will consider the claims advanced by the plaintiffs.

Procedural History

[30] This trial results from four orders of Justice Bowden, who was previously the case management judge in all of these proceedings. Two of the orders are dated November 15, 2017, while the other two are dated January 29, 2018, and June 26, 2018. The reasons for each of these orders were published and are indexed as 2017 BCSC 2064, 2017 BCSC 2071, 2018 BCSC 137, and 2018 BCSC 1049, respectively.

[31] In the reasons indexed as 2017 BCSC 2064, Justice Bowden addressed the Grewal plaintiffs' application for a declaration that the automatic stay of proceedings against 690714 and Panorama as bankrupts provided for in the BIA no longer applied to the Grewal Action. Justice Bowden reviewed the procedural history of this matter up to that date and noted that on April 8, 2016, Justice Kirkpatrick of the Court of Appeal had ordered, by consent, that the stay of proceedings against Jaswant pursuant to his bankruptcy be lifted on certain terms. Justice Bowden found as a fact that the Trustee had, at that time, also consented to an order lifting the automatic stay of proceedings against 690174 and Panorama to permit the Grewal plaintiffs to proceed with the Grewal Action.

[32] The Trustee did not deny that he had made such an agreement. However, he argued that by the end of July 2016 he had determined that the Garcha and Grewal claims were equity claims, and that the inspectors of the bankrupt corporations had authorized him to take steps to maintain the stay of proceedings in the actions against those corporations.

[33] Justice Bowden did not accept the Trustee's submissions and made a declaration pursuant to s. 69.4 of the BIA that the stay of proceedings no longer applied to the Grewal Action, subject to a requirement that if judgment was obtained against either corporation, no steps to enforce the judgment could be taken without leave of the Court. In addition, he confirmed the authority of the Trustee to defend the action, as authorized by a resolution of the inspectors of the Bankrupts dated September 1, 2016.

[34] In the reasons indexed as 2017 BCSC 2071, Justice Bowden granted a declaration that the automatic stay of proceedings no longer applied to the Garcha Action. Because there was no express agreement on the part of the Trustee to the lifting of the stay of the Garcha Action, Justice Bowden applied the factors set out in Re Advocate Mines Ltd. (1984), 52 C.B.R. (N.S.) 277 (Ont. S.C.J.), and determined that the Garchas had met the applicable test for lifting the stay of their action.

[35] In the reasons indexed as 2018 BCSC 137, Justice Bowden addressed the procedural issues that arose from the fact that the Grewal and Garcha plaintiffs had also filed proofs of claim with the Trustee, which the Trustee had disallowed or ruled were equity claims. He permitted the Bankruptcy Appeals to continue with respect to the claims of creditors other than the Garcha and Grewal plaintiffs and gave leave to the Trustee to apply for a distribution of funds held in trust on the completion of those appeals. He also permitted the Civil Actions to proceed and directed that they be heard at the same time as the Bankruptcy Appeals. Finally, he directed that the procedures set out in the Supreme Court Civil Rules, B.C. Reg. 168/2009 [SCCR], would apply to the contemporaneous hearings of the trials in the Civil Actions and the Bankruptcy Appeals.

[36] In the reasons indexed as 2018 BCSC 1049, Justice Bowden gave the Trustee leave to participate in the Civil Actions by being added as a defendant. He ordered the Grewal and Garcha plaintiffs to amend their notices of civil claim to add the Trustee and gave leave to the Trustee to file responses for Jaswant, 690174, and Panorama. In addition, he reiterated that the Civil Actions and the Bankruptcy Appeals should be heard at the same time and be subject to the SCCR. Justice Bowden also ordered that the issues raised in the Civil Actions must be decided de novo, and that to the extent that those decisions are inconsistent with the Trustee's decisions in the notices of disallowance, the Court's decisions will prevail.

[37] Based on the foregoing, I am satisfied that Justice Bowden decided that all issues raised in the Civil Actions and the Bankruptcy Appeals should be decided de novo pursuant to the procedures for actions set out in the SCCR.

[38] No appeal was taken from Justice Bowden's orders.

[39] I have also independently concluded that these proceedings fall into that category of bankruptcy cases in which the interests of justice require that the issues be determined by a trial before the court. Although the general rule is that appeals from a Trustee's disallowance of claims are true appeals, the direct conflict in the evidence of the parties and the difficult and complicated legal issues raised in the proceedings require that the court determine the issues de novo on the basis of evidence presented at trial.

[40] In Credifinance Securities Limited v. DSLC Capital Corp., 2011 ONCA 160, the Ontario Court of Appeal recognized that there will be cases that are simply not suitable to be decided pursuant to the summary provisions of the BIA and that on appeal the court has jurisdiction to determine the issues de novo if required in the interests of justice. In my view this is one of those cases. I note that the issues raised in these proceedings raise complex factual and legal issues and require credibility findings with respect to conflicts in the evidence. As such, they were not suitable for summary disposition.

[41] As indicated, the Trustee filed responses to civil claim in the Civil Actions and fully participated as an adverse party in the actions and throughout the trial. I also note that counsel for the Trustee indicated in argument that the Trustee was seeking a resolution of all issues before me.

[42] In these circumstances I conclude that it would be unfair to the Garcha and Grewal plaintiffs to give deference to the Trustee's factual conclusions on these issues. I am also satisfied that the Trustee has made legal errors that would have led to the allowance of the Bankruptcy Appeals on a true appeal.

[43] I will therefore proceed to determine the issues raised in the Civil Actions de novo on the record before me and apply those determinations to decide the outcome of the Bankruptcy Appeals. This will make it unnecessary for me to consider the Bankruptcy Appeals separately.

Credibility

[44] I do not find it necessary to determine all of the credibility issues raised by the parties in their submissions. However, there are a number of credibility findings that I must make at the outset to determine the relevant facts.

[45] The considerations to be taken into account in assessing credibility were reviewed in Bradshaw v. Stenner, 2010 BCSC 1398:

> [186] Credibility involves an assessment of the trustworthiness of a witness' testimony based upon the veracity or sincerity of a witness and the accuracy of the evidence that the witness provides (Raymond v. Bosanquet (Township) (1919), 1919 CanLII 11 (SCC), 59 S.C.R. 452, 50 D.L.R. 560 (S.C.C.)). The art of assessment involves examination of various factors such as the ability and opportunity to observe events, the firmness of his memory, the ability to resist the influence of interest to modify his recollection, whether the witness' evidence harmonizes with independent evidence that has been accepted, whether the witness changes his testimony during direct and cross-examination, whether the witness' testimony seems unreasonable, impossible, or unlikely, whether a witness has a motive to lie, and the demeanour of a witness generally (Wallace v. Davis, [1926] 31 O.W.N. 202

> [187] It has been suggested that a methodology to adopt is to first consider the testimony of a witness on a 'stand alone' basis, followed by an analysis of whether the witness' story is inherently believable. Then, if the witness testimony has survived relatively intact, the testimony should be evaluated based upon the consistency with other witnesses and with documentary evidence. The testimony of non-party, disinterested witnesses may provide a reliable yardstick for comparison. Finally, the court should determine which version of events is the most consistent with the "preponderance of probabilities which a practical and informed person would readily recognize as reasonable in that place and in those conditions" (Overseas Investments (1986) Ltd. v. Cornwall Developments Ltd. (1993), 1993 CanLII 7140 (AB QB), 12 Alta. L.R. (3d) 298 at para. 13 (Alta. Q.B.)). I have found this approach useful.

[46] The most important credibility issue in these proceedings is the extent to which I can rely on Jaswant's oral evidence.

[47] In carrying out his analysis of the Project, the Trustee placed considerable reliance on the information and explanations that Jaswant provided to him. This led the Trustee to conclude that Jaswant was a generally honest debtor whose financial difficulties arose from being undercapitalized and from the general economic conditions created by the 2008 financial crisis.

[48] However, I have come to a different conclusion. I found Jaswant to be a most unsatisfactory witness. His evidence was self-serving, lacked candour, and was in many instances self-contradictory. He also tended to be argumentative rather than answering questions directly. At times he professed to have no memory of events relating to the Project. However, at other times he emphatically testified to events that favoured his position. I also note that he repeatedly testified while being cross-examined by parties adverse to his interests he had no independent memory of events and was almost entirely reliant on documents to answer questions put to him. However, his memory was better when he was cross-examined by counsel for his wife and counsel for the Trustee, who were aligned with him at trial but were entitled to cross-examine him because he was called to testify as an adverse party pursuant to Rule 12-5(20) of the SCCR.

[49] In addition, on more than one occasion Jaswant contradicted his previous evidence or the evidence he had given in examination for discovery. As was the case with many of the defendants, when confronted with the inconsistencies in his evidence Jaswant testified that he had been under a lot of stress and was taking medications when he gave his previous evidence. However, he made no attempt to correct any answers given on his previous examinations until confronted with the contradictions at trial, and he did not provide any medical evidence supporting his assertion that his memory had been affected by medications.

[50] In assessing Jaswant's credibility, I also take into account some of his conduct during the Project and in the course of the Bankruptcies that casts doubt on his trustworthiness.

[51] In cross-examination, Jaswant acknowledged as accurate the contents of a letter dated March 12, 2012, addressed to him from Royal Morton, a lawyer at Buckley Hogan. Mr. Morton represented Jaswant in an action brought by Hardeep Singh Gill ("Hardeep Gill") against 690174 with respect to a failed real estate transaction, which I will describe later. Jaswant and 690174 waived solicitor-client privilege over the contents of this letter, and it was admitted into evidence at trial.

[52] In this letter, Mr. Morton confirmed that Jaswant did not wish the other 2007 Joint Venturers to be informed of his post-2007 dealings with Hardeep Gill. Hardeep Gill had obtained a large judgment (the "Gill Judgment") against 690174 in the aforementioned action and registered the judgment against Lot 1, the subject of the 2007 JVA, in the New Westminster Land Title Office.

[53] Jaswant expressed concerns to Mr. Morton about disclosing this fact and other aspects of his financial and legal affairs to the 2007 Joint Venturers. He said that he would look bad within his community if Mr. Morton approached them to obtain affidavits to support Jaswant's evidence that 690174 beneficially owned only 1/23 of the proposed lots to be subdivided from Lot 1 and that the balance of the lots was beneficially owned by the other 2007 Joint Venturers.

[54] This conduct revealed a marked lack of candour on Jaswant's part. It also put the beneficial ownership interests of the 2007 Joint Venturers in Lot 1 at risk by denying them the opportunity to intervene to protect their position with respect to the Gill Judgment.

[55] In addition, Jaswant admitted that he prepared what he knew to be fabricated promissory notes which were certified to be true by Raveen and Parmjit in proofs of claim they filed in the Bankruptcies.

[56] In the 690174 Bankruptcy, Parmjit filed a claim as an ordinary creditor in the amount of $699,590.08, which she certified was based on promissory notes purportedly made on March 31, 2009, for $132,000, and January 1, 2010, for $319,338.55. Both notes provided for interest at 7% per month, which I accept was meant to be 7% per annum. Jaswant executed the notes on behalf of 690174. However, in cross-examination at trial, Jaswant and Parmjit admitted that Jaswant had prepared these notes after 690174 was assigned into bankruptcy on April 21, 2016, and backdated them.

[57] In the Jaswant Bankruptcy, Parmjit swore an affidavit stating that she had contributed one-third of the amount advanced from a joint account in the names of Jaswant, Parmjit, and Raveen as a loan to 690174, and that Jaswant had agreed to guarantee that loan.

[58] However, Parmjit and Jaswant's evidence at trial was that Parmjit had invested these sums in the Project on her own behalf. When cross-examined on this discrepancy and on the dates of the promissory notes, Parmjit described the promissory notes as having been prepared by mistake and stated that she no longer relied on them.

[59] Jaswant prepared similar promissory notes payable by 690174 to Raveen's company, 688350 B.C. Ltd. ("688350"), purportedly dated March 31, 2009, and December 30, 2006. 688350 filed a proof of claim in the 690174 Bankruptcy for principal and interest on those notes to the date of bankruptcy. At trial, Raveen and Jaswant admitted that these notes had not been prepared until after 690174 had been assigned into bankruptcy.

[60] In my view these documents were an attempt to defraud the creditors of the bankrupt estates. I do not accept the explanations given by Parmjit and Raveen for the creation of these documents. In effect, they testified that they did not understand the process of making a claim in bankruptcy and did not understand the documents that they certified or affirmed. I find that this explanation lacks credibility.

[61] I therefore do not find Jaswant, Parmjit, or Raveen to be witnesses whose evidence I can accept without corroboration.

[62] I found the evidence of the plaintiffs and other defendants generally to be credible, unless I indicate otherwise in the course of these reasons. However, I do recognize that the reliability of all of the oral evidence in this case is affected by the long period of time that has elapsed between the time of the events testified to and the trial. Most of the critical events in this case occurred eight to 15 years before the trial. In addition, I suspect that at times all witnesses were filling in gaps in their memories and were in some instances influenced by what they wanted to remember rather than their actual recollections.

[63] These concerns require me to rely principally on the documentary evidence and on inferences from established facts in making the findings of fact necessary to resolve the issues before me.

Findings of Fact and Chronology of Events

[64] The parties filed an Agreed Statement of Facts at trial. It is neither necessary nor possible to incorporate all of its details in these reasons. Because there is considerable disagreement about the nature of the relationships between the parties and the agreements they made, I will make additional findings of fact necessary to decide those issues in the following chronology of events.

Purchase of Lot 1 and the 2007 JVA

[65] In the 2000s, Jaswant promoted the three land assembly and subdivision developments that are most relevant to these proceedings. Two of the developments were referred to in the evidence as Sangha Groups 1 and 2, and involved the assembly and subdivision of residential lots in Surrey, B.C. The Project was the third development. Jaswant began to pursue the Project at the same time as Sangha Group 2, in or about 2006.

[66] On April 14, 2006, 688350 entered into an agreement with the owners of 13020 60th Ave. to purchase that property, which is referred to throughout these reasons as Lot 1, for $2,700,000. The purchase price was increased to $2,725,000 in subsequent agreements that extended the closing date for its purchase.

[67] Around this time, Jaswant had discussions with the plaintiff Daljit Singh Garcha about investing in real estate. The evidence of Mr. Garcha and Jaswant about the content of these discussions is to some extent contradictory. Mr. Garcha testified that Jaswant told him that he was working to acquire and subdivide Lot 1, and that if he and his wife Jaswinder Kaur Garcha were willing to invest, they could obtain title to seven of the lots to be created from the subdivision of Lot 1 for an investment of approximately $50,000 to $60,000 per lot. It was unclear whether these amounts were in addition to the initial contribution made by the Garchas.

[68] Jaswant's evidence is that he told Mr. Garcha that Lot 1 was to be part of a larger land assembly and subdivision and that the Garchas would receive a proportionate share of the net profits from the sale of the lots to be subdivided from Lot 1. Mr. Garcha denies that Jaswant told him this. I prefer Mr. Garcha's evidence on the issue of whether he was told that Lot 1 was to be part of a larger land assembly. I note that Jaswant's evidence on this issue is inconsistent with his desire expressed to Mr. Morton not to inform the members of the 2007 Joint Venture of his dealings with respect to Lot 1. However, I have concluded that these discussions did not determine the nature of the legal relationship that would pursue the object of subdividing Lot 1. I conclude that in these discussions Mr. Garcha and Jaswant were discussing the general business terms of Jaswant's proposal, but that it was understood there would be a written document executed that set out their agreement.

[69] As a result of these discussions, the Garchas advanced $150,000 to 688350 on December 28, 2006, and $242,000 to 690174 on March 30, 2007. I find that these funds were used to provide part of the amount due on closing of the purchase of Lot 1 and that Jaswant gave instructions to the Garchas to pay the $150,000 to 688350, telling them that the funds would be used to help pay for the purchase of Lot 1. I also find that the funds the Garchas provided to 690714 and 688350 were provided for the express purpose of acquiring Lot 1.

[70] In addition, it is agreed that other members of what became the 2007 Joint Venture contributed to the purchase of Lot 1. The Mallis advanced $392,000 to 690174 through their company, Joginder Chahal advanced $100,000, and Malkait Bains advanced $56,000. Other members of the 2007 Joint Venture contributed lesser amounts.

[71] 688350 assigned its interest pursuant to the agreement to purchase Lot 1 to 690174, which completed the purchase on April 2, 2007, thereby becoming the registered owner of that lot. I find that 688350 acted as 690174's agent in all respects with regard to the acquisition of Lot 1.

[72] There was considerable evidence led with respect to the amount that 690174 paid to 688350 to obtain the assignment of the agreement to purchase Lot 1. The assignment agreement contemplated that 690174 would pay 688350 an assignment fee of $292,000 in addition to the amount that 688350 was required to pay for Lot 1. 690174 did pay $292,000 to 688350, but almost immediately thereafter 688350 transferred $300,000 to 690174. In the result, these amounts netted out. I find that 688350 did not in fact receive any assignment fee. It is likely that the purpose of the assignment fee was to increase the apparent amount that was paid to acquire Lot 1 to assist in maximizing mortgage financing in aid of the purchase.

[73] By April 2, 2007, the investors in Lot 1 had provided all of the payments outlined above. The funds necessary to purchase Lot 1 were provided by: (i) the deposit; (ii) a payment from 690174's solicitors, Buckley Hogan, in the amount of $895,724.05; (iii) an official cheque for $25,000; and (iv) mortgage proceeds from a mortgage in favour of IMOR Capital of $1,607,037.96 (the "IMOR Mortgage"). The cash portion of the purchase price was less than the total of the amount received from the persons who became members of the 2007 Joint Venture.

[74] On October 5, 2007, the Garchas, the Mallis, Joginder Chahal, Malkait Bains, Harjinder Bassi, Gurcharan Singh Sandhu, Sarbjit Kaur Basraon and Balraj Basraon, Gurmit Singh and Manisha Sidhu, Sumit Sidhu, and 690174 executed the 2007 JVA.

[75] The effect and scope of the 2007 JVA is very much in dispute in these proceedings. I will address its interpretation later in these reasons.

[76] The following provisions of the 2007 JVA are relevant:

1. Recital B states that the parties have agreed to form the 2007 Joint Venture for the purpose of investing in Lot 1, subdividing it into approximately 22 RF-9 residential lots, and selling the lots.

2. Recital C states that 690174 shall hold legal title to Lot 1 and develop it as bare trustee on behalf of the 2007 Joint Venture.

3. Paragraph 2.2 provides that 690174 acknowledges and agrees that it is holding 20 lots in trust for the 2007 Joint Venturers as bare trustee and that the 2007 Joint Venturers are each beneficial owners of those lots in the ratio of their proportionate shares. The reference to 20 lots appears to have been an error that was corrected to 22 lots in a later amendment executed for that purpose.

4. Paragraph 4.2 provides that the 2007 Joint Venturers each own as tenants in common, as their separate property, an undivided beneficial interest in the Project (defined as the development of Lot 1) and the 2007 Joint Venture assets in the ratio of their respective proportionate shares. To avoid confusion with the Project as defined in paragraph 1 of these reasons, I will refer to the Project defined in the 2007 JVA as the Lot 1 Project.

5. Paragraph 6.2 provides that Jaswant Sangha be engaged as manager of the Lot 1 Project on terms acceptable to the management committee.

6. Paragraph 8.1 provides for the distribution of all revenue received relating to the Lot 1 Project, firstly to pay secured creditors of the Lot 1 Project, secondly to pay all unsecured claims against the Lot 1 Project, and thirdly to distribute the net proceeds to the 2007 Joint Venturers in accordance with their proportionate shares.

[77] The agreement also contained detailed provisions for funding of Lot 1 Project expenses and remedies on default.

[78] I find that although the 2007 JVA was dated six months after the acquisition of Lot 1, it was at all times agreed that the terms under which Lot 1 would be acquired and developed would be set out in a written agreement and that the rights and obligations of the parties with respect to Lot 1 would be and are governed by the terms of the 2007 JVA.

[79] I find that Jaswant and 690174 undertook responsibility for the management of the Lot 1 Project. From the outset, Jaswant made all decisions with respect to the development of Lot 1 without consulting with the other 2007 Joint Venturers or obtaining any prior approval for his decisions, even though the terms of the 2007 JVA required authorizations to make major decisions about the Lot 1 Project.

[80] The IMOR Mortgage required payment of interest at a high rate. Jaswant negotiated two further mortgages over Lot 1 to replace the IMOR financing. The first replacement mortgage was registered on November 1, 2007, in favour of Pacific Coast Mortgage Investment Corporation (“PMIC”). The Garchas executed this mortgage as covenantors on or about October 3, 2007. This mortgage was also secured by what would become known as Lot 2, one of the other lots assembled for the Project, and by a mortgage granted by the Mallis over their home.

[81] This mortgage was in turn replaced by a mortgage to PMIC registered on July 7, 2009, which was also secured by Lot 2, a half interest in the Mallis' home, and the home in which Jaswant and Parmjit lived. Although she did not live there, Raveen was the registered owner of the property on which Jaswant and Parmjit resided, and she was accordingly required to execute that mortgage. The Garchas executed this mortgage as covenantors, thereby assuming personal responsibility for its repayment, as they had with the two previous mortgages.

[82] Paragraph 2.2 of the 2007 JVA was amended in January 2010 to make it clear that the Joint Venture participants other than 690174 were entitled to a proportionate share of 22 lots, not 20 lots as previously stated. The 2010 amendment, which was executed by 690174, repeated that 690174 held legal title to Lot 1 as bare trustee on behalf of the 2007 Joint Venturers.

Purchase of Lots 2 to 4 and the November 2010 JVA

[83] Jaswant arranged the purchase of 3 additional lots (Lots 2 to 4) between 2007 and 2010.

[84] On August 22, 2006, 688350 contracted to purchase what became Lot 2 for $1,250,000. The agreement required a deposit of $150,000 within 48 hours of subject removal and was to complete on March 31, 2007. This deposit was paid by 688350 on or about December 6, 2006.

[85] On April 27, 2007, 690174 transferred $300,000 into the account of Parkwood Developments, an entity apparently associated with the defendant Ranjit. On April 30, 2007, 690174 advanced $27,886.96 to its solicitors, Buckley Hogan, and Ranjit advanced $345,000 from the Parkwood Developments account to Buckley Hogan to acquire Lot 2. The balance of the purchase price was paid from the proceeds of a mortgage in favour of TD Canada Trust in the amount of $750,000.

[86] The purchase of Lot 2 closed on April 30, 2007, when a transfer of one undivided half interest to Jaswant and Parmjit as joint tenants and the other half interest to Ranjit and Svender as joint tenants was registered. No documentation was put in evidence with respect to the transfer of the purchase agreement from 688350 to the ultimate purchasers. As with Lot 1, I am satisfied that 688350 acted on behalf of and at the direction of Jaswant in all of its dealings with Lot 2.

[87] On August 4, 2007, 690174 made an agreement to purchase what came to be known as Lot 3 for $1,350,000. 690174 paid the required deposit of $225,000 in four installments between August 7, 2007, and March 7, 2008. On March 12, 2008, 690174 assigned the purchase contract to Jaswant. On June 23, 2008, 690174 advanced a total of $211,490.70 to Buckley Hogan towards the purchase of the lot.

[88] The purchase of Lot 3 completed on June 23, 2008, when title was transferred into the names of Jaswant and Parmjit as joint tenants. The funds necessary to pay the purchase price came from the advances made by 690174 described in the preceding paragraph and from the proceeds of a mortgage in favour of the Royal Bank of Canada in the principal amount of $945,000.

[89] On March 11, 2008, Jaswant made an agreement to purchase what became known as Lot 4 for $1,445,000. 690174 paid the required deposit of $100,000 by an official cheque that had been issued on February 16, 2008. On August 4, 2008, 690174 advanced $388,227.53 to Buckley Hogan to pay part of the purchase price for the lot. On August 8, 2008, title to Lot 4 was transferred into the names of Wills and Dale as joint tenants as to a half interest and Jaswant as to the other half interest. The balance of the purchase price above the funds provided by 690174 came from the proceeds of a mortgage in favour of Gulf & Fraser Fisherman’s Credit Union in the amount of $994,196.25. Wills and Dale gave their covenants to pay this mortgage, which of course charged their registered interest in Lot 4.

[90] By 2010, Jaswant had organized the acquisition of Lots 1 to 4 and had reached an agreement with the owner of an additional lot (Lot 5), Satgur Investments Ltd. (“Satgur”), to contribute that lot to the Project and participate in the Project as a joint venturer. At some point, a draft joint venture agreement was prepared which included Satgur as a participant, but later, probably in the summer of 2010, Satgur decided not to participate.

[91] On November 15, 2010, 690174, Panorama, Jaswant, Wills and Dale, Parmjit, Ranjit, and Svender executed the November 2010 JVA.

[92] The terms of the November 2010 JVA were very similar to those of the 2007 JVA. Paragraph 4.1 sets out the proportionate shares of the November 2010 Joint Venturers in the Project. By the express terms of the November 2010 JVA, each November 2010 Joint Venturer became the beneficial owner of its proportionate share of all of the Lots involved in the Project. Paragraph 4.2 of the November 2010 JVA is identical to paragraph 4.2 of the 2007 JVA, reading as follows:

> 4.2 The Joint Venturers each own as tenants-in-common, as their separate property, an undivided beneficial interest in the Project and the Joint Venture Assets in the ratio of their respective Proportionate Shares.

[93] I will refer to the mortgages taken out to purchase Lots 1 to 5 as each of the "Acquisition Mortgages". Lots 1 and 5 were each approximately twice as large as the other three lots. Accordingly, they were considerably more expensive to acquire.

Project financing

[94] It is quite clear from the evidence that the Project was undercapitalized from the outset and that Jaswant needed investors to pursue it. This problem continued throughout the Project, but arose most frequently when Jaswant needed funds to close on the purchase of each of the 5 Lots, and later when charges were registered in the New Westminster Land Title Office against title to some of the Lots.

[95] In the preceding paragraphs I outlined how funds flowed to purchase Lots 1 to 4. However, the evidence with respect to the actual source of the funding, with the exception of Lot 1, is incomplete and confusing. The Trustee prepared a number of schedules with respect to the financing of the acquisition of Lots 2 to 4. Unfortunately, those schedules are of limited utility because they do not show the source of the funds used by the purchasers of the Lots. For example, the Trustee stated that 690174 contributed all of the funds for the down payment required to purchase Lots 3 and 4 because they were paid out of 690174's bank account. However, a significant portion of these funds were said to be profits from Sangha Groups 1 and 2, and there is evidence, which I will refer to later, indicating that $500,000 of the proceeds from Sangha Group 2 had previously been assigned to Mr. Mattu as an investment in the Project.

[96] Similarly, in Schedule 1 to the Trustee's Ninth Report, prepared at my request, the Trustee credited Panorama with contributing $729,936.70 to the acquisition of Lot 5, consisting of the $300,000 deposit paid on the purchase price and $428,936.70 provided at closing. However, the evidence is clear that $200,000 of the deposit came from funds provided by 0892995 and the balance came from deposits paid directly to Panorama from purchasers of lots to be created from the ultimate subdivision of the Project. Panorama had no right to use those deposits for its own benefit because they were by that time the property of the November 2010 Joint Venture. I have no difficulty in finding that Panorama contributed at most $100,000 of its own funds to the purchase of Lot 5.

[97] In addition, it is difficult to reconcile the amounts that the Trustee credited to 690174 as contributions to the Project with the Trustee's conclusion in his Preliminary Report that the net amount, after repayments, of Sangha family contributions to 690174 and Panorama from the Sangha family joint account was only $63,365. While this calculation does not take into account contributions from Sangha Groups 1 and 2, there still remains great uncertainty as to the actual net amount of Sangha family contributions to the Project.

Acquisition of Lot 5 and the 2011 JVA

[98] As stated above, it was originally contemplated that Satgur would participate in the Project by contributing Lot 5, which it owned, in exchange for a 28.5% proportionate share. However, at some point in 2010 Satgur withdrew from the Project.

[99] This meant that the Project required additional funds to remain viable and, in particular, to purchase Lot 5 from Satgur. Although scant attention was paid to Satgur's withdrawal in the evidence, it obviously put further financial pressure on the Project. Lot 5 was one of the two larger Lots and was of vital importance to the Project. Instead of Satgur providing Lot 5 as its contribution to the Project, Jaswant was forced to find additional capital to purchase it.

[100] The November 2010 JVA contemplated Panorama's acquisition of Lot 5 and its utilization in the Project. However, I find that from 2010 to 2011, Jaswant and Panorama lacked the funds necessary to complete its purchase.

[101] On August 20, 2010, Panorama entered into an agreement with Satgur to purchase Lot 5 for $3,300,000. Although it was not expressly set out in the evidence, it appears that Panorama was incorporated to purchase Lot 5. The purchase agreement required Panorama to provide a deposit of $300,000 by August 30, 2010. I find that Jaswant did not have sufficient funds to pay the deposit on that date. However, he was able to extend the payment date to November 17, 2010.

[102] Panorama's lack of funds also resulted in extensions of the closing date for the purchase of Lot 5. On April 5, 2011, Satgur and Panorama agreed to extend the completion date to June 30, 2011.

[103] In or before June 2010, Jaswant began to sell and receive deposits from persons who signed agreements to purchase lots that were to be subdivided from the Project. Most of these agreements showed Panorama as the seller. Instead of holding the deposits in trust, Panorama used them as part of the funds required to complete the purchase of Lot 5. By June 30, 2011, Panorama had deposited $516,000 in presale deposits into its Coast Capital Savings Account, which it provided to Buckley Hogan to partially fund the purchase.

[104] In June 2011, Jaswant asked Mr. Mattu to assist him in finding the additional funds necessary to complete the purchase of Lot 5. Mr. Mattu then introduced Jaswant to the plaintiff Jasprit Grewal.

[105] After some discussion, Mr. Grewal agreed to invest in the Project, utilizing his company, Grewal Management. Mr. Grewal's counsel summarized his evidence about his discussions with Jaswant as follows:

> Mr. Grewal described the meeting at Lot 1, at which Mr. Sangha indicated the neighboring lot, Lot 5, had to be purchased for the Project and that he and his > companies had purchased the other four lots. They exchanged telephone numbers, and Mr. Grewal left to think about the proposal. In a subsequent phone call, Mr. Sangha told Mr. Grewal that Mr. Grewal's $1.6 million contribution to the purchase of Lot 5 would be considered an investment in the Project, that Mr. Sangha would arrange for the paperwork to get ready for subdivision, Mr. Sangha would keep accounting records, Mr. Sangha and his companies would get the lands subdivided and bring fully-serviced lots to market, after which Mr. Grewal would receive a share proportionate to his financial contribution to the Project.

[106] This is an accurate summary of Mr. Grewal's evidence, which I accept to be true.

[107] Mr. Grewal testified that in a discussion a day or so later, Jaswant repeated this description of the proposal and confirmed that he would be responsible for completing the subdivision and selling lots. Mr. Grewal also stated that Jaswant assured him that he would keep accurate records of all expenses and that when the Project was completed there would be an accounting with the profits, after payment of all Project expenses, divided according to proven contributions to the Project.

[108] In these discussions, Jaswant was seeking Mr. Grewal's agreement to provide one half of the money needed to close the purchase of Lot 5. Jaswant told Mr. Grewal that he would provide the other half of the necessary funds. These discussions all occurred a short time before the completion date of June 30, 2011.

[109] On or about June 29, 2011, Panorama assigned a 50% interest in the contract to purchase Lot 5 to Grewal Management.

[110] At that time, Mr. Grewal's understanding was that Lot 5 was to be purchased for cash without obtaining any mortgage financing. However, shortly before the completion, Mr. Grewal learned that Panorama would be financing its half of the purchase through a mortgage from Manjeet Kaur Samra, Aman Mander, Azad Mander, and Ravinder Mander (the "Mander Mortgage"), to be secured against a 100% interest in Lot 5. On closing, title to Lot 5 was transferred to Panorama and Grewal Management, with each company having a 50% registered interest as tenants in common. Grewal Management was named as a mortgagor on the Mander Mortgage.

[111] The purchase of Lot 5 completed on June 30, 2011. On that date Grewal Management advanced $1,687,556.50 and Buckley Hogan provided $428,936.70 to pay part of the purchase price for Lot 5. The balance of the funds required to pay the purchase price came from the deposit and the proceeds of the Mander Mortgage in the principal amount of $1,000,000.

[112] Based on the evidence before me it therefore appears that, with the possible exception of $100,000, Panorama did not provide any of its own funds or any funds provided by Jaswant or other companies he owned for the purchase of Lot 5. Panorama's contribution to the amount necessary to complete the purchase of Lot 5 came from the proceeds of the Mander Mortgage, the deposits from purchasers referred to above, and the initial deposit of $300,000, $200,000 of which came from the funds 0892995 had provided to the October 2010 Joint Venture.

[113] On or about June 30, 2011, Grewal Management and the November 2010 Joint Venturers executed the 2011 JVA.

[114] The 2011 JVA divided Panorama's 28.5% proportionate share in the November 2010 Joint Venture in half, resulting in Panorama's and Grewal Management's respective shares being 14.25%. It also provided that all of the terms of the November 2010 JVA not expressly amended remained in full force and effect.

[115] Counsel has accurately summarized Mr. Grewal's evidence that Jaswant made the following statements to him in June 2011, some of which I have already discussed and some which I will address later in these reasons:

1. Jaswant reassured Mr. Grewal that the same terms in their oral agreement were applicable and Mr. Grewal understood that the registered owners would hold the land in trust;

2. Jaswant did not inform Mr. Grewal about the 2007 JVA or the Garchas' interest in the Project;

3. Jaswant told Mr. Grewal that he had paid the deposit for Lot 5; and

4. Jaswant told Mr. Grewal that Lots 1 to 4 in the Project had been purchased by him and his companies.

[116] I accept that Jaswant made the above statements to Mr. Grewal. I also accept that Jaswant did not inform Mr. Grewal about the Gill Judgment or Ms. Johl's certificate of pending litigation (both discussed below), each registered on certain Project lands.

[117] Mr. Grewal also testified that he had not seen the November 2010 JVA when he signed the 2011 JVA. While I accept his evidence to this effect, I do note that the 2011 JVA makes express reference to the November 2010 JVA and that there is no evidence that Mr. Grewal asked to see that document.

Mr. Mattu's investment

[118] Mr. Mattu invested in the Project before the execution of the November 2010 JVA and before Rajpreet became an investor. In or about 2007, Jaswant requested that Mr. Mattu advance him $400,000 as a loan, in consideration of which Jaswant would pay $500,000 to Mr. Mattu from the profits from Sangha Group 2. Later, Jaswant and Mr. Mattu agreed that rather than paying him $500,000, Jaswant would convert that amount into an investment by Mr. Mattu in the Project. Jaswant acknowledged in cross-examination that he and Mr. Mattu had agreed that the $500,000 would be converted into an investment in the Project, albeit on different terms than alleged by Mr. Mattu.

[119] Mr. Mattu made a number of advances in addition to the $500,000 of Sangha Group 2 proceeds. He testified that, with the exception of some funds advanced to Jaswant for the rebuilding of a house that had been damaged by fire, all of his further advances were made as an investment in the Project. However, Jaswant testified that at a certain point he and Mr. Mattu agreed that Mr. Mattu would become his "silent partner" in all of his real estate investments.

[120] In cross-examination, Jaswant admitted to agreeing with Mr. Mattu that $500,000 of the net proceeds from Sangha Group 2 was to be invested on

Mr. Mattu's behalf in the Project. I accept his evidence on this point, quoted from Mr. Mattu's counsel's argument:

> Q. Mr Sangha, I just want to clarify this: in the responses you just gave, am I correct that what you're testifying is this, when there funds flowing to 690 from the Sangha Group 2 subdivision, $500,000 of that money that came out of Sangha Group 2 subdivision was invested in the 60th Avenue subdivision on behalf of Mr. Mattu?
> A. Yes, that's correct.

[121] I am satisfied that the arrangements made with respect to obtaining Mr. Mattu's $500,000 investment and a further $488,791.45 advance on February 15, 2008, materially assisted in the acquisition and carrying costs of the Lots that went into the Project. On a balance of probabilities, given the proximity between the date of the further advance and the dates of June 23 and August 8, 2008, when 690174 advanced $211,490 and $388,227.53 to Buckley Hogan for the purchase of Lots 3 and 4, I find that most of Mr. Mattu's 2008 advance was used to pay the cash due on closing of those Lots. I also conclude that a number of further advances made by Mr. Mattu were used by 690174 or Jaswant to pay interest and other Project expenses.

[122] Jaswant's evidence about when the partnership he alleges with Mr. Mattu was formed is somewhat confusing. He denies that Mr. Mattu was his partner in Sangha Group 1 or 2. The thrust of his evidence appears to be that the partnership came into existence at or about the time that Jaswant became involved in another deal with Hardeep Singh Gill to have 690174 purchase land in Maple Ridge from Mr. Gill.

[123] Mr. Mattu testified that no such agreement was made. Except where I expressly state otherwise, I prefer the evidence of Mr. Mattu when it conflicts with that of Jaswant on this issue.

[124] The Trustee submits that Mr. Mattu admitted he was Jaswant's silent partner to Jaswant's lawyer, Sean Hogan. I accept that Mr. Mattu described himself as a silent partner in a telephone conversation with Mr. Hogan on or about February 21, 2014. This conversation occurred in the context of the preparation of mortgage documents over the phase 1 lots created by the Project in favour of the 2011 Joint Venturers.

[125] My conclusion, based on the evidence and the inherent unreliability of Jaswant's testimony, is that his testimony that Mr. Mattu was his silent partner in all of his dealings was not true. There is no written partnership agreement between Jaswant and Mr. Mattu. Jaswant did not communicate the existence of any such partnership with Mr. Mattu to anyone prior to this litigation. In particular, Jaswant did not disclose the existence of this partnership to the Trustee or in his statement of affairs in his bankruptcy. If such a partnership existed, it was Jaswant's legal duty to disclose it to the Trustee at the outset of his bankruptcy. He did not.

[126] Mr. Hogan prepared a memorandum of his dealing with respect to the mortgage described in para. 124. In that memorandum he recorded that his assistant had received instructions from Mr. Grewal and Ranjit to add Mr. Mattu as a mortgagee on the mortgage that was being prepared.

[127] Mr. Hogan was called as a witness by the defendants who introduced the memorandum into evidence. In my view the memorandum gives some insight into the nature of Mr. Mattu's involvement in the Project. While Mr. Hogan's assistant was not called as a witness, I am satisfied that the memorandum does accurately record the events leading up to its preparation.

[128] The memorandum states that it was Mr. Grewal and Ranjit Sangha who had first described Mr. Mattu as a silent partner. The context in which this statement was made makes it obvious that they were referring to Mr. Mattu as a silent partner in the Project. It is also apparent that by the time this memorandum was prepared in February 2014, there were financial pressures being put on the Project and that Mr. Mattu was attempting to document and protect his investment.

[129] I am satisfied that when Mr. Mattu referred to himself as Jaswant's silent partner in his phone call with Mr. Hogan he was referring to his investment in the Project and his attempt to be added to the mortgage over the subdivided lots. That conclusion is consistent with the subject matter of the discussion, because it appears that Mr. Mattu was attempting to obtain the same security for his advances to the Project that the registered members of the 2011 JVA were pursuing.

[130] There is no doubt that Mr. Mattu became heavily involved in the affairs of the Project as time went on. However, in my view, that involvement was consistent with his evidence that he agreed to become involved in the pursuit of the Project and that he had advanced a considerable amount of money to the Project by 2014.

[131] Mr. Mattu's investment was not a loan. There was no evidence that Jaswant or any of his companies assumed any obligation to repay Mr. Mattu's advances, nor was there evidence of any of the usual terms of a loan, such as the rate of interest.

[132] For reasons I will set out later, I have concluded that the agreement made between Mr. Mattu and Jaswant had all of the essential elements of a joint venture agreement pursuant to which Mr. Mattu acquired a beneficial interest in the Project.

[133] There is some dispute between Mr. Mattu and the Trustee over the actual amount Mr. Mattu advanced to the Project. Mr. Mattu submits that the net amount advanced on his behalf, after taking into account funds he received back, was $1,280,350.20. The Trustee's submission is that the net amount of Project-related advances was $894,991.25. The parties are in agreement on the amount of payments back to Mr. Mattu. However, they do not agree that all amounts advanced by Mr. Mattu were advanced for the benefit of the Project.

[134] In 2008, Mr. Mattu raised $488,791 to invest in the Project by mortgaging a property he owned. I agree with the Trustee's submission that the expenses incurred by Mr. Mattu in obtaining that mortgage should not be considered to be an investment in the Project. Mr. Mattu's key allegation is that he invested pursuant to an agreement that the investment would entitle him to an interest in the Project. In my view, the costs associated with raising the funds to be invested should be for Mr. Mattu's account and not treated as a Project investment.

[135] I therefore agree with the Trustee that the following expenses should be deducted from Mr. Mattu's investment:

1.	July 10, 2009: Cunningham and Rivard Appraisal	$870
2.	September 3, 2009: further appraisal fee	$1500
3.	September 9, 2009: Cheque to Hashmi relating to refinancing	$108,000
4.	September 29, 2009: Cunningham and Rivard	$1,938.75

[136] In addition, I agree with the Trustee that the advances on October 25, 2007, of $80,000 and December 5, 2007, of $26,000 have not been shown to relate to the Project and should not be allowed.

[137] I accept Mr. Mattu's evidence that the balance of the amounts he lists were advanced as an investment in the Project. I therefore find that Mr. Mattu's investment, net of repayments, was $1,062,041.45.

[138] On the evidence, it is clear that the funds advanced by Mr. Mattu made a material contribution to the acquisition of Lots 2 to 4 and to the successful completion of the Project.

Rajpreet Sangha's investment

[139] I accept Rajpreet's evidence with respect to his investment in the Project.

[140] In September or October 2010, Mr. Mattu asked Rajpreet if he would be interested in investing in a real estate project. Mr. Mattu knew Rajpreet because he had made deliveries to Rajpreet's convenience store. When Rajpreet expressed interest, Mr. Mattu introduced him to Jaswant.

[141] Jaswant came to Rajpreet's house and told him that he had the right to acquire lots in a subdivision project. Jaswant described the Project and proposed that Rajpreet, Mr. Mattu, and himself each put up $800,000 to acquire 7 lots each from the subdivided lots to be created by the Project. Rajpreet went to view another project that Jaswant was involved in at 50th Ave. and Number 10 Highway and decided to invest in Jaswant's proposal. Rajpreet asked Jaswant how to do so and Jaswant advised him to set up a company to make the investment. Rajpreet then incorporated 0892995. Jaswant told him that he would arrange for an agreement to be drawn up and would be responsible for taking all necessary steps to complete the proposed agreement.

[142] Jaswant arranged a meeting at Buckley Hogan in October 2010 where the October 2010 JVA was signed by 0892995, 0731431 (Mr. Mattu's company), and Panorama. Rajpreet testified that Mr. Mattu and Jaswant agreed to contribute $800,000 to the October 2010 Joint Venture. This evidence is consistent with the terms of the October 2010 JVA.

[143] The October 2010 JVA stated that it was formed for the purpose of acquiring certain subdivided lots in the Project, building homes on those lots, and selling them. The Preamble to the agreement stated that Panorama had the beneficial right to acquire those lots. Each party agreed to advance a minimum of $800,000 to be used for the purpose of pursuing the objects of the joint venture.

[144] The October 2010 JVA contained terms relevant to the issues in these proceedings, including:

1. In paragraphs 4.1 and 4.2, the October 2010 Joint Venturers agreed that each owned as tenants in common as their separate property an undivided beneficial one-third interest in the in the assets of the October 2010 Joint Venture.

2. Paragraph 9.4 provided that all receipts and disbursements with respect to the October 2010 Joint Venture would be made to a separate bank account maintained solely for that purpose.

[145] A few days after the October 2010 JVA was signed, Jaswant asked Rajpreet for $200,000. On or about October 25, 2010, 0892995 provided Panorama with a bank draft for $200,000. I find that these funds were provided pursuant to the terms of the October 2010 JVA. However, Jaswant did not use them for that purpose. It is not disputed that all of those funds were instead used as part of the deposit paid for the purchase of Lot 5. I find that Jaswant did not seek or obtain Rajpreet's consent to use the funds for that purpose.

[146] In December 2010, Jaswant told Rajpreet that lots in another project in which he was involved were not selling and that he could not come up with his contribution to the October 2010 Joint Venture. Mr. Mattu said that he would not contribute his $800,000 if Jaswant did not provide his funds. However, Jaswant said he had a new proposal for Rajpreet. He proposed that instead of investing in the October 2010 Joint Venture, Rajpreet should invest in the Project.

[147] Jaswant's proposal was that the funds that 0892995 has already provided, together with an additional $600,000, would be invested in the Project and that the profits from the Project would be divided in accordance with the contributions of each investor. Rajpreet agreed to proceed on that basis, providing Panorama with a bank draft for $300,000 and sometime later with $300,000 in cash.

[148] I find that Rajpreet provided these funds as an investment in the Project. I also infer that it was understood that the funds would be invested on the same terms as the October 2010 JVA; that is, that Rajpreet's investment would entitle him to a beneficial ownership interest in the Project based on his contribution.

[149] On November 17, 2010, Panorama paid a deposit of $300,000 on account of the purchase price for Lot 5. It is clear that $200,000 of that amount came from funds advanced by 0892995 pursuant to the October 2010 JVA.

[150] Schedule 6 of Exhibit 175, the Trustee's Summaries, indicates that $50,000 was transferred from Best Quality Homes Ltd. to Panorama on May 2, 2011, and that $10,000 was transferred on April 14, 2011. The Trustee attributes these transfers to funds provided by Rajpreet. Thus, even using the first in, first out ("FIFO") method of accounting used by the Trustee, which for reasons I will set out below I do not agree with, some $260,000 of funds provided by Rajpreet have been shown to have been used to acquire Lot 5.

[151] Jaswant may have used some of the funds advanced by 0892995 for purposes other than the Project. The evidence before me does not disclose what exactly Panorama used those funds for. However, I infer that most of the funds he provided were used to finance expenses related to the Project.

[152] By the time that Rajpreet made his last advance of $300,000, the November 2010 JVA had been executed. Therefore, the only means by which he could participate in the Project was by acquiring an interest in the November 2010 Joint Venture.

[153] I accept Rajpreet's evidence that he was not aware of the terms of the November 2010 JVA. However, I find that he had a reasonable expectation, based on Jaswant's proposal, that he would participate in the Project through having a proprietary interest in its assets.

[154] Jaswant admits to receiving $800,000 from Rajpreet and 0892995 but denies that he agreed that the advances were an investment in the Project. However, Jaswant was unable to give any other explanation as to the basis on which he obtained Rajpreet's funds.

[155] I am satisfied on the evidence that Jaswant was in need of funds to acquire Lot 5 when he made the agreements with Rajpreet and obtained his investment. I am also satisfied that a substantial portion of the funds advanced by Rajpreet made a direct contribution that was vital to the success of the Project, including paying the deposit for the purchase of Lot 5 and a substantial portion of the development costs for that Lot.

[156] By the time the November 2010 JVA was executed, 690174 had already acknowledged that it held title to Lot 1 as bare trustee for the participants in the October 2007 JVA. In addition, Panorama had also agreed that it would hold title to certain lots that it would receive from the subdivision of the 5 Lots as bare trustee for the participants in the October 2010 JVA. Jaswant and Mr. Mattu had also made the agreement whereby Mr. Mattu had invested more than $1,000,000 in the Project.

[157] Notwithstanding these previous agreements, in the November 2010 JVA 690174 covenanted that it was the beneficial owner of Lot 1 and Panorama covenanted that it had the right to become the beneficial owner of Lot 5. On the evidence before me the covenant with respect to Lot 1 was demonstrably untrue and the covenant with respect to Lot 5 was misleading because Panorama lacked the funds necessary to purchase Lot 5.

[158] In the result, by June 30, 2011, Jaswant and his companies had entered into a number of agreements with respect to the Project that conflicted with each other. This litigation arises as a direct consequence of those actions.

The Gill Judgment and Johl claim against 690174

[159] The Gill Judgment and the Johl Certificate of Pending Litigation are of fundamental importance to these proceedings. I will therefore describe them in some detail.

[160] 690714 appears to have been Jaswant's main operating company before he became involved in the Project. Notwithstanding the fact that 690174 agreed to hold legal title to Lot 1 in trust for the October 2007 Joint Venturers, Jaswant continued to carry on business unrelated to the Lot 1 Project in that company. He also failed to take any steps to insulate Lot 1 from 690174's other business activities, such as, for example, transferring the legal title to Lot 1 to another single-purpose legal entity.

[161] On or about November 19, 2007, one month after the 2007 JVA was executed, Jaswant caused 690174 to enter into an agreement with Hardeep Singh Gill to purchase property from him for development purposes. For reasons that were not put into evidence, 690174 did not complete its contract to purchase that property. As a result, Mr. Gill commenced an action against 690174 in this Court on May 12, 2009, alleging that 690174 had breached its contract to purchase the property and seeking specific performance or damages in lieu thereof for the breach.

[162] 690174 filed a statement of defence in the action on June 9, 2009, but on November 27, 2009, Mr. Gill obtained a judgment against it in the amount of approximately $750,000, plus costs.

[163] On December 1, 2009, Mr. Gill registered the Gill Judgment against Lot 1 in the Land Title Office. I find that Jaswant was fully aware of this action and of the 2009 registration of the judgment. Pursuant to s. 89(2) of the Court Order Enforcement Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 78, the Registrar of Land Titles must send a notice of the registration of a certificate of judgment together with a copy of the certificate of judgment to the registered owner of the property against which it has been registered. I therefore infer that Jaswant was aware of the registration of the Gill Judgment in January 2010, when he had the 2007 Joint Venturers execute the amendment to the 2007 JVA. I find that Jaswant did not inform the other 2007 Joint Venturers of the registration of the Gill Judgment at that time or thereafter.

[164] On October 14, 2010, Sarabpaul Kaur Johl commenced an action against 690174 and Jaswant seeking an order for specific performance or damages in lieu thereof in respect of an agreement she alleged she had made to purchase a lot that was to be subdivided from Lots 1 and 2 of the Project. Pursuant to this action, Ms. Johl filed a Certificate of Pending Litigation against Lots 1 and 2 in the Land Title Office on October 27, 2010 (the “Johl CPL”). I note that this was very close in time to the October 2010 JVA.

[165] It is common ground that the registration of the Gill Judgment and the filing of the Johl CPL prevented the registration of any subdivision plan as long as they remained registered. It is also clear that no institutional financing could have been obtained on the security of lands registered in the name of 690174 or the registered owners of Lot 2 as long as these charges remained on title to the Project lands.

[166] I find that Jaswant did not disclose the Gill Judgment or the Johl CPL to the Garchas, Mr. Grewal, or Rajpreet prior to June 2011. However, it is probable that Mr. Mattu was aware of them because of his involvement in the Project.

The Virk Mortgage

[167] Despite the registration of the Gill Judgment and the Johl CPL, Jaswant continued with efforts to complete the subdivision of Lots 1 to 5. However, it was critical that these charges be removed from title before the subdivision could be completed. To that end, in the fall of 2011 Jaswant arranged a loan from Jatinder Virk, Mr. Grewal's sister-in-law, in the amount of $900,000 to provide security for the discharge of the Gill Judgment and Johl CPL.

[168] A number of complex steps were taken to provide security for the loan from Ms. Virk without the registration of a mortgage against Lots 1 to 5. The loan was structured as a loan to Mr. Mattu, his wife, and Raveen, secured by a mortgage over two properties owned by the Mattus and the property registered in Raveen's name on which Jaswant and Parmjit resided. Mr. Mattu and his wife were named as co-borrowers on this mortgage. This mortgage was registered in the New Westminster Land Title Office on October 14, 2011.

[169] As further security for her loan, Ms. Virk was granted two unregistered mortgages over a number of properties, including Lot 1, Lot 3, the undivided half interest in Lot 5 registered in Panorama's name, Jaswant's interest in Lot 4, and Jaswant and Parmjit's interest in Lot 2.

[170] The unregistered mortgages were executed on October 13, 2011, and were held in escrow by a law firm in Surrey subject to conditions for release to the mortgagee on certain events of default.

[171] The proceeds of the Virk mortgage were used to provide security to discharge the Gill Judgment and the Johl CPL from title to the affected properties, thus permitting the Project to move forward. However, the success of the Project thereby depended on its completion and sale before the Virk mortgage became enforceable. In addition, the Virk Mortgage added over $1,000,000 in debt secured by some of the Project lands, including Lot 1.

[172] In these proceedings Jaswant has acknowledged that the Virk Mortgage was his responsibility because it was taken out to satisfy an obligation that was unrelated to the Project and for his sole benefit.

[173] I take Jaswant's statements to be an acknowledgement that he was using Lot 1 for an improper purpose. I find that he was aware of the impropriety of his actions at the time he undertook them.

[174] The arrangements made with Ms. Virk did however permit mortgage financing to be obtained and allowed the subdivision to proceed.

The Ludu Mortgage

[175] On December 9, 2011, Jaswant and Parmjit granted a mortgage of Lot 3 to Rattan Singh Ludu, securing the principal amount of $270,250 with an annual interest rate of 25% (the “Ludu Mortgage”).

[176] The Ludu Mortgage was granted after the execution of the joint venture agreements and, in particular, after Jaswant and Parmjit had agreed that their legal title to Lot 3 was held beneficially for all of the members of the 2011 Joint Venture.

[177] The proceeds of the Ludu Mortgage were paid to Jaswant and Parmjit. There is no evidence that the proceeds of the Ludu Mortgage were used in the Project. In his Preliminary Report, the Trustee stated that little is known about this mortgage. However, in the Agreed Statement of Facts the parties agreed that on December 12, 2011, the solicitors who acted on behalf of the mortgagee issued a cheque for $250,000 to Jaswant and Parmjit. I find that this cheque was the net amount advanced under the Ludu Mortgage and that Jaswant and Parmjit have not shown that these funds were used in the Project.

The WSCU mortgages

[178] On February 10, 2012, Westminster Savings Credit Union (“WSCU”) issued a commitment letter to 690174 and the other 2011 Joint Venturers granting approval of development financing to complete the Project. Mr. Grewal and his wife Gurmeet Grewal (the “Grewal Guarantors”) agreed to guarantee the WSCU financing. The commitment letter provided for a first advance to discharge all Acquisition Mortgages. It also provided for subsequent advances pursuant to a development mortgage.

[179] On March 19, 2012, WSCU advanced the sum of $6,603,604.65 pursuant to its mortgage. This advance paid out the outstanding balances on all of the Acquisition Mortgages.

[180] The following table sets out the amount advanced under each of the Acquisition Mortgages and the amounts advanced to pay out the outstanding balances owing, as set out in the Agreed Statement of Facts:

Acquisition Mortgage or Replacement	Original Balance	Paid March 2012 (to nearest dollar)
1. PCMIC Mortgage Lot 1	$1,750,000	$1,948,596
2. TD Canada Lot 2	$750,000	$668,951
3. RBC Lot 3	$945,000	$845,029
4. G&F Credit Union Lot 4	$994,196	$927,041
5. Mander Mortgage Lot 5	$1,000,000	$1,115,974

[181] In addition, $740,498 was paid to Grewal Management, $322,206 was used to repay the Ludu Mortgage, and $34,905 was paid to the City of Surrey for taxes from the proceeds of the WSCU Mortgage.

[182] On June 13, 2012, the 2011 Joint Venturers executed a further mortgage in favour of WSCU to provide construction financing of up to $6,082,500 for the Project. In connection with this mortgage, the 2011 Joint Venturers also executed a construction loan agreement setting out the terms on which funds would be advanced. As part of the financing arrangements with WSCU, a Project chequing account was established at WSCU. Cheques drawn on this account required the signatures of any two of Jaswant, Ranjit, and Mr. Grewal. While it is not expressly set out in the evidence, it appears that Project expenses from that date forward were paid from this account.

The Land Swap Agreement and subdivision

[183] As part of the Project, Jaswant negotiated a land swap agreement (the “Land Swap Agreement”) with the Anglican Diocese of New Westminster, whereby a portion of Lot 1 was exchanged for a portion of a large lot owned by the Diocese adjacent to Lot 1. This swap increased the number of subdivided lots that could be created from the Project.

[184] The Land Swap Agreement was dated June 1, 2011, but was actually executed on or about January 3, 2012. It contemplated 690174 acting as a developer and registering certain subdivision plans to give effect to the agreement. As part of that process the 2011 Joint Venturers and the Synod of the Diocese of New Westminster conveyed their interests in the Project lands and the Diocese lands to Raveen in trust for purposes of subdivision.

[185] On November 29, 2012, Raveen consolidated and subdivided Lots 1 to 5 and the Diocese Lands into 30 lots, one of which was conveyed to the Diocese (the "Church Lot").

Subdivision of Lots

[186] After the Land Swap Agreement was completed and the Church Lot was conveyed to the Diocese of New Westminster, two further subdivisions were effected, resulting in the creation of 81 subdivided lots in total.

[187] The steps taken to effect the subdivisions are set out in paragraphs 120 to 136 of the Agreed Statement of Facts and I need not repeat them here. The registered titles to the subdivided lots varied from the proportionate ownership interests of the parties set out in the 2011 JVA. However, the 2011 JVA provided that the registered interest in each lot was held by the registered owner or owners of that lot in trust for all of the members of the 2011 Joint Venture in accordance with their proportionate shares set out in that agreement.

[188] Beginning in 2010, although there was no evidence before me to indicate that proper regulatory approval had been obtained to do so, Jaswant began entering into agreements to sell lots in the Project. Once the subdivision plans had been registered, lot sales began to be completed. The first receipts for these lots were paid to WSCU to pay down the amount secured by its mortgages.

Further legal proceedings

[189] On March 14, 2014, Jatinder Virk commenced foreclosure proceedings against Lot 3. On September 2, 2014, she amended her petition to seek a declaration of a prior mortgage affecting the lots created by the Project and filed a certificate of pending litigation against those lots in the New Westminster Land Title Office. These steps temporarily prevented completion of the sale of further lots in the Project.

[190] The Grewal Action was commenced on April 2, 2014. In general terms, it alleged that the Grewal plaintiffs had the right to share in the proceeds of sale of the subdivided lots based on contributions to the Project made pursuant to oral agreements with Jaswant, 690174, and Panorama.

[191] On or about July 17, 2014, Jaswant provided a demand promissory note from 690174 payable to Mr. Garcha as lender in the amount of $484,252 (the “Promissory Note”). The Promissory Note stated that the lender agreed that this amount represented the amount paid to 690174 as the lender’s contribution to the 2007 Joint Venture. However, the note was not signed by Mr. Garcha.

[192] On October 7, 2014, WSCU began foreclosure proceedings to enforce its mortgage security over the subdivided lots and filed certificates of pending litigation in respect of its mortgage against all of the subdivided lots.

[193] The Garcha Action was commenced on February 16, 2015, asserting that the Garchas had rights pursuant to the 2007 JVA. In it, Mr. Garcha also sought judgment on the Promissory Note.

[194] 690174 did not defend the Garcha Action, and on March 17, 2015, Mr. Garcha took default judgment on the Promissory Note in its amount together with costs and Court Order Interest.

[195] On May 19, 2015, Justice Harvey granted an order nisi of foreclosure in the Jatinder Virk foreclosure proceedings (the “Harvey Order”). The Trustee places considerable reliance on this order, because in it the Court declared that the Virk mortgage ranked in priority to the interests of the respondents and those claiming by, through, or under them. The Garchas were named as respondents in this foreclosure proceeding, although it appears that their counsel did not attend at the hearing.

[196] One week later, on May 26, 2015, Justice Masuhara made an order in petition S-153116, commenced by other members of the 2007 Joint Venture, converting that petition to an action and setting out a sales procedure for the remaining unsold subdivided lots. This order expressly reserved the rights of all parties.

[197] On August 24, 2015, Jaswant made a voluntary assignment in bankruptcy, and Crowe Mackay & Company was appointed as his Trustee.

[198] On April 18, 2016, the Trustee obtained leave of the Court to assign 690174 and Panorama into bankruptcy. Those companies were assigned into bankruptcy on April 21, 2016, with Crowe Mackay being appointed Trustee in both bankruptcies.

[199] On May 11, 2016, the Court made a sales process order in these proceedings which resulted in all proceeds from the sale of lots, after payment of the WSCU Mortgage, being placed in trust with the Trustee's counsel for the 2011 Joint Venturers. The proceeds were placed in separate trust accounts depending upon which 2011 Joint Venturer was the registered owner of the lot from which the proceeds were derived (the "Vendor Trust Accounts"). However, the Trustee recognizes that the amounts attributed to each party must be adjusted to reflect their proportionate interests set out in the 2011 JVA.

[200] By October 28, 2016, all lots had been sold and the net proceeds deposited with the Trustee's solicitors in the Vendor Trust Accounts.

[201] The net proceeds of sale after satisfaction of the amounts owed to WSCU were $15,441,090.52. From those proceeds, $1,602,942.51 was paid to satisfy the Virk Mortgage. In addition, builders liens of $410,734.62 and $37,110.34 were paid from the funds held in trust.

[202] In the course of the administration of the Bankruptcies, the plaintiffs in the Grewal and Garcha Actions filed proofs of claim against the Bankrupts. I need not detail them because, as I have already decided, the rights of the parties will be decided de novo in these reasons. It is sufficient to say that the Trustee either disallowed the claims or decided that they were equity claims that were postponed to the claims of all other creditors pursuant to s. 140.1 of the BIA.

Issues Raised in the Proceedings

[203] I outlined the orders that have led to this trial in the course of dealing with the procedural issues earlier in these reasons.

[204] The parties raise a multitude of issues. However, in my view, many of the arguments and submissions seek the same result by relying on different theories of liability or defence.

[205] The cornerstone of the Trustee's position is that the claims of the Garcha and Grewal plaintiffs' claims are equity claims, as that term is defined in the BIA, and are therefore postponed to the claims of other creditors of the Bankrupts. However, in order to determine that issue I must first consider the nature of the relationships between the plaintiffs and the defendants as well as the nature of the plaintiffs' interests in the Project. I will therefore first determine the rights of the parties without reference to the BIA, then consider how the Bankruptcies have affected those rights.

Issues in the Garcha Action

[206] The following issues arise in the Garcha Action:

1. What was the nature of the relationship between the Garchas and 690174 created by the 2007 JVA? Was it a binding agreement and did it create a trust?

2. Did Jaswant and 690174 owe fiduciary duties to the Garchas, and if so, what was the extent of those duties?

3. Did 690174 and Jaswant breach any fiduciary duties they owed to the Garchas?

4. If Jaswant and 690174 breached their fiduciary duties to the Garchas, are any of the other defendants liable to the Garchas on the basis of knowing assistance or knowing receipt?

5. Are the Garchas entitled to a remedy against the lots created by the Project?

6. By taking judgment on the Promissory Note did Mr. Garcha elect a remedy that precludes the Garchas from pursuing their claims to an interest in the subdivided lots?

7. Are any defences raised by the defendants a bar to the remedies sought by the Garchas?

Issues in the Grewal Action

[207] I will deal with the claim of Rajpreet Sangha as part of the Grewal Action even though he represented himself at trial.

[208] The issues raised in the Grewal Action are:

1. What was the nature of the various Grewal plaintiffs' involvement in the Project? In particular, were any binding oral joint venture agreements made between any of the Grewal plaintiffs and the defendants? If there were any such agreements, what were their terms?

2. What is the relevance of the October 2010 JVA?

3. Are the November 2010 and 2011 JVAs valid and binding agreements in accordance with their terms, and if so, what is the relationship between them and the oral agreements alleged by the Grewal plaintiffs? To what extent are the defendants other than Jaswant, 690174, and Panorama bound by those alleged oral agreements?

4. Did Jaswant have the authority to bind the members of the November 2010 Joint Venture to any agreements made with Grewal Management, Mr. Mattu, and Rajpreet?

5. If the alleged oral agreements are established, what remedies are appropriate?

6. Did the Bankrupts owe fiduciary duties to the Grewal plaintiffs, and if so, did they breach those duties? What remedies are appropriate?

7. Do any of the Grewal plaintiffs have a claim in unjust enrichment against the defendants?

Issues in the Bankruptcy Appeals

[209] The following issues arise in the Bankruptcy Appeals:

1. Are the remedies sought by the Garcha plaintiffs and Grewal plaintiffs against the Bankrupts equity claims subordinated to the claims of all other creditors pursuant to s. 140.1 of the BIA?

2. What effect do the Bankruptcies have on remedies that might otherwise have been available to the plaintiffs and, in particular, on the granting of constructive trusts over the proceeds of sale of the Project?

Discussion of Garcha Claims

Did the 2007 JVA create a trust of which the Garchas were beneficiaries?

[210] The Garchas' claim is based on their status as signatories to the 2007 JVA. I set out some of the terms of that agreement earlier in these reasons at para. 76.

[211] The Garchas' position is that 690174 and Jaswant owed fiduciary duties pursuant to the 2007 JVA that prevented them from taking any benefit from 691074's legal title to Lot 1, other than 690174's contingent right to the revenue received if Lot 1 was subdivided into more than 22 lots. The Garchas submit that the 2007 JVA created a trust of which they and the other 2007 Joint Venturers were the beneficiaries that can be traced into the subdivided lots and revenue they generated.

[212] In his evidence, Mr. Garcha testified that his understanding of the 2007 JVA was that in consideration of contributing between $50,000 and $60,000 per lot, he and his wife would receive seven lots once the subdivision of Lot 1 was completed. He testified that Jaswant had described the investment to him this way, and that this was his expectation when he contributed funds to the Project.

[213] Although they initially took a different position, in their final arguments the defendants and the Grewal parties conceded that the 2007 JVA is a valid and binding agreement. However, their position is that it does not create a beneficial interest for the 2007 Joint Ventures in the subdivided lots created by the Project. They say that the elements necessary to create an enforceable trust with respect to those lots are absent in this case.

[214] The Trustee and the Grewal plaintiffs concede that 690174 acquired and held Lot 1 in trust for the 2007 Joint Venturers. However, the Trustee, supported by all of the defendants, takes the position that that trust was extinguished by the development process and that the 2007 Joint Venturers have only a contractual right against 690174 to share in its profits from the Project.

[215] In addition, the defendants submit that if there was an agreement that the Garchas were entitled to receive specific lots created from the subdivision of Lot 1, that agreement did not create a valid trust because it lacked the three certainties required to establish a trust: (i) certainty of intention, (ii) certainty of object, and (iii) certainty of subject matter.

[216] While the Grewal parties do not oppose the Garchas sharing in the proceeds of the Project, they support the defendants' position that the 2007 JVA did not create a valid trust in the subdivided lots because there was no certainty as to the subject matter of the trust. They submit that certainty was lacking because the agreement did not specify which lots each 2007 Joint Venturer would receive on subdivision and provided no mechanism pursuant to which the court could determine that issue.

[217] I do not accept this submission. I find that the subject matter of the trust was Lot 1 and all other assets of the 2007 Venture. I am also of the view that the 2007 JVA adequately describes the rights of the members of the joint venture on the subdivision of Lot 1. It provides a formula for division of the net proceeds of the subdivision, based on the number of subdivided lots created by the subdivision process. In my view the existence of such a formula meets the requirement for certainty of subject matter. In Donovan W.M. Waters et al., Waters' Law of Trusts in Canada, 4th ed. (Toronto: Thomson Reuters Canada Limited, 2012) at 163, the principle is stated as follows:

> When the courts say there must be certainty of subject-matter, they mean that the property must either be described in the trust instrument, or there must be a "formula or method given for identifying it". This latter form of certainty more often occurs with fixing the quantum of beneficiaries' interests, but it can occur with the whole trust property.

[218] I agree that the 2007 JVA did not give the Garchas the right to take title to specific lots created by the subdivision. It may be that Mr. Garcha's subjective understanding of the transaction was that he and Ms. Garcha would receive title to seven lots on subdivision, subject to payment of costs of $50,000 to $60,000 per lot. However, subject to certain exceptions that are not present in this case, his subjective understanding is not admissible to vary or alter the express terms of the 2007 JVA.

[219] The Trustee submits that the object and purpose of the 2007 JVA was the subdivision of Lot 1 into residential lots, the sale of those lots, and the division of the net profits after expenses among the 2007 Joint Venturers. His position is that the 2007 JVA is a commercial agreement that limits the rights of the 2007 Joint Venturers to a contractual right to a share of the net profits from the sale of subdivided lots. The Trustee also argues that the commercial nature of the 2007 JVA negates any fiduciary obligations except those that arose out of the bare trust over Lot 1.

[220] The Trustee made extensive written submissions on the principles of contractual interpretation in support of his argument that 690174 owed no fiduciary duties and that the members of the 2007 Joint Venture had no proprietary interest in the proceeds of sale of lots subdivided out of Lot 1.

[221] I find these submissions to be without merit.

[222] The principles of contractual interpretation are well settled. They were restated by Justice Rothstein in Sattva Capital Corp. v. Creston Moly Corp., 2014 SCC 53 [Sattva] at para. 47:

> Regarding the first development, the interpretation of contracts has evolved towards a practical, common-sense approach not dominated by technical rules of construction. The overriding concern is to determine "the intent of the parties and the scope of their understanding" (Jesuit Fathers of Upper Canada v. Guardian Insurance Co. of Canada, 2006 SCC 21, [2006] 1 S.C.R. 744, at para. 27, per LeBel J.; see also Tercon Contractors Ltd. v. British Columbia (Transportation and Highways), 2010 SCC 4, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 69, at paras. 64-65, per Cromwell J.). To do so, a decision-maker must read the contract as a whole, giving the words used their ordinary and grammatical meaning, consistent with the surrounding circumstances known to the parties at the time of formation of the contract. Consideration of the surrounding circumstances recognizes that ascertaining contractual intention can be difficult when looking at words on their own, because words alone do not have an immutable or absolute meaning:
>
> > No contracts are made in a vacuum: there is always a setting in which they have to be placed... . In a commercial contract it is certainly right that the court should know the commercial purpose of the contract and this in turn presupposes knowledge of the genesis of the transaction, the background, the context, the market in which the parties are operating.

[223] As a general rule the subjective intention or understanding of a party to a contract is irrelevant to its proper interpretation. The object of the interpretation of a contract is to determine what the parties using the words in the relevant circumstances would reasonably have been understood to mean.

[224] I find that the only reasonable interpretation of the 2007 JVA is that each 2007 Joint Venturer is the beneficial owner of their proportionate share of all of the assets of the 2007 Joint Venture. This is made clear by paragraph 4.2, which I have set out above, but will repeat here:

> The Joint Venturers each own as tenants in-common, as their separate property, an undivided beneficial interest in the Project and the Joint Venture Assets in the ratio of their respective Proportionate Shares.

[225] Any doubt about the meaning of this provision is removed by the definition of Joint Venture Assets found at paragraph 1.1(d):

> "Joint Venture Assets" means all property and assets of the Joint Venture, both real and personal, tangible and intangible, including, without limitation, goodwill, interests in contracts, money and bank accounts"

[226] Preambles B and C of the 2007 JVA provide:

> B. The parties have agreed to form a joint venture (the Joint Venture) for the purpose of investing in the Lands for the purpose of developing, subdividing same into approximately 22 RF-9 residential lots and the reselling of the aforesaid lots;
>
> C. The Company (690174) shall hold legal title to the Lands and develop it as bare trustee on behalf of the Joint Venturers;

[227] Paragraph 3.2 of the agreement gives effect to this intention:

> The Joint Venturers hereby associate themselves into and as a joint venture for the purpose of:
>
> a) combining their skills, experience and resources to develop and subdivide the Lands into approximately 22 RF-9 residential lots and resell the aforesaid lots;
>
> b) doing all things incidental thereto;
> (together, the "Project")

[228] These provisions clearly spell out that each of the 2007 Joint Venturers is the beneficial owner of an undivided proportionate interest in the assets of the 2007 Joint Venture. At the time the 2007 JVA was executed, title to Lot 1 had already been acquired, utilizing in large part funds contributed by the 2007 Joint Venturers other than 690174. The express purpose of the 2007 Joint Venture was to develop that lot on behalf of all of the 2007 Joint Venturers. From the outset, each of the 2007 Joint Venturers was a beneficial owner of a proportionate share of all of the assets of the 2007 Joint Venture, including Lot 1.

[229] In his written submissions, the Trustee also takes the position that the purpose of the bare trust was "spent" and came to an end upon the subdivision of

Lot 1. In this regard he repeats his submission that as of that date the sole right of the 2007 Joint Venturers was a contractual right to share in the net proceeds after payment of expenses. The Trustee further submits that 690174 had the right and authority to convey legal and equitable title to the subdivided lots to purchasers of those lots, subject only to the contractual obligation to share the profits with the other 2007 Joint Venturers.

[230] These submissions are unsupportable in view of the express terms of the 2007 JVA and the law relating to fiduciary duties that arise in the context of a joint venture.

[231] The rights and obligations arising under a joint venture agreement are of fundamental importance in determining the position of the parties both before and after bankruptcy. The characteristics of a joint venture were addressed by Justice Goldie of the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Canlan Investment Corp. v. Gettling, [1997] B.C.J. No. 1647:

> 30 Counsel reviewed for us many authorities on the subject of joint ventures. The chambers judge laid some emphasis on the fact that from the outset it was intended the two venturers would own shares in a company owning and operating the ice facility, rather than having a direct property interest in that facility. Thus, the relationship of the two would be governed not by a joint venture agreement but by company law applied to a shareholders' agreement. He was influenced by the judgment of the Nova Scotia Supreme Court in Central Mortgage & Housing Corp. v. Graham (1973), 43 D.L.R. (3d) 686 where Mr. Justice Jones canvassed the existing authorities with particular reference to Williston on Contracts, 3d Ed., (N.Y.,1959).
> 31 I refer, as did Mr. Justice Jones, to pp. 563-5 of this text, and in particular to p.563:
>
> > Besides the requirement that a joint venture must have a contractual basis, the courts have laid down certain additional requisites deemed essential for the existence of a joint venture. Although its existence depends on the facts and circumstances of each particular case, and while no definite rules have been promulgated which will apply generally to all situations, the decisions are in substantial agreement that the following factors must be present:
> >
> > (a) A contribution by the parties of money, property, effort, knowledge, skill or other asset to a common undertaking;
> >
> > (b) A joint property interest in the subject matter of the venture;
> >
> > (c) A right of mutual control or management of the enterprise;

> (d) Expectation of profit, or the presence of "adventure," as it is sometimes called;
>
> (e) A right to participate in the profits;
>
> (f) Most usually, limitation of the objective to a single undertaking or ad hoc enterprise.
>
> [Emphasis added by Justice Goldie]
> 32 While the "decisions" referred to are mainly from jurisdictions in the United States, I regard the foregoing when read with the 1993 supplement as a reasonable and compendious statement of the characteristics of a joint venture.

[232] Canlan was cited by Justice Wedge in Blue Line Hockey Acquisition Co., Inc. v. Orca Bay Hockey Limited Partnership, 2008 BCSC 27, which has in turn been cited in a number of subsequent decisions of this Court.

[233] The above quotation recognizes that the members of a joint venture have a joint property interest in the subject matter of the joint venture. Unlike a partnership, a joint venture does not own the property that is the subject matter of the joint venture. Instead, the persons forming the joint venture own the property in their proportionate shares, unless the parties make an agreement to the contrary.

[234] The rights, including the property rights, of the 2007 Joint Venturers must be determined by the terms of the 2007 JVA. In my view those terms make it clear that each 2007 Joint Venturer is the beneficial owner of its proportionate share of the assets of the 2007 Joint Venture. It is that beneficial ownership that entitles them to share in the net proceeds of the 2007 Joint Venture. This right is not derived through 690174, as the Trustee seems to have assumed.

[235] The nature of the ownership of property that is the subject matter of a joint venture was considered by the Alberta Law Reform Institute's 2012 publication Joint Ventures, Final Report 99 at page 18:

> If joint ventures are allowed to declare themselves not to be partnerships, questions may arise as to ownership of property owned by the non-partnership joint venturers respectively and committed to the joint venture, and as to the ownership of property acquired in the course of the joint venture. If the joint venture contract provides for the ownership of the property, its provisions will prevail. If the joint venture contract is silent on the question, in the absence of any legislative provision, property committed by a joint venturer for the use of the joint venture will presumably remain the > property of the joint venturer, while property acquired in the course of the joint venture will presumably be co-owned by the joint venturers.

[236] I also conclude that the beneficial ownership interests of the 2007 Joint Venturers are traceable into 690174's proportionate share of the 2011 Joint Venture and do not form part of the assets of 690174 divisible among its creditors.

690174 and Jaswant owed fiduciary duties to the 2007 Joint Venturers

[237] I find that 690174 and Jaswant owed a fiduciary duty to the 2007 Joint Venturers by virtue of the terms of the 2007 JVA and Jaswant's de facto control of its affairs.

[238] The preponderance of authority establishes that the members of a joint venture owe fiduciary duties to the joint venture and to one another when they are dealing with the property or enterprise that is the subject of the joint venture. Those duties are restricted to the objects of the joint venture and may be altered by agreement or by the particular circumstances of a case. In this regard, the members of a joint venture are not generally restricted from carrying on other activities that they might be precluded from pursuing if they were in a partnership.

[239] I adopt the analysis of the circumstances in which fiduciary duties in a joint venture arise set out by Justice Butler, when he was a member of this court, in Smithies Holdings Inc. v. RCV Holdings Ltd., 2014 BCSC 1688. In my view, the following paragraphs from Smithies Holdings apply to the duties owed by 690174 pursuant to the 2007 JVA:

> 73 The finding that a disclosure obligation may arise by implication from the terms of the JV Agreement does not preclude a finding that the Joint Venturers are in a fiduciary relationship. The fact the obligation arises between them in relation to the management of the JV is important. Messrs. Hong, Smithies and Vandekerkhove, as officers and directors of Spearpoint, were placed in the position of fiduciaries with regard to the management of that company. Of course, the management tasks of the company are restricted to the business of the JV. The Lands, the primary asset of the JV, are held in trust by Spearpoint, and pursuant to Article 6 of the JV Agreement, the Board of Directors of Spearpoint is responsible for the "overall management and control of the Joint Venture". Given this structure, it is difficult to see how the obligation of honesty and good faith owed by the individuals as directors and officers of Spearpoint, does not also apply to the Joint Venturers in relation to their dealings with the business of the JV. Of > course, as directors and officers of Spearpoint the individuals are in a per se fiduciary relationship with one another. As Joint Venturers, they cannot escape the nature of that relationship just because the business of Spearpoint is one step removed from the JV.

> 74 In addition, it is difficult to see how the terms of the JV Agreement which permit the Joint Venturers to compete in other land transactions could eliminate the existence of the obligation of full disclosure in relation to this common venture. In other words, while the nature of the obligations owed may be reduced or narrowed by the terms of the JV Agreement, the Joint Venturers remain in a common venture and there is no principled reason why they should not continue to owe the duties of full disclosure and a duty not to make a secret profit in relation to this common venture. I conclude the parties were in a per se fiduciary relationship.

[240] In Zynik Capital Corp. v. Faris, 2007 BCSC 527, Justice Tysoe emphasized that fiduciary duties are not owed between parties who are negotiating for a joint venture but do arise after they have entered into one:

> 131 Counsel for Mr. Faris (whose submission in this regard was adopted by counsel for Intergulf) submits that no concurrent fiduciary duties were owed because Intergulf and Zynik were sophisticated commercial entities dealing at arm's length with no power imbalance between them. In my view, a distinction must be made between negotiations for the creation of a joint venture and dealings after the joint venture has been formed. I accept that parties who are negotiating with each other at arm's length to form a joint venture will not owe fiduciary duties to each other. However, the situation changes once the joint venture is formed. For example, in the context of this case, I think it is clear that, during the subsistence of the joint venture, both Zynik and Intergulf owed each other the fiduciary duty not to acquire the opportunity for themself to the exclusion of the other.

[241] In this case 690174 held title to Lot 1 in trust for the 2007 Joint Venturers. 690174 agreed that as bare trustee of Lot 1 it was responsible for applying for all necessary permits required for the development and subdivision of Lot 1. The development and subdivision of Lot 1 was the very object of the 2007 Joint Venture. In addition, Jaswant was personally appointed manager of the 2007 Joint Venture project and was the sole director and directing mind of 690174. In my view this gave rise to a per se fiduciary duty on 690174 and Jaswant.

[242] I am also satisfied that the circumstances of this case imposed an ad hoc fiduciary duty on 690174 and Jaswant. Given the terms of the 2007 JVA and the fact that it was clear that Jaswant assumed full control over the affairs of the 2007 Joint Venture, I find that the 2007 Joint Venturers had the right to expect that 690174 and Jaswant would act in the mutual interests of the parties to the 2007 JVA to the exclusion of their several interests: Hodgkinson v. Simms, [1994] 3 S.C.R. 377 at 407.

[243] The Trustee relied on the fact that 690174 was a bare trustee of Lot 1 and cited a number of cases in support of the proposition that a bare trustee owes only a limited fiduciary duty to the beneficiaries of the trust. However, those cases do not stand for the proposition that the bare trustee may treat the subject matter of the trust as its own property. As pointed out in one of the Trustee's authorities, Scoretz v. Kensam Enterprises Inc., 2018 BCCA 66 at paras. 21-30, at a minimum a bare trustee has the obligation to transfer legal title to the beneficiaries of the trust upon request.

[244] Despite arguing that 690174 owed only limited fiduciary duties as a bare trustee, the Trustee argues that 690174 had full authority to subdivide Lot 1 and transfer title to the subdivided lots to purchasers. These submissions are inconsistent. More importantly, they ignore the fact that 690174 used its registered title to take steps that profoundly affected the beneficial ownership rights of the 2007 Joint Venturers.

[245] 690174 not only held title to Lot 1 in trust but also undertook the responsibility to apply for all necessary permits required for the development and subdivision of Lot 1. It is clear that by virtue of holding legal title to Lot 1, 690174 had the ability to affect the rights of all of the 2007 Joint Venturers. This made them vulnerable to the actions of 690174. The elements necessary to establish both an ad hoc fiduciary duty (as set out in more detail at para. 474 of these reasons) and a per se fiduciary duty on 690174 were therefore present in this case.

[246] The fiduciary duties owed by 690174 and Jaswant extended to all dealings with Lot 1 that could have affected the 2007 Joint Venturers' beneficial ownership of that lot. They also extended to all steps taken to pursue the commercial objective of the 2007 JVA, which was to subdivide Lot 1 for the benefit of the 2007 Joint Venturers.

Breaches of duty by 690174 and Jaswant

[247] As fiduciaries, 690174 and Jaswant were required to act honestly, in good faith, and in the best interests of the 2007 Joint Venture when exercising the powers they held by virtue of their position. This duty extended to avoiding any action that resulted in an unauthorized benefit to themselves and to obtaining the fully informed consent of the members of the 2007 Joint Venture prior to the taking of any action pursuant to those powers that could adversely affect them.

[248] I find that 690174 and Jaswant undertook a number of actions that breached those duties, including the following:

1. Permitting financial charges that arose from 690174's outside dealings to be registered against Lot 1.

2. Registering other financial charges against Lot 1 to provide security for obligations incurred by 690174 in pursuit of its separate business interests.

3. Purporting to transfer the beneficial ownership of Lot 1 to the members of the November 2010 and 2011 Joint Ventures.

4. Entering into the Land Swap Agreement, which transferred a significant portion of Lot 1 to the Anglican Diocese of New Westminster in exchange for land that was utilized for the benefit of the 2011 Joint Venturers without obtaining the informed consent of the 2007 Joint Venturers.

5. Executing a mortgage over Lot 1 to secure the WSCU financing that was used to finance the Project for the exclusive benefit of the 2011 Joint Venturers.

[249] The result of 690174's actions was to put the beneficial ownership of Lot 1 at risk and to receive benefits for themselves from Lot 1 that they had no right to obtain.

[250] 690174 could only have taken these steps if it had first obtained the informed consent of the 2007 Joint Venturers or undertaken them for the benefit of the 2007

Joint Venture. There is no evidence that 690174 obtained the necessary consent or that it was acting on behalf of the 2007 Joint Venture in carrying out the actions described above. To the contrary, Jaswant sought to justify his actions by testifying that Mr. Garcha had told him that he wanted nothing further to do with the 2007 Joint Venture, an issue I will deal with in the discussion of other defences to the Garcha Action.

[251] The record is also devoid of any evidence that, in their dealings with Lot 1, Jaswant or 690174 considered that they owed any duty whatsoever to the 2007 Joint Venturers. The evidence all suggests the opposite. Jaswant personally and through his companies acted solely in his own interests without any regard for the impact of his actions on the rights of the 2007 Joint Venturers.

[252] I am satisfied that these breaches were dishonest. As stated in Air Canada v. M & L Travel Ltd., [1993] 3 S.C.R. 787 at 825-826*,* set out below at para. 289 of these reasons, any action by a fiduciary that exposes the beneficiary to a risk that the fiduciary is not entitled to take is a dishonest breach of duty.

Discussion of breaches by Jaswant and 690174

The Gill Judgment

[253] I have set out the circumstances that led to the registration of the Gill Judgment in paras. 159-166 above.

[254] 690174's duty as a trustee was to protect the title to Lot 1 and to utilize its own resources to clear charges registered against it arising out of its separate business activities. However, Jaswant concealed the registration of the Gill Judgment from the 2007 Joint Venturers and prevented them from taking steps to protect their beneficial ownership of Lot 1.

The Virk Mortgage

[255] I will deal with the Virk Mortgage here even though it occurred later than some of the other breaches I will address below. I do so because it is directly related to the Gill Judgment. I find that 690174 and Jaswant breached their fiduciary duties by entering into the Virk Mortgage and charging Lot 1 as security for the separate obligations of 690174.

[256] Encumbering Lot 1 with the Virk Mortgage was both a breach of the express terms of the 2007 JVA and breach of the fiduciary duties owed to the 2007 Joint Venturers. It was a dishonest breach because it subjected Lot 1 to a risk that 690174 was not entitled to expose it to. While it provided Jaswant and 690174 with the opportunity to pursue the objects of the 2011 Joint Venture, it was of no benefit to the 2007 Joint Venturers who had been excluded from participation in the Project by the terms of the November 2010 and 2011 JVAs.

[257] I find that Jaswant wished to conceal his actions with respect to the Project and Lot 1 from the members of the 2007 Joint Venture because he was aware that he had granted security over Lot 1 for a debt that 690174 used to meet its separate obligations. I also infer from his actions that he was aware that he had not taken the steps necessary to protect the position of the 2007 Joint Venturers as beneficial owners of Lot 1.

[258] The subsequent release of funds provided by the Virk Mortgage to settle Mr. Gill's judgment allowed 690174 to proceed with subdivision of Lots 1 to 5 and to complete the financing for the Project from WSCU. However, it also burdened the beneficial owners of Lot 1 with a mortgage of approximately $1,000,000 which increased to more than $1,600,000 by the time it was paid. There can be no question that the granting this mortgage over Lot 1 was a dishonest breach of fiduciary duty on the part of Jaswant and 690174.

The November 2010 and 2011 JVAs

[259] 690174 and Jaswant also breached their fiduciary duties by entering into the November 2010 JVA and the 2011 JVA. Pursuant to para. 2.2 of the November 2010 JVA, Jaswant and 690174 agreed that Lot 1 would henceforth become part of the assets of that joint venture and would thereafter be beneficially owned by the November 2010 Joint Venturers according to their proportionate shares.

[260] In para. 3.3 of the November 2010 JVA, 690174 and Jaswant agreed that the net revenue from the November 2010 Joint Venture would be divided proportionately among the November 2010 Joint Venturers without making any provision to protect the 2007 Joint Venturers' beneficial ownership of Lot 1.

[261] In para 4.2, 690174 and Jaswant agreed that each of the November 2010 Joint Venturers owned, as their separate property, an undivided beneficial interest in Lots 1 to 5 in the ratio of its proportionate share. By executing the November 2010 JVA, 690174 had therefore purported to convey a beneficial interest in Lot 1 to each of the other November 2010 Joint Venturers. However, 690174 was not the beneficial owner of Lot 1.

[262] These provisions continued in force after the execution of the 2011 JVA.

The Land Swap Agreement

[263] The Land Swap Agreement was executed by the 2011 Joint Venturers on or about January 1, 2012. It clearly benefitted the members of that joint venture by facilitating a more profitable subdivision plan. By that time, it is clear that Jaswant and 690174 no longer considered themselves bound by the terms of the 2007 JVA.

[264] It is obvious that the execution of the Land Swap Agreement was a "Major Decision" affecting the members of the 2007 Joint Venture, as that term is defined in the 2007 JVA, because it resulted in the alienation of a significant portion of Lot 1. Despite this, Jaswant made no effort to obtain any consent from any 2007 Joint Venturer. I find that the execution of the Land Swap Agreement was one of the things that Jaswant had in mind when he told Mr. Morton that he did not want to disclose his legal affairs to the members of the 2007 Joint Venture.

[265] The Trustee submits that the Land Swap Agreement did not cause any loss to the 2007 Joint Venturers because it was a prudent step in the process of achieving a subdivision in all of the Lots in the Project.

[266] I do not accept this submission. The execution of the Land Swap Agreement without the informed consent of the 2007 Joint Venturers deprived them of the opportunity to take any steps to protect their position in the Project. I have no doubt that a fully informed 2007 Joint Venturer who received legal advice regarding the Project in January 2012 would have insisted that their position be protected either by becoming a registered owner of a proportionate interest in the Project or by some other effective means.

[267] In any event, the law is clear that it is no answer for a fiduciary who has benefited from a breach of fiduciary duty to say that its actions caused no damage to the beneficiary. The obtaining of an unauthorized benefit is sufficient to establish liability in such circumstances.

The WSCU Financing

[268] 690174 and Jaswant also breached their duties by negotiating the terms of, and charging Lot 1 with, the WSCU mortgage charges. The first advance under the WSCU financing was used to pay off the outstanding balances on all of the Acquisition Mortgages. While those mortgages included the mortgage on Lot 1, they also included mortgages on all of the other Lots. As with the other breaches I have identified, the WSCU Mortgage required the informed consent of the 2007 Joint Venturers to affect their rights. Paragraph 7.3 of the 2007 JVA expressly states that the acceptance of a financing commitment required the prior written approval of all 2007 Joint Venturers. 690174 made no attempt to obtain such approval. The failure of 690174 and Jaswant to seek approval of the WSCU financing deprived the 2007 Joint Venturers of another opportunity to protect their rights under the 2007 JVA.

The subdivision

[269] Upon registration of the Land Swap Agreement and the subdivision plans, title to all of the subdivided lots was registered in the name of one or more of the 2011 Joint Venturers.

[270] The subdivision of Lots 1 to 5 and registration of the titles of those lots in the names of the 2011 Joint Venturers was a further breach of fiduciary duty because it permitted the Project to be completed for the sole benefit of the 2011 Joint Venturers. In this regard it is significant that the Trustee based his conclusion that the 2007 Joint Venturers were equity creditors at least in part on the fact that they had no registered interest in the subdivided lots. While I do not agree that the Trustee was correct in so doing, there can be no doubt that the state of the registered title to the Project Lands caused actual harm to the 2007 Joint Venturers. Even on the Trustee's view of this matter, they would have been entitled to share in the proceeds of sale if their beneficial interest had been registered in the Land Title Office. That was the basis on which the Trustee decided that the 2011 Joint Venturers were not equity claimants.

Cumulative assessment of the breaches

[271] The cumulative effect of the numerous breaches of fiduciary duty was that the 2007 Joint Venturers were deprived of their beneficial ownership of Lot 1 and that the 2011 Joint Venturers have appropriated that benefit. As I will address later in the remedy section of these reasons, that is a result that a court of equity cannot permit.

[272] The Trustee has not been able to articulate any legal basis justifying 690174's actions in appropriating Lot 1 for its own benefit. In simple terms, 690174 did not own Lot 1. It had no right to transfer title to Lot 1 except at the direction of the 2007 Joint Venturers.

[273] The circumstances of these proceedings raise issues similar to those considered by the House of Lords in Foskett v. McKeown, [2000] 3 All E.R. 97, which addressed the nature of persons' interests in property they beneficially own but to which they have entrusted a Trustee or agent with legal title.

[274] In Foskett, an individual named Murphy promoted a plan to sell plots of land in Portugal. The purchase monies paid by purchasers were held in trust by Mr. Murphy pending the completion of the lots. Two years after the purchasers paid their money, it was learned that Mr. Murphy had dissipated it, in part by paying premiums on a life insurance policy of £1,000,000, of which his children were the beneficiaries. After the fraud was discovered Mr. Murphy committed suicide and, because the policy had been in force long enough to become payable in such an event, the beneficiaries were entitled to the death benefit.

[275] A dispute arose as to how the death benefit should be distributed. The precise question was whether the purchasers whose money was used to pay the premiums were entitled to share the death benefit pro rata with the children based on the relative amounts paid by Murphy out of his own funds and from the purchaser's money, or the purchasers were restricted to having a lien on the death benefit for repayment of the money of which they had been defrauded. A majority of the Law Lords held that the death benefit should be divided proportionately based on the respective contribution to the premiums from Murphy's own money and the purchasers' money.

[276] What makes Foskett relevant to the Garchas' claim is the analysis of the majority that concluded that the purchasers' claim was not based on unjust enrichment but on the right they had to follow their own property into the death benefit.

[277] This principle is explained in the reasons of Lord Browne Wilkinson in Foskett at 101-102:

> The crucial factor in this case is to appreciate that the purchasers are claiming a proprietary interest in the policy moneys and that such proprietary interest is not dependent on any discretion vested in the court. Nor is the purchasers claim based on unjust enrichment. It is based on the assertion by the purchasers of their equitable proprietary interest in identified property.
>
> The first step is to identify the interest of the purchasers: it is their absolute equitable interest in the moneys originally held … on the express trusts of the purchasers trust deed. This case does not involve any question of resulting or constructive trusts. The only trusts at issue are the express trusts of the purchasers trust deed. Under those express trusts the purchasers were entitled to equitable interests in the original moneys paid … by the purchasers. Like any other equitable proprietary interest, those equitable proprietary interests under the purchasers trust deed which originally existed in the moneys paid … now exist in any other property which, in law, now represents the original trust assets. If, as a result of tracing, it can be said that certain of the policy moneys are what now represent part of the assets subject to the trusts of the purchasers trust deed, then as a matter of English property law the purchasers have an absolute interest in such moneys. There is no discretion vested in the court. There is no room for any consideration whether, in the circumstances of this particular case, it is in a moral sense "equitable" for the purchasers to be so entitled. The rules establishing equitable proprietary interests and their enforceability against certain parties have been developed over the centuries and are an integral part of the property law of England. It is a fundamental error to think that, because certain property rights are equitable rather than legal, such rights are in some > way discretionary. This case does not depend on whether it is fair, just and reasonable to give the purchasers an interest as a result of which the court in its discretion provides a remedy. It is a case of hard-nosed property rights.

[278] In my view, the above comments apply equally to the 2007 Joint Venturers. They were at all times the beneficial owners of Lot 1 and are entitled to trace their property into the proceeds of sale of the subdivided lots that are attributable to the contribution of Lot 1 to the Project.

[279] Thus, I find that the 28.5% share of the 2011 Joint Venture obtained by 690174 is beneficially owned by the 2007 Joint Venturers. There is a direct and clear path from the ownership of Lot 1 into 690174's 28.5% share of the 2011 Joint Venture. No other person acquired any interest in that share of the 2011 Joint Venture.

[280] This means that it is unnecessary for the Garchas to establish unjust enrichment or any other discretionary remedy. Their remedy is the right to recover their own property, which they have never lost.

[281] The Trustee made a number of submissions to the effect that Jaswant's pursuit of the Project did not cause any damage to the 2007 Joint Venture. Rather, the Trustee says that Jaswant's actions enhanced the value of Lot 1. However, the issue is who should have received the benefit of any such enhancement. In my view there can be only one answer to that question. The beneficial owners of Lot 1 were exclusively entitled to the benefit of its development. However, as a result of Jaswant's and 690174's actions they have been excluded entirely from receiving any benefit from Lot 1. It is difficult to conceive of a clearer example of a breach of fiduciary duty than the acts of Jaswant and 690174 in this case.

[282] In the above paragraphs I have made frequent references to the lack of informed consent on the part of the 2007 Joint Venturers to various steps taken by Jaswant and 690174. In so doing I have not overlooked the evidence that some of the 2007 Joint Venturers were aware that Lot 1 would be incorporated into a larger subdivision. However, there is simply no evidence that the Garchas or indeed any other 2007 Joint Venturer, gave their fully informed consent to the actions of 690174 and Jaswant that I have outlined above. The onus of establishing such consent is on 690174 and Jaswant. Even if one accepts Jaswant's evidence about Mr. Garcha's statements, which I do not, these defendants have failed to establish that they had the informed consent of the 2007 Joint Venturers to their actions.

Knowing Assistance and Knowing Receipt

[283] The Garchas submit that all of the members of the November 2010 Joint Venture hold their interests subject to a constructive trust in favour of the 2007 Joint Venturers based on knowingly assisting or knowingly receiving a benefit from 690174's and Jaswant's breaches of fiduciary duty.

[284] I have concluded that the appropriate remedy to be granted to the Garchas is their proportionate share of 690174's 28.5% share of the net revenue from the Project. In one sense this makes it unnecessary to consider the claims of knowing assistance and knowing receipt.

[285] However, I will address these claims for two reasons. The first is that if I am in error in concluding that the Garcha's claims are not equity claims postponed to the claims of all other creditors, the Garchas would still have a claim against the non-bankrupt defendants to satisfy their claims.

[286] Secondly, a finding of knowing assistance or knowing receipt would make the other defendants jointly and severally liable for the Garchas' claim. Thus, even if the Garchas' claim is not an equity claim, an issue will arise with respect to how the burden of their remedy should be borne as between the defendants who are found to be liable.

[287] Knowing assistance in, and knowing receipt of the benefit of, a breach of trust or fiduciary duty are related but distinct causes of action. I will therefore address them separately.

Knowing assistance

[288] A person who assists another in a breach of fiduciary duty may become liable to the beneficiary to the same extent as the person who committed the actual breach. For a person to be liable for knowing assistance, they must have actual knowledge of the wrongful conduct of the defaulting fiduciary and knowingly assist in it. Imposition of liability requires that the wrongdoer's breach of fiduciary must be dishonest. A person can be liable for knowing assistance without receiving any benefit from its actions: Air Canada at 812.

[289] The issue in Air Canada was whether the directors of the defendant M & L Travel were liable for that company's breach of trust by putting funds which were held in trust for Air Canada into its general bank account, where they were subject to seizure by a bank. The Court held that by so doing M & L Travel took an impermissible risk that prejudiced the rights of the beneficiary, Air Canada, and therefore committed a dishonest breach of trust. At 825-826, Justice Iacobucci articulated the nature of the breach required in knowing assistance cases:

> 59 Where the trustee is a corporation, rather than an individual, the inquiry as to whether the breach of trust was dishonest and fraudulent may be more difficult to conceptualize, because the corporation can only act through human agents who are often the strangers to the trust whose liability is in issue. Regardless of the type of trustee, in my view, the standard adopted by Peter Gibson J. in the Baden, Delvaux case, following the decision of the English Court of Appeal in Belmont Finance, supra, is a helpful one. I would therefore "take as a relevant description of fraud 'the taking of a risk to the prejudice of another's rights, which risk is known to be one which there is no right to take'." In my opinion, this standard best accords with the basic rationale for the imposition of personal liability on a stranger to a trust which was enunciated in In re Montagu's Settlement Trusts, supra, namely, whether the stranger's conscience is sufficiently affected to justify the imposition of personal liability. In that respect, the taking of a knowingly wrongful risk resulting in prejudice to the beneficiary is sufficient to ground personal liability. This approach is consistent with both lines of authority previously discussed.

[290] Justice Iacobucci also referred to the decision of Justice Wilson of this court in Scott v. Riehl (1958), 15 D.L.R. (2d.) 67 (B.C. S.C.). In Scott, Justice Wilson held the directors of a small, closely-held company, who had used funds which were subject to a trust under the Mechanics Lien Act, 1956, S.B.C. 1956, c. 27, for unauthorized purposes were equally liable with the company because they knew that all the monies that were deposited were subject to the trust and because they operated the account, drawing their salaries from it.

[291] In this case, the breaches I have found consist of dealing with Lot 1 in a manner that failed to recognize that the 2007 Joint Venturers were the beneficial owners of that lot. In my view the existence of the trust in favour of the 2007 Joint Venturers would have been obvious to anyone who read the 2007 JVA.

[292] All of the November 2010 and 2011 Joint Venturers participated in at least some the breaches I have identified by being parties to the agreements by which those breaches were brought about. None of these steps could have been taken without their participation and assistance.

[293] The real question therefore is which of the November 2010 and 2011 Joint Venturers, if any, had the requisite knowledge to be found liable on the basis of knowing assistance? When the wrongful act arises from the breach of a duty imposed under an agreement, the question of the assisters' knowledge will depend on the extent and familiarity they had with the agreement, although willful blindness may substitute for actual knowledge. Thus, to have the requisite knowledge, a November 2010 or 2011 Joint Venturer must be found to have had actual knowledge of the terms of the 2007 JVA or have been wilfully blind as to their existence.

[294] I have concluded that Panorama, Parmjit, Ranjit, and by extension Svender had actual notice of the terms of the 2007 JVA or were wilfully blind to its terms and are therefore liable for knowing assistance of Jaswant's and 690174's breaches.

[295] Panorama must have had actual knowledge of Jaswant's and 690174's breaches because Jaswant was the sole director and shareholder of Panorama and was its directing mind, as were the directors that Justice Wilson refers to in Scott. Panorama is therefore equally liable with 690174 and Jaswant based on knowing assistance.

[296] I find that Ranjit had actual notice of the terms of the 2007 JVA. Ranjit admitted that he saw the 2007 JVA in 2007. However, his counsel submits that there was no evidence that he was aware of the terms on which 690174 held title to Lot 1. I do not accept this submission. Ranjit was obviously an intelligent person with some experience in land development. His evidence at his examination for discovery was that one of the two lots allocated to his close friend Joginder Chahal in the 2007 JVA was acquired on his behalf. He advanced money to Mr. Chahal on the basis of that arrangement. It is not credible to suggest that he would have entered into such a transaction without reading the underlying agreement that gave rise to that interest. I therefore find that Ranjit had the requisite knowledge or he was, at a minimum, wilfully blind to the terms of the 2007 JVA. Svender's counsel has conceded that he is equally liable with his father for any findings in this case. I therefore also find him liable for knowing assistance.

[297] I have already stated that I found Parmjit to be an unsatisfactory witness. I do not accept her evidence that she had virtually no knowledge of the details of her husband's business affairs even though she was a member of Sangha Groups 1 and 2 and of the November 2010 and 2011 JVAs. There is sufficient evidence to allow me to infer that Parmjit was very familiar with Jaswant's business and with the affairs of the various joint ventures in issue in these proceedings, including the terms of the 2007 JVA.

[298] I accept Jaswinder Garcha's evidence that in 2004 Parmjit asked her if she and her husband wished to invest in property development with Jaswant. Jaswant confirmed that this was the case in his evidence despite Parmjit's denial that any such discussion took place.

[299] Despite Parmjit's evidence that she looked after the home while her husband looked after the business, she signed numerous documents relating to Lot 1, including the first and second PMIC mortgages securing the refinancing of the IMOR mortgage on Lot 1. She gave her covenant for repayment of these mortgages and mortgaged her interest in Lot 2 to secure them. The Garchas were named parties to these mortgages. In addition, her sister was one of the 2007 Joint Venturers. Parmjit also struck me as a shrewd person. I do not find her evidence that she was unaware of the 2007 JVA to be credible. I find that she had actual knowledge of the terms of the 2007 JVA which stipulated that 690174 held legal title to Lot 1 in trust for the 2007 Joint Venturers, or at a minimum was wilfully blind to that fact.

[300] I also accept the submission of the Garchas' counsel that Parmjit is equally liable with Jaswant and 690174 on the principle referred to by Justice Southin in Osborne v. Pavlick, 2000 BCCA 120. Osborne was a case involving joint tortfeasors. A wife owned a business which was operated on a property owned jointly by herself and her husband, which they decided to sell as a package. The wife induced the plaintiffs to purchase the property by making fraudulent representations to them about the state of the business. The purchasers sued in fraud. At trial both the wife and husband were found liable on the basis that the wife was acting as the husband's agent in making the fraudulent representation.

[301] On appeal, Justice Southin concluded that it was not open to the trial judge to find that the wife was acting as the husband's agent in making the misrepresentation because no misrepresentation had been alleged against him. She did however find that the husband was liable as a joint tortfeasor with the wife, because they had embarked on a joint enterprise. She found that when two people engage in a joint enterprise and one commits a tort in carrying out the enterprise, both are liable for the tort.

[302] While Osborne was a tort case, the principle that persons involved in a joint enterprise can be found jointly liable for the wrongful acts of another was applied in a breach of fiduciary duty case: Ruwenzori Enterprises Ltd. v. Walji et al., 2004 BCSC 741, aff'd 2006 BCCA 448. I can see no principled reason why it should not also apply in this case.

[303] I have no hesitation in finding that Parmjit and Jaswant were engaged in a joint enterprise, as explained in Osborne, with respect to the Project. Parmjit participated in Sangha Groups 1 and 2 and, according to her evidence, rolled her capital and profits from them into the Project. Parmjit became a member of the November 2010 and 2011 Joint Ventures. In all of these matters she was content to allow Jaswant to make all decisions with respect to the business and to benefit from those decisions.

[304] I also note that Parmjit alleged that she had advanced money to 690174 when she filed proofs of claims in that company's bankruptcy. This is a further indication of Parmjit's close involvement in Jaswant's and 690174's business activities.

[305] The more difficult question is whether Wills and Dale are liable to the Garchas based on knowing assistance.

[306] Ms. Dale and Mr. Wills have not been shown to have actual knowledge of the terms of the 2007 JVA or any facts that suggested that 690174 was not the beneficial owner of Lot 1 at any material time. I accept their evidence that they did not know of the terms of the 2007 JVA and find no evidence from which I could draw a contrary inference. They are therefore not liable for knowingly assisting in Jaswant's and 690174's breaches of fiduciary duty.

[307] However, I have concluded that Wills and Dale are holding their interest in the 2011 Joint Venture as a nominee for Jaswant or 690174. With the possible exception of $25,000 advanced by them to 690174 on August 17, 2007, there is no documentary evidence showing that Wills or Dale contributed any funds to the Project or to the acquisition of Lots 1 to 5. The Trustee has concluded that the $25,000 advance was used to contribute to the deposit for the purchase of Lot 3. However, Wills and Dale's registered interest is in Lot 4. They therefore have made no contribution to the purchase of the Lot that constitutes their capital contribution to the 2011 Joint Venture.

[308] Ms. Dale and Mr. Wills testified that they began to invest in real estate projects being managed by Jaswant in the 1990s, and that the profits they had earned in earlier projects were rolled into the Project, ending with their acquisition of a half interest in Lot 4. However, they were unable to identify any specific projects in which they had invested. They could not say how much they invested or provide any proof of advances they made to any such project. They could produce no documents relating to any such investments. Jaswant's evidence was that Mr. Wills and Ms. Dale had been paid everything that they were entitled to from past projects and therefore had invested nothing in the Project.

[309] Wills and Dale also admitted that they had never declared any income from those previous projects on their tax returns. Their explanation for this was that they never actually received any funds from the projects. However, they produced no records or documents corroborating their evidence that they had earned any profits from them. They described themselves as being executives in multi-million-dollar enterprises. I find it difficult to accept that, as such, they were not aware of their obligation to disclose accrued income from these projects on their income tax returns.

[310] Ms. Dale did produce some handwritten notes showing receipt of net proceeds from the sale of three properties registered in her name in 2010. Two of these properties were sold to Ranjit and Joginder Chahal. It was not clear from the records who purchased the third property. Ms. Dale's notes record the receipt of the following net proceeds:

1. Lot 59	$62,814.97
2. Lot 60	$62,833.65
3. 58 Ave	$403,863.33

[311] The notes also indicate that a cheque of $403,690.62 was transferred to Jaswant's Coast Capital Account on an indecipherable date, probably in 2010. Ms. Dale also produced copies of a $25,000 bank draft to Jaswant which appears to be dated April 7, 2010, a $20,000 cheque to Jaswant dated May 5, 2010, and a $411,420.86 bank draft to Best Quality Homes Ltd. on July 29, 2011.

[312] However, the evidence shows that Best Quality Homes Ltd. provided the funds to purchase these properties and that the net proceeds of sale were paid to that company or to Jaswant. I conclude that Wills and Dale held title to those properties as a nominee for Best Quality Homes Ltd. or Jaswant.

[313] I also find that Jaswant had agreed that some consideration would be provided to Wills and Dale for providing their covenants on the financing for Lot 4 but that the amount of that consideration was never determined.

[314] As I understand the answers Jaswant gave under cross-examination, his evidence was that 690174 had provided all of the funds used to acquire Lot 4 and that he intended to recover those amounts from the profits earned from the Project before Wills and Dale were entitled to receive anything. I do not agree with Mr. Taylor that Jaswant's evidence was that all of the profits from Wills and Dale's proportionate interest would be paid to 690174. However, there was no evidence as to how much they would receive from the Project. What is clear is that Jaswant considered that he had the unilateral right to decide how much they would receive.

[315] According to the Ninth Report of the Trustee, 690174 advanced $488,227.53 towards the acquisition of Lot 4. The most recent information contained in Exhibit 175 showed a balance of $1,832,266.24 in the Vendor Trust Account set up in the name of Jaswant, Wills, and Dale, of which Wills and Dale are notionally entitled to a 50% interest. This means that they are asserting the right to receive over $900,000 from an investment of at most $25,000.

[316] Based on all of the forgoing I have concluded that Wills and Dale held their interest in Lot 4 as a nominee for 690174 or Jaswant. I find that they provided their covenants on the Acquisition Mortgage for Lot 4 to assist Jaswant to obtain that financing but that they did not have a beneficial ownership interest in that Lot. I find that there was an understanding that Wills and Dale would receive some compensation for giving their covenants for payment but that they had not agreed with Jaswant on the amount of that compensation by the time of his bankruptcy.

[317] Therefore, Wills and Dale are in the position of volunteers with respect to their interest in the Project and hold their interest subject to the Garchas' proprietary claim. However, they are not jointly liable with 690174 and Jaswant on the basis of knowing assistance.

[318] I have also concluded that Grewal Management did not have the required knowledge of the 2007 JVA to be liable for knowing assistance of 690174's breaches fiduciary duty, some of which occurred before Grewal Management became a joint venturer. Grewal Management did not become an investor in the Project until 2011. There is no evidence that Mr. Grewal had actual knowledge of the terms of the 2007 JVA at any material time.

[319] Similarly, I am unable to find a sufficient evidentiary basis for finding that Raveen had actual knowledge of the terms of the 2007 JVA or was willfully blind with respect to it. While I did not find Raveen to be a credible witness, I am unable to draw any inference that she had the requisite state of knowledge to make her liable for knowing assistance of Jaswant's and 690174's breaches.

[320] I am also of the view that the circumstances in which the assignment fee from 690174 to 688350 was handled did not result in any receipt of a benefit by 688350 or Raveen. I find that the assignment fee was paid to inflate the apparent purchase price paid for Lot 1 in order to maximize the amount of mortgage financing that could be obtained to purchase it. These circumstances do no credit to Jaswant or Raveen. However, they do not constitute any actionable wrong at the instance of the Garchas.

Knowing receipt

[321] The Garchas also claim against the 2011 Joint Venturers on the basis of knowing receipt.

[322] Knowing receipt is the receipt of property that is known to be subject to a trust or obtained through a breach of fiduciary duty. A person therefore cannot be liable for knowing receipt without actually having received some benefit obtained from the breach. However, unlike liability for knowing assistance, a person may be liable for knowing receipt on the basis of constructive notice of the fiduciary obligation.

[323] The requisite state of knowledge for knowing receipt is set out by Justice La Forest in Citadel General Assurance Co. v. Lloyds Bank Canada, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 805 at 836-837:

> 48 Given the fundamental distinction between the nature of liability in assistance and receipt cases, it makes sense to require a different threshold of knowledge for each category of liability. In "knowing assistance" cases, which are concerned with the furtherance of fraud, there is a higher threshold of knowledge required of the stranger to the trust. Constructive knowledge is excluded as the basis for liability in "knowing assistance" cases; see Air

> Canada v. M & L Travel Ltd., National Westminster Bank Ltd., supra, at pp. 811-13. However, in "knowing receipt" cases, which are concerned with the receipt of trust property for one's own benefit, there should be a lower threshold of knowledge required of the stranger to the trust. More is expected of the recipient, who, unlike the accessory, is necessarily enriched at the plaintiff's expense. Because the recipient is held to this higher standard, constructive knowledge (that is, knowledge of facts sufficient to put a reasonable person on notice or inquiry) will suffice as the basis for restitutionary liability. Iacobucci J. reaches the same conclusion in Gold v National Westminster Bank Ltd., supra, where he finds, at para. 46, that a stranger in receipt of trust property "need not have actual knowledge of the equity [in favour of the plaintiff]; notice will suffice".

[324] In this case it is clear that Panorama, through Jaswant, had actual knowledge of Jaswant's and 690174's breaches and, as set out above, received a benefit from the incorporation of Lot 1 into the Project. It is therefore also liable for knowing receipt of a benefit obtained by a breach of trust.

[325] As Ranjit benefited from 690174's breaches and had actual knowledge of the terms of the 2007 JVA, he is liable as a person in knowing receipt of a benefit. Even if he did not have actual knowledge, I am of the view that Ranjit's knowledge of and participation in the 2007 Joint Venture were sufficient to put him on notice and under a duty to make inquiries about the 2007 JVA. Ranjit admits that he had knowledge of the 2007 JVA. It is inconceivable that he did not know that the purpose of the 2007 JVA was to develop Lot 1 and that others had invested in it. The combination of receipt of property subject to a trust and being put on notice of facts requiring further inquiry is sufficient to impose liability on Ranjit for knowing receipt.

[326] As I have already stated, counsel for Ranjit and Svender conceded that Svender is bound by any finding made against his father. I therefore find Svender liable for knowing receipt as well.

[327] I find that at a minimum Parmjit was aware of sufficient facts to impose on her a duty to make further inquiries before taking a benefit from Lot 1. It is simply not credible for her to deny that she was not aware of the existence of the 2007 JVA. At a minimum, she must have known that Jaswant had entered into a joint venture agreement with other persons with respect to Lot 1. She was also aware that no reference was made to any of those persons in Jaswant and 690174's dealing with

Lot 1. These circumstances were sufficient to put her on inquiry before accepting an interest in Lot 1. Her failure to do so makes her liable for knowing receipt of property obtained by a breach of fiduciary duty.

[328] My findings with respect to Parmjit's liability for knowing assistance by virtue of being engaged in a joint enterprise with Jaswant apply equally to her liability for knowing receipt.

[329] Raveen certainly played an active role in relation to the Land Swap and subdivision of the 5 Lots. However, there is no evidence that she received any benefit from her involvement in these actions.

[330] I also find that the Garchas have not established that Raveen is liable to them as a trustee de son tort. A person may be found liable as a trustee de son tort if they assume trust duties over property even though they have not been appointed to the office of a trustee. The Garchas submit that when Raveen became the trustee of Lots 1 to 5 in connection with the Land Swap, she became a trustee de son tort to them. However, as I read the authorities, a person does not become a trustee of another person unless they are aware that the property over which they have control is held in trust for that person. In this case, I am not satisfied that Raveen knew that Lot 1 was being held in trust for the members of the 2007 JVA. Her duty was to the persons who appointed her as trustee, that is, the 2011 Joint Venturers. In the absence of actual knowledge of the trust on Raveen's part or of the receipt of any benefit from the trust property, Raveen cannot be liable as a trustee de son tort.

[331] Accordingly, I find that the Garchas have not established any claim against Raveen in these proceedings.

[332] Because I am of the view that the appropriate remedy for the Garchas is to declare that they are entitled to their proportionate share of 690174's 28.5% interest in the 2011 Joint Venture it is not necessary for me to make any award against the other 2011 Joint Venturers whom I have found liable for knowing assistance or knowing receipt.

[333] I therefore simply make a declaration that those joint venturers knowingly assisted 690174's breaches and knowingly received a benefit from the breaches.

[334] At trial, 690174 made no submissions with respect to how any award made in favour of the plaintiffs should be allocated among the defendants. No defendant advanced any claim for indemnity or contribution against any other with respect to any such award. The position taken by the defendants was that the plaintiffs' claims were without merit and ought to be dismissed, or, in the case of the Trustee, that any claims were equity claims that were subordinated to the claims of all other creditors of the Bankrupts. Given these positions, I am unable to grant any relief in favour of any defendant against any other defendant at this time.

[335] However, I am prepared to receive submissions on this question once the defendants have had the opportunity to assess their positions in view of the findings I have made in favour of the plaintiffs. Such submissions should be made at the same time as the Accounting Hearing referred to at para. 618.

Affirmative Defences Raised by Defendants in the Garcha Action

The defence of election

[336] The Trustee, Raveen, and Parmjit submit that the Garchas have elected a remedy inconsistent with the claims they advance for equitable relief and are thereby precluded from obtaining that relief.

[337] In their notice of civil claim, the Garchas advanced the claim for equitable remedies flowing from the breaches of fiduciary duty that I have addressed above. However, Mr. Garcha also claimed judgment against 690174 as the maker of the Promissory Note. Although this claim was contained in the notice of civil claim, it was made separately by Mr. Garcha and not as an alternative to the claims based on breach of equitable duties.

[338] In the Promissory Note, 690174 promised to pay Mr. Garcha the principal amount of $484,252 without interest. The Promissory Note recited that Mr. Garcha agreed and acknowledged that the principal amount represents Mr. Garcha's 2007 Joint Venture contribution paid to 690174 pursuant to the 2007 JVA and stated that 690174 was entitled to prepay any portion of the amount owing without notice, bonus, or penalty.

[339] 690174 did not deliver a response to the notice of civil claim, and on March 17, 2015, Mr. Garcha obtained a default judgment for the amount of the Promissory Note. Mr. Garcha then attempted to register that judgment against the interest of 690174 in the Project. Any enforcement proceedings on the judgment were of course stayed upon 690174's bankruptcy.

[340] On November 9, 2018 the Trustee filed a response to the Garchas' notice of civil claim, pursuant to the order of Justice Bowden dated June 26, 2018, that granted it leave to defend this action on behalf of the Bankrupts.

[341] The Trustee did not plead that the Garcha's right to pursue the action was barred by the doctrine of election or the principles of issue estoppel in his original response to civil claim. He did however plead that the acceptance of the Promissory Note amounted to what was in effect an accord and satisfaction of the Garchas' claims.

[342] In their amended response to civil claim filed January 17, 2019, Parmjit and Raveen did not raise the defence of election or merger, but they pleaded that the Garchas' claims "have been limited by the promissory note given 690174 BC Ltd and taken by the Plaintiffs". This plea remained unchanged in the amended response to civil claim dated February 21, 2020, in response to the Garchas' amended notice of civil claim, filed by leave of the court on January 28, 2020. To the extent that this is a good pleading, I find that it also was a plea of accord and satisfaction.

[343] The Trustee did, however, raise what could be characterized as the defence of merger in para. 1 of Part 3 of its February 24, 2020, amended response to civil claim, which also responded to the Garchas' amended notice of civil claim. That pleading states "having taken the default judgment, the Plaintiffs are barred from suing further as against 690174 as any other cause of action they had as against 690174 was merged in the default judgment".

[344] I note that this pleading was contained in a pleading filed in response to the Garchas' amended notice of civil claim. The Trustee did not apply for leave to amend, but was entitled to amend to meet the new matters raised in the Garchas' amendment pursuant to Rule 6-1(5)(a) of the SCCR. However, this portion of the Trustee's amendment did not respond to any new matter raised by the Garchas' amendment. It would therefore appear that this pleading was not authorized under the SCCR.

[345] The Garchas have not raised any objection to the defence of election being relied upon by the defendants. While I have some doubt about whether it was open to Parmjit and Raveen to rely on the doctrine of election or for the Trustee to raise this defence for the first time in its amended response to civil claim, I will nevertheless address that defense in these reasons.

[346] The Trustee argued that the taking of a default judgment constituted an irrevocable election by Mr. Garcha to recover his investment through the personal judgment on the Promissory Note to the exclusion of any other remedy. The Trustee relies on Ladner v. Ladner, 2004 BCCA 366, and H.Y. Louie Co. Limited v. Bowick, 2015 BCCA 256, for the proposition that a party who elects to take one remedy for a cause of action is precluded from seeking an alternative remedy at a later time.

[347] There is no question that a party who pursues alternative remedies for the same cause of action must at some point elect which remedy it seeks from the court. The law is equally clear that such an election need not be made before judgment. However, a party may obtain concurrent remedies at different times or in separate proceedings.

[348] A plaintiff who takes judgment for an alternative remedy is precluded from pursuing the other remedy by virtue of the doctrine of election unless the dictates of fairness and justice require a second action: Ladner at para. 47. Recent jurisprudence also suggests that the doctrines of merger and election are closely related to the principles of res judicata, issue estoppel, and cause of action estoppel, and that the underlying rationale for all of these doctrines is preventing abuse of the court's process.

[349] Election applies only when the plaintiff is seeking to enforce the same cause of action. A cause of action is a factual situation giving rise to a claim or remedy: Ladner at para. 49; Letang v. Cooper, [1965] 1 Q.B. 232 (Eng. C.A.) at 242-3. Therefore, the threshold question is whether the Garchas are seeking to enforce the same cause of action on which Mr. Garcha took default judgment.

[350] In this case I am not satisfied that the Garchas are seeking a remedy for the same cause of action. Their claim for breach of trust and fiduciary duty is based on the manner in which 690174 and Jaswant discharged their trust and fiduciary duties to the members of the 2007 Joint Venture. Mr. Garcha's judgment is based on the Promissory Note, which was made well after the breaches of fiduciary duty. There is clearly a connection between the two claims. However, it is also clear that either claim could have been advanced independently of the other, that is, without relying on any of the facts giving rise to the other claim. This is so because a promissory note creates a cause of action independent of any underlying obligation.

[351] Subject to the issue of election and merger, the acceptance of the Promissory Note and the obtaining of judgment on it would bar any further claim for breaches of equitable duty only if the Promissory Note was given and accepted in satisfaction of the Garchas' claims for relief arising out of those claims. Whether that occurred is a question of fact. In this case there was no evidence that the Promissory Note was given or accepted in full satisfaction of the Garchas' claims. Neither Jaswant nor Mr. Garcha testified that that was the case. The Promissory Note does not clearly state that the note was intended to be a full settlement of the Garchas' claims.

[352] In addition, the circumstances under which Mr. Garcha took judgment on the Promissory Note are inconsistent with his having accepted it in full satisfaction of his claim. The Garchas continued to pursue equitable relief after Mr. Garcha received the Promissory Note and after Mr. Garcha took judgment.

[353] I therefore conclude that the defendants have not established that the Garchas have elected to accept the Promissory Note in satisfaction of their claims.

[354] The alternate question is whether the doctrine of election applies to preclude the Garchas from seeking to claim a property interest in the Project. This in turn depends on whether the remedies sought by the Garchas are alternative or cumulative. If they are alternative, any further claim may be barred by the doctrine of election, while if they are cumulative they are not. However, I am also satisfied that even if they are alternative, I am required to consider whether allowing the action to continue would be an abuse of the court's process or whether it is in the interests of justice to allow it to proceed.

[355] If the default judgment is viewed as a remedy for 690174's breaches of trust and fiduciary duty, it is clearly a personal or in personam remedy. The question is whether such a personal remedy against a defaulting fiduciary is inconsistent with continuing to seek an equitable remedy through a charge on the assets that it has misappropriated.

[356] In Bronson v. Tompkins Ranching Ltd., 2012 BCSC 770, Justice Gropper succinctly summarized the principle that a wronged person alleging a breach of fiduciary duty may pursue personal remedies against the wrongdoer and seek a charge against the proceeds of the wrongdoing because these remedies are cumulative.

> 93 The two remedies in the case at bar are: (a) an in personam remedy against the trustee; and (b) an in rem remedy against the misappropriated trust property. Ultimately, the conclusion as to whether these remedies are alternative or cumulative is critical. If alternative, the plaintiffs are precluded from bringing the Second Action because they elected between the two remedies at the time of judgment in the First Action. If cumulative, the plaintiffs can bring the Second Action as they have not yet elected between the two remedies because they have not received full satisfaction for their loss.
> 94 Framing the question differently, are the two remedies "inconsistent"? If yes, they are alternative. If no, they are cumulative. Other than the fact that the plaintiffs cannot have both remedies (as this would offend the rule against double satisfaction), there is no inconsistency between the two remedies.
> 95 There is English authority which states that an in personam claim against a defaulting trustee advanced in a first action may be supplemented in a later action by a claim to enforce an equitable charge or lien over the proceeds in which the misappropriated assets have been mixed. This is permitted because these remedies are cumulative: see Serious Fraud Office v. Lexi Holdings Plc, [2008] EWCA Crim 1443 (Eng. C.A.), at para. 39-40

> [Serious Fraud Office]. I note the Court in that case relied on Tang Man Sit to arrive at this conclusion. It seems to me that if pursuing an in personam claim against a defaulting trustee and pursuing an equitable charge over the misappropriated property are cumulative remedies, then it can equally be said that pursuing an in personam claim against a trustee for breach of trust and an in rem claim against the third party who has knowingly assisted in the breach of trust are cumulative remedies. Indeed, the latter is a remedy that could be characterized as one "in aid of" the remedy against the trustee: Serious Fraud Office, at para. 40.

[357] These considerations apply in this case. I find that the remedies sought by the Garchas are cumulative and that the doctrine of election therefore has no application.

[358] A somewhat similar situation arose in Citadel General Insurance Co. v. Lloyd's Bank of Canada, [1993] A.J. No. 680 (Alta. Q.B.). In that case the plaintiff insurance company alleged that the defendant bank was liable to it for knowing receipt of funds that its customer held in trust for the plaintiff. The funds in question were insurance premiums had been collected in trust for the plaintiff by the bank's customer. The customer was in financial difficulty and defaulted in paying over the premiums to the plaintiff after the defendant bank debited its bank account to cover overdrafts owing to it.

[359] When the customer defaulted in remitting the premiums, the plaintiff obtained a promissory note from it for the amount that it owed. The customer made some payments on the note but ultimately defaulted. The plaintiff sued on the note for the balance owing to it but was unable to collect anything in the action. From para. 11 of the reasons it appears that the plaintiff did take judgment on the note because that was the only way it could enforce it.

[360] The defendant bank argued that by accepting the note the plaintiff had revoked the trust or acquiesced in the use of the funds by the customer. The court rejected that argument and held that the plaintiff had merely asked for the note as confirmation of the amount owing to it. In the Supreme Court of Canada's 2007 decision in Citadel General Insurance, the Court agreed with the trial decision on this point.

[361] I find that the cases relied upon by the defendants are distinguishable.

[362] In Ladner, Justice Huddart recognized that the court has the discretion to allow a claim otherwise subject to the doctrine of election to proceed if it is in the interests of justice to do so:

> 50 This appeal comes, I think, to the question of whether, by entering judgment for damages, the appellant elected to forego her claim for an equitable remedy, and whether, if she did, there is reason in the record to allow the claim to proceed in any event, as there was in Hoque v. Montreal Trust of Canada (1997), 162 N.S.R. (2d) 321 (C.A.), leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused, [1997] S.C.C.A. No. 656.

[363] The facts of this case can usefully be compared to the facts in Ladner, as outlined in Justice Huddart's reasons:

> 51 Although not pleaded before Parrett J. and the Court of Appeal, the appellant sought to establish a constructive trust over the Canadian Bar Association policies. That claim was properly rejected. The appellant abandoned her claim for specific performance of the separation agreement, and sought no other equitable remedy over the three policies with which this appeal is concerned or any of the other estate assets. When she learned of the estate's alleged insolvency, the appellant did not seek to amend her pleadings, to allege a "good conscience" trust. Nor did she seek an adjournment of the hearing to assess damages so she might reconsider her position or attempt to lead new evidence. Scarth J. assessed damages; his order was entered and not appealed. After the order was interpreted in a manner unfavourable to her, the appellant did not apply to extend the time for appeal. No new material facts have since come to light.

[364] In Ladner there was an express finding that the appellant knowingly had foregone her claim to equitable relief. In this case, it is clear to me that the Garchas did not intend to forego their claim for equitable relief over the property of which they have been wrongfully deprived.

[365] In H. Y. Louie, the issue was the proper characterization of a judgment obtained against a defendant prior to the defendant's bankruptcy. The plaintiff alleged that it was entitled to pursue the defendant after bankruptcy because its claim against the defendant was for obtaining property by false pretenses. The majority of the British Columbia Court of Appeal held that the judgment had been obtained for breach of contract because it was the pleadings that determined the nature of the plaintiff's claim. In that case there was no issue about whether the claims were concurrent or alternative. There had been only one claim made against the defendant. The plaintiff had consented to the judgment on that basis even though it was aware there was a possible claim for false pretenses

[366] As the above quotation from Bronson makes clear, the Garchas are not entitled to recover twice for the defendants' wrongdoing. Thus, if Mr. Garcha had recovered anything under the judgment, that amount would have to be taken into account in determining his remedy based on the rule against double recovery. However, that issue does not arise in this case because Mr. Garcha has not collected anything on the judgment.

[367] In addition, Jaswinder Kaur Garcha was not a party to the Promissory Note and did not take judgment on it. No question of election can therefore arise in respect of her claim.

[368] I have also concluded that I have the jurisdiction to allow the Garchas' claims for breach of trust and breach of fiduciary duty to be determined on the merits if it is in the interests of justice to do so.

[369] In Tang Man Sit v. Capacious Investments Ltd, [1995] UKPC 54, the Privy Council held that the doctrine of election was part of a general and overriding principle that legal proceedings should be conducted in a manner that strikes a fair and reasonable balance between the interests of the parties, having regard to the wider public interest in the conduct and finality of court proceedings. Tang Man Sit was cited with approval by Justice Gropper in Bronson.

[370] In Danyluk v. Ainsworth Technologies Inc., 2001 SCC 44, Justice Binnie commented on the principle of issue estoppel that "the Court should stand back and, taking into account the entirety of the circumstances, consider whether application of issue estoppel in the particular case would work an injustice, considering the procedural and equitable issues at stake": at para. 80.

[371] In Danyluk, Justice Binnie also referred to the reasons of Justice Finch, as he then was, in British Columbia (Ministry of Forests) v. Bugbusters Pest Management Inc. (1998), 159 D.L.R. (4th) 50 (B.C. C.A.) at para. 32:

> It must always be remembered that although the three requirements for issue estoppel must be satisfied before it can apply, the fact that they may be satisfied does not automatically give rise to its application. Issue estoppel is an equitable doctrine, and as can be seen from the cases, is closely related to abuse of process. The doctrine of issue estoppel is designed as an implement of justice, and a protection against injustice. It inevitably calls upon the exercise of a judicial discretion to achieve fairness according to the circumstances of each case.

[372] Justice Binnie's closing comments on the nature of the court's discretion in applying issue estoppel are also relevant to this case:

> 66 In my view it was an error of principle not to address the factors for and against the exercise of the discretion which the court clearly possessed. This is not a situation where this Court is being asked by an appellant to substitute its opinion for that of the motions judge or the Court of Appeal. The appellant is entitled at some stage to appropriate consideration of the discretionary factors and to date this has not happened.
>
> 67 The list of factors is open. They include many of the same factors listed in Maybrun in connection with the rule against collateral attack. A similarly helpful list was proposed by Laskin J.A. in Minott, supra. The objective is to ensure that the operation of issue estoppel promotes the orderly administration of justice but not at the cost of real injustice in the particular case. …

[373] In Minott v. O'Shanter Development Co. (1999), 42 O.R. (3d) 321 (C.A.), Justice Laskin stated the proposition as follows at paras. 49-50:

> Even had the three requirements been met, however, in my view the court has always retained discretion to refuse to apply issue estoppel when to do so would cause unfairness or work an injustice. As Lord Upjohn observed in Carl Zeiss Stiftung v. Rayner Keeler Ltd., [1967] 1 A.C. 853 at p. 947, [1966] 2 All E.R. 536, "[a]ll estoppels are not odious but must be applied so as to work justice and not injustice, and I think the principle of issue estoppel must be applied to the circumstances of the subsequent case with this overriding consideration in mind."
>
> Issue estoppel is a rule of public policy and, as a rule of public policy, it seeks to balance the public interest in the finality of litigation with the private interest in achieving justice between litigants. Sometimes these two interests will be in conflict, or at least there will be tension between them. Judicial discretion is required to achieve practical justice without undermining the principles on which issue estoppel is founded. Issue estoppel should be applied flexibly where an unyielding application of it would be unfair to a party who is precluded from relitigating an issue.

[374] I am aware that many of these cases involve decisions of tribunals and that the issue before the Court was whether the doctrine of issue estoppel barred a further action. However, the English authorities referred to by Justice Gropper in Bronson have held that there is a general rule that the overriding question is whether pursuing a claim after judgment arising out of the same facts constitutes an abuse of process.

[375] I conclude that the interests of justice require that the court permit the Garchas' claim for equitable relief to continue even if the elements of election applied to Mr. Garcha. From the outset of these proceedings the Garchas have asserted a beneficial interest in the proceeds of the sale of Lot 1. I find that it would be unfair to deny them a remedy because Mr. Garcha took default judgment on the Promissory Note.

[376] The evidence at trial shows that 690174 and Jaswant have benefitted to a considerable degree from their wrongful acts. They have had the opportunity to dispute their liability and through the Trustee have done so.

[377] I also rely on the fact that 690174 stood in the position of a fiduciary to the Garchas at the time that Jaswant presented the Promissory Note to Mr. Garcha. As a fiduciary, 690174 owed a duty to make full disclosure of all relevant circumstances concerning the note to Mr. Garcha. There is no evidence that Jaswant informed Mr. Garcha that it was unlikely that 690174 was or would be in a position to honour the Promissory Note if it was presented for payment. In particular, 690174 presented the note after Ms. Virk commenced foreclosure proceedings against the Project and after the Grewal Action had been commenced. By that time, it was unlikely that 690174 could honour the Promissory Note.

[378] In addition, at the time the Mr. Garcha's counsel took default judgment, the facts relating to Jaswant's conduct, the degree to which funds had been mixed by Jaswant, and the numerous inconsistent agreements that the Jaswant-controlled parties had entered into had not been fully explored.

[379] Finally, if the plea of election is given effect, Mr. Garcha will be deprived of the beneficial interest he owns in Lot 1 despite having contributed a significant amount to its acquisition.

[380] The last part of the relevant analysis considers whether allowing the Garcha claim to continue would be to permit an abuse of the process of the Court. In my view it would not. On the contrary, it is my view that the consequences of applying the doctrine of election to preclude the Garchas obtaining the relief to which I have found they are otherwise entitled would result in an injustice.

[381] I therefore conclude that the default judgment is not a bar to the claims pursued by the Garchas at trial.

Defence of non-compliance with subdivision requirements of the LTA

[382] Parmjit and Raveen submit that the version of the oral agreement that Mr. Garcha testified to, one in which the Garchas would receive seven subdivided lots, offends s. 73 of the Land Title Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 250 [LTA], because it amounts to a subdivision of Lot 1 without complying with the requirements of the LTA for subdivision. In International Paper Industries Ltd. v. Top Line Industries Inc. (1996), 20 B.C.L.R. (3d) 41 (B.C. C.A.), the Court of Appeal held that an agreement to lease a portion of un-subdivided land to a tenant without complying with the subdivision requirements of the LTA was void and unenforceable. Parmjit and Raveen say that this decision precludes the Garchas from asserting any claim to have lots transferred to them.

[383] As I understand it, this argument does not assert that the express terms of the 2007 JVA violate s. 73. Rather, it is directed to Mr. Garcha's subjective understanding of the agreement he made with Jaswant as set out in the Garchas' further amended notice of civil claim. However, I have already decided that the Garchas are bound by the terms of the written 2007 JVA and that their rights must be determined on that basis, without regard to their subjective understanding of the agreement.

[384] Therefore, I find that s. 73 of the LTA has no application to the enforceability of the 2007 JVA, which clearly contemplates that any subdivision will be carried out in accordance with all applicable legislative requirements.

Repudiation or fundamental breach of 2007 JVA by the Garchas

[385] The Trustee and Parmjit argue that the Garchas "walked away" from the 2007 Joint Venture and that this justified Jaswant's actions in dealing with Lot 1 without regard to their interests.

[386] It is not clear whether this argument asserts that the Garchas repudiated the 2007 JVA or that they were in fundamental breach of their obligations under it, although these terms are sometimes used interchangeably. These concepts apply only to executory contracts. The Garcha's claims are based on their beneficial ownership of their proportionate share of Lot 1. It is therefore questionable whether they apply in this case. In any event, the evidence does not establish either ground for 690174 failing to carry out its obligations under the 2007 JVA.

[387] A party repudiates a contract when it communicates an unequivocal intention to no longer be bound by it. A party can therefore repudiate a contract without actually breaching any performance obligation up to the time of repudiation. Fundamental breach occurs when a party breaches a contract in such a way as to deprive the innocent party of any benefit from the contract.

[388] The law is well-settled that a party alleging that a contract has come to an end by virtue of a repudiation must demonstrate that the conduct of the other party evinced an unequivocal intention not to be bound by the terms of the agreement, and that the innocent party had accepted and communicated an acceptance of the repudiation to the party in breach: G.H.L. Fridman, The Law of Contract in Canada, 6th ed. (Toronto: Thomson Reuters Canada, 2011) at 585-6 [Fridman]; Doman Forest Products Ltd. v. GMAC Commercial Credit Corp. Canada, 2007 BCCA 88.

[389] The elements necessary to establish a fundamental breach were set out by Justice Wilson in Hunter Engineering Co. v. Syncrude Canada Ltd., [1989] 1 S.C.R. 426 at 499-500:

> 148 The formulation that I prefer is that given by Lord Diplock in Photo Production Ltd. v. Securicor Tpt. Ltd., [1980] A.C. 827, [1980] 2 W.L.R. 283, [1980] 1 All E.R. 556 (H.L.). A fundamental breach occurs "Where the event resulting from the failure by one party to perform a primary obligation has the effect of depriving the other party of substantially the whole benefit which it > was the intention of the parties that he should obtain from the contract" (p. 849) (emphasis added). This is a restrictive definition and rightly so, I believe. As Lord Diplock points out, the usual remedy for breach of a "primary" contractual obligation (the thing bargained for) is a concomitant "secondary" obligation to pay damages. The other primary obligations of both parties yet unperformed remain in place. Fundamental breach represents an exception to this rule for it gives to the innocent party an additional remedy, an election to "put an end to all primary obligations of both parties remaining unperformed" (p. 849). It seems to me that this exceptional remedy should be available only in circumstances where the foundation of the contract has been undermined, where the very thing bargained for has not been provided.

[390] I do not agree that the Garchas “walked away” from their investment. The evidence relied upon by the Trustee in support of this argument consists of Jaswant’s testimony that Mr. Garcha told him he could “let it burn” when he asked Mr. Garcha for more contributions to the expenses of the 2007 Joint Venture and on the failure of the Garchas to make further contributions to the 2007 Joint Venture after October 2009.

[391] The evidence about the statement comes from Jaswant. Mr. Garcha denies making that statement. When Jaswant’s evidence conflicts with that of Mr. Garcha, I prefer Mr. Garcha’s evidence.

[392] In addition, I find that by October 2009, Jaswant had ceased to pursue the purposes of the 2007 Joint Venture, which contemplated the subdivision of only Lot 1. At that point, 690174 had no further right to ask for funds from the 2007 Joint Venturers without obtaining their informed consent to the incorporation of Lot 1 into the Project.

[393] While the Trustee argues that the 2007 Joint Venture was not incompatible with a larger subdivision, it clearly was incompatible with the manner in which the November 2010 JVA purported to divide up the beneficial ownership of the lands being subdivided.

[394] Apart from the evidence of Jaswant that I have rejected, there is no evidence that the Garchas ever refused to meet their obligations under the 2007 JVA. In any event, even if Jaswant’s evidence is accepted, it amounts to no more than an assertion that the Garchas refused to make further financial contributions to the 2007 Joint Venture. It is clear that Jaswant and 690174 did not comply with the procedures for raising funds set out in the 2007 JVA, and accordingly the Garchas were under no obligation to comply with his requests for further financial contributions.

[395] In this case, 690174 has continued to enjoy the principal benefit that it obtained from the 2007 JVA: the ability to utilize Lot 1 in the Project. It therefore has also failed to establish the elements necessary to establish fundamental breach.

[396] At worst, a failure to advance funds, assuming that the request was made in accordance with the parties' agreement, would constitute a default on the part of the party refusing to do so. The appropriate remedy for any such default would have been to take it into account upon division of the 2007 Joint Venture's proceeds. It might have also led to a claim for damages: 307527 B.C. Ltd. v. Cambridge, 2003 BCSC 1027 at paras. 253-258.

[397] There is therefore no basis for concluding that the Garchas are precluded from a remedy on these grounds.

Effect of the order of Justice Harvey of May 19, 2015

[398] While it is not entirely clear, the Trustee's argument seems to be that the Harvey Order somehow extinguished the property rights of the 2007 Joint Venturers in Lot 1.

[399] The Trustee submits that the Garchas are bound by the Harvey Order because they are persons claiming by, through, or under 690174 and therefore are bound by the priority established in para. 8 of that order.

[400] However, I find that the Trustee has misapprehended the effect of the Harvey Order. That order was an order nisi of foreclosure declaring that the Virk Mortgage was a valid charge ranking in priority to the respondents in the property charged by the Virk Mortgage.

[401] There is no question that Ms. Virk was entitled by virtue of the priorities set out in the LTA to rely on the registered state of title to the lands charged by her mortgage, including Lot 1, and to treat 690174 as the owner of Lot 1 for the purposes of establishing its priority.

[402] However, the Harvey Order merely established that the Virk Mortgage ranked in priority to the Garchas' interest in Lot 1. It did not in any way determine the validity of that interest, nor did it extinguish it or determine the rights of the parties to these proceedings against each other. To the contrary, an order nisi of foreclosure as a matter of law recognizes the right of persons whose interests rank behind the foreclosing mortgagee to redeem its mortgage.

[403] The Harvey Order is therefore irrelevant to the issues in this case, apart from being a step in a process that put the Garchas' beneficial ownership rights in Lot 1 at risk.

Effect of registration of an interest in the Land Title Office

[404] Wills and Dale rely upon on s. 23 of the LTA, arguing that it protected their registered title.

[405] Section 23 of the LTA provides as follows:

> 23 (1) In this section, "court" includes a person or statutory body having, by law or consent of parties, authority to hear, receive and examine evidence.
>
> (2) An indefeasible title, as long as it remains in force and uncancelled, is conclusive evidence at law and in equity, as against the Crown and all other persons, that the person named in the title as registered owner is indefeasibly entitled to an estate in fee simple to the land described in the indefeasible title, subject to the following:
>
> > (a) the subsisting conditions, provisos, restrictions, exceptions and reservations, including royalties, contained in the original grant or contained in any other grant or disposition from the Crown;
> >
> > (b) a federal or Provincial tax, rate or assessment at the date of the application for registration imposed or made a lien or that may after that date be imposed or made a lien on the land;
> >
> > (c) a municipal charge, rate or assessment at the date of the application for registration imposed or that may after that date be imposed on the land, or which had before that date been imposed for local improvements or otherwise and that was not then due and payable, including a charge, rate or assessment imposed by a public body having taxing powers over an area in which the land is located;

> (d) a lease or agreement for lease for a term not exceeding 3 years if there is actual occupation under the lease or agreement;
> (e) a highway or public right of way, watercourse, right of water or other public easement;
>
> (f) a right of expropriation or to an escheat under an Act;
>
> (g) a caution, caveat, charge, claim of builder's lien, condition, entry, exception, judgment, notice, pending court proceeding, reservation, right of entry, transfer or other matter noted or endorsed on the title or that may be noted or endorsed after the date of the registration of the title;
>
> (h) the right of a person to show that all or a portion of the land is, by wrong description of boundaries or parcels, improperly included in the title;
>
> (i) the right of a person deprived of land to show fraud, including forgery, in which the registered owner has participated in any degree;
>
> (j) a restrictive condition, right of reverter, or obligation imposed on the land by the Forest Act, that is endorsed on the title.

[406] In my view, s. 23 of the LTA does not assist the defendants in these proceedings.

[407] The law is well settled that the LTA does not oust the jurisdiction of a court of equity to grant a remedy against a person found to be subject to an equitable obligation, including one based on unjust enrichment. In Tolley v. Guerin, [1926] S.C.R. 566, the Supreme Court held that the provisions of a Land Title Act employing a Torrens System of title do not oust the equitable jurisdiction of the Court (see also Bainville v. White, 2002 BCCA 239).

[408] In these proceedings, the claim against the registered owners of the subdivided lots is based on allegations that they either committed a wrongful act, are legally responsible for the wrongful acts of Jaswant and his companies, or have been unjustly enriched at the expense of the plaintiffs. None of these claims are affected by the existence of a registered interest.

[409] In Ng v. Ng, 2012 BCCA 195, the case relied upon by Wills and Dale, the Court of Appeal upheld the decision of the trial judge, Justice Cullen, that a certain property was not held in trust by the plaintiff for one of the defendants who had counter-claimed for that relief. I can see no support in that decision for the proposition that an equitable claim against a registered owner of property is defeated by registration of the defendant's title to the property in issue in the Land Title Office. I also note that at para. 29 of Ng, the Court referred to a number of authorities in which equitable relief had been granted against a defendant who had registered title to the land in dispute.

[410] In this case any remedy I have granted against the defendants has been based on establishing a cause of action against them. The fact that they have a registered interest in the Project lands does not prevent them from being answerable for their conduct. Section 23 of the LTA protects the title acquired by persons in accordance with its provisions. It does not provide any defence to an action against persons who have acquired property in circumstances in which they are required to account for it.

[411] I therefore find that s. 23 of the LTA does not assist the defendants.

The Garchas' Other Claims

Unjust enrichment

[412] Because I am satisfied that my findings on breach of trust and breach of fiduciary duty are sufficient to grant appropriate relief to the Garchas, I do not find it necessary to deal with their claims for unjust enrichment.

[413] The essence of the Garchas' claim is to follow their own property into the proceeds of sale of the subdivided lots. I have found that they have established that claim. They therefore are not required to establish the elements of unjust enrichment to be entitled to relief.

Conspiracy

[414] In the course of final submissions, counsel for the Garchas abandoned this claim.

Punitive damages

[415] The Garchas seek an award of punitive damages in the amount of $500,000 against all defendants except the Trustee. However, they did not address the requirements for such an award set out by the Supreme Court in Whiten v. Pilot Insurance Co., 2002 SCC 18, and Performance Industries Ltd. v. Sylvan Lake Golf & Tennis Club Ltd., 2002 SCC 19.

[416] In those cases, the Supreme Court of Canada held that an award of punitive damages should be restricted to cases in which the defendant's conduct represents a marked departure from ordinary standards of human behaviour. In addition, there must be a rational basis for the award of punitive damages, and that basis will only exist if a compensatory award is insufficient to serve the purposes of denunciation and deterrence. In para. 87 of Performance Industries, Justice Binnie stated the principle as follows:

> 87 O'Connor's fraud was, of course, reprehensible. Indeed, fraud is generally reprehensible, but only in exceptional cases does it attract punitive damages. In this case, the trial judge, at para. 109, thought punishment above and beyond the payment of generous compensatory damages was required for two reasons, namely that O'Connor's actions (1) "demand an award which will stand as an example to others" and (2) "at the same time assure that O'Connor does not unduly profit from his conduct." These are both legitimate objectives for the award of punitive damages (Whiten, supra, at paras. 43, 111). However, it must be kept in mind that an award of punitive damages is rational "if, but only if" compensatory damages do not adequately achieve the objectives of retribution, deterrence and denunciation.

[417] In this case Jaswant and 690174 are the only defendants whose conduct may be said to have constituted a marked departure from ordinary standards of human behaviour. However, the award I have made against them requires them to disgorge any benefit they obtained from their wrongful conduct regardless of any actual loss suffered by the Garchas. I conclude that this award adequately achieves the objectives set out by Justice Binnie.

[418] The claim for punitive damages is accordingly dismissed.

The Grewal Parties' Claims

[419] Each of the Grewal plaintiffs alleges that he, or his wholly owned company on his behalf, entered into an oral agreement with Jaswant to participate in the Project on terms that differed significantly from any of the written agreements put into evidence.

[420] In addition, each alleges that the agreements they made with Jaswant are binding on the members in the 2011 Joint Venture and that they compel the members of the 2011 Joint Venture to share the profits of the Project with them based on the amount that each participant in the Project contributed to the capital necessary to carry it out.

[421] There is however an important difference between Grewal Management's claim and the claims of Mr. Mattu and Rajpreet. Grewal Management entered into a written agreement purporting to govern the terms on which it invested in the Project. Neither Rajpreet nor Mr. Mattu entered into a written agreement with respect to their investments.

Grewal Management's claim

[422] I have set out my findings with respect to Grewal Management becoming involved in the Project at paras. 104-117 of these reasons.

[423] Grewal Management's position is that it invested in the Project pursuant to the oral agreement I described in those paragraphs and that the oral agreement supersedes the written agreement set out in the 2011 JVA.

[424] Mr. Grewal testified that he and Jaswant agreed that there would be an accounting when the Project was completed with all lots sold and expenses paid that would calculate how the profits would be divided based on relative contributions to the Project. While Mr. Grewal did not expressly say so, it is clear that when he referred to contributions, he meant monetary contributions.

[425] The defendants' position is that the whole of the net profits from the Project should be divided in accordance with the proportionate shares of each of the 2011

Joint Venturers. This would result in Grewal Management being entitled to 14.25% of the net profits.

[426] The actual contribution to Project expenses made by Grewal Management is not in dispute. In June 2011, Grewal Management contributed $1,687,886.50 to Buckley Hogan to be used to pay part of the purchase price for Lot 5. On March 19, 2012, it received $740,498.38 from the proceeds of the WSCU mortgage that paid out the Acquisition Mortgages on Lots 1 to 5. As in the case of the other 2011 Joint Venturers, I regard this receipt as an advance distribution of proceeds from the Project.

[427] The issue is whether the agreement pursuant to which Grewal Management participated in the Project was wholly reduced to writing or whether the oral agreement alleged by Mr. Grewal supersedes or modifies the written agreement set out in the 2011 JVA.

[428] I have concluded that Grewal Management is bound by the terms of the 2011 JVA, which explicitly set out the proportionate interest of each 2011 Joint Venturer in the Project.

[429] An oral agreement can in some circumstances constitute a collateral agreement that explains or expands upon a written agreement. However, an oral agreement that contradicts the express terms of a written agreement is of no effect: Fridman at 517.

[430] The oral agreement alleged by Grewal Management contradicts the written agreement it executed. It is therefore of no effect and Grewal Management is bound by the terms of the written agreement it executed pursuant to the parol evidence rule.

[431] The parol evidence rule was succinctly described in Sattva:

> 59 It is necessary to say a word about consideration of the surrounding circumstances and the parol evidence rule. The parol evidence rule precludes admission of evidence outside the words of the written contract that would add to, subtract from, vary, or contradict a contract that has been wholly reduced to writing (King, at para. 35; and Hall, at p. 53). To this end, the rule > precludes, among other things, evidence of the subjective intentions of the parties (Hall, at pp. 64-65; and Eli Lilly & Co. v. Novopharm Ltd., [1998] 2 S.C.R. 129 (S.C.C.), at paras. 54-59, per Iacobucci J.). The purpose of the parol evidence rule is primarily to achieve finality and certainty in contractual obligations, and secondarily to hamper a party's ability to use fabricated or unreliable evidence to attack a written contract (C.J.A., Local 579 v. Bradco Construction Ltd., [1993] 2 S.C.R. 316 (S.C.C.), at pp. 341-42, per Sopinka J.).

[432] In addition, in this case the entire agreement clause in the November 2010 JVA expressly stated that the written agreement superseded all agreements with respect to the Project. While Mr. Grewal did not read the November 2010 JVA, the 2011 JVA expressly incorporated its terms by reference and Grewal Management must be taken to have agreed to be bound by it, including the entire agreement clause found at para. 13.1.

[433] A further difficulty I have with Mr. Grewal's submission is that it does not satisfactorily explain why he executed the 2011 JVA within days after the alleged oral agreement. There is no evidence that Mr. Grewal communicated any concern about Grewal Management's rights as set out in the 2011 JVA to anyone at the time it was executed.

[434] I find that the terms of the 2011 JVA were clear and capable of only one reasonable interpretation: that the profits from the 2011 Joint Venture would be distributed in accordance with the agreed proportionate interests set out in that agreement. I am reinforced in my interpretation by the fact that the sole purpose of the 2011 JVA was to admit Grewal Management into the joint venture and to adjust the proportionate interests of the parties accordingly.

[435] I therefore conclude that Grewal Management is bound by the terms of the 2011 JVA, which limit it to receiving 14.25% of the net proceeds of the Project.

Jaswant's fiduciary duties to Grewal Management

[436] Mr. Grewal's position is that Jaswant owed a fiduciary duty to Grewal Management with respect to the Project. His counsel submitted that this fiduciary duty arose from the de facto control that Jaswant exercised over all aspects of the Project and from the representations that Jaswant made with respect to how the proceeds of the Project would be divided.

[437] I am not satisfied that Jaswant owed a fiduciary duty to Grewal Management or Mr. Grewal with respect to the negotiation of the terms on which Grewal Management became a member of the 2011 JVA or invested in the Project. As I have indicated above in the discussion of Zynik Capital Corp., parties who are merely negotiating the terms of a joint venture do not generally owe fiduciary duties to one another.

[438] I am satisfied that Jaswant owed a fiduciary duty to Grewal Management with respect to the affairs of the 2011 Joint Venture. However, I do not find that Jaswant breached those fiduciary duties. All of the funds he invested were used in the Project. Mr. Grewal was involved in the negotiation of the Virk Mortgage, the Land Swap, and the subdivision of the Project. Jaswant carried out those steps with the informed consent of the 2011 Joint Venturers including Grewal Management, all of whom benefitted from them.

Rajpreet Sangha's claim

[439] I have already made a finding that Rajpreet advanced $800,000 to Panorama and Jaswant in connection with the Project. The first $200,000 was initially advanced as a contribution to the October 2010 Joint Venture by 0892995. Panorama owed a fiduciary duty to 0892995 to use that advance solely for the purposes of the October 2010 Joint Venture. Because that joint venture did not proceed, the $200,000 should have been kept segregated and returned to 0892995. However, Panorama used those funds to make up part of the deposit for the purchase of Lot 5. 0892995 therefore had a right to trace those funds into Lot 5 and ultimately Panorama's interest in the 2011 Joint Venture.

[440] I also find that the subsequent agreement made between Rajpreet, Jaswant, and their respective companies had all of the essential elements of a joint venture, set out at para. 231 of these reasons. Rajpreet agreed to combine his contributions with those of others into the Project. There is no suggestion that any of the funds advanced by Rajpreet or 0892995 were advanced as loans. I find that they were advanced as contributions to a joint venture, the object of which was to acquire and subdivide Lots 1 to 5 and sell those lots; in other words, the Project. I also find that this joint venture agreement contained a formula for determining each party's share of the proceeds.

[441] I therefore conclude that the agreement made between Jaswant and Rajpreet in 2010, pursuant to which Rajpreet made his investment, was a joint venture agreement pursuant to which Rajpreet obtained a beneficial ownership interest in the Project.

[442] The agreement between Rajpreet and Jaswant was made after the execution of the November 2010 JVA, which purported to fully allocate the ownership of the Project. The question this raises is the extent to which the interests of any November 2010 Joint Venturer, apart from Jaswant and the two companies he wholly owned and controlled, could be affected by the agreement between Rajpreet and Jaswant.

[443] All of the members of the November 2010 Joint Venture testified that they never authorized Jaswant to bind them to make any agreements altering their rights under that agreement. They also rely on the terms of the November 2010 JVA that limit the authority of any joint venture to bind the others.

[444] There are circumstances in which a person may be bound by an agreement made by another person. This most commonly arises in an agency relationship.

[445] A person may bind another if they have actual authority or ostensible authority to do so.

[446] Ostensible authority requires some communication from the principal to the third party that would cause the third party reasonably to believe that the agent had authority to bind the principal. In this case I cannot find sufficient evidence that the November 2010 Joint Venturers held out Jaswant as their agent in his dealings with Rajpreet to establish ostensible authority. There is virtually no evidence of any communications between Rajpreet and the November 2010 Joint Venturers or that Rajpreet was even aware of the November 2010 Joint Venture.

[447] For Rajpreet to affect the rights of the other November 2010 Joint Venturers he must therefore establish that Jaswant had actual authority to bind them.

[448] The existence of actual authority is a question of fact that must be determined on a review of the evidence. The principles relating to a finding of actual authority were set out in Grosvenor Canada Limited v. South Coast British Columbia Transportation Authority, 2015 BCSC 177:

> 58 The parties agree the essential elements of an agency relationship are (a) the principal's control of the agent's action, (b) the consent of both the agent and the principal, and (c) the authority of the agent to affect the principal's legal position. Professor Fridman in Canadian Agency Law 2nd Ed. (Toronto: LexisNexis Canada Inc., 2012) defines agency at common law as follows (at p. 4):
>
> > Agency is a relationship that exists between two persons when one, called the agent, is considered in law to represent the other, called the principal, in such a way as to be able to the affect the principal's legal position in respect of strangers to the relationship by the making of contracts or the disposition of property.
> 59 The existence of an agency relationship is a question of fact and it may arise between parties who have another legal relationship. In the context of trustees acting as agents, see Advanced Glazing v. Multimetro et al., 2000 BCSC 804. It is irrelevant that the parties have used the term agency in describing their relationship (Fridman, Canadian Agency Law at p. 6). No express agreement is necessary to establish an agency relationship, and therefore it can be implied from the circumstances: Trident Holdings Ltd. v. Danand Investments Ltd. (1988), 64 O.R. (2d) 65 (C.A.).

[449] I have no difficulty in finding that Jaswant had actual authority to bind his companies, 690174 and Panorama. He was their directing mind and was acting on their behalf in the Project. I have already found that he had actual authority to bind Parmjit and that they were in fact engaged in a joint enterprise with respect to the Project. I also have found that Wills and Dale held their interest in the November 2010 Joint Venture as nominees for Jaswant, and that he therefore had the authority to deal with their interests in the Project to complete it successfully.

[450] The totality of the circumstances under which the Project was formed and pursued have convinced me that Jaswant had the actual authority to take the steps necessary to complete the Project, including by bringing in additional investors to provide funds to meet the expenses necessary to bring it to fruition.

[451] The evidence shows that in fact Jaswant made almost all of the decisions with respect to the Project without consulting with the other members of the November 2010 Joint Venture. There is no evidence of any November 2010 Joint Venturer ever challenging any decision Jaswant made. Remarkably, there is no evidence of any negotiations about the proportionate interests of the parties to the November 2010 JVA. On the contrary, it appears that Jaswant unilaterally decided what those interests would be.

[452] There is also no evidence that any of the November 2010 Joint Venturers except Ranjit played any role in the acquisition of Lots 2 to 4. Ranjit was involved in the acquisition of Lot 2, but his evidence was that he was not aware that Lot 2 was going to be consolidated and subdivided when he purchased a half interest in it. His belief was that Lot 2 was to be held for investment purposes. Although he signed the November 2010 JVA, there is no evidence that Ranjit participated in its negotiation or in the determination of the proportionate interests of the November 2010 Joint Ventures. Wills and Dale played no role in the acquisition of Lot 4 apart from executing the Lot 4 Acquisition Mortgage, and neither Mr. Wills nor Ms. Dale knew what they would receive from the completed Project.

[453] I find that Jaswant had the actual authority of the members of the November 2010 Joint Venture to do what was necessary to raise the funds required to complete the Project, including the agreement he made with Rajpreet.

[454] Because Rajpreet was not a party to the November 2010 JVA and was not aware of it, he is not bound by any of the contractual provisions in it restricting collateral agreements.

[455] The result is that Rajpreet has established a joint venture agreement with Jaswant that must be taken into account in determining the distribution of the proceeds of the Project.

Daljit Singh Mattu's claim

[456] Mr. Mattu invested $1,062,041.45 in the Project. As with Rajpreet, the critical issue with relation to his claim is how this amount should be characterized.

[457] Jaswant agrees that he borrowed $400,000 from Mr. Mattu and used those funds to invest in Sangha Group 2. The documentary evidence indicates that from November 2006 to February 2007, Mr. Mattu advanced approximately $400,000 to Jaswant, which he used to fund land acquisitions for Sangha Group 2.

[458] As I have earlier stated, Jaswant agrees that those funds were advanced as a loan and that he agreed to repay $500,000 to Mr. Mattu once Sangha Group 2 was completed.

[459] When Mr. Mattu inquired about the $500,000.00 repayment in 2007, Jaswant told him he needed to wait a little longer to be paid. In October 2007, after Mr. Mattu again asked for the repayment, Jaswant told him about the Project and gave him the option of taking the $500,000.00 repayment or investing it in the Project. Mr. Mattu visited the site and decided to invest.

[460] Mr. Mattu testified that Jaswant told him that the subdivision was his and that more properties would be acquired. He denies having knowledge of the involvement of other parties at that time.

[461] Jaswant acknowledged that he agreed the $500,000.00 due to Mr. Mattu would be invested in the Project, and that he invested the $500,000.00 in the Project on Mr. Mattu's behalf. However, as I described earlier in these reasons, his position is that he used the funds because Mr. Mattu was his silent partner in all his business activities. I need not repeat my reasons for rejecting that evidence.

[462] I have also accepted Mr. Mattu's evidence that most of his further advances to Jaswant were made pursuant to the same agreement. The bulk of Mr. Mattu's advances to Jaswant were made in 2007 and 2008, the period during which Lots 2 to 4 were being acquired.

[463] I find that the agreement between Jaswant and Mr. Mattu has all of the necessary characteristics of a joint venture.

[464] Mr. Mattu did not use the term joint venture in his evidence. However, I find his agreement was summarized accurately in his counsel's argument:

> a. funds Mr. Mattu advanced to Mr. Sangha or his companies would be used by Mr. Sangha only to acquire properties for the Project or to pay costs associated with the Project;
>
> b. Mr. Sangha would involve other investors, and keep records to keep track of amounts advanced by other investors;
>
> c. Mr. Sangha would keep records of all of the bills for the Project, which investors could access;
>
> d. Mr. Sangha would be "in charge" of the Project and hire people for the Project;
>
> e. after the Project was complete and lots sold, and all costs and any legitimate creditors directly associated with the Project, including bank and contractors, had been paid, the remaining proceeds would be divided proportionately among investors according to their proven investments in the Project.

[465] Arguably the only element of a joint venture lacking in this description, as set out in Gettling, is a right of mutual control. It is clear that Jaswant exercised a great deal of control over the Project. However, this does not mean that Mr. Mattu had no right to control aspects of the Project.

[466] Mr. Mattu was clearly actively involved in the financial management of the Project from 2010 onwards. He introduced Rajpreet and later Jasprit Grewal to Jaswant. He raised funds needed to move the Project forward. He provided security for the Virk Mortgage, which was necessary for the Project to proceed. He clearly had control over all of these activities.

[467] Surrounding circumstances also support the conclusion that there was a joint venture between Jaswant and Mr. Mattu with respect to the Project:

1. Jaswant had historically structured projects relating to land developments in which investors were involved as joint ventures.

2. Jaswant adopted a joint venture structure to arrange for the involvement of the participants in the 2007, October 2010, November 2010, and 2011 JVAs.

3. All of the written joint venture agreements provided that the joint venturers owned a share of the joint venture assets as their separate property.

[468] I therefore find that Mr. Mattu entered into a joint venture with Jaswant pursuant to which Mr. Mattu acquired a beneficial interest in the Project by providing funds and assisting in its completion. The only rational basis for Mr. Mattu providing security for the Virk Mortgage was to carry out the objectives of the Project. He had no reason to put his property at risk unless he was a participant in the Project.

[469] I find that Mr. Mattu must have been aware of the existence of the November 2010 JVA by no later than June 2011. He introduced Mr. Grewal to the Project. Mr. Mattu witnessed the signatures of many of the 2011 Joint Venturers to the 2011 JVA. Even if he did so before some of the 2011 Joint Venturers had executed it, he must have been aware of the 2011 JVA by then. There is no evidence that Mr. Mattu communicated any objection to the terms of the November 2010 or 2011 JVAs at that time. This however is also consistent with him being a participant in Jaswant's interest in the Project.

[470] As set out above, there is ample evidence that Mr. Mattu was involved in the management of the Project, particularly with respect to finding investors and assisting in executing documentation. The only question is whether Mr. Mattu was participating in the Project because he was Jaswant's partner in all of the business activities carried out by Jaswant and his companies, or whether his activities and investment were restricted to the Project. I repeat my finding that Mr. Mattu was not a participant in any of Jaswant's business activities apart from the Project. I find that he became an investor in the Project in 2007 when Jaswant invested $500,000 from Sangha Group 2 on his behalf into the Project and that from that time forward was engaged in the joint venture that developed the Project. I am satisfied that the funds he advanced, either directly or through his agreement with respect to the $500,000 from Sangha Group 2, were investments in the capital required to complete the Project.

[471] I also find that the November 2010 and 2011 Joint Venturers became aware of his involvement in the Project by 2011 at the latest.

[472] The memorandum prepared by Sean Hogan, which I described at paras. 126-128, supports the conclusion that the 2011 Joint Venturers were aware of Mr. Mattu's investment and recognized that he was a participant in the Project. They must have been aware of the reasons for Mr. Mattu's involvement in obtaining the Virk Mortgage. I also consider it significant that it was Ranjit and Mr. Grewal who first described Mr. Mattu as a silent partner and instructed Buckley Hogan to include him in the mortgage of the phase 1 lots. It is clear to me that their reference to Mr. Mattu being a silent partner referred to his interest in the Project. From this I conclude that they were aware of his involvement and did not object to it. This reinforces my conclusion that the 2011 Joint Venturers were aware that Mr. Mattu would share in the revenue from the Project.

Jaswant owed a fiduciary duty to Mr. Mattu and Rajpreet

[473] It is trite to say that both contractual and fiduciary duties can arise out of the same relationship. I am of the view that Jaswant obtained the use of Mr. Mattu's and Rajpreet's funds in circumstances which imposed an ad hoc fiduciary duty on him to use them for the specific purposes of securing them an interest in the Project.

[474] The existence of an ad hoc fiduciary duty is dependent on the specific circumstances of a relationship. The circumstances giving rise to an ad hoc fiduciary duty were reviewed in Elder Advocates of Alberta Society v. Alberta, 2011 SCC 24:

> 30 First, the evidence must show that the alleged fiduciary gave an undertaking of responsibility to act in the best interests of a beneficiary: Galambos, at paras. 66, 71 and 77-78; and Hodgkinson, per La Forest J., at pp. 409-10. As Cromwell J. wrote in Galambos, at para. 75: "what is required in all cases is an undertaking by the fiduciary, express or implied, to act in accordance with the duty of loyalty reposed on him or her."

> 31 The existence and character of the undertaking is informed by the norms relating to the particular relationship: Galambos, at para. 77. The party asserting the duty must be able to point to a forsaking by the alleged fiduciary of the interests of all others in favour of those of the beneficiary, in relation to the specific legal interest at stake.
> 32 The undertaking may be found in the relationship between the parties, in an imposition of responsibility by statute, or under an express agreement to act as trustee of the beneficiary's interests. . . .
>
> 33 Second, the duty must be owed to a defined person or class of persons who must be vulnerable to the fiduciary in the sense that the fiduciary has a discretionary power over them. Fiduciary duties do not exist at large; they are confined to specific relationships between particular parties. Per se, historically recognized, fiduciary relationships exist as a matter of course within the traditional categories of trustee-cestui qui trust, executor-beneficiary, solicitor-client, agent-principal, director-corporation and guardian-ward or parent-child. By contrast, ad hoc fiduciary relationships must be established on a case-by-case basis.
>
> 34 Finally, to establish a fiduciary duty, the claimant must show that the alleged fiduciary's power may affect the legal or substantial practical interests of the beneficiary: Frame, per Wilson J., at p. 142.
> [Emphasis added]

[475] I do not understand the reference in Elder Advocates to a requirement that the alleged fiduciary act exclusively in the interest of the beneficiary to preclude finding a fiduciary duty to act in the mutual interests of the fiduciary and beneficiary. This situation will often arise when, as in this case, the parties are jointly pursuing a business opportunity, such as a joint venture.

[476] The circumstances of Mr. Mattu’s and Rajpreet’s investments in the Project that gave rise to an ad hoc fiduciary duty with respect to their investments were as follows:

1. Jaswant had undertaken to use the funds contributed by them for the purposes of completing the Project.

2. Jaswant had control of the funds invested by them and discretion as to how to use them.

3. The manner in which Jaswant used the funds clearly could affect their legal and practical interest in the Project.

4. The only recourse that they had to recover their investment was to obtain a share of the net proceeds of the Project.

[477] With respect to the “vulnerability” requirement, it is important to note that vulnerability must be assessed after the relationship in question has been entered into. This principle was addressed by Justice Cromwell in Galambos v. Perez, 2009 SCC 48:

> 68 . . . fiduciary law is more concerned with the position of the parties that results from the relationship which gives rise to the fiduciary duty than with the respective positions of the parties before they enter into the relationship. La Forest J. in Hodgkinson, at p. 406, made this clear by approving these words of Professor Ernest J. Weinrib: "It cannot be the sine qua non of a fiduciary obligation that the parties have disparate bargaining strength. . . . In contrast to notions of conscionability, the fiduciary relation looks to the relative position of the parties that results from the agreement rather than the relative position that precedes the agreement" ("The Fiduciary Obligation" (1975), 25 U.T.L.J. 1, at p. 6). Thus, while vulnerability in the broad sense resulting from factors external to the relationship is a relevant consideration, a more important one is the extent to which vulnerability arises from the relationship: Hodgkinson, at p. 406.

[478] I am therefore satisfied that Rajpreet and Mr. Mattu became vulnerable to Jaswant when they provided him with their investments in the Project, and that all of the elements necessary to establish an ad hoc fiduciary duty were present.

Are Rajpreet and Mr. Mattu entitled to a constructive trust over the proceeds of lot sales?

[479] A critical issue with respect to Rajpreet’s and Mr. Mattu’s claims is whether they are entitled to a constructive trust over the subdivided lots, and if so, when the trust took effect.

[480] A constructive trust may be imposed if the alleged trustee has engaged in wrongful conduct or has been unjustly enriched.

[481] The leading case on the circumstances necessary to impose a remedial constructive trust for wrongful conduct is Soulos v. Korkontzilas, [1997] 2 S.C.R. 217. In Re Redstone Investment Corp. 2015 ONSC 533, Justice Morawetz, as he then was, summarized the test set out in Soulos:

> 68 The test for finding a constructive trust based on wrongful conduct was set out by the Supreme Court of Canada in Soulos v. Korkontzilas, [1997] 2 S.C.R. 217 (S.C.C.). The following criteria is to be considered in determining the availability of the remedial constructive trust:
>
> > 1. The defendant must have been under an equitable obligation, that is, an obligation of the type that courts of equity have enforced, in relation to the activities giving rise to the assets in his hands;
> >
> > 2. The assets in the hands of the defendant must be shown to have resulted from deemed or actual agency activities of the defendant in breach of his equitable obligation to the plaintiff;
> >
> > 3. The plaintiff must show a legitimate reason for seeking a proprietary remedy, either personal or related to the need to ensure that others like the defendant remain faithful to their duties; and
> > 4. There must be no factors which would render imposition of a constructive trust unjust in all the circumstances of the case; e.g., the interests of intervening creditors must be protected.

[482] I adopt this analysis of Soulos. However, subsequent to Redstone the Supreme Court has held that the equitable obligation referred to in the preceding passage need not be of a fiduciary nature, and that a breach of any obligation that a Court would enforce may be sufficient: Moore v. Sweet, 2018 SCC 52.

[483] A constructive trust may also be imposed against a party pursuant to the equitable doctrine of unjust enrichment if, as per Garland v. Consumers' Gas Co., 2004 SCC 25 at para. 30, there exists:

1. An enrichment of that party;

2. A corresponding deprivation of the plaintiff; and

3. An absence of a juristic reason for the enrichment.

[484] In this case I am satisfied that Rajpreet and Mr. Mattu are entitled to the remedy of a constructive trust on both of the above grounds.

A constructive trust is available based on wrongful conduct

[485] I find that the elements necessary to establish a constructive trust against the interests of the Bankrupts and Parmjit in the Project are present in this case. All of these defendants knew that Rajpreet and Mr. Mattu had invested in the Project based on Jaswant's agreement that they would participate in it. I have included Parmjit in this category because of my finding that she and Jaswant were engaged in a joint enterprise in pursuing the Project. I am satisfied that by obtaining Rajpreet's and Mr. Mattu's investments on the basis that they would be participants in the Project, Jaswant was under an obligation to them that a Court of Equity would have enforced. The defendants referred to in this paragraph knew and profited from Jaswant's breach of that obligation. For the reasons I have set and out in paras. 562-568 below I find that the constructive trust came into existence prior to the Bankruptcies.

[486] On the facts I have found Jaswant and Parmjit could not in good conscience have retained the benefit of Rajpreet's and Mr. Mattu's investments without ensuring that they participated in the Project. The good conscience basis for imposing a constructive trust was expressly approved in Soulos:

> 29 Good conscience as the unifying concept underlying constructive trust has attracted the support of many jurists. Edmund Davies L.J. suggested that the concept of a "want of probity" in the person upon whom the constructive trust is imposed provides "a useful touchstone in considering circumstances said to give rise to constructive trusts": Carl Zeiss Stiftung v. Herbert Smith & Co. (No. 2), [1969] 2 Ch. 276 (C.A.), at p. 301. Cardozo J. similarly endorsed the unifying theme of good conscience in Beatty v. Guggenheim Exploration Co., 122 N.E. 378 (1919), at p. 380:
> > A constructive trust is the formula through which the conscience of equity finds expression. When property has been acquired in such circumstances that the holder of the legal title may not in good conscience retain the beneficial interest, equity converts him into a trustee.

[487] I repeat that the contributions of Rajpreet and Mr. Mattu made a material contribution to the acquisition of Lots 2 to 4 and to the payment of Project expenses.

[488] I also find that there is a legitimate reason for these plaintiffs to seek a proprietary remedy in this case. The obtaining of a proprietary interest in the subdivided lots is the only effective remedy available to them. Given the insolvency of the bankrupt defendants, a personal remedy would clearly be inadequate.

[489] Finally, there is no other factor that would make the imposition of a proprietary remedy unjust in the circumstances. While the Trustee maintains that a constructive trust should not be imposed to the prejudice of the creditors of the bankrupt estates, I find that it would be unjust for the creditors to obtain the benefit of the plaintiffs' investment in the circumstances I have outlined above.

[490] As pointed out by Justice Morawetz in Redstone, the interests of the general body of creditors in a bankruptcy is not a factor that will render the imposition of a constructive trust unjust if the property over which the trust is imposed would not have been available to the creditors without the wrongful acts of the insolvent defendant. In such a case it would be unjust to permit the general body of creditors to benefit from the wrongful acts of that defendant.

A constructive trust is available based on unjust enrichment

[491] If I am wrong in finding that Jaswant owed a fiduciary duty with respect to Rajpreet and Mr. Mattu, he nevertheless had a contractual obligation to ensure their participation in the Project. This raises the question of whether a breach of that contractual obligation is sufficient to warrant the imposition of a constructive trust in their favour based on unjust enrichment.

[492] The traditional view was that in order to establish a claim in unjust enrichment against an innocent third party the claimant must show a breach of an equitable duty on the part of the wrongdoer. However, in Moore, the majority imposed a constructive trust which arose from the deprivation of a contractual right. Justice Coté stated this principle as follows:

> 49 My view is that it is not useful, in the context of unjust enrichment, to distinguish between expectations based on a contractual obligation and expectations where there was a breach of an equitable duty (see my colleagues' reasons, at para. 104). Rather, a robust approach to the corresponding deprivation element focuses simply on what the plaintiff actually lost — that is, property that was in his or her possession or that would have accrued for his or her benefit — and on whether that loss corresponds to the defendant's enrichment, such that we can say that the latter was enriched at the expense of the former. As was observed by Professors Maddaugh and McCamus in The Law of Restitution, one source of difficulty in these kinds of disappointed beneficiary cases is > > a rigid application of the "corresponding deprivation" or "expense" element as if it requires that the benefit in the defendant's hands must have been transferred from, or constitute an out-of-pocket expense of, the plaintiff. . . .

> > [R]estitution of benefits received from third parties may well provide a basis for recovery. In this particular context, the benefit received can, in any event, normally be described as having been received at the plaintiff's expense in the sense that, but for the mistaken failure to implement the arrangements in question, the benefit would have been received by the plaintiff. [Emphasis added; p. 35-21.]
> I agree. In this case, given the fact that Michelle held up her end of the bargain, kept the policy alive by paying the premiums, did not predecease Lawrence, and still did not get what she actually contracted for, it seems artificial to suggest that her loss was anything less than the right to receive the entirety of the insurance proceeds.

[493] The facts of Moore were different from those of these proceedings. However, the legal analysis of the majority decision is in my view applicable to the facts before me.

[494] The claimant in Moore was the first wife of a deceased person who had been named as sole beneficiary in the deceased's life insurance policy. The premiums on the policy were initially paid from the couple's joint account. When the marriage broke down, the applicant and the deceased made an oral agreement that the applicant would pay the premiums from her own funds and would continue to be the designated beneficiary of the policy. Thereafter, the claimant made all of the premium payments.

[495] After divorce, the deceased entered into a relationship with the respondent. At some later date he revoked the claimant's designation as beneficiary and instead designated the respondent as an irrevocable beneficiary as permitted by the applicable Ontario insurance legislation. When the deceased died, the claimant was denied payment under the policy. She then brought proceedings for an order that she was entitled to the death benefit. She succeeded at first instance, but that decision was reversed by the Ontario Court of Appeal.

[496] The Supreme Court of Canada reversed the Court of Appeal and held that the applicant was entitled to the death benefit. Notwithstanding the fact that her claim was based on a breach of contract, the majority of the Court found that the applicant was entitled to a constructive trust over the proceeds of the policy based on unjust enrichment. In so doing, the Court found that the applicant had been unjustly deprived of the whole of the death benefit and not just the premiums she had paid on the policy.

[497] Justice Coté emphasized that the underlying principle of unjust enrichment was the notion of restoration of a benefit which justice did not permit another person to retain:

> 38 This principled approach to unjust enrichment is a flexible one that allows courts to identify circumstances where justice and fairness require one party to restore a benefit to another. Recovery is therefore not restricted to cases that fit within the categories under which the retention of a conferred benefit was traditionally considered unjust (Kerr, at para. 32). As observed by McLachlin J. in Peel (Regional Municipality) (at p. 788):
> > The tri-partite principle of general application which this Court has recognized as the basis of the cause of action for unjust enrichment is thus seen to have grown out of the traditional categories of recovery. It is informed by them. It is capable, however, of going beyond them, allowing the law to develop in a flexible way as required to meet changing perceptions of justice.

[498] In Moore, the Court also reiterated the two-step analysis of the issue of whether there was a juristic reason for the deprivation and enrichment. The analysis places the initial onus on the plaintiff to show that the established categories of juristic reasons (such as contract, statutory provision, or gift) do not apply. Once the plaintiff establishes that those categories do not apply the onus shifts to the defendant to establish a juristic reason for the enrichment.

[499] Justice Coté held that a claimant is not required to prove that the benefit was bestowed directly on the defendant, and that the amount of the deprivation can be based on the amount of a gain of which the claimant had been deprived. Thus, the claimant was entitled to receive the whole of the death benefit and not just the amount she paid in premiums.

[500] In this case, Jaspreet and Mr. Mattu have clearly been deprived of a benefit: the right to share in the profits of the Project. The 2011 Joint Venturers have collectively received a corresponding benefit.

[501] However, Rajpreet, Parmjit, and Wills and Dale submit that they are bona fide purchasers for value of their interests in the November 2010 and 2011 Joint Ventures without notice of the claims of Mr. Mattu and Rajpreet, and that this is a juristic reason for their enrichment.

[502] I have concluded that this defence is not available to the defendants. I have already found that Parmjit was content to let Jaswant act on her behalf in the Project. In my view the finding that Parmjit and Jaswant were engaged in a joint enterprise makes Parmjit responsible for Jaswant's wrongful acts with respect to Rajpreet and Mr. Mattu.

[503] I also am satisfied that Ranjit was aware of Mr. Mattu's involvement in the Project from an early point in its development and that Ranjit was, at the very least, in possession of sufficient facts to put him on inquiry with respect to Mr. Mattu's involvement. It follows from the concession made by counsel that Svender is also to be taken to have had notice of Mr. Mattu's interest in the Project.

[504] I have already concluded that Wills and Dale hold their interest in the Project as nominees for Jaswant. Given this fact, they are not bona fide purchasers for value with respect to that interest. As neither the Trustee nor any of the other members of the 2011 Joint Venture, other than Grewal Management, have sought any remedy against Wills and Dale, they continue to be entitled to share in the profits of the 2011 Joint Venture, subject to the established claims of Rajpreet and Mr. Mattu.

[505] In addition, as I have already indicated, I am satisfied that Jaswant had the actual authority to do what was necessary to finance the Project. The fact that the 2011 Joint Venturers are parties to a contract pursuant to which they are entitled to certain rights does not insulate them from a claim based on unjust enrichment. None of them contributed their proportionate share of the expenses incurred to complete the Project. Many of those expenses were paid from funds provided by Rajpreet and Mr. Mattu. There is therefore a direct link between their enrichment and Mr. Mattu's deprivation.

[506] I therefore find that the defence of being bona fide purchasers for value has not been made out by the 2011 Joint Venturers.

[507] With respect to the Trustee, as I have outlined elsewhere in these reasons, the funds that the Trustee says should be distributed to the creditors of the bankrupt estates would not have been available without the funds invested by Mr. Mattu and Rajpreet. Therefore, the analysis of Justice Morawetz in Redstone applies to the bankrupt estates.

[508] I am therefore satisfied that Rajpreet and Mr. Mattu are entitled to the remedy of a constructive trust over the net proceeds of the Project.

[509] I will quantify the extent of the constructive trust when I deal with the remedies awarded to the successful plaintiffs.

Are the Garcha, Mattu and Rajpreet Claims Equity Claims?

[510] The Trustee submits that the plaintiffs' claims in the Civil Actions are equity claims, as that term is defined in the BIA, and are therefore postponed to the claims of all other creditors of the Bankrupts to the funds held in the Vendor Trust Accounts set up for the Bankrupts. If this position is correct there will be nothing payable to the plaintiffs because there are insufficient assets in the bankrupt estates to pay the unsecured claims in full.

[511] The Trustee's counsel set out his position on this issue in his written submissions in the Grewal Action as follows:

> 85. Ignoring for the moment the written agreements, of importance to the classification of the Grewal Group's Equity Claims, were the allegations in their first NOCC as to the existence of a joint venture and investment agreement's terms that constituted what the Trustee viewed as a classic definition of what an Equity Claim was. An investment was alleged to contribute capital, share profit, accepting the risk of loss or profit, requiring the return of capital and a dividend or similar payment based upon a share of profit, if any. There was no allegation or suggestion by the Grewal Group that the investment monies were a loan repayable with interest or other form of debt or credit agreement.
> 86. The Grewal Group never once suggested in any way in evidence at trial that they were entitled to the repayment of a debt or loan or an obligation under a credit agreement.

[512] In my view the Trustee's submissions on this issue are based on the incorrect assumption that the Garchas' and Grewal plaintiffs' claims are claims to participate in the division of the property of the Bankrupts that is divisible among their creditors.

[513] This assumption is incorrect because the plaintiffs' claims are to receive their proportionate share of the profits of the joint ventures, all of which were pursuing the business of completing the Project. The property of the Bankrupts in the Project is limited to their proportionate share of the capital of the joint ventures remaining after all creditors of the Project have been paid. The proportionate shares of the non-bankrupt joint venturers are not property of the Bankrupts.

[514] The joint venturers have not made any contribution to the capital of the Bankrupts and have no right to share in the profits the Bankrupts received from the Project. The joint venturers provided capital to the joint ventures in which they participated, not to the Bankrupts. Similarly, the separate creditors of the Bankrupts have no right to claim against the proportionate shares of the non-bankrupt joint venturers.

[515] The Trustee has also failed to address the interaction between ss. 67(1) and 140.1 of the BIA. Section 67(1) excludes property held in trust from the property of a bankrupt divisible among its creditors. Section 140.1 applies only to the property of a bankrupt that is distributable among its creditors. The express terms of the 2007 JVA provide that 690174 held title to the assets of the 2007 Joint Venture in trust for the 2007 Joint Venturers. Apart from the 1/23 interest held by 690174, all of the property of that joint venture was beneficially owned by the 2007 Joint Venturers and is therefore not distributable among 690174's creditors.

[516] Section 140.1 provides as follows:

> 140.1 A creditor is not entitled to a dividend in respect of an equity claim until all claims that are not equity claims have been satisfied.

[517] An equity claim is defined as follows:

> equity claim means a claim that is in respect of an equity interest, including a claim for, among others,
>
> (a) a dividend or similar payment,

> (b) a return of capital,
>
> (c) a redemption or retraction obligation,
>
> (d) a monetary loss resulting from the ownership, purchase or sale of an equity interest or from the rescission, or, in Quebec, the annulment, of a purchase or sale of an equity interest, or
>
> (e) contribution or indemnity in respect of a claim referred to in any of paragraphs (a) to (d); (réclamation relative à des capitaux propres)

[518] An equity interest is described as follows:

> equity interest means
>
> > (a) in the case of a corporation other than an income trust, a share in the corporation — or a warrant or option or another right to acquire a share in the corporation — other than one that is derived from a convertible debt, …

[519] Section 67(1)(a) of the BIA provides as follows:

> 67(1) The property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors shall not comprise
> > (a) property held by the bankrupt in trust for any other person;

[520] The modern approach to statutory interpretation requires a consideration of the words of a statue in the context of the scheme of the act in which they are found; in Re Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd., [1998] 1 S.C.R. 27 at 40-41:

> 21 Although much has been written about the interpretation of legislation (see, e.g., Ruth Sullivan, Statutory Interpretation (1997); Ruth Sullivan, Driedger on the Construction of Statutes (3rd ed. 1994) (hereinafter "Construction of Statutes"); Pierre-André Côté, The Interpretation of Legislation in Canada (2nd ed. 1991), Elmer Driedger in Construction of Statutes (2nd ed. 1983) best encapsulates the approach upon which I prefer to rely. He recognizes that statutory interpretation cannot be founded on the wording of the legislation alone. At p. 87 he states:
> > Today there is only one principle or approach, namely, the words of an Act are to be read in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament.

[521] In my view neither the ordinary meaning of the words contained in ss. 140.1 and 67(1)(a) nor the scheme of the BIA support the Trustee's position with respect to the Garchas' claim.

[522] The Trustee relied on a number of recent decisions that considered s. 140.1. In Re Bul River Mineral Corp., 2014 BCSC 1732, Justice Fitzpatrick reviewed the law relating to the proper interpretation of s. 140.1 and decided that it had expanded the scope of claims that should be considered to be equity claims to include claims that were derived from equity holdings of the claimant. She also agreed with other cases that claims formerly considered to be debt claims, such as claims for dividends that had been declared but not paid before bankruptcy, should now be classified as equity claims. Justice Fitzpatrick also found that a judgment obtained on such a claim before bankruptcy continued to be an equity claim.

[523] While it is not entirely clear, it appears that the Trustee interpreted Re Bul River and other cases that reached similar conclusions as authority for the proposition that any claim arising out of an agreement that calls for the sharing of profits with a bankrupt should be regarded as an equity claim.

[524] However, none of the cases relied upon by the Trustee dealt with the issue raised in this case, which is whether non-bankrupt joint venturers were equity creditors of a bankrupt joint venturer who held legal title to property that was beneficially owned by all the joint venturers.

[525] The scheme of the BIA requires the Trustee to make a determination of the property of the bankrupt that is divisible among its creditors. In making that determination the Trustee must comply with the provisions of s. 67(1)(a), which excludes property held in trust for another person from being distributable.

[526] Section 140.1 is found in the Scheme of Distribution Portion of Part V of the BIA. The Scheme of Distribution set out in the BIA applies only to claims against the property of a bankrupt that is divisible among its creditors. It does not convert property that is not divisible into property that is, or otherwise affect entitlement to that property.

[527] The inability of the Trustee to divide property held in trust for another person among the creditors of a bankrupt under the BIA was recognized in Royal Bank of Canada v. North American Life Assurance Co., [1996] 1 S.C.R. 325 at 357:

> 62 However, the trustee is barred from dividing two categories of property among creditors: property held by the bankrupt in trust for another person (s. 67(1)(a)), and property rendered exempt from execution or seizure under provincial legislation (s. 67(1)(b)). While such property becomes part of the bankrupt's estate in the possession of the trustee, the trustee may not exercise his or her estate distribution powers over it by reason of s. 67.

[528] Section 140.1 therefore has no application to such property.

[529] This however does not mean that the common law rule that precludes the payment of the capital of a business until all creditors of the business have been paid does not apply to joint ventures. The question is how it should properly be applied.

Applicable common law rule

[530] The long-standing common law rule was that all of the creditors of an insolvent business must be paid before any capital could be recovered. In these reasons I have referred to the rule as a common law rule even though it is an equitable rule, which originated in the Chancery Division.

[531] Before 2009, persons holding capital in a bankrupt business had no right to file any claim in a bankruptcy. Section 140.1 allowed equity holders to make a claim but maintained the rule that such a claim was postponed to the claims of creditors.

[532] Despite this change I am of the view that the common law rule against distribution of capital until all creditors claims are paid remains in force.

[533] I reach this conclusion for two reasons. First, the 2009 amendments do not contain a complete definition of an equity creditor, stating only that an equity creditor is a person who makes a claim in respect of an equity interest. The definition of equity interest referred to above applies only to corporations. There is a similar definition of an equity interest in an income trust. There is however no statutory definition in the BIA of an equity claim that arises out of other business arrangements.

[534] In addition, a statute should be presumed to have modified the pre-existing common law only if it does so in clear language: Glenko Enterprises Ltd. v. Keller, 2007 MBCA 7 at para. 47; Jackson v. Canadian National Railway, 2013 ABCA 440 at para. 37. I therefore conclude that Parliament intended that the existing rule would remain in force in situations to which s. 140.1 is not applicable.

[535] The common law rule is described in Sukloff v. A.H. Rushforth & Co. Estate, [1964] S.C.R. 459. A person who contributes to the capital of a business carried on for their joint benefit has no right to receive any return of its capital until all of the creditors of the business have been paid in full. For this principle, Justice Ritchie quoted Halsbury's Laws of England, 3rd ed., vol. 2 (London: Butterworths, 1964) at 495:

> If a person advances money to another not by way of loan but as a contribution to the capital of a business carried on for their joint benefit, the person who has made the advance, even though he is not a partner in the business and has received no share of the profits as such, is debarred from proving in the bankruptcy of the recipient of the money in competition with the creditors of the business.

[536] The principle set out in Halsbury's and applied by Justice Ritchie is derived from the English Court of Appeal decisions of In Re Meade, [1951] Ch. 774, and In Re Beale (1876), 4 Ch. D. 246. In Re Meade involved a couple that entered into a horse-riding academy business together. The wife provided her husband with funds to buy the academy and necessary equipment with the understanding that the couple would live on the grounds they had purchased, operate the academy, and live off its proceeds. It was ruled that this contribution could not be considered a loan, but rather a contribution to the capital of a business enterprise in which she had an interest. As such, the wife was "no more entitled, as against the ordinary creditors of the business, to prove in respect of her contribution than the proprietor is entitled to prove in respect of his" [emphasis added].

[537] This principle was also applied in Laronge Realty Ltd v. Golconda Investments Ltd. (1986), 7 B.C.L.R. (2d) 90 (B.C. C.A.), and accurately summarized in the headnote as follows:

> If the advances were not loans the case would not be within s. 110 (now s. 139) but would be governed by the common law rule that if a person advances money to another as a contribution to the capital of a business carried on for their joint benefit, the person who has made the advance, even though he is not a partner in the business and has received no share of the profits as such, is debarred from proving in the bankruptcy of the recipient of the money in competition with the creditors of the business.

[538] The only businesses that can be said to have been carried on by the plaintiffs and the Bankrupts for their joint benefit are the joint ventures – not the Bankrupts themselves. I am satisfied that, as joint venturers, the plaintiffs' capital contributions at issue in this litigation were to the joint ventures (and their businesses, the Project) and not to the Bankrupts. Thus, they are not equity creditors pursuant to the common law rule described above.

[539] I reviewed the terms of the JVAs in detail earlier in these reasons. The parties to all of the written joint venture agreements in issue agreed that each joint venturer owned a proportionate share of the assets acquired for the joint venture as its separate property. That agreement meant that the interest of the Bankrupts pursuant to those agreements was limited to the Bankrupts' proportionate share as set out in each joint venture agreement. In the case of 690174 that interest is limited by the terms of the 2007 JVA.

[540] The Bankrupts acquired no further divisible interest by virtue of other joint venturers' contributions or by holding the property of the joint venture in trust. While they managed the business of completing the Project, they were not themselves the business.

[541] The position of the joint venturers in the case at bar can usefully be compared to that of partners, in spite of significant differences between partnerships and joint ventures. If a partner in a partnership becomes bankrupt, only that partner's interest in the partnership is subject to division among its creditors. The property of the partnership ceases to be held jointly and becomes held as tenants in common. In

L.W. Houlden & C.H. Morawetz, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada, 4th ed. (Toronto: Thomson Reuters Canada) G§162(10) [Houlden & Morawetz], the editors state the proposition as follows:

> If only one member of a partnership becomes bankrupt, the trustee becomes tenant in common with the solvent partner in of the assets of the firm: Ex parte Stoveld (1823), 1 Gl. & J. 303.

[542] In a partnership, the property of the partnership is owned by the partnership. Unlike a partnership, a joint venture cannot own property. The property employed in the joint venture is owned in the manner specified in the joint venture agreement. As stated in Canlan, the property is usually owned jointly by the joint venturers in accordance with their proportional interests, as in the case at bar. Similar to a partnership, it is only the interest of the bankrupt joint venturer that vests in its trustee. To the extent that the bankrupt holds legal title to assets of the joint venture in trust for nor bankrupt joint venturers, s. 67(1)(a) precludes that property from being divided among the creditors of the bankrupt joint venturer.

[543] Re Abacus Cities Ltd. (1984), 50 C.B.R. (n.s.) 289 (Alta. Q.B.), was the only authority referred to by counsel for the Trustee in support of his submission that solvent joint venturers are equity creditors of a bankrupt joint venturer. The Trustee's case book included a quotation from Houlden & Morawetz suggesting that the advances made in that case were contributions of equity. However, the case does not support that proposition.

[544] Re Abacus Cities arose out of the bankruptcy of a real estate developer that syndicated properties through the use of joint venture agreements. The applicants, who had purchased units from Abacus Cities, sought a declaration that payments they had made to Abacus were received subject to a trust in their favour. The Court held that the amounts received were not subject to a trust and that no debtor-creditor relationship existed with regard to most of their claims. However, the reason for that finding was that the Court found the amounts claimed had been advanced to Abacus for services to be rendered, which it had in fact provided. Therefore, nothing was owing in respect of those payments. This is made clear at para. 13:

> 13 In Thorne Riddell Inc. v. Rolfe (1982), 44 C.B.R. (N.S.) 219, 22 Alta L.R. (2d) 76, 19 B.L.R. 98, 44 A.R. 161 (Q.B.), the court dealt with a similar enterprise of Abacus based on a set of similar agreements. The issue in that case was whether the developer/clients were personally responsible to trade creditors for obligations made by Abacus. It was held that Abacus was best classified as an independent contractor. In reasons for judgment I stated it was not subject to control as to the details of the work to be performed. It was not engaged in a master and servant relationship. I see little difference between the position of Abacus and that of a house builder who is employed "merely to accomplish certain results and is not otherwise subject to his employer's control in the manner of performance". I follow that decision in this case. The relationship between Abacus and the developer/client is governed by the extensive agreements into which they entered.

[545] It is to be noted that in Re Abacus Cities, the Court did find that a small amount from the advances had not been earned by Abacus Cities and allowed the applicants to prove as unsecured creditors for that amount. There is no suggestion that the Court considered those claims to be equity claims. The decision therefore does not support the Trustee's submission.

The Garchas' claim

[546] The Garchas' rights are set out in the 2007 JVA, which expressly recognizes their beneficial ownership of a proportionate share of the assets of the 2007 JVA.

[547] I repeat that the Trustee wrongly assumes that the Garchas are seeking to share in the property of 690174 that is divisible among its creditors. That is not the case. As I stated earlier in these reasons, the Garchas are seeking to recover their own property by tracing it into the proceeds of sale of the subdivided lots. The property they are seeking does not and never did belong to 690174.

[548] The fact that the Garchas' interest was beneficial rather than legal does not change their ownership of it: Foskett, quoted at para. 277. I find that the property they seek to recover falls squarely within s. 67(1)(a) and is therefore not divisible among 690174's creditors. Section 140.1 therefore does not apply to it.

[549] It is also relevant to note that a trustee has no better claim to property than the bankrupt had before bankruptcy except in certain circumstances such as deemed trusts created by provincial statutes, or legislation requiring registration of security interests such as conditional sales agreements.

[550] This principle was reiterated in Lefebvre v. Tremblay (Trustee of), 2004 SCC 63. Although Lefebvre dealt with an issue arising out of the Civil Code of Quebec, S.Q. 1991, c. 64, Justice Lebel described the underlying principle as applicable to both the Civil Code and common law:

> 37 When the trustee takes control or becomes seised civil law of the universality of property defined in s. 67 B.I.A., his or her seisin is limited to the property in the debtor's patrimony. Apart from the special powers accorded by law to the trustee, as representative of the creditors, to restore the patrimony to be liquidated in its entirety, the trustee has no more rights with respect to the debtor's property than did the debtor, of whom the trustee remains the successor in this regard. This principle is well established in relation to the application of s. 67 B.I.A. It was laid down by Judson J. in Flintoft v. Royal Bank, [1964] S.C.R. 631 (S.C.C.), at p. 634. More recently, Iacobucci J. confirmed the validity of the principle in Giffen. In my view, the trustee has no greater interest in the property under his or her responsibility than that of the bankrupt, unless otherwise provided for by legislation (Giffen, at para. 50).

[551] The passage from Flintoft v. Royal Bank of Canada, [1964] S.C.R. 631 at 634, referred to in Lefebvre states as follows:

> 7 We are not concerned here with the rights of a purchaser for value without notice of the proceeds of the sale of the bank's security. It is true that s. 63 of the Bankruptcy Act avoids in favour of the trustee the assignment of book debts held by the bank because of defective registration. Subject to this, the trustee has no higher rights than the bankrupt and he takes the property of the bankrupt merely as a successor in interest and not as an innocent purchaser for value without notice. He takes the property of the bankrupt subject to the express trust created by the agreement noted above, which, in my opinion, cannot be characterized as an assignment of book debts in another form. When these debts, the proceeds of the sale of the s. 88 security, come into existence they are subject to the agreement between bank and customer. As between these two the customer has nothing to assign to the bank. The actual assignment of book debts which was signed does no more than facilitate collection. Any other assignment, whether general or specific, of these debts by the customer to a third party would fail unless the third party was an innocent purchaser for value without notice.
> [Emphasis added]

[552] The Garchas' were not participating in 690174's profits from the 2007 Joint Venture. The profits to which they were entitled arose out of their own proportionate beneficial ownership interests in the 2007 Joint Venture and not from the property of 690174.

[553] I therefore find that the Garchas' claims are not equity claims but, as explained in Foskett, are simply claims to recover their own property.

Rajpreet and Mr. Mattu's claims

[554] The claims advanced by Rajpreet and Mr. Mattu are distinguishable from the Garchas' claims because they are based on oral joint venture agreements that do not contain the express statement of beneficial ownership found in the 2007 JVA.

[555] The Trustee submits that the claims of Mr. Mattu and Rajpreet fall under s. 140.1 of the BIA because the relationship they allege is one in which they were to share profits with the Bankrupts.

[556] In my view this submission is based on the misunderstanding of the nature of an equity investment that similarly afflicts the Trustee's argument regarding the Garcha claim. If Mr. Mattu and Rajpreet had contributed capital to the Bankrupts their claims to that capital would have been postponed to other claims against the Bankrupts. However, the business to which they contributed capital was the Project, which was being pursued by the November 2010 and 2011 Joint Ventures. It is the creditors of that business, not of the Bankrupts, that must be paid in full before any of the joint venturers, including the Bankrupts, are entitled to any return of capital.

[557] The Trustee appears to have conflated the concepts addressed by ss. 139 and 140.1 of the BIA by emphasizing the concept of sharing profits and overlooking the critical question of whether Mr. Mattu and Rajpreet can be said to have contributed to the capital of the Bankrupts' business. Section 139 postpones the claims of creditors who advance money to a borrower under a contract which provides for the lender to share in the profits of a business being carried on by the bankrupt. However, the Trustee does not rely on s.139, nor could he, because the advances made by Rajpreet and Mr. Mattu were not loans.

[558] Thus, I find that Rajpreet and Mr. Mattu have not advanced equity claims to the property of the Bankrupts. Rather, their claims relate to the property of the Project over which I have granted a remedial constructive trust.

[559] Another troubling implication of the Trustee's analysis is it would mean that anyone who enters into a joint venture with a company that subsequently becomes bankrupt would have its right to the capital and profits of the joint venture postponed to the claims of all of the creditors of the bankrupt joint venturer. The Trustee has cited no authority for such a result. The critical error that the Trustee has made is the same as the one described by Justice Blair in Lester & Orpen Dennys Limited v. Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, [1991] O.J. No. 1399 (Ont. C.J.). In that case, the Trustee made precisely the same argument being made by the Trustee in this case; that is that the CBC, which had entered into a joint venture with the bankrupt should have its claim against the bankrupt postponed because the joint venture called for a sharing of profits. Justice Blair succinctly disposed of the argument as follows:

> 6 . . . . What is being claimed here is a share of the profits of a joint-venture agreement that arises through a written contract between Lester & Orpen Dennys Limited and CBC, not the share of profits of Lester & Orpen Dennys Limited itself. This fact distinguishes the circumstances from those which existed in the Meade case and the Sukloff case . . .
> [Emphasis added]

[560] The terms of the joint venture under consideration in Re Orpen Dennys were not specified in the decision. It appears that the appellant in that case was entitled to a share of the royalties from a publication rather than a proportionate share of the assets. Nevertheless, Justice Blair had no difficulty in finding that the appellant was not seeking any share of the bankrupt's profits.

[561] I therefore find that the claims of Mr. Mattu and Rajpreet are not equity claims and that 140.1 has no application to those claims.

Property of the Bankrupts subject to a constructive trust is not divisible among its creditors

[562] On the facts I have found, Mr. Mattu and Rajpreet are each entitled to a constructive trust over the proceeds of the Project on the basis of the Bankrupts' breach of fiduciary duty with respect to the funds they advanced to Jaswant and on the principles of unjust enrichment.

[563] Property which has been found to be subject to a constructive trust may be property held in trust for the purposes of s. 67(1)(a) of the BIA, depending upon when the constructive trusts came into existence.

[564] In Ellingsen (Trustee of) v. Hallmark Ford Sales Ltd., 2000 BCCA 458, Justice Donald, writing for the majority, held that in a bankruptcy the court has the discretion to impose a constructive trust effective prior to the bankruptcy:

> [38] I turn to consider the issue of timing: can the constructive trust be imposed prior to the bankruptcy? In order for the remedy to have any practical effect, it must be imposed before the bankruptcy, otherwise s. 67(1)(a) of the BIA could not operate. Support for the proposed timing can be found in Rawluk v. Rawluk, 1 [1990] S.C.R. 70 at 91:
>
> > It is important in this respect to keep in mind that a property interest arising under a constructive trust can be recognized as having come into existence not when the trust is judicially declared but from the time when the unjust enrichment first arose. As Professors Oosterhoff and Gillese state, "the date at which a constructive trust arises…is now generally accepted to be the date upon which a duty to make restitution occurs" (Oosterhoff and Gillese, A.H. Oosterhoff: Text, Commentary and Cases on Trusts (3rd ed. 1987), at p. 579). Professor Scott has stated in Law of Trusts, op. cit., at pp. 323-4, that:
> > > The beneficial interest in the property is from the beginning in the person who has been wronged. The constructive trust arises from the situation in which he is entitled to the remedy of restitution, and it arises as soon as that situation is created. … It would seem that there is no foundation whatever for the notion that a constructive trust does not arise until it is decreed by a court. It arises when the duty to make restitution arises, not when that duty is subsequently enforced.

[565] In BNSF Railway Company v. Teck Metals Ltd., 2016 BCCA 350 at para. 76, Justice Newbury also held that the court has discretion to determine whether the trust arises at the time of judgment or some earlier date, such as when the act that gave rise to the trust occurred.

[566] I note that in the passage from Rawluk referred to in both cases, Justice Cory, writing for the majority, stated that he agreed completely with the statements of the authors of the texts quoted by him that the trust arises at the time when the duty to make restitution arises and not when declared by the court.

[567] In this case, I also find that the constructive trusts arose prior to the Bankruptcies. The trust in favour of Rajpreet arose at the latest when the 2011 Joint Venture was formed without expressly providing him with an interest in it. With respect to the first $200,000 that 0892995 provided to Panorama, it arose when Panorama and Jaswant used those funds as part of the deposit for the purchase of Lot 5.

[568] Similarly, the remedial constructive trust in favour of Mr. Mattu arose when Jaswant used the funds he received from Mr. Mattu without ensuring that Mr. Mattu's proprietary interest in the Project was protected, or at the latest when the November 2010 JVA was executed without protecting Mr. Mattu's rights under his oral joint venture agreement with Jaswant.

[569] However, the Trustee submits that in a bankruptcy context, a remedial constructive trust is only available over property that would otherwise form part of the bankrupt's estate in cases where it is necessary to do so to remedy debtor misconduct. In this regard he relies on Credifinance Securities.

[570] This argument has no merit with respect to the Garchas' claim for the reasons I have already given. The remedy the Garchas have been granted is the right to trace their own property into the lots created by the Project. As set out in Foskett, the remedy they have been granted is not based on an exercise of the court's discretion to order a remedial constructive trust but on a recognition of their property rights.

[571] The remedy granted to Mr. Mattu and Rajpreet was discretionary, with the imposition of a remedial constructive trust based both upon the need to remedy wrongful conduct and unjust enrichment.

[572] However, in my view, Credifinance Securities does not assist the Trustee. In that case, the issue before the court was whether a claimant who had been defrauded by the bankrupt could assert a constructive trust over funds that had been frozen in civil proceedings commenced prior to the bankruptcy. A judge of the Ontario Superior Court of Justice ordered that the claimant was entitled to assert a trust claim over the funds.

[573] On appeal, Justice Laforme set out what the court considered to be the relevant test:

> 33 There is no question that the remedy of constructive trust is expressly recognized in bankruptcy proceedings. Both the case law and authors of texts make this clear, although the test for proving the existence of a constructive trust in a bankruptcy setting is high: L.W. Houlden & Geoffrey Morawetz, Houlden and Morawetz Bankruptcy and Insolvency Analysis (Toronto: WL Can, 2011) at F§5(1). The authors add this at F§5(8): "A constructive trust will ordinarily be imposed on property in the hands of a wrongdoer to prevent him or her from being unjustly enriched by profiting from his or her wrongful conduct" (citations omitted).
>
> 34 Ascent, a case decided by an Ontario Registrar in Bankruptcy, is a case that demonstrates the type of circumstances that can make a case extraordinary. I found this case to be very instructive.
>
> The Registrar in Ascent held that in its role as the arbiter of commercial morality, the Bankruptcy Court can rely on equitable principles, "even at the expense of the formulaic aspects of the BIA scheme of distribution": para. 17.
>
> 36 An example of commercial immorality is described in Ascent as being where a bankrupt and its creditors benefit from misconduct by the bankrupt which was the basis upon which the property was obtained. The Registrar held that to permit an estate to retain the property in such circumstances amounts to an unjust enrichment, and the court can impose a constructive trust on an estate's assets to remedy the injustice. Furthermore, "it matters not which assets are consumed to remedy this": para. 18.
> 37 Thus, a constructive trust in bankruptcy proceedings can be ordered to remedy an injustice; for example, where permitting the creditors access to the bankrupt's property would result in them being unjustly enriched. The prerequisite is that the bankrupt obtained the property through misconduct. The added necessary feature is that it would be unjust to permit the bankrupt and creditors to benefit from the misconduct.

[574] I have some difficulty in reconciling the above comments with the clear statements of the Supreme Court of Canada in Lefebvre and Flintoft that a Trustee in Bankruptcy has no better claim to property than the bankrupt, unless the BIA expressly provides otherwise.

[575] However, in any event, the remedy I have granted to Mr. Mattu and Rajpreet is based on Jaswant’s misconduct. Refusing to impose a constructive trust would result in the creditors benefitting from Jaswant’s wrongful acts. The facts before me therefore fall clearly within the circumstances described above. The funds Mr. Mattu and Rajpreet provided made a material contribution to the successful completion of the Project. Jaswant agreed that the funds they provided to him entitled them to an interest in the Project.

[576] In this case, I find that depriving Mr. Mattu and Rajpreet of their beneficial rights in the Project would result in an unjust enrichment of the general body of creditors, whose recovery in the bankruptcy comes almost entirely from the success of the Project: Redstone at para. 71.

[577] I therefore see no reason why s. 67(1)(a) of the BIA should not apply to the remedial constructive trusts imposed by this judgment. The property over which a constructive trust has been ordered is property held in trust and is therefore not divisible among the creditors of the Bankrupts.

[578] Some of the confusion that has arisen in these proceedings may have originated from the nature of the proofs of claim filed by the plaintiffs. I agree with the Trustee that those claims ought to have been filed pursuant to s. 81(1) of the BIA. However, the Trustee has acknowledged that he understood the basic nature of the claims and his counsel has indicated that the Trustee is content to have this issue decided in these proceedings.

[579] I am also satisfied that even if the plaintiffs had filed such claims pursuant to s. 81(1), the Trustee would have disputed them pursuant to that section of the BIA.

[580] In summary I find that the claims of the Garchas, Mr. Mattu, and Rajpreet are not postponed to the claims of the general body of creditors of the Bankrupts and that it is only the proportionate beneficial interests of the Bankrupts in the 2007 and 2011 Joint Ventures that form part of the assets divisible among the general body of creditors.

[581] However, in accordance with In Re Meade, all direct creditors of the Project must be paid in full before any proceeds are distributed to the joint venturers, Rajpreet, and Mr. Mattu.

[582] If I am wrong in concluding that Rajpreet and Mr. Mattu are entitled to a constructive trust or have entered into a joint venture agreement with the Bankrupts, this does not mean that they are equity creditors. Following Re Orpen Dennys, in such a case they would be entitled to rank as unsecured creditors because they did not contribute any capital to the Bankrupts. The Trustee therefore erred in law in disallowing their claims on that ground in any event.

Remedies

Garcha remedies

[583] The Garchas seek an order that they receive a proportionate share of the gross proceeds of sale of the subdivided lots. As I understand their submission there are two aspects to their claim.

[584] Firstly, they seek a proportionate share of the gross proceeds from the Project that are attributable to Lot 1. Their position is that the only permissible deduction from those gross proceeds should be their pro rata share of $1,750,000, the principal amount of the second PMIC mortgage. They calculate that share to be 7/22 of that amount, or $556,818. They submit that they should not be responsible for any share of Project development costs because they were not given the opportunity to approve those costs and because the Trustee has refused to provide an accounting of them.

[585] Secondly, on the theory that a rogue trustee should be deprived of any benefit obtained from a breach of fiduciary duty, they also seek a share of the gross proceeds from the Project arising out of the lots attributable to Lots 2 to 5 which would otherwise be payable to the other 2011 Joint Venturers, whom they allege are liable for knowing assistance or knowing receipt.

[586] In my view these claims are overreaching and exceed the remedy to which the Garchas are entitled and which would compensate them adequately.

[587] I find that the Garchas are entitled to their proportionate share of the net proceeds of the Project that are attributable to Lot 1, as determined by the 2007 JVA. Pursuant to those terms the Garchas are entitled to 7/22 of the proceeds from 22 lots subdivided from Lot 1.

[588] The Project resulted in the creation of 81 saleable lots. 690174's 28.5% interest in the 2011 Joint Venture equates to 23 of those lots. The 2007 JVA entitles 690174 to the proceeds of sale of the extra lot. The Garchas' entitlement is therefore 7/23 of 28.5% of the net proceeds of the Project.

[589] 690174 is entitled to 1/23 of that 28.5% interest, which will of course form a part of its estate. There is also evidence that 690174 acquired the interest of one of the other joint venturers. If that is the case 690174 is entitled to the proceeds attributed to that interest.

[590] An assessment of the amount to which the Garchas are entitled can only be made after adjustments to the net revenue for unpaid project expenses and a determination of responsibility for specific amounts previously paid by the Trustee, which include the amount paid to satisfy the Virk Mortgage.

[591] Counsel for the Garchas argued that this case called for a remedy that has a prophylactic purpose, as discussed in Wang v. Wang, 2020 BCCA 15 at paras. 56-59. Counsel argues that 690174 and the persons who knowingly assisted its breaches of fiduciary duty should be deprived of any benefit from those breaches to deter fiduciary faithlessness and preserve the integrity of the fiduciary relationship. He submits that Jaswant acted dishonestly and that dishonesty warrants the more draconian remedy of full disgorgement of any benefits he or those who are also responsible for his actions have obtained.

[592] I have concluded that awarding this remedy would be unfair to the other parties who have contributed to the success of the Project and would in effect unjustly enrich the Garchas. On this aspect of the case I do think that the interests of the creditors of the Bankrupts should be taken into account.

[593] A fiduciary that breaches its duty must account for what it acquired in consequence of its breach. However, in 3464920 Canada Inc. v. Strother, 2007 SCC 24, Justice Binnie cautioned against making harsh awards out of all proportion to the actual behaviour of the wrongdoer:

> 88 The Court of Appeal, despite its observation that the accounting remedy itself should not become "an instrument of injustice" (BCCA #1, at para. 52), nevertheless concluded that the "accounting period" should be open-ended:
>
> > After much anxious consideration, I have therefore concluded that Mr. Strother must be required to account for and disgorge to Monarch all benefits, profits, interests and advantages he has received or which he may hereafter be entitled to receive, directly or indirectly (i.e., through a corporation, trust, or other vehicle), from or through any of the Sentinel Hill Entities.
> >
> > (BCCA #1, at para. 61, per Newbury J.A.)
>
> An accounting of profits is an equitable remedy and, as La Forest J. noted in a different context:
>
> > ... equity is not so rigid as to be susceptible to being used as a vehicle for punishing defendants with harsh damage awards out of all proportion to their actual behaviour.
> >
> > (Hodgkinson v. Simms, at p. 444)
>
> 89 To the same effect, the High Court of Australia noted in Warman International Ltd. v. Dwyer (1995), 128 A.L.R. 201 (Australia H.C.), at pp. 211-12:
>
> > ... the stringent rule requiring a fiduciary to account for profits can be carried to extremes and ... in cases outside the realm of specific assets, the liability of the fiduciary should not be transformed into a vehicle for the unjust enrichment of the plaintiff.
>
> In Warman itself, the Court found that two years was the appropriate period for which defendants should be ordered to account. From the profits so determined, an allowance for the expenses, skill, expertise, effort and resources contributed by the defendants was to be deducted.

[594] In addition, the general rule is that the reasonable and necessary expenses incurred to earn the benefit are deductible from the amount that must be accounted for: Strother at para. 97. The method of assessment sought by the Garchas is contrary to this rule.

[595] In addition to the above claims, the Garchas seek to recover their proportionate share of what they allege was the secret profit of $300,000 obtained by 690174 in relation to the assignment fee paid to 688350. As I am satisfied that there was in fact no secret profit obtained from this payment, no relief is granted in respect of this claim.

[596] The Trustee submits that the Garchas' entitlement should be adjusted to account for their under-contribution to the carrying costs of the Lot 1 Acquisition Mortgage. The Trustee has calculated that shortfall as $174,962.49, based on the Garchas being responsible for 7/23 the carrying costs.

[597] I have some difficulties with this submission. The Garchas' entitlement is approximately 8% of the net proceeds of the Project, for which they have already contributed approximately $475,261. Given the unsatisfactory state of the accounts kept for the Project, I am not satisfied that the Garchas have not paid their share of the costs of the Lot 1 Acquisition Mortgage.

[598] The Garchas' contribution can usefully be compared to the confirmed contribution of Ranjit and Svender of less than $400,000, which resulted in them being entitled to 7.17% of the net proceeds. The Trustee has also allocated the same percentage to Wills and Dale, who contributed only $25,000 to Project costs.

[599] I therefore find that the 7/23 of 690174's share of the net proceeds of the Project are beneficially owned by the Garchas, and that they are entitled to be paid that amount from the funds held in trust.

[600] I have not addressed the entitlement of the non-party 2007 Joint Venturers in these reasons. During the trial, counsel for the Trustee indicated that some form of accommodation has been reached with some or all of those 2007 Joint Venturers. I however am not in a position to determine whether they are entitled to the same remedy as the Garchas, principally because I do not know the extent to which they gave their informed consent to 690174's actions.

[601] However, to the extent that other 2007 Joint Venturers are entitled to benefit from this judgment, I consider it just and equitable that the Garchas be entitled to indemnification for a proportionate share of their legal expenses, on a solicitor-client basis, from such recoveries. I give the Garchas leave to pursue this claim at the hearing to be held to consider costs issues generally. If the Garchas intend to pursue such an order, they must give notice to the non-party 2007 Joint Venturers.

Mattu and Rajpreet remedies

[602] While I am satisfied that Rajpreet and Mr. Mattu are entitled to the remedy of a constructive trust, the more difficult question is how to determine its amount.

[603] Mr. Mattu submits that I should find all of the members of the November 2010 JVA to be bound by Jaswant's agreement with him; that is, that he should receive a share of the proceeds based on his relative contributions to the Project. He argues that his agreement with Jaswant predates the November 2010 JVA and, in any event, that Jaswant had the actual authority to amend its terms to further the development of the Project by making an accommodation for him in it.

[604] However, there are formidable practical difficulties in determining the actual amounts contributed to the Project by the various parties. This is mainly attributable to the chaotic state of the Project accounting. It is however also attributable to the informality of the dealings between Rajpreet, Mr. Mattu, and Jaswant.

[605] Unfortunately, I found the Trustee's spreadsheets of limited utility in determining the amounts actually contributed by the parties. One of my major difficulties arises out of the methodology used by the Trustee in analyzing the flow of funds. The Trustee used the accounting principle of first in first out, known as FIFO. The legal equivalent of FIFO is the Rule in Clayton's Case. That case created a legal presumption that funds withdrawn from an account are deemed to be drawn from the first funds paid into the account.

[606] However, in cases involving a breach of fiduciary duty, the operative legal rule is the Rule in Hallett's Case arising from the decision in Re Hallett's Estate, (1880) 13 Ch. D. 696 (Eng. C.A.), which held that when a trustee mixes its own funds with those of its beneficiaries, it is deemed to use its own funds for non-trust related expenses and the trust funds for the purpose for which it received them.

[607] This principle was applied by Justice Grauer in Re 0409725 B.C. Ltd., 2015 BCSC 1221:

> 20 But trusts do not evaporate because the trust property disappears. It is here, then, that the breaches of trust come to the fore. As noted in my second Reasons, there can be no doubt that all of the monies paid by the > owners of the various projects at issue were funds that, prior to the bankruptcy, were impressed with trusts by section 10(1) of the BLA. Those trusts remained until the beneficiaries were paid. The problem is that any attempt after the bankruptcy to assess what remains in trust on a project-by-project basis is frustrated by Odenza's breaches (paying sub trade claims of one job with funds received from other jobs). On a FIFO approach, the effect would be to limit the trusts to the last few standing — last in, still there.

>
> 21 But the law is quite clear that FIFO is the wrong approach to the distribution of mingled trust funds where the trust claims exceed the amount available. The correct approach is to distribute the funds pro rata: Law Society of Upper Canada v. Toronto Dominion Bank (1998), 42 O.R. (3d) 257 (Ont. C.A.) and Ontario (Securities Commission) v. Greymac Credit Corp. (1986), 55 O.R. (2d) 673 (Ont. C.A.), upheld [1988] 2 S.C.R. 172 (S.C.C.).
>
> 22 The law also provides that where a trustee acts in breach of trust in the mingling and spending of trust and non-trust funds, he is deemed to have spent his own money first, and trust money last: Hallett's Estate, Re (1880), 13 Ch. D. 696 (Eng. C.A.).

[608] This principle is important in this case because equity presumes that Jaswant used Rajpreet's and Mr. Mattu's funds in the Project and his own funds for purposes not related to it.

[609] An additional consideration is that dividing the revenue strictly on the basis of financial contributions would make no provision for the considerable contribution that Jaswant's abilities and efforts as a developer have made to the success of the Project.

[610] I have therefore concluded that the appropriate remedy in this case is one that permits Rajpreet and Mr. Mattu to obtain a fair share of the proceeds of the Project but does not completely replace the existing legal interests set out in the 2011 JVA.

[611] A defining feature of equitable remedies is their responsiveness to the facts of a particular case. As stated in Kerr v. Baranow, 2011 SCC 10 at para. 71, "[t]he Court has often emphasized the flexibility of equitable remedies and the need to fashion remedies that respond to various situations in principled and realistic ways". Given that equitable remedies are so dependent on the facts, significant judicial discretion is permitted (indeed, required) in fashioning them. Such discretion encompasses "the full gamut of available remedies": Cadbury Schweppes Inc. v. FBI

Foods Ltd., [1999] 1 S.C.R. 142 (S.C.C.) at 179-180. Imposition of a constructive trust is recognized as one of such remedies: Soulos at 236.

[612] Any method of determining an appropriate remedy for Rajpreet and Mr. Mattu will be to a certain extent arbitrary. Given the deplorable state of the Project accounts (which have made it virtually impossible to determine the amount most parties contributed to the total Project costs), the inconsistency between the various agreements that Jaswant made, the recognition that Jaswant's efforts did bring the Project to a successful completion, and the failure of Mr. Mattu and Rajpreet to document their agreements with Jaswant, I have concluded that the fairest way to compensate them is to impose a constructive trust in their favour over a portion of the net proceeds of the Project.

[613] I originally considered awarding Rajpreet and Mr. Mattu an amount equal to their investment plus a reasonable rate of return on it. However, I have concluded that such a division would not reflect the risks that they would have known they were taking by investing in the Project. Taking all of the above factors into account, I have concluded that the most appropriate way to compensate Rajpreet and Mr. Mattu is to adjust the proportionate shares of the parties to the 2011 Joint Venture to reflect their investment.

[614] The best comparable to use to determine a fair share for Rajpreet and Mr. Mattu is the amount that Grewal Management paid to acquire its 14.25% interest in the Project. My view is that the appropriate amount to use is the initial amount that Grewal Management paid to acquire its interest in Lot 5, which was approximately $1,690,000. Rajpreet's investment was $800,000, which is 47% of that investment. I have determined Mr. Mattu's investment to be $1,062,000, which is approximately 62.3% of Grewal Management's investment. Applying these percentages to the 14.25% of the profits obtained by Grewal Management results in granting Mr. Mattu 9% and Rajpreet 6.8% of the net revenue from the Project.

[615] I find that it is appropriate to charge that amount pro rata among the members of the 2011 Joint Venture, including the 28.5% interest of 690174. The evidence in this case demonstrates that the members of the 2011 Joint Venture did not contribute sufficient funds to finance the acquisition and development costs of the Project. That deficiency was made up in large part by the funds contributed by Mr. Mattu and Rajpreet. All of the 2011 Joint Venturers have therefore benefitted from Mr. Mattu and Rajpreet's contributions.

Project Accounting Issues

[616] The final determination of the amounts to which the parties are entitled requires decisions on a number of the accounting issues. Some of these issues were raised by the Trustee in his Ninth Report to the Court and his Submission Re Adjustments and Reallocations. Some arise from the findings I have made.

[617] In Exhibit 175, the Trustee estimated total project recoveries of $15,441,090.52. After deduction of amounts disbursed by the Trustee, the balance held in trust as of February 28, 2018, was $10,118,804.25. These deductions included approximately $2,775,000 in Trustee's fees and legal expenses (the "Trustee Costs"). The amount of the Trustee Costs has increased significantly since February 2018. In Schedule 2 of Summary 1, the Trustee estimated $3,500,000 in Trustee Costs to the completion of the file.

[618] The parties are agreed that the there will be a further hearing to address the issues of costs and how the Trustee Costs should be allocated. For convenience I will refer to this hearing as the "Accounting Hearing"

[619] I also wish to emphasize that I regard the Vendor Trust Accounts as having been set up for convenience only and that they are of no assistance in determining the final entitlements of the Parties. I will however decide certain allocation issues in these reasons.

The Virk Mortgage

[620] In Exhibit 175, the Trustee allocated the full amount paid to satisfy the Virk Mortgage to 690174's Vendor Trust Account. It is obvious from my decision that 690174 holds all but a 1/23 interest in the Project in trust for the 2007 Joint Venturers and that it is therefore inappropriate to use 690174's share of the proceeds to pay the Virk Mortgage. Jaswant acknowledged at all times that the Virk

Mortgage was his responsibility. I have also found that Jaswant and Parmjit were engaged in a joint enterprise with respect to the Project. It follows from this finding that Parmjit must also bear responsibility for the Virk Mortgage. Panorama should also bear a proportionate share of the amount of this payment based on Jaswant's complete control of its affairs. The proportionate shares chargeable should be based on the relative share of the proceeds payable to these parties under the 2011 JVA. However, no portion should be charged to Ranjit and Svender's or Grewal Management's share of the proceeds.

[621] In addition, my finding that Wills and Dale hold their interest as nominees for Jaswant implies that they are responsible for their proportionate share of this cost. However, it would not be fair to charge Wills and Dale's share of the proceeds with a portion of the Virk Mortgage payout because that issue was not raised during the trial. I give the parties leave to make submissions on that issue at the Accounting Hearing.

Payout of Acquisition Mortgages

[622] During the course of the trial I expressed concern about the discrepancy between the amounts contributed to the Project by the 2011 Joint Venturers and their proportionate entitlements set out in the 2011 JVA. I need not repeat those concerns. The Trustee's explanation for the discrepancy was that the proportionate interests set out in the 2011 JVA were based on the size of the Lots contributed to the Project by the 2011 Joint Venturers. He reasoned that because the Lots were acquired by the persons contributing them at different times and in different market conditions, it made sense to determine the proportionate interest from the size of the contributed Lots rather than the amount paid for them.

[623] However, this analysis overlooks a crucial consideration. Each of the Lots contributed was encumbered by an Acquisition Mortgage which was paid out from the proceeds of the first WSCU Mortgage, which itself was ultimately paid proportionately by the 2011 Joint Venturers from lot sales.

[624] This resulted, for example, in Panorama receiving 14.25% of the Project in exchange for contributing a share of a Lot that it had purchased from the proceeds of an Acquisition Mortgage which was paid off by all of the 2011 Joint Venturers based on their proportionate shares in the 2011 Joint Venture. In contrast, Grewal Management paid cash for its share of Lot 5 and received only a partial refund of that price, almost as an afterthought, when the order to pay the WSCU Mortgage was signed. Yet, Grewal Management obtained an identical 14.25% interest in the Project.

[625] I have concluded that this result is inconsistent with the terms of the 2011 JVA, which clearly contemplated that expenses should be borne in accordance with the proportionate interests of the 2011 Joint Venturers. To address this issue, I find that the amounts paid in March 2012 to pay out the Acquisition Mortgages, as well as the cash payment to Grewal Management and the amount paid to discharge the Ludu Mortgage, should be regarded as an advance payment of Project profits to the 2011 Joint Venturers who benefitted from them. This will require an adjustment to the final amount distributable to take those benefits into account. For clarity, the amount paid to retire the Ludu Mortgage should be regarded as an advance distribution to Jaswant and Parmjit. I have also concluded that the amounts paid to pay the Virk Mortgage should be regarded as an advance distribution of profits to Jaswant, Parmjit, and Panorama.

[626] It seems to me that these adjustments may notionally increase the profits from the Project by an amount equal to the March 2012 payouts, but I will leave it to the Trustee to make this adjustment.

[627] In addition, the accounts will have to be adjusted to take into account the remedies I have granted to Rajpreet and Mr. Mattu. This means that the amount available for distribution to the signatories to the 2011 JVA will be 84.2% of the net Project proceeds. It would seem that this will result in a pro rata reduction of the share of the proceeds payable to each of the 2011 Joint Venturers. However, the parties may make submissions at the Accounting Hearing on this issue.

Other adjustments with respect to specific payments

[628] I agree with the manner in which the Trustee has allocated the payments or credits (all as set out in Schedule 2 to Summary 2 of Exhibit 175) to the B & B Contracting liability of $410,734.62; the PTT Lien of $37,110.34; the direct Project creditors of $113,981.43; the May 16, 2012, deposit to 690174's WSCU account on May 16, 2013; and the Buckley Hogan payment to the City of Surrey and Project completion costs.

[629] I do note that the direct Project creditors amount was increased to $115,583.15 in the Trustee's Submission Re Adjustments and Reallocations, delivered after the close of the evidence. The correct figure should be used for this adjustment.

[630] I do not agree that any adjustment is appropriate for carrying costs from November 15, 2010, to the date of payout of the Acquisition Mortgages. Even though the beneficial ownership of the Lots may have changed on November 15, 2010 I find that the parties who contributed the Lots remained responsible for their carrying costs on the capital that they provided to the Project. They should not be regarded as Project costs.

[631] It may be that some joint venturers made payments on Acquisition Mortgages that were not their responsibility. If that is the case an adjustment as between the venturer who paid and the venturer who was responsible may have been appropriate. However, that is an adjustment that falls outside of the Project accounting and the scope of these proceedings.

Indirect Project creditors

[632] The Trustee also suggests that what he referred to as indirect Project creditors should share directly in the distribution of Project profits. These appear to refer to amounts borrowed by the Bankrupts that were in turn used by the Bankrupts to make three categories of payments relating to the Project as set out in Summary 5 of Exhibit 175:

1. Project mortgage payments

2. Project land purchases

3. Project costs

[633] Project mortgage payments appear to be payments made on the Acquisition Mortgages, which I have already found are not Project costs. I have made the same finding with respect to Lot acquisition costs, referred to above as Project land purchases.

[634] The third category is difficult to identify because Summary 5 does not provide the dates on which the payments were made or specifics regarding what they were made for. For example, page 2 of Summary 5 shows that the Trustee allowed a claim of $322,227.50 from Manjit Bains as an unsecured creditor of Jaswant. Of this amount, $48,954.26 was allocated to Project costs. $46,000 of that amount was paid to Buckley Hogan, Jaswant's lawyers. No other details are provided.

[635] Despite this concern, I am prepared to credit the Bankrupt estates with payments made for Project costs, apart from land acquisition and carrying costs, after November 15, 2010, from funds borrowed from their creditors to the extent that such payments can be proven on a balance of probabilities. Any such payments should be credited to the Bankrupt that made them and not the entity from whom they were borrowed. The persons who provided that credit did not provide it to the Project but to the Bankrupts. If the parties cannot agree on the amounts of such payments they may make further submissions at the Accounting Hearing.

[636] I am also of the view that the amounts shown as an advance from Raveen to 690174 must be closely scrutinized because I do not recall Raveen ever having testified to making any such advance. However, if 690174 can demonstrate that it made a payment to B & B Contracting of $199,098.49 for Project costs from funds it borrowed, it is entitled to the appropriate credit for that payment, taking into account its obligation to bear a proportionate share of that expense.

Accounting Process

[637] It is difficult to conceptualize the most useful method of determining the combined issues of Project accounting and allocation of Trustee Costs.

[638] After much consideration I have concluded that the accounting should follow the following process:

1. The Trustee should prepare an initial accounting of the Project incorporating the directions and decisions I have made without deducting anything for legal costs or Trustee Costs. This accounting should show the amounts that each of the parties is entitled to from the Project based on my reasons and the terms of the 2011 JVA.

2. The Trustee will also update Exhibit 175 to include all Trustee Costs to the present, including charges that have not yet been presented for approval

3. The parties will then make submissions on how the Trustee Costs should be satisfied, including on the issue of the extent to which the interests of the non-bankrupt parties should be used to pay the Trustee Costs.

Summary of Orders

[639] In summary, I make the following orders:

1. Each 2007 Joint Venturer is the beneficial owner of its proportionate share of the assets of the 2007 Joint Venture.

2. Jaswant and 690174 breached their fiduciary duties to the 2007 Joint Venturers by:

    i. Permitting financial charges that arose from 690174’s outside dealings to be registered against Lot 1.

    ii. Registering other financial charges against Lot 1 to provide security for obligations incurred by 690174 in pursuit of its separate business interests.

iii. Purporting to transfer the beneficial ownership of Lot 1 to the members of the November 2010 and 2011 Joint Ventures.

iv. Entering into the Land Swap Agreement, which transferred a significant portion of Lot 1 to the Anglican Diocese of New Westminster in exchange for land that was utilized for the benefit of the 2011 Joint Venturers without obtaining the informed consent of the 2007 Joint Venturers.

v. Executing a mortgage over Lot 1 to secure the WSCU financing that was used to finance the Project for the exclusive benefit of the 2011 Joint Venturers.

3. Panorama, Parmjit, Ranjit, and Svender are liable to the 2007 Joint Venturers in knowing assistance and knowing receipt.

4. The Garchas' claim for punitive damages is dismissed.

5. Jaswant breached an ad hoc fiduciary duty to Rajpreet and Mr. Mattu regarding the funds they advanced towards the Project.

6. The Vendor Trust Accounts are to be consolidated into one trust account to be disbursed in accordance with these reasons and the directions made on the accounting.

7. 22/23 of the 28.5% share of the net proceeds of the Project allocated to 690174 in the 2011 JVA is held in trust for the members of the 2007 JVA and 7/22 of that share is held in trust for the Garchas.

8. Grewal Management's claim is dismissed.

9. 9% of the net proceeds of the Project are subject to a constructive trust in favour of Mr. Mattu and 6.8% are subject to a constructive trust in favour of Rajpreet. The parties may make submissions at the Accounting Hearing as to how these trusts should affect their entitlement to the remaining 84.2% of Project proceeds.

10. The amount paid to satisfy the Virk Mortgage is to be borne proportionately by the Bankrupts and Parmjit.

11. The appeals of the disallowances of the claims are allowed, and the claims of the appellants are disposed of by the orders I have made in the trials of their claims.

12. There will be a declaration that the claims of the plaintiffs are not equity claims.

13. There will be an Accounting Hearing to address the issues identified in these reasons as requiring further submissions and to determine the costs of these proceedings.

114 O.R. (3d) 304

2012 ONCA 816

Court of Appeal for Ontario, Goudge, Hoy and Pepall JJ.A.
November 23, 2012

Debtor and creditor -- Arrangements -- Shareholders of company commencing class actions against company, underwriters and auditors for misrepresentation -- Plaintiffs alleging that misrepresentations artificially inflated price of company's shares -- Company successfully seeking protection under Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act ("CCAA") -- Underwriters and auditors filing proofs of claim against company seeking contribution and indemnity for any amounts they might be ordered to pay as damages in class actions -- Supervising judge not erring in finding that those claims were equity claims within meaning of s. 2(1) of CCAA despite fact that underwriters and auditors were not holders of an equity interest -- Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36, s. 2(1).

The appellant underwriters provided underwriting services in connection with three S Co. equity offerings and four S Co. note offerings. The appellant auditors served as S Co.'s auditors at the relevant time. Shareholders of S Co. brought proposed class actions against S Co. and, among others, the underwriters and auditors, alleging that S Co. repeatedly misrepresented its assets and financial situation and its compliance with generally accepted accounting principles in its public disclosure, that the auditors and underwriters failed to detect those misrepresentations, and that the auditors misrepresented that their audit reports [page305] were prepared in accordance with generally accepted auditing standards. They claimed that the misrepresentations artificially inflated the price of S Co.'s shares and that proposed class members suffered damages when the shares fell after the truth was revealed. S Co. successfully sought protection pursuant to the provisions of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act ("CCAA"). The auditors and underwriters filed proofs of claim seeking contribution and indemnity for, among other things, any amounts that they were ordered to pay as damages to the plaintiffs in the class actions. S Co. applied for an order that the claims against it arising from the ownership, purchase or sale of an equity interest in the company, including shareholder claims, and any indemnification claim against it related to or arising from the shareholder claims, including the claims for contribution or indemnity, were equity claims under the CCAA. The application was granted. The underwriters and auditors appealed.

Held, the appeal should be dismissed.

The definition of equity claim in s. 2(1) of the CCAA focuses on the nature of the claim, and not the identity of the claimant. The appellants' claims for contribution and indemnity were clearly equity claims, despite the fact that the appellants did not have an equity interest in S Co. Parliament adopted expansive language in defining "equity claim". Parliament employed the phrase "in respect of" twice in defining equity claim: in the opening portion of the definition, it refers to an equity claim as a "claim that is in respect of an equity interest", and in para. (e) it refers to "contribution or indemnity in respect of a claim referred to in any of paragraphs (a) to (d)". The Supreme Court of Canada has repeatedly held that the words "in respect of" are of the widest possible scope, conveying some link or connection between two related subjects. It was conceded that the shareholder claims against S Co. were claims for "a monetary loss resulting from the ownership, purchase or sale of an equity interest", within the meaning of para. (d) of the definition of "equity claim". There was an obvious link between the appellants' claims against S Co. for contribution and indemnity and the shareholders' claims against S Co. Parliament also defined equity claim as "including a claim for, among others", the claims described in paras. (a) to (e). The Supreme Court has held that the phrase "including" indicates that the preceding words -- "a claim that is in respect of an equity interest" -- should be given an expansive interpretation, and include matters which might not otherwise be within the meaning of the term. Accordingly, the appellants' claims, which clearly fell within para. (e), were included within the meaning of the phrase "claim that is in respect of an equity interest". Parliament chose not to include language in s. 2(1) restricting claims for contribution or indemnity to those made by shareholders. If only a person with an equity interest could assert an equity claim, para. (e) would be rendered meaningless. No legislative provision should be interpreted so as to render it mere surplusage. Looking at s. 2(1) as a whole, it appeared that the remedies available to shareholders were all addressed by s. 2(1)(a) to (d). The logic of s. 2(1)(a) to (e) therefore also supported the notion that para. (e) referred to claims for contribution and indemnity not by shareholders, but by others. The definition of "equity claim" was sufficiently clear to alter the pre-existing common law.

BY THE COURT: --

I Overview

[1] In 2009, the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36, as amended ("CCAA"), was amended to expressly provide that general creditors are to be paid in full before an equity claim is paid.

[2] This appeal considers the definition of "equity claim" in s. 2(1) of the CCAA. More particularly, the central issue is whether claims by auditors and underwriters against the respondent debtor, Sino-Forest Corporation ("Sino-Forest"), for contribution and indemnity fall within that definition. The claims arise out of proposed shareholder class actions for misrepresentation. [page308]

[3] The appellants argue that the supervising judge erred in concluding that the claims at issue are equity claims within the meaning of the CCAA and in determining the issue before the claims procedure established in Sino-Forest's CCAA proceeding had been completed.

[4] For the reasons that follow, we conclude that the supervising judge did not err and accordingly dismiss this appeal.

II The Background

(a) The parties

[5] Sino-Forest is a Canadian public holding company that holds the shares of numerous subsidiaries, which in turn own, directly or indirectly, forestry assets located principally in the People's Republic of China. Its common shares are listed on the Toronto Stock Exchange. Sino-Forest also issued approximately $1.8 billion of unsecured notes, in four series. Trading in Sino-Forest shares ceased on August 26, 2011, as a result of a cease-trade order made by the Ontario Securities Commission.

[6] The appellant underwriters [See Note 1 below] provided underwriting services in connection with three separate Sino-Forest equity offerings in June 2007, June 2009 and December 2009, and four separate Sino-Forest note offerings in July 2008, June 2009, December 2009 and October 2010. Certain underwriters entered into agreements with Sino-Forest in which Sino-Forest agreed to indemnify the underwriters in connection with an array of matters that could arise from their participation in these offerings.

[7] The appellant BDO Limited ("BDO") is a Hong Kong-based accounting firm that served as Sino-Forest's auditor between 2005 and August 2007, and audited its annual financial statements for the years ended December 31, 2005 and December 31, 2006.

[8] The engagement agreements governing BDO's audits of Sino-Forest provided that the company's management bore the primary responsibility for preparing its financial statements in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles ("GAAP") [page309] and implementing internal controls to prevent and detect fraud and error in relation to its financial reporting.

[9] BDO's audit report for 2006 was incorporated by reference into a June 2007 prospectus issued by Sino-Forest regarding the offering of its shares to the public. This use by Sino-Forest was governed by an engagement agreement dated May 23, 2007 in which Sino-Forest agreed to indemnify BDO in respect of any claims by the underwriters or any third party that arose as a result of the further steps taken by BDO in relation to the issuance of the June 2007 prospectus.

[10] The appellant Ernst & Young LLP ("E&Y") served as Sino-Forest's auditor for the years 2007 to 2012, and delivered auditors' reports with respect to the consolidated financial statements of Sino-Forest for fiscal years ended December 31, 2007 to 2010, inclusive. In each year for which it prepared a report, E&Y entered into an audit engagement letter with Sino-Forest in which Sino-Forest undertook to prepare its financial statements in accordance with GAAP, design and implement internal controls to prevent and detect fraud and error, and provide E&Y with its complete financial records and related information. Some of these letters contained an indemnity in favour of E&Y.

[11] The respondent Ad Hoc Committee of Noteholders consists of noteholders owning approximately one-half of Sino-Forest's total noteholder debt. [See Note 2 below] They are creditors who have debt claims against Sino-Forest; they are not equity claimants.

[12] Sino-Forest has insufficient assets to satisfy all the claims against it. To the extent that the appellants' claims are accepted and are treated as debt claims rather than equity claims, the noteholders' recovery will be diminished.

(b) The class actions

[13] In 2011 and January of 2012, proposed class actions were commenced in Ontario, Quebec, Saskatchewan and New York State against, amongst others, Sino-Forest, certain of its officers, directors and employees, BDO, E&Y and the underwriters. Sino-

Forest is sued in all actions. [See Note 3 below] [page310]

[14] The proposed representative plaintiffs in the class actions are shareholders of Sino-Forest. They allege that Sino-Forest repeatedly misrepresented its assets and financial situation and its compliance with GAAP in its public disclosure; the appellant auditors and underwriters failed to detect these misrepresentations; and the appellant auditors misrepresented that their audit reports were prepared in accordance with generally accepted auditing standards ("GAAS"). The representative plaintiffs claim that these misrepresentations artificially inflated the price of Sino-Forest's shares and that proposed class members suffered damages when the shares fell after the truth was revealed in 2011.

[15] The representative plaintiffs in the Ontario class action seek approximately $9.2 billion in damages. The Quebec, Saskatchewan and New York class actions do not specify the quantum of damages sought.

[16] To date, none of the proposed class actions has been certified.

(c) CCAA protection and proofs of claim

[17] On March 30, 2012, Sino-Forest sought protection pursuant to the provisions of the CCAA. Morawetz J. granted the initial order which, among other things, appointed FTI Consulting Canada Inc. as the monitor and stayed the class actions as against Sino-Forest. Since that time, Morawetz J. has been the supervising judge of the CCAA proceedings. The initial stay of the class actions was extended and broadened by order dated May 8, 2012.

[18] On May 14, 2012, the supervising judge granted an unopposed claims procedure order which established a procedure to file and determine claims against Sino-Forest.

[19] Thereafter, all of the appellants filed individual proofs of claim against Sino-Forest seeking contribution and indemnity for, among other things, any amounts that they are ordered to pay as damages to the plaintiffs in the class actions. Their proofs of claim advance several different legal bases for Sino-Forest's alleged obligation of contribution and indemnity, including breach of contract, contractual terms of indemnity, negligent and fraudulent misrepresentation in tort, and the provisions of the Negligence Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. N.1.

(d) Order under appeal

[20] Sino-Forest then applied for an order that the following claims are equity claims under the CCAA: claims against Sino-Forest arising from the ownership, purchase or sale of an equity [page311] interest in the company, including shareholder claims ("shareholder claims"); and any indemnification claims against Sino-Forest related to or arising from the shareholder claims, including the appellants' claims for contribution or indemnity ("related indemnity claims").

[21] The motion was supported by the Ad Hoc Committee of Noteholders.

[22] On July 27, 2012, the supervising judge granted the order sought by Sino-Forest and released a comprehensive endorsement.

[23] He concluded that it was not premature to determine the equity claims issue. It had been clear from the outset of Sino-Forest's CCAA proceedings that this issue would have to be decided and that the expected proceeds arising from any sales process would be insufficient to satisfy the claims of creditors. Furthermore, the issue could be determined independently of the claims procedure and without prejudice being suffered by any party.

[24] He also concluded that both the shareholder claims and the related indemnity claims should be characterized as equity claims. In summary, he reasoned that -- the characterization of claims for indemnity turns on the characterization of the underlying primary claims. The shareholder claims are clearly equity claims and they led to and underlie the related indemnity claims;

-- the plain language of the CCAA, which focuses on the nature of the claim rather than the identity of the claimant, dictates that both shareholder claims and related indemnity claims constitute equity claims;

-- the definition of "equity claim" added to the CCAA in 2009 broadened the scope of equity claims established by pre-amendment jurisprudence;

-- this holding is consistent with the analysis in Return on Innovation Capital Ltd. v. Gandi Innovations Ltd., [2011] O.J. No. 3827, 2011 ONSC 5018, 83 C.B.R. (5th) 123 (S.C.J.), which dealt with contractual indemnification claims of officers and directors. Leave to appeal was denied by this court, [2012] O.J. No. 31, 2012 ONCA 10, 90 C.B.R. (5th) 141; and

-- "[i]t would be totally inconsistent to arrive at a conclusion that would enable either the auditors or the underwriters, through a claim for indemnification, to be treated as creditors [page312] when the underlying actions of shareholders cannot achieve the same status" (para. 82). To hold otherwise would run counter to the scheme established by the CCAA and would permit an indirect remedy to the shareholders when a direct remedy is unavailable.

[25] The supervising judge did not characterize the full amount of the claims of the auditors and underwriters as equity claims. He excluded the claims for defence costs on the basis that while it was arguable that they constituted claims for indemnity, they were not necessarily in respect of an equity claim. That determination is not appealed.

III Interpretation of "Equity Claim"

(a) Relevant statutory provisions

[26] As part of a broad reform of Canadian insolvency legislation, various amendments to the CCAA were proclaimed in force as of September 18, 2009.

[27] They included the addition of s. 6(8):

> 6(8) No compromise or arrangement that provides for the payment of an equity claim is to be sanctioned by the court unless it provides that all claims that are not equity claims are to be paid in full before the equity claim is to be paid.

Section 22.1, which provides that creditors with equity claims may not vote at any meeting unless the court orders otherwise, was also added.

[28] Related definitions of "claim", "equity claim" and "equity interest" were added to s. 2(1) of the CCAA:

> 2(1) In this Act,
>
> . . . . .
>
> "claim" means any indebtedness, liability or obligation of any kind that would be a claim provable within the meaning of section 2 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act;
>
> . . . . .
>
> "equity claim" means a claim that is in respect of an equity interest, including a claim for, among others,
>
> (a) a dividend or similar payment,
>
> (b) a return of capital,
>
> (c) a redemption or retraction obligation, [page313]
>
> (d) a monetary loss resulting from the ownership, purchase or sale of an equity interest or from the rescission, or, in Quebec, the annulment, of a purchase or sale of an equity interest, or
>
> (e) contribution or indemnity in respect of a claim referred to in any of paragraphs (a) to (d);
>
> "equity interest" means
>
> (a) in the case of a company other than an income trust, a share in the company -- or a warrant or option or another right to acquire a share in the company -- other than one that is derived from a convertible debt, and
>
> (b) in the case of an income trust, a unit in the income trust -- or a warrant or option or another right to acquire a unit in the income trust -- other than one that is derived from a convertible debt[.]

(Emphasis added)

[29] Section 2 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C.

1985, c. B-3 ("BIA") defines a "claim provable in bankruptcy". Section 121 of the BIA in turn specifies that claims provable in bankruptcy are those to which the bankrupt is subject.

> 2. "claim provable in bankruptcy", "provable claim" or "claim provable" includes any claim or liability provable in proceedings under this Act by a creditor;
>
> . . . . .
>
> 121(1) All debts and liabilities, present or future, to which the bankrupt is subject on the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt or to which the bankrupt may become subject before the bankrupt's discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt shall be deemed to be claims provable in proceedings under this Act.

(Emphasis added)

(b) The legal framework before the 2009 amendments

[30] Even before the 2009 amendments to the CCAA codified the treatment of equity claims, the courts subordinated shareholder equity claims to general creditors' claims in an insolvency. As the supervising judge described [at paras. 23-25]:

> Essentially, shareholders cannot reasonably expect to maintain a financial interest in an insolvent company where creditor claims are not being paid in full. Simply put, shareholders have no economic interest in an insolvent enterprise.
>
> The basis for the differentiation flows from the fundamentally different nature of debt and equity investments. Shareholders have unlimited upside potential when purchasing shares. Creditors have no corresponding upside potential. [page314]
>
> As a result, courts subordinated equity claims and denied such claims a vote in plans of arrangement.

(Citations omitted) [See Note 4 below]

(c) The appellants' submissions

[31] The appellants essentially advance three arguments.

[32] First, they argue that on a plain reading of s. 2(1), their claims are excluded. They focus on the opening words of the definition of "equity claim" and argue that their claims against Sino-Forest are not claims that are "in respect of an equity interest" because they do not have an equity interest in Sino-Forest. Their relationships with Sino-Forest were purely contractual and they were arm's-length creditors, not shareholders with the risks and rewards attendant to that position. The policy rationale behind ranking shareholders below creditors is not furthered by characterizing the appellants' claims as equity claims. They were service providers with a contractual right to an indemnity from Sino-Forest.

[33] Second, the appellants focus on the term "claim" in para. (e) of the definition of "equity claim", and argue that the claims in respect of which they seek contribution and indemnity are the shareholders' claims against them in court proceedings for damages, which are not "claims" against Sino-Forest provable within the meaning of the BIA and, therefore, not "claims" within s. 2(1). They submit that the supervising judge erred in focusing on the characterization of the underlying primary claims.

[34] Third, the appellants submit that the definition of "equity claim" is not sufficiently clear to have changed the existing law. It is assumed that the legislature does not intend to change the common law without "expressing its intentions to do so with irresistible clearness": Parry Sound (District) Social Services Administration Board v. Ontario Public Service Employees Union, Local 324, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 157, [2003] S.C.J. No. 42, 2003 SCC 42, at para. 39, citing Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. of Canada v. T. Eaton Co., [1956] S.C.R. 610, [1956] S.C.J. No. 37, at p. 614 S.C.R. The appellants argue that the supervising judge's interpretation of "equity claim" dramatically alters the common [page315] law as reflected in National Bank of Canada v. Merit Energy Ltd., [2001] A.J. No. 918, 2001 ABQB 583, 294 A.R. 15, affd [2002] A.J. No. 6, 2002 ABCA 5, 317 A.R. 319. There, the court determined that in an insolvency, claims of auditors and underwriters for indemnification are not to be treated in the same manner as claims by shareholders. Furthermore, the Senate debates that preceded the enactment of the amendments did not specifically comment on the effect of the amendments on claims by auditors and underwriters. The amendments should be interpreted as codifying the pre-existing common law as reflected in National Bank of Canada v. Merit Energy Ltd.

[35] The appellants argue that the decision of Return on Innovation Capital Ltd. v. Gandi Innovations Ltd. is distinguishable because it dealt with the characterization of claims for damages by an equity investor against officers and directors, and it predated the 2009 amendments. In any event, this court confirmed that its decision denying leave to appeal should not be read as a judicial precedent for the interpretation of the meaning of "equity claim" in s. 2(1) of the CCAA.

(d) Analysis

(i) Introduction

[36] The exercise before this court is one of statutory interpretation. We are therefore guided by the following oft-cited principle from Elmer A. Driedger, Construction of Statutes, 2nd ed. (Toronto: Butterworths, 1983), at p. 87:

> [T]he words of an Act are to be read in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament.

[37] We agree with the supervising judge that the definition of equity claim focuses on the nature of the claim, and not the identity of the claimant. In our view, the appellants' claims for contribution and indemnity are clearly equity claims.

[38] The appellants' arguments do not give effect to the expansive language adopted by Parliament in defining "equity claim" and read in language not incorporated by Parliament. Their interpretation would render para. (e) of the definition meaningless and defies the logic of the section.

(ii) The expansive language used

[39] The definition incorporates two expansive terms.

[40] First, Parliament employed the phrase "in respect of" twice in defining equity claim: in the opening portion of the definition, it refers to an equity claim as a "claim that is in respect of [page316] an equity interest", and in para. (e) it refers to "contribution or indemnity in respect of a claim referred to in any of paragraphs (a) to (d)" (emphasis added).

[41] The Supreme Court of Canada has repeatedly held that the words "in respect of" are "of the widest possible scope", conveying some link or connection between two related subjects. In CanadianOxy Chemicals Ltd. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 743, [1998] S.C.J. No. 87, at para. 16, citing R. v. Nowegijick, [1983] 1 S.C.R. 29, [1983] S.C.J. No. 5, at p. 39 S.C.R., the Supreme Court held as follows:

> The words "in respect of" are, in my opinion, words of the widest possible scope. They import such meanings as "in relation to", "with reference to" or "in connection with". The phrase "in respect of" is probably the widest of any expression intended to convey some connection between two related subject matters.

(Emphasis added in CanadianOxy)

That court also stated as follows in Markevich v. Canada, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 94, [2003] S.C.J. No. 8, 2003 SCC 9, at para. 26:

> The words "in respect of" have been held by this Court to be words of the broadest scope that convey some link between two subject matters.

(Citations omitted)

[42] It is conceded that the shareholder claims against Sino-Forest are claims for "a monetary loss resulting from the ownership, purchase or sale of an equity interest", within the meaning of para. (d) of the definition of "equity claim". There is an obvious link between the appellants' claims against Sino-Forest for contribution and indemnity and the shareholders' claims against Sino-Forest. The legal proceedings brought by the shareholders asserted their claims against Sino-Forest together with their claims against the appellants, which gave rise to these claims for contribution and indemnity. The causes of action asserted depend largely on common facts and seek recovery of the same loss.

[43] The appellants' claims for contribution or indemnity against Sino-Forest are therefore clearly connected to or "in respect of" a claim referred to in para. (d), namely, the shareholders' claims against Sino-Forest. They are claims in respect of equity claims by shareholders and are provable in bankruptcy against Sino-Forest.

[44] Second, Parliament also defined equity claim as "including a claim for, among others", the claims described in paras. (a) to (e). The Supreme Court has held that this phrase "including" indicates that the preceding words -- "a claim that is in respect of an equity interest" -- should be given an expansive [page317] interpretation, and include matters which might not otherwise be within the meaning of the term, as stated in National Bank of Greece (Canada) v. Katsikonouris, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1029, [1990] S.C.J. No. 95, at p. 1041 S.C.R.:

> [T]hese words are terms of extension, designed to enlarge the meaning of preceding words, and not to limit them.
> [T]he natural inference is that the drafter will provide a specific illustration of a subset of a given category of things in order to make it clear that that category extends to things that might otherwise be expected to fall outside it.

[45] Accordingly, the appellants' claims, which clearly fall within para. (e), are included within the meaning of the phrase a "claim that is in respect of an equity interest".

(iii) What Parliament did not say

[46] "Equity claim" is not confined by its definition, or by the definition of "claim", to a claim advanced by the holder of an equity interest. Parliament could have, but did not, include language in para. (e) restricting claims for contribution or indemnity to those made by shareholders.

(iv) An interpretation that avoids surplusage

[47] A claim for contribution arises when the claimant for contribution has been sued. Section 2 of the Negligence Act provides that a tortfeasor may recover contribution or indemnity from any other tortfeasor who is, or would if sued have been, liable in respect of the damage to any person suffering damage as a result of a tort. The securities legislation of the various provinces provides that an issuer, its underwriters and, if they consented to the disclosure of information in the prospectus, its auditors, among others, are jointly and severally liable for a misrepresentation in the prospectus, and provides for rights of contribution. [See Note 5 below] [page318]

[48] Counsel for the appellants were unable to provide a satisfactory example of when a holder of an equity interest in a debtor company would seek contribution under para. (e) against the debtor in respect of a claim referred to in any of paras. (a) to (d). In our view, this indicates that para. (e) was drafted with claims for contribution or indemnity by non-shareholders rather than shareholders in mind.

[49] If the appellants' interpretation prevailed, and only a person with an equity interest could assert such a claim, para. (e) would be rendered meaningless, and as Lamer C.J.C. wrote in R. v. Proulx, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 61, [2000] S.C.J. No. 6, 2000 SCC 5, at para. 28:

> It is a well accepted principle of statutory interpretation that no legislative provision should be interpreted so as to render it mere surplusage.

(v) The scheme and logic of the section

[50] Moreover, looking at s. 2(1) as a whole, it would appear that the remedies available to shareholders are all addressed by s. 2(1)(a) to (d). The logic of s. 2(1)(a) to (e) therefore also supports the notion that para. (e) refers to claims for contribution or indemnity not by shareholders, but by others.

(vi) The legislative history of the 2009 amendments

[51] The appellants and the respondents each argue that the legislative history of the amendments supports their respective interpretation of the term "equity claim". We have carefully considered the legislative history. The limited commentary is brief and imprecise. The clause-by-clause analysis of Bill C-12 comments that "[a]n equity claim is defined to include any claim that is related to an equity interest". [See Note 6 below] While, as the appellants submit, there was no specific reference to the position of auditors and underwriters, the desirability of greater conformity with United States insolvency law to avoid forum shopping by debtors was highlighted in 2003, some four years before the definition of "equity claim" was included in Bill C-12.

[52] In this instance, the legislative history ultimately provided very little insight into the intended meaning of the amendments. We have been guided by the plain words used by Parliament in reaching our conclusion. [page319]

(vii) Intent to change the common law

[53] In our view, the definition of "equity claim" is sufficiently clear to alter the pre-existing common law. National Bank of Canada v. Merit Energy Ltd., an Alberta decision, was the single case referred to by the appellants that addressed the treatment of auditors' and underwriters' claims for contribution and indemnity in an insolvency before the definition was enacted. As the supervising judge noted, in a more recent decision, Return on Innovation Capital Ltd. v. Gandi Innovations Ltd., the courts of this province adopted a more expansive approach, holding that contractual indemnification claims of directors and officers were equity claims.

[54] We are not persuaded that the practical effect of the change to the law implemented by the enactment of the definition of "equity claim" is as dramatic as the appellants suggest. The operations of many auditors and underwriters extend to the United States, where contingent claims for reimbursement or contribution by entities "liable with the debtor" are disallowed pursuant to 502(e)(1)(B) of the U.S. Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C.S. [See Note 7 below]

(viii) The purpose of the legislation

[55] The supervising judge indicated that if the claims of auditors and underwriters for contribution and indemnity were not included within the meaning of "equity claim", the CCAA would permit an indirect remedy to the shareholders when a direct remedy is not available. We would express this concept differently.

[56] In our view, in enacting s. 6(8) of the CCAA, Parliament intended that a monetary loss suffered by a shareholder (or other holder of an equity interest) in respect of his or her equity interest not diminish the assets of the debtor available to general creditors in a restructuring. If a shareholder sues auditors and underwriters in respect of his or her loss, in addition to the debtor, and the auditors or underwriters assert claims of contribution or indemnity against the debtor, the assets of the debtor available to general creditors would be diminished by the amount of the claims for contribution and indemnity. [page320]

IV Prematurity

[57] We are not persuaded that the supervising judge erred by determining that the appellants' claims were equity claims before the claims procedure established in Sino-Forest's CCAA proceeding had been completed.

[58] The supervising judge noted, at para. 7 of his endorsement, that from the outset, Sino-Forest, supported by the monitor, had taken the position that it was important that these proceedings be completed as soon as possible. The need to address the characterization of the appellants' claims had also been clear from the outset. The appellants have not identified any prejudice that arises from the determination of the issue at this stage. There was no additional information that the appellants have identified that was not before the supervising judge. The monitor, a court-appointed officer, supported the motion procedure. The supervising judge was well positioned to determine whether the procedure proposed was premature and, in our view, there is no basis on which to interfere with the exercise of his discretion.

V Summary

[59] In conclusion, we agree with the supervising judge that the appellants' claims for contribution or indemnity are equity claims within s. 2(1)(e) of the CCAA.

[60] We reach this conclusion because of what we have said about the expansive language used by Parliament, the language Parliament did not use, the avoidance of surplusage, the logic of the section and what, from the foregoing, we conclude is the purpose of the 2009 amendments as they relate to these proceedings.

[61] We see no basis to interfere with the supervising judge's decision to consider whether the appellants' claims were equity claims before the completion of the claims procedure.

VI Disposition

[62] This appeal is accordingly dismissed. As agreed, there will be no costs.

Appeal dismissed.

REASONS FOR DECISION

PEPALL J.

[1] This motion addresses the legal characterization of claims of holders of preferred shares in the capital stock of the applicant, Nelson Financial Group Ltd. ("Nelson"). The issue before me is to determine whether such claims constitute equity claims for the purposes of sections 6(8) and 22.1 of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act ("CCAA").

Background Facts

[2] Nelson was incorporated pursuant to the Business Corporations Act of Ontario in September, 1990. Nelson raised money from investors and then used those funds to extend credit to customers in vendor assisted financing programmes. It raised money in two ways. It issued promissory notes bearing a rate of return of 12% per annum and also issued preference shares typically with an annual dividend of 10%.[1] The funds were then lent out at significantly higher rates of interest.

[3] The Monitor reported that Nelson placed ads in selected publications. The ads outlined the nature of the various investment options. Term sheets for the promissory notes or the preferred shares were then provided to the investors by Nelson together with an outline of the proposed tax treatment for the investment. No funds have been raised from investors since January 29, 2010.

(a) Noteholders

[4] As of the date of the CCAA filing on March 23, 2010, Nelson had issued 685 promissory notes in the aggregate principal amount of $36,583,422.89. The notes are held by approximately 321 people.

[1] The Monitor is aware of six preferred shareholders with dividends that ranged from 10.5% to 13.75% per annum.

(b) Preferred Shareholders

[5] Nelson was authorized to issue two classes of common shares and 2,800,000 Series A preferred shares and 2,000,000 Series B preferred shares, each with a stated capital of $25.00. The president and sole director of Nelson, Marc Boutet, is the owner of all of the issued and outstanding common shares. By July 31, 2007, Nelson had issued to investors 176,675 Series A preferred shares for an aggregate consideration of $4,416,925. During the subsequent fiscal year ended July 31, 2008, Nelson issued a further 172,545 Series A preferred shares and 27,080 Series B preferred shares. These shares were issued for an aggregate consideration of $4,672,383 net of share issue costs.

[6] The preferred shares are non-voting and take priority over the common shares. The company's articles of amendment provide that the preferred shareholders are entitled to receive fixed preferential cumulative cash dividends at the rate of 10% per annum. Nelson had the unilateral right to redeem the shares on payment of the purchase price plus accrued dividends. At least one investor negotiated a right of redemption. Two redemption requests were outstanding as of the CCAA filing date.

[7] As of the CCAA filing date of March 23, 2010, Nelson had issued and outstanding 585,916.6 Series A and Series B preferred shares with an aggregate stated capital of $14,647,914. The preferred shares are held by approximately 82 people. As of the date of filing of these CCAA proceedings, there were approximately $53,632 of declared but unpaid dividends outstanding with respect to the preferred shares and $73,652.51 of accumulated dividends.

[8] Investors subscribing for preferred shares entered into subscription agreements described as term sheets. These were executed by the investor and by Nelson. Nelson issued share certificates to the investors and maintained a share register recording the name of each preferred shareholder and the number of shares held by each shareholder.

[9] As reported by the Monitor, notwithstanding that Nelson issued two different series of preferred shares, the principal terms of the term sheets signed by the investors were almost identical and generally provided as follows:

- the issuer was Nelson;
- the par value was fixed at $25.00;
- the purpose was to finance Nelson's business operations;
- the dividend was 10% per annum, payable monthly, commencing one month after the investment was made;
- preferred shareholders were eligible for a dividend tax credit;
- Nelson issued annual T-3 slips on account of dividend income to the preferred shareholders;
- the preferred shares were non-voting (except where voting as a class was required), redeemable at the option of Nelson and ranked ahead of common shares; and
- dividends were cumulative and no dividends were to be paid on common shares if preferred share dividends were in arrears.

[10] In addition, the Series B term sheet provided that the monthly dividend could be reinvested pursuant to a Dividend Reinvestment Plan ("DRIP").

[11] The preferred shareholders were entered on the share register and received share certificates. They were treated as equity in the company's financial statements. Dividends were received by the preferred shareholders and they took the benefit of the advantageous tax treatment.

(c) Insolvency

[12] Mr. Boutet knew that Nelson was insolvent since at least its financial year ended July 31, 2007. Nelson did not provide financial statements to any of the preferred shareholders prior to, or subsequent to, the making of the investment.

(d) Ontario Securities Commission

[13] On May 12, 2010, the Ontario Securities Commission ("OSC") issued a Notice of Hearing and Statement of Allegations alleging that Nelson and its affiliate, Nelson Investment Group Ltd., and various officers and directors of those corporations committed breaches of the Ontario Securities Act in the course of selling preferred shares. The allegations include non-compliance with the prospectus requirements, the sale of shares in reliance upon exemptions that were inapplicable, the sale of shares to persons who were not accredited investors, and fraudulent and negligent misrepresentations made in the course of the sale of shares. The OSC hearing has been scheduled for the end of February, 2011.

(e) Legal Opinion

[14] Based on the Monitor's review, the preferred shareholders were documented as equity on Nelson's books and records and financial statements. Pursuant to court order, the Monitor retained Stikeman Elliott LLP as independent counsel to provide an opinion on the characterization of the claims and potential claims of the preferred shareholders. The opinion concluded that the claims were equity claims. The Monitor posted the opinion on its website and also advised the preferred shareholders of the opinion and conclusions by letter. The opinion was not to constitute evidence, issue estoppel or res judicata with respect to any matters of fact or law referred to therein. The opinion, at least in part, informed Nelson's position which was supported by the Monitor, that independent counsel for the preferred shareholders was unwarranted in the circumstances.

(f) Development of Plan

[15] The Monitor reported in its Eighth Report that a plan is in the process of being developed and that preferred shareholders would have their existing preference shares cancelled and would then be able to claim a tax loss on their investment or be given a new form of preference shares with rights to be determined.

Motion

[16] The holders of promissory notes are represented by Representative Counsel appointed pursuant to my order of June 15, 2010. Representative Counsel wishes to have some clarity as to the characterization of the preferred shareholders' claims. Accordingly, Representative Counsel has brought a motion for an order that all claims and potential claims of the preferred shareholders against Nelson be classified as equity claims within the meaning of the CCAA. In addition, Representative Counsel requests that the unsecured creditors, which include the noteholders, be entitled to be paid in full before any claim of a preferred shareholder and that the preferred shareholders form a separate class that is not entitled to vote at any meeting of creditors. Nelson and the Monitor support the position of Representative Counsel. The OSC is unopposed.

[17] On the return of the motion, some preferred shareholders were represented by counsel from Templeman Menninga LLP and some were self-represented. It was agreed that the letters and affidavits of preferred shareholders that were filed with the court would constitute their evidence. Oral submissions were made by legal counsel and by approximately eight individuals. They had many complaints. Their allegations against Nelson and Mr. Boutet range from theft, fraud, misrepresentation including promises that their funds would be secured, operation of a Ponzi scheme, breach of trust, dividend payments to some that exceeded the rate set forth in Nelson's articles, conversion of notes into preferred shares at a time when Nelson was insolvent, non-disclosure, absence of a prospectus or offering memorandum disclosure, oppression, violation of section 23(3) of the OBCA and of the Securities Act such that the issuance of the preferred shares was a nullity, and breach of fiduciary duties.

[18] The stories described by the investors are most unfortunate. Many are seniors and pensioners who have invested their savings with Nelson. Some investors had notes that were rolled over and replaced with preference shares. Mr. McVey alleges that he made an original promissory note investment which was then converted arbitrarily and without his knowledge into preference shares. He alleges that the documents effecting the conversion did not contain his authentic signature.

[19] Mr. Styles states that he and his company invested approximately $4.5 million in Nelson. He states that Mr. Boutet persuaded him to convert his promissory notes into preference shares by promising a 13.75% dividend rate, assuring him that the obligation of Nelson to repay would be treated the same or better than the promissory notes, and that they would have the same or a priority position to the promissory notes. He then received dividends at the 13.75% rate contrary to the 10% rate found in the company's articles. In addition, at the time of the conversion, Nelson was insolvent.

[20] In brief, Mr. Styles submits that:

(a) the investment transactions were void because there was no prospectus contrary to the provisions of the Securities Act and the Styles were not accredited investors; the preferred shares were issued contrary to section 23(3) of the OBCA in that Nelson was insolvent at the relevant time and as such, the issuance was a nullity; and the conduct of the company and its principal was oppressive contrary to section 248 of the OBCA; and that

(b) the Styles' claim is in respect of an undisputed agreement relating to the conversion of their promissory notes into preferred shares which agreement is enforceable separate and apart from any claim relating to the preferred shares.

The Issue

[21] Are any of the claims advanced by the preferred shareholders equity claims within section 2 of the CCAA such that they are to be placed in a separate class and are subordinated to the full recovery of all other creditors?

The Law

[22] The relevant provisions of the CCAA are as follows.

Section 2 of the CCAA states:

> In this Act,
>
> "Claim" means any indebtedness, liability or obligation of any kind that would be a claim provable within the meaning of section 2 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act;
>
> "Equity Claim" means a claim that is in respect of an equity interest, including a claim for, among others,
>
> (a) a dividend or similar payment,
>
> (b) a return of capital,
>
> (c) a redemption or retraction obligation,
>
> (d) a monetary loss resulting from the ownership, purchase or sale of an equity interest or from the rescission, or, in Quebec, the annulment, of a purchase or sale of an equity interest, or
>
> (e) contribution or indemnity in respect of a claim referred to in any of paragraphs (a) to (d);"
>
> "Equity Interest" means
>
> (a) in the case of a corporation other than an income trust, a share in the corporation — or a warrant or option or another right to acquire a share in the corporation — other than one that is derived from a convertible debt, and
>
> (b) in the case of an income trust, a unit in the income trust — or a warrant or option or another right to acquire a unit in the income trust — other than one that is derived from a convertible debt;

Section 6(8) states:

> No compromise or arrangement that provides for the payment of an equity claim is to be sanctioned by the court unless it provides that all claims that are not equity claims are to be paid in full before the equity claim is to be paid.

Section 22.1 states:

> Despite subsection 22(1) creditors having equity claims are to be in the same class of creditors in relation to those claims unless the court orders otherwise and may not, as members of that class, vote at any meeting unless the court orders otherwise.

[23] Section 2 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act ("BIA") which is referenced in section 2 of the CCAA provides that a claim provable includes any claim or liability provable in proceedings under the Act by a creditor. Creditor is then defined as a person having a claim provable as a claim under the Act.

[24] Section 121(1) of the BIA describes claims provable. It states:

> All debts and liabilities, present or future, to which the bankrupt is subject on the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt or to which the bankrupt may become subject before the bankrupt's discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt shall be deemed to be claims provable in proceedings under this Act.

[25] Historically, the claims and rights of shareholders were not treated as provable claims and ranked after creditors of an insolvent corporation in a liquidation. As noted by Laskin J.A. in Re Central Capital Corporation[2], on the insolvency of a company, the claims of creditors have always ranked ahead of the claims of shareholders for the return of their capital. This principle is premised on the notion that shareholders are understood to be higher risk participants who have chosen to tie their investment to the fortunes of the corporation. In contrast, creditors choose a lower level of exposure, the assumption being that they will rank ahead of shareholders in an insolvency. Put differently, amongst other things, equity investors bear the risk relating to the integrity and character of management.

[26] This treatment also has been held to encompass fraudulent misrepresentation claims advanced by a shareholder seeking to recover his investment: Re Blue Range Resource Corp.[3] In that case, Romaine J. held that the alleged loss derived from and was inextricably intertwined with the shareholder interest. Similarly, in the United States, the Second Circuit Court of Appeal in Re Stirling Homex Corp.[4] concluded that shareholders, including those who had allegedly been defrauded, were subordinate to the general creditors when the company was insolvent. The Court stated that "the real party against which [the shareholders] are seeking relief is the body of general creditors of their corporation. Whatever relief may be granted to them in this case will reduce the percentage which the general creditors will ultimately realize upon their claims." National Bank of Canada v. Merit Energy Ltd.[5] and Earthfirst Canada Inc.[6] both treated claims relating to agreements that were collateral to equity claims as equity claims. These cases dealt with separate indemnification agreements and the issuance of flow through shares. The separate agreements and the ensuing claims were treated as part of one integrated transaction in respect of an equity interest. The case law has also recognized the complications and delay that would ensue if CCAA proceedings were mired in shareholder claims.

[27] The amendments to the CCAA came into force on September 18, 2009. It is clear that the amendments incorporated the historical treatment of equity claims. The language of section 2 is clear and broad. Equity claim means a claim in respect of an equity interest and includes, amongst other things, a claim for rescission of a purchase or sale of an equity interest. Pursuant to sections 6(8) and 22.1, equity claims are rendered subordinate to those of creditors.

[28] The Nelson filing took place after the amendments and therefore the new provisions apply to this case. Therefore, if the claims of the preferred shareholders are properly characterized as equity claims, the relief requested by Representative Counsel in his notice of motion should be granted.

[29] Guidance on the appropriate approach to the issue of characterization was provided by the Ontario Court of Appeal in Re Central Capital Corporation[7]. Central Capital was insolvent and sought protection pursuant to the provisions of the CCAA. The appellants held preferred shares of Central Capital. The shares each contained a right of retraction, that is, a right to require Central Capital to redeem the shares on a fixed date and for a fixed price. One shareholder exercised his right of retraction and the other shareholder did not but both filed proofs of claim in the CCAA proceedings. In considering whether the two shareholders had provable debt claims, Laskin J.A. considered the substance of the relationship between the company and the shareholders. If the governing instrument contained features of both debt and equity, that is, it was hybrid in character, the court must determine the substance of the relationship between the company and the holder of the certificate. The Court examined the parties' intentions.

[30] In Central Capital, Laskin J.A. looked to the share purchase agreements, the conditions attaching to the shares, the articles of incorporation and the treatment given to the shares in the company's financial statements to ascertain the parties' intentions and determined that the claims were equity and not debt claims.

[31] In this case, there are characteristics that are suggestive of a debt claim and of an equity claim. That said, in my view, the preferred shareholders are, as their description implies, shareholders of Nelson and not creditors. In this regard, I note the following.

(a) Investors were given the option of investing in promissory notes or preference shares and opted to invest in shares. Had they taken promissory notes, they obviously would have been creditors. The preference shares carried many attractions including income tax advantages.

(b) The investors had the right to receive dividends, a well recognized right of a shareholder.

(c) The preference share conditions provided that on a liquidation, dissolution or winding up, the preferred shareholders ranked ahead of common shareholders. As in Central Capital, it is implicit that they therefore would rank behind creditors.

(d) Although I acknowledge that the preferred shareholders did not receive copies of the financial statements, nonetheless, the shares were treated as equity in Nelson's financial statements and in its books and records.

[32] The substance of the arrangement between the preferred shareholders and Nelson was a relationship based on equity and not debt. Having said that, as I observed in I. Waxman & Sons.[8], there is support in the case law for the proposition that equity may become debt. For instance, in that case, I held that a judgment obtained at the suit of a shareholder constituted debt. An analysis of the nature of the claims is therefore required. If the claims fall within the parameters of section 2 of the CCAA, clearly they are to be treated as equity claims and not as debt claims.

[33] In this case, in essence the claims of the preferred shareholders are for one or a combination of the following:

(a) declared but unpaid dividends;

(b) unperformed requests for redemption;

(c) compensatory damages for the loss resulting in the purchased preferred shares now being worthless and claimed to have been caused by the negligent or fraudulent misrepresentation of Nelson or of persons for whom Nelson is legally responsible; and

[8] (2008), 2008 CarswellOnt 1245.

(d) payment of the amounts due upon the rescission or annulment of the purchase or subscription for preferred shares.

[34] In my view, all of these claims fall within the ambit of section 2, are governed by sections 6(8) and 22.1 of the CCAA, and therefore do not constitute a claim provable for the purposes of the statute. The language of section 2 is clear and unambiguous and equity claims include "a claim that is in respect of an equity interest" and a claim for a dividend or similar payment and a claim for rescission. This encompasses the claims of all of the preferred shareholders including the Styles whose claim largely amounts to a request for rescission or is in respect of an equity interest. The case of National Bank of Canada v. Merit Energy Ltd.[9] is applicable in regard to the latter. In substance, the Styles' claim is for an equity obligation. At a minimum, it is a claim in respect of an equity interest as described in section 2 of the CCAA. Parliament's intention is clear and the types of claims advanced in this case by the preferred shareholders are captured by the language of the amended statute. While some, and most notably Professor Janis Sarra[10], advocated a statutory amendment that provided for some judicial flexibility in cases involving damages arising from egregious conduct on the part of a debtor corporation and its officers, Parliament opted not to include such a provision. Sections 6(8) and [10] "From Subordination to Parity: An International Comparison of Equity Securities Law Claims in Insolvency Proceedings" (2007) 16 Int. Insolv. Re., 181.

22.1 allow for little if any flexibility. That said, they do provide for greater certainty in the appropriate treatment to be accorded equity claims.

[35] There are two possible exceptions. Mr. McVey claims that his promissory note should never have been converted into preference shares, the conversion was unauthorized and that the signatures on the term sheets are not his own. If Mr. McVey's evidence is accepted, his claim would be qua creditor and not preferred shareholder. Secondly, it is possible that monthly dividends that may have been lent to Nelson by Larry Debono constitute debt claims. The factual record on these two possible exceptions is incomplete. The Monitor is to investigate both scenarios, consider a resolution of same, and report back to the court on notice to any affected parties.

[36] Additionally, the claims procedure will have to be amended. The Monitor should consider an appropriate approach and make a recommendation to the court to accommodate the needs of the stakeholders. The relief requested in the notice of motion is therefore granted subject to the two aforesaid possible exceptions.

ENDORSEMENT

[1] In this proceeding, United States Steel Corporation ("USS") seeks a determination of 14 Proofs of Claim (the "USS Claims") filed in these proceedings under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 (the "CCAA") regarding U.S. Steel Canada Inc. ("USSC").

[2] Objections to the treatment of certain of these Claims as debt rather than as "equity claims" for the purposes of the CCAA, and to the enforceability of the security asserted in respect of certain of these Claims, have been filed by each of: (1) the United Steel, Paper and Forestry, Rubber, Manufacturing, Energy, Allied Industrial and Service Workers International Union (the "USW") on its own behalf and on behalf of USW Local 1005 and USW Local 8782 (collectively, the "Union"); (2) Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Ontario and the Superintendent of Financial Services (Ontario) in his capacity as administrator of the Pension Benefits Guarantee Fund (collectively, the "Province"); and (3) Representative Counsel to all non-USW active employees and retirees of USSC (collectively, the "Objecting Parties").

[3] This motion principally addresses the objections filed by the Objecting Parties (the "Objections"). The following are the USS Claims in respect of which Objections have been made:

Claim Reference #	Description of Claim	Amount of Claim
9	Unsecured Term Loan	$1,847,169,934
10	Unsecured Revolver Loan	U.S. $120,150,928
11	Secured Revolver Loan	U.S. $72,938,390
11(a)	Secured Cliffs LRD Transaction	U.S. $14,538,463
11(b)	Secured Credit Support Payments	U.S. $3,742,479
11(c)	Secured Intercompany Trade	U.S. $31,252,193

The Claim numbers above, and amounts reflected in this table, are taken from the Third Supplementary Seventh Report of the Monitor dated July 29, 2015 (the "Third Supplementary Monitor's Report") at para. 11.

[4] In these Reasons, Claims #9 and #10 are referred to as the "USS Unsecured Claims" and Claims #9, #10 and #11 are referred to collectively as the "USS Debt Claims". In addition, Claims #11, #11(a), #11(b) and #11(c) are referred to as the "USS Secured Claims", and Claims #11(a), #11(b) and #11(c) are referred to as the "USS Remaining Secured Claims".

Background

[5] The following is a brief summary of the background to this proceeding. Further detail regarding the relationship between USS and USSC and the USS Claims that have given rise to the Objections is set out below.

USSC

[6] USSC is an integrated steel manufacturer that conducts most of its business from two large steel plants located in Ontario: the Hamilton Works located in Hamilton, Ontario and the Lake Erie Works located in Nanticoke, Ontario.

[7] USSC is an indirect wholly-owned subsidiary of USS. Prior to its acquisition by USS in 2007, USSC was known as Stelco Inc. ("Stelco").

[8] As a result of its financial difficulties, USSC applied for relief under the CCAA and was granted CCAA protection pursuant to an Initial Order dated September 16, 2014 (the "Filing Date") (as amended and restated from time to time, the "Initial Order").

The USS Parties

[9] USS is an integrated steel producer with major operations in North America and Central Europe. USS is a publicly-traded, Delaware corporation and its shares are listed for trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

[10] 1344973 Alberta ULC ("ABULC") was an Alberta corporation incorporated on August 22, 2007 to be the acquisition vehicle for the purposes of the USS acquisition of Stelco.

[11] U.S. Steel Canada Limited Partnership ("Canada LP") is a limited partnership formed under the laws of Alberta. Canada LP is an indirect wholly-owned subsidiary of USS. At the time of the USS acquisition of Stelco, Canada LP owned all the outstanding shares of ABULC and was, therefore, ABULC's direct parent. As a result of the amalgamation of ABULC and USSC on December 31, 2007 described below, Canada LP has become the direct parent of USSC.

[12] United States Steel Credit Corporation ("Credit Corp") was a Delaware corporation that was a wholly-owned subsidiary of USS. Credit Corp was merged into another wholly-owned subsidiary of USS on December 20, 2013.

[13] U.S. Steel Kosice s.r.o. ("USS Kosice") is a Slovakian corporation that is an indirect wholly-owned subsidiary of USS.

The USS Acquisition of Stelco Inc. in 2007

[14] On August 26, 2007, the USS board of directors approved the USS acquisition of Stelco, and USS, Stelco and ABULC entered into an arrangement agreement giving effect to the proposed transaction. The plan of arrangement by which the acquisition was implemented was subsequently approved by the Ontario Superior Court of Justice on October 30, 2007, and the acquisition transaction closed on October 31, 2007 (the "Acquisition").

Financing the Acquisition and the Flow of Funds

[15] The total amount spent by USS in connection with the Stelco acquisition was approximately $1.939 billion, or U.S. $2.056 billion at then prevailing exchange rates. The relevant corporate structure and the flow of funds are shown on the Funds Flow Chart attached as Schedule A to these Reasons. In these Reasons, all dollar amounts are denominated in Canadian dollars unless otherwise specifically indicated.

[16] ABULC was the acquisition vehicle that directly acquired Stelco. ABULC was financed by the following loans and capital contributions:

(a) Canada LP loaned ABULC $700 million pursuant to a loan agreement dated October 29, 2007 described below (the "Term Loan");

(b) Canada LP provided ABULC with equity in the amount of $600 million; and

(c) Credit Corp loaned ABULC approximately U.S. $744 million pursuant to a loan agreement dated October 29, 2007 described below (the "Credit Corp Loan").

[17] ABULC used the funds received from Canada LP and Credit Corp as follows: (1) ABULC used $1.046 billion to purchase the outstanding shares of Stelco; (2) ABULC loaned Stelco approximately $741 million, which Stelco used to pay out its third party debt (other than a loan from the Province of Ontario); (3) ABULC loaned Stelco approximately $59 million, which Stelco used to pay out its option holders; (4) ABULC loaned Stelco approximately $61 million, which Stelco used to pay out its warrant holders; (5) ABULC loaned Stelco $32.5 million, which Stelco used to make a payment to its four main pension plans; and (6) ABULC loaned Stelco $40 million to fund Stelco's working capital.

[18] The funds used to acquire Stelco were derived from multiple sources. First, USS obtained new debt financing in the principal amount of U.S. $900 million in the form of facilities provided by a banking syndicate led by J.P. Morgan Chase Bank, N.A. These facilities comprised an unsecured three-year term loan in the principal amount of U.S. $500 million and an unsecured one-year term loan in the amount of U.S. $400 million. The one-year term loan was subsequently refinanced by USS as part of a larger offering of ten-year bonds in the public market. Second, USS obtained approximately U.S. $400 million by drawing on an existing receivables purchase facility. Third, USS utilized approximately U.S. $153 million of cash on hand at the USS level and €434,415,519.56, or $597,860,287.50, of cash on hand in USS Kosice.

[19] The source of the financing for the Acquisition, the structure of the Acquisition and the flow of funds to ABULC for such purposes was developed by USS between the date of the Arrangement Agreement and the date of the Acquisition. The principal consideration in the development of this structure was tax-efficiency from the perspective of USS. With respect to ABULC, the amounts received by it as debt and equity were driven by the "thin capitalization" rules under the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.). In addition, the amount of the funding reflected a USS policy of avoiding any secured third party indebtedness at the level of any subsidiary. As a result, it was necessary to fund Stelco with the amount necessary to repay all outstanding third party debt at the date of the Acquisition, other than a loan from the Province.

Post-Acquisition Corporate Reorganization & Refinancing

[20] On November 1, 2007, immediately following the Acquisition, Stelco was renamed U.S. Steel Canada Inc.

[21] Between October 31, 2007 and the year-end, the Credit Corp Loan was repaid in full. Certain of the repayments were made from additional advances under the Term Loan which are described in greater detail below.

[22] Following such additional advances by Canada LP to ABULC under the Term Loan in 2007, the outstanding principal amount outstanding under the Term Loan on December 31, 2007 was $1,227,363,149.82. The total amount outstanding on that date including accrued interest was $1,240,009,143.

[23] ABULC and USSC amalgamated on December 31, 2007 to continue as USSC (the "Amalgamation"). As a result of the Amalgamation, the obligations of ABULC under the Term Loan became obligations of the amalgamated entity, USSC.

The History of the Credit Corp Loan

[24] As described above, pursuant to the Credit Corp Loan, Credit Corp advanced U.S. $744,463,605 to ABULC on or about October 31, 2007. The funds provided by the Credit Corp Loan were notionally intended to fund Stelco's third party debt at the date of acquisition that was denominated in U.S. dollars. USS intended the facility to be a short-term facility that would be repaid within two months. Larry Brockway, the Senior Vice-President, Chief Financial Officer and Chief Risk Officer of USS ("Brockway"), testified that the "purpose of the agreement was to help stair-step the structure into a more permanent structure as part of the ultimate steps between the acquisition and year end".

[25] Consistent with this objective, the Credit Corp Loan was repaid by means of: (1) a repayment of approximately U.S. $26 million in November 2007; (2) a repayment of approximately U.S. $41 million on December 4, 2007, which was funded by an advance to ABULC under the Term Loan on the same day described below; (3) a U.S. $87 million repayment by ABULC on December 21, 2007, comprised of U.S. $10 million presumably funded out of a U.S. $20 million equity injection from Credit Corp to ABULC on the same day and application of U.S. $77 million out of the $470 Million Advance described below; and (4) a reduction in the amount of approximately U.S. $595 million pursuant to the SHC Transaction described below.

The SHC Transaction

[26] The following summarizes the description of the SHC Transaction set out in the Third Supplementary Monitor's Report.

[27] At the time of the Acquisition, Stelco indirectly owned all of the outstanding shares of Stelco Holding Company ("SHC"), a corporation incorporated under the laws of Delaware. SHC's principal assets were interests in two mining joint ventures – Hibbing Taconite Company ("Hibbing") and Tilden Mining Company ("Tilden").

[28] At the time of the Acquisition, SHC had a liability to Stelco in the amount of approximately U.S. $393 million. This amount principally represented the excess of the amount owing by Stelco to SHC for iron-ore pellets produced by Hibbing and Tilden and shipped to Stelco, representing SHC's pro rata share of such production, less the amount of annual cash calls on SHC in respect of Hibbing and Tilden, which were paid by Stelco on behalf of SHC. This liability was booked as an advance from SHC to Stelco, and had increased in each year prior to 2007. The liability also included legacy liabilities of Stelco to certain other subsidiaries of SHC that were dormant. Stelco had not repaid any amount on account of these advances, and had no intention of doing so prior to the Acquisition, due to the adverse tax consequences of dividending the amount of any such payment back to Canada.

[29] The Acquisition presented an issue of tax inefficiency for USS, referred to as a "tax sandwich", that would result if distributions from SHC (as dividends or interest) were made to USSC in Canada and, in turn, distributed to USS in the United States. To address this issue, USS caused ABULC, USSC and SHC to enter into certain transactions which were effected by book entries in the financial accounts of the relevant corporations pursuant to a payment direction agreement dated December 21, 2007 (the "Payment Direction") (collectively, the "SHC Transaction").

[30] The SHC Transaction involved the following steps:

(1) ABULC loaned USSC the amount of U.S. $393 million out of the $470 Million Advance (defined below);

(2) USSC repaid the outstanding advance to SHC in the same amount;

(3) USSC sold its equity interest in SHC to USS for consideration in the form of a promissory note dated December 31, 2007 in the principal amount of U.S. $595 million payable to the wholly-owned subsidiary of USSC that owned the shares of SHC. The face amount of the promissory note of U.S. $595 million represented USS' estimation of the fair market value of SHC at the time of the sale; and

(4) The promissory note was distributed by such wholly-owned subsidiary to USSC on December 31, 2007 which, in turn, assigned the note to Credit Corp in reduction of the remaining principal amount outstanding under the Credit Corp Loan, which was slightly less than U.S. $593 million.

[31] The effect of the SHC Transaction was to transfer ownership of SHC from USSC to USS by way of satisfaction of the remaining amount outstanding under the Credit Corp Loan as of December 31, 2007.

The Term Loan

[32] The following summarizes the provisions of the Term Loan that are relevant for the issues in this proceeding and the history of draws and accrued interest under the Term Loan resulting in the USS claim in respect of the Term Loan.

The Relevant Provisions of the Term Loan

[33] The Term Loan is an unsecured loan facility having a term of 30 years repayable by USSC at any time without premium or penalty. The full amount of the outstanding principal is therefore due on October 31, 2037, to the extent it is not repaid before that date. USS says that it selected a 30-year term for the Term Loan because it viewed its investment in Stelco as a long-term one. The 30-year term was also the maximum term countenanced for U.S. tax purposes.

[34] Interest on the Term Loan accrued daily and compounded semi-annually at an interest rate of 9.03% per annum. USS obtained and relied upon advice from an independent, third-party consultant regarding an acceptable interest rate for a company with a similarly rated risk for 30-year debt. Interest is payable on the last business day of the year on the second anniversary after the year in which it accrues. As a result, interest under the Term Loan was payable from 24 to 36 months after the date it began to accrue.

[35] The Term Loan was denominated in Canadian dollars. The Term Loan originally allowed for a maximum borrowing of $1 billion. The maximum availability under the Term Loan was increased from $1 billion to $1.5 billion on December 21, 2007. As mentioned, the amount of $700 million was initially advanced on October 31, 2007. The Term Loan provided that further advances could be obtained "with prior written notice … pursuant to a request for advance" set out in a form similar to a scheduled document to the Term Loan.

[36] The loan agreement contains certain representations and covenants of ABULC/USSC and events of default. The events of default include an event of default if the borrower is "unable to meet debts". Upon the occurrence of an event of default, the maturity date is accelerated and Canada LP has the right to demand repayment.

History of Advances and Repayments under the Term Loan

[37] As mentioned above, Canada LP advanced $700 million to ABULC on October 31, 2007 in connection with the Acquisition. This amount became a direct obligation of USSC after the Amalgamation. In addition, during the period from the Acquisition to the Amalgamation, ABULC recorded three additional advances. On December 4, 2007, ABULC recorded two advances totaling approximately U.S. $61 million, of which U.S. $41 million was applied to reduce the Credit Corp Loan and the balance was advanced to USSC for working capital purposes. On December 22, 2007, ABULC recorded an advance of U.S. $470 million under the Term Loan pursuant to the Payment Direction (the "$470 Million Advance"). The foregoing advances under the Term Loan are collectively referred to as the "initial advances".

[38] During 2008, USSC made interest payments to Canada LP under the Term Loan totalling approximately $113 million. Of this amount, $99,940,908 was paid in October and November 2008. Such payments were made in advance of their due date under the Term Loan Agreement, which provided that such interest was not payable until December 31, 2010. In addition, USSC made a principal repayment of $19 million in January 2008. The only additional funding provided to USSC by USS or any of its affiliates in 2008 was an equity injection of approximately $55 million in October 2008.

[39] In 2009, USSC received additional advances from Canada LP under the Term Loan totalling $211.2 million. These advances were made during the months of February, June, September, November and December 2009. No interest or principal was paid during 2009. In addition, as set out in the table above, USS provided equity injections totalling $61 million during 2009. These capital contributions were made in February, July and October 2009.

[40] There were no further advances under the Term Loan after 2009. At the end of 2010, USS decided to waive the remaining interest that was due under the Term Loan in respect of interest accrued during 2008. Since there had been substantial interest payments made in 2008, the accrued interest that was waived in December 2010 was only $10.5 million. USS says that, given USSC's other funding needs at the time, the interest payment could only have been made if USSC received additional funding. Further, due to taxation on interest payments, it did not make economic sense to fund USSC with additional debt or equity in order to enable USSC to repay interest on the Term Loan. USS says that this was the first time that USS considered waiving interest due under the Term Loan. In other words, it asserts that it did not have such expectation at the time that it entered into the Term Loan.

[41] USS continued the practice of waiving interest in each year after 2010. Accordingly, in each of the years 2010 to 2013, USS waived approximately one-half of the accrued and unpaid interest due in that year. In total, USS has waived interest obligations of USSC totaling approximately $428 million and has accrued interest under the Term Loan in approximately the same amount.

[42] As of the Filing Date, the total amount outstanding under the Term Loan, including accrued interest, was $1,847,169,934.

The Revolver Loan

[43] Pursuant to an agreement dated May 11, 2010 between USSC and Credit Corp (as amended from time to time, the "Revolver Loan Agreement"), Credit Corp established a Revolver Loan to provide working capital to USSC to support its operating activities. The Revolver Loan Agreement was subsequently amended successively by an agreement dated July 31, 2012 (the "First Revolver Amendment"), an agreement dated January 28, 2013 (the "Second Revolver Amendment") and an agreement dated October 30, 2013 (the "Third Revolver Amendment") in the circumstances described below. In these Reasons, the loan outstanding under the Revolver Loan Agreement, as so amended from time to time, is herein referred to as the "Revolver Loan" and the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan are collectively referred to as the "Loans" and individually are referred to as a "Loan".

[44] USS has filed two proofs of claim in respected of the Revolver Loan. The first claim is an unsecured claim (being Claim #10) in the amount of U.S. $120,150,928, representing the outstanding loan on October 30, 2013, together with accrued interest since that date. The second claim is a secured claim (being Claim #11) in the amount of U.S. $72,938,390, representing the loan advances since October 30, 2013 plus accrued interest. The following sets out the principal terms of the Revolver Loan, including the related security, and the history of advances and payments in respect of the Revolver Loan.

Terms of the Revolver Loan

[45] The Revolver Loan was originally an unsecured loan having a fifteen-year term. Accordingly, all outstanding advances are due on May 11, 2025. As mentioned, the Revolver Loan originally provided for a maximum availability of U.S. $350 million.

[46] Advances under the Revolver Loan accrued interest at the applicable federal interest rate for the month in which the advance was drawn and compounded interest semi-annually. The applicable interest rate as of the date of the Revolver Loan was 4.42% per annum.

[47] The loan agreement contains certain representations and covenants of USSC, including originally, a solvency representation, and events of default. The events of default include an event of default in the event that the borrower is "unable to meet debts". Upon the occurrence of an event of default, the maturity date is accelerated and Credit Corp had the right to demand repayment. The loan agreement is governed by the laws of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

The History of Advances and Repayments Under the Revolver Loan

[48] Credit Corp advanced a total of U.S. $120 million under the Revolver Loan from its establishment in May 2010 through the third quarter of 2011. Of this amount, U.S. $75 million was advanced in May 2010, U.S. $25 million was provided in two advances in August 2010, and a further U.S. $20 million was advanced in June 2011.

[49] In the period from November 2011 to April 2012, USSC had somewhat more stable cash flows. Credit Corp advanced approximately U.S. $136 million under the Revolver Loan during this period. During the same period, USSC made interest payments totaling almost U.S. $9 million and principal repayments of approximately U.S. $61.8 million under the Revolver Loan. Thereafter, the outstanding balance began to grow with additional advances in each month in 2012, other than October.

[50] By July 31, 2012, the outstanding principal balance of the Revolver Loan was, however, approaching the cap of U.S. $350 million. On that date, Credit Corp and USSC executed the First Revolver Amendment, which increased the maximum availability under the Revolver Loan to U.S. $500 million. Apart from removal of the solvency representation of USSC, the First Revolver Amendment did not otherwise amend the provisions of the Revolver Loan Agreement, including the events of default. The solvency representation of USSC was removed at the request of USSC's management, which had a concern about USSC's solvency given its recent losses and the level of its debt. The circumstances pertaining to this action are addressed further below.

[51] By January 28, 2013, however, after additional advances to USSC under the Revolver Loan, the outstanding principal balance of the Revolver Loan had again reached the maximum availability. USSC's business plan for 2013 indicated that it would need substantial additional financing during that year in order to finance its operations. Accordingly, on that date Credit Corp and USSC executed the Second Revolver Amendment, which increased the maximum availability under the Revolver Loan from U.S. $500 million to U.S. $600 million, on the condition that USSC grant a security interest in favour of USS in respect of its inventory of iron ore pellets sold to it by SHC. The Second Revolver Amendment did not otherwise amend the provisions of the Revolver Loan Agreement as it existed on January 28, 2013, including the events of default and consequences of a default.

[52] In furtherance of the provisions of the Second Revolver Amendment, USSC granted a security interest in favour of Credit Corp over all of its inventory of iron ore pellets sold to USSC by SHC, and related proceeds, pursuant to a security agreement dated January 28, 2013 executed by USSC and USS (the "Security Agreement").

[53] In February 2013, USS determined that the foreign currency exchange fluctuations on the Revolver Loan, which was a U.S. dollar-denominated loan, had become unacceptable as a result of the volatility of USSC's revenues, and accordingly of its quarterly earnings, due to fluctuations in the Canadian dollar. Over a period of several months thereafter, Canada LP injected significant amounts of equity into USSC to provide for USSC's working capital funding needs and to allow USSC to pay down the Revolver Loan.

[54] Between February and September 2013, as set out above, equity injections provided to USSC totaled over $680 million. Payments of principal and interest on the Revolver Loan over the same period totaled over U.S. $390 million. As of October 30, 2013, the amount outstanding under the Revolver Loan had been reduced to $116,969,996.

[55] On October 30, 2013, Credit Corp and USSC executed the Third Revolver Amendment. The Third Revolver Amendment contains a recital to the effect that the parties wish to amend and restate the Revolver Loan "in order to permit the Borrower to access the remainder of the [Revolver] Loan." The Third Revolver Amendment continued the availability under the Revolver Loan in the amount of U.S. $600 million. However, it divided borrowings under the facility into two tranches: (1) the "First Tranche Indebtedness", being the outstanding amount of $116,969,996, which was entitled to the security interest over iron-ore pellets constituted by the Security Agreement; and (2) the "Second Tranche Indebtedness", being any advances after October 30, 2013, which were entitled to the general security interest constituted by the October Security Agreement (as defined below). The Third Revolver Amendment did not otherwise amend the provisions of the Revolver Loan as it existed on October 30, 2013, including the events of default and consequences of a default.

[56] Concurrently with the execution of the Third Revolver Amendment, USSC and Credit Corp executed an amendment and restatement of the Security Agreement pursuant to an agreement also dated October 30, 2013 (the "October Amendment"). Pursuant to the October Amendment, USSC granted a general security interest over all of its personal property in favour of Credit Corp. The October Amendment contained a recital to the effect that Credit Corp "is willing to continue to provide Loans pursuant to [the Revolver Loan], only if [USSC] enters into this Amendment". The General Security Agreement, as amended by the October Amendment, is herein referred to as the "October Security Agreement". Apart from broadening the security interest granted in favour of Credit Corp, the October Amendment did not otherwise amend the provisions of the Security Agreement as it existed as of October 30, 2013.

[57] USS has acknowledged that, as of October 30, 2013, although USSC was meeting its obligations as they fell due, the total liabilities of USSC exceeded the market value of its assets and, accordingly, USSC was otherwise "insolvent", including for the purposes of section 95 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 (the "BIA").

[58] After the execution of the Third Revolver Amendment and the October Security Agreement, Credit Corp advanced loans to USSC under the Revolver Loan totaling U.S. $71 million. These loans were outstanding at the Filing Date. USSC did not make any payments of either principal or interest after October 30, 2013 in respect of the First Tranche Indebtedness under the Revolver Loan outstanding as of October 30, 2013.

[59] Accordingly, at the Filing Date, the total amount outstanding under the Revolver Loan, including accrued interest, was U.S. $193,089,318. The portion of this balance attributable to advances made prior to October 30, 2013, i.e., to the First Tranche Indebtedness plus accrued and unpaid interest thereon since that date, was U.S. $120,150,928. This is the amount of the USS unsecured claim in respect of the Revolver Loan. The portion attributable to advances made after October 30, 2013, i.e., to the Second Tranche Indebtedness, was U.S. $72,938,390, representing U.S. $71 million of advances plus interest. This is the amount of the USS secured claim in respect of the Revolver Loan.

Internal Procedure for Additional Draws and Equity Capital Contributions

[60] In order to request funding under the Term Loan after December 31, 2007 and under the Revolver Loan, USSC would prepare and submit to USS a cash flow forecast setting out its anticipated cash requirements for the following 13-week period. The submission of these weekly cash flow forecasts, and the related correspondence and discussions between USS and USSC, constituted USSC's formal request for funding.

[61] USS would review the forecast and determine whether funds would be advanced, and if so whether they would be advanced as debt under the Loans or as an equity injection. Typically the funds would be advanced as debt unless additional debt would cause USSC to go offside the "thin capitalization" tax rules under the Income Tax Act.

[62] There is no dispute that all advances made under the Term Loan were documented and recorded by both Canada LP and USSC as debt and that all advances made under the Revolver Loan were similarly documented and recorded by both Credit Corp and USSC as debt. It is also not disputed that all contributions to equity by Canada LP were recorded by both Canada LP and USSC as equity. In this regard, the Monitor has noted that USSC's books and records relating to these intercompany transactions are well organized and documented, including with respect to each specific advance of cash in the form of equity or debt.

[63] The following table summarizes the equity capital injections by USS into USSC between October 31, 2007 and the Filing Date:

Equity Contributions (CAD $Millions)

[64] The Remaining USS Secured Claims USS has asserted the following three Claims, which it says are secured pursuant to the November Security Agreement (as defined below):

Claim	Amount (USD)	Claim Reference #
Secured Cliffs Transaction	$14,538,462.95	11(a)
Secured Credit Support Payments	$3,742,478.78	11(b)
Secured Intercompany Goods & Services	$31,252,193.05	11(c)

As mentioned, these Claims are collectively referred to as the "USS Remaining Secured Claims". It is my understanding that the Objecting Parties do not challenge the quantum of these Claims but assert that the security for these Claims is unenforceable on the grounds described later in these Reasons.

Secured Cliffs Transaction (Claim #11(a))

[65] USS filed a secured claim for U.S. $14,538,462.95 with respect to the amount of a payment made by USS to Cliffs Natural Resources and Cliffs Sales Company (collectively, "Cliffs") for certain iron ore delivered by Cliffs to USSC, which iron ore was, in turn, resold by USS to USSC under the following circumstances.

[66] Cliffs and USS are parties to an agreement dated January 1, 2008 for the supply of iron ore (the "Cliffs Agreement"). The iron ore delivered by Cliffs to USSC was sourced by the USS Procurement Department as part of the raw materials services arrangement between USS and USSC that was provided for in the "Limited Risk Distributor Agreement" referred to below.

[67] The Claim relates to four shipments of iron ore, and associated screening charges, totaling U.S. $14.1 million, which were delivered by Cliffs to USSC in August 2014, prior to the Filing Date and outstanding obligations in the amount of U.S. $0.4 million for screening charges incurred in January and May 2014 for which Cliffs had not previously issued invoices.

[68] On September 16, 2014, pursuant to an agreement between USS and USSC (the "Iron Ore Agreement"), in order to avoid an interruption of the supply of a critical raw material under the Cliffs Agreement, USS agreed to make the payment to Cliffs and to transfer title of the iron ore pellets to USSC provided that USSC confirmed the corresponding obligation of USSC to USS in payment of such iron ore would be secured under the November Security Agreement.

[69] The Monitor has confirmed that USSC received delivery of the iron ore prior to the Filing Date and that USS made the payment of $14.1 million to Cliffs on October 2014. The Monitor has also confirmed that, under the Cliffs Agreement, title to the iron ore did not pass to USS until USS paid for the iron ore after the Filing Date. At that time, USS effectively took title to the iron ore and re-sold it to USSC pursuant to the Limited Risk Distributor Agreement described below.

[70] Accordingly, this Claim is a claim of USS for the payment of goods sold by USS to USSC after the Filing Date pursuant to arrangements set out in the Iron Ore Agreement that were entered into prior to the commencement of these proceedings under the CCAA.

Secured Credit Support Payments - Claim #11(b)

[71] USS filed a secured Claim for U.S. $3,703,450 for contribution and indemnity as guarantor of certain USSC obligations as follows:

Vendor	Amount (USD)
Independent Electricity System Operator ("IESO")	$2,616,156.27
Union Gas Limited ("Union Gas")	$669,109.87
Norfolk Southern Corporation ("Norfolk")	$457,212.64

[72] USS received demands subsequent to the Filing Date from IESO, Union Gas and Norfolk pursuant to existing guarantee agreements between USS in favour of each of such parties in respect of goods and services supplied to USSC prior to the Filing Date. USS made payments to these vendors pursuant to these guarantees subsequent to the Filing Date. This Claim is therefore an aggregation of USS' rights of subrogation which arose on payment of these three obligations of USSC after the Filing Date pursuant to the USS guarantees in favour of the third parties.

Secured Intercompany Goods & Services - Claim #11(c)

[73] In the ordinary course of business, the USS Affiliates provided raw materials and other goods as well as various services to USSC both informally and under several intercompany agreements. Invoices relating to the intercompany goods and services received by USSC in a calendar month were typically paid on a gross basis on or about the 15th day of the following month as part of a normal reconciliation process between USSC and USS.

[74] USS filed a secured claim totaling U.S. $31,252,193.05 in respect of the sale of goods and the provision of services on an intercompany basis after the date of the November Security Agreement.

[75] As stated above, the sale of goods and the provision of services by USS to USSC took place both informally and under several intercompany agreements. The relevant intercompany agreements include the following: (1) two Marketing, Distributorship and Supply Agreements, dated March 1, 2009 and December 1, 2008, which governed cross-border sales within the USS group, i.e., the sale of steel produced in the U.S. or Canada and sold to a customer in the other country; (2) a Limited Risk Distributor Agreement, dated February 1, 2008, between USS and USSC under which USSC purchased significant quantities of raw material on an as-needed basis from USS; (3) an ERP Cost Sharing Agreement, amended January 1, 2011, that governed the costs of an enterprise-wide financial and operational software solution known as "Oracle"; (4) a Corporate Services Agreement, dated November 1, 2007, pursuant to which USS provided, among other things, financial and accounting, corporate strategic planning, tax planning and audit services to USSC; and (5) a Business Services Agreement, dated January 1, 2014, among USS, USSC and USS Kosice that related to certain IT and financial transaction processing services.

[76] The claims that are aggregated as Claim #11(c) are therefore contractual claims of USS for payment of the goods and services provided pursuant to these agreements prior to the Filing Date.

Procedural History of this Proceeding

[77] Pursuant to a claims process order of the Court in these CCAA proceedings dated November 13, 2014 (the "Claims Process Order"), creditors of USSC were required to file Proofs of Claim (as defined in the Claims Process Order) in respect of affected Claims with the Monitor by December 22, 2014.

Actions of the Monitor under the Claims Process Order

[78] With respect to any claims filed by USS, U.S. Steel Holdings, Inc., Canada LP or any affiliates of USS (other than USSC or any of USSC's subsidiaries), paragraph 28 of the Claims Process Order ordered:

(a) the Monitor to prepare a report to be served on the Service List and filed with the Court, detailing its review of all USS claims and recommendations it has, if any, with respect to the determination of such claims;

(b) the Monitor to seek a scheduling appointment before the Court, on notice to the Service List, to schedule a hearing of a motion to determine the USS claims; and

(c) that the USS claims shall not be accepted or determined as Proven Claims without approval of this Court.

[79] USS and its subsidiaries and affiliates filed 14 Proofs of Claim with the Monitor, being the "USS Claims".

[80] On March 10, 2015, the Monitor issued its Seventh Report in these CCAA proceedings dated March 9, 2015 (the "Monitor's Seventh Report").

[81] As described at paragraph 8 of Monitor's Seventh Report, the USS Claims may be summarized and aggregated into the following three categories:

(a) non-contingent Secured Claims (as defined in the Claims Process Order), which total U.S. $122,432,496.11 (being the "USS Secured Claims");

(b) unsecured Claims, which total U.S. $127,805,815.36 (being Claims #1 to 8, #10 and an unsecured portion of Claim #11) and $1,847,169,934.04 (being Claim #9); and

(c) contingent Secured Claims, which total $78,761,395.00 (which are not addressed in these Reasons).

[82] The review process undertaken by the Monitor (and in certain cases by the Monitor's counsel) of the USS Claims is described at paragraphs 36-40 of the Monitor's Seventh Report. Based on its review of the USS Claims, the Monitor recommended to the Court that:

(a) USS bring a motion to approve the USS Secured Claims and the USS Unsecured Claims; and

(b) the USS Secured Claims and the USS Unsecured Claims be found to be Proven Claims in their entirety as filed by USS.

[83] Based on the Monitor's recommendations to the Court, USS commenced this proceeding by a notice of motion dated March 13, 2015. Pursuant to this motion, USS seeks to have the USS Secured Claims and the USS Unsecured Claims approved by the Court as Proven Claims pursuant to the Claims Process Order.

The Objections of the Province, the Union and Representative Counsel

[84] The following briefly summarizes the claims set out in the Objections of the Objecting Parties that have given rise to this trial. In addition, an objection was filed by Robert and Sharon Milbourne (collectively, the "Milbournes"). However, the Milbournes chose not to participate in the hearing of this motion. The Court has therefore treated their objection as withdrawn.

The Objection of the Province of Ontario

[85] On April 14, 2015, an Objection was filed on behalf of the Province.

[86] The Province submitted that the facts of this case raise significant issues with respect to the validity and enforceability of the security interests underlying the secured portions of the USS Claims as well as the proper characterization of the USS Claims. It argued that, in light of these issues, there was an insufficient basis on which to accept the USS Claims as Proven Claims. It argued that a hearing was required to evaluate these issues, which evaluation should include a consideration of whether the security claimed by USS was valid and enforceable given, among other matters, that the adequacy of consideration received by USSC in exchange for the grant of security has not been established. The Province also submitted that the Court should consider whether the USS Claims constitute bona fide indebtedness, or whether they are properly characterized as equity contributions from a controlling parent company.

[87] The Objection of the Province was supplemented by a clarification dated August 21, 2015, which set out in greater detail the bases upon which the Province asserts that the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan should be re-characterized as "equity claims" and that the security for the USS Secured Claims should be declared to be a fraudulent preference or otherwise unenforceable. As these arguments are addressed below in the Court's analysis, I do not propose to repeat them in this section.

The Objection of the Union

[88] On April 14, 2015, an Objection was filed by the Union. By way of overview, the Union submitted that USS, as the shareholder of USSC, directed the operations of USSC in a manner that has caused USSC to significantly underperform, thereby incurring substantial losses and requiring it to incur significant debt. In addition, the Union submitted that such actions undermined the ability of USSC to meet its on-going funding obligations to the USW pension plans of USSC. The Union argued that, as a result, USS has diluted the potential recoveries of the Union members and the USW pension plan beneficiaries in this CCAA proceeding.

[89] The Union broadly categorized its objections as follows:

(a) an objection to the granting of security interests on the assets of USSC;

(b) an objection to the characterization of most of the USS Claims as debt when they are properly characterized as equity; and

(c) an objection grounded in USS' conduct in relation to its Canadian plants, unionized pensioners, pension plan members and beneficiaries, which gives rise to claims of oppression and breaches of fiduciary duty.

[90] With respect to the objection in (a), the Union submitted that USS' secured claim is based on security interests effectively granted by USS to itself, at a time when there was no independent board of directors or advisors, for insufficient consideration, and in a manner which amounted to an improper preference and/or fraudulent conveyance. With respect to the objection in (b), the Union submitted that a significant portion of USS' debt is really in the nature of equity and should be re-characterized as such based on, among other factors, the fact that (i) much of the debt was incurred to acquire Stelco; (ii) USS completely controlled USSC; (iii) USS was the sole source of USSC's financing; (iv) USS provided commercially unreasonable interest and repayment terms; (v) USS had no reasonable expectation of repayment on the purported loans; and (vi) USSC was significantly undercapitalized throughout the years following its acquisition by USS.

[91] The first two claims of the Union overlap significantly, if not completely, with the arguments raised by the Province in its Objection. The remaining claims are not being addressed on this motion. The process for addressing such claims was the subject of an earlier hearing and the Court's endorsement that was released as U.S. Steel Canada Inc. (Re), 2015 ONSC 5103.

The Objection of Representative Counsel

[92] On April 14, 2015, an Objection was filed also filed by Representative Counsel for all non-USW active employees and retirees of USSC. In its Objection and at the trial in this proceeding, Representative Counsel adopted the particulars of the Objections filed by the Province and the Union as applicable to the non-USW active employees and retirees of USSC.

The Disputed USS Claims

[93] For completeness, the Objections that were made in respect of Claims #1-5 in the Monitor's Seventh Report, which are unsecured claims in the aggregate amount of U.S. $3,085,746, have now been withdrawn by the Objecting Parties. Further, no Objections have been made in respect of Claims #6-8 in such Report, which are unsecured claims in the aggregate amount of U.S. $338,169. Therefore, based on the Monitor's Seventh Report, Claims #1-8 inclusive should be confirmed as Proven Claims. The USS Claims which are the subject of this motion, and in respect of which the Objections are maintained, are the following:

Claim Reference #	Description of Claim	Amount of Claim
9	Unsecured Term Loan	$1,847,169,934
10	Unsecured Revolver Loan	U.S. $120,150,928
11	Secured Revolver Loan	U.S. $72,938,390
11(a)	Secured Cliffs LRD Transaction	U.S. $14,538,463
11(b)	Secured Credit Support Payments	U.S. $3,742,479
11(c)	Secured Intercompany Trade	U.S. $31,252,193

[94] For clarity, none of the parties object to the quantum of the USS Claims which are the subject of the present motion.

[95] The USS motion and the Objections were addressed collectively at a trial conducted over eight days. The evidence adduced at the trial consisted of affidavit evidence and oral testimony, the relevant portions of which are described below.

Applicable Statutory Law

[96] The following provisions of the CCAA are relevant for the Objections that the USS Claims should be re-characterized as "Equity Claims" for the purposes of these CCAA proceedings:

> 2. In this Act,
>
> "Claim" means any indebtedness, liability or obligation of any kind that would be a claim provable within the meaning of section 2 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act;
>
> "Equity Claim" means a claim that is in respect of an equity interest, including a claim for, among others,
>
> (a) a dividend or similar payment,
>
> (b) a return of capital,
>
> (c) a redemption or retraction obligation,
>
> (d) a monetary loss resulting from the ownership, purchase or sale of an equity interest or from the rescission, or, in Quebec, the annulment, of a purchase or sale of an equity interest, or

> (e) contribution or indemnity in respect of a claim referred to in any of paragraphs (a) to (d);
>
> "Equity Interest" means
>
> (a) in the case of a corporation other than an income trust, a share in the corporation -- or a warrant or option or another right to acquire a share in the corporation -- other than one that is derived from a convertible debt, and
>
> (b) in the case of an income trust, a unit in the income trust -- or a warrant or option or another right to acquire a unit in the income trust -- other than one that is derived from a convertible debt;
>
> 6. (8) No compromise or arrangement that provides for the payment of an equity claim is to be sanctioned by the court unless it provides that all claims that are not equity claims are to be paid in full before the equity claim is to be paid.
> 11. Despite anything in the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act or the Winding-up and Restructuring Act, if an application is made under this Act in respect of a debtor company, the court, on the application of any person interested in the matter, may, subject to the restrictions set out in this Act, on notice to any other person or without notice as it may see fit, make any order that it considers appropriate in the circumstances.

[97] The following provisions of the CCAA are relevant to the Objections that the security for the secured USS Claims, being the general security interest granted by USSC in favour of Credit Corp in the October Security Agreement and in favour of USS, United States Steel International, Inc. and SHC in the November Security Agreement, should be invalidated on the grounds of a fraudulent preference:

> 36.1 (1) Sections 38 and 95 to 101 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act apply, with any modifications that the circumstances require, in respect of a compromise or arrangement unless the compromise or arrangement provides otherwise.
>
> (2) For the purposes of subsection (1), a reference in sections 38 and 95 to 101 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act
>
> (a) to "date of the bankruptcy" is to be read as a reference to "day on which proceedings commence under this Act";
>
> (b) to "trustee" is to be read as a reference to "monitor"; and
>
> (c) to "bankrupt", "insolvent person" or "debtor" is to be read as a reference to "debtor company".

[98] Section 95 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 (the "BIA") provides as follows:

> (1) A transfer of property made, a provision of services made, a charge on property made, a payment made, an obligation incurred or a judicial proceeding taken or suffered by an insolvent person
>
> > (a) in favour of a creditor who is dealing at arm's length with the insolvent person, or a person in trust for that creditor, with a view to giving that creditor a preference over another creditor is void as against — or, in Quebec, may not be set up against — the trustee if it is made, incurred, taken or suffered, as the case may be, during the period beginning on the day that is three months before the date of the initial bankruptcy event and ending on the date of the bankruptcy; and
> >
> > (b) in favour of a creditor who is not dealing at arm's length with the insolvent person, or a person in trust for that creditor, that has the effect of giving that creditor a preference over another creditor is void as against — or, in Quebec, may not be set up against — the trustee if it is made, incurred, taken or suffered, as the case may be, during the period beginning on the day that is 12 months before the date of the initial bankruptcy event and ending on the date of the bankruptcy.
>
> (2) If the transfer, charge, payment, obligation or judicial proceeding referred to in paragraph (1)(a) has the effect of giving the creditor a preference, it is, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, presumed to have been made, incurred, taken or suffered with a view to giving the creditor the preference — even if it was made, incurred, taken or suffered, as the case may be, under pressure — and evidence of pressure is not admissible to support the transaction.

The Issues for Determination in This Proceeding

[99] There are two principal categories of Objections addressed in this proceeding: (1) that the USS Debt Claims are, in substance, "equity claims" for the purposes of the CCAA; and (2) that the security for the USS Secured Claims is either unenforceable for lack of consideration or void as a fraudulent preference under section 95 of the BIA, as incorporated into these proceedings by virtue of section 36.1 of the CCAA. These two issues will be addressed in order after first describing certain expert evidence adduced at trial by the parties.

Expert Financial Evidence

[100] The Province and USS introduced expert evidence from three financial experts who testified at trial. The following briefly summarizes the principal issues addressed in the reports and testimony of these experts. The significance of such evidence is considered below in the Court's analysis of the characterization of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan.

The Finnerty Report

[101] The Province introduced into evidence a report dated August 21, 2015 of Dr. John Finnerty (the "Finnerty Report"). Dr. Finnerty was qualified as an expert in financial economics. Among other things, the Finnerty Report analyzed the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan against fifteen factors, described later in these Reasons and referred to as the "AutoStyle factors", that are used in American courts in debt re-characterization cases. It was Dr. Finnerty's opinion that, from the perspective of financial economics, the terms of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan, and the manner in which they were implemented, are suggestive of equity rather than debt.

[102] The Finnerty Report concluded that, in respect of the Term Loan, eight of the AutoStyle factors are more consistent, from a financial economics perspective, with a characterization of equity, one, being the maturity date provisions and the schedule of debt service payments, is more consistent with a characterization of debt, and the remaining six factors are "indeterminate" from a financial economics perspective.

[103] The eight factors identified in the Finnerty Report as being more consistent with an equity characterization of the Term Loan are the following: (1) the interest rate provisions and the history of interest payments; (2) the inadequacy of capitalization of ABULC at the date of the acquisition; (3) the absence of security for the advances; (4) the inability of USSC to obtain similar financing from outside institutions, based upon the Hall Report described below; (5) the extent to which advances under the Term Loan were effectively subordinated to claims of outside creditors; (6) the absence of a sinking fund to provide debt repayments; (7) the "hollow" right of USS to enforce principal and interest obligations; and (8) the failure of USSC to repay the Term Loan on the due date or to seek a postponement thereof.

[104] The Finnerty Report reached a similar opinion in respect of the Revolver Loan. The Finnerty Report concludes that ten of the AutoStyle Plastics factors are more consistent with equity. These are the eight factors enumerated above as being more consistent with equity in respect of the Term Loan, plus: (9) the source of the debt repayments; and (10) the lengthy fixed maturity date and the schedule of debt service payments. The Finnerty Report concludes that the extent to which the advances under the Revolver Loan were used for working capital, rather than to acquire capital assets, is more consistent with a debt characterization and the remaining two factors are "indeterminate".

The Hall Report

[105] The Province also introduced into evidence a report dated August 21, 2014 of Brad Hall (the "Hall Report"), a director of Alix Partners LLC, who was qualified as an expert in institutional lending.

[106] The Hall Report concludes that a third-party lender in an arm's length transaction would not have provided financing to ABULC/USSC in the amounts and on the terms provided by USS pursuant to the Term Loan and pursuant to the Revolver Loan. The Hall Report was incorporated into, and relied upon, by Dr. Finnerty in the preparation of the Finnerty Report.

[107] These conclusions in the Hall Report are based on an assessment of the terms of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan against the standard of a bank or other institutional lender offering unsecured term loans and unsecured revolving loans (herein referred to as a "third-party lender").

[108] In the opinion of Mr. Hall, a third-party lender would have based any term loan granted to USSC in 2007 on the historical financial performance of Stelco, rather than on the projections relied upon by USS for the purposes of the Acquisition, and would have disregarded any of the synergies projected by USS. In addition, a third-party lender would not have granted a term loan on an unsecured basis, nor would it have been prepared to accept the provisions of the Term Loan in respect of the maturity date, principal repayments or interest payments.

[109] Similarly, Mr. Hall was of the view that a third-party lender would not have granted an unsecured loan in the amount of the Revolver Loan in 2010 nor would it have accepted the provisions of the Revolver Loan respecting the maturity date or interest payments. In addition, the Hall Report addresses the financial performance covenants that a third-party lender would typically require, principally debt/equity, Debt/EBITDA and EBITDA/interest tests, and observed that, given USSC's financial performance after 2008, USSC would not have complied with the latter two tests as typically applied at the time of advances under the Revolver Loan.

[110] The Hall Report also concluded that the terms of the Term Loan were not comparable with the loans provided by the prior arm's length lenders to Stelco or by the arm's length lenders that provided financing at or about the same time to USS. I do not find these opinions of assistance with respect to the issues in this proceeding.

The Austin Smith Report

[111] USS introduced into evidence a report dated September 4, 2015 of Yvette R. Austin Smith (the "Austin Smith Report"), a principal of the Brattle Group, which addressed certain features of the Finnerty Report and the Hall Report. For present purposes, the Austin Smith Report reached three principal conclusions, aspects of which are relevant for the determinations below in these Reasons.

[112] First, the Austin Smith Report says that the conclusions in the Finnerty Report — that, from a financial economics perspective, the terms of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan, and the manner of their administration, are strongly suggestive of an equity investment — relies too heavily on hindsight to be credible. The Report suggests that, as a result, the application of the AutoStyle factors does not assist in establishing the substance of these transactions or the intent of the parties at the time of the establishment of the Loans.

[113] Second, the Austin Smith Report concludes that the opinion in the Hall Report that USSC could not have financed the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan "in the amounts and on the terms as provided by USS" relies on a flawed credit analysis of USSC that, therefore, does not address USSC's debt capacity after the Acquisition.

[114] Third, the Austin Smith Report suggests that the opinions in the Hall Report, and therefore in the Finnerty Report, ignore the reality of diverse corporate debt markets in their concentration on the third-party lender market.

Observations Regarding the Expert Financial Evidence

[115] I do not propose to make any finding regarding the differences of opinion expressed in the Finnerty Report and in the Austin Smith Report on the particular issues raised in the latter as it is not necessary to do so for the purposes of the determinations herein. However, the following three observations regarding the matters addressed in the expert evidence relied upon by the Objecting Parties are relevant to the approach set out below in these Reasons.

[116] First, in respect of most of the AutoStyle factors to which Dr. Finnerty refers as suggestive of equity rather than debt, Dr. Finnerty expressly or implicitly measures the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan against the standard of a bank or other institutional lender offering unsecured term loans and unsecured revolving loans, that is, against the standard of a third-party lender offering such loans.

[117] At the risk of some oversimplification, Dr. Finnerty's logic is as follows. The Term Loan and the Revolver Loan purport on their face to be an unsecured term loan and an unsecured revolver loan. The market for such loans is the third-party lender market. However, the terms and conditions of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan are not terms and conditions that would be acceptable to a third-party lender nor were the Loans administered in certain respects in the manner that would be expected of a third-party lender. Therefore, from the perspective of financial economics, the Loans must be equity. It is the validity of the last proposition in this chain that is at issue in this proceeding. The conclusions of Dr. Finnerty are more or less relevant in this proceeding depending upon whether a third-party lender standard is appropriate in addressing financial arrangements between a parent corporation and its wholly-owned subsidiary. This issue is addressed below.

[118] Second, as Dr. Finnerty testified, of the fifteen AutoStyle factors, three principal factors inform his conclusions that the Loans are more suggestive of equity rather than debt. These factors are: (1) the absence of available financing from third-party lenders on the terms and in the amount of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan; (2) the waiver of interest payments under the Term Loan in 2010 and thereafter; and (3) the "fungibility of debt and equity", which refers to the payment of interest and repayment of principal by USSC out of equity injections received from USS, principally in respect of the Revolver Loan. It is therefore appropriate to focus on the evidentiary value of these three considerations, rather than on the larger list which effectively repeats the same considerations.

[119] Lastly, I would observe that, while Dr. Finnerty was qualified as an expert in financial economics, substantially all of his expert evidence related to his view of third-party lender behaviour in various circumstances, rather than to any more formal analysis that was informed by the analytical framework of financial analysis.

Expert Legal Evidence

[120] USS and the Province also introduced expert legal evidence from two lawyers who testified at trial regarding a specific issue of Pennsylvania law. The following briefly summarizes the issue of law and the testimony of these experts. The issue is significant for the analysis of the validity of the security for the USS Secured Claims.

The Issue

[121] The Revolver Loan Agreement contained an event of default in section 11c as follows: "Borrower consents to the appointment of a receiver, trustee or liquidator of all or substantially all of its assets, is unable to meet debts, or files bankruptcy". The same event of default was continued after each of the First Revolver Amendment, which removed the solvency representation, the Second Revolver Amendment and the Third Revolver Amendment.

[122] The expert testimony addressed the meaning of the phrase "unable to meet debts" as a matter of contractual interpretation under the laws of Pennsylvania. Both experts testified that the principles of contractual interpretation under Pennsylvania law are substantially similar to the principles under Ontario law with, based on USS' expert, a tendency toward somewhat greater emphasis on the strict construction of contracts.

[123] I would observe that, while the expert testimony was tendered in respect of this provision in the Revolver Loan Agreement, the same event of default appears in section 13(c) of the Term Loan Agreement which is governed by the laws of Alberta.

The McMichael Report

[124] USS introduced into evidence a report dated August 21, 2015 of Lawrence McMichael (the "McMichael Report"). It was Mr. McMichael's opinion that the phrase "unable to meet debts" connoted a balance sheet solvency test which, under Pennsylvania law, would be performed on a market value basis. Accordingly, Mr. McMichael was of the opinion that the contractual interpretation of clause 11c of the Revolver Loan Agreement resulted in an event of default in the circumstances in which the aggregate liabilities of USSC exceeded the fair market value of its assets.

The Di Massa Report

[125] The Province introduced into evidence a report dated September 4, 2014 of Rudolf Di Massa, Jr. (the "Di Massa Report"). It was Mr. Di Massa's opinion that the phrase "unable to meet debts" did not connote an insolvency test as such, whether on a balance sheet basis or on a going concern basis. Mr. Di Massa was of the view that the correct statutory interpretation of this phrase meant "unable to satisfy or manage its obligations relating to operating activities on an on-going basis given its financial resources from all available sources". He described this event of default as essentially a direction from USS to USSC to manage its financial obligations by obtaining credit from all available sources, including from trade creditors through an extension of payment terms and from USS itself by drawing up to the maximum availability under the Revolver Loan Agreement.

[126] An important feature of Mr. Di Massa's interpretation is his view of the operation of the Revolver Loan Agreement, which is significant in three respects. Mr. Di Massa's opinion implies that an event of default would not arise unless and until USSC had drawn the maximum availability under the Revolver Loan Agreement and was unable to foresee obtaining credit from any other possible sources on a prospective basis. It also implies that, under the Revolver Loan Agreement, USS was obligated to continue to advance funds until such maximum availability was reached, subject to the occurrence of one of the other events of default in the Agreement.

Lastly, as the phrase "unable to meet debts" is the only event of default that appears to address the state of insolvency, and, as Mr. Di Massa is of the view that this phrase does not serve as an insolvency event of default, his interpretation has the result that the Revolver Loan Agreement lacks an express insolvency event of default.

The Findings of the Court

[127] The Court finds that, under the laws of Pennsylvania, the words "unable to meet debts" in the Revolver Loan Agreement mean that the fair market value of the assets of USSC are less than the total of its liabilities, that is, that the words connote a balance sheet solvency test. I reach this conclusion for the following four reasons.

[128] First, this interpretation is more consistent with the plain meaning of the words "unable to meet debts" than the interpretation proposed by Mr. Di Massa. In particular, it recognizes the absence of the additional words "when due", or words to a similar effect. Such words appear in the events of default in sections 11a and 11b of the Revolver Loan Agreement. If they had been incorporated into the "unable to meet debts" event of default, I think it is clear that they would have indicated an intention to apply an event of default in the event of an inability to meet USSC's obligations as they fell due, i.e. a going concern event of default. Their absence indicates an intention that the event of default would relate to the alternative definition of insolvency under the laws of Pennsylvania, being the extent of assets relative to liabilities. For this reason, while it is true that the parties could have used more specific language if they had intended a balance sheet insolvency event of default, instead of the rather archaic phrase that appears, I do not think that such words connote a going concern event of default or the approach proposed in the Di Massa Report.

[129] Second, as a related matter, the interpretation proposed in the Di Massa Report requires reading in language that is neither present nor customary. Such an interpretation should be rejected in favour of an interpretation that gives effect to the plain meaning of the language of the event of default.

[130] Third, even assuming an ambiguity in the language of the event of default, the Di Massa Report relies heavily on an inference based on the removal of the solvency representation from the Revolver Loan agreement by the First Revolver Agreement. The solvency representation spoke to both balance sheet solvency and solvency on a going concern basis. It is suggested that it would have been illogical for USS and USSC to have removed the solvency representation and maintained a balance sheet event of default. It is also suggested that interpretation of the event of default as a balance sheet solvency event of default would have resulted in a continuing state of default under the Revolver Loan Agreement, with automatic acceleration of the Revolver Loan, which could not have been intended.

[131] As discussed later in these Reasons, I do not think that any conclusion can be drawn regarding the intention of the parties in respect of the removal of the solvency representation. In particular, I do not think that there is any evidence regarding the surrounding circumstances in which the First Revolver Amendment was negotiated and executed that bears on the interpretation of the event of default.

[132] Fourth, an important principle of contractual interpretation is that, in the case of ambiguity, a court should prefer the more commercially reasonable interpretation. In my view, for the following reasons, the interpretation proposed by Mr. Di Massa results in an unreasonable result from a commercial perspective.

[133] In this case, while the interpretation in the McMichael Report may have had the result that USSC was in default as of the execution of the Third Revolver Amendment, if not before, I do not see a particular difficulty in this. Unlike a third-party lender, there is no evidence that USS had a particular concern with the occurrence of a balance sheet event of default under the Revolver Loan. It could always choose to waive any event of default and advance further funds notwithstanding the occurrence of an event of default. In this respect, the evidence of Mr. Di Massa that a commercial lender would not engage in such behaviour is not a relevant consideration.

[134] On the other hand, USS would have had a significant concern with any renunciation of its ability to control the extent, if any, of future advances of funds. As Mr. McMichael testified, lenders, including parents of wholly-owned subsidiaries, do not intend to be bound to lend money that they do not believe will be repaid. This is particularly important with respect to the operation of the Revolver Loan Agreement in October 2013 given the amount of the undrawn facility — being approximately U.S. $383 million — and the cash burn of USSC in 2013, including the anticipated cash burn for the rest of the year. In addition, USS would not have intended the availability under the Revolver Loan to extend beyond what was absolutely necessary, having just completed a significant de-leveraging exercise for other reasons.

[135] Further, as noted above, the interpretation in the Di Massa Report has the result that there is no balance sheet event of default in the Revolver Loan Agreement. As a parent corporation controls the advance of funds to a subsidiary, and thereby its ability to meets its obligations on an on-going basis, a parent corporation would not necessarily need an event of default for a failure to meet on-going obligations. It would, however, require a balance sheet event of default for protection against third parties in the event of an insolvency of its subsidiary.

[136] Given the foregoing considerations, I consider that the interpretation proposed by Mr. Di Massa produces a commercial unreasonable result while the interpretation of Mr. McMichael results in a commercially viable loan arrangement.

The Debt Re-Characterization Claims

[137] I propose to address the debt re-characterization claims of the Objecting Parties in the following order. First, I will deal with two threshold issues. Next, I will address the test to be applied by the Court in the analysis of the characterization of both the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan. I will then address the debt characterization claims of the Objecting Parties in two parts. The first part addresses certain general considerations raised by the Objecting Parties that are common to both the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan. The second part sets out my analysis of each of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan in turn in light of the Court's determinations regarding these general considerations.

Threshold Issues

[138] The two threshold questions to be addressed are: (1) the onus of proof; and (2) the test to be applied in the evaluation of the debt re-characterization claims respecting the USS Debt Claims. I will address each issue in turn.

The Onus of Proof

[139] As would be expected, USS argues that the burden of proof lies with the Objecting Parties and the Objecting Parties argue that it lies with USS. I will deal separately with the burden of proof pertaining to the debt re-characterization claims of the Objecting Parties and the claims that the security for the USS Secured Claims is invalid or otherwise unenforceable.

[140] The issue of the burden of proof in respect of the debt re-characterization claims appears to be a matter of first impression as the parties have been unable to find any case law on this issue. I conclude that the Objecting Parties have the burden of proof that the USS Debt Claims are properly characterized as "equity claims" under the CCAA for the following three reasons.

[141] First, in a claims process under the CCAA, a creditor bears the onus of proving the validity and amount of its debt claim. It is not required to go further and prove the negative. In other words, it does not have to demonstrate that a claim is not an "equity claim". If another creditor chooses to assert such an argument, I think it must bear the onus of proving that an otherwise proven debt claim is more properly characterized in substance as an "equity claim".

[142] Second, put in procedural terms, the motion of the creditor, in this case USS, is limited to a determination of the validity and amount of its debt claim in order to establish a "Proven Claim" under the Claims Process Order. The objection of any other creditor, in this case the Objecting Parties, is in substance a cross-motion for a declaration that the debt claim, if accepted, constitutes in substance an "equity claim" for the purposes of the CCAA. I do not agree with the Objecting Parties that the motion of the objecting creditor should be regarded as the substantive equivalent of a statement of defence which must be addressed to establish the validity and amount of a moving party's debt claim.

[143] Lastly, an important consideration is that the debt re-characterization claims of the Objecting Parties are based on the underlying substantive reality of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan. These are factual matters, rather than matters based on allegations of inequitable behavior on the part of USS. I accept that there may be an argument for a reversal of the onus of proof in the circumstances of a bona fide allegation of bad faith or inequitable conduct on the part of an insider or a controlling shareholder of a debtor company that could engage an equitable remedy in favour of the injured party or an analogous statutory remedy. However, as mentioned, that is not the basis of the claims of the Objecting Parties on this motion.

[144] The Objecting Parties' argument that the security for the USS Secured Claims is invalid or, in the alternative, unenforceable raises two issues, although I conclude that the Objecting Parties bear the onus of proof in either case.

[145] With respect to the claim that the October Security Agreement and the November Security Agreement are unenforceable for lack of consideration, I think the same principles govern the issue of onus as apply with respect to the issue of onus regarding the treatment of the USS Debt Claims as "equity claims". A creditor asserting a Secured Claim must move for a determination that the security is valid. To such end, the creditor must establish that the security was delivered by the debtor company, that the security is expressed to cover the creditor's claim, and that any necessary registrations were effected under applicable legislation. An objection of any other creditor that such security is invalid or otherwise unenforceable on any other basis would involve a cross-motion by such objecting creditor seeking a declaration to such effect.

[146] With respect to the claim that the October Security Agreement and the November Security Agreement constitute fraudulent preferences for purposes of section 95 of the BIA, the Objecting Parties acknowledge that the case law establishes that they bear the onus of proof.

The Test to Be Applied

[147] The more difficult threshold issue is identification of the test to be applied to determine whether the USS Debt Claims are debt obligations or "equity claims".

[148] The Term Loan and the Revolver Loan are, on their own terms, loans rather than equity contributions. The terms and conditions of the Term Loan Agreement and the Revolver Loan Agreement unequivocally evidence loan agreements. The Term Loan and Revolver Loan are both documented as loans in contracts entitled "Loan Agreement" in which the parties are described as lender and borrower. Each loan agreement prescribes a term and an interest rate, requires repayment, and has no terms expressly tying any payments to the financial performance of USSC. USS and USSC also had very different processes for approval and transmission of loan advances and equity contributions. The financial accounts of Canada LP or Credit Corp, as applicable, and USSC accurately recorded the loan advances separately from equity contributions.

[149] The form of the documentation for the Loans, and the foregoing actions, are the point of departure. USS says it intended the outstanding advances under the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan to be loans rather than capital contributions. Accordingly, USS says that the USS Debt Claims are in respect of loans and are not "equity claims". The issue for the Court on this motion is, therefore, whether the foregoing actions and documentation are determinative. USS argues that there is no further issue for the Court for two alternative reasons based, respectively, in the language of the CCAA and in the pre-2009 Canadian case law. I will address these two arguments in turn.

The Provisions of the CCAA

[150] USS argues that the most recent amendments to the CCAA, which introduced the definition of "equity claims", comprehensively codified the treatment of "equity claims" with the result that the issue of whether a particular claim is to be treated as debt or equity is solely a matter of statutory interpretation. It relies on Re Sino-Forest Corp., 2012 ONCA 816, 114 O.R. (3d) 304, at paras. 30 and 36, for this proposition.

[151] In the circumstances of this case, USS argues that the USS Debt Claims are not claims in respect of a share of USSC, or a warrant or option or another right to acquire a share of USSC. It submits that, accordingly, the USS Debt Claims are not claims in respect of an "equity interest" and, therefore, are not "equity claims". USS says that, as a result, the USS Debt Claims are claims in respect of loans.

[152] I agree that the issue of whether a particular claim is to be treated as debt or equity is a matter of statutory interpretation. I also agree that the USS Debt Claims do not fall within paragraph (d) of the definition of "equity claim" which refers to "a monetary loss resulting from the ownership, purchase or sale of an equity interest". This provision addresses the circumstances of shareholders pursuing securities misrepresentation or oppression actions against a debtor company. It prevents recovery of claims by such shareholders for the value paid for their shares prior to the satisfaction of claims of debt-holders of the debtor company: see Re Sino-Forest Corp., 2012 ONSC 4377 (Commercial List), at paras. 71, 80, 96, aff'd 2012 ONCA 816, 114 O.R. (3d) 304.

[153] However, I do not read the definitions of "equity claim" and "equity interest" as narrowly as USS. The USS argument relies implicitly on the need for the demonstration of the issuance of shares as a requirement of an "equity claim". In doing so, USS ignores the reality of a sole shareholder situation and reaches an unreasonable conclusion.

[154] In the circumstances of a sole shareholder, there is no practical difference for present purposes between a shareholding of a single share and a shareholding of multiple shares. Accordingly, for the purposes of the definition of an "equity claim", there should be no difference between a payment to a debtor company on account of the issuance of new shares and a payment to a debtor company by way of a contribution to capital in respect of the existing shares.

[155] On this basis, I conclude that, as a matter of statutory interpretation, the definition of an "equity claim" must extend to a contribution to capital by a sole shareholder unaccompanied by a further issue of shares. Put another way, I conclude that a payment by a sole shareholder of a debtor company on account of a capital contribution constitutes a payment in respect of a share of the debtor company. Such a payment would therefore constitute an "equity interest" and a claim in respect of such payment in a CCAA proceeding would be a claim for a return of such capital and therefore an "equity claim".

[156] Further, I conclude that there is no reason why the reference to "a return of capital" in paragraph (b) of the definition of "equity claim" should be limited a claim in respect of an express contribution to capital by a shareholder. A transaction can be a contribution to capital in substance even if it expressed to be otherwise.

[157] Accordingly, I conclude that the issue for the Court in this proceeding is whether the USS Debt Claims constitute claims for a return of capital in respect of the shares in USSC owned by USS. In order to decide that issue, the Court must decide whether the advances made under the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan constituted loans to USSC or contributions to the capital of USSC in respect of the outstanding shares of USSC owned by USS. To the extent any of such advances constituted a contribution to capital, any claim for such amounts as Proven Claims in these CCAA proceedings would constitute a claim for a return of capital and, therefore, an "equity claim".

Pre-2009 Canadian Case Law

[158] USS makes an alternative submission in the event the Court finds that the definition of "equity claim" does not preclude a determination of whether the USS Debt Claims are be treated as debt or equity. USS says that the applicable Canadian case law regarding debt re-characterization issues, which pre-dates the recent amendments to the CCAA, requires that a court have regard solely to the intention of the parties as a matter of the contractual interpretation of the relevant documentation in determining whether any transaction gave rise to an "equity interest".

[159] In this case, as mentioned above, USS says that the relevant documentation consists of the Term Loan Agreement, the Revolver Loan Agreement and the documentation pertaining to the advances and payments thereunder. USS submits that the intention of both parties at the time of execution of the Term Loan Agreement and the Revolver Loan Agreement, and at the time of all advances thereunder, is manifest on the face of such documents. It submits that, as a matter of contractual interpretation, it is clear that USS and USSC intended that such transactions would constitute debt obligations of USSC rather than capital contributions by USS to USSC. USS says that Canadian case law provides no basis for going beyond the exercise of contractual interpretation to evaluate whether the USS Debt Claims should be characterized as "equity claims" on some other basis.

[160] In making this argument, USS relies, in particular, on the decision of the Supreme Court in Canada Deposit Insurance Corp. v. Canadian Commercial Bank, [1992] 3 S.C.R. 558. In that decision, the issue was whether certain monies provided to the Canadian Commercial Bank (the "CCB") had been provided by way of a loan or a capital investment. At paragraph 51, the Court approached the issue before it as a matter of contractual interpretation as follows:

> As in any case involving contractual interpretation, the characterization issue facing this Court must be decided by determining the intention of the parties to the support agreements. This task, perplexing as it sometimes proves to be, depends primarily on the meaning of the words chosen by the parties to reflect their intention. When the words alone are insufficient to reach a conclusion as to the true nature of the agreement, or when outside support for a particular characterization is required, a consideration of admissible surrounding circumstances may be appropriate.

[161] The Supreme Court concluded that the transaction in that case was a loan, noting that: (1) there was nothing in the express terms of the agreements in question which supported a conclusion that the money was advanced as an investment; and (2) there were express provisions supporting a characterization of the advance as a loan, including provisions for repayment, for an indemnity should full repayment not be made from the sources contemplated, and for equal ranking with the ordinary creditors of CCB: see Canada Commercial Bank, supra at para. 63.

[162] In (Re) Bul River Mineral Corporation, 2014 BCSC 1732, 16 C.B.R. (6th) 173, Fitzpatrick J. summarized the principles in Canadian Commercial Bank in the following manner, which I find helpful in the present case:

> (a) the fact that a transaction contains both debt and equity features does not, in itself, determine its characterization as either debt or equity;
>
> (b) the characterization of a transaction under review requires the determination of the intention of the parties;
>
> (c) it does not follow that each and every aspect of a "hybrid" debt and equity transaction must be given the exact same weight when addressing a characterization issue; and
> (d) a court should not too easily be distracted by aspects of a transaction which are, in reality, only incidental or secondary in nature to the main thrust of the agreement.

This summary demonstrates that the issue before the court in Canadian Commercial Bank was the characterization of an instrument that had characteristics of both debt and equity.

[163] I do not find the decision of Canadian Commercial Bank helpful in the present circumstances for the reason that the present circumstances differ in two important respects.

[164] First, the subject-matter in Canadian Commercial Bank was, as mentioned, a hybrid security, i.e., a security having characteristics of both debt and equity. Therefore the issue was whether the security in question should be characterized as a debt obligation or a capital investment. The present proceeding does not involve a hybrid security. As mentioned above, the relevant documentation unequivocally evidences loan transactions on their face.

[165] Second, the parties to the transaction in Canadian Commercial Bank were at arm's length and the transaction documentation represented the outcome of arm's length negotiations between the parties. The parties to the Term Loan Agreement and the Revolver Loan Agreement were not at arm's length. As a result, the form of the documentation, including the characterization of the transaction as debt rather than equity, was determined by USS in its sole discretion, subject only to satisfaction of any applicable Canadian legal considerations raised by USSC.

[166] In such circumstances, the task of a court is qualitatively different from that in Canadian Commercial Bank. In that decision, given the hybrid nature of the security under consideration, the issue was whether the parties intended that the institutions providing financial support to the CCB were making a capital investment in the bank or were making a loan to it. In other words, the intentions of the parties were unclear without a contractual analysis to determine the substance of the transaction that had been agreed upon. At the same time, given the arm's length relationship between the parties, the language of the agreements could be relied upon as an accurate reflection of the intentions of the parties regarding the substantive reality of the transaction.

[167] Where, however, as in the present circumstances, the parties are not at arm's length, the issue is not what the parties say they intended regarding the substance of the transaction as a matter of contractual interpretation. The expressed intention of the parties is clear. However, given the absence of any arm's length relationship, there can be no certainty that the language of the agreements reflects the underlying substantive reality of the transaction. Accordingly, the issue for a court is whether, as actually implemented, the substance of the transaction is, in fact, different from what the parties expressed it be in the transaction documentation.

[168] In other words, the task of a court is to determine whether the transaction in substance constituted a contribution to capital notwithstanding the expressed intentions of the parties that the transaction be treated as a loan. It is therefore not appropriate to limit the inquiry into the intentions of the parties to a review of the form of the transaction documentation. Such an exercise reduces to a "rubber stamping" of the determination of a single party to the transaction, i.e., the sole shareholder, and it does not address the substance of the transaction as it was actually implemented. In such circumstances, the determination of whether a particular claim is to be treated as debt or equity must address not just the expressed intentions of the parties as reflected in the transaction documentation but also the manner in which the transaction was implemented and the economic reality of the surrounding circumstances.

[169] USS also refers to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Metropolitan Toronto Police Widows and Orphans Fund v. Telus Communications Inc., [2005] O.J. No. 2309 (C.A.), leave to appeal to S.C.C. denied, [2005] S.C.C.A. No. 379, at paras. 38-40. In these paragraphs, the Court of Appeal stated that: (1) the determination of the legal character of a transaction is not a simple mechanical exercise of assessing and tallying up a list of factors and then deciding whether they net out to one or the other; and (2) that a court must give legal effect to the intention of the parties as expressed in the language of an agreement. In that case, the Court of Appeal also recognized that the respective needs of the parties to an agreement are an indication of their intention and that parties are entitled to structure their contractual relationships as they see fit, absent a sham or public policy considerations dictating otherwise.

[170] I do not find this decision to be helpful in the present circumstances for the same reasons as the decision in Canadian Commercial Bank does not address the issues in the present proceeding. Metropolitan Toronto Police Widows and Orphans Fund involved the characterization of a securitization transaction as either a sale or a loan. In that context, the issue before the Court of Appeal was a matter of contractual interpretation. The transaction was an arm's length commercial transaction. Accordingly, the documentation before the court in that case could be relied upon to accurately reflect the intentions of the parties regarding the underlying economic reality of the transaction. I do agree, however, with the statement of the Court of Appeal in that decision that determination of the substantive nature of a transaction is not conducted by means of a simple "scorecard" of factors.

[171] I would observe, however, that in large measure the difference between the parties in this proceeding – which appears to reduce to the significance to be attached to the manner in which the Loans were administered – is perhaps more semantic than real. The Objecting Parties proposed, and USS accepted, that a useful summary of the appropriate approach to be taken in the present proceeding was set out in a non-binding, American decision, In re Fedders North America, Inc., 405 B.R. 527 (2009), U.S. Bankruptcy Court, D. Delaware, at para. 59, as follows:

> The law regarding recharacterization is well-settled in this jurisdiction. The Third Circuit has held that the overarching inquiry with respect to recharacterizing debt > as equity is whether the parties to the transaction in question intended the loan to be a disguised equity contribution. In re SubMicron Systems Corp., 432 F.3d 448, 455-56 (3d Cir.2006). This intent may be inferred from what the parties say in a contract, from what they do through their actions, and from the economic reality of the surrounding circumstances. Id. at 456. Recharacterization has nothing to do with inequitable conduct, however. See In re AutoStyle Plastics, Inc., 269 F.3d 726 at 748-49 (6th Cir. 2001) (discussing the differences between equitable subordination and recharacterization)

[172] On this basis, the parties do not dispute the process so much as the result. They have fundamentally different views on the intentions of USS and USSC regarding the substance of the transaction which I think can be summarized as follows.

[173] The Objecting Parties say that the Term Loan Agreement and the Revolving Loan Agreement reflect arrangements under which USS intended, at all times, on the one hand, to return excess cash to USS when it became available, and, on the other hand, to write off the principal or interest to the extent that payments of either were due and sufficient cash was not available.

[174] USS acknowledges that the Term Loan and subsequently the Revolver Loan were established with the intention of constituting the principal vehicles by which cash would be advanced to USSC, initially for the purposes of the Acquisition and subsequently for working capital purposes, and by which excess cash in USSC from any source would be repatriated to USS. USS says, however, that, at all times, it extended advances and made payments under the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan in accordance with their terms. USS argues that nothing in the manner in which it established or operated the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan reflected, in substance, a contribution to the capital of USSC, and that the only contributions to capital were made outside the loan arrangements in the form of the equity injections set out in Exhibit "O" to the Monitor's Seventh Report.

[175] These two competing views of the substance of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan frame the debt re-characterization issues addressed in these Reasons.

The American Multi-Factor Analysis

[176] Given these competing views of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan, it is necessary to determine an appropriate test for the determination of whether the USS Debt Claims are in substance claims in respect of loans or are "equity claims". The Objecting Parties urge the Court to adopt the multi-factor analysis prevailing in American courts under which courts evaluate a long list of factors drawing conclusions about what factors are most determinative in any given fact scenario.

[177] As referenced above, a leading case in this area is In re AutoStyle Plastics, Inc., 269 F.3d at 749-50 (6th Cir., 2001), in which the court articulated the following eleven factors:

> (1) the names given to the instruments, if any, evidencing the indebtedness; (2) the presence or absence of a fixed maturity date and schedule of payments; (3) the presence or absence of a fixed rate of interest and interest payments; (4) the > source of repayments; (5) the adequacy or inadequacy of capitalization; (6) the identity of interest between the creditor and the stockholder; (7) the security, if any, for the advances; (8) the corporation's ability to obtain financing from outside lending institutions; (9) the extent to which the advances were subordinated to the claims of outside creditors; (10) the extent to which the advances were used to acquire capital assets; and (11) the presence or absence of a sinking fund to provide repayments.

In addition, courts in other American circuits have considered the following additional factors: (1) the right to enforce payment of principal and interest; (2) participation in management flowing as a result; (3) the failure of the debtor to repay on the due date or to seek a repayment postponement; and (4) the intent of the parties: see In re Submicron Systems Corporation, 432 F.3d (3rd Cir., 2006), at 455-456. In the interest of simplicity, in these Reasons I refer to the fifteen factors enumerated in this paragraph as the "AutoStyle factors", although I acknowledge this is technically inaccurate.

[178] The Objecting Parties refer to the following description of the multi-factor analysis from In re Submicron Systems Corporation, at 455-456, which appears to restate the approach set out above in Re Fedders:

> In defining the re-characterization inquiry, courts have adopted a variety of multi-factor tests borrowed from non-bankruptcy case law. While these tests undoubtedly include pertinent factors, they devolve to an overarching inquiry: the characterization as debt or equity is a court's attempt to discern whether the parties called an instrument one thing when in fact they intended it as something else. That intent may be inferred from what the parties say in their contracts, from what they do through their actions, and from the economic reality of the surrounding circumstances. Answers lie in facts that confer context case-by-case.

[179] There does not appear to be any reported Canadian or Commonwealth cases in which courts have purported to apply the multi-factor, re-characterization tests relied upon by the Objecting Parties prevailing in American courts. The Objecting Parties urge the Court to formally adopt the foregoing eleven or fifteen factors in making a determination in this proceeding.

[180] American courts find authority for this approach in the general equitable powers granted to a bankruptcy court under the provisions of section 105(a) of the United States Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C 1982, which is the equivalent of section 11 of the CCAA. USS says the Court lacks similar authority under the CCAA on the basis that the recent amendments to the CCAA in this area have limited the scope of a court's authority under section 11. USS relies on the earlier decision of the Court in U.S. Steel Canada Inc. (Re), 2015 ONSC 5103, at para. 51, as follows:

> … I consider that the language of the definition of an 'Equity Claim" and of the provisions of section 36.1 operates as a "restriction set out in the Act" for the purposes of section 11 of the CCAA which has the effect of limiting the authority of the Court in any determination regarding an "Equity Claim" or in any proceedings brought under section 36.1.

However, that decision does not address the extent of the Court's authority under the CCAA in the evaluation of whether a security or a transaction expressed to be a debt claim is, in substance, an "equity interest". At a minimum, any such evaluation requires consideration of a number of the factors considered by American courts in the multi-factor analysis and by Canadian courts in evaluating the underlying substance of a transaction.

[181] The more immediate, and more important, issue for the Court is a framework for identification of the specific considerations or factors to be applied in the context of the present proceeding. The American cases evidence the obvious reality that, in any given situation, different factors or considerations will be more or less persuasive. Insofar as the American cases suggest a "scorecard" approach, however, I have rejected such an approach in favour of an evaluation of the substantive reality of the USS Debt Claims. In the end, in this proceeding, the AutoStyle factors constituted no more than the starting point, in the form of a list of factors upon which the parties drew to support their characterization of the USS Debt Claims. In short, it is not necessary to adopt the American, multi-factor analysis as a formal matter in the determination of the issues before the Court, and I therefore decline to do so.

The Approach of the Court

[182] As a first step in the identification of the specific considerations that should inform the determination of the substance of the USS Debt Claims, I propose to start with a conceptual understanding of the dividing line between debt and equity.

[183] An appropriate starting point is the definition of debt and equity for financial purposes set out in paragraphs 32 and 34 of the Finnerty Report:

> At its heart, the difference between equity and debt lies in the fundamental nature of their respective claims on the assets and cash flow of the company. Debt involves borrowing funds subject to a legal commitment to repay the borrowed money with interest at an agreed rate by a stated maturity date. This commitment is embodied in a contract, and this contract is implemented by the borrower. Lenders receive a contractually agreed set of cash flows, typically through periodic interest payments and one or more principal repayments, the last of which occur on the maturity date. … In contrast to debt, an equity claim entitles the holder to a share of the company's profits and residual cash flows after the company has made all the contractually required debt service payments. That is, the debt ranks senior to the equity with respect to the company's cash flows. Similarly, the debt ranks senior to the equity in the event the company must be liquidated and its assets sold to repay its debt obligations. The equityholders get what is left after the holders of the debt have been paid in full; if the debtholders can't get paid in full, then the equityholders get nothing.

[184] With this definition in mind, the Province suggests that the Court should address the substance of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan from the perspective of whether the evidence is more consistent with an intention and a practice of repayment of principal plus interest under these Loans, or the payment of the residual cash flow and assets of USSC. I think this is a helpful approach, even if at a general level.

[185] Therefore, in the context of a parent-subsidiary relationship, the fundamental consideration in assessing whether a transaction is a loan is whether a holder of the instrument expects at the outset to be repaid the principal amount of the loan with interest out of cash flows of the company. The definition above implies a belief on the part of a lender that its debtor has the financial capacity to generate cash flow sufficient to pay interest and repay principal over the term of the loan, regardless of the profitability of the debtor from time to time in the course of that term.

[186] This approach suggests that the issue of whether the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan should be characterized as debt or equity can best be addressed by considering two issues: (1) the expectation of USS regarding repayment of principal with interest of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan out of cash flows of USSC over the term of these Loans; and (2) the reasonableness of such expectation.

[187] The first of these questions addresses a subjective issue – the expectations of USS. Obviously, if, at the time of making advances under a Loan, USS had no expectation that USSC would honour any payment obligation under the Loan when due in the absence of available cash at such time and, for example, intended from the outset to waive all interest as it became payable and to forgive the principal indebtedness when it became due, the Court would disregard the form of the documentation as, in effect, a sham.

[188] The second question addresses a more objective issue assuming the existence of an expectation of repayment with interest of the Loan – the reasonableness of such expectation. This question engages, among other issues, the adequacy of capitalization of a wholly-owned subsidiary and the debt capacity of the subsidiary. If USSC were only nominally capitalized, this might be relatively easy to disprove. In this proceeding, as in most cases, however, this issue will involve, among other things, expert evidence regarding the availability of financing in capital markets generally.

[189] It is important for present purposes to note that, given that the burden of proof rests with the party asserting that a purported loan is, in substance, a capital contribution, the onus lies on the Objecting Parties, as the parties seeking to re-characterize the Loans as equity, to demonstrate that there was no reasonable basis for USS's expectations. There are good policy reasons for such a standard.

[190] Any determination of the reasonableness of a lender's expectations at the time of the making of a loan, or an advance under a loan, is prospective in nature and therefore highly speculative. It necessarily involves consideration of a borrower's financial capacity under a variety of possible future economic scenarios. A court should be cautious in reaching a conclusion that there was no reasonable expectation in the absence of a detailed consideration of such scenarios and compelling evidence that there was no basis for the lender's expectations under any of such scenarios. In addition, a determination that a lender acting in good faith nevertheless had no reasonable basis for believing that its subsidiary had the financial capacity to generate cash flow sufficient to pay interest and repay principal over the term of the loan will inevitably rely heavily on the opinion of financial experts. Any expert opinion on such an issue, however, is at least as much a matter of judgment as it is of fact, except perhaps in exceptional circumstances. Accordingly, a court must have a very high degree of confidence in any such expert financial evidence before it finds that a lender acting in good faith nevertheless had no reasonable basis for believing that its subsidiary had the financial capacity to generate cash flow sufficient to pay interest and repay principal over the term of the loan.

[191] Given the foregoing considerations, I conclude that, in order to find that the USS Debt Claims are "equity claims", the Court must be satisfied that either: (1) at the time of making an advance under the Term Loan or the Revolver Loan, USS did not believe that USSC would be able to repay such advance with interest out of USSC's cash flows over the term of the Term Loan or the Revolver Loan, as applicable; or (2) that, at the time of such advance, there was no reasonable basis on which USS could have expected USSC to generate cash flow sufficient to pay interest on, and repay the principal of, such advance over the term of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan, as the case may be.

[192] Three related principles are also important for the analysis of the character of the USS Debt Claims.

[193] First, while the Term Loan and later the Revolver Loan constituted a significant part of USS' investment in USSC, the Loans do not represent all of that investment. As described above, USS has also made a significant investment that has been expressly treated as equity. This distinction is important. In this proceeding, the issue is limited to the characterization of the debt component of that investment. Clearly, the return on the equity portion of USS' investment will be dependent on the residual cash flow from USSC after payment of trade creditors as well as repayment with interest of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan. However, the fact that these Loans form part of USS' total investment in USSC does not automatically mean that USS' expectation of repayment of these Loans is the same as its expectation of receiving a return on its equity investment.

[194] A parent corporation is able to divide its investment in an acquired corporation between debt and equity as it chooses. Such allocation of its investment is not determinative for the reasons discussed above. However, equally, such allocation must be respected unless it is demonstrated that the parent corporation did not have a reasonable expectation of repayment with interest of the portion of the investment which has been treated as debt when the loan was advanced. There is no basis in the CCAA for an automatic re-characterization into equity of a portion of an investment that has been structured as debt merely because the entire investment is, in a general sense, dependent for a return on the success of the investment. Put another way, a parent corporation can loan money to a wholly-owned subsidiary without that loan being treated automatically as part of the parent corporation's equity investment in the subsidiary.

[195] Second, the characterization of the USS Debt Claims must be analysed as of the date of the advances under each of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan. Subsequent behaviour of either or both of the parties to the Term Loan Agreement or the Revolver Loan Agreement may be relevant, but only to the extent that such behaviour illuminates the intentions of the parties regarding the Term Loan or the Revolver Loan as of the date of the advances thereunder. Behaviour subsequent to any advance cannot, on its own, justify a re-characterization of such advance.

[196] Third, the characterization of the advances under each of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan cannot be viewed in isolation from the economic circumstances in which the advances were made.

[197] In this respect, the economic backdrop to the advances under the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan during the period 2008 to 2013 can be summarized as follows. The advances under the Term Loan between October 31, 2007 and December 31, 2007 were made in the context of a buoyant steel market. Economic conditions changed dramatically in the autumn of 2008 after the collapse of Lehman Brothers and the onset of the financial crisis in that year. Worsening conditions prevailed throughout 2009 and into early 2010. Thereafter, in each of 2010, 2011 and 2012, USS and USSC experienced mini-cycles consisting of one or two encouraging quarters succeeded by a weak performance for the remainder of these years. In 2013, USS and USSC experienced a weak market throughout the year with the result that matters reached a critical stage. Under a new chief executive officer and a new chief financial officer, who assumed their offices effective September 1, 2013, USS commenced a review of its operations which revealed, among other difficulties, that while USSC represented 10% of USS' revenues, it contributed 50% of its operating losses.

General Considerations Regarding Determination of the Debt Re-characterization Issues

[198] Although the exercise of evaluation of the character of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan ultimately requires a consideration of each of the advances individually, the issue is best addressed initially on a collective basis. As the Objecting Parties suggested, consideration of the characterization of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan together recognizes, or perhaps more appropriately starts, from the position that the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan were used and administered by USS in the same manner and that the difference in their terms principally reflected tax and accounting considerations rather than any significant substantive difference in function. In this section, I propose to consider the probative value of the factors upon which the Objecting Parties principally rely as evidence that the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan were, in substance, equity contributions by USS to USSC.

[199] The Objecting Parties identified the following principal considerations or factors which, in their view, demonstrated that advances under the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan were equity contributions rather than loans for USSC: (1) the absence of any arm's length negotiation regarding the terms and conditions of the Loans; (2) the deferred interest payment dates and the long maturity dates of both the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan; (3) the history of interest payments and waivers under the Term Loan; (4) the absence of any security; (5) the extent of USS' control over the business, operations and financial performance of USSC; (6) the fact, as acknowledged by USS, that USSC would not have been able to obtain financing from a third-party bank or institutional lender in the amount and on the terms and conditions of either of the Term Loan or the Revolver Loan; and (7) their view that payments on account of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan were effectively subordinated to payment of trade creditors.

[200] The Objecting Parties argue that, collectively, these considerations establish that USS had no expectation of repayment with interest of the advances under the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan out of cash flow from USSC. They say these factors demonstrate that, in substance, the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan were financial instruments under which USS was intended to receive the residual cash flow and assets of USSC as, and to the extent, available without an expectation of repayment with interest of either Loan, and were therefore capital contributions.

[201] Significantly, the Objecting Parties argue that each of the foregoing factors has probative value when measured against the standard of behavior that would be expected of a third-party lender. As mentioned above, this position reflects the approach in the Finnerty Report. USS argues that such a standard is inappropriate and, accordingly, that the factors upon which the Objecting Parties rely are not indicative of "equity interests".

[202] I propose to assess the submissions of the Objecting Parties respecting these general considerations in the following order. First, I will address in greater detail my understanding of the purposes and the administration of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan. Then, I propose to address the issue of the significance of third-party lender behaviour in the context of a wholly-owned subsidiary relationship. Lastly, I will consider the probative value of the principal considerations relied upon by the Objecting Parties in light of the conclusions regarding the third-party lender standard.

The Purposes and Administration of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan and the Differing Perspectives of the Parties

[203] As mentioned, USS established the Term Loan, and subsequently the Revolver Loan, with the intention that they would be the principal vehicles by which cash flows could be moved between USS and USSC and, in particular, surplus cash in USSC could be repatriated to USS. Additional equity injections were also made from time to time by USS, but only to the extent that USSC required additional capital to stay onside the "thin capitalization" rules under the Income Tax Act and for the purposes of the "de-leveraging" exercise described above.

[204] The initial advances of the Term Loan were directed to ABULC for the purpose of the Acquisition. Subsequent advances prior to and including December 31, 2007 were used by USS to repay the Credit Corp Loan, repay USSC's liabilities to SHC and, in a lesser amount, for working capital purposes. The advances in 2009 totaling $211.2 million were also used for working capital purposes. A substantial portion of the interest under the Term Loan in 2008 was paid in that year, two years before its due date. Such interest was paid out of surplus cash on hand as a result of the strong financial performance of USSC in 2008 prior to the slowdown that began in the fourth quarter of that year.

[205] USS then established the Revolver Loan in 2010 as a more tax-efficient means of moving cash between USS and USSC after withholding tax was eliminated on interest payments from USSC to USS, permitting tax-free interest payments from USSC to Credit Corp, which was an American corporation. For that reason, the Revolver Loan was denominated in U.S. dollars. Prior to the "de-leveraging" exercise in 2013, the outstanding balance under the Revolver Loan slightly exceeded the maximum availability of U.S. $500 million. In 2013, payments of principal and interest totaling approximately U.S. $390 million, that were funded out of equity injections aggregating over U.S. $680 million, reduced the outstanding balance to the amount of the First Tranche Indebtedness.

[206] In order to maximize its flexibility for such cash management purposes, USS structured both the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan to provide for the most generous maturity dates and interest payment dates possible given constraints imposed by tax legislation. Further, both the Term Loan Agreement and the Revolver Loan Agreement contained minimal representations and warranties and very basic events of default. In addition, until the Second Revolver Amendment, both the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan were unsecured facilities. The Second Revolver Amendment in January 2013 provided for security on iron-ore pellets pursuant to the Security Agreement for the principal, if not the sole, purpose of maintaining the intended tax treatment for payments in respect of the Revolver Loan, given the interest waivers granted under the Term Loan in 2010, 2011 and 2012. As mentioned, with the arrival of a new chief financial officer effective as of September 1, 2013, USS began to evaluate its investment in USSC more closely. As of the end of October 2013, USS determined that it would only advance funds to USSC that it believed USSC would be able to repay. As a result, all subsequent advances were secured under the October Security Agreement and the November Security Agreement.

[207] There is, however, no suggestion that USS and USSC disregarded the debt character of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan in moving cash between USSC and USS. Accordingly, all advances under the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan were documented as such and were distinguished, both in terms of documentation and accounting, from equity injections. All interest payments on the Loans were similarly documented by both parties and treated accordingly for tax and accounting purposes. Principal payments were similarly documented by both parties. There is no evidence that the payments made in respect of the Term Loan or the Revolver Loan failed to satisfy the requirements under Canadian and American tax legislation for treatment as debt and, in particular, that any payments were deemed to be dividends.

[208] On the other hand, there is no doubt that the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan were provided by USS to USSC on terms and conditions that USSC could not have obtained from third party banks and other non-bank institutional providers of term financing and operating credit facilities. In particular, the payment provisions respecting interest and principal, and the absence of security, would not have been available to USSC.

[209] USS says that both the documentation and the manner of administration of the Loans reflect debt obligations. USS says that there is nothing in the cash management arrangements described above between a parent and a wholly-owned subsidiary that can justify re-characterization of the Loans as capital contributions for the purposes of the CCAA. In particular, USS argues that nothing in these financing arrangements suggests that it did not expect to receive repayment with interest of the funds advanced under the Loans. It also says that the fact that the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan were provided to USSC on terms that were not available to USSC from third parties is irrelevant.

[210] The Objecting Parties argue that USS established and administered the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan in the manner of, and using its rights as, a shareholder rather than a lender. They say that USS' actions are collectively more consistent with an intention to receive the residual cash flow and assets of USSC, as and when available, without any expectation of repayment with interest of the advances under the Loans. A more precise expression of their position is that the Term Loan Agreement and the Revolving Loan Agreement reflect arrangements under which USS intended at all times to return excess cash to USS when available and to write off the principal or interest in respect of the Loans to the extent that payments were due and sufficient cash was not available. I have excerpted below certain passages from the written submissions of the Union and the Province that I think capture the essential approach of these parties and which also assist in clarifying the positions of these parties.

The Relevance of the Third-Party Lender Standard

[211] Clearly, a significant fact in this proceeding is that, at all relevant times, ABULC and USSC, as applicable, were wholly-owned subsidiaries of USS. In addition, unlike many parent-subsidiary relationships in which the subsidiary carries on a business independently of the parent, USSC was very closely integrated into the business of USS. After the Acquisition, all management and operational functions previously conducted by Stelco were effectively centralized within USS. USSC became a part of the North American flat-rolled steel division of USS. This relationship is significant in two related respects.

[212] The Objecting Parties argue that the USS control of USSC is an important factor in assessing whether, in substance, the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan were debt instruments or contributions to capital. They say that USS had a significant ability to influence the profitability of USSC through such control. They say that such control is, in some way, an indication of an equity contribution. I will address this below in the next section.

[213] The issue of control is also significant for present purposes as a gateway to the related issue of the relevance of a third-party lender standard as a basis for evaluation of the terms and conditions, as well as the administration, of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan. As mentioned, USS provided financing to USSC that would not have been available to USSC from banks and other institutional lenders. The Objecting Parties place great weight on this factor as demonstrating that the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan were not real loan transactions, but rather were disguised equity contributions. Equally important, most, if not all, of the AutoStyle factors identified above upon which the Objecting Parties rely are informed, in whole, or in part, by a comparison of USS' actions against a standard of a typical third-party lender.

[214] The Objecting Parties suggest the Court should look to a third-party lender standard in two principal respects – in order to assess the terms and conditions of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan and in order to assess the actions of USS and USSC in the administration of these Loans including payments thereunder. As these are significant factors in the analysis proposed by the Objecting Parties, I propose to address these two issues in some detail.

[215] It is important to recognize at the outset that there is no necessary reason why a parent corporation would act in the same manner as a third-party lender in the provision of financing facilities to its wholly-owned subsidiary. In particular, the terms and conditions of lending arrangements between a wholly-owned subsidiary and its parent will, in many if not most cases, depart from typical lending arrangements between a third-party lender and a borrower.

[216] As a practical matter, compliance with tax regulations in order to ensure favourable tax treatment will be a significant, if not the main, driver regarding these matters. In this case, USS determined the relative amounts of loans and equity injections based principally on tax considerations to the USS group of companies considered as a whole. Generally, these considerations dictated maximization of debt to obtain interest deductibility under the United States Internal Revenue Code, 26 U.S.C., subject to compliance with the "thin capitalization" rules under the Income Tax Act, which established a maximum debt/equity structure.

[217] In addition, in a wholly-owned subsidiary relationship, there is no need for extensive documentation, nor is there a need for the types of contractual protections typically found in commercial loan agreements. Given the parent's ability to control the subsidiary's actions as its sole shareholder, there is also no need for a strict schedule of repayment of principal. Further, there is no reason why a parent corporation would enforce any rights of default that may arise in the course of a loan so long as the parent corporation believes that the subsidiary has value. Such rights are asserted only as required to protect the parent corporation in the event that a third party asserts its rights as a creditor against the subsidiary or to terminate the parent corporation's support of the subsidiary. Similarly, it is not realistic to expect that a wholly-owned subsidiary will conduct its affairs pursuant to a corporate governance structure that includes independent directors until such time as the interests of the parent corporation and the subsidiary diverge.

[218] There is nothing improper in any of the foregoing arrangements. To be clear, the Objecting Parties do not suggest that there is. They submit that a parent corporation can choose to structure its arrangements however it chooses for tax and other purposes. However, they say that such arrangements should not govern the determination of whether such loans give rise to "equity claims" for the purposes of the CCAA. On their approach, the determination of the treatment of such claims under the CCAA should be made on the basis of a different test than that which satisfied tax and other regulatory rules and regulations prior to an insolvency.

[219] The dispute between the parties, and a principal issue on this motion, is therefore whether there are any consequences, in the context of CCAA proceedings, to a parent corporation that has structured its investment in a wholly-owned subsidiary in the manner of the Loans, that is, in a manner that complies with all applicable tax and other regulations but is not consistent with how a third-party lender would have structured any loan facilities in favour of USSC and how any such lender would have acted in the circumstances of USSC's subsequent financial performance.

[220] A comparison of the relationship between USS and USSC against a notional relationship between USSC and a third-party lender provides a helpful clarification of certain factors that are relevant for present purposes, as is discussed below. However, I find that a comparison between the behavior of USS and the behavior of a notional third-party lender is not an appropriate test in the evaluation of whether the advances under the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan were capital contributions to USSC. I reach this conclusion for the following reasons.

[221] First, the Loans were structured, and excess cash was moved between USSC and USS, in the manner described above for legitimate business reasons and in accordance with all applicable legal requirements. There is no express authority in the CCAA for disregarding these arrangements in such an evaluation apart from the very general language in the definition of "equity claim" referring to a return of capital. In particular, there is no express authority for disregarding the business purpose of financing arrangements in the evaluation of whether loan instruments are, in substance, "equity interests" giving rise to "equity claims".

[222] Second, the Objecting Parties assert that the USS Debt Claims constitute claims for a return of capital. In the absence of any statutory definition of capital, or guidance regarding the determination of capital, for the purposes of the definition of an "equity claim", considerable weight should be given to the accounting and tax determination of capital of the debtor company in any CCAA proceedings. In this case, there is no suggestion that the Term Loan or the Revolver Loan were treated as capital for such purposes.

[223] Third, the Objecting Parties submit, as an operating principle, that the less the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan resembled financing available from a third-party lender, and the less the actions of USS in the administration of the Loans resembled those that would have been expected of a third-party lender, the more the advances under the Loans resemble equity contributions. I do not accept this principle for the reason that I do not see a necessary connection between a failure to adhere to the third-party lender standard and an absence of an expectation of repayment with interest of a loan in the circumstances where the departure from the third-party lender standard reflects a valid business purpose.

[224] I accept that there may be circumstances where the departure from a third-party lender standard may not serve any valid business purpose related to a parent-subsidiary relationship. In such circumstances, it may well be that such actions would suggest an equity contribution, that is, that the only explanation for the parent corporation's actions is that the loan transaction was in fact a capital contribution. However, that is not the case in the present circumstances. As mentioned above, the interest payment terms, the maturity dates of the Loans and the absence of a schedule for principal repayments provided USS and USSC with a certain amount of flexibility to align the payment of interest and the repayment of principal with the economic performance of USSC against the backdrop of a highly cyclical industry. In particular, it provided USSC with the ability to defer payments of interest and principal for a period of time in the event of adverse economic performance without triggering default provisions or a reversal of income expense for tax purposes.

[225] Fourth, as a related matter, the third-party lender standard ignores the very real business purposes that a parent corporation could have for departing from a third-party lender standard in the administration of financing established in favour of a wholly-owned subsidiary.

[226] The Objecting Parties submit that the less a parent corporation acts to enforce its rights in an insolvent situation in the manner that would be expected of a third-party lender, the more it demonstrates that the financing arrangements between the parent corporation and the subsidiary are in fact equity contributions rather than loans. This submission ignores the reality that a parent corporation which believes that there is value remaining in a subsidiary, even if the subsidiary is technically insolvent, will not act to enforce its security in the manner that would be expected of a third-party lender whose objective is necessarily limited to maximizing the prospects for the immediate recovery of its principal and interest. Nor would a parent corporation seek to negotiate some further benefit such as fees or additional equity in such circumstances. The subsidiary has no additional benefit to give when the parent already owns 100% of the benefit of its enterprise. Given such considerations, the actions of a parent corporation in departing from a third-party lender standard do not evidence the absence of an expectation of repayment with interest of a loan to its subsidiary when the loan was made. Moreover, in this respect, the position of the Objecting Parties contradicts the purposes of the CCAA, which should encourage efforts that seek to continue the operations of a distressed subsidiary.

[227] Fifth, more generally, the premise underlying the position of the Objecting Parties, as is demonstrated by the foregoing discussion, is that a parent corporation is acting as a shareholder to the extent that it fails to act in a manner that would be expected of a third-party lender. They express this argument by saying that, to the extent a parent corporation is not looking at a loan to its subsidiary through the lens of a third-party lender, it must be looking at the loan from the perspective of a shareholder and, as such, in reality, the loan must be equity. In short, a parent corporation cannot wear two hats at the same time.

[228] I do not think this is correct. A parent corporation lending to its wholly-owned subsidiary can have regard to the existence of its rights as a shareholder in structuring and administering a loan to its subsidiary without ceasing to be a lender. The issue to be considered is whether the actions of the parent corporation demonstrate that it had no expectation of repayment with interest of the loan. There is no necessary connection between a parent corporation lending to a subsidiary on a basis that departs from a third-party lender standard and the absence of such an expectation.

[229] Sixth, there is also a significant issue with the definition of a third-party lender proposed as the standard by the Objecting Parties. The Objecting Parties propose the standard of a bank or an institutional lender providing unsecured term or operating facilities on the basis of their expert financial evidence regarding an appropriate proxy for the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan. This is an unduly restrictive standard given the purpose of the test for an "equity claim", which is to assist in determining whether USS had a reasonable expectation of repayment with interest at the time it extended advances under the Term Loan and the Revolver Loans. While the willingness of a third-party to lend on the terms provided by a parent corporation could support such a conclusion, the absence of third-party lender financing is not sufficient to establish that no other financing would have been available to the subsidiary on a viable basis. Where a party seeks to disprove the alleged reasonableness of an expectation of repayment of a loan with interest, or the absence of any debt capacity of a borrower, it is necessary to canvas the availability of viable financing across capital markets more broadly.

[230] Lastly, the Objecting Parties acknowledge that the standard that they propose would apply solely for purposes of proceedings under the CCAA and, perhaps, the BIA. There are three difficulties with this result.

[231] First, as mentioned, a court should give considerable weight to the characterization of payments to the extent that third parties, such as the Canadian and American tax authorities, have accepted the treatment of such payments in the past in the absence of any express authority in the CCAA to do otherwise. In this case, there is a history of characterization of payments consistent with loan transactions that includes not only the loan documentation but also interest payments, principal repayments and interest waivers under the Term Loan. There is no evidence that either the Canadian or the American tax authorities have raised any issue with the treatment of any such payments for tax purposes.

[232] Second, while tax treatment cannot be determinative, these tax regimes represent another third-party standard that has some independent validity in evaluating the substantive reality of loan instruments.

[233] Third, as a policy matter, I see no policy benefit in having separate rules in the tax and accounting domain, on the one hand, and in the CCAA domain on the other. It is important for stakeholders in a corporation to have rules that yield reasonable certainty for planning purposes. A consequence of the approach proposed by the Objecting Parties would be that a parent corporation seeking such certainty in respect of the treatment of a loan to its subsidiary would have to limit its financing arrangements to those which an independent consultant considers to be comparable to financing facilities that would be provided by a notional third-party lender. There are a number of difficulties with this approach from a policy perspective for which there is no obvious corresponding benefit. The principal difficulty is the overriding of valid business purposes by the imposition of a restrictive standard for the purposes of any future CCAA proceedings. In addition, there would be additional costs associated with such a policy, a need for updates as advances are made over time in changing market conditions, and a potentially inefficient limitation of financing options from a financial perspective.

[234] Based on the foregoing considerations, I am not persuaded that the third-party lender standard proposed by the Objecting Parties, and which underlies many of the specific factors upon which the Objecting Parties rely, is appropriate in the present context for determining whether the Loans were, in substance, capital contributions. This conclusion has the following implications in respect of the manner in which the factors identified above are to be applied in the evaluation of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan as debt obligations or capital contributions.

[235] First, with respect to factors (1) to (4), such factors are relevant to the issue of the expectations of USS at the time of advances under the Loans. However, these considerations must be evaluated in terms of what they indicate about the expectations of USS without regard to any comparison with any notional third-party lender. In other words, it is not a relevant consideration in determining whether USS had an expectation of repayment with interest that a notional third-party lender would not have provided financing arrangements to USSC having these features.

[236] Second, the fact that a notional third-party lender would not have extended financing facilities to USSC on the terms and conditions of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan is also not determinative of whether USSC had the debt capacity to service the advances under the Term Loan and under the Revolver Loan when they were made. It is therefore not determinative of the reasonableness of USS' expectation of repayment with interest of the Loan.

[237] The foregoing conclusion does not, however, foreclose entirely the relevance of the availability of financing from independent sources. As discussed above, I accept that a test based on the availability of financing from an external source of financing, not limited to a third-party lender, could be a means of evaluating the debt capacity of a wholly-owned subsidiary. Framed in such terms, such a test would bear on the reasonableness of a parent corporation's expectations of repayment of the principal with interest of a particular loan or advance based on the debt-capacity of the subsidiary. However, there is no reason to narrow consideration of such debt capacity to the availability of third-party lender financing, unless the evidence clearly establishes that no other financing facilities would have been available to the subsidiary had it sought external financing.

[238] Third, in the analysis below, I do not accord any significant weight to the test suggested by the Objecting Parties – that the less the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan reflect the characteristics of a third party loan from a bank or other institutional lender, the more such Loans resemble equity. In my opinion, to the extent that such Loans depart from the third-party lender standard for reasons that have a legitimate business purpose that is related to the wholly-owned subsidiary relationship or its business, the Court cannot disregard the legitimacy of such arrangements in its analysis. Given a legitimate business purpose for departing from the standard of behavior of a third-party lender, there is no necessary reason why a parent corporation could not also have had an expectation of repayment with interest of any loan advance at the time of such advance notwithstanding that it did not act in the same manner as a third-party lender. As discussed above, there is no necessary reason why a parent corporation cannot be both a lender and a shareholder even if, as a lender, it does not conform in all respects to the standard of a third-party lender.

Analysis of the Principal Considerations Relied Upon by the Objecting Parties

[239] I turn then to a consideration of the probative value of the general factors relied upon by the Objecting Parties in the analyses below of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan. As set out above, the Objecting Parties say that the Term Loan Agreement and the Revolver Loan Agreement reflect arrangements under which USS intended at all times to return excess cash to USS when available and to write off the principal or interest in respect of the Loans to the extent that payments of either were due and sufficient cash was not available.

[240] In this section, I will address, in order, the extent to which the seven principal factors relied upon by the Objecting Parties are of assistance in the analysis of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan in light of the conclusions reached above. The seven principal factors are the following: (1) the absence of any arm's length negotiation regarding the terms and conditions of the Term Loan or the Revolver Loan; (2) the deferred interest payment dates and the long maturity dates of both the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan; (3) the history of interest payments and waivers under the Term Loan; (4) the absence of any security; (5) the extent of USS' control over the business operations and financial performance of USSC; (6) the fact, as acknowledged by USS, that USSC would not have been able to obtain financing from a third-party bank or institutional lender in the amount and on the terms and conditions of either the Term Loan or the Revolver Loan; and (7) the view of the Objecting Parties that payments on account of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan were effectively subordinated to payment of trade creditors.

[241] First, the Objecting Parties suggest that the lack of any negotiation between USS and ABULC regarding the Term Loan, and the absence of any substantive negotiations between USS and USSC regarding the Revolver Loan, suggest that the advances under the Loans were in the nature of equity injections rather than bona fide debt. I do not consider these circumstances to be of any value in addressing the issues on this motion. The limited negotiations between these parties is a reflection of the wholly-owned subsidiary relationship that is the starting point for such issues, but it is a neutral fact that does not bear in any way on the reasonableness of the expectations of USS regarding repayment with interest of the advances under the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan.

[242] Second, the Objecting Parties submit that the two-year interest payment provision in the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan, and the lengthy maturity dates for the Loans, suggest these arrangements were capital contributions. However, the terms and conditions of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan make express provision for the payment of interest on fixed dates and the repayment of principal by a fixed maturity date. While these terms were acknowledged to be generous, the fact remains that each Loan fixed the maximum amount payable thereunder as interest and principal and provided fixed dates for the payment of accruing interest and the repayment of the principal amount of the Loans. In particular, the interest payment dates were time-limited. Setting aside any comparison with the terms expected in third-party lender arrangements for the reasons set out above, there is nothing in the terms of the Loans, on their own, that would support an inference that USS did not expect to receive repayment with interest of all advances made under the Loans. In particular, the existence of a long maturity date and the absence of a schedule of repayments is not a basis for inferring that USS did not expect USSC to repay the Term Loan. The Term Loan did not prevent earlier repayment of principal. In addition, USS was in a position to require USSC to repay principal without a contractual schedule of repayments.

[243] Accordingly, on their face, neither the Term Loan nor the Revolver Loan is more consistent with receipt of the residual cash flow and assets of USSC as the Objecting Parties suggest. Any such inference must be based on the actions of USS and USSC in the administration of the Loans.

[244] Third, accordingly, the Objecting Parties argue that the Court should infer from the manner in which interest payments were treated under the Term Loan that the Loans were intended to be capital contributions rather than debt, i.e., that there was never any expectation of repayment with interest of the Loans. There are two aspects of the interest payment history in respect of the Term Loan that will be addressed separately – the accelerated payment of interest in 2008 and the interest waivers commencing in 2010.

[245] The Objecting Parties argue that the acceleration of the interest payments under the Term Loan in 2008 evidences an intention to treat the Term Loan as a capital contribution. In making this argument, the Objecting Parties rely on the testimony of Dr. Finnerty who suggested that the payment of interest under the Term Loan in 2008 ahead of the due date in 2010 exhibited behavior that was more characteristic of the payment of dividends rather than interest.

[246] I accept that it is possible that the payment of interest could resemble a dividend in circumstances in which there is no reasonable explanation for the timing or amount of payments made outside the provisions of a loan agreement, for example, a payment in excess of accrued interest by way of an alleged pre-payment of interest. However, where the timing of interest payments is consistent with a legitimate business purpose and in accordance with the provisions of a loan agreement, the Court cannot disregard such circumstances in assessing the expectations of the parent corporation regarding the loan.

[247] In this case, the Term Loan permitted, but did not require, a deferral of interest payments for a period of time. The argument based on Dr. Finnerty's evidence proceeds on the unrealistic premise that, given such a provision in a loan agreement, a subsidiary would not pay interest to its parent corporation until the end of the permitted interest deferral period even if an earlier payment would be more efficient financially. In other words, the argument relies on a third-party lender standard which is rejected for the reasons discussed above. More generally, where there is a legitimate business reason for the flexibility provided in the loan agreement, I do not see any necessary connection between the availment of that flexibility and either the characterization of the payment as a dividend or the expectation of the parent corporation regarding repayment of the loan with interest.

[248] In the present circumstances, the accelerated interest payments reflected very favourable financial results of USSC during the first three quarters of 2008. There was no legitimate reason for USSC to defer payment of interest, which was compounding while outstanding, to the interest payment date if it had cash available for such purpose. The Term Loan Agreement permitted a deferral of interest payments for a period of time to accommodate an adverse financial performance from time to time. However, it did not require such a deferral in the event of a favourable economic performance. The presence of this provision does not evidence an intention of USS and USSC that USSC would hold on to excess cash at its own cost in such circumstances.

[249] Accordingly, I am not persuaded that the acceleration of interest payments in 2008 is indicative of an intention on the part of USS to treat the Term Loan as a capital contribution rather than as a debt obligation.

[250] The Objecting Parties also argue that the interest payment waivers granted in favour of USSC commencing in 2010 evidence the absence of any expectation of repayment with interest of the Term Loan. Insofar as the Objecting Parties urge the Court to draw such an inference from the existence of the interest waivers without having regard to a third-party lender standard, this issue is addressed later in these Reasons.

[251] I note, however, that Dr. Finnerty's opinion was based on a somewhat different approach. He suggested that, from the perspective of financial economics, USS' actions in respect of the interest waivers reflected the behavior of a shareholder rather than a lender. The position of Dr. Finnerty and the Objecting Parties is that, in the circumstances of non-payment of interest, third-party lenders will obtain some value in negotiations with borrowers as a condition of granting such waivers. As evidence of an equity interest, they point to the absence of any enforcement proceedings on the part of USS to protect its interest as a lender, and of any negotiations to obtain a quid pro quo for, in particular, the grant of such waivers of interest.

[252] Given the finding above regarding the appropriateness of the third-party lender standard, the Court does not draw any inference from the absence of any enforcement proceedings or other actions on the part of USS in respect of the interest waivers. In this case, the application of such a standard also reflects an unrealistic premise upon which the argument for equity treatment is based. As mentioned above, in wholly-owned situations, enforcement proceedings are counter-productive so long as the parent corporation believes the subsidiary still has value. It is also axiomatic that the subsidiary cannot give the parent any additional value as a quid pro quo for obtaining a waiver of its interest obligations since the parent already owns all of the subsidiary's equity value. The probative value of the interest waivers is discussed further below.

[253] Fourth, the Objecting Parties submit that the absence of security for the Term Loan or the First Tranche Indebtedness is probative of the expectations of USS at the time it extended advances under the Loans. This argument also relies implicitly on a comparison with a third-party lender standard. If such a comparison is disregarded, I conclude that the absence of security is not indicative of a capital contribution for the following reasons.

[254] As discussed above, and as the history of the Revolver Loan demonstrates, as the sole shareholder of USSC, USS had no need to require security for its loans to USSC until it became concerned about the ability of USSC to repay any funds advanced to it. As such, the fact that USS required security for advances made after October 2013 is more significant as evidence of the expectations of USS in October 2013 than the absence of any security for advances made prior to that date. In short, the Objecting Parties have not demonstrated a necessary connection between an absence of security for the Term Loan or the First Tranche Indebtedness and an absence of any expectation of repayment with interest of the Term Loan or the First Tranche Indebtedness.

[255] Moreover, the implication of the position of the Objecting Parties is that, to protect itself in possible insolvency proceedings, a sole shareholder must lend on an asset-backed basis, i.e., take security on the assets of the enterprise, to avoid characterization of its loan as equity. This cannot have been the intention of the definition of "equity claims" under the CCAA insofar as such an implication would, among other things, encourage a parent corporation to take a priority over claims of trade creditors and thereby make a restructuring of an enterprise in an insolvency situation more difficult.

[256] Fifth, for the following reasons, I am not persuaded that the extent of USS' control of USSC is a factor to be taken into account in assessing whether the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan were, in substance, equity contributions by USS.

[257] As a polar case, I accept that there may be circumstances in which a parent corporation's expectation from the outset is that it will sacrifice a subsidiary's profitability over the long-term for the benefit of the consolidated enterprise. In such circumstances, a court could find that the parent corporation had no intention of causing the subsidiary to repay with interest any financing extended to the subsidiary or, more precisely, no expectation that the subsidiary would generate sufficient cash flow to enable it to make such payments based on the parent's anticipated business plan for it. In such circumstances, a court could also find that the entire amount of the financing extended by the parent corporation to the subsidiary was, in reality, an equity contribution.

[258] However, the Objecting Parties have expressly advised the Court that they do not take that position in this proceeding. In any event, the evidence is not sufficient to justify such a conclusion in the present circumstances. In particular, among other considerations, the history of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan is too short, and the impact on the entire USS business of the recessionary environment after late 2008 was too significant, to enable the Court to draw such a conclusion.

[259] This leaves the question of whether control of a wholly-owned subsidiary that does not go so far as to render the profitability of the subsidiary a matter entirely in the sole discretion of the parent corporation can constitute a consideration to be taken into account in the analysis of whether loans made by the parent corporation are debt or are, instead, equity contributions. I accept that such control requires a court to take a "good hard look" at the substantive reality of any such loans, in this case being the advances under the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan. Beyond that, however, in this case, I think that USS' control is the point of departure, rather than an independent factor, for the following reasons.

[260] First, and foremost, as mentioned, there is no overriding authority in the CCAA to disregard entirely the manner in which parties, including related parties, have structured their affairs. As set out above, I think a court must give effect to such structure unless and until, in the case of a loan from a parent corporation to a subsidiary, there is other evidence establishing that the parent did not reasonably expect to receive repayment of the loan with interest at the time of the making of the loan. In other words, the existence of control is not a basis for such an inference on its own.

[261] Second, the submission of the Objecting Parties that USS' control is an independent factor demonstrating an equity contribution proceeds on the basis of a distinction between a lender's rights and a shareholder's rights that is untenable in the present circumstances. The Objecting Parties argue, in effect, that USS acted in its capacity as a shareholder, rather than as a lender, in causing USSC to repay monies to it and, therefore, such payments should be treated as dividends.

[262] This argument is based on a false dichotomy. No lender has a right to compel the repayment of principal or the payment of interest. The lender's rights are restricted to enforcement in the event of non-payment. The debtor alone decides whether to pay principal or interest. The implication of this argument is that a parent corporation must renounce its rights as a shareholder to cause payments under a loan agreement. This is not only unrealistic but also counter to the conclusion that a parent corporation can have regard to its rights as a shareholder while acting as a lender. Accordingly, the fact that USS instructed USSC with respect to the payments to be made cannot on that account result in a characterization of such payments as dividends, or of the Loans as capital contributions.

[263] Sixth, for the reasons set out above, I conclude that the fact that USSC could not have obtained financing from a third-party lender on the terms and in the amounts of the Loans is not an independent factor that assists in evaluating USS' expectations regarding repayment with interest of the advances under these Loans at the time that they were made.

[264] Seventh, the remaining consideration is the view of the Objecting Parties that USS effectively subordinated its position to the other creditors of USS by paying interest on the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan only after such other creditors were satisfied on an on-going basis. In doing so, the Objecting Parties say USS acted like a shareholder rather than a lender, thereby evidencing the absence of any expectation of repayment with interest of the Loans.

[265] As a factual matter, it is correct that USSC paid interest on the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan only after its arm's length creditors were satisfied on an on-going basis. From 2007 until shortly prior to the Filing Date, USS funded USSC with debt or equity in order to permit USSC to pay its trade creditors on an ongoing basis. Moreover, as mentioned, USS waived a significant amount of interest that accrued and became due under the Term Loan and made no interest payments on the remaining accrued interest.

[266] This raises the question of whether such evidence demonstrates that USS intended that the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan would be subordinated to payment of USSC's other obligations and, if so, whether such arrangements demonstrate that USS did not expect to receive repayment with interest of the Loans. There are a number of issues bound up in this argument that need to be separated.

[267] First, it is important to note that there is no suggestion that USS intended a legal subordination of its claims in respect of either the Term Loan or the Revolver Loan to claims of third party creditors of USSC. Indeed, after October 2013, all fresh advances under the Revolver Loan were secured and, therefore, ranked ahead of the trade creditors of USSC.

[268] Second, in any event, subordinated debt is not synonymous with a capital contribution. For present purposes, subordinated debt remains debt, subject to demonstration that a borrower could not have obtained subordinated debt on any basis from external sources, that is, did not have the debt capacity to obtain external financing in the amount of the Term Loan or the amount of the First Tranche Indebtedness. In such event, such evidence would cast serious doubt on a parent corporation's expectation with respect to repayment with interest of the alleged subordinated debt. As discussed below, however, there is no such evidence in the present case.

[269] Third, I am not persuaded that the actions of USS and USSC described above are properly characterized as subordination for present purposes. In the face of a significantly changed economic and financial environment described above, USS chose to defer rather than subordinate the repayment of the principal of the Loans and the payment of interest, except to the extent of the waived interest. However, USS left its options open regarding the treatment of amounts outstanding under the Term Loan in the future.

[270] Fourth, and most important, there is no evidentiary connection between the factual circumstances which the Objecting Parties describe as effective subordination of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan and the expectation of USS regarding repayment with interest of the Loans at the time the advances were made thereunder. As described elsewhere in these Reasons, the economic circumstances commencing in 2008 established a reason for the actions that USS and USSC took subsequently which the Objecting Parties say constituted effective subordination of the Loans. There is, however, no evidence of an intention to implement such actions or, more generally, to implement a principle of effective subordination, at the time of the advances under the Loans.

[271] Accordingly, I am not persuaded that the argument of alleged effective subordination of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan supports the position of the Objecting Parties that USS did not expect to receive repayment with interest of advances under the Term Loan or the Revolver Loan.

Analysis and Conclusions Regarding the Re-characterization Claim in Respect of the Term Loan

[272] I propose to set out my analysis of the debt re-characterization claim of the Objecting Parties with respect to the Term Loan after first setting out the position of the Objecting Parties in their written submissions. I would note that, at the trial, the Objecting Parties concentrated on a subset of these considerations which are addressed in these Reasons.

Positions of the Parties

The Union

[273] The essence of the position of the Union with respect to both the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan is captured by the two paragraphs below which are taken from the supplementary written submissions of the Union:

> Critically, USS always expected and intended that USSC's repayment of amounts owing under both the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan was contingent on USSC's performance.

> The evidence is clear that USS only expected to receive payments on account of interest and principal if and when USSC was able to make them, and not in accordance with the terms of the agreements. On discovery, Mr. Brockway's evidence was that USS "anticipated that the ability to repay that portion of the debt would be dependent on the success of Stelco's business going forward."

[274] The Objecting Parties do not merely assert that USS expected to disregard the timing requirements of the Term Loan Agreement and the Revolver Loan Agreement with respect to the movement of available cash from USSC to USS. Rather, they say that, from the outset of each of the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan, USS did not expect USSC to be able to repay the advances under such Loans, and the interest on such advances, and therefore expected to write off a significant portion of such obligations as they fell due.

[275] In its factum, the Union argues that the Term Loan should be re-characterized as equity based principally on the following seven AutoStyle factors: (1) the ability of USSC to obtain similar financing from outside lending institutions; (2) the source of repayments of the Term Loan; (3) the presence or absence of a fixed maturity date and schedule of payments; (4) the absence of security for advances under the Term Loan; (5) the absence of a sinking fund to provide for repayments; (6) the extent to which the advances under the Term Loan were effectively subordinated to the claims of outside creditors; and (7) the inadequacy of capitalization of ABULC at the date of the initial advance under the Term Loan.

[276] The Union also says that the lack of negotiation between USS and USSC regarding the Term Loan and the fact that the principal purpose of the initial advances under the Term Loan was the acquisition by USS of capital assets also support a finding of a contribution to capital rather than debt.

The Province

[277] The general approach of the Province with respect to both the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan is set out in the following excerpts from its factum:

> The context of the Term Loan is crucial for the characterization exercise. … Essentially, USSC operated as a division of the USS organization. This same context also applies to the Revolver….
>
> USS' attitude to the financing of USSC reflected what its attitude would be in funding one of its operating divisions – the money went where and when needed. There was no consideration or expectation that the funds would be treated other than equity – the investment would yield returns if, and only if, the business prospered. Advances were motivated by whether the global business would benefit from the allocation of resources to the facility, and not based upon any analysis of the profitability or credit-worthiness of the business unit….
> USS' loose approach to interest from USSC is understandable in the context of the complete control of USSC by USS discussed above. Whether USSC had the wherewithal at any point in time to pay interest was utterly dependent on the production USS assigned to it, the intercompany allocation of raw materials (and > their cost) and USSC's personnel – all controlled by USS. Presumably, USS believed sending the money to USSC on a non-interest bearing basis allowed USS to earn a better return elsewhere in the global business.

[278] In its factum, the Province argues that the Term Loan should be re-characterized as equity based principally on the following three allegations: (i) there was no expectation that USSC would pay interest on the Term Loan advances; (ii) there was no expectation that USSC would repay the principal of the Term Loan advances; and (iii) the Term Loan was not provided by, nor available from, a third-party lender on commercial terms. I note that the first two considerations are not actually referred to in AutoStyle, although, as discussed above, I think that they are fundamental issues in respect of the re-characterization issue.

[279] The Province also suggested that the following four attributes of the Term Loan, which reflect factors referred to in AutoStyle and are included in the considerations upon which the Union relies, also demonstrate that it is, in substance, equity rather than debt: (1) the initial advances under the Term Loan were used to acquire a capital asset, being the outstanding shares of Stelco; (2) ABULC's capital structure was thinly or inadequately capitalised at the date of the Acquisition when the initial advances were made under the Term Loan, especially in light of Stelco's historical operating performance; (3) the failure to provide for security for the Term Loan; and (4) the failure to establish a sinking fund for repayment, particularly in view of the 30-year term of the Term Loan.

USS

[280] USS submits that a number of the AutoStyle factors considered by American courts refute, rather than support, the Objecting Parties' re-characterization argument, including: (1) the documents entered into between USS and USSC regarding the Term Loan on their face purport to evidence indebtedness and are titled "Loan Agreements"; (2) the parties intended to enter into a loan transaction; (3) the Term Loan has a fixed maturity date; (4) the Term Loan provides for a specified applicable interest rate; (5) under the Term Loan, USS has the right to enforce payment of interest and principal; (6) USS did not acquire any management control rights in exchange for the funds advanced under the Term Loan; (7) USS did not subordinate any amounts owing under the Term Loan to USSC's other creditors as a matter of law; and (8) a substantial portion of the funds advanced under the Term Loan were used to finance USSC's ongoing operations. In addition, USS relies on statements in a recent American decision, In re Alternate Fuels Inc., 789 F.3d 1139 (10th Cir. 2015), to the effect that the identity of interest between USS and USSC and any undercapitalization of ABULC should not be material considerations in the context of a loan from a parent to a wholly-owned subsidiary.

Analysis and Conclusions

[281] As set out above, the claim of the Objecting Parties that the Term Loan should be characterized as an "equity claim" requires addressing two matters: (1) the expectation of USS regarding repayment of principal and interest on the Term Loan out of cash flows of USSC over the term of the Term Loan; and (2) the reasonableness of such expectations. I note that, while these are discrete issues, the evidence referred to below that is relevant to the expectation of USS at the time of any particular advance can also be relevant to the reasonableness of such expectation.

[282] As described above, most of the Term Loan advances were advanced to ABULC between October 31, 2007 and December 31, 2007. However, further advances in the aggregate principal amount of $211.2 million were made in 2009. It is therefore necessary to address the characterization of the Term Loan advances in these two periods of time separately. In each case, I will address the application of the general considerations discussed above to the USS expectation regarding repayment of the Term Loan with interest and will then consider certain additional arguments of the Objecting Parties specific to the Term Loan that have not already been addressed above.

Term Loan Advances at the Time of the Acquisition

[283] The advances made to USSC in respect of the Acquisition between October 31, 2007 and December 31, 2007 have been set out above. USS says that it expected to be repaid the principal of the Term Loan outstanding at December 31, 2007 with interest over the course of the Loan, even if it could not anticipate the timing of such payments given the cyclical nature of the steel industry.

[284] USS relies principally on the evidence of Brockway with respect to the facts pertaining to its expectations at the time of the Acquisition and the initial advances under the Term Loan. Brockway testified that USS based its decision to acquire Stelco on a financial model which was created by USS internally, but was reviewed by its financial advisor in the transaction and was relied upon by the USS board of directors in connection with their decision to make the Acquisition.

[285] The financial model contemplated stable sales of flat-rolled steel that would rise 1%-2% annually, which would generate earnings before interest, taxes and depreciation ("EBITDA") estimated to be U.S. $368 million in 2008 and projected to gradually rise over the next seven years. Brockway testified that, based on this financial model, USS anticipated that the Acquisition would generate sufficient free cash flow in USSC to pay the interest provided for under the Term Loan and to repay the principal over the 30-year term of the Term Loan. The financial model also included a discounted cash flow analysis. The extent to which this analysis is also supportive of the USS expectation is unclear. However, there is no evidence regarding this financial model that contradicts USS's expectation of repayment of the Term Loan with interest.

[286] The Objecting Parties do not dispute that USS made its decision to acquire USSC based on the financial model described above. However, the Objecting Parties argue that the constellation of factors described above pertaining to the terms of the Term Loan Agreement, and the manner in which USS administered the Term Loan, demonstrate that USS did not expect to be repaid the principal with interest of the initial advances under the Term Loan.

Did USS Expect to be Repaid the Term Loan With Interest?

[287] I do not propose to revisit the considerations that have been excluded for the reasons set out in the preceding section, including, in particular, the considerations that rely on a comparison with a third-party lender standard. Setting those considerations aside, the position of the Objecting Parties is based primarily on the following remaining factors which will be evaluated without regard to a third-party lender standard: (1) the terms of the Term Loan Agreement, in particular the deferred interest payment dates and the length of the term of the Term Loan; (2) the acceleration of interest payments in 2008; (3) the waivers of interest commencing in 2010; and (4) the view of the Objecting Parties that USS effectively subordinated payments on the Term Loan to payment of USSC's trade creditors. The Objecting Parties argue that, even considered without regard to the third-party lender standard, these factors, particularly the actions of USS after the advances were made, evidence the fact that USS did not expect to receive repayment of the principal with interest of the Term Loan. I will address each of these factors in turn and will then address the probative value of these factors considered collectively.

[288] First, as mentioned, the Term Loan Agreement provided USSC and USS with considerable latitude regarding the timing of both the payment of interest and the repayment of principal. There was a legitimate business reason for these terms of the Loans. They provided USS with some, but not complete, flexibility to align the payment of interest with the receipt of excess cash flow in a highly cyclical industry. They also provided a lengthy period of time over which to repay the Loans for the same reason. These terms were permissible under applicable tax legislation without losing the tax treatment for debt. For the reasons set out above, I do not think that the terms of the Term Loan Agreement, by themselves, are more consistent with a re-characterization of the Term Loan as a capital contribution. The mere existence of provisions providing flexibility in the timing of payment of interest and repayment of principal is not a basis for inferring that USS did not expect to receive repayment with interest of the Term Loan without further evidence at the time of the initial advances. There is no such evidence in this case. In particular, as noted above, there is no evidence regarding the financial model that establishes, on a balance of probabilities, that repayment of the Term Loan was not a realistic possibility over the life of the Loan.

[289] Second, the Objecting Parties suggest that the acceleration of interest payments in 2008 supports a finding that the payments were, in substance, dividend payments. For the reasons set out in the preceding section, I do not think that the two interest payments made in late 2008 are more properly characterized as dividends based on a third-party lender standard. I also do not think that the action of causing such payments in advance of their respective payment dates is, on its own, indicative of treatment of the Term Loan as a capital contribution. More generally, in the absence of any documentary or other evidence at the time of the payments suggesting otherwise, the fact that the payments were characterized as interest payments, that the payments did not exceed the amount of the accrued interest at the time, that the payments were permitted under the Term Loan Agreement, and that there was a legitimate business purpose for making interest payments in advance of their due date should be determinative.

[290] Third, the Objecting Parties' reliance on the interest waivers and failure to repay any interest in the seven years between the initial advances under the Term Loan and the Filing Date is understandable. It raises a legitimate question of whether USS ever intended USSC to pay principal or interest on the Term Loan, that is, whether it ever expected to be paid interest and/or repaid principal.

[291] There is some force to this argument in one respect. Insofar as USS waived, rather than continued to accrue, unpaid interest, it appears to have acted as a shareholder rather than a lender. The evidence before the Court established that it was not economic for USS to "round-trip" the payment of interest by USSC under the Term Loan. This explains why USS did not fund USSC to enable it to pay the accrued interest. However, it does not explain why it was appropriate to write off the interest that was waived in each of the relevant years, much less why only a portion of the interest was written off. Moreover, based on an internal email dated March 29, 2011 of USS, it is possible that, in or about late 2010 or early 2011, USS decided on a policy of waiving at least some interest at the end of each year to the extent USS was not in a position to pay the accrued interest payable in such year.

[292] However, the Objecting Parties suggest that the Court should infer from the interest waivers that USS did not expect to receive repayment with interest of the Term Loan at the time of the initial advances under the Term Loan. In the preceding section, I addressed the argument of Dr. Finnerty that the Court should draw such an inference from USS' failure to assert its rights as a lender in respect of the interest payment defaults that gave rise to the interest waivers. In this section, I address the alternative argument of the Objecting Parties that the granting of the interest waivers by themselves is sufficient to support the inference that USS never expected to receive repayment of the Term Loan with interest at the time that the initial advances were extended thereunder.

[293] I do not think a court can reasonably draw such inferences for a number of reasons. First, and most important, there is no other evidence supporting such an expectation at the time of the establishment of the Term Loan and the making of the initial advances under the Loan. Second, the payment of interest under the Term Loan in 2008 is inconsistent with an absence of any expectation of payment of interest from the outset of the Term Loan. Third, the intervening economic events are sufficient to establish radically different economic conditions which support the USS position of altered expectations. There is no evidence that USS contemplated the possibility of a recession of the depth and length experienced in the steel market since 2008 even though it put in place flexibility regarding interest payments and a long maturity date as discussed above. Fourth, notwithstanding the waivers in 2011, 2012 and 2013, there is no evidence that such repeated waivers of interest reflected a long-term policy of USS that existed from the outset of the Term Loan.

[294] Accordingly, the significant facts for this purpose are the lengthy period after the initial advances before the initial decision was made to waive interest coupled with the intervening occurrence of significantly adverse market conditions. These factors, together with the absence of any documentation or other evidence to the contrary at the time of the initial advances under the Term Loan, exclude an intention at the time of such advances to waive interest as and when it became payable under the terms of the Term Loan Agreement.

[295] Lastly, with respect to the argument of subordination, I have concluded for the reasons set out above that the evidence regarding the alleged effective subordination of the Loan does not evidence the absence of an expectation of USS of repayment with interest of the Term Loan or the Revolver Loan, except to the extent of the waived interest which has been addressed above. I would add that I do not consider that the evidence of Brockway, discussed below, constitutes evidence that USS implemented a policy of subordination of the Term Loan to trade creditors from the time of the initial advances as the Objecting Parties suggest.

[296] The Objecting Parties have raised one further argument that should be addressed pertaining to the use of the initial advances under the Term Loan. They suggest that both the use of the advances under the Term Loan to acquire capital assets, being the Stelco shares and other Stelco securities, and the circumstances surrounding the SHC Transaction, argue for a finding that the Term Loan constituted, in substance, a contribution to capital. I do not accept either submission for the following reasons.

[297] With respect to the significance of the acquisition of the Stelco shares and other securities, the Objecting Parties say that such use of the initial advances under the Term Loan demonstrates that the primary intention of USS was the acquisition of Stelco rather than the establishment of a debtor-creditor relationship between Canada LP and ABULC.

[298] This argument presumes that the purpose of debt is the provision of working capital and that the purpose of equity is the acquisition of capital assets. That is too narrow an approach. Term loans are regularly used to acquire capital assets and, indeed, are often secured on such capital assets in the case of third-party lenders. There is no necessary reason why the fact that advances under a term loan were used for the purpose of acquiring assets should be a consideration that demonstrates a capital contribution. In addition, as discussed above, there is no general principle that prevented USS from structuring a portion of its investment in USSC as a loan. Moreover, as described below, the portion of the Term Loan that reduced the Credit Corp Loan was effectively used to retire the third party debt of Stelco at the time of the Acquisition.

[299] With respect to the SHC Transaction, the Union argues that the fact that advances under the Term Loan were used to satisfy the Credit Corp Loan, which was incurred to refinance the Stelco debt at the USS level, is indicative of a view of the Term Loan as an equity contribution. I do not see the connection suggested by the Union.

[300] The SHC Transaction has been described above. The principal effect of the SHC Transaction was to effect a sale of SHC at its apparent fair market value by USSC and a reduction of the Credit Corp Loan in a like amount. If the SHC Transaction had not occurred, the Credit Corp Loan would have remained outstanding as of the Filing Date in the amount of such reduction and the amount of the Term Loan would have been correspondingly lower. From the point of view of the aggregate amount of outstanding debt of USSC, the SHC Transaction was therefore neutral. Moreover, the Credit Corp Loan was made for the purpose of repaying third-party debt of Stelco. To the extent that advances under the Term Loan in connection with the SHC Transaction were applied to reduce the Credit Corp Loan, such advances were therefore indirectly used to repay such third-party debt. I do not see any further significance to the SHC Transaction.

[301] It is therefore necessary to address the argument of the Objecting Parties that, while none of the foregoing factors or considerations may be sufficient on its own to support a conclusion that the Term Loan was, in substance, a capital contribution, the combination of factors should support such a conclusion. This argument effectively brings together all of the factors set out and discussed above and asserts that collectively they establish that it is more probable that USS did not expect to receive repayment with interest of the Term Loan than that USS had such an expectation.

[302] In considering this argument, I have looked more generally at which of the two scenarios proposed by the parties is more probable – the USS position that it expected to be repaid the principal with interest of the Term Loan at the time of the advances in 2007 or the Objecting Parties' position that, at the time of such advances, USS expected to receive only such cash flow and assets as were available after satisfaction of the obligations to third party creditors and to write off the principal or interest in respect of the Term Loan when cash was not available and such obligations fell due.

[303] In addition to the factors described above, the Objecting Parties rely on the evidence of Brockway referred to above and the evidence more particularly described in certain excerpts of Brockway's discovery in these proceedings set out at pages 8 and 9 of the Union's Compendium of Key Read-in Evidence. The Union submits that these excerpts establish that USS' expectation of repayment was "contingent on USSC's performance" or was "dependent on the success of Stelco's business going forward" and that "[USS] only expected to receive interest payments if USSC was successful." I note that this argument is similar to, but separate from, the argument that USS effectively subordinated repayment of the Term Loan, and payment of interest thereon, to the payment of USSC's third party creditors.

[304] I do not think that this submission accurately captures the evidence of Brockway and, accordingly, I think that the Objecting Parties rely on an interpretation of his evidence which it was not intended to carry.

[305] There is a difference between the investment risks of USS' investment in Stelco, considered as a whole, and the risk of repayment of the portion of the investment that was structured as debt of USSC. Reading the entirety of Brockway's evidence, I am satisfied that Brockway's statement was intended to acknowledge no more than that there could be no certainty that the aggregate investment in Stelco would be profitable. Brockway acknowledged no more than that the Acquisition entailed normal investment risks and that, to the extent that USS made a bad investment, there was a risk that it had made such a bad investment that USSC would be unable to repay not only its equity investment but also the Term Loan with interest. His evidence does not, however, constitute an acknowledgement that USS believed it had made an unprofitable investment in acquiring Stelco, much less an acknowledgement that USS therefore expected that USSC would be unable to repay the Term Loan with interest.

[306] The foregoing discussion highlights the fact that, at times, the position of the Objecting Parties approaches the issue of repayment of the Term Loan as part of the larger issue of the profitability of the entire investment of USS in USSC. This is reflected in the position of the Union, as excerpted above, which proceeds on the basis that USS treated both the Loans and the equity component as a single investment. In so doing, the Objecting Parties disregard the reality that the Term Loan was expressly structured and documented separately from the equity injections in order to function in the manner described above. I do not think that the separate existence of the Term Loan can be simply ignored in the absence of an explanation or reason for treating the USS investment on an aggregate basis. In doing so, this approach conflates the issues of repayment of the Term Loan and the profitability of USS' acquisition of Stelco, which are very different. The Court is only concerned with USS' expectation of repayment with interest of the Term Loan. Even an unsuccessful investment may nevertheless repay with interest the portion of the investment structured as a loan.

[307] Further, to the extent that Brockway was also acknowledging the existence of lending risks with respect to repayment of the Term Loan, the mere existence of lending risks is not a basis for an inference that there was no expectation of repayment of the debt portion of the USS' investment in USSC. The statement that USSC would not be able to repay the Term Loan with interest unless it was profitable is, on its own, a neutral statement. There is a considerable distance between an acknowledgement of the existence of normal lending risks and an acknowledgement that USS did not expect USSC to be able to repay the Term Loan with interest. I do not read Brockways' testimony as going to the latter statement.

[308] It is also necessary to address the position of the Province as excerpted above. The Province argues, in effect, that, having made the decision to acquire Stelco and to integrate it into the USS business as an operating division, USS paid no attention to the ability of USSC to repay the Term Loan over the thirty-year life of the Loan. It says that such action demonstrates that the Term Loan was, in effect, equity. By way of explanation for this approach, the Province suggests that USS considered the investment from a business-wide perspective. The Province suggests that USS was not concerned specifically with the profitability of USSC, and its ability to repay the Term Loan, given that USS considered that an increased profitability of other companies within the USS group would more than compensate for any losses in USSC.

[309] At the time of the initial advances under the Term Loan, USS undoubtedly intended to integrate Stelco into its business as an operating division. That fact alone, however, does not support the conclusion that USS had no expectation that USSC would be unable to repay with interest the portion of the acquisition cost that was provided to it in the form of the Term Loan. More importantly, the evidence does not support the conclusion that USS paid no attention to the ability of USSC to repay the Term Loan in the manner suggested by the Province for the following reasons.

[310] First, as Brockway noted, it is incorrect to suggest that USS made no credit analysis of USSC in connection with the initial advances under the Term Loan. The financial model, upon which the decision to acquire Stelco was based, served the function of a credit analysis even if the principal purpose of the model was to address the financial impact of the entire investment. In its projections of cash flows of the post-acquisition Stelco, the financial model provided the basis for a conclusion regarding USSC's ability to service the Term Loan. As set out below, the evidence before the Court with respect to this financial model does not demonstrate that USS did not expect to receive repayment with interest of the initial advances under the Term Loan over the life of the Loan.

[311] Second, while the financial model did anticipate the realization of substantial synergies outside of USSC, it is not suggested that the quantum of such synergies was such that they would compensate for anticipated losses in USSC. More generally, there is no evidence that USS did not anticipate recovery of the majority of its investment in the form of profits from USSC, including the portion represented by the initial advances under the Term Loan which for this purpose is notionally senior to USS' equity investment.

[312] The Brockway evidence therefore does not constitute an acknowledgement or admission of USS that it had no expectation of repayment with interest of the initial advances under the Term Loan when they were made. For the reasons set out above, I am also not persuaded by the Province's argument that USS allocated its investment in Stelco between debt and equity with no regard to USSC's ability to repay the initial advances under the Term Loan. The probative value of the other considerations upon which the Objecting Parties rely has been discussed above. The element of USS' actions which most strongly raises a doubt regarding its expectation regarding repayment of the Term Loan is the experience of the interest waivers. The Objecting Parties also rely, among other considerations, on the long maturity date, the absence of a schedule of repayments, and the alleged effective subordination. For the reasons set out above, however, none of this evidence is sufficient on its own to support a characterization of the Term Loan advances as equity. I am also not persuaded, for the reasons discussed above, that the experience of the interest waivers, together with the other considerations upon which the Objecting Parties rely, collectively demonstrate that USS did not expect to be repaid the initial advances under the Term Loan with interest as of the time such advances were made in 2007.

[313] Accordingly, I find, on a balance of probabilities, that, at the time of the advances under the Term Loan in 2007, USS expected that USSC would repay interest on the Term Loan in accordance with the terms of the Term Loan Agreement and would repay principal on or prior to the maturity date of the Term Loan.

Was the USS Expectation Reasonable?

[314] This raises the issue of the reasonableness of the USS expectation.

[315] The Objecting Parties rely heavily on two factors which might suggest that such an expectation was unreasonable: (1) third party financing was not available to USSC on terms substantially similar to the terms of the financing provided by USS; and (2) the view of the Objecting Parties that ABULC was inadequately capitalized. I will address these issues in turn.

[316] As mentioned, the Province introduced the Hall Report as expert evidence demonstrating that a third party lender would not have provided ABULC/USSC with financing in the amount and on the terms of the Term Loan provided by USS.

[317] There is no actual dispute regarding this opinion in the Hall Report. However, for the reasons set out above, the standard addressed in the Hall Report — i.e., whether USSC could have obtained financing on the terms and in the amount of the Term Loan from a bank or other institutional lender — is too limited to establish that the USS expectation of repayment of the Term Loan was unreasonable. In this regard, it is noteworthy that both Mr. Hall and Dr. Finnerty, who relied on the Hall Report for the purpose of the opinion in the Finnerty Report on this issue, acknowledged that they were not expressing any opinion on the ability of USSC to have obtained financing other than from a third-party lender.

[318] The question remains whether the evidence regarding the ability of USSC to raise debt on a viable basis as of December 31, 2007 contradicts the reasonableness of the USS expectation. If the Objecting Parties were able to demonstrate, on a balance of probabilities, that USSC could not have obtained external financing in the amount of the Term Loan on any viable basis, I think a court could conclude that at least the excess of the Term Loan over the amount of financing that was obtainable from external sources represented an equity contribution.

[319] However, in the present circumstances, the evidence is not sufficient to establish that USSC lacked the capacity to raise an amount of debt equal to the outstanding amount of the Term Loan as of December 31, 2007, that is, that external financing would not have been available to USSC on a viable basis, although admittedly on a fully secured basis. Accordingly, the Objecting Parties cannot establish that the USS expectation in 2007 of repayment with interest of the Term Loan was unreasonable. In this regard, the following considerations are relevant.

[320] First, Stelco had total debt approximating $1.16 billion at the time of the Acquisition. As the Austin Smith Report suggests and Mr. Hall acknowledged, this would appear to put a floor on the debt capacity of USSC at the time of the Acquisition.

[321] Second, the historical financial results for Stelco (EBITDA and EBIT) prior to the Acquisition, when adjusted to remove non-recurring items, reflected an improving trend from 2006 to 2007 on a quarter-over-quarter comparison by year.

[322] Third, the outstanding balance of the Term Loan at December 31, 2007, being approximately $1.4 million including the outstanding loan from the Province, was not significantly higher than the amount of the Stelco debt prior to the Acquisition. This level of debt represented approximately 70% of the total acquisition cost to USS of Stelco. It is not inconsistent with Brockway's testimony that USS believed that the Term Loan could be repaid over the 30-year life of the Loan as Brockway suggested. It is true that the investment failed to generate the results contemplated by the USS financial model. By any estimation, in hindsight, the investment was a significant failure. However, there is no basis for retrospectively fixing USS with such knowledge at the time of the initial advances under the Term Loan.

[323] Fourth, the Hall Report bases its conclusions entirely on the historical performance of Stelco rather than on an analysis of the projected cash flow of USSC at the time of the Acquisition. However, as the Province's financial advisor in respect of the Acquisition, Ernst & Young Inc., recognized in a report dated August 22, 2007 to the Province, the Acquisition was likely to improve the financial strength of USSC relative to Stelco. The report identified a number of factors for consideration by the Province regarding the Acquisition. Purely from a cash-flow perspective, these factors would have been expected to result in an increased and more stable cash flow, other economic factors being equal. There is, therefore, a reasonable basis for concluding that the Acquisition increased USSC's debt capacity relative to Stelco's pre-Acquisition debt capacity. The fact that a third-party lender might not have been prepared to rely on USS' cash flow projections is not determinative of whether lenders in other capital markets were prepared to do so.

[324] Fifth, the limited metrics in evidence do not suggest that USSC lacked the ability to incur such external financing. As noted by Brockway, in 2007, Stelco incurred slightly less than $60 million in interest expense for the nine months ended September 30, 2007, or slightly less than $80 million on an annualized basis. The Term Loan interest for 2008 approximated $100 million, which was well within the estimated EBITDA for that year.

[325] Sixth, while the Acquisition was not a leveraged buyout transaction as that term is generally understood, USS, as a strategic purchaser, approached the purchase of Stelco with a similar philosophy and approach to capitalization, as the Austin Smith Report notes. In this regard, the financial metrics pertaining to aggregate debt and interest coverage, on a prospective basis, are consistent with leveraged buyout financing transactions in 2007 and are, therefore, suggestive of the availability of financing in the high-yield market.

[326] Given these factors, the evidence suggests a reasonable possibility of obtaining third-party financing in other capital markets, beyond the third-party lender market addressed in the Hall Report and the Finnerty Report, in particular, in the high-yield market. For the reasons discussed above, it is not relevant for present purposes that any such financing would have been on different terms and conditions from the Term Loan. The second issue raised by the Union in its Factum is the allegedly inadequate capitalization of ABULC/USSC at the time of the initial advances under the Term Loan.

[327] Insofar as the Union says that ABULC was inadequately capitalized, I think the issue is misdirected. While it is correct that ABULC had no prior operating performance and no revenues or profits of its own, that is irrelevant. At all times, ABULC was the direct parent corporation of USSC. Its financial performance on a consolidated basis was that of USSC. Accordingly, the extent to which ABULC was or was not undercapitalized was directly dependent on the extent to which USSC was or was not undercapitalized.

[328] Insofar as the Objecting Parties say that post-Acquisition USSC was inadequately capitalized, I think this issue engages the same issue as the preceding discussion of the availability of external financing. To the extent that the evidence fails to establish that USSC could not have obtained external financing on a viable basis in the amount of the Term Loan, it cannot reasonably be argued that USSC was inadequately capitalized.

[329] Based on the foregoing, I find that the Objecting Parties have not satisfied the onus of demonstrating that the USS expectation of repayment with interest of the principal of the Term Loan as of December 31, 2007 was unreasonable.

Term Loan Advances in 2009

[330] As mentioned, in 2009, USSC received additional advances totalling $211.2 million under the Term Loan from Canada LP. No interest or principal was paid during 2009. In addition, as set out in the table above, USS provided equity injections in the amount of $61 million during 2009.

[331] The Objecting Parties do not raise any arguments regarding these advances under the Term Loan in addition to those addressed above. The relevant facts are essentially the circumstances as of December 31, 2007 carried forward, subject to the interest payments in 2008 and the occurrence of the recession in 2009. Given the history of the steel market in the period 2004 to 2008, USS had a reasonable expectation that markets would improve that justified supporting USSC in 2009 with additional working capital advances. I note as well that the first interest waiver under the Term Loan occurred subsequent to the advances in 2009.

[332] Accordingly, I see no basis for reaching a different conclusion respecting the expectation of USS regarding repayment of these advances from the conclusion reached above regarding repayment of the initial advances under the Term Loan. The evidence before the Court establishes that USS expected that USSC would repay these advances with interest for the reasons set out above. Hindsight is always 20/20. There is, however, no evidence that, as of 2009 when such advances were made, USS or USSC anticipated the negative financial performance of USSC in the period 2009 to 2013 and therefore expected that USSC would be unable to repay these advances with interest. There is also no evidence before the Court that would demonstrate that the expectation of repayment with interest of these advances under the Term Loan was unreasonable.

Conclusion Regarding Characterization of the Term Loan

[333] Based on the foregoing, I conclude that the outstanding Term Loan, being Claim #9, constitutes a debt claim rather than an "equity claim" for the purposes of this CCAA proceeding.

Analysis and Conclusions Regarding the Re-characterization Claim in Respect of the Revolver Loan

[334] I propose to set out my analysis of the debt re-characterization claim of the Objecting Parties with respect to the Revolver Loan after first setting out the position of the Objecting Parties in their written submissions. As in the case of the Term Loan, the Objecting Parties concentrated on a subset of these considerations at the trial, which are addressed in these Reasons.

Positions of the Parties

The Union

[335] The approach of the Union, as excerpted above from its written submissions, applies equally to the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan and therefore will not be repeated here. In its factum, the Union argues that the Revolver Loan should be re-characterized as equity based principally on the following seven AutoStyle factors: (1) the inability of USSC to obtain similar financing from outside lending institutions; (2) the source of repayments of the Revolver Loan; (3) the presence or absence of a fixed maturity date and schedule of payments; (4) the absence of security for advances under the Revolver Loan; (5) the absence of a sinking fund to provide for repayments; (6) the extent to which the advances under the Revolver Loan were effectively subordinated to the claims of outside creditors; and (7) the financial position of USSC, including an inadequate capitalization, at the date that the Revolver Loan was first put in place.

The Province

[336] The Province's approach, as excerpted above from its factum, also applies equally to the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan and therefore will not be repeated here. In its written submissions, the Province argues that the Revolver Loan should be re-characterized as equity based principally on two assertions also made in respect of the Term Loan, namely: (i) there was no expectation that USSC would repay the principal of the Revolver Loan advances; and (ii) the Revolver Loan was not provided by, nor available from, a third-party lender on commercial terms. The Province also suggests that the following three attributes of the Revolver Loan further demonstrate that it is, in substance, equity rather than debt: (1) the arrangements pertaining to interest including, in particular, determination of the interest rate based on tax requirements, the timing of interest payments in the loan agreements, and the reliance on equity injections to make interest payments under the Revolver Loan; (2) thin or inadequate capitalization of USSC at the date of the Revolver Loan Agreement and USSC's operating performance at the time; and (3) the failure to establish a sinking fund for repayment.

USS

[337] USS submits that the same AutoStyle factors upon which it relies in respect of the Term Loan also refute the Objecting Parties' re-characterization claim in respect of the Revolver Loan. Accordingly, I will not repeat them here.

Analysis and Conclusions

[338] The claim of the Objecting Parties that the Revolver Loan should be characterized as an "equity claim" also requires addressing the two matters discussed above: (1) the expectation of USS regarding repayment of principal with interest on the Revolver Loan out of cash flows of USS over the term of the Revolver Loan; and (2) the reasonableness of such expectation. In the case of the Revolver Loan, it is necessary to address these issues separately in respect of each of the First Tranche Indebtedness and the Second Tranche Indebtedness. Accordingly, I will deal with each Tranche in order.

The First Tranche Indebtedness

Background

[339] As set out above, the amount of the First Tranche Indebtedness outstanding as of October 31, 2013 was U.S. $116,969,996. It is understood that no payments of either principal or interest were made in respect of the First Tranche Indebtedness after October 30, 2013. The history of advances and payments under the Revolver Loan to this date is important for the determinations herein. The Monitor's Seventh Report sets out all such advances and repayments in Exhibit "O" thereto, which is briefly summarized as follows.

[340] During 2010, USSC drew a total of U.S. $100,000,000 under the Revolver Loan and made no interest payments. In 2011, USSC drew U.S. $20,000,000 in June, repaid U.S. $18,339,563 in November and drew U.S. $25,223,983 in December. In the same year, USSC paid U.S. $6,660,437 of interest in November and U.S. $223,983 of interest in December. As of December 31, 2011, the amount outstanding under the Revolver Loan was U.S. $127,155,598.

[341] In 2012, USSC obtained advances totaling U.S. $307,366,090. Advances were made in each month, other than March and April when it repaid U.S. $33,866,386 and U.S. $9,568,279, respectively, and October when there was no activity. In addition, small amounts of interest were paid in each of January, March and April, being U.S. $366,090, U.S. $1,133,614 and U.S. $431,721, respectively. At the end of December 2012, the outstanding balance of the Revolver Loan was U.S. $496,702,434, which amount was increased by a draw of U.S. $10,000,000 in early January 2013 to bring the outstanding amount to U.S. $507,750,128.

[342] As Dr. Finnerty observed, with the qualification that money is fungible, it can be argued that the payments on account of principal and interest in the aggregate amount of U.S. $25,000,000 in November 2011, and a further interest payment of U.S. $223,983 in December 2011, were funded by an equity injection in October 2011. It can also be argued that the payments on account of principal and interest in March and April 2012 were funded by an advance under the Revolver Loan in February 2012.

[343] In 2013, as described above, USS implemented a decision to "de-lever" USSC by reducing the Revolver Loan. Accordingly, principal and interest payments totaling $383,845,848 and $11,154,152, respectively, were made in each of the months of February to July 2013 inclusive. By this means, the balance outstanding at October 31, 2013, prior to the execution of the Third Revolver Amendment and the October Security Agreement, had been reduced to the level set out above, being the amount of the First Tranche Indebtedness. Applying advances and repayments on a first-in, first-out basis, the advances outstanding under the First Tranche Indebtedness at the Filing Date were advances made in the course of 2012.

[344] It is necessary to overlay the economic performance of USS and USSC during these years. As described above, the evidence establishes that market conditions improved in the second quarter of 2010 and then weakened again in the second half of 2010. Similarly, market conditions improved in the second quarter and third quarter of each of 2011 and 2012 before weakening again in the fourth quarter of each year. Essentially, the evidence is that USS thought that the improvement in the markets in the first half of 2010 signalled the start of an improving market whereas, in retrospect, it heralded the beginning of several years of "mini-cycles" in each of 2010, 2011 and 2012. The evidence also indicates that a similar improvement did not occur in the first half of 2013.

[345] Exhibit "O" to the Monitor's Seventh Report sets out the equity injections made by USS during the period 2010 to October 2013 on a monthly basis, which is briefly summarized as follows. In 2010, USS made equity injections in each of June, July, September, October and December totaling $611,754,000. In 2011, USS made equity contributions in each of January, February, July, August, September and October totaling approximately U.S. $213 million. There were no equity injections in 2012. In 2013, as described above, in connection with its "de-leveraging" decision, USS contributed a total of $682,758,200 through equity injections in each month from February to and including September. It is not disputed that a significant portion of these equity injections in 2013 was used to pay interest owing, and to repay principal outstanding, on the Revolver Loan in connection with the "de-leveraging" exercise. A further $57,040,500 was injected in October 2013 prior to execution of the Third Revolver Amendment prompting a moratorium on further cash payments to USSC imposed by the new chief financial officer until security was provided.

Analysis and Conclusions

[346] The evidence indicates that USS established the Revolver Loan in May 2010 during a period of improvement in market conditions after the significant slowdown in business activity during the second half of 2008 and 2009. The funding under the Revolver Loan provided additional working capital required to respond to the recovery of the steel market that was anticipated at that time. As mentioned, the advances comprising the First Tranche Indebtedness were made in 2012 based on a first-in, first-out approach to advances and repayments under the Revolver Loan. Accordingly, such advances must be considered in the context of the economic environment in which they were made in 2012.

[347] USS says that it expected to be repaid all advances, with interest, when they were made under the Revolver Loan over the course of the Loan. As set out above, the principal argument of the Objecting Parties is that the terms of the Revolver Loan, as well as the manner in which the Loan was administered by USS, are more consistent with receipt of the residual cash flow and assets of the USSC, without any expectation of repayment with interest of the advances under the Revolver Loan.

[348] The Objecting Parties rely largely on the general considerations that were addressed in respect of characterization of the Term Loan. This is consistent with the fact that the Revolver Loan performed the same cash management function as the Term Loan. They also rely on certain other considerations that are specific to the circumstances in which the First Tranche Indebtedness was advanced. These include the following matters: (1) the losses of USSC since 2009; (2) the failure of USSC to pay any interest on the Term Loan after 2009; (3) the negative equity of USSC in 2012; (4) the removal of the solvency representation from the Revolver Loan; and (5) the use of equity injections to fund repayment of the Revolver Loan pursuant to the "de-leveraging" exercise described above in 2013.

[349] I will first address the application of the general considerations that the Objecting Parties suggest demonstrate the equity character of both the Term Loan and the Revolver Loan and then the additional considerations which they raise that are specific to the Revolver Loan.

[350] As mentioned, in the period from 2010 to 2012, that is, prior to the "de-leveraging" exercise discussed below, USS administered the Revolver Loan in the same manner as it had administered the Term Loan with the exception that: (1) in each of 2011 and 2012, USSC repaid some principal and paid some accruing interest out of available cash; and (2) USSC did not waive any interest that became payable during this period. There are no additional facts in respect of the administration of the Revolver Loan that render the combined effect of the general considerations upon which the Objecting Parties rely more compelling in the context of the Revolver Loan than the Term Loan.

[351] I therefore do not think that the terms of the Revolver Loan Agreement and the manner in which USS administered the Revolver Loan are sufficient to constitute the Revolver Loan, in substance, an equity contribution. There is nothing in these circumstances, considered on their own or collectively, that casts any doubt on the evidence that USS expected USSC to repay the principal with interest of the First Tranche Indebtedness over the life of the Loan.

[352] The next issue is therefore whether the financial status of USSC in 2012, when the advances comprising the First Tranche Indebtedness were made, affects this conclusion. The Objecting Parties say that the Court should infer from the four considerations set out above, which pertain to the financial state of USSC in the latter half of 2012, that USS did not expect to receive repayment with interest of the Revolver Loan. These factors raise a legitimate issue regarding both the expectation of USS and the reasonableness of that expectation at that time. I propose to address the issue of the removal of the solvency representation first and then the remaining considerations pertaining to USSC's financial state.

[353] The Objecting Parties place considerable reliance on the agreement of USS to remove the solvency representation from the Revolver Loan Agreement in 2012 as evidence that USS could not have expected USSC to be able to repay any advances under the Revolver Loan. The solvency representation was removed by the First Revolver Amendment in July 2012 at the request of Michael McQuade, the chief financial officer of USSC at the time ("McQuade").

[354] McQuade states in his affidavit sworn September 4, 2014 that, at the time of the execution of the First Revolver Amendment, he had a concern about USSC's solvency given its losses since 2009 and its reliance on USS for on-going liquidity and solvency. He testified at the hearing of this motion that he had a concern that USSC might become insolvent at some point over the remaining thirteen-year term of the Revolver Loan.

[355] The Objecting Parties suggest the Court should draw the inference that USS was aware that USSC was insolvent in July 2012 and, from that inference, find that USS had no expectation of repayment with interest of the advances made in 2012 under the Revolver Loan. I do not think the evidence justifies such an inference or finding for the following reasons.

[356] First, there is no evidence regarding the intentions of either USS or USSC in removing the insolvency representation that supports such a finding. McQuade requested its removal. His evidence at the trial was that he approached the solvency representation as a continuing representation. McQuade's concern was prospective rather than immediate. He was concerned that USSC might breach the representation at some point in the future rather than that USSC was insolvent in July 2012. In addition, McQuade also testified that he believed that USSC had a continuing right under the Revolver Loan Agreement to draw funds as needed up to the maximum availability. It is not clear how he integrated these two apparently contradictory considerations. McQuade's view of the operation of the Revolver Loan Agreement does, however, reinforce the prospective nature of his concern. In addition, there is no evidence regarding why USS agreed to remove the solvency representation at the time.

[357] Second, it is not possible to draw any conclusion regarding the knowledge of USS and USSC from the terms of the Revolver Loan Agreement for the following reasons. As described elsewhere in these Reasons, I consider that the proper interpretation of the Revolver Loan Agreement is that a balance sheet solvency test remained in the form of the "unable to meet debts" event of default. In addition, a similar event of default remained in the Term Loan Agreement. I do not see any inconsistency in the removal of the solvency representation and the retention of a balance sheet event of default. Moreover, it is not clear whether the solvency representation was a continuing representation given at the time of each advance. Even if it was, which may be more likely, the net effect of the amendment was to remove the solvency test based on meeting liabilities as they fell due. As discussed above, there was no need for such an event of default in the context of a wholly-owned subsidiary relationship. It is therefore questionable whether the removal of the insolvency representation had any real practical significance from which it would be possible to draw an inference.

[358] Third, while USSC may not have been solvent on a book value basis in July 2012, there is no evidence to suggest that USS considered that USSC was insolvent on a market value basis at that time, which is the relevant issue both as a practical matter as well as a legal matter.

[359] I turn then to the remaining financial performance considerations upon which the Objecting Parties say that the Court should infer an absence of an expectation of repayment of the Revolver Loan on the part of USS in 2012. With hindsight, these considerations point in the direction of continuing financial problems of USSC which were identified in the autumn of 2013. With the benefit of that hindsight, it is also clear that USS had very lax controls over the provision of additional cash to USSC from 2010 until late October 2013 and perhaps poor planning processes. In practice, USSC's requests, as set out in its rolling thirteen-week cash forecasts, appear to have been satisfied on a regular basis without close scrutiny by the USS treasury department.

[360] However, such evidence, considered collectively with the other considerations relied upon by the Objecting Parties, is not sufficient to establish that USS actually expected that USSC would be unable to repay with interest the advances in 2012. The evidence is more consistent with a USS expectation that funding additional working capital in 2012 was appropriate given an anticipated improvement in the steel market, with a concomitant ability of USSC to repay such advances under the Revolver Loan as USSC returned to profitability.

[361] The advances under the Revolver Loan funded USSC with a view to increasing its working capital to take advantage of more favourable steel markets that were expected at the time. As described above, there were mini-cycles in each of 2010, 2011 and 2012. In each case, USS misread these mini-cycles as the start of a more broad-based improvement that did not occur. In the case of these advances, the evidence indicates a misplaced belief that the performance of USSC would improve in 2012 and 2013. There is, however, no evidence before the Court which suggests that USS did not hold these views. Nor is there any evidence that such views were unreasonable at the time.

[362] The Objecting Parties also raise the issue that the outstanding principal amount of the Revolver Loan was reduced from slightly in excess of U.S. $500,000,000 to the amount of U.S. $116,969,996 during 2013 pursuant to the "de-leveraging" exercise that was funded by equity injections from USS. They suggest that the source of funds is a factor indicating that the Revolver Loan was, in fact, an equity injection. There are three difficulties with this argument.

[363] First, USS had a legitimate business purpose in reducing the outstanding amount of the Revolver Loan that was not connected in any way to its expectation regarding the ability of USSC to repay the Revolver Loan. The "de-leveraging" exercise was undertaken to remove foreign currency fluctuations from the USSC financial statements and, thereby, to address an unnecessary complication in the USS consolidated financial statements.

[364] Second, in any event, I do not see any necessary connection between the use of the equity injections to reduce the outstanding balance of the Revolver Loan and the characterization of the remaining outstanding balance of the Loan. It may be that the use of equity injections reflected the fact that, in the course of 2013, USS concluded that USSC was no longer likely to be able to repay an amount of the Revolver Loan equal to the amount repaid by the equity injections. However, any determination to that effect would require evidence regarding the options available to USS to address the currency fluctuation issue, including the feasibility of conversion of such advances into another debt instrument rather than equity. Such evidence was not before the Court. In addition and in any event, the issue for the Court is whether USS expected repayment of an amount of the Revolver Loan equal to the remaining balance, being the First Tranche Indebtedness. The "de-leveraging" exercise does not demonstrate that USS also concluded that USSC would not be able to repay the amount of the Revolver Loan that it determined to leave outstanding.

[365] Third, there is a significant element of hindsight to this particular argument. The advances comprising the First Tranche Indebtedness were fully advanced before a decision to undertake the "de-leveraging" exercise was taken. In the absence of any documentary evidence of USS' decision-making in 2012, it is not possible to establish that the USS decision to convert a portion of the Revolver Loan to equity in 2013 reflected a determination made earlier in 2012 at the time of the advances under the Loan regarding the ability of USSC to repay such advances. More generally, there is no evidence that demonstrates that the use of equity injections to repay a portion or all of the Revolver Loan was contemplated at any time prior to late January 2013.

[366] Accordingly, I do not see any demonstrable connection between the use of the equity injections to pay down the Revolver Loan and the expectation of USS regarding repayment with interest of the Loan when the Revolver Loan was established or when the advances comprising the First Tranche Indebtedness were made in 2012.

[367] Lastly, as mentioned, the Province argues that, in respect of the Revolver Loan, USS advanced monies to USSC as an operating division based on anticipated benefits to the overall USS business and without any expectation of the payment of interest or the repayment of principal of the advances. On this view, USS provided monies to USSC that would not earn interest or be repaid because it would earn sufficient additional profits elsewhere in the organization to justify the increased equity investment in USSC.

[368] While such a possibility cannot be wholly discounted, the evidence for such a conclusion is lacking, apart from the absence of any credit analysis by USS before establishing the Revolver Loan in 2010, upon which the Province relies. There is no evidence that the losses that USSC generated were compensated for by profits elsewhere within the USS companies between 2010 and 2012. Moreover, there also is no evidence that, by 2010, the synergies envisaged at the time of the Acquisition outside of USSC were being realized within the USS business. As discussed above, the evidence only goes as far as demonstrating lax controls and perhaps a poor planning process. Such evidence is insufficient to demonstrate an absence of an expectation of repayment with interest of the advances under the Term Loan.

[369] Based on the foregoing, I therefore find that the evidence demonstrates, on a balance of probabilities, that USS had an expectation of repayment with interest of the advances comprising the First Tranche Indebtedness at the time such advances were made.

[370] I turn then to the evidence regarding the reasonableness of such expectation.

[371] In this regard, the principal argument of the Objecting Parties is that USSC could not have obtained an operating loan from a third-party lender on the terms and conditions of the Revolver Loan. They argue that this fact demonstrates that the First Tranche Indebtedness was in substance an equity injection.

[372] There is no doubt that a third-party lender would not have made an operating line of credit available on the terms and conditions of the Revolver Loan. The Hall Report opines that a third-party lender would not have granted an unsecured credit facility in 2010 given the circumstances that USSC was unprofitable, was experiencing negative EBITDA, had a net worth deficit on a book value basis, and had an outstanding balance under the Term Loan of approximately $1.6 billion. On the other hand, there is no evidence before the Court that would support a conclusion that secured financing would not have been available on viable terms from an external source other than a third-party lender. Neither Mr. Hall nor Mr. Finnerty expressed any opinion on this matter.

[373] The more difficult question is whether any external financing would have been available given the amount outstanding under the Term Loan in 2012, that is, whether the total debt capacity of USSC would have been exceeded by the addition of a secured operating line. If it could be demonstrated that such financing would not have been available, a court could find that it was unreasonable to expect repayment of the advances of the First Tranche Indebtedness, being Claim #10, when they were made.

[374] However, there is no capital markets evidence before the Court that addresses this issue directly.

[375] The limited financial evidence referred to above is not sufficient to support any inference regarding the debt capacity of USSC at such time as it is limited to the availability of an unsecured revolver loan from a third-party lender. As the Objecting Parties bear the onus of proof, there is, therefore, no basis for a conclusion that USS' expectation of repayment was unreasonable on the basis that USSC lacked the aggregate debt capacity in 2012 to establish a revolving loan facility in the amount of the Revolver Loan.

[376] Based on the foregoing, I conclude that USS had a reasonable expectation of repayment with interest of the advances constituting the First Tranche Indebtedness at the time such advances were made. I therefore also conclude that the unsecured Claim in respect of the Term Loan, being Claim #10, constitutes a debt claim rather than an "equity claim" for the purpose of this CCAA proceeding.

The Second Tranche Indebtedness

[377] As set out above, Credit Corp advanced loans to USSC under the Revolver Loan totaling U.S. $71 million after the execution of the Third Revolver Amendment and the October Security Agreement on or about October 30, 2013. These advances were outstanding at the Filing Date. USS did not make any equity injection after October 30, 2013. As noted above, USSC acknowledges that USSC was insolvent on a balance sheet basis as of October 31, 2013, by which it is understood that USSC's liabilities exceeded the fair market value of its assets as of that date. The Objecting Parties argue that the Second Tranche Indebtedness was also an equity contribution.

[378] For clarity, I have approached the issue of characterization of the Second Tranche Indebtedness on the basis that such Indebtedness is secured by the security constituted by the October Security Agreement. Because USS required such security before advancing the Second Tranche Indebtedness, it is not realistic to address the characterization of such Indebtedness independently of such security. Accordingly, no conclusion is reached in these Reasons on the characterization of such Indebtedness to the extent that such security may be held to be void or unenforceable.

[379] I find the evidence supports the conclusion that USS expected to be repaid the Second Tranche Indebtedness as advanced under the Revolver Loan for the following reasons.

[380] First, there can be little doubt that USS expected to be repaid the advances made after October 30, 2013 with interest given the security over all the assets of USSC provided by the October Security Agreement. The existence of security for the Second Tranche Indebtedness overwhelms any argument that could be made for an absence of any expectation of repayment with interest based on the general considerations relied upon to seek to characterize the Term Loan and the First Tranche Indebtedness as capital contributions. The existence of security also precludes an argument based on the financial status of USSC at the time the advances comprising the Second Tranche Indebtedness were made.

[381] Second, the principal argument of the Objecting Parties is that USS was legally and practically obligated to continue funding USSC. The Objecting Parties say that, if USS had not funded through the Revolver Loan, it would have had to fund the same amounts by equity injections. They argue that therefore the Revolver Loan was effectively an equity contribution. There are two difficulties with this argument.

[382] First, I find that USS was not legally obligated to continue funding USSC under the Revolver Loan Agreement for the following reasons.

[383] The Objecting Parties submit that, as of October 31, 2013, USS was legally obligated to continue to make all advances requested by USSC up to the limit of the availability under the Revolver Loan Agreement, being U.S. $600 million. This position is based on the contractual interpretation set out in the Di Massa Report of the "unable to meet debts" event of default in section 11c of the Revolver Loan Agreement as of October 30, 2007.

[384] However, I have concluded above that the "unable to meet debts" event of default constituted a balance sheet insolvency event of default in the Revolver Loan Agreement. There is no dispute that USSC was insolvent on a balance sheet basis in October 2013. Accordingly, on this interpretation of the Revolver Loan Agreement, an event of default had occurred under the "unable to meet debts" event of default in the Agreement entitling USS to refuse to advance further funds to USSC thereunder.

[385] In addition, even assuming that USS was obligated practically to ensure financing for USSC, I do not think it is correct to say that USS was obligated to provide that financing by equity injections. This argument assumes that secured financing was not available from external sources on a viable basis in the amount of the Second Tranche Indebtedness. However, there is no reason to think that a revolving loan on a secured basis in the amount advanced during the remainder of 2013, being approximately $71 million, would not have been available to USS, although admittedly on terms and conditions which would have differed from those of the Revolver Loan.

[386] I note that the Objecting Parties acknowledged at the trial that, but for the foregoing argument, they would have no compelling argument for characterization of the Second Tranche Indebtedness as a capital contribution. In particular, they do not raise any argument to the effect that any expectation of USS of repayment of the Second Tranche Indebtedness as secured debt was unreasonable. The principal issue raised by the Objecting Parties in respect of the Second Tranche Indebtedness is the validity or enforceability of the security for such Indebtedness constituted by the October Security Agreement, which is discussed below.

[387] Based on the foregoing, I conclude that USS had a reasonable expectation of repayment with interest of the advances comprising the Second Tranche Indebtedness at the time such advances were made.

The Validity of the Security for the Second Tranche Indebtedness

[388] The Objecting Parties submit that the security for the USS Secured Claims (being, collectively, Claims # 11, 11(a), 11(b), and 11(c)) should be invalidated. They make two principal arguments: (1) that the October Security Agreement and the November Security Agreement are unenforceable for lack of consideration at the time that they were executed and delivered by USSC; and (2) that the October Security Agreement and the November Security Agreement are void as constituting a fraudulent preference for the purposes of section 95(1)(b) of the BIA.

[389] In this section, I will address these issues in respect of the security for the Second Tranche Indebtedness, being the October Security Agreement. The security for the Remaining USS Secured Claims will be addressed in the last section of these Reasons.

Alleged Unenforceability of the October Security Agreement

[390] The Province and the Union argue that the October Security Agreement is unenforceable due to a lack of consideration at the time that it was executed and delivered by USSC and submit that, accordingly, the security constituted by such Agreement is invalid. On this basis, they argue that USS Claim #11, being the Second Tranche Indebtedness, should be declared to be an unsecured claim.

[391] USS says consideration was given for the October Security Agreement in the form of further advances under the Revolver Loan which would not have been granted without the provision of security for such advances, as referenced in the recital in the October Security Agreement cited above.

[392] The position of the Objecting Parties raises the following issues pertaining to the validity of security:

1. Is consideration for the October Security Agreement necessary for an enforceable security interest?

2. If so, did USS give consideration for the October Security Agreement in the form of an agreement to advance further funds under the Revolver Loan?

3. Alternatively, did USS give consideration for the October Security Agreement in the form of a forbearance or a waiver in respect of USS' rights to declare a default or take enforcement proceedings pursuant to the Revolver Loan Agreement or otherwise?

[393] I do not accept the position of the Objecting Parties that the October Security Agreement is unenforceable for want of consideration for the following reasons, which address each of these questions in turn.

[394] First, I do not think consideration is required for a grant of a security interest to be effective, although it will not be enforceable until such time as an obligation arises in favour of the grantee that is secured by the security interest. This result is a consequence of the fact that security is essentially a proprietary right. Consideration is not required to effect a pledge, or a charge on property. While a security interest is a statutory creation, I see nothing in the Personal Property Security Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.10 (the "PPSA") that imposes a requirement for consideration as a condition of the effectiveness of a grant of a security interest.

[395] The Objecting Parties say that a requirement for consideration is found in the statutory provisions of the PPSA that require a security agreement between the parties. Given that any agreement requires consideration in favour of a party to the agreement to be enforceable against such party, the Objecting Parties say it necessarily follows that consideration is required for a party to enforce the grant of a security interest in its favour in a security agreement. I acknowledge that, in the absence of consideration, the other covenants in favour of a grantee of a security interest in a security agreement may not be enforceable. That is, however, a different issue. In such event, the rights of the grantee would be limited to its statutory rights under the PPSA, but the grant of the security interest would still be effective.

[396] Consistent with this approach, the PPSA expressly distinguishes between a security agreement and a security interest. A "security agreement" is defined in section 1(1) of the PPSA as "an agreement that creates or provides for a security interest and includes a document evidencing a security interest". I see no reason why a "document evidencing a security interest" cannot include a document or instrument containing a unilateral grant of a security interest by a grantor in favour of a grantee. Such a grant would be effective as between the parties regardless of whether consideration was given, provided the grantee could demonstrate that the grantor intended it to be delivered. It would also be effective in respect of the rights of third parties, subject to the other requirements of the PPSA regarding rights in the collateral and attachment. It is the extension of credit, and thereby the creation of an obligation in favour of the grantee that is secured by the security interest, that makes the security interest enforceable.

[397] Second, if consideration is required for the security interest granted in the October Security Agreement to be effective, I think this requirement was satisfied in three separate ways.

[398] First, the October Security Agreement recites that consideration was given, the receipt and sufficiency of which is acknowledged by both parties to the Agreement. It is an elementary principle that courts will not enter into an inquiry as to the adequacy of consideration: see John D. McCamus, The Law of Contracts, (Toronto: Irwin Law, 2005), at p. 222.

[399] Second, as a related matter, as stated above, the third recital to the October Security Agreement recites, in effect, that Credit Corp required the provision of security as a condition of continued advances under the Revolver Loan Agreement. This recital is consistent with the Court's conclusion above that an event of default had occurred under the Revolver Loan Agreement entitling Credit Corp to refuse to advance further monies under the Revolver Loan. On this basis, USS was therefore in a position to provide consideration in the form of a commitment to advance further funds under the Revolver Loan Agreement. Accordingly, the commitment to advance further funds on the part of Credit Corp referred to in the third recital accurately reflected the existence of consideration for the purposes of the October Security Agreement.

[400] Third, I am also of the opinion that any lack of consideration for the October Security Agreement was cured by the actual advances of monies under the Revolver Loan Agreement comprising the Second Tranche Indebtedness. If the execution of the October Security Agreement and the advance of monies had occurred concurrently, there would have been no issue regarding a lack of consideration. The advance of monies itself would have satisfied any requirement for consideration under the October Security Agreement. In other words, under such circumstances, it would have been unreasonable, and unnecessary, to require demonstration of an intermediate commitment to advance further funds. The result should not change merely because there was a period of time between the execution of the October Security Agreement and the subsequent advance of monies under the Revolver Loan. The significance of the lapse of time is that the security interest was not enforceable, in the sense that the security interest did not secure any outstanding obligation and therefore could be enforced, until such time as an advance occurred under the Revolver Loan. It did not, however, render the October Security Agreement void for lack of consideration.

[401] The Objecting Parties raise three arguments to the effect that USS did not give any consideration, even if an event of default had arisen under the Revolver Loan Agreement which would otherwise have permitted USS to refuse to advance further funds under the Revolver Loan Agreement.

[402] First, the Objecting Parties say that, notwithstanding the occurrence of an event of default, USS had waived its right to assert such an event of default by advancing funds prior to January 2013. They say this course of conduct constituted a waiver of USS' right to assert such an event of default in October 2013 or of USS' right to use the event of default to deny further advances under the Revolver Loan at that time.

[403] This argument is rejected for three reasons. First, as a practical matter, the last advance which could have given rise to such a waiver took place in early January 2013. There is no evidence that USS knew that USSC was insolvent, and therefore that an event of default had occurred, at or prior to the time of any such advances. Second, as a legal matter, the language of the Revolver Loan Agreement excluded the operation of a waiver in October 2013 based on previous conduct on two grounds. The provisions of section 7 of the Revolver Loan Agreement require that, to be effective, any waiver must be in writing, which would exclude entirely the possibility of an unwritten waiver based on a course of conduct. In addition, section 7 expressly negates the operation of a waiver based on the granting of a previous waiver. Third, in any event, as a practical matter, there can be no doubt that, as between USS and USSC, USSC would have understood that no course of conduct by USS could have given rise to a waiver of USS' rights to determine the availability of funding under the Revolver Loan Agreement, as described above.

[404] Second, the Objecting Parties submit that USSC did not, in fact, provide consideration in the form of a commitment to advance further funds under the Revolver Loan. They base this argument on the fact that McQuade testified that he was never expressly advised by any USS representative that USS would refrain from advancing funds unless the October Security Agreement was signed. They also rely upon the fact that USS did not declare an event of default in October 2013.

[405] I do not accept this argument for the following reasons. By acceding to USS' position with full knowledge that USS was taking the position that it was entitled to withhold future advances, USSC must be taken to have accepted USS' legal position. In this regard, it is clear that McQuade understood that execution of the October Security Agreement was a condition of the further advance of funds to USSC at the time he signed the Third Revolver Amendment and the October Security Agreement, notwithstanding the absence of any direct conversation on the matter with any USS representative. Further, McQuade's determination that execution of the October Security Agreement was in the best interests of USSC was expressly made on the basis of his understanding that USSC needed the advances to continue to meet its obligations and that USSC would only receive the further advances if it consented to the security.

[406] Accordingly, while McQuade says he believed that USS was obligated to fund under the Revolver Loan Agreement up to the limit of availability, he also knew that USS was taking the position that it was entitled to withhold funding under the Agreement until it received security for any further advances. McQuade did not challenge this legal position on behalf of USSC. Instead, USSC agreed to provide the security. In these circumstances, it was not necessary for USS to declare an event of default as a formal matter to assert its legal position. More importantly, in the absence of a determination at the time regarding the right of USS to withhold further advances, the decision of USSC to provide security must constitute acceptance of such legal right of USS.

[407] Lastly, the Objecting Parties say that, as a practical matter, USS was never going to stop advancing funds in October 2013 for reasons relating to the operational impact on USS and USSC as well as the potential triggering of cross-default provisions on the USS public debt. Whether or not this is true, I do not think it demonstrates an absence of legal consideration for the following reasons. First, the absence of a legal obligation to advance further funds is by itself sufficient to give rise to consideration. Second, the grant of security by USSC forecloses this argument as it become entirely speculative. The position of the Objecting Parties requires the Court to make a determination that, in the hypothetical situation in which USSC refused to provide the required security, USS would necessarily have advanced the monies comprising the Second Tranche Indebtedness. I do not think the Court could make such a determination on the limited evidence before it. Among other things, in order to make such a determination, the Court would need to address the other options that would have been available to USS in such circumstances, including a filing under the CCAA and DIP financing, which was raised at the time by the financial advisors to USS.Based on the foregoing, I do not accept the position of the Objecting Parties that the security constituted by the October Security Agreement is unenforceable for lack of consideration.

[408] For completeness, USS also argues that it gave consideration in the form of a forbearance from declaring a default, accelerating the Revolver Loan or instituting insolvency proceedings. These arguments also turn, at least in part, on the Court's acceptance of the contractual interpretation of the "unable to meet debts" event of default proposed in the Di Massa Report. Given the determination herein regarding consideration for the October Security Agreement, it is not necessary to address these potential additional sources of consideration, and I therefore decline to make a finding on these issues.

Alleged Fraudulent Preference

[409] In the alternative, if the October Security Agreement is held to be enforceable, the Objecting Parties submit that the Agreement constituted a fraudulent preference for the purpose of section 95(1)(b) of the BIA, as incorporated into the CCAA by the provisions of section 36.1 thereof. It is not disputed that the Objecting Parties bear the onus of proof in respect of this Objection.

[410] The provisions of section 95 of the BIA have been set out above. To succeed in this proceeding, the Objecting Parties must demonstrate: (1) a non-arm's length relationship between USSC and USS at the time of entering into the October Security Agreement; (2) that USSC was insolvent at the time of entering into the October Security Agreement; (3) that the October Security Agreement was entered into within twelve months of the Filing Date; and (4) that the October Security Agreement had the effect of giving USS, or more particularly Credit Corp as the lender under the Revolver Loan, a preference over other unsecured creditors at the date of delivery of October Security Agreement. There is no dispute that Credit Corp was not dealing at arm's length with USSC, that USSC was insolvent on and after October 30, 2013, and that the grant of security in favour of Credit Corp occurred less than one year prior to the Filing Date.

[411] USS argues, however, that the granting of security in the October Security Agreement did not give rise to a preference over another creditor entitling the Objecting Parties to relief under section 95 of the BIA. It bases this argument on the fact that the security in favour of Credit Corp is only being asserted in respect of advances made under the Revolver Loan after October 30, 2013, that is, in respect of the Second Tranche Indebtedness. USS bases its argument on the principle that there is no preference under section 95 if, and to the extent that, security is granted by a debtor company in respect of fresh advances which are used in the ongoing operations of the debtor company: see McAsphault Industries Ltd. v. Six Paws Investments Ltd., [1995] O.J. No. 2450 (C.A.), at para. 19.

[412] The Objecting Parties make two submissions.

[413] The principal submission of the Objecting Parties is that the October Security Agreement constituted a fraudulent preference because Credit Corp obtained security in circumstances in which it was obligated to advance monies under the Revolver Loan Agreement. They say that, if Credit Corp had an unqualified obligation to advance monies under the Revolver Loan as and when requested by USSC up to such limit, delivery of the October Security Agreement would have constituted a fraudulent preference on the basis that delivery of security in such circumstances would be similar to providing security for past debts. This argument turns on the question of the extent to which Credit Corp was legally obligated to advance funds to USSC up to the limit of availability under the Revolver Loan Agreement as and when requested by USSC. It is a novel argument that could only arise, as a practical matter, in a non-arm's length situation.

[414] I have reservations regarding the merits of this argument as a matter of law. However, it is not necessary to determine the issue the alleged fraudulent preference on this basis. I have concluded above, in the context of the determination that USS provided consideration for the grant of the October Security Agreement, that Credit Corp was not obligated to advance further funds under the Revolver Loan Agreement. On this basis, this argument of the Objecting Parties cannot succeed.

[415] The alternative argument of the Objecting Parties is that the security in favour of Credit Corp under the October Security Agreement must fail in its entirety to the extent that the October Security Agreement purports to secure a pre-existing debt. They rely on Re Fulton (No. 2), [1926] O.J. No. 115 (C.A.), at para. 7, for this proposition.

[416] I accept that the granting of security for existing or past indebtedness constitutes a preference for the purpose of section 95 of the BIA. However, USS is not asserting a secured claim in respect of any such obligations in this proceeding, notwithstanding that the definition of "Secured Obligations" in the October Security Agreement extends to pre-existing indebtedness.

[417] In such circumstances, the Court of Appeal made it clear in McAsphault, at para. 19, that "a security may be bad in respect to some advances, but enforceable in respect to others, thus protecting payments made by an insolvent company which would otherwise be preferential." In that case, the evidence indicated that the fresh advances at issue were used in the on-going operations of the company. On that basis, the Court of Appeal held that the repayment of the advances did not constitute a fraudulent preference.

[418] In my opinion, the same principle operates in the present circumstances. There is no dispute that the advances comprising the Second Tranche Indebtedness were used in the on-going operations of USSC's business. The advances under the Revolver Loan after October 30, 2013 therefore benefitted the unsecured creditors as of the date of such advances. This factual context is sufficient under the case law to exclude a finding of a fraudulent preference under section 36.1 of the CCAA and section 95 of the BIA.

[419] The decision in Fulton does not assist the Objecting Parties for the reason that the circumstances in Fulton were qualitatively different from the present circumstances. Fulton involved advances under a chattel mortgage totaling $3,800, of which $2,200 represented a new advance after the date of the chattel mortgage. The mortgage purported to secure the existing obligation as well as the new advance. The security was declared invalid in respect of both advances. However, there was a significant issue with the new advance that explains the result in that decision. The Court of Appeal expressly held that there was "no doubt that the $2,200 did not in fact increase the assets of the estate in any tangible way." In fact, the court concluded that there was no evidence regarding what became of the $2,200. Accordingly, the security failed in its entirety because the new advance could not be demonstrated to have been used in the operations of the debtor, not because the mortgage also purported to secure a past advance.

[420] Based on the foregoing, I conclude that there is no basis for a finding that the delivery of the October Security Agreement constituted the grant of a fraudulent preference by USSC in favour of Credit Corp insofar as the security constituted thereby secured the Second Tranche Indebtedness.

Conclusion Regarding the Second Tranche Indebtedness

[421] Based on the foregoing, I conclude that Claim #11, being the claim in respect of the Second Tranche Indebtedness under the Revolver Loan, constitutes a debt claim, rather than an "equity claim", which is a Secured Claim for the purpose of this CCAA proceeding.

Remaining USS Secured Claims

[422] As mentioned, the Objecting Parties also submit that the security for the Remaining USS Claims (being Claims #11(a), 11(b) and 11(c)), should be invalidated on the grounds that the security for such Claims, being the November Security Agreement, is either unenforceable as a matter of contract law for lack of consideration at the time it was executed and delivered by USSC or void as constituting a fraudulent preference for the purposes of section 95(1)(b) of the BIA. The Objecting Parties do not dispute the quantum of any of these three Claims nor do they suggest that these Claims are "equity claims". For completeness, the Objecting Parties also submitted that the November Security Agreement cannot be an enforceable obligation to the extent that the Court were to find that the October Security Agreement was unenforceable. Given the determination above, it is not necessary to address this submission.

[423] I propose to address the issues pertaining to the Remaining USS Secured Claims in the following order. First, I will describe the nature of the November Security Agreement. Then I will address the issues pertaining to Claim #11(c) (Intercompany Goods & Services), which relates to the provision of goods and services by USS to USSC prior to the Initial Order. Lastly, I will address the issues pertaining to Claim #11(a) (the Cliffs Transaction) and Claim #11(b) (Credit Support Payments), which involve different considerations, as these claims arose after the Filing Date.

The November Security Agreement

[424] On November 12, 2013, Credit Corp, USSC, USS, United States Steel International, Inc. and SHC executed a further amendment and restatement of the October Security Agreement that provided security to each of USS, United States Steel International, Inc. and SHC (collectively, the "USS Affiliates") in respect of the provision of intercompany goods and services on credit by any of them to USSC (as so amended, the "November Security Agreement") in addition to, and alongside, the security already provided to Credit Corp in respect of advances under the Revolver Loan pursuant to the October Security Agreement.

[425] The November Security Agreement contains recitals to the effect that each USS Affiliate sells "Goods" to USSC pursuant to arrangements and agreements, defined for such purposes as the "Sales Agreements", as between the USS Affiliates and USSC, that the USS Affiliates have determined that, in light of USSC's financial position and credit worthiness, they "no longer wish to sell Goods to the Debtor on terms other than cash in advance or cash on delivery, unless the Debtor provides acceptable financial accommodations" and that, "upon the Debtor's request, the [USS Affiliates] are willing to continue to sell Goods to the Debtor on credit…provided that the Debtor secures its obligations to pay for such Goods pursuant to the terms of the [November Security Agreement]". I would note that the definition of "Goods" for purposes of the November Security Agreement is "materials, goods and other products (including inventory and raw materials)".

[426] The extension of security to the USS Affiliates was implemented by adding the USS Affiliates as parties to the October Security Agreement, providing that such parties were "Secured Parties" for purposes of such Agreement, and amending the definition of "Secured Obligations" to read as follows:

> …all obligations, duties, indebtedness and liabilities of the Debtor from time to time owing by the Debtor to any Secured Party including, without limitation, obligations, duties, indebtedness and liabilities arising under, or in connection with: (i) the Loan Agreement; (ii) any amendment or restatement of the Loan Agreement, including any such amendment or restatement which increases or decreases the maximum amount of Loans and other obligations that may be made by Secured Party to Debtor thereunder; (iii) this Agreement; (iv) all obligations > arising out of, in connection with or relating to the Sales Agreements or the sale of Goods by any USS Seller to the Debtor at any time and from time to time; and (v) any other document made, delivered or given in connection with any of the foregoing; in each case whether now existing or hereafter arising, whether evidenced by a note or other writing, whether allowed in any bankruptcy, insolvency, receivership or other similar proceedings, whether arising from an extension of credit, issuance of a letter of credit, acceptance, loan, guarantee, indemnification or otherwise, and whether direct or indirect, absolute or contingent, due or to become due, primary or secondary, or joint or several.

[427] By virtue of the definition of "Secured Obligations", therefore, all obligations owing by USSC to Credit Corp under the Revolver Loan Agreement, or to any of the USS Affiliates in respect of the sale of Goods, were entitled to the benefit of the general security interest granted by USSC in the Security Agreement, as amended and restated by the October Agreement and the November Security Agreement.

[428] I would also note that the first advance comprising the Second Tranche Indebtedness was made at the time that the October Security Agreement was in force and that the two later advances were apparently made after the November Security Agreement came into force. However, it is not disputed that the same security interest was continued under the November Security Agreement. I would also note that the parties addressed the validity of the security for the Second Tranche Indebtedness, and the existence of a fraudulent preference in respect of the granting of security for the Second Tranche Indebtedness, in the context of the October Security Agreement rather than the November Security Agreement. As the Objecting Parties have not raised any additional issues in respect of the Second Tranche Indebtedness pertaining to the November Security Agreement, I have proceeded on the basis that such Indebtedness is secured thereunder the extent that the security for the Second Tranche Indebtedness under the October Security Agreement is not invalidated for one of the reasons discussed above.

The Intercompany Trade Claim - Claim #11 (c)

[429] As mentioned, the Objecting Parties argue that the security for this Claim is either unenforceable for want of consideration from the USS Affiliates with respect to the November Security Agreement or void on the basis that the grant of the November Security Agreement constituted a fraudulent preference. I will address each issue in turn. I note that there is no issue regarding the fair market value of the goods and services relating to this Claim.

Alleged Unenforceability of the November Security Agreement

[430] The principles regarding the requirement for consideration in respect of the grant of a security interest in a security agreement have been addressed above in respect of the October Security Agreement. I do not propose to repeat that discussion in this section. As applied to the November Security Agreement, I reach the following conclusions.

[431] First, for the reasons set out above, I do not think that consideration is required for the grant of the security interest in the November Security Agreement.

[432] Further, to the extent that consideration is required to enforce the security constituted by the November Security Agreement, I find that consideration was given for the November

Security Agreement, as verified in the recitals in the Agreement and acknowledged by all the parties. In particular, the recitals to the November Security Agreement reflect the grant of consideration from the USS Affiliates in the form of a commitment to continue to provide the goods and services that are the subject of this Claim. The position of the USS Affiliates was made clear to McQuade before he executed the November Security Agreement on behalf of USSC. There is no evidence before the Court that would indicate that the USS Affiliates lacked the legal right to refuse to provide such goods and services if USSC had refused to provide the security. Insofar as the Objecting Parties suggest that the USS Affiliates were not going to stop providing these services, as a practical matter, I consider that the reasoning and conclusions reached in respect of the comparable argument made regarding the security for the Second Tranche Indebtedness is equally applicable in this context.

[433] In addition, any lack of consideration was cured by the delivery and provision by the USS Affiliates of the goods and services in respect of Claim #11(c). I note that such delivery is the substantive equivalent of an advance of funds to be used in the operations of USSC to acquire such goods and services. If USS had advanced the purchase price of such goods and services to USSC under the Revolver Loan for the purpose of payment of such obligations, such advances would have been secured pursuant to the October Security Agreement based on the conclusion reached above. There is no principled reason why the result would differ because the USS Affiliates provided goods and services rather than advanced funds for such purposes.

[434] Accordingly, I conclude that the November Security Agreement is not unenforceable in respect of the amounts constituting Claim #11(c) for lack of consideration from the USS Affiliates to USSC.

Alleged Fraudulent Preference

[435] The principles regarding the operation of section 95(1)(b) of the BIA have also been set out above. As discussed above, there is no evidence before the Court that the USS Affiliates were legally obligated to continue to provide the goods and services that are the basis for this Claim. The security constituted by the November Security Agreement was given in respect of a the provision of additional goods and services that would not otherwise have been provided to USSC. Accordingly, for the reasons set out above, I conclude that the grant of the security under by the November Security Agreement in favour of the USS Affiliates did not constitute a fraudulent preference in their favour for the purposes of section 95.

[436] Further, as stated above, the delivery and provision of the goods and services in respect of Claim #11(c) represents the substantive equivalent of a fresh advance of funds to USSC to be used in the operation of its business. On this basis, the grant of security in respect of the delivery and provision of such goods and services did not prejudice the unsecured creditors of USSC as of the date of delivery of the November Security Agreement or the date of the delivery or provision of such goods and services and does not constitute a fraudulent preference.

[437] Based on the foregoing, I conclude there is no basis for a finding that the delivery of the November Security Agreement by the USS Affiliates in respect of Claim #11(c) constituted the grant of a fraudulent preference by USSC in favour of such parties.

The Cliffs Transaction Claim and the Credit Support Payments Claim – Claims #11(a) and #(b)

[438] The claims for the Cliffs transaction and the credit support payments each arose after the Filing Date in the following circumstances.

[439] USSC took delivery from Cliffs of the iron ore that is the subject of the Cliffs transaction prior to the Filing Date. However, USS was not in a position to sell the iron ore to USSC until it had paid Cliffs. Because USS did not pay for the iron ore until after the Filing Date, its claim against USSC for payment of the iron ore arose after the Filing Date.

[440] USSC incurred the third-party obligations that are the basis of the credit support payments claim prior to the Filing Date but had not paid them as of that date. Because USS paid such claims pursuant to its guarantees in favour of such third parties after the Filing Date, its claim against USSC in respect of these payments also arose after the Filing Date.

[441] I will address each of these claims in turn.

The Cliffs Transaction – Claim #11(a)

[442] The Objecting Parties argue that the security for this Claim constituted by the November Security Agreement is either unenforceable or void as a fraudulent preference on the same grounds upon which they rely in respect of Claim #11(c). In addition, they argue that this claim is a pre-filing claim that is no different from all other trade creditor claims outstanding on the Filing Date. They argue that the effect of the November Security Agreement is to elevate improperly an unsecured pre-filing claim into a secured claim.

[443] This Claim involves the sale of goods by USS to USSC and is therefore similar as a factual matter to the circumstances in Claim #11(c). I conclude that the principles that governed the determinations with respect to Claim #11(c) regarding the issues of consideration for the November Security Agreement and the alleged fraudulent preference are equally applicable in the present situation, with the following additional consideration which reinforces the conclusions therein.

[444] In the case of this Claim, the Iron Ore Agreement specifically evidences fresh consideration for the grant of security pursuant to the November Security Agreement. While it is correct that USS was obligated to pay Cliffs under its agreement with Cliffs, as the Objecting Parties say, there is no evidence that USS was legally obligated to sell the iron ore to USSC once it acquired title to the ore. USS could have required that USSC deliver up possession of the iron ore to it. Instead, USS and USSC entered into a fresh agreement regarding the purchase by USSC of the iron ore at a time when USSC was independently represented. The Iron Ore Agreement provided that USSC's obligation to pay for such iron ore, when it arose, would be a "Secured Obligation" for purposes of the November Security Agreement, in return for USS' agreement effectively to sell USSC its interest in the iron ore and to pay Cliffs the purchase price of the ore on behalf of USSC.

[445] Such circumstances are sufficient to satisfy any requirement for the demonstration of consideration for the grant of security pursuant to the November Security Agreement in respect of the purchase price obligation of USSC and to negate any fraudulent preference upon the grant of such security for such obligation.

[446] I would add that, in the case of this claim, USSC expressly agreed to the secured treatment of the purchase price obligation prior to such obligation coming into existence. As such, the circumstances do not involve the transformation of a pre-filing unsecured claim into a post-filing secured claim.

The Credit Support Payments Claim – Claim #11(b)

[447] As discussed above, USS paid these obligations pursuant to guarantees established in favour of the third-party creditors. It asserts Claim #11(b) against USSC pursuant to its rights of subrogation. USS submits that such rights of subrogation constitute "Secured Obligations" for the purposes of the November Security Agreement and, accordingly, rank ahead of all other trade creditors. If these credit support payments are secured, a consequence would be that the unsecured, pre-filing claims of the third party-creditors have become secured, post-filing claims of USS without any involvement of the Monitor or the Court pursuant to the provisions of section 10 of the Initial Order, which would otherwise govern the payment of pre-filing obligations.

[448] The Objecting Parties argue that the security for this Claim constituted by the November Security Agreement is either unenforceable or void as a fraudulent preference on the same grounds upon which they rely in respect of Claims #11(a) and #11(c).

[449] After a review of the documentation pertaining to this Claim, I think there is a threshold issue of whether the USS subrogation rights at issue qualify as "Secured Obligations" under the November Security Agreement. This issue was not, however, raised directly in the submissions of the parties. The parties should therefore be given an opportunity to make submissions regarding this threshold issue to the extent they wish to do so.

[450] Accordingly, I do not propose to address the determination of the issues pertaining to this Claim at this time. If the parties are unable to agree on a schedule for submissions on the threshold issue, they should contact the Court to arrange a telephone case conference at their convenience.

Conclusions

[451] he USS Claims referenced as Claims #1-8 inclusive in the Monitor's Third Report are not disputed in this proceeding and are therefore confirmed as unsecured Claims under the Claims Process Order. Based on the foregoing, the USS Claims referenced in such Report as Claims #9 and #10 are also confirmed as unsecured Claims under the Claims Process Order and Claims #11, #11(a) and #11(c) are confirmed as Secured Claims. The USS Claim referenced in the Report as Claim #11(b) remains to be determined.

AZOXCO CRYOGÉNIQUE INC.
RESPONDENT – Debtor

---

[1] The appellants appeal against a judgment rendered by the Superior Court on October 1, 2021 (the Honourable Madam Justice Danielle Turcotte),[1] which annulled the decision of the respondent's trustee to allow their proof of claim as unsecured creditors, characterized said claim as an equity claim under s. 2 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency

---

1 Avis d'intention de Azoxco Cryogénique inc., 2021 QCCS 4100 [judgment under appeal].

Act[2] ("BIA") and declared that the appellants are not entitled to vote on the respondent's proposal.

[2] The facts are as follows. On June 28, 2019, the appellants, who were shareholders of Azoxco Cryogénique Inc. ("Pre-amalgamation Azoxco") at the time, sold all of their shares to 9397-5530 Québec Inc. ("Québec Inc."). An amount of $2,535,000 was paid, with a balance payable at a later date.

[3] That same day, and as provided for in section 0.01.06 of the contract for the sale of shares, Québec Inc. and Pre-amalgamation Azoxco carried out a short-form amalgamation through which the first entity absorbed the second. The amalgamated corporation adopted the name Azoxco Cryogénique. The amalgamated corporation is the respondent, which therefore became the debtor for the balance of the share sale price.

[4] On August 25, 2020, the appellants, who had still not been paid, claimed from the respondent an amount of $1,952,817, representing the balance of the selling price. The respondent presented a defence and filed a cross-application, alleging fraud and misrepresentation by the appellants.

[5] In February 2021, the respondent filed a notice of intention to make a proposal to its creditors, which led to a stay of the appellants' proceedings. The stay was subsequently lifted.

[6] On February 2, 2021, the appellants filed a proof of claim as unsecured creditors.

[7] On July 8, 2021, the meeting of creditors was adjourned for the purpose of obtaining a legal opinion on the admissibility of the appellants' claim.

[8] On August 6, 2021, the trustee announced that it was accepting the appellants' claim.

[9] The effect of this decision would be to cause the respondent's bankruptcy because the appellants held the deciding vote and, unlike the other creditors, intended to vote against the proposal. The respondent therefore challenged the trustee's decision under s. 37 BIA. This is the issue that was adjudicated in the judgment under appeal.

[10] Based on s. 286 of the Business Corporations Act[3] ("BCA"), the judge concluded that the amalgamation had not changed the nature of the claim, as the rights and obligations of the amalgamating corporations had become those of the amalgamated corporation. The judge also noted that, in their pleadings, the appellants themselves had alleged that the claim was in respect of the balance of the selling price of the Pre-amalgamation Azoxco shares.

[11] Applying the principles developed by the Ontario Court of Appeal in Sino-Forest,[4] pursuant to which the notion of equity claim must be given an expansive interpretation and the analysis must focus on the nature of the claim rather than the identity of the claimant, the judge found that the appellants' claim was in respect of equity. Although the judge did not state it explicitly, she linked the claim to "a monetary loss resulting from the ownership, purchase or sale of an equity interest or from the rescission, or, in Quebec, the annulment, of a purchase or sale of an equity interest" set out in paragraph (d) of the definition.

[14] It is necessary to clearly identify what is at issue in this appeal.

[15] A corporation's equity constitutes the shareholders' assets. It consists, in particular, of the issued and paid-up share capital or the retained earnings.[5]

[16] The rule set out in s. 54.1 BIA, which prohibits holders of equity claims from voting on a proposal, is intended, on the one hand, to prevent such holders from controlling the outcome of the vote and, on the other hand, to prioritize the protection of creditors who, unlike shareholders and other equity holders, have not participated in a speculative adventure.[6] Insolvency is a risk associated with the investment made by shareholders and, indeed, that risk justifies their potential profits. Author Frank Bennet has the following to say on this point:[7]

> EQUITY CLAIMS
>
> Claims against a company that result from ownership, purchase or sale of an equity interest in the debtor company and related indemnity claims are considered equity claims. Such claims as shareholders' claims can result in significant upside while creditors who supply goods and services do not share in the same upside. Consequently, there can be no distribution to holders of equity claims unless non-equity claimants are paid in full. Shareholders cannot expect to receive a dividend until all the creditors are satisfied. Shareholders do not have any financial interest in the debtor company until that happens.
> [Reference omitted]

[17] The definition of "equity claim" in s. 2 BIA includes, among others, a dividend, a redemption obligation, or a monetary loss resulting from the ownership, purchase or sale of an equity interest. The issue in the matter at hand, therefore, is whether the appellants' claim falls within this list, which, through the use of the words "among others", indicates that the list is not exhaustive.

7 Frank Bennett, Bennett on Bankruptcy, 24th ed., Toronto, LexisNexis, 2022, p. 1371. His comments pertain to the definition of "equity claim" under s. 2 of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. (1985), c. C-36, which is identical to the definition in s. 2 BIA.

[18] The uniqueness of this case can be summarized as follows. Upon the sale of the shares, the appellants' claim against Québec Inc. was in respect of shares – thus equity – of Pre-amalgamation Azoxco, which was a third party to the contract. This means that, as between the parties to the contract, and pursuant to the BIA, the appellants had an unsecured claim against Québec Inc. It also means that at this point, if Pre-amalgamation Azoxco had become bankrupt, the appellants would not have had a claim or held equity with respect to it. The shares of Pre-amalgamation Azoxco held by Québec Inc. were an asset of Québec Inc.

[19] However, as a result of the amalgamation, the respondent, as the continuation of Québec Inc.'s juridical personality, assumed the debt owed by Québec Inc., and the shares of Pre-amalgamation Azoxco held by Québec Inc. were cancelled. Consequently, the issue is whether the claim, insofar as it is in respect of equity of one of the entities that resulted in the creation of the respondent, is a claim in respect of equity, within the meaning of s. 2 BIA, of the respondent. If it is, then, pursuant to s. 54.1 BIA, the appellants cannot vote on the proposal. If it is not, they can indeed vote.

[20] The appellants submit that the judge erred when, taking into account the amalgamation, she changed the nature of their claim against Québec Inc. – which was merely an unsecured claim – into an equity claim. In their view, the amalgamation could not have had that effect, because under s. 286 BCA, the amalgamation merely transferred Québec Inc.'s debt to the respondent, but did not modify that debt. It was an unsecured claim – which is not contested – and remained so.

[21] The appellants further argue that in order for their claim to be characterized as an equity claim, it was necessary that, at the time of the notice of intention, they hold a share in the respondent, or a warrant, an option or other analogous right. That said, not only was that not the case, but s. 282 BCA provides that the shares of Pre-amalgamation Azoxco, which the appellants sold, no longer existed and were not replaced by shares in the respondent. Therefore, the appellants were never shareholders of the respondent.

[22] As for the respondent, it argues that our Court owes great deference to the trial judge, both because she was seized of a question of mixed law and fact and because s. 37 BIA confers broad discretion on her. It further argues that the judge was correct in applying the analytical framework set out in Sino-Forest, in which the Ontario Court of Appeal established that the important factor is the nature of the claim, not the status of the claimant – that is, whether or not it is a shareholder.[8] In the respondent's view, applying the appellants' interpretation would depart from that principle by requiring that, at the moment the notice of intention is filed, the claimant hold a share or other type of equity interest. It would also indirectly achieve what s. 54.1 of the BIA seeks to proscribe, by allowing the appellants to vote on the proposal.

[8] Sino-Forest, supra, note 4, para. 46.

[23] Before this Court, the parties both contend, as the trial judge did, that the amalgamation did not change the nature of the appellants' claim, but they draw contrary conclusions. The respondent, however, had argued the opposite in its motion appealing the trustee's decision. Upon reflection, and as explained below, whether or not the amalgamation changed the nature of the claim ultimately depends on the angle from which one analyzes the case.

[24] As stated above, at the time of the sale of the shares, the nature of the appellants' claim against their debtor, Québec Inc., was not in respect of the latter's equity, but rather the equity of a third party, namely Pre-amalgamation Azoxco. This means that if Québec Inc. had become bankrupt, the appellants could have filed a claim as unsecured creditors. This perspective supports the appellants' argument to the effect that by characterizing their claim as an "equity claim" after the amalgamation, the judge altered the nature of the initial claim and, in so doing, the appellants' insolvency risk.

[25] Conversely, the nature of the debt can also be viewed from the perspective of what was sold. In the present case, the appellants sold all the shares of Pre-amalgamation Azoxco, and a balance of sale was owed to them by Québec Inc. Their claim pertained to shares of Pre-amalgamation Azoxco and, consequently, it pertained to an equity interest in that corporation. Following the sale, Pre-amalgamation Azoxco and Québec Inc. carried out a short-form amalgamation and became the respondent. In reality, this type of amalgamation is but a reorganization of the amalgamating corporations' share capital.[9] As Professor Paul Martel points out, the amalgamated corporation is not a different entity from the amalgamating corporations, but rather their continuation, such that the amalgamated corporation holds all the property, rights and obligations of the original entities, without third-party rights having been affected by the amalgamation.[10] This is the essence of what is set out in the second paragraph of s. 286 BCA. The respondent, therefore, found itself with all the assets and liabilities of Pre-amalgamation Azoxco and Québec Inc. As for Pre-amalgamation Azoxco's equity, it was cancelled and, given the facts, converted into a debt owed by the respondent. The respondent was therefore now obliged to pay a debt related to equity of one of the amalgamating entities whose juridical personality it continued.

[26] How should the matter be resolved?

[27] In the case at bar, the Court does indeed owe great deference to the trial judge's findings, because she exercised a power under s. 37 BIA, which gave her wide discretion.[11]

[28] In addition to this first reason for deference, there is the nature of the issue the trial judge had before her. Contrary to the appellants' contention, this was not a pure question of law, but rather a mixed question. Indeed, the judge's characterization of the nature of the claim was not a purely technical exercise; it required her to consider the circumstances of the matter at hand in order to seek out the true nature of the transaction.[12] In the present case, the sale of the shares was inextricably linked to the amalgamation. Not only was the amalgamation provided for in the contract, but it occurred in its wake. This concomitance and the integration of the steps that took place provide a genuine indication of the nature of the transaction and the interests at stake. This approach is all the more necessary as it has been noted that distinguishing equity from unsecured claims may be difficult at times because corporations are finding new mechanisms that can narrow the gap between these two categories.[13]

[29] Let us look at the issue differently and assume that the shares the appellants held in Pre-amalgamation Azoxco had been repurchased by Pre-amalgamation Azoxco itself (rather than through Québec Inc.). Logically, and in accordance with a broad interpretation of the definition of equity claim,[14] such a transaction should have been characterized as a transaction under paragraph (d) of the definition, since the unpaid balance indeed constituted a loss resulting from "the ownership, purchase or sale of an equity interest […]". Accepting the appellants' position would circumvent the application of s. 54.1 BIA by allowing them to vote on the proposal, which would be directly contrary to the legislature's intent to subordinate the interests of holders of equity interests to those of creditors.

[30] Lastly, the Court cannot accept the appellants' argument that the definition of "equity claim" presupposes that, at the time of the notice of intention, they had to hold a share in the respondent, or a warrant, an option or other such right. Not only would adding such a condition run counter to the broad and liberal interpretation of this definition and depart from the legislature's intent to subordinate the protection of holders of an equity interest to that of creditors – as already discussed above – but the very wording of the definition does not suggest it. Indeed, paragraph (d) of the definition refers to a monetary loss resulting from, among other things, the sale of an equity interest. Consequently, once such equity has been sold, the seller is, by definition, no longer its owner. Nonetheless, its claim can still be characterized as an equity claim under paragraph (d) of the definition. There is no reason to conclude otherwise because the matter at hand involves a balance of sale.

[31] This was also the conclusion of the Ontario Court of Appeal in Sino-Forest. In that case, the shareholders had sued the accountants, who had failed to detect inaccuracies in the financial information provided by the corporation. The Ontario Court of Appeal, upholding the decision of Morawetz, J., concluded that this claim was included in the definition of "equity claim" even if the claimant did not hold, and had never held, such equity. That case, admittedly, is not identical to the one before us, because, ultimately, the beneficiaries of the claim were equity holders. Nevertheless, in both cases, an analysis of the nature of the claim rather than the nature of the claimant indicates that the claim is in respect of an equity interest.

[32] Absent a palpable and overriding error committed by the trial judge in characterizing the genuine nature of the claim, the appeal must be dismissed.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT:

REASONS OF SCHRAGER, J.A.

[9] This is an appeal from the judgment rendered on May 5, 2022 by the Superior Court, Commercial Division, District of Montreal (the Honourable Martin Castonguay).[1]

[10] The judgment sets aside, in part, the disallowance by the Appellant-Trustee[2] of the Respondent's proof of claim in the bankruptcy of Public Bike System Company ("Bixi") and declares that the Respondent[3] is an unsecured creditor for an amount of $31,746,757 ranking pari passu with the other unsecured creditors.

[11] For the reasons which follow, I propose that the Court allow the appeal, overturn the judgment under appeal and dismiss the Respondent's appeal from the Trustee's notice of disallowance of its proof of claim.

I. FACTS

[12] The partial disallowance of the Respondent's claim pertains to the following sums of money:

- $8,191,681.12 due by Bixi to the Respondent and arising from payments by the Respondent to Bixi's banker pursuant to a guarantee signed by the Respondent;

- $31,746,575 due by Bixi to the Respondent for a direct loan that was declared null by the Court in a previous judgment.[4]

[13] The text of the disallowance reads in part as follows:

> 2. With respect to Ville de Montreal's entire claim in the amount of $39,938,256.12:
>
> • Ville de Montreal was not dealing at arm's length with the debtor when it entered into the various transactions at the basis of its claim, as held by the Court of Appeal at paragraphs 67 and following of its judgement in Ville de Montreal c. Litwin Boyadjian inc. (Syndic de Société de vélo en libre-service), 2019 QCCA 794. In the Trustee's opinion, these transactions > cannot be deemed "proper" within the meaning of section 137(1) of the Act, as they were entered into in violation of the Municipal Aid Act, a legislation of public order intended to protect taxpayers against municipal mismanagement of public funds. The City's claim must thus be postponed pursuant to section 137(1) of the Act.

3 Herein the "Respondent" or the "City".

> • Alternatively, Ville de Montréal's claim must be characterized as an equity claim and postponed accordingly pursuant to section 140.1 of the Act. Pursuant to the recharacterization doctrine, the Trustee must consider the manner in which the underlying transactions were implemented and the economic reality of the surrounding circumstances. The record shows inter alia that Ville de Montréal intervened to regularize the Bankrupt's financial situation at a time when the latter could not find other sources of financing in order to uphold the Debtor's bike-sharing services for the benefit of its citizens. Moreover, the Convention de prêt dated May 27, 2011 was mostly used to reimburse the Bankrupt's starting capital (initially itself lent by Société en commandite Stationnement de Montréal). In short, the transactions at the basis of Ville de Montréal's claim must be recharacterized as capital contributions.

[14] It is common ground that the Respondent's claim, if not postponed, would seriously dilute the distribution to the unsecured creditors of Bixi from the approximate amount of $21,000,000 held by the Trustee for such purpose. If the claim is postponed, the Respondent will not receive any dividend.

[15] The Court's 2019 Judgment referred to above[5] declared that the loan advanced by the Respondent to Bixi and the hypothec granted to secure it were null as they offended a provision of public order prohibiting municipalities from offering financial assistance to commercial establishments.[6] However, the judgment went on to declare that the Respondent was nevertheless a creditor of Bixi (in an amount of $31,746,575) since the nullity of the loan agreement gave rise to the obligation of restitution between the parties, such that Bixi should return the loan proceeds received from the Respondent. However, since the bankruptcy of Bixi made it impossible for Bixi to pay the monies to the Respondent, the Court modified the manner of making restitution and recognized that the Respondent could file a proof of claim in the bankruptcy.

[16] As set forth above, the Trustee disallowed the Respondent's proof of claim and the claims were postponed. The Respondent's appeal from the Trustee's disallowance was allowed in part by the Superior Court. The judge overruled the Trustee's postponement regarding the portion of $31,746,575 only. He accepted the Respondent's argument that the 2019 Judgment created a new "legal reality" between the parties such that the source of the Respondent's claim was not the loan contract that had been declared null but rather the obligation to make restitution. Accordingly, s. 137 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act[7] ("BIA") invoked by the Trustee to justify the postponement did not apply. Such provision allows for the postponement of claims arising from contracts that are entered into between a bankrupt and non-arm's-length parties and are not proper. The judge added that the Respondent did deal at arm's length with Bixi since they were not related according to the definitions found in ss. 4(2) and 4(3) BIA. The judge also made short shrift of the Trustee's reliance on s. 140.1 BIA to contend that the claim represented equity and not debt. The judge stated that the proof in the record indicates the Respondent's intention to be reimbursed the advances made to Bixi, so that the money advanced was a loan and not a contribution to capital.

[17] As stated above, I believe the appeal should be allowed as the judgment is tainted by both errors of law and errors of mixed fact and law.

II. ISSUES

[18] The parties' respective positions give rise to four issues for resolution on appeal:

1.- Does the Appellant have an appeal as of right or does it require leave and, if so, should leave be granted pursuant to the De Bene Esse application for such leave referred to this panel?

2.- Did the judge err in concluding that the Court already decided in the 2019 Judgment that the Respondent's claim as an unsecured creditor should be allowed by the Trustee?

3.- Did the judge err in the interpretation and application of s. 137 BIA?

4.- Did the judge err in concluding that the Trustee's determination that the Respondent's claim was an "equity claim" was unreasonable?

III. ANALYSIS

1.- Does the Appellant have an appeal as of right or does it require leave and, if so, should leave be granted pursuant to the De Bene Esse application for such leave referred to this panel?

[19] The Appellant's notice of appeal relies upon paragraph (a) – the point at issue involves future rights – and paragraph (c) – the property involved in the appeal exceeds in value $10,000 – of s. 193 BIA.

[7] R.S.C. (1985), c. B-3.

[20] The Appellant has also applied for leave to appeal under s. 193 (e) BIA in the event the Court rules that it has no appeal as of right. That application was referred to the Court by one of our colleagues.[8]

[21] Given that the question of the postponement of the Respondent's proof of claim would mean that the Respondent would not share in any dividend in the Bixi bankruptcy, the Appellant contends that the value of the property involved in the appeal exceeds $10,000.[9] I believe this to be the case. Moreover, there is abundant case law confirming that where the amount at issue in a proof of claim exceeds $10,000, a right of appeal under s. 193 (c) BIA exists. Ultimately, if the issue is the loss or gain resulting from the disallowance or acceptance of a proof of claim for more than $10,000, s. 193 (c) BIA permits an appeal.[10]

[22] However, the Respondent argues, based primarily on the decision of Brown, J.A., sitting as chamber's judge, in 2403177 Ontario Inc. v. Bending Lake Iron Group Limited,[11] that s. 193 (c) BIA should be read restrictively and not apply to "(i) orders that are procedural in nature; (ii) orders that do not bring into play the value of the debtor's property; or (iii) orders that do not result in a loss".[12]

[23] To put the decision in context, Bending Lake involved an appeal from a judgment approving a sale agreement and ordering the vesting of the debtor's property. The value of the property was not in issue. Rather, the grounds of appeal were "process-related", regarding such things as disclosure of information about the sale agreement to the debtor by the receiver, the negotiation process for the sale and the adequacy of notice given to Aboriginal communities.[13]

[24] In Hillmount Capital inc. v. Pizale,[14] Brown, J.A. revisited s. 193 (c) BIA and agreed with the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal in MNP Ltd. v Wilkes[15] that merely because the question raised in appeal is procedural, this does not mean there is not property involved that exceeds $10,000. Thus, the Court should scrutinize the grounds of appeal to examine the effect of the order sought.[16]

---

8 Syndic de Société de vélo en libre-service, 2022 QCCA 853 (Cournoyer, J.A.).

9 Property is defined in s. 2 BIA as including "money".

10 See, for example, Trimor Mortgage Investment Corporation v. Fox, 2015 ABCA 44, paras. 7-10; Roman Catholic Episcopal Corporation of St. George's v. John Doe - 49 - GBS, 2007 NLCA 17, paras. 22-27; Temple Consulting Group Ltd. v. Abakhan & Associates Inc., 2011 BCCA 540, paras. 5-8; EnerNorth Industries Inc. (Re), 2009 ONCA 536, para. 34.

11 2403177 Ontario Inc. v. Bending Lake Iron Group Limited, 2016 ONCA 225 [Bending Lake].

12 Bending Lake, supra, note 11, para. 53; but, see also Orpen v. Roberts, [1925] S.C.R. 364, p. 367: Pecuniary loss is the determinant of whether a monetary threshold has been crossed.

13 Bending Lake, supra, note 11, para. 58.

14 Hillmount Capital Inc. v. Pizale, 2021 ONCA 364 [Hillmount Capital].

15 MNP Ltd. v Wilkes, 2020 SKCA 66.

16 Hillmount Capital, supra, note 14, paras. 41-42.

[25] In the present case, the value of the Respondent's claim is inextricably the issue as it is common ground that if it is postponed, it will be worthless in a distribution and will result in a loss for the Respondent exceeding $30,000,000. Moreover, if not postponed, the claim will cause considerable dilution, exceeding in the aggregate $10,000, of the payment to all other creditors. This appeal clearly involves a potential loss either to the Respondent or to the mass of creditors exceeding the threshold amount; it is not restricted to procedural issues.

[26] Accordingly, I would conclude that the Appellant has a right of appeal under s. 193 (c) BIA.

[27] If I doubted the existence of an appeal as of right, I would not hesitate to grant leave as requested by the Appellant because the criteria for the granting of such leave are easily satisfied.[17]

[28] The appeal is, at the very least, prima facie meritorious, its resolution is important for this bankruptcy estate, and the issues raised bear on the law in the area. No undue delay in the administration of the bankrupt estate is caused at this point in time by the appeal.

[29] However, I propose to dismiss the application for leave, without costs, as being unnecessary given my opinion that there is a right of appeal under s. 193 (c) BIA.

2.- Did the judge err in concluding that the Court already decided in the 2019 Judgment that the Respondent's claim as an unsecured creditor should be allowed by the Trustee?

[30] The conclusions of the 2019 Judgment state simply:

> [76] ACCUEILLE partiellement l'appel, avec les frais de justice, à seule fin d'ajouter une conclusion déclaratoire :
> > DÉCLARE que la Ville est créancière pour le solde dû à la date de la prise en paiement, soit 31 746 575 $, et peut présenter une réclamation au syndic de faillite;

Though the doctrine of res judicata can extend beyond the conclusions (in French "dispositif") of a judgment to the reasons, the latter must be intrinsically tied to such conclusions.[18] In principle, it is the conclusions which are operative.[19]

[31] As stated above, the Court examined the validity of the loan made by the Respondent to Bixi and the security, in light of the legal prohibition against such financial assistance.[20] The Court found that the nullity gives rise to the obligation of restitution pursuant to art. 1422 C.C.Q. and then added the following:

> [62] La faillite subséquente de Bixi l'empêche de remettre le prêt obtenu. Par ailleurs, ordonner à la Ville seule de restituer les prestations créerait un déséquilibre et avantage injustifié pour Bixi. La solution adéquate est de modifier les modalités de la restitution en reconnaissant que la Ville est créancière de Bixi pour le solde du prêt et qu'elle peut présenter une réclamation dans la faillite[27], en application du deuxième alinéa de l'article 1699 C.c.Q. Cette créance est sujette aux règles de droit régissant la faillite (art. 69.3 LFI). Sa créance sera traitée pari passu avec les autres créanciers de la faillite. Le prêt et l'hypothèque sont nuls, mais l'obligation pour Bixi de restituer l'argent reçu existe en application du principe de restitution des prestations.
> [63] À la lecture du jugement, il est impossible de savoir si le juge estime que Bixi n'a pas à rembourser le prêt ou s'il a tenu pour acquis que la Ville possède une créance et va déposer une réclamation dans la faillite. Il convient d'ajouter une conclusion à cet effet.
>

[32] The Court's language is permissive – i.e. the City "peut présenter une réclamation dans la faillite" and any such proof of claim will be subject to the legal rules governing the bankruptcy.

[33] No such proof of claim had been filed at the time of the 2019 Judgment. As such, the Court cannot be taken to have ruled on the validity or propriety of such claim. Nevertheless, the Respondent submits that the use of the term "pari passu" in paragraph 62 refers to how such claim should be treated or collocated in the bankruptcy. The judge evidently agreed:

> [35] De fait, le Syndic, en ajournant la preuve de réclamation de la créance de la Ville telle qu'établi par la Cour d'appel, fait comme si cet arrêt n'existait tout simplement pas ou encore que la décision de la Cour supérieure maintenue par la Cour d'appel, n'avait aucun impact sur le pouvoir par le Syndic, d'analyser le bien-fondé d'une preuve de réclamation sous le prisme de l'article 137(1) L.F.I.
> [36] C'est l'existence même de l'arrêt et en particulier son paragraphe 62 lequel doit être lu en conjonction avec tous ceux de la section « La restitution par Bixi » qui fait en sorte que la position du Syndic est non seulement déraisonnable, mais frôle la témérité.

[34] The Respondent and the judge read into the 2019 Judgment what is not there. As stated, the Court was not examining a proof of claim but merely the City's right to file a proof of claim and thereby become a creditor in the bankruptcy.[21] In the brief the Respondent had filed in that case, it had indeed sought to have its claim (as opposed to its right to file a proof of claim) recognized, but that is not what the Court did.

[35] Counsel for the Respondent points to the second paragraph of Article 1699 C.C.Q.:

The court may, exceptionally, refuse restitution where it would have the effect of according an undue advantage to one party, whether the debtor or the creditor, unless it considers it sufficient, in that case, to modify the scope or modalities of the restitution instead.	Le tribunal peut, exceptionnellement, refuser la restitution lorsqu'elle aurait pour effet d'accorder à l'une des parties, débiteur ou créancier, un avantage indu, à moins qu'il ne juge suffisant, dans ce cas, de modifier plutôt l'étendue ou les modalités de la restitution.

Thus, the Respondent argues that it was open to the Court in the 2019 Judgment to subordinate the City's claim if it obtained an undue advantage. Given that the Court did not do this, counsel reasons that the Court did not believe the City obtained an undue advantage, such that the Trustee is bound to consider the 2011 transaction a proper one and not invoke s. 137 to subordinate the Respondent's claim. Again, counsel reads into the 2019 Judgment what is not there. There is no indication that this was considered. It is not for this panel to add to what the Court wrote in paragraph 62 of the 2019 Judgment quoted above.

[21] Section 124 BIA.

[36] Nowhere did the Court put aside or even refer to the Trustee's duty "to examine every proof of claim (…) and the grounds therefor" and to make a determination, as required by s. 135 (1) BIA. This duty is a fundamental obligation of a bankruptcy trustee.[22]

[37] The expression "pari passu" in paragraph 62 of the 2019 Judgment refers to the right of the Respondent, like other creditors, to file a proof of claim, not to its eventual treatment or collocation by the Trustee. The Court did not say that the claim would be paid rateably (in French "au prorata"), which is the general rule, set out in s. 141 BIA, for dealing with claims; the Court merely stated that the claim would be treated as all the other claims. This includes the examination by the Trustee pursuant to s. 135.

[38] The reference in paragraph 75 of the 2019 Judgment to such proof of claim as "chirographaire" or ordinary or unsecured, in the context of the 2019 Judgment, clearly refers to the fact that the loan and the accessory hypothec were null but that the legal institution of restitution would give rise to the City's right to claim the monies advanced to Bixi, albeit not as a secured creditor.

[39] Moreover, the postponement of the Respondent's claim pursuant to the Trustee's notice of disallowance does not per se contradict that the Respondent is an unsecured ("chirographaire") creditor. The disallowance maintains such qualification but postpones the claim, or in the wording of ss. 137 and 140.1 BIA, the Respondent is not entitled to receive a dividend in the bankruptcy until the other unsecured creditors are fully paid.

[40] The Respondent points to comments from one member of the panel and exchanges with counsel to bolster its position that the Court decided in the 2019 Judgment that the proof of claim was valid. However, comments from the panel are not binding and do not form any part of a judgment.[23]

[41] I believe that the foregoing analysis indicates that the conclusions of the 2019 Judgment, taken alone or in conjunction with the reasons, disclose a decision providing for the Respondent's right to file a claim as an unsecured creditor in the bankruptcy of Bixi in the amount stated. Neither the conclusions nor the reasons address the eventual treatment of that claim by the Trustee in the exercise of its duties under s. 137 BIA. In deciding otherwise, the judge committed a reviewable error, which merits intervention by the Court.

3.- Did the judge err in the interpretation and application of s. 137 BIA?

[42] The judge concluded that the Trustee was wrong to postpone the Respondent's claim pursuant to s. 137(1) BIA. It provides as follows:

137 (1) A creditor who, at any time before the bankruptcy of a debtor, entered into a transaction with the debtor and who was not at arm's length with the debtor at that time is not entitled to claim a dividend in respect of a claim arising out of that transaction until all claims of the other creditors have been satisfied, unless the transaction was in the opinion of the trustee or of the court a proper transaction.	137 (1) Le créancier qui, avant la faillite du débiteur, a conclu une transaction avec celui-ci alors qu'il existait un lien de dépendance entre eux n'a pas droit de réclamer un dividende relativement à une réclamation née de cette transaction jusqu'à ce que toutes les réclamations des autres créanciers aient été satisfaites, sauf si la transaction était, de l'avis du syndic ou du tribunal, une transaction régulière.

[43] The judge held that s. 137 BIA did not apply because the Respondent and Bixi did deal at arm's length. He reasoned that since they were not related within the meaning of ss. 4 (2) and 4 (3) BIA, then in virtue of s. 4 (5) they could not be deemed not to deal at arm's length. This is an error of law as the judge failed to consider s. 4 (4) BIA which provides as follows:

4 (4) It is a question of fact whether persons not related to one another were at a particular time dealing with each other at arm's length.	4 (4) La question de savoir si des personnes non liées entre elles n'avaient pas de lien de dépendance, à tel ou tel moment, est une question de fait.

[44] Thus, even though the Respondent and Bixi might not have been related parties within the definition of s. 4 BIA (and I express no opinion on such finding), the judge should have pursued his analysis to see if the facts indicated that they were or were not arm's length parties. The factual matrix is compelling: (i) Bixi was executing the Respondent's bicycle sharing project on its behalf as the Court observed in the 2019 Judgment;[24] (ii) Bixi's project was conceived by Mr. André Lavallée, an elected official of the Respondent; (iii) the Respondent's treasurer was also a member of the board of directors of Bixi from 2001 to 2013 and was extensively involved in the financing referred to above, as the Court observed in the 2019 Judgment;[25] and (iv) the Respondent's consolidated financial statements included those of Bixi together with other entities under the Respondent's control.

[45] Moreover, the judge did not consider the scope of the agreement entered into between the Respondent and Bixi in 2011, whereby Bixi effectively gave the Respondent

[24] 2019 Judgment, supra, note 4, paras. 4-5.

[25] 2019 Judgment, supra, note 4, para. 40 (referring to para. 110 of the trial judgment on appeal to the Court in that case).

de jure control over it. Pursuant to such agreement, inter alia: (i) the members and the chairman of Bixi's board of directors and its managing director were appointed on the recommendation of the Respondent; (ii) Bixi was obliged to submit to the Respondent, for approval, its budgets and three-year plans on such dates and in such form and substance as the Respondent indicated; (iii) Bixi was obliged to inform the Respondent of any major change to its approved budget; (iv) Bixi was obliged to remit to the Respondent yearly audited financial statements, quarterly interim financial statements, and quarterly detailed reports of its operations and orientations ("reddition de compte complète […] de ses activités et de ses orientations"); (v) Bixi granted the Respondent unfettered access to its books, records and premises; (vi) Bixi undertook to abide by the rules governing the awarding of contracts under the Cities and Towns Act; and (vii) Bixi undertook not to contract debt financing, modify its corporate structure, merge with any entity, modify its letters patent or seek its dissolution without the prior approval of the Respondent. These elements are not addressed in the judgment.

[46] In view of the above, it is not surprising that in the 2019 Judgment, the Court, in applying s. 95 (1) (b) BIA to the transaction between the Respondent and Bixi, underlines the following passage of the provision:[26]

> (…) a creditor who is not dealing at arm's length with the insolvent person (…)

[47] Lastly, during argument before the judge, counsel for the Respondent conceded that his client was related to Bixi: "C'est pas contesté que la Ville est une personne liée à Bixi, c'était notre conclusion à l'époque, ça été la conclusion de la Cour d'appel, c'est pas un fait qui est contesté".

[48] Accordingly, in deciding that s. 137 (1) BIA was not applicable, the judge erred both in law and in fact.

[49] However, the Respondent asserts (and the judge agreed) that the effect of the 2019 Judgment providing for restitution creates a new "legal reality" between the parties – i.e. the restitution obligation to return the funds received is the source of the obligation, such that the propriety of the transaction between the Respondent and Bixi in 2011 was not to be considered in examining the Respondent's proof of claim.

[50] I believe this argument is wrong in law for the reasons that follow.

[51] That the concept of restitution allowed the Respondent to file a proof of claim regarding proceeds of a loan declared null does not mean that logically or legally the Appellant in the performance of its trustee's duty to examine that claim "and the grounds therefor",[27] should not look beyond the obligation of the bankrupt to make restitution and consider the circumstances giving rise to the claim. Such consideration would include the elements giving rise to the nullity of the contract as examined by the Court in the 2019 Judgment. That judgment has the effect of setting aside the obligation generated by the contract of loan but does not somehow erase the historical fact of that loan transaction so that a trustee should close its eyes to it, pretending that it never existed. As a majority of the Supreme Court observed recently in dealing with a municipal contract declared a nullity:

> (…) it will then be deemed never to have existed (arts. 1416 and 1422 C.C.Q.; Cumyn, at No. 224; Lluelles and Moore, at No. 1087; Baudouin and Jobin, at No. 377; Gaudet, at p. 332). But this does not mean that the contract never actually existed. Logically, a contract must exist before it can be annulled: if a contract did not become a legal reality, it cannot be deemed never to have existed, because it does not in fact exist. (…)[28]

[52] In the words of s. 137 BIA, the Respondent's claim "aris[es] out of [the] transaction" that was entered into between it and Bixi and was declared a nullity by the Court. Indeed, the Court's conclusion quoted above declares that the City may file a proof of claim in the amount of the balance due to it at the date of the taking in payment and not the balance due when the loan was declared a nullity.

[53] I conclude that it is an error of law to only consider the obligation of restitution and not the underlying transaction of 2011 in analyzing the Respondent's proof of claim.

[54] Given his view of the law, the judge did not consider whether the 2011 transaction was a proper transaction within the meaning of s. 137 BIA.

[55] The standard of review on appeal from a trustee's disallowance is correctness on questions of law and reasonableness (or palpable error) on questions of fact or mixed fact and law.[29] The parties had stipulated before the Superior Court that the only issue was the reasonableness of the Trustee's decision. That being said, the onus was on the Respondent in the lower court to demonstrate that the Trustee's decision was not reasonable.[30]

[56] As seen above, the Trustee found that the 2011 loan transaction was not proper because it was entered into in violation of a statutory provision of public order to protect taxpayers against misuse of public funds by municipalities. The Court agreed in the 2019 Judgment and declared the loan agreement a nullity. Thus, it cannot be said that the Trustee's determination that the transaction was not proper was an unreasonable conclusion. I would thus propose that the Court intervene to set aside the judgment and dismiss the appeal from the disallowance of the proof of claim.

4.- Did the judge err in concluding that the Trustee's determination that the Respondent's claim was an "equity claim" was unreasonable?

[57] Though not strictly necessary, given my opinion that the Trustee could postpone the Respondent's claim upon the application of s. 137 BIA, I propose to briefly examine the other ground in the disallowance, based on s. 140.1 BIA, to the effect that the "loan" was really a contribution to capital.

[58] The judge devoted two paragraphs to dismiss the Trustee's position in this regard:

> [37] Tout aussi téméraire l'argument subsidiaire que la créance devrait être également ajournée ne vertu de l'article 140.1 L.F.I. puisque la Ville serait un « Equity Partner » dans l'aventure commerciale de Vélo, puisqu'il fait fi des motifs développés tant par la Cour supérieure que par la Cour d'appel quant à l'aspect commercial de Vélo, limité à la seule aventure internationale et non pas quant au réseau strictement montréalais.
>
> [38] Cet argument ne tient pas compte non plus de l'ensemble de la preuve administrée devant la Cour supérieure alors que celle-ci constate que les gestes posés par la Ville ne visaient qu'à se faire rembourser les avances consenties par Société en commandite Stationnement de Montréal (SCSM) à Vélo, pour qu'elles lui soient versées à titre de redevances. En aucun temps il ne fut question d'une quelconque recherche de profits par la Ville.

[59] I reiterate that the standard of review of a trustee's disallowance is one of reasonableness.

[60] Equity claim is defined in s. 2 of the BIA as follows:

equity claim means a claim that is in respect of an equity interest, including a claim for, among others,	réclamation relative à des capitaux propres Réclamation portant sur un intérêt relatif à des capitaux propres et visant notamment :
(a) a dividend or similar payment,	a) un dividende ou un paiement similaire;
(b) a return of capital,	b) un remboursement de capital;
(c) a redemption or retraction obligation,	c) tout droit de rachat d'actions au gré de l'actionnaire ou de remboursement anticipé d'actions au gré de l'émetteur;

(d) a monetary loss resulting from the ownership, purchase or sale of an equity interest or from the rescission, or, in Quebec, the annulment, of a purchase or sale of an equity interest, or	d) des pertes pécuniaires associées à la propriété, à l'achat ou à la vente d'un intérêt relatif à des capitaux propres ou à l'annulation de cet achat ou de cette vente;
(e) contribution or indemnity in respect of a claim referred to in any of paragraphs (a) to (d); (réclamation relative à des capitaux propres)	e) une contribution ou une indemnité relative à toute réclamation visée à l'un des alinéas a) à d). (equity claim)

[61] Was the 2011 loan a contribution by the Respondent to Bixi's capital?

[62] Judges sitting in bankruptcy matters have identified various indicia relevant to the examination:

> [41] U.S. Steel sets out a helpful two-part test in to be followed in situations involving parent-subsidiary relationships at paras 186-190:
>
> > (a) subjectively, did the alleged lender actually expect to be repaid the principle (sic) amount of the loan with interest out of the cashflows of the alleged borrower; and
> >
> > (b) objectively, was the expectation reasonable under the circumstances?
>
> [42] The Court in U.S. Steel referred to various factors used by American courts to aid in determining appropriate characterization, including the following:
>
> > (a) the names given to the instruments, if any, evidencing the indebtedness;
> >
> > (b) the presence or absence of a fixed maturity date and schedule of payments. The American cases suggest that the absence of a fixed maturity date and a fixed obligation to repay is an indication that the advances were capital contributions and not loans;
> >
> > (c) the presence or absence of a fixed rate of interest and interest payments. Again, it is suggested that the absence of a fixed rate of interest and interest payments is a strong indication that the advances were capital contributions rather than loans;
> >
> > (d) the source of repayments. If the expectation of repayment depends solely on the success of the borrower's business, the cases suggest that the transaction has the appearance of a capital contribution;
> >
> > (e) the adequacy or inadequacy of capitalization. Thin or inadequate capitalization is strong evidence that the advances are capital contributions rather than loans;

> (f) the identity of interest between the creditor and the shareholder. If shareholders make advances in proportion to their respective stock ownership, an equity contribution is indicated;
>
> (g) the security, if any, for advances;
>
> (h) the corporation's ability to obtain financing from outside lending institutions. When there is no evidence of other outside financing, some cases indicate that the fact no reasonable creditor would have acted in the same manner is strong evidence that the advances were capital contributions rather than loans;
>
> (i) the extent to which the advances were subordinated to the claims of outside creditors;
>
> (j) the extent to which the advances were used to acquire capital assets. The use of the advance to meet the daily operating needs for the corporation, rather than to purchase capital assets, is arguably indicative of bona fide indebtedness; and
>
> (k) the presence or absence of a sinking fund to provide repayments.[31]
> (Emphasis added)

[63] In U.S. Steel, Justice Wilton-Siegel underlined that in determining whether a transaction is a contribution to capital rather than a loan, the surrounding circumstances of the loan and the real intent of the parties rather than an adherence to the literal wording of a contract should be the focal point, particularly where the parties do not deal at arm's length.[32]

[64] The factual elements relied on by the Trustee and in evidence before the judge indicate the reasonableness of the Trustee's conclusion. The judge made no reference to these elements of proof in considering the application of s. 140.1 BIA.

[65] In 2011, Bixi was in a dire financial situation. Indeed, it was insolvent, having an operating deficit and no reasonable outlook for making up its deficit. The Respondent had no expectation that Bixi could ever repay the $31,000,000 in direct advance nor the $8,000,000 of the guaranteed loan. Without the Respondent's guarantee of that loan, Bixi could not find an operating lender and would be forced to cease its activities. The Respondent wanted Bixi to be able to continue to offer its bike sharing service to Montrealers. These are facts testified to by the CEO of Bixi as well as the Respondent's treasurer.

31 Alberta Energy, supra, note 30, paras. 41-42.

32 U.S. Steel Canada Inc. (Re), 2016 ONSC 569, para. 168.

[66] Under the 2011 agreement entered into by Bixi and the Respondent, the latter has all the hallmarks of a sole shareholder if not an alter ego, as described above in paragraph [45].

[67] I accept that the mere fact that a sole shareholder[33] (or group of shareholders)[34] advances funds to its company does not constitute per se a contribution to capital. However, the surrounding circumstances described above, taken together, make it such that the Trustee's determination that the loans were, in substance, contributions to capital was a reasonable determination. The judge erred by not considering the aforementioned facts and by not applying the appropriate standard of review in considering the Trustee's disallowance of the Respondent's proof of claim. This is a further ground justifying the Court's intervention.

[68] Accordingly, and for all the foregoing reasons, I would dismiss the application for leave to appeal without costs as it is not necessary given the right to appeal under s. 193 (c) BIA. I would then grant the appeal to set aside the judgment of the Superior Court and dismiss the Respondent's appeal from the Trustee's notice of disallowance, with legal costs before both courts.

[69] The Appellant also asks the Court to take cognizance that it has withdrawn its notice of disallowance regarding the sums of $6,489,081.12 and $1,702,600 representing the sums paid by the Respondent to National Bank of Canada pursuant to the guarantee for Bixi's liability to such bank. These amounts (totalling $8,191,681.12) are included in the total postponed amount of $39,938,256.12. The judge makes no mention that this alternative disallowance is overturned, but the Trustee, in its written pleadings in first instance, had withdrawn the disallowance of this portion of the claim in order that National Bank of Canada not continue to be a party to the proceedings. I propose to add such a conclusion to the Court's judgment.

C.43, art. 128, 129, 130.

En 1987, Reemark Sterling I Ltd., projetant la construction d'un immeuble en copropriété, a conclu un Engagement de prêt hypothécaire postconstruction (« EPP ») avec la société de fiducie intimée, en vertu duquel l'intimée devait verser à Reemark la quasi-totalité du prix des unités et toucher de la part des investisseurs les versements hypothécaires portant intérêt à un taux composé. Reemark et la banque appelante ont passé une convention de prêt à la construction selon laquelle l'appelante devait prêter à Reemark 33 millions de dollars à un taux d'intérêt composé aux fins du projet. Reemark, l'appelante et l'intimée ont aussi signé un acte de cession de l'EPP par lequel Reemark cédait à l'appelante son droit the appellant until the construction loan had been repaid. In 1991, with a collapsing real estate market, the respondent refused to advance the funds to the appellant under the TOC assignment or a subsequent agreement between the parties. The appellant appointed a receiver and sold the project for $22.5 million, substantially less than the appellant was owed under the loan agreement and TOC assignment. In an action against the respondent for breach of contract, the trial judge awarded the appellant damages equal to the shortfall plus interest at the compound rate set out in the loan agreement both before and after the judgment. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal except for the question of interest where it substituted an order for simple interest as provided in s. 128 of the Courts of Justice Act ("CJA").

Held: The appeal should be allowed and the trial judgment restored.

Although both simple interest and compound interest measure the time value of the initial sum of money, the principal, compound interest reflects the time-value component to interest payments while simple interest does not. Simple interest makes an artificial distinction between money owed as principal and money owed as interest while compound interest treats a dollar as a dollar and is therefore a more precise measure of the value of possessing money for a period of time. Compound interest is the norm in the banking and financial systems and is the standard practice of the appellant and the respondent, which were both in the business of lending.

Contract damages are determined in one of two ways. Expectation damages, focussing on the value which the plaintiff would have received had the contract been performed, and restitution damages, focussing on the advantage gained by the defendant as a result of his or her breach of contract. When awarding damages to the plaintiff, the court must first determine the dollar value of the promise to the plaintiff at the time the obligation was to have been performed and then apply the appropriate interest rate and method of calculation to account for the time during which the plaintiff was not paid. In Ontario, pre-judgment and post-judgment interest are governed by ss. 128 to 130 CJA. Sections 128(4)(g), 129(5) and 130 CJA, each of which allows the judge to award interest other than as specifically set out in ss. 128 and 129, clearly indicate that the rates and calculation methods of interest provided in ss. 128 and 129 are applicable in the absence of more appropriate rates and methods of aux sommes que devait lui verser l'intimée en exécution de l'EPP jusqu'au remboursement du prêt à la construction. En 1991, lors de l'effondrement du marché immobilier, l'intimée a refusé d'avancer à l'appelante les fonds prévus dans la cession de l'EPP ou dans une convention subséquente conclue par les parties. L'appelante a mis l'immeuble sous séquestre et l'a vendu pour la somme de 22,5 millions de dollars, bien inférieure au montant qui lui était dû suivant la convention de prêt et la cession de l'EPP. Dans une action intentée contre l'appelante pour inexécution de contrat, le juge de première instance a accordé à l'appelante des dommages-intérêts équivalant à la perte subie plus l'intérêt au taux composé prévu dans la convention de prêt pour les périodes antérieure et postérieure au jugement. La Cour d'appel a rejeté l'appel, sauf en ce qui concerne l'intérêt composé, qu'elle a remplacé par l'intérêt simple prévu à l'art. 128 de la Loi sur les tribunaux judiciaires (la « LTJ »).

Arrêt : Le pourvoi est accueilli et le jugement de première instance est rétabli.

L'intérêt simple et l'intérêt composé traduisent chacun la valeur temporelle de la somme d'argent initiale, le capital; cependant, contrairement à l'intérêt simple, l'intérêt composé tient compte de la valeur temporelle des versements d'intérêts. L'intérêt simple crée une distinction artificielle entre la somme exigible à titre de capital et celle payable à titre d'intérêt, alors que dans le calcul de l'intérêt composé, chaque dollar est considéré comme un dollar, de sorte que ce type d'intérêt traduit plus précisément la valeur de la possession d'une somme pendant une période donnée. L'intérêt composé est la norme dans les systèmes bancaires et financiers et tant l'appelante que l'intimée, dont les activités consistent à prêter de l'argent, en exigent couramment le paiement.

Il existe deux méthodes pour fixer le montant des dommages-intérêts contractuels : l'indemnisation de la perte du profit escompté, calculée en fonction de la valeur que le demandeur aurait reçue si le contrat avait été exécuté, et la restitution de l'avantage obtenu, calculée en fonction de l'avantage que le défendeur tire de l'inexécution du contrat. Pour accorder des dommages-intérêts au demandeur, la cour doit tout d'abord déterminer la valeur financière de la promesse faite au demandeur au moment où l'obligation aurait dû être exécutée, puis appliquer le taux d'intérêt et le mode de calcul appropriés pour tenir compte de la période pendant laquelle le demandeur a été privé de son dû. En Ontario, les intérêts antérieurs et postérieurs au jugement sont régis par les art. 128 à 130 LTJ. Il ressort clairement de l'al. 128(4)g), du par. 129(5) et de l'art. 130 LTJ, qui permettent tous au tribunal d'accorder d'autres intérêts que ceux expressément prévus aux art. 128 et 129, que les taux et les méthodes de calcul calculation. Section 130 allows a court, where it considers it just, to vary the interest rate or the time for which interest may be awarded, while ss. 128(4)(g) and 129(5) allow a court to award interest where interest is "payable by a right other than under this section". The court's common law power to award damages flows from the application of contract law. The language of ss. 128(4)(g) and 129(5) provides statutory authority to award compound pre- and post-judgment interest according to this common law power. It also provides statutory authority to award compound post-judgment interest according to the court's jurisdiction in equity. Absent exceptional circumstances, the interest rate which had governed a loan prior to breach would be the appropriate rate to govern the post-breach loan. The application of simple interest on the breach of a loan which itself bore compound interest would not adequately award the plaintiff the value he or she would have received had the contract been performed and would provide incentives to breach contracts. This analysis applies equally to pre-judgment interest and post-judgment interest.

In this case, the trial judge was correct in awarding compound pre- and post-judgment interest. His award yields a satisfactory result with respect to both expectation damages and restitution damages. Any lesser amount would fail to award the appellant the agreed-upon time-value of its money. Moreover, this is not a case of efficient breach. An award of compound interest will prevent the respondent from profiting by its breach at the expense of the appellant.

prescrits par ces articles s'appliquent en l'absence de taux et de méthodes de calcul plus appropriés. L'article 130 permet au tribunal, s'il l'estime juste, de modifier le taux d'intérêt ou la période pour laquelle l'intérêt est accordé, alors que l'al. 128(4)g) et le par. 129(5) lui permettent d'accorder des intérêts lorsque le droit aux intérêts « a sa source ailleurs que dans le présent article ». Le pouvoir que la common law confère au tribunal d'accorder des dommages-intérêts découle de l'application du droit des contrats. Le libellé de l'al. 128(4)g) et du par. 129(5) lui confèrent le pouvoir légal d'accorder des intérêts antérieurs et postérieurs au jugement à taux composé conformément à ce pouvoir de common law. Il leur confère aussi le pouvoir légal d'accorder des intérêts postérieurs au jugement à taux composé dans l'exercice de leur compétence en equity. Sauf circonstances exceptionnelles, le taux d'intérêt applicable à l'emprunt avant l'inexécution devrait s'appliquer également après celle-ci. En accordant l'intérêt simple pour l'inexécution d'un contrat de prêt stipulant lui-même un intérêt composé, le tribunal n'octroierait pas au demandeur un dédommagement convenable équivalant à ce qu'il aurait touché si le contrat avait été dûment exécuté et encouragerait les parties à se soustraire à leurs obligations contractuelles. Ces principes valent aussi bien pour les intérêts antérieurs au jugement que pour les intérêts postérieurs au jugement.

En l'espèce, le juge de première instance a eu raison d'accorder les intérêts antérieurs et postérieurs au jugement à taux composé. Son jugement donne un résultat satisfaisant en ce qui concerne tant l'indemnisation de la perte du profit escompté que la restitution de l'avantage obtenu du fait de l'inexécution. Toute somme inférieure versée à l'appelante ne tiendrait pas compte de la valeur temporelle de l'argent dont les parties étaient convenues. De plus, on ne peut parler en l'espèce d'inexécution rentable. L'octroi d'intérêts composés empêchera l'intimée de tirer avantage de son inexécution aux dépens de l'appelante.

LE JUGE MAJOR —

I. Introduction

La question de savoir si une cour de justice a compétence pour accorder l'intérêt à taux composé sur les dommages-intérêts est controversée. Elle se pose à nouveau dans le cadre du présent pourvoi, dans les termes suivants : la cour peut-elle ordonner trial judge in the Ontario Court (General Division) said yes but was reversed by the Ontario Court of Appeal.

Sections 128 and 129 of the Ontario Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.43 ("CJA"), prescribe interest rates and methods of calculation before and after judgment and also permit a court to award other rates and methods of calculation in accordance with those sections.

Is the appellant entitled, on a breach of contract claim, to compound interest both before and after judgment? I conclude that it is and, as a result, the appeal is allowed.

II. Facts

In 1987, Reemark Sterling I Ltd. ("Reemark") planned to build a 300-unit residential condominium project in Scarborough, Ontario. Reemark intended to sell the units to investors. On November 12, 1987, Reemark entered into an agreement with the respondent, Mutual Trust Company (now Clarica Trust Company), under which the respondent trust company agreed to provide mortgage financing to investors to allow them to purchase the units from Reemark. This agreement was the Takeout Mortgage Commitment (the "TOC"). Under this arrangement, the respondent trust company would be entitled to interest on the loans compounded semi-annually. The aggregate amount available under the TOC was $36.5 million.

Reemark would not receive funds pursuant to the TOC until units had been sold and the mortgages were arranged. In the meantime, Reemark needed money to start construction of the project. On December 1, 1988, Reemark and the appellant bank entered into a construction loan agreement (the "Loan Agreement") under which the appellant bank agreed to provide Reemark with a construction loan of $33 million for the project. The Loan Agreement le paiement d'intérêts composés antérieurs et postérieurs au jugement? Le juge de première instance de la Cour de l'Ontario (Division générale) a répondu par l'affirmative, mais la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a infirmé cette décision.

2 Les articles 128 et 129 de la Loi sur les tribunaux judiciaires de l'Ontario, L.S.O. 1990, ch. C.43 (la « LTJ »), prescrivent les taux et les méthodes de calcul des intérêts antérieurs et postérieurs au jugement. Ils autorisent également le tribunal à utiliser d'autres taux et méthodes de calcul conformément à leurs dispositions.

3 L'appelante, qui invoque l'inexécution d'un contrat, a-t-elle droit à des intérêts composés antérieurs et postérieurs au jugement? J'estime qu'elle y a droit et, par conséquent, l'appel est accueilli.

II. Les faits

4 En 1987, Reemark Sterling I Ltd. (« Reemark ») projetait la construction à Scarborough, en Ontario, d'un immeuble en copropriété comprenant 300 unités résidentielles qu'elle comptait vendre à des investisseurs. Le 12 novembre 1987, Reemark a conclu, avec la Société de fiducie Mutuelle intimée (maintenant la Société de fiducie Clarica), une convention suivant laquelle la société de fiducie intimée s'engageait à consentir aux investisseurs le financement hypothécaire nécessaire pour acheter les unités de Reemark. Cette convention prenait la forme d'un Engagement de prêt hypothécaire post-construction (l'« EPP »). Selon les stipulations de l'engagement, l'intérêt payable à la société de fiducie intimée sur les prêts hypothécaires était composé semestriellement. Le montant global du financement offert dans l'engagement s'élevait à 36,5 millions de dollars.

5 Reemark ne devait toucher les fonds qu'une fois les unités vendues et les hypothèques constituées. Dans l'intervalle, elle avait besoin de fonds pour entreprendre la construction de l'immeuble. Le 1er décembre 1988, la banque appelante et Reemark ont passé une convention de prêt à la construction (la « Convention de prêt »), dans laquelle la banque acceptait de consentir un prêt de 33 millions de dollars à Reemark. Selon la Convention de prêt, required Reemark to repay the loan with interest equal to the appellant bank's prime lending rate plus one percent compounded monthly.

6 On December 16, 1988, the appellant bank, Reemark and the respondent trust company executed an Assignment of Takeout Financing Commitment ("TOC Assignment") by which the respondent trust company would pay the proceeds of the TOC to the appellant bank rather than Reemark until the construction loan was repaid.

7 On July 31, 1991, against the background of the collapsing real estate market of the early 1990s, the respondent trust company refused to advance funds under the TOC and declared that it would do so only if additional conditions were met. Following negotiations, the respondent trust company, the appellant bank and Reemark executed a further agreement on December 18, 1991, called the Amended Takeout Mortgage Commitment ("ATOC"). It provided a renegotiated basis upon which the respondent was to advance the long-term mortgage financing to the appellant. The respondent again refused to advance funds to the appellant. The appellant appointed a receiver of the project and sold the building for $22.5 million, which left a significant shortfall of principal and accrued compound interest.

8 The appellant brought an action against the respondents for breach of contract. At trial, Farley J. found that the respondent had breached the TOC, the TOC Assignment, and the ATOC. He awarded damages to the appellant with compound interest at the rate specified in the Loan Agreement as referenced in the TOC Assignment both before and after the judgment. The Ontario Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal except for the question of interest where it substituted an order for simple interest as provided in s. 128 CJA. The difference between compound and simple interest on the damages awarded is approximately $5 million or more.

l'emprunt que Reemark devait rembourser portait intérêt au taux préférentiel de la banque appelante majoré de un pour cent et composé mensuellement.

Le 16 décembre 1988, la banque appelante, Reemark et la société de fiducie intimée ont signé un acte de cession de l'EPP (la « cession de l'EPP ») par lequel la société de fiducie intimée convenait de verser le produit de l'EPP à la banque appelante plutôt qu'à Reemark, jusqu'au remboursement du prêt à la construction.

Le 31 juillet 1991, dans le contexte de l'effondrement du marché immobilier du début des années quatre-vingt-dix, la société de fiducie intimée a refusé d'avancer les fonds prévus par l'EPP et a déclaré qu'elle ne les verserait qu'une fois de nouvelles conditions remplies. Le 18 décembre 1991, à l'issue de négociations, la société de fiducie intimée, la banque appelante et Reemark ont signé une nouvelle convention, l'Engagement de prêt hypothécaire postconstruction modifié (l'« EPPM »). L'EPPM stipulait les nouvelles conditions auxquelles la société de fiducie intimée devait verser à l'appelante le produit du financement hypothécaire à long terme. L'intimée a de nouveau refusé d'avancer des fonds à l'appelante. Après avoir nommé un séquestre à l'égard de l'immeuble, l'appelante l'a vendu au prix de 22,5 millions de dollars, somme bien inférieure au capital et aux intérêts composés courus.

L'appelante a poursuivi l'intimée pour inexécution de contrat. En première instance, le juge Farley a conclu que l'intimée avait manqué aux obligations que lui imposaient l'EPP, la cession de l'EPP et l'EPPM. Il a accordé à l'appelante des dommages-intérêts avec intérêt composé pour les périodes antérieure et postérieure au jugement au taux prévu dans la Convention de prêt intégrée par renvoi à la cession de l'EPP. La Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a confirmé le jugement, sauf en ce qui concerne l'intérêt composé, qu'elle a remplacé par l'intérêt simple prévu à l'art. 128 LTJ. La différence entre l'intérêt composé et l'intérêt simple sur les dommages-intérêts accordés s'élève à environ 5 millions de dollars, voire davantage.

III. Relevant Statutory Provisions

Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.43

128.—(1) A person who is entitled to an order for the payment of money is entitled to claim and have included in the order an award of interest thereon at the prejudgment interest rate, calculated from the date the cause of action arose to the date of the order.

(4) Interest shall not be awarded under subsection (1),

(b) on interest accruing under this section;

(g) where interest is payable by a right other than under this section.

129.—(1) Money owing under an order, including costs to be assessed or costs fixed by the court, bears interest at the postjudgment interest rate, calculated from the date of the order.

(5) Interest shall not be awarded under this section where interest is payable by a right other than under this section.

130.—(1) The court may, where it considers it just to do so, in respect of the whole or any part of the amount on which interest is payable under section 128 or 129,

(a) disallow interest under either section;

(b) allow interest at a rate higher or lower than that provided in either section;

(c) allow interest for a period other than that provided in either section.

(2) For the purpose of subsection (1), the court shall take into account,

III. Dispositions législatives applicables

128 (1) La personne qui a droit à une ordonnance de paiement d'une somme d'argent a le droit de demander que l'ordonnance lui accorde des intérêts sur cette somme, calculés au taux d'intérêt antérieur au jugement, depuis la date à laquelle la cause d'action a pris naissance jusqu'à la date de l'ordonnance.

(4) Il n'est pas accordé d'intérêts aux termes du paragraphe (1) :

b) sur les intérêts accumulés aux termes du présent article;

g) si le droit aux intérêts a sa source ailleurs que dans le présent article.

129 (1) La somme d'argent due aux termes d'une ordonnance, y compris les dépens devant être liquidés ou ceux fixés par le tribunal, porte intérêt au taux d'intérêt postérieur au jugement, à compter de la date de l'ordonnance.

(5) Il ne doit pas être accordé d'intérêts aux termes du présent article si un droit aux intérêts existe en vertu d'un autre article.

130 (1) Le tribunal peut, à l'égard de la totalité ou d'une partie de la somme qui porte intérêt aux termes de l'article 128 ou 129, s'il l'estime juste :

a) refuser les intérêts prévus à l'un ou l'autre article;

b) accorder des intérêts à un taux supérieur ou inférieur à celui qui est prévu à l'un ou l'autre article;

c) accorder des intérêts pour une période différente de celle qui est prévue à l'un ou l'autre article.

(2) Pour l'application du paragraphe (1), le tribunal tient compte :

(a) changes in market interest rates;

(b) the circumstances of the case;

(c) the fact that an advance payment was made;

(d) the circumstances of medical disclosure by the plaintiff;

(e) the amount claimed and the amount recovered in the proceeding;

(f) the conduct of any party that tended to shorten or to lengthen unnecessarily the duration of the proceeding; and

(g) any other relevant consideration.

IV. Judicial History

A. Ontario Court (General Division) (1998), 18 R.P.R. (3d) 213

10 The trial judge found the respondent in breach of contract for a number of reasons, namely it breached its takeout financing commitment and acted in bad faith on its agreement by refusing to fund the TOC in 1991 and the ATOC in 1992; by causing unreasonable delay in replacing its counsel; by sending out invalid requisitions when it knew or ought to have known that they were invalid and only used for "negotiating purposes"; and, finally, "by taking a position at the end of February 1992 that it was relieved of its obligations to provide takeout financing as of March 1, 1992".

11 The trial judge held that under the TOC, the appellant would have received $36.5 million less $400,000 legal fees and disbursements and less a $182,500 commitment fee payable on closing of the individual mortgages for a net amount of $35,917,500. The appellant received proceeds from the sale of the building. Subtracting this amount from amounts owing on the construction loan, at the end of May 1993, meant that $11,045,200.79 of principal and $4,473,665.01 of interest (as per the Loan Agreement, calculated at the BAC prime rate plus one percent per annum compounded monthly) remained outstanding for a total of $15,518,865.80. From this amount, the trial judge deducted $600,000

a) de la fluctuation des taux d'intérêt du marché;

b) des circonstances de l'espèce;

c) du fait qu'un paiement anticipé a été effectué;

d) des faits relatifs à la divulgation de renseignements médicaux par le demandeur;

e) du montant demandé et du montant recouvré dans le cadre de l'instance;

f) du comportement de l'une ou l'autre partie, qui aurait eu pour effet d'abréger ou de prolonger indûment la durée de l'instance;

g) de tout autre facteur pertinent.

IV. Historique des procédures judiciaires

A. La Cour de l'Ontario (Division générale) (1998), 18 R.P.R. (3d) 213

Le juge de première instance a conclu qu'il y avait eu inexécution de contrat de la part de l'intimée pour plusieurs raisons : elle avait manqué à ses obligations de financement hypothécaire postconstruction et avait agi de mauvaise foi en refusant d'avancer les fonds prévus par l'EPP en 1991 et par l'EPPM en 1992, en retenant les services de nouveaux avocats et en causant ainsi un retard déraisonnable, en présentant des réquisitions qu'elle savait ou aurait dû savoir injustifiées et formulées uniquement à des [TRADUCTION] « fins de négociation » et, enfin, [TRADUCTION] « en prétendant, à la fin du mois de février 1992, être déchargée de l'obligation d'assurer le financement hypothécaire postconstruction à partir du 1er mars 1992 ».

Le juge de première instance a statué que, suivant l'EPP, l'appelante aurait touché 36,5 millions de dollars, représentant un montant net de 35 917 500 $ déduction faite d'un montant de 400 000 $ au titre des honoraires d'avocat et des débours et d'une commission d'engagement de 182 500 $ payable à la clôture des hypothèques individuelles. L'appelante a touché le produit de la vente de l'immeuble. Si l'on soustrait ce produit des sommes dues en application de la Convention de prêt à la fin du mois de mai 1993, un capital de 11 045 200,79 $ et des intérêts de 4 473 665,01 $ (calculés au taux préférentiel de la banque appelante majoré de un pour cent par année et composés representing the higher than expected vacancy rate for a total of $14,918,865.80 owed by the respondent to the appellant as of June 1, 1993. The trial judge adjusted this figure by adding monthly compounded interest at the BAC prime rate plus one percent per annum compounded monthly, the rate provided for in the Loan Agreement.

In deciding the appropriate measure of pre-judgment and post-judgment interest, the trial judge agreed with the appellant that it should be awarded the interest rate provided for in the Loan Agreement because, although it only intended to be an interim lender, the breach by the respondent resulted in the appellant becoming a long term lender which resulted in the appellant missing other investment opportunities as the money due to it was not paid and not available for other loans. The appellant also submitted that awarding simple interest would result in a windfall for the respondent as it would lend the money it owed to the appellant to customers at its usual compound interest rates.

The respondent opposed the award of compound interest for three reasons. First, the appellant's statement of claim did not plead compound interest. Second, the appellant did not miss investment opportunities for lack of funds because it could have obtained funds from its parent corporation or other lenders. Finally, the interest rate in the Loan Agreement should not apply to the respondent as it was not a party to the contract.

The trial judge rejected these arguments. He confirmed that the statement of claim could be amended at any stage of the proceeding and that the respondent was not prejudiced in this case by the appellant raising the issue of compound interest at trial as the respondent was fully aware of the issue. He decided that financial institutions could not borrow money without cost and that the respondent was not a stranger to the Loan Agreement but was, in effect, mensuellement, conformément à la Convention de prêt) demeuraient impayés, soit un solde de 15 518 865,80 $ au total. De cette somme, le juge de première instance a déduit 600 000 $ pour tenir compte du taux d'inoccupation plus élevé que prévu, de sorte que l'intimée devait à l'appelante la somme de 14 918 865,80 $ le 1er juin 1993. Il a rajusté ce montant en y ajoutant l'intérêt composé mensuellement au taux préférentiel de la banque appelante majoré de un pour cent par année, soit le taux stipulé dans la Convention de prêt.

12 Pour déterminer le juste montant des intérêts antérieurs et postérieurs au jugement, le juge de première instance a convenu que l'appelante devait obtenir le taux d'intérêt prévu dans la Convention de prêt. Bien que l'appelante n'ait voulu fournir qu'un prêt-relais, l'inexécution de l'intimée avait transformé ce prêt en prêt à long terme, de sorte qu'elle n'avait pu saisir d'autres occasions de placement, n'ayant pas reçu les sommes qui lui étaient dues et ne pouvant les utiliser pour consentir d'autres prêts. L'appelante a également soutenu que le paiement de l'intérêt simple serait indûment avantageux pour l'intimée, celle-ci pouvant, dans l'intervalle, prêter les sommes impayées à ses taux d'intérêt composés habituels.

13 L'intimée s'est opposée au paiement de l'intérêt composé pour trois motifs. Premièrement, l'appelante n'avait pas formulé de demande en ce sens dans sa déclaration. Deuxièmement, le non-paiement des sommes en cause ne l'a pas empêchée de saisir des occasions de placement, car elle aurait pu obtenir des fonds de sa société mère ou d'autres prêteurs. Enfin, le taux d'intérêt fixé dans la Convention de prêt ne devait pas s'appliquer à l'intimée, puisqu'elle n'était pas partie à ce contrat.

14 Le juge de première instance a écarté ces arguments. Il a confirmé que la déclaration pouvait être modifiée à toute étape de l'instance et que l'appelante, en soulevant à l'audience la question de l'intérêt composé, n'avait causé aucun préjudice à l'intimée, celle-ci étant parfaitement au courant de la question. Selon lui, une institution financière ne pouvait emprunter des fonds sans engager de frais et l'intimée n'était pas étrangère à la Convention de to step into the place of the appellant, as lender to Reemark.

15 Farley J. considered ss. 128 and 129 CJA, but relied on s. 130 to exercise his discretion in varying the award of interest. The trial judge referred to Mason C.J. and Wilson J. in Hungerfords v. Walker (1989), 171 C.L.R. 125 (Aust. H.C.), at pp. 145-46 and at pp. 149-50, and concluded that this case involved a breach of financing with the attendant deprivation to the plaintiff from receiving the funds on a timely basis in accordance with the contract and the reciprocal benefit to the defendant in retaining and investing funds it should have paid. This led him to conclude that there should be a compounding provision for the pre- and post-judgment interest particularly when, as here, the plaintiff and the defendants are financial institutions whose business is lending money regularly at compound rates.

16 It is part of the record that each of the relevant agreements, the Loan Agreement, the TOC and the TOC Assignment, involved compound interest. The respondent agreed that was so but claimed that compound interest ceased upon its breach of the contract.

17 In summary, the trial judge determined that in 1987, Reemark began plans to build the condominium project. On November 12, 1987, Reemark and the respondent trust company entered into the TOC under which the respondent would pay Reemark most of the price of a unit and receive mortgage loan payments from investors at compound interest rates. On December 1, 1988, Reemark and the appellant bank entered into the Loan Agreement under which the appellant loaned Reemark $33 million at compound interest rates. On December 16, 1988, Reemark, the appellant and the respondent entered into the TOC Assignment under which Reemark assigned its rights to receive payments from the respondent under the TOC to the appellant until the construction loan had been repaid. Upon learning that the respondent would not perform its obligations pursuant to the TOC Assignment or prêt, mais devait en fait se substituer à l'appelante comme bailleur de fonds de Reemark.

Après avoir examiné les art. 128 et 129 LTJ, le juge Farley a exercé le pouvoir discrétionnaire que lui conférait l'art. 130 de recourir à une autre méthode de calcul. Il a cité le juge en chef Mason et le juge Wilson dans Hungerfords c. Walker (1989), 171 C.L.R. 125 (H.C. Austr.), p. 145-146 et 149-150, puis il a conclu qu'il s'agissait en l'espèce de l'inexécution d'un contrat de financement qui avait empêché la demanderesse de toucher des fonds au moment prévu conformément au contrat et permis par la même occasion à la défenderesse de conserver et de placer les sommes qu'elle aurait dû verser. Il est donc arrivé à la conclusion que les intérêts antérieurs et postérieurs au jugement devaient être composés, d'autant plus que la demanderesse et les défenderesses étaient, comme en l'espèce, des institutions financières dont les activités consistent à prêter régulièrement de l'argent à des taux d'intérêt composés.

Le dossier révèle que le taux d'intérêt stipulé dans chacune des conventions en cause, soit la Convention de prêt, l'EPP et la cession de l'EPP, était composé. L'intimée en a convenu, mais elle a opposé que l'intérêt composé avait cessé d'être exigible dès l'inexécution du contrat.

En résumé, le juge de première instance a déterminé que, en 1987, Reemark avait commencé à établir des plans en vue de la construction de l'immeuble en copropriété. Le 12 novembre 1987, Reemark et la société de fiducie intimée avaient conclu l'EPP suivant lequel l'intimée devait verser à Reemark la quasi-totalité du prix d'une unité et toucher de la part des investisseurs les versements hypothécaires portant intérêt à un taux composé. Le 1er décembre 1988, Reemark et la banque appelante ont conclu la Convention de prêt par laquelle l'appelante prêtait à Reemark 33 millions de dollars à un taux d'intérêt composé. Le 16 décembre 1988, Reemark, l'appelante et l'intimée ont conclu la cession de l'EPP, Reemark cédant à l'appelante son droit aux sommes que devait lui verser l'intimée en exécution de l'EPP, jusqu'au remboursement du prêt à la construction. Ayant appris que l'intimée a subsequent agreement between the parties, the appellant appointed a receiver of the project and sold the project for $22.5 million, substantially less than the appellant was owed under the Loan Agreement and TOC Assignment. The trial judge awarded the appellant damages equal to the shortfall plus interest at the compound rate set out in the Loan Agreement.

ne s'acquitterait pas des obligations contractées dans la cession de l'EPP ou dans une convention subséquente conclue par les parties, l'appelante a mis l'immeuble sous séquestre et l'a vendu pour la somme de 22,5 millions de dollars, bien inférieure au montant qui lui était dû suivant la Convention de prêt et la cession de l'EPP. Le juge de première instance a accordé à l'appelante des dommages-intérêts équivalant à la perte subie plus l'intérêt au taux composé prévu dans la Convention de prêt.

B. La Cour d'appel de l'Ontario (2000), 184 D.L.R. (4th) 1

The Ontario Court of Appeal affirmed the trial judgment other than the award of compound interest. Goudge J.A. stated that the court cannot presume that simply because the appellant was engaged in the lending business that it lost profits equal to the interest rate it was entitled to under the Loan Agreement. He concluded that lost profits must be proved.

18 La Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a confirmé le jugement de première instance, sauf en ce qui a trait à l'intérêt composé. Le juge Goudge a dit que la cour ne pouvait présumer que l'appelante, du seul fait que son activité consistait à consentir des prêts, avait subi une perte de profits équivalant au taux d'intérêt auquel elle avait droit suivant la Convention de prêt. Selon lui, l'appelante devait prouver sa perte de profits.

As well, Goudge J.A. held that the discretion granted to the court under s. 130 CJA to vary an interest award from what is prescribed under ss. 128 and 129 does not include the authority to award compound interest. He found that the court's jurisdiction to award compound interest stems from the court's general equitable jurisdiction. If the principles of equity warrant an award of compound interest, it is, in the language of ss. 128(4)(g) and 129(5), "payable by a right other than under this section". As a result, this being in his view a simple breach of contract, equitable principles did not warrant damages at compound interest rates.

19 De même, le juge Goudge a statué que l'art. 130 LTJ, qui confère à la cour le pouvoir discrétionnaire d'accorder des intérêts différents de ceux prescrits aux art. 128 et 129, ne permettait pas d'ordonner le paiement d'intérêts composés. À son avis, le pouvoir d'accorder des intérêts composés découle de la compétence générale de la cour en equity. Si les principes de l'equity justifient le versement d'intérêts composés, le droit à ces intérêts, suivant l'al. 128(4)g) et le par. 129(5), « a sa source ailleurs que dans le présent article » ou « existe en vertu d'un autre article ». Or, selon lui, il s'agissait en l'espèce d'une simple inexécution de contrat, de sorte que les principes de l'equity ne justifiaient pas que les dommages-intérêts accordés portent intérêt à un taux composé.

Did the trial judge have the jurisdiction to award compound pre-judgment and post-judgment interest and, if so, was he correct in doing so?

20 Le juge de première instance avait-il compétence pour accorder des intérêts composés pour les périodes antérieure et postérieure au jugement et, dans l'affirmative, a-t-il eu raison de le faire?

VI. Analysis

A. Jurisdiction

(1) The Time-Value of Money

21 The value of money decreases with the passage of time. A dollar today is worth more than the same dollar tomorrow. Three factors account for the depreciation of the value of money: (i) opportunity cost (ii) risk, and (iii) inflation.

22 The first factor, opportunity cost, reflects the uses of the dollar which are foregone while waiting for it. The value of the dollar is reduced because the opportunity to use it is absent. The second factor, risk, reflects the uncertainty inherent in delaying possession. Possession of a dollar today is certain but the expectation of the same dollar in the future involves uncertainty. Perhaps the future dollar will never be paid. The third factor, inflation, reflects the fluctuation in price levels. With inflation, a dollar will not buy as much goods or services tomorrow as it does today (G. H. Sorter, M. J. Ingberman and H. M. Maximon, Financial Accounting: An Events and Cash Flow Approach (1990), at p. 14). The time-value of money is common knowledge and is one of the cornerstones of all banking and financial systems.

23 Simple interest and compound interest each measure the time value of the initial sum of money, the principal. The difference is that compound interest reflects the time-value component to interest payments while simple interest does not. Interest owed today but paid in the future will have decreased in value in the interim just as the dollar example described in paras. 21-22. Compound interest compensates a lender for the decrease in value of all money which is due but as yet unpaid because unpaid interest is treated as unpaid principal.

24 Simple interest makes an artificial distinction between money owed as principal and money owed as interest. Compound interest treats a dollar as a dollar and is therefore a more precise measure of

VI. Analyse

A. Compétence

(1) La valeur temporelle de l'argent

La valeur de l'argent diminue avec le temps. Un dollar vaut davantage aujourd'hui que demain. La dépréciation de l'argent est imputable à trois facteurs : (i) le coût de renonciation, (ii) le risque et (iii) l'inflation.

Le premier facteur, le coût de renonciation, correspond aux occasions manquées d'utiliser la somme dont on attend le versement. La valeur de la somme diminue à cause de l'impossibilité de l'utiliser. Le deuxième facteur, le risque, traduit l'incertitude inhérente au report de la possession de la somme. La possession d'une somme aujourd'hui est certaine, mais son versement ultérieur ne l'est pas. La somme dont on prévoit le versement ultérieur pourrait ne jamais être touchée. Le troisième facteur, l'inflation, reflète la fluctuation des prix. À cause de l'inflation, un dollar permet d'acheter plus de biens ou de services aujourd'hui que demain (G. H. Sorter, M. J. Ingberman et H. M. Maximon, Financial Accounting : An Events and Cash Flow Approach (1990), p. 14). La valeur temporelle de l'argent est un fait notoire et constitue l'une des pierres angulaires de tous les systèmes bancaires et financiers.

L'intérêt simple et l'intérêt composé traduisent chacun la valeur temporelle de la somme d'argent initiale, le capital. La différence entre les deux réside dans le fait que, contrairement à l'intérêt simple, l'intérêt composé tient compte de la valeur temporelle des versements d'intérêts. Comme dans l'exemple du dollar cité aux par. 21 et 22, l'intérêt exigible aujourd'hui, mais payé plus tard, voit sa valeur diminuer dans l'intervalle. L'intérêt composé indemnise le prêteur de la dépréciation de tout l'argent qui lui est dû et qui demeure impayé, l'intérêt en souffrance étant assimilé au capital dû.

L'intérêt simple crée une distinction artificielle entre la somme exigible à titre de capital et celle payable à titre d'intérêt. Dans le calcul de l'intérêt composé, chaque dollar est considéré comme un the value of possessing money for a period of time. Compound interest is the norm in the banking and financial systems in Canada and the western world and is the standard practice of both the appellant and respondent.

(2) Contract Damages

Contract damages are determined in one of two ways. Expectation damages, the usual measure of contract damages, focus on the value which the plaintiff would have received if the contract had been performed. Restitution damages, which are infrequently employed, focus on the advantage gained by the defendant as a result of his or her breach of contract.

(a) Expectation Damages

Generally, courts employ expectation damages where, if breach is proved, the plaintiff will be entitled to the value of the promised performance (S. M. Waddams, The Law of Damages (3rd ed. 1997), at p. 267).

See Haack v. Martin, [1927] S.C.R. 413, per Rinfret J., at p. 416:

The case is governed by the general rule applicable to all breaches of contract, and laid down as follows by Parke B. in Robinson v. Harman (1848) [1 Ex. 850, at p. 855].

> The rule of the common law is, that where a party sustains a loss by reason of a breach of contract, he is, so far as money can do it, to be placed in the same situation, with respect to damages, as if the contract had been performed.

Since the value of money decreases with the passage of time, an award, at trial, to a plaintiff of the dollar amount he or she expected to receive had the contract been performed on time would not put the plaintiff in the same position as if the contract had been performed. The party would receive less than his or her expectation damages because of the dollar; ce type d'intérêt traduit donc plus précisément la valeur de la possession d'une somme pendant une période donnée. L'intérêt composé est la norme dans les systèmes bancaires et financiers au Canada et dans le monde occidental, et tant l'appelante que l'intimée en exigent couramment le paiement.

(2) Dommages-intérêts contractuels

25 Il existe deux méthodes pour fixer le montant des dommages-intérêts contractuels. La première, ordinairement utilisée, est l'indemnisation de la perte du profit escompté, calculée en fonction de la valeur que le demandeur aurait reçue si le contrat avait été exécuté. La deuxième, utilisée plus rarement, est la restitution de l'avantage obtenu, calculée en fonction de l'avantage que le défendeur tire de l'inexécution du contrat.

(a) L'indemnisation de la perte du profit escompté

26 En général, les tribunaux fixent le montant des dommages-intérêts en fonction de la perte du profit escompté lorsque la preuve de l'inexécution donne au demandeur le droit de recevoir la valeur de l'exécution promise (S. M. Waddams, The Law of Damages (3e éd. 1997), p. 267).

27 Dans l'arrêt Haack c. Martin, [1927] R.C.S. 413, le juge Rinfret dit ceci, à la p. 416 :

[TRADUCTION] La règle générale applicable à toute inexécution de contrat, énoncée comme suit par le baron Parke dans Robinson c. Harman, (1848) [1 Ex. 850, p. 855], s'applique en l'espèce :

> Suivant la common law, lorsqu'une partie subit une perte par suite de l'inexécution d'un contrat, les dommages-intérêts doivent, dans la mesure où une indemnité financière le permet, la placer dans la situation où elle se serait trouvée si le contrat avait été exécuté.

28 Comme la valeur de l'argent diminue avec le temps, l'octroi au demandeur, lors du procès, de la somme qu'il s'attendait à toucher si le contrat avait été exécuté au moment prévu ne le place pas dans la situation où il se serait trouvé si le contrat avait été dûment exécuté. Le demandeur obtient une somme inférieure à la perte du profit escompté, en raison

(i) opportunity cost, (ii) risk and (iii) inflation. The plaintiff would fail to receive the benefit of the bargain.

29 To award the plaintiff damages equal to the value of the contract as if it had been performed on time, the court must first determine the dollar value of the promise to the plaintiff at the time the obligation was to have been performed, and then apply the appropriate interest rate and method of calculation to account for the time during which the plaintiff was not paid what was rightfully due.

(b) Restitution Damages

30 The other side of the coin is to examine the effect of the breach on the defendant. In contract, restitution damages can be invoked when a defendant has, as a result of his or her own breach, profited in excess of his or her expected profit had the contract been performed but the plaintiff's loss is less than the defendant's gain. So the plaintiff can be fully paid his damages with a surplus left in the hands of the defendant. This occurs with what has been described as an efficient breach of contract. In some but not all cases, the defendant may be required to pay such profits to the plaintiff as restitution damages (Waddams, supra, at p. 474).

31 Courts generally avoid this measure of damages so as not to discourage efficient breach (i.e., where the plaintiff is fully compensated and the defendant is better off than if he or she had performed the contract) (Waddams, supra, at p. 473). Efficient breach is what economists describe as a Pareto optimal outcome where one party may be better off but no one is worse off, or expressed differently, nobody loses. Efficient breach should not be discouraged by the courts. This lack of disapproval emphasizes that a court will usually award money damages for breach of contract equal to the value of the bargain to the plaintiff.

(i) du coût de renonciation, (ii) du risque et (iii) de l'inflation. Il est privé de l'avantage que devait lui conférer le marché.

Pour accorder au demandeur des dommages-intérêts équivalant à la valeur qu'aurait eue le contrat s'il avait été exécuté dans le délai prévu, la cour doit tout d'abord déterminer la valeur financière de la promesse faite au demandeur au moment où l'obligation aurait dû être exécutée, puis appliquer le taux d'intérêt et le mode de calcul appropriés pour tenir compte de la période pendant laquelle le demandeur a été privé de son dû.

(b) La restitution de l'avantage obtenu du fait de l'inexécution

L'autre façon de considérer la question est d'examiner l'effet de l'inexécution sur le défendeur. En matière contractuelle, il peut y avoir restitution lorsque le défendeur a réalisé, du fait de sa propre inexécution, un gain supérieur à celui qu'il pouvait escompter si le contrat avait été exécuté, et que la perte du demandeur est inférieure au gain du défendeur. Ainsi, le défendeur peut réaliser un gain même après avoir indemnisé pleinement le demandeur de son préjudice. L'inexécution contractuelle est alors qualifiée de rentable. Dans certains cas seulement, le tribunal peut ordonner au défendeur de restituer ce profit au demandeur (Waddams, op. cit., p. 474).

Les tribunaux évitent généralement de recourir à cette méthode de calcul des dommages-intérêts afin de ne pas décourager l'inexécution rentable (c.-à-d. lorsque le demandeur est entièrement dédommagé et que la situation du défendeur est plus avantageuse que s'il avait respecté le contrat) (Waddams, op. cit., p. 473). L'inexécution rentable correspond à ce que les économistes décrivent comme l'optimum de Pareto : une partie peut être avantagée sans qu'aucune autre ne soit désavantagée; en d'autres termes, personne n'y perd. Les tribunaux ne devraient pas décourager l'inexécution rentable. Cette absence de désapprobation rappelle que les dommages-intérêts pour inexécution contractuelle accordés par les tribunaux équivalent habituellement à la valeur du marché pour le demandeur.

However, where a sum of money is required to be paid as of a certain date, the benefit to the defendant of the money during the interval between when the money is owed and when the money is paid is, all other things being equal, exactly the same as the detriment to the plaintiff of not having that money during the same interval. This is not a Pareto optimal outcome, but, rather, a zero-sum outcome. The defendant's gain is the plaintiff's loss, the value of which, but for the defendant's breach, would have belonged to the plaintiff.

To prevent defendants from exploiting the time-value of money to their advantage, by delaying payment of damages so as to capitalize on the time-value of money in the interim, courts must be able to award damages which include an interest component that returns the value acquired by a defendant between breach and payment to the plaintiff.

(3) Judgment Interest in Canada

The history of interest at law was identified in Costello v. Calgary (City) (1997), 152 D.L.R. (4th) 453 (Alta. C.A.), by Picard J.A., at pp. 492-94:

> The history of interest at law is long and miserly. Traditionally, pre-judgment interest generally was denied because it was thought usurious and the case against compound interest was considered particularly strong because of the (supposed) difficulty of calculation: M.A. Waldron, The Law of Interest in Canada (Scarborough, Ont.: Carswell, 1992) at pp. 1-10, 142. In time, at least the former rationale was abandoned and the harshness of the law's position was recognized. The legislative response, however, initially was limited. Section 28 of the Civil Procedure Act, 1833 (U.K.), 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42 (better known as Lord Tenterden's Act), merely provided for the availability of interest upon "Debts or Sums certain". . . .
> Of course, that is not to say that non-statutory, pre-judgment interest was entirely foreign to the common law. Exceptions have always existed. Most obviously, interest has long been granted when provided for by

Cependant, toutes choses étant égales par ailleurs, lorsqu'une somme doit être payée à une date déterminée, l'avantage que le défendeur tire de la possession de cette somme entre le moment de son exigibilité et celui de son paiement correspond exactement au préjudice que subit le demandeur du fait qu'il est privé de cette somme pendant le même intervalle. Ce résultat ne peut être assimilé à l'optimum de Pareto. Il s'agit plutôt d'une situation gagnant-perdant. Le gain du défendeur correspond à la perte du demandeur, dont la valeur, n'eût été l'inexécution du défendeur, aurait échu au demandeur. 32

Afin d'éviter qu'un défendeur n'exploite à son avantage la valeur temporelle de l'argent en différant le paiement des dommages-intérêts et en capitalisant la valeur temporelle de cette somme dans l'intervalle, les tribunaux doivent pouvoir inclure, dans les dommages-intérêts accordés, des intérêts qui permettent au demandeur de récupérer la valeur acquise par le défendeur entre l'inexécution et le paiement des dommages-intérêts. 33

(3) L'intérêt sur les jugements au Canada

Dans Costello c. Calgary (City) (1997), 152 D.L.R. (4th) 453 (C.A. Alb.), le juge Picard a tracé l'historique de l'intérêt en common law (aux p. 492-493) : 34

> [TRADUCTION] Il a fallu attendre longtemps pour que soit reconnu, parcimonieusement, le droit aux intérêts en common law. Traditionnellement, les tribunaux refusaient d'accorder de façon générale les intérêts antérieurs au jugement parce qu'ils les estimaient usuraires, et les arguments en défaveur des intérêts composés leur paraissaient particulièrement convaincants à cause des (prétendues) difficultés de calcul : M.A. Waldron, The Law of Interest in Canada (Scarborough, Ont. : Carswell, 1992), p. 1 à 10 et 142. Avec le temps, on a abandonné à tout le moins le premier motif de refus et admis la sévérité de la common law. Les mesures législatives prises en conséquence avaient toutefois une portée limitée, à l'origine. L'article 28 de la Civil Procedure Act, 1833 (R.-U.), 3 & 4 Will. 4, ch. 42 (mesure législative attribuée à lord Tenterden) ne permettait d'ordonner le paiement des intérêts que sur les créances ou sommes déterminées . . .
>
> Cela ne signifie évidemment pas que la common law ignorait totalement les intérêts antérieurs au jugement non prévus par une disposition législative. Il y a toujours eu des exceptions. De toute évidence, des intérêts sont agreement of the parties or when implied by usage of trade: Page v. Newman (1829), 9 B. & C. 378, 109 E.R. 140.

35 Judgment interest in Canada has had statutory authorization since 1837 with the passage of An Act for the further amendment of the Law, and the better advancement of Justice, 7 Wm. 4, c. 3 (U.C.). See Rowan v. Toronto R.W. Co. (1918), 43 O.L.R. 164 (C.A.), at p. 173. The first statute which provided for interest on judgments for debt or sum certain in Upper Canada was the Act to amend the Common Law Procedure Act of Upper Canada, S. Prov. C. 1866, 29 & 30 Vict., c. 42. The Administration of Justice Act, 1884, S.O. 1884, c. 10, provided for post-judgment interest in certain cases in tort and the first provision generally allowing post-judgment interest appeared in The Judicature Act, R.S.O. 1887, c. 44 s. 88. Today in Ontario, each of pre-judgment and post-judgment interest is governed by ss. 128 to 130 CJA.

(4) Interest as Compensation

36 In The Law of Interest in Canada (1992), at pp. 127-28, M. A. Waldron explained that the initial theory underpinning an award of judgment interest was that the defendant's conduct was such that he or she deserved additional punishment. The modern theory is that judgment interest is more appropriately used to compensate rather than punish. At pp. 127-28, she wrote:

> Compensation is one of the chief aims of the law of damages, but a plaintiff who is successful in his action and is awarded a sum for damages assessed perhaps years before but now payable in less valuable dollars finds it quite obvious that he has been shortchanged. Equally obviously, payment of interest on his damage award from some relevant date is one way of redressing this problem.

The overwhelming opinion today of Law Reform Commissions and the academic community is that depuis longtemps accordés lorsque les parties l'ont prévu dans leur contrat ou que tel est l'usage du commerce : Page c. Newman (1829), 9 B. & C. 378, 109 E.R. 140.

Au Canada, les intérêts sur le montant d'un jugement peuvent être accordés depuis l'adoption, en 1837, de la loi intitulée An Act for the further amendment of the Law, and the better advancement of Justice, 7 Wm. 4, ch. 3 (H.-C.). Voir Rowan c. Toronto R.W. Co. (1918), 43 O.L.R. 164 (C.A.), p. 173. La première loi prévoyant l'octroi par jugement des intérêts sur le montant d'une créance ou d'une somme certaine au Haut-Canada est la loi intitulée Acte pour amender l'acte concernant la procédure du droit commun du Haut Canada, S. Prov. C. 1866, 29 & 30 Vict., ch. 42. La loi intitulée The Administration of Justice Act, 1884, S.O. 1884, ch. 10, prévoyait le versement des intérêts postérieurs au jugement dans certaines affaires de responsabilité délictuelle. La loi intitulée The Judicature Act, R.S.O. 1887, ch. 44, art. 88, a été la première loi à renfermer une disposition autorisant les intérêts postérieurs au jugement de façon générale. De nos jours, en Ontario, les intérêts antérieurs et postérieurs au jugement sont régis par les art. 128 à 130 LTJ.

(4) Les intérêts compensatoires

Dans son ouvrage intitulé The Law of Interest in Canada (1992), p. 127-128, M. A. Waldron explique que la théorie justifiant l'octroi des intérêts sur le montant du jugement était, initialement, que le comportement du défendeur était tel qu'une sanction supplémentaire s'imposait. De nos jours, les intérêts sur le montant d'un jugement jouent, à plus juste titre, un rôle compensatoire plutôt que punitif. Voici ce qu'elle écrit aux p. 127-128 :

> [TRADUCTION] L'indemnisation est l'un des principaux objectifs du droit en matière de dommages-intérêts. Or le demandeur qui a gain de cause et qui obtient à titre de dommages-intérêts une somme établie il y a peut-être plusieurs années, payable aujourd'hui en dollars dépréciés, est convaincu de se faire rouler. Il est en outre évident que l'un des moyens de remédier à cette situation consiste à ordonner le paiement des intérêts sur le montant des dommages-intérêts accordés à partir d'une date pertinente donnée.

De nos jours, l'opinion largement prédominante parmi les commissions de réforme du droit et les théoriciens est interest on a claim prior to judgment is properly part of the compensatory process. [Citations omitted.]

After acknowledging that historically compound interest was not available at common law, Waddams, supra, at p. 437, concludes that an award of compound interest should be available to courts so as to allow them to award full compensation to a plaintiff.

[T]here seems in principle no reason why compound interest should not be awarded. Had prompt recompense been made at the date of the wrong the plaintiff would have had a capital sum to invest; the plaintiff would have received interest on it at regular intervals and would have invested those sums also. By the same token the defendant will have had the benefit of compound interest.

Although not historically available, compound interest is well suited to compensate a plaintiff for the interval between when damages initially arise and when they are finally paid.

(5) Sections 128 to 130 of the Courts of Justice Act

Sections 128 to 130 CJA entitle a person with an award for damages to interest on the damages for the period between the date that the cause of action arose and the judgment ("pre-judgment interest") as well as for the period between the judgment and the time when payment is made in full ("post-judgment interest"). The legislation recognizes the unfairness of awarding a plaintiff damages, at trial, in the amount to which he or she was entitled as of the date that the cause of action arose, and no more for the period in between which is frequently years. Sections 128 and 129 CJA, therefore, contain interest rates and methods of calculation to serve for pre-judgment and post-judgment interest, respectively, in those cases for which there is no evidence of a more appropriate interest rate and/or method of calculation.

Sections 128(4)(g), 129(5) and 130 CJA, each of which allows the judge to award interest other than as specifically set out in ss. 128 and 129, clearly que les intérêts antérieurs au jugement font à bon droit partie du processus d'indemnisation. [Citations omises.]

37 Après avoir reconnu que, historiquement, la common law ne permettait pas d'octroyer des intérêts composés, Waddams, op. cit., conclut, à la p. 437, que les tribunaux devraient pouvoir ordonner le versement d'intérêts composés pour assurer l'indemnisation complète du demandeur.

[TRADUCTION] [A]ucun principe ne paraît justifier qu'un tribunal ne puisse accorder des intérêts composés. S'il avait été indemnisé le jour où il a subi le préjudice, le demandeur aurait disposé d'un capital à placer; il aurait périodiquement touché de l'intérêt sur ce capital, qu'il aurait également placé. Le défendeur a quant à lui bénéficié des intérêts composés.

38 Malgré l'impossibilité historique d'octroyer des intérêts composés, il s'agit d'un bon moyen d'indemniser le demandeur du délai écoulé entre le moment où le droit aux dommages-intérêts a pris naissance et le moment où ils sont enfin payés.

(5) Les articles 128 à 130 de la Loi sur les tribunaux judiciaires

39 Suivant les art. 128 à 130 LTJ, la personne qui se voit octroyer une somme à titre de dommages-intérêts a le droit de toucher les intérêts sur cette somme entre le moment où la cause d'action prend naissance et celui où le jugement est rendu (les « intérêts antérieurs au jugement »), de même que pour la période comprise entre la date du jugement et celle du paiement intégral de la somme accordée (les « intérêts postérieurs au jugement »). La loi reconnaît qu'il est injuste que le demandeur obtienne au procès des dommages-intérêts équivalant à ce qu'il aurait dû toucher le jour où la cause d'action a pris naissance, mais n'obtienne rien de plus pour le temps écoulé depuis, qui représente souvent plusieurs années. Les articles 128 et 129 LTJ prescrivent donc des taux d'intérêt et des méthodes de calcul applicables respectivement aux intérêts antérieurs au jugement et aux intérêts postérieurs au jugement, en l'absence de preuve de l'opportunité de recourir à autre méthode de calcul ou à un taux d'intérêt différent.

40 Il ressort clairement de l'al. 128(4)g), du par. 129(5) et de l'art. 130 LTJ, qui permettent tous au tribunal d'accorder d'autres intérêts que ceux indicate that the rates and calculation methods of interest provided in ss. 128 and 129 are applicable in the absence of more appropriate rates and methods of calculation. Section 130 allows a court, where it considers it just, to vary the interest rate or the time for which interest may be awarded. Sections 128(4)(g) and 129(5) allow a court to award pre-judgment and post-judgment interest, respectively, where interest is payable by another right.

(6) Interest Payable by Another Right

41 Equity has been recognized as one right by which interest may be awarded other than as specifically stated in ss. 128 and 129 CJA, including an award of compound interest. (See Brock v. Cole (1983), 142 D.L.R. (3d) 461 (Ont. C.A.); Claiborne Industries Ltd. v. National Bank of Canada (1989), 59 D.L.R. (4th) 533 (Ont. C.A.); Confederation Life Insurance Co. v. Shepherd (1996), 88 O.A.C. 398 (C.A.); Oceanic Exploration Co. v. Denison Mines Ltd., Ont. Ct. (Gen. Div.), May 8, 1998.) It is of some interest that in Air Canada v. Ontario (Liquor Control Board), [1997] 2 S.C.R. 581, at para. 85, approving Brock, supra, Iacobucci J. emphasized that in equity the awarding of compound interest is a discretionary matter. Simple breach of contract does not require moral sanction and is usually governed by common law, not equity.

42 In this case, the Court of Appeal recognized that the court has the jurisdiction to award compound interest under the court's general equitable jurisdiction and that an award of compound interest grounded in equity is, in the language of ss. 128(4)(g) and 129(5) "payable by a right other than under this section". The Court of Appeal found that equity did not apply and therefore the court had no jurisdiction to award compound interest. Implicit in their holding was that the only "right other than under this section" was the right to receive compound interest in equity. This is not so, as a common law right of interest can be an "other right".

expressément prévus aux art. 128 et 129, que les taux et les méthodes de calcul prescrits par ces articles s'appliquent en l'absence de taux et de méthodes de calcul plus appropriés. L'article 130 permet au tribunal, s'il l'estime juste, de modifier le taux d'intérêt ou la période pour laquelle l'intérêt est accordé. L'alinéa 128(4)g) lui permet d'accorder des intérêts antérieurs au jugement, et le par. 129(5) des intérêts postérieurs au jugement, lorsque le droit aux intérêts a sa source ailleurs que dans ces dispositions.

(6) Le droit aux intérêts qui a sa source ailleurs

Les tribunaux ont reconnu que l'equity pouvait conférer un autre droit aux intérêts, y compris à l'intérêt composé, que celui expressément prévu aux art. 128 et 129 LTJ. (Voir Brock c. Cole (1983), 142 D.L.R. (3d) 461 (C.A. Ont.); Claiborne Industries Ltd. c. National Bank of Canada (1989), 59 D.L.R. (4th) 533 (C.A. Ont.); Confederation Life Insurance Co. c. Shepherd (1996), 88 O.A.C. 398 (C.A.); Oceanic Exploration Co. c. Denison Mines Ltd., C. Ont. (Div. gén.), 8 mai 1998.) Il convient de signaler que dans Air Canada c. Ontario (Régie des alcools), [1997] 2 R.C.S. 581, par. 85, où notre Cour approuve Brock, précité, le juge Iacobucci insiste sur le fait que, selon l'equity, l'attribution d'intérêts composés est discrétionnaire. La simple inexécution de contrat n'exige pas de réprobation morale et elle ressortit habituellement à la common law, et non à l'equity.

En l'espèce, la Cour d'appel a reconnu que le tribunal pouvait accorder de l'intérêt composé dans l'exercice de sa compétence générale en equity et que, pour reprendre le libellé de l'al. 128(4)g) et du par. 129(5), le droit à l'intérêt composé fondé sur l'equity « a sa source ailleurs que dans le présent article » ou « existe en vertu d'un autre article ». Elle a conclu que l'equity ne s'appliquait pas et que le tribunal n'avait donc pas le pouvoir d'accorder de l'intérêt composé. Cette conclusion signifiait implicitement que le seul droit aux intérêts qui « a sa source ailleurs » est le droit à l'intérêt composé conféré par l'equity. Or tel n'est pas le cas, car un droit aux intérêts conféré par la common law peut constituer un droit aux intérêts qui « a sa source ailleurs ».

The common law right in contract law to be awarded expectation damages is another such other right. As noted in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v. Islington London Borough Council, [1996] 2 All E.R. 961 (H.L.), at p. 969, the power to award compound interest was not traditionally available at common law, although it is now. This is so because, as our jurisprudence demonstrates, the common law has been able to grow and adapt to changing conditions. In Friedmann Equity Developments Inc. v. Final Note Ltd., [2000] 1 S.C.R. 842, 2000 SCC 34, at para. 42, this Court outlined the following conditions where the rules of common law may be changed if necessary:

(1) to keep the common law in step with the evolution of society,

(2) to clarify a legal principle, or

(3) to resolve an inconsistency.

It warned that the changes should be incremental, and their consequences capable of assessment.

Compound interest is no longer commonly thought to be, in the language quoted in Costello, supra, at pp. 492-93, usurious or to involve prohibitively complex calculations. Compound interest is now commonplace. Mortgages are calculated using compound interest, as are most other loans, including such worthy endeavours as student loans. The growth of a company or a country's gross domestic product over a period of years is often stated in terms of an annually compounded rate. The bank rate, which garners much attention as an indicator of the health and direction of the economy, is a compound interest rate. It is for reasons such as these that the common law now incorporates the economic reality of compound interest. The restrictions of the past should not be used today to separate the legal system from the world at large.

If the court was unable to award compound interest on the breach of a loan which itself bore

43 Le droit contractuel à l'indemnisation de la perte du profit escompté, reconnu en common law, constitue également une autre source du droit aux intérêts. Dans Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale c. Islington London Borough Council, [1996] 2 All E.R. 961 (H.L.), p. 969, la cour a signalé que, par le passé, la common law ne permettait pas aux tribunaux d'accorder des intérêts composés, mais qu'elle les y autorise désormais. Comme le montre la jurisprudence de notre Cour, il en est ainsi parce que la common law a pu évoluer et s'adapter à la société. Dans Friedmann Equity Developments Inc. c. Final Note Ltd., [2000] 1 R.C.S. 842, 2000 CSC 34, par. 42, notre Cour a statué que la common law pouvait être modifiée au besoin :

(1) pour lui permettre de suivre l'évolution de la société,

(2) pour préciser un principe de droit ou

(3) pour éliminer une contradiction.

Notre Cour a précisé que la modification devait être graduelle et que ses conséquences devaient pouvoir être évaluées.

44 Pour reprendre la terminologie employée dans Costello, précité, p. 492-493, on ne considère généralement plus que l'intérêt composé est usuraire et exige des calculs trop complexes. Il est désormais courant. Il s'applique aux prêts hypothécaires, comme à la plupart des autres prêts, y compris aux initiatives aussi méritoires que les prêts étudiants. La croissance d'une entreprise ou du produit intérieur brut d'un pays pendant un certain nombre d'années est souvent exprimée sous forme de taux composé annuellement. Le taux bancaire, que bon nombre de gens voient comme un indicateur de la santé et de l'orientation de l'économie, est un taux d'intérêt composé. C'est pour de telles raisons que la common law s'est adaptée à la réalité économique et permet de nos jours l'octroi d'intérêts composés. Les restrictions du passé ne devraient pas servir aujourd'hui à isoler le système juridique du reste du monde.

45 Si un tribunal ne pouvait accorder de l'intérêt composé pour l'inexécution d'un contrat de prêt compound interest, it would be unable to adequately award the plaintiff the value he or she would have received had the contract been performed. To keep the common law current with the evolution of society and to resolve the inconsistency between awarding expectation damages and the courts' past unwillingness to award compound interest, that unwillingness should be discarded in cases requiring that remedy for the plaintiff to realize the benefit of his or her contract.

46 A contrary rule would lead to inequity and provide incentives to breach contracts. If courts were restricted to simple interest in assessing damages for breach of contract, an apparent abuse could occur in the following way. Money lent at compound interest would accrue compound interest until there was a breach of contract by the borrower. The lender would then sue and only be entitled to simple interest on the judgment. This would encourage borrowers not to repay loans. Contract law is not the enemy of parties to an agreement but, rather, their servant. It should not frustrate their mutually agreed intentions but, instead, absent overriding policy concerns, should permit those parties to obtain the benefit of their intended agreement.

47 I find support for these conclusions in Hadley v. Baxendale (1854), 9 Ex. 341, 156 E.R. 145. In Hadley the Court of Exchequer was confronted with the issue of the proper measure of damages for a breach of contract. In that case, the plaintiffs, who owned a flour mill in Gloucester, sent a broken shaft, without which the mill was inoperable, to the Gloucester office of the defendants, who were common carriers. The shaft was to be taken to Greenwich to serve as a model to make a new one. The plaintiffs sued the defendants for failing to deliver the shaft to Greenwich within a reasonable time. Plaintiffs sought profits which were lost because the mill was inoperable. At p. 151, stipulant lui-même un intérêt composé, il ne pourrait octroyer au demandeur un dédommagement convenable équivalant à ce qu'il aurait touché si le contrat avait été dûment exécuté. Afin que la common law suive l'évolution de la société et que disparaisse la discordance entre l'indemnisation de la perte du profit escompté et la réticence antérieure des tribunaux à accorder de l'intérêt composé, cette réticence doit céder le pas lorsqu'une telle mesure est nécessaire pour accorder au demandeur l'avantage que le contrat devait lui conférer.

Toute démarche contraire serait source d'injustice et encouragerait les parties à se soustraire à leurs obligations contractuelles. Si les tribunaux devaient s'en tenir à l'intérêt simple lorsqu'ils fixent le montant des dommages-intérêts pour inexécution du contrat, il pourrait en résulter un abus manifeste. En effet, l'argent prêté à un taux d'intérêt composé porterait intérêt à ce taux jusqu'à l'inexécution du contrat par l'emprunteur. Le prêteur intenterait ensuite une action et n'aurait droit qu'à l'intérêt simple sur le montant du jugement. L'emprunteur serait encouragé à ne pas rembourser son emprunt. Le droit contractuel existe non pas pour contrecarrer la volonté des parties à une convention, mais pour servir leurs intérêts. Il ne doit pas faire échec à leur intention commune, mais permettre aux parties, en l'absence de considérations de principe supérieures, d'obtenir l'avantage que devait leur conférer l'entente intervenue.

Je m'appuie à cet égard sur la décision Hadley c. Baxendale (1854), 9 Ex. 341, 156 E.R. 145, où la Cour de l'Échiquier était appelée à déterminer le montant qu'il convenait d'accorder à titre de dommages-intérêts par suite de l'inexécution d'un contrat. Dans cette affaire, les propriétaires d'une minoterie de Gloucester avaient fait parvenir au bureau de Gloucester des défendeurs, qui étaient des transporteurs publics, un arbre brisé sans lequel la minoterie ne pouvait fonctionner. L'arbre devait être acheminé à Greenwich afin d'y servir de modèle pour la fabrication d'un nouvel arbre. Les demandeurs ont poursuivi les défendeurs pour omission d'acheminer la pièce à Greenwich dans Alderson B. explained the general rule of contract damages:

"There are certain established rules," this Court says, in Alder v. Keighley (15 M. & W. 117), "according to which the jury ought to find." And the Court, in that case, adds: "and here there is a clear rule, that the amount which would have been received if the contract had been kept, is the measure of damages if the contract is broken."

Now we think the proper rule in such a case as the present is this: — Where two parties have made a contract which one of them has broken, the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect of such breach of contract should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally, i.e., according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties, at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it.

The court held that the unreasonable delay of delivery of the shaft to the engineer would not necessarily lead to the cessation of operations of the mill. The plaintiffs might have had a substitute shaft which could have been used in the interim. The court found for the defendants, holding that the stoppage of milling did not naturally arise from the delay in delivery nor was this result and the concomitant cost to the plaintiff in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract.

With respect to the failure to repay the loan in this appeal when due, it cannot be said that the cost of such delay was not in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract, particularly as both parties were in the business of lending. A loan agreement with a specified interest rate is an agreement between parties on the cost of borrowing money over a period of time. Absent exceptional circumstances, the interest rate which had governed the loan prior to breach would be the un délai raisonnable. Ils ont demandé un dédommagement pour le manque à gagner occasionné par le fait que la minoterie ne pouvait être exploitée. À la p. 151, le baron Alderson explique la règle générale régissant l'octroi de dommages-intérêts en matière contractuelle :

[TRADUCTION] Dans Alder c. Keighley (15 M. & W. 117), la cour a dit « que le jury doit appliquer certaines règles établies pour se prononcer ». Elle a ajouté : « et en l'espèce, une règle claire veut que le montant des dommages-intérêts pour inexécution contractuelle soit établi en fonction du montant qui aurait été touché si le contrat avait été exécuté ».

Nous pensons que la règle qu'il convient d'appliquer dans une affaire comme celle dont nous sommes saisis est la suivante. Lorsque deux parties ont conclu un contrat et que l'une d'elles manque à ses obligations, les dommages-intérêts que l'autre partie devrait recevoir pour l'inexécution du contrat correspondent à ceux que l'on peut justement et raisonnablement considérer soit comme ceux découlant naturellement, c.-à-d. selon le cours normal des choses, de l'inexécution du contrat, soit comme ceux que les parties pouvaient raisonnablement envisager, lors de la conclusion du contrat, comme conséquence probable de son inexécution.

48 La cour a conclu qu'il n'était pas certain que le retard déraisonnable dans l'acheminement de la pièce au technicien entraînerait l'interruption des activités de la minoterie. Les demandeurs auraient pu disposer d'une pièce de remplacement et l'utiliser dans l'intervalle. La cour a tranché en faveur des défendeurs, estimant que l'interruption des activités de la minoterie n'avait pas résulté naturellement du retard d'acheminement et que, lors de la conclusion du contrat, les parties n'avaient envisagé ni ce résultat ni le coût concomitant pour les demandeurs.

49 Pour ce qui est de l'omission, en l'espèce, de rembourser l'emprunt à l'échéance, on ne saurait dire que les parties n'ont pas envisagé le coût de ce retard lors de la conclusion de la Convention, d'autant plus qu'elles évoluaient toutes deux dans le secteur du crédit. Une convention de prêt stipulant un taux d'intérêt précis constitue un accord entre les parties sur le coût de l'emprunt d'une somme pendant une période donnée. Sauf circonstances exceptionnelles, le taux d'intérêt applicable à l'emprunt appropriate rate to govern the post-breach loan. The application of a lower interest rate would be unjust to the lender.

50 This analysis applies equally to pre-judgment interest and post-judgment interest. Pre-judgment interest is necessary to compensate a plaintiff for the period from when the money was initially owed until the date of the judgment. Contract law principles may require such interest to be compounded so as to award the plaintiff the benefit of the bargain. Damage awards, however, are not necessarily paid at the date judgment is rendered. Contract law entitles the plaintiff to the full value of the benefit of the bargain at the time payment is finally made. Where the parties have earlier agreed on a compound rate of interest, or there are circumstances warranting it, it seems fair that a court have the power to award compound post-judgment interest as damages to enable the plaintiff to be fully compensated when the award is finally paid.

51 Additionally, it would be illogical and unfair to the plaintiff to change to a simple rate of interest charged upon the judgment at the post-judgment phase. This would delay but not eliminate the period when the defendant gains a benefit that belongs to the plaintiff by not paying compound interest. It would encourage the defendant to delay paying the judgment award. As noted above, equity is another jurisdiction under which compound interest may be ordered in accordance with s. 129(5) CJA. In light of the illogical and inequitable result that would be occasioned by refusing to extend an award of compound interest to the post-judgment phase, in addition to common law remedies, it may be appropriate to extend that award on equitable grounds where it has been already determined that compound interest was part of the damages for breach in the pre-judgment phase.

52 The court's common law power to award damages flows from the application of contract law. In addition, ss. 128(4)(g) and 129(5) CJA, proavant l'inexécution devrait s'appliquer également après celle-ci. La réduction de ce taux serait injuste envers le prêteur.

Ces principes valent aussi bien pour les intérêts antérieurs au jugement que pour les intérêts postérieurs au jugement. Les intérêts antérieurs au jugement indemnisent le demandeur pour la période comprise entre la date d'échéance initiale et celle du jugement. Le droit des contrats peut exiger que ces intérêts soit composés afin que le demandeur obtienne l'avantage que devait lui conférer le marché. Toutefois, les dommages-intérêts accordés ne sont pas nécessairement versés le jour où le jugement est rendu. Suivant le droit des contrats, le demandeur a droit, lorsque la somme lui est enfin versée, à la pleine valeur de l'avantage prévu. Lorsque les parties ont déjà convenu d'un taux d'intérêt composé ou que les circonstances le justifient, il paraît équitable que le tribunal ait le pouvoir d'accorder des intérêts composés postérieurs au jugement, à titre de dommages-intérêts, afin que le demandeur soit entièrement dédommagé le jour où il touchera enfin la somme qui lui est due.

De plus, il serait illogique et injuste pour le demandeur que la somme accordée ne porte plus intérêt qu'à un taux simple après le jugement. Cela ne ferait que reporter, sans la supprimer, la période pendant laquelle le défendeur, en ne payant pas d'intérêts composés, bénéficierait d'un avantage qui devrait échoir au demandeur. Le défendeur serait encouragé à différer le paiement du montant du jugement. Je le rappelle, pour l'application du par. 129(5) LTJ, l'equity constitue une autre source du pouvoir d'accorder de l'intérêt composé. Étant donné qu'il serait injuste et illogique de refuser d'accorder également l'intérêt composé pour la période postérieure au jugement, en sus des réparations prévues par la common law, le tribunal pourrait exercer à bon droit sa compétence en equity pour l'accorder lorsqu'il a déjà été déterminé que les dommages-intérêts pour inexécution contractuelle incluent l'intérêt composé pour la période antérieure au jugement.

Le pouvoir que la common law confère au tribunal d'accorder des dommages-intérêts découle de l'application du droit des contrats. De plus, vide statutory authority to award compound pre-judgment and post-judgment interest according to this common law power. The court also has an equitable power to award compound interest, as has traditionally been done in cases of, inter alia, wrongful retention of funds and s. 129(5) CJA provides statutory authority to award compound post-judgment interest according to this equitable power.

l'al. 128(4)g) et le par. 129(5) LTJ lui confèrent le pouvoir légal d'accorder des intérêts antérieurs et postérieurs au jugement à taux composé conformément à ce pouvoir de common law. Les tribunaux peuvent également exercer le pouvoir que leur confère l'equity d'attribuer de l'intérêt composé comme ils le font habituellement dans les affaires, notamment, de rétention fautive de fonds, et c'est le par. 129(5) LTJ qui leur confère le pouvoir légal d'accorder des intérêts postérieurs au jugement à taux composé dans l'exercice de cette compétence en equity.

B. Was the Court Below Correct to Award Compound Interest?

B. Le tribunal de première instance a-t-il eu raison d'accorder l'intérêt composé?

At trial, Farley J. found that the respondent had breached the TOC and the TOC Assignment. Under the TOC Assignment, the parties agreed that the respondent would pay to the appellant money owed under the TOC by the respondent to Reemark until the construction loan from the appellant to Reemark had been repaid. The Loan Agreement was incorporated by reference in the TOC Assignment, including the compound interest rate.

53 En première instance, le juge Farley a conclu à l'inexécution de l'EPP et de la cession de l'EPP par l'intimée. Dans la cession de l'EPP, les parties ont convenu que l'intimée verserait à l'appelante les sommes que l'intimée devait verser à Reemark en application de l'EPP, jusqu'au remboursement du prêt à la construction consenti par l'appelante à Reemark. La Convention de prêt, y compris le taux d'intérêt composé, a été incorporée par renvoi à la cession de l'EPP.

The respondent submitted that the appellant had not pleaded damages at compound interest, this was raised at the trial where the trial judge determined that there was no prejudice to the respondent by raising that issue as the appellant at the time had the ability if requested by the respondent to call evidence on the question of what the interest component of the damages should be. The manner in which a trial should proceed is properly left to the discretion of the trial judge, and, absent prejudice or error, an appellate court should not lightly interfere.

54 L'intimée a fait valoir que l'appelante n'avait pas allégué son droit à l'intérêt composé sur les dommages-intérêts. Cette question a été soulevée à l'instruction, où le juge de première instance a conclu que l'intimé n'avait subi aucun préjudice de ce fait puisque, si l'intimée l'exigeait, l'appelante pouvait alors présenter des éléments de preuve relativement à la question de savoir quels devraient être les intérêts intégrés aux dommages-intérêts. La façon de procéder à cet égard à l'instruction relève à juste titre du pouvoir discrétionnaire du juge de première instance et, sauf préjudice ou erreur, la cour d'appel ne doit pas intervenir à la légère.

An award of compound pre- and post-judgment interest will generally be limited to breach of contract cases where there is evidence that the parties agreed, knew, or should have known, that the money which is the subject of the dispute would bear compound interest as damages. It may be awarded as consequential damages in other cases

55 Règle générale, le tribunal n'accordera des intérêts antérieurs et postérieurs au jugement à taux composé que dans les affaires d'inexécution contractuelle où il est prouvé que les parties ont convenu, savaient ou auraient dû savoir que la somme faisant l'objet du litige porterait intérêt à un taux composé à titre de dommages-intérêts. Dans les but there would be the usual requirement of proving that damage component.

56 The award by the trial judge considered both the expectation and restitution aspects of damages.

(1) Expectation Damages

57 From the date of the TOC Assignment until the repayment of the construction loan, the funds to be paid by the respondent accrued interest at the interest rate set forth in the Loan Agreement which was the appellant's prime lending rate plus one percent compounded monthly. This was included by reference in the TOC Assignment. This was the cost of that loan.

58 The respondent breached the TOC Assignment by failing to repay the construction loan. This breach caused the outstanding balance of the loan to increase at the compound interest rate specified in the Loan Agreement. Had that loan been paid in accordance with the TOC Assignment, the appellant would have received the initial principal amount of the loan plus interest at the appellant's prime lending rate plus one percent over the entire period from the date interest first accrued until the date of payment in full compounded monthly. Any lesser amount would fail to award the appellant the agreed-upon time-value of its money.

(2) Restitution Damages

59 The respondent is a financial institution whose business is to make loans at compound interest. At the hearing, it was clear that loans made by the respondent since the time of the breach of contract would have been made at compound interest. The trial judge found that as the real estate market autres affaires, des intérêts composés peuvent être accordés à titre de dommages-intérêts indirects, mais il faut alors satisfaire à l'exigence habituelle de prouver cet élément du préjudice.

Les dommages-intérêts accordés par le juge de première instance tenaient compte à la fois de l'indemnisation de la perte du profit escompté et de la restitution de l'avantage obtenu du fait de l'inexécution.

(1) L'indemnisation de la perte du profit escompté

Entre la date de la cession de l'EPP et le remboursement du prêt à la construction, les sommes payables par l'intimée portaient intérêt au taux prévu dans la Convention de prêt, c'est-à-dire au taux préférentiel de la banque appelante majoré de un pour cent et composé mensuellement. Ces modalités étaient intégrées par renvoi à la cession de l'EPP. Il s'agissait du coût de l'emprunt.

L'intimée a manqué aux obligations qui lui incombaient en vertu de la cession de l'EPP en omettant de rembourser le prêt à la construction. Cette inexécution a eu pour effet d'augmenter le solde impayé du prêt au taux composé stipulé dans la Convention de prêt. Si cet emprunt avait été remboursé conformément à la cession de l'EPP, l'appelante aurait touché le capital initial plus l'intérêt composé mensuellement au taux préférentiel de l'appelante majoré de un pour cent, pour toute la période comprise entre la date à laquelle les intérêts ont commencé à courir et la date du règlement intégral. Toute somme inférieure versée à l'appelante ne tiendrait pas compte de la valeur temporelle de l'argent dont les parties étaient convenues.

(2) La restitution de l'avantage obtenu du fait de l'inexécution

L'intimée est une institution financière dont les activités consistent à consentir des prêts à des taux composés. À l'audience, il est apparu clairement que les prêts consentis par l'intimée depuis l'inexécution du contrat auraient été consentis à des taux composés. Le juge de première instance a conclu collapsed, the respondent was under pressure from each of the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions and the Office of the Ministry of Financial Institutions at a time when the respondent needed the approval of these regulatory bodies to increase its multiplier and avoid any reduction of its capital base by the removal from it of any deemed "troubled" loans. Having fallen below the required ratio of capital to loans, it is reasonable to conclude that the money which should have been paid to the appellant was used by the respondent to support loans already made at compound interest rates.

If required to pay damages at only simple interest, the respondent would have earned compound interest on the appellant's money while paying only simple interest. By breaching the contract, the respondent would have conferred on itself a profit which the contract envisaged for the appellant.

This is not a case of efficient breach. The respondent's gains have come at the appellant's expense. An award of compound interest will prevent the respondent from profiting by its breach at the expense of the appellant. The award of the trial judge yields a satisfactory result with respect to both expectation damages and restitution damages.

VII. Conclusion

The courts have the jurisdiction to award pre-judgment and post-judgment interest at both common law and equity. Sections 128(4)(g) and 129(5) CJA allow courts to award interest by means of these powers as a substitute for the interest prescribed by those sections. This is such a case. As a result, the order of the Court of Appeal is set aside and the trial judgment restored. Accordingly, the appeal is allowed. The appellant is entitled to costs throughout.

que, par suite de l'effondrement du marché immobilier, l'intimée avait été l'objet de pressions de la part du Bureau du surintendant des institutions financières et du ministère des Institutions financières, au moment où elle devait obtenir l'approbation de ces organismes de réglementation pour augmenter son multiplicateur et éviter toute réduction de son capital de base résultant de la déduction du montant de prêts jugés « douteux ». Le ratio capital/prêts de l'intimée étant devenu inférieur à celui exigé, il est raisonnable de conclure qu'elle a utilisé les fonds qu'elle devait à l'appelante pour soutenir des prêts déjà consentis à des taux d'intérêt composés.

60 Si elle avait été tenue de payer seulement l'intérêt simple relativement aux dommages-intérêts, l'intimée aurait touché l'intérêt composé sur les sommes dues à l'appelante tout en ne versant elle-même que l'intérêt simple. En manquant à ses obligations contractuelles, l'intimée se serait approprié le profit qui, selon le contrat, devait revenir à l'appelante.

61 On ne peut parler en l'espèce d'inexécution rentable. Le gain de l'intimée est réalisé aux dépens de l'appelante. L'octroi d'intérêts composés empêchera l'intimée de tirer avantage de son inexécution aux dépens de l'appelante. Le jugement de première instance donne un résultat satisfaisant en ce qui concerne tant l'indemnisation de la perte du profit escompté que la restitution de l'avantage obtenu du fait de l'inexécution.

VII. Conclusion

62 Les tribunaux ont compétence pour accorder des intérêts antérieurs et postérieurs au jugement tant en common law qu'en equity. L'alinéa 128(4)g) et le par. 129(5) LTJ leur permettent d'exercer ces pouvoirs plutôt que d'accorder les intérêts prescrits par ces dispositions. Le tribunal s'est prévalu de cette possibilité en l'espèce. En conséquence, l'ordonnance de la Cour d'appel est annulée et le jugement de première instance est rétabli. En conséquence, le pourvoi est accueilli. L'appelante a droit aux dépens devant toutes les cours.

diagnosed with chronic fatigue syndrome and fibromyalgia, and began receiving long-term disability benefits in January 1991. Under the terms of the policy, she was only entitled to continued benefits after two years if she was unable to do any job. In May 1997, the insurer informed F that her benefit payments would be terminated. According to the insurer, its video surveillance detailed activities inconsistent with F's claim that she was incapable of performing light or sedentary work. The insurer's denial of benefits was followed by almost two years of correspondence with F and medical professionals. Despite the medical evidence in its possession to the effect that F was not yet capable of doing any work, the insurer, relying on its own consultants and experts, confirmed its decision to terminate benefits in December 1998. F commenced an action and, in April 2002, one week before the trial was scheduled to start, the insurer offered to reinstate her benefits and to pay all arrears with interest. As a result, the only issue at trial was F's entitlement to damages. The trial judge awarded her $20,000 in aggravated damages for mental distress but, concluding that the insurer had not acted in bad faith, dismissed her claim for punitive damages. The Court of Appeal unanimously upheld the award for mental distress, and a majority of the court awarded F an additional $100,000 in punitive damages, finding palpable and overriding error on the question of bad faith.

Held: The appeal should be allowed in part.

Damages for mental distress for breach of contract may be recovered where they are established on the evidence and shown to have been within the reasonable contemplation of the parties at the time the contract was made. There is no requirement for an independent actionable wrong. In order to be successful, a plaintiff must prove his or her loss and the court must be satisfied that the degree of mental suffering caused by the breach was of a degree sufficient to warrant compensation. These questions require sensitivity to the particular facts of each case. Here, given the nature of a disability insurance contract, it would have been within the reasonable contemplation of the parties at the time the contract was made that mental distress would likely flow from a failure to pay the required benefits. An unwarranted delay in receiving the bargained for protection can be extremely stressful. The longue durée. Elle est tombée malade alors qu'elle était âgée de 36 ans. Un diagnostic de syndrome de fatigue chronique et de fibromyalgie a finalement été établi et elle a commencé à recevoir des prestations d'invalidité de longue durée au mois de janvier 1991. Aux termes de la police, elle n'avait droit au maintien du versement des prestations après deux ans que si elle était incapable d'exercer tout emploi. Au mois de mai 1997, l'assureur a informé F qu'il cessait de lui verser les prestations. Selon l'assureur, la vidéo de surveillance montrait des activités incompatibles avec l'affirmation de F selon laquelle elle était incapable d'accomplir un travail léger ou sédentaire. Le refus de l'assureur de verser des prestations a été suivi d'un échange de lettres avec F et des professionnels de la santé qui a duré presque deux ans. Malgré la preuve médicale qu'elle possédait établissant que F n'était pas encore en mesure d'effectuer le moindre travail, l'assureur, sur la foi de ses propres consultants et spécialistes, a confirmé en décembre 1998 sa décision de cesser de verser les prestations. F a intenté une action et, en avril 2002, une semaine avant le début de l'instruction, l'assureur lui a offert de rétablir les prestations et de payer tous les arrérages avec intérêts. Par conséquent, il n'a été question au procès que du droit de F à des dommages-intérêts. Le juge de première instance lui a accordé 20 000 $ en dommages-intérêts majorés pour souffrance morale mais, concluant que l'assureur n'avait pas agi de mauvaise foi, il a rejeté la demande de dommages-intérêts punitifs. La Cour d'appel à l'unanimité a maintenu l'attribution de dommages-intérêts pour souffrance morale et les juges majoritaires ont accordé à F une somme additionnelle de 100 000 $ en dommages-intérêts punitifs, estimant qu'il y avait eu erreur manifeste et dominante sur la question de la mauvaise foi.

Arrêt : Le pourvoi est accueilli en partie.

Des dommages-intérêts peuvent être recouvrés pour la souffrance morale causée par la violation de contrat lorsqu'ils sont établis par la preuve et qu'il est démontré qu'ils étaient raisonnablement prévisibles pour les parties lors de la conclusion du contrat. Une faute indépendante donnant ouverture à action n'est pas requise. Pour avoir gain de cause, le demandeur doit prouver sa perte et le tribunal doit être convaincu que la souffrance morale causée par la violation du contrat était suffisamment intense pour justifier une indemnisation. Ces points exigent une attention spéciale aux faits particuliers à chaque cas. En l'espèce, compte tenu de la nature du contrat d'assurance-invalidité, les parties pouvaient raisonnablement envisager au moment de la conclusion du contrat que le refus de payer les prestations requises entraînerait une souffrance morale. Il peut être extrêmement stressant de recevoir en retard la protection mental distress at issue here was of a degree sufficient to warrant compensation. The trial judge concluded, based on extensive medical evidence documenting the stress and anxiety that F experienced, that merely paying the arrears and interest did not compensate for the years that F was without her benefits. His award of $20,000 seeks to compensate her for the psychological consequences of the insurer's breach. [44-45] [47] [56-59]

The Court of Appeal's award of punitive damages must be set aside. Punitive damages are not compensatory. They are designed to address the purposes of retribution, deterrence and denunciation. However, an insurer will not necessarily be liable for such damages by incorrectly denying a claim that is eventually conceded, or judicially determined, to be legitimate. The question in each case is whether the denial was the result of the overwhelmingly inadequate handling of the claim, or the introduction of improper considerations into the claims process. Ultimately, each case revolves around its own facts. Here, after a thorough review of the relevant evidence, the trial judge found that the insurer had not acted in bad faith. He considered every salient aspect of how the insurer handled the claim and concluded that its denial of benefits was the product of a real, albeit incorrect, doubt as to whether F was incapable of performing any work. The termination of benefits relating to an unobservable disability in the absence of any medical evidence indicating an ability to return to work represents conduct that is troubling, but not sufficiently so as to justify interfering with the trial judge's conclusion that there was no bad faith. convenue. La souffrance morale en l'espèce était suffisamment intense pour justifier qu'une indemnité soit accordée. En se fondant sur une preuve médicale volumineuse attestant le stress et l'inquiétude qui ont affligé F, le juge de première instance a conclu que le simple versement des arrérages et de l'intérêt ne compensait pas F pour les années où elle avait été privée de ses prestations. En lui accordant 20 000 $, il a voulu l'indemniser des conséquences psychologiques découlant de la violation du contrat par l'assureur. [44-45] [47] [56-59]

L'attribution de dommages-intérêts punitifs par la Cour d'appel doit être annulée. Les dommages-intérêts punitifs ne sont pas des dommages-intérêts compensatoires. Ils ont pour objet le châtiment, la dissuasion et la dénonciation. Cependant, un assureur n'est pas nécessairement tenu de payer ces dommages-intérêts lorsqu'il refuse à tort une réclamation qu'il reconnaît ensuite comme légitime ou qui est déclarée telle par un tribunal. Il faut se demander dans chaque cas si le refus découlait d'une analyse terriblement bâclée de la réclamation ou de l'application de considérations malhonnêtes dans le processus de règlement. En bout de ligne, l'issue de chaque affaire dépend des faits qui lui sont propres. En l'espèce, à l'issue d'un examen exhaustif de la preuve pertinente, le juge de première instance a conclu que l'assureur n'avait pas agi de mauvaise foi. Il a examiné tous les points saillants du traitement de la réclamation par l'assureur et a conclu que son refus de verser les prestations reposait sur un doute qui, pour mal fondé qu'il fût, n'en était pas moins réel sur la question de savoir si F était incapable d'exercer tout emploi. La cessation du versement des prestations relatives à une invalidité impossible à observer, en l'absence de toute preuve médicale indiquant que l'assurée était apte à reprendre le travail, révèle une conduite troublante, mais pas au point qu'il soit justifié d'infirmer la conclusion du juge de première instance sur l'absence de mauvaise foi. The judgment of the Court was delivered by

THE CHIEF JUSTICE AND ABELLA J. — For more than five years, Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada denied Connie Fidler the long-term disability benefits to which she was entitled. The trial judge found that, while there was no bad faith on the part of the insurer justifying an award of punitive damages, the denial caused Ms. Fidler significant mental distress. Sun Life was found liable to pay Ms. Fidler $20,000 in damages for mental distress resulting from Sun Life's breach of a group disability insurance contract. In the Court of Appeal for British Columbia, that award was upheld. In addition, a majority of the Court of Appeal found that, in reaching the conclusion that there was no bad faith, the trial judge had made a palpable and overriding error and awarded $100,000 in punitive damages to Ms. Fidler.

Since mental distress of the kind experienced by Ms. Fidler was reasonably within the contemplation of the parties when they entered into the contract of disability insurance, we see no reason to deny her compensation for the damages for mental distress directly flowing from the breach. However, the trial judge's finding that Sun Life did not act in bad faith should not be interfered with and precludes an award of punitive damages. Accordingly, we reverse the Court of Appeal's order as to punitive damages and restore the award made by the trial judge.

Version française du jugement de la Cour rendu par

LA JUGE EN CHEF ET LA JUGE ABELLA — Pendant plus de cinq ans, Sun Life du Canada, compagnie d'assurance-vie a refusé de verser à Connie Fidler les prestations d'invalidité de longue durée auxquelles elle avait droit. Le juge de première instance a conclu que même s'il n'y avait pas de mauvaise foi de l'assureur justifiant que des dommages-intérêts punitifs soient accordés, ce refus avait causé à M^me^ Fidler une souffrance morale importante. Il a condamné Sun Life à lui verser 20 000 $ à titre de dommages-intérêts pour la souffrance morale causée par la violation du contrat d'assurance-invalidité collective. La Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique a maintenu l'attribution de ces dommages-intérêts. De plus, les juges majoritaires ont estimé que le juge de première instance avait commis une erreur manifeste et dominante en concluant à l'absence de mauvaise foi et ils ont accordé à M^me^ Fidler des dommages-intérêts punitifs de 100 000 $.

Puisque le type de souffrance morale éprouvée par M^me^ Fidler était raisonnablement prévisible au moment de la conclusion du contrat d'assurance-invalidité, nous ne voyons aucune raison de lui refuser une indemnité pour la souffrance morale découlant directement de la violation du contrat. Toutefois, la conclusion du juge de première instance selon laquelle Sun Life n'a pas agi de mauvaise foi ne devrait pas être modifiée et elle empêche que des dommages-intérêts punitifs soient accordés. Par conséquent, nous infirmons l'ordonnance de la Cour d'appel quant aux dommages-intérêts punitifs et nous rétablissons les dommages-intérêts accordés par le juge de première instance.

I. Background

3 Connie Fidler worked as a receptionist at a branch of the Royal Bank of Canada in Burnaby, British Columbia. Like other employees of the bank, Ms. Fidler was covered by a group policy which included long-term disability benefits. The insurer was Sun Life Company of Canada.

4 In 1990, at the age of 36, Ms. Fidler became ill with pyelonephritis, an acute kidney infection, resulting in her hospitalization for several days. Even when the infection ended, however, Ms. Fidler continued to suffer from fatigue. She was eventually diagnosed with chronic fatigue syndrome and fibromyalgia.

5 Under the terms of her policy with Sun Life, Ms. Fidler was eligible to receive long-term disability benefits six months after becoming totally disabled. It was a precondition of entitlement to long-term disability benefits that the insured fit within the definition of "Totally Disabled". The policy defines "Totally Disabled" as follows:

> An Employee is Totally Disabled if he is in a continuous state of incapacity due to Illness which
>
> 1. while it continues throughout the Elimination Period and during the following 24 months . . . of incapacity prevents him from performing the essential duties of his own job at the onset of disability,
> 2. while it continues after such period, prevents him from engaging in any occupation for which he is or may become reasonably qualified by education, training or experience. [Emphasis added.]

6 Under the first clause, Ms. Fidler was entitled to receive long-term disability benefits for two years, if she was unable to do her own job; after two years, according to the second clause, she was only entitled to continued benefits if she was unable to do any job.

7 Despite some initial disputes between Ms. Fidler and Sun Life about whether she was in fact totally

I. Contexte

Connie Fidler travaillait comme réceptionniste dans une succursale de la Banque Royale du Canada à Burnaby en Colombie-Britannique. Comme les autres employés de la banque, elle était couverte par une police d'assurance collective comportant un régime d'assurance-invalidité de longue durée. Sun Life du Canada, compagnie d'assurance-vie était l'assureur.

En 1990, alors qu'elle était âgée de 36 ans, M^me^ Fidler a dû être hospitalisée pendant plusieurs jours pour une pyélonéphrite, une infection rénale aiguë. Remise de l'infection, elle a continué malgré tout à souffrir de fatigue. Un diagnostic de syndrome de fatigue chronique et de fibromyalgie a finalement été établi.

Aux termes de la police d'assurance émise par Sun Life, M^me^ Fidler devenait admissible à des prestations d'invalidité de longue durée six mois après qu'elle soit devenue totalement invalide. Pour que l'assurée ait droit à ces prestations, son état de santé devait correspondre à la définition d'« invalidité totale » formulée comme suit dans la police :

> [TRADUCTION] Invalidité totale d'un employé est un état d'incapacité continue causé par la maladie, qui :
>
> 1. perdure pendant le délai de carence et les 24 mois suivants [. . .] et l'empêche d'accomplir les fonctions principales de l'emploi qu'il occupe au moment où commence l'invalidité;
> 2. continue après cette période et l'empêche d'exercer tout emploi pour lequel il est ou peut devenir raisonnablement qualifié en raison de son instruction, de sa formation ou de son expérience. [Nous soulignons.]

Suivant la première clause de cette définition, M^me^ Fidler avait le droit de toucher des prestations d'invalidité de longue durée pendant deux ans si elle était incapable d'exercer son propre emploi; après deux ans, aux termes de la seconde clause, elle n'avait droit aux prestations que si elle était incapable d'exercer tout emploi.

Bien qu'un différend sur l'existence d'une invalidité totale ait d'abord opposé M^me^ Fidler et Sun disabled, Ms. Fidler eventually received long-term disability benefits starting January 4, 1991.

Her benefits continued until, in a letter dated May 12, 1997, Sun Life informed Ms. Fidler that "as a result of a non medical investigation revealing that your activities are incompatible with your alleged disability", benefit payments would be terminated, effective April 30, 1997. At the time Sun Life terminated Ms. Fidler's benefits, it had no medical evidence indicating that she was now capable of working.

The "non medical investigation" consisted of video surveillance conducted in August and September 1996 by private investigators hired by Sun Life, along with a "Lifestyle Questionnaire" Ms. Fidler had completed at Sun Life's request in January 1996. In her answers to the questionnaire, Ms. Fidler described her activities as "rarely go shopping . . . no hobbies . . . no entertaining . . . recreation limited to occasional camping". She expressed a preference not to drive "because of fatigue and pain". Her condition, she said, had "not much hope for change".

The surveillance video, which was the basis for Sun Life's conclusion that Ms. Fidler was not entitled to continued benefits, showed Ms. Fidler getting in and out of her vehicle, driving, shopping, and climbing into the rear of her vehicle, among other things. An internal Sun Life memorandum about the surveillance stated that Ms. Fidler was "active for 5 FULL DAYS!" The surveillance was in fact conducted for about five hours on each of three days, and for one hour on a fourth day. According to Sun Life, its surveillance impugned Ms. Fidler's credibility, leading it to doubt her assertion that she was incapable of doing any work.

Life, l'assurée a finalement commencé à recevoir des prestations d'invalidité de longue durée le 4 janvier 1991.

8 M^me^ Fidler a continué à toucher des prestations jusqu'à ce qu'à ce qu'une lettre de Sun Life en date du 12 mai 1997 l'informe que les versements prendraient fin le 30 avril 1997 [TRADUCTION] « par suite d'une enquête non médicale révélant que vos activités sont incompatibles avec votre prétendue invalidité ». Au moment où Sun Life a cessé de verser des prestations, elle ne disposait d'aucune preuve médicale indiquant que M^me^ Fidler était alors capable de travailler.

9 L'« enquête non médicale » consistait en une surveillance vidéo effectuée aux mois d'août et septembre 1996 par des détectives privés engagés par Sun Life, ainsi qu'en un « questionnaire sur le mode de vie », auquel M^me^ Fidler avait répondu au mois de janvier 1996 à la demande de Sun Life. Dans ses réponses aux questions, M^me^ Fidler décrivait ainsi ses activités : [TRADUCTION] « fais rarement les courses [. . .] aucun passe-temps [. . .] ne reçois pas [. . .] loisirs limités à quelques sorties de camping ». Elle indiquait qu'elle préférait ne pas conduire [TRADUCTION] « à cause de la fatigue et de la douleur » et qu'elle [TRADUCTION] « n'avait pas grand espoir que son état change ».

10 La vidéo réalisée pendant la surveillance, sur laquelle Sun Life s'est fondée pour conclure que M^me^ Fidler n'avait plus droit aux prestations, montrait notamment cette dernière alors qu'elle montait dans son véhicule et en sortait, qu'elle conduisait, faisait les courses et grimpait dans l'habitacle arrière du véhicule. Une note de service interne de Sun Life au sujet de la surveillance indiquait que M^me^ Fidler avait été [TRADUCTION] « active 5 JOURS COMPLETS! » En fait, la surveillance s'est effectuée à raison d'environ cinq heures par jour pendant trois jours et pendant une heure lors d'une quatrième journée. Selon Sun Life, la vidéo avait mis à mal la crédibilité de M^me^ Fidler et lui avait fait douter de la véracité de son affirmation selon laquelle elle était incapable d'accomplir toute tâche.

11 Ms. Fidler asserted that what the surveillance video showed was consistent with the information she supplied in a Supplementary Statement to Sun Life on August 5, 1996, a month before the surveillance, when she said: "I feel I am doing well to take care of myself and my daily business — i.e. paying bills, shopping, etc. and as this seems like a full time effort for me I cannot imagine trying to hold a job."

Selon M^me^ Fidler, la vidéo concordait avec les renseignements qu'elle avait fournis dans une déclaration supplémentaire à Sun Life le 5 août 1996, un mois avant la surveillance. Elle y affirmait : [TRADUCTION] « Je pense que je vais assez bien pour prendre soin de moi et vaquer à mes occupations quotidiennes — c.-à-d. payer mes comptes, faire des courses, etc., mais cela me demande un effort constant et je ne peux concevoir de tenter d'exercer un emploi. »

12 Sun Life's denial of benefits, effective April 30, 1997, was followed by almost two years of correspondence with Ms. Fidler, involving medical professionals, investigators, and claims examiners. The correspondence began with a letter from Ms. Fidler to Sun Life dated May 30, 1997, in which Ms. Fidler requested a copy of the surveillance video and any other evidence Sun Life had used as the basis for its decision. On June 21, 1997, Sun Life replied, through its claims administrator, that it was not prepared to disclose its investigative report (including the video), and detailed the activities it concluded were inconsistent with Ms. Fidler's claim that she was incapable of performing light or sedentary work.

Le refus de Sun Life de verser des prestations à compter du 30 avril 1997 a été suivi d'un échange de lettres avec M^me^ Fidler qui a duré presque deux ans et a fait intervenir des professionnels de la santé, des enquêteurs et des rédacteurs-sinistres. La correspondance a débuté par une lettre à Sun Life en date du 30 mai 1997 dans laquelle M^me^ Fidler demandait une copie de la vidéo de surveillance et de tout autre élément de preuve sur lequel Sun Life s'était fondée pour prendre sa décision. Le 21 juin suivant, un gestionnaire des demandes de règlement de Sun Life lui a répondu que Sun Life n'était pas disposée à communiquer son rapport d'enquête (y compris la vidéo) et lui a donné des précisions sur les activités jugées incompatibles avec l'affirmation de M^me^ Fidler selon laquelle elle était incapable d'accomplir un travail léger ou sédentaire.

13 In January 1998, Dr. Wilkinson, Ms. Fidler's doctor again confirmed the existence of Ms. Fidler's total disability and reiterated that she was not fit to return to work. An independent medical examination was recommended on March 5, 1998 by both Sun Life's claims administrator and Dr. Wilkinson. Ms. Fidler agreed to the examination readily.

Au mois de janvier 1998, le médecin traitant de M^me^ Fidler, le Dr Wilkinson, a encore une fois confirmé l'invalidité totale de sa patiente et a répété que celle-ci n'était pas apte à retourner au travail. Le 5 mars 1998, le gestionnaire des demandes de règlement et le docteur Wilkinson ont recommandé un examen médical indépendant. M^me^ Fidler y a consenti sans difficulté.

14 The independent examination was conducted by Dr. John Wade on September 29, 1998. His conclusions are relied on by both Sun Life and Ms. Fidler:

> It would be my opinion that Connie Fidler is increasingly able to consider returning to work on a graduated basis. Prior to this being successful, she should embark upon a graduated training program to improve her level of physical fitness.

Le Dr John Wade a procédé à l'examen indépendant le 29 septembre 1998. Tant Sun Life que M^me^ Fidler se sont appuyées sur ses conclusions :

> [TRADUCTION] Je suis d'avis que Connie Fidler est de plus en plus en mesure d'envisager un retour au travail graduel. Pour que le retour au travail réussisse, elle devrait préalablement suivre un programme de mise en forme progressif pour améliorer son aptitude physique.

Sun Life took from this diagnosis that Ms. Fidler was "increasingly able to consider returning to work"; Ms. Fidler, for her part, emphasized the words "[p]rior to this being successful", which she said indicated that a return to work was premature and conditional on a training program.

Sun Life did not pursue Dr. Wade's suggestion that Ms. Fidler "embark upon a graduated training program". Sun Life's internal medical consultant, who did not see or communicate with Ms. Fidler, did not share Dr. Wade's hesitation. Based on a review of the video surveillance and Dr. Wade's assessment, on November 13, 1998, the medical consultant reached a conclusion notwithstanding the opinions of both Dr. Wade and Dr. Wilkinson:

> All in all there is no medical and non-medical evidence to support that this lady cannot perform at a light physical, clerical or sedentary job on a regular basis since, at least, Sept. 96. [Emphasis added.]

This contradicted the medical evidence Sun Life had in its possession to the effect that Ms. Fidler was not yet capable of doing any work. Nonetheless, in a letter dated December 14, 1998 to Ms. Fidler, Sun Life confirmed its decision to terminate benefits. A year and a half had elapsed since its initial decision to terminate them.

On February 2, 1999, Ms. Fidler commenced this action.

In April 2002, a week before the trial was scheduled to start, Sun Life offered to reinstate Ms. Fidler's benefits and to pay all outstanding amounts along with pre-judgment interest. The total, as of April 22, 2002, was $52,516.10. The trial, as a result, dealt only with Ms. Fidler's entitlement to aggravated and punitive damages.

The trial judge, Ralph J., awarded Ms. Fidler $20,000 in what he termed aggravated damages ((2002), 6 B.C.L.R. (4th) 390, 2002 BCSC 1336).

Sun Life a retenu de ce diagnostic que M^me^ Fidler était « de plus en plus en mesure d'envisager un retour au travail »; pour sa part, M^me^ Fidler a mis l'accent sur les mots « [p]our que le retour au travail réussisse » qui, selon elle, indiquaient qu'un retour au travail était prématuré et qu'il était subordonné à un programme de mise en forme. 15

Sun Life n'a pas donné suite à la recommandation du Dr Wade préconisant que M^me^ Fidler suive « un programme de mise en forme progressif ». Le médecin consultant de Sun Life, qui n'avait pas vu M^me^ Fidler ni communiqué avec elle, ne partageait pas l'hésitation du Dr Wade. S'appuyant sur la vidéo de surveillance et l'évaluation faite par le Dr Wade, il a formulé, le 13 novembre 1998, la conclusion suivante en dépit des opinions des Drs Wade et Wilkinson : 16

> [TRADUCTION] Tout bien considéré, aucune preuve, médicale ou non médicale, ne permet d'affirmer que cette dame ne peut, sur une base régulière, exercer un emploi de bureau, un emploi sédentaire ou un emploi peu exigeant au plan physique, et ce, depuis le mois de septembre 1996 au moins. [Nous soulignons.]

Cette conclusion contredisait la preuve médicale que possédait Sun Life établissant que M^me^ Fidler n'était pas encore en mesure d'effectuer le moindre travail. Néanmoins, dans une lettre en date du 14 décembre 1998 adressée à M^me^ Fidler, Sun Life a confirmé sa décision de cesser de verser les prestations. Un an et demi s'étaient écoulés depuis la décision initiale de mettre fin aux prestations. 17

Le 2 février 1999, M^me^ Fidler a intenté cette action. 18

Au mois d'avril 2002, une semaine avant le début de l'instruction, Sun Life a offert de rétablir les prestations de M^me^ Fidler et de payer tous les arrérages, avec intérêts avant jugement. Le 22 avril 2002, la somme totale était de 52 516,10 $. Par conséquent, il n'a été question au procès que des dommages-intérêts majorés et punitifs. 19

En première instance, le juge Ralph a accordé 20 000 $ à M^me^ Fidler pour ce qu'il a appelé des dommages-intérêts majorés ((2002), 6 B.C.L.R. 20

He applied the B.C. Court of Appeal's decision in Warrington v. Great-West Life Assurance Co. (1996), 139 D.L.R. (4th) 18, which held that aggravated damages can be awarded without separately actionable conduct if the contract is one for "peace of mind". In his view, a long-term disability insurance contract is such a contract.

21 On the evidence before him, including that of Ms. Fidler as well as the corroborating evidence of Dr. Wade, the trial judge was satisfied that Ms. Fidler "genuinely suffered significant additional distress and discomfort arising out of the loss of the disability coverage" (para. 30). Given the five-year duration of the cessation of payments, in his view it was appropriate to award $20,000 in aggravated damages in order to compensate Ms. Fidler for Sun Life's breach.

22 On the other hand, the trial judge concluded that, while its conduct with respect to Ms. Fidler's claim was at times "rather zealous" (para. 38), Sun Life had not acted in bad faith. As a result, he dismissed Ms. Fidler's claim for punitive damages.

23 Sun Life appealed the aggravated damages award and Ms. Fidler cross-appealed the denial of punitive damages. The Court of Appeal noted the "general principle" that damages for mental distress resulting from a breach of contract are not recoverable unless it is a peace of mind contract ((2004), 27 B.C.L.R. (4th) 199, 2004 BCCA 273). Concluding that the insurance contract in this case is such a contract, the Court of Appeal, affirming Warrington, held that "aggravated damages are available as additional compensation if the insured establishes that a breach of that [peace of mind] contract caused her mental distress" (para. 39) and unanimously declined to interfere with the trial judge's award of aggravated damages.

(4th) 390, 2002 BCSC 1336). Il a appliqué l'arrêt Warrington c. Great-West Life Assurance Co. (1996), 139 D.L.R. (4th) 18, de la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique, qui statuait que des dommages-intérêts majorés peuvent être accordés sans qu'existe une conduite distincte donnant ouverture à action si le contrat vise à assurer la [TRADUCTION] « tranquillité d'esprit », ce qui, à son avis, était le cas d'un contrat d'assurance-invalidité de longue durée.

Compte tenu de la preuve qui lui avait été soumise, dont le témoignage de M^me^ Fidler et le témoignage corroborant du Dr Wade, le juge de première instance s'est dit convaincu que [TRADUCTION] « la perte des prestations d'invalidité a véritablement causé une souffrance et un inconfort supplémentaires importants » (par. 30) à M^me^ Fidler. Comme les prestations avaient été suspendues pendant cinq ans, il a estimé qu'il y avait lieu d'accorder à M^me^ Fidler 20 000 $ en dommages-intérêts majorés à titre d'indemnisation pour la violation du contrat.

Le juge de première instance a cependant conclu que si Sun Life avait parfois manifesté [TRADUCTION] « beaucoup de zèle » dans le dossier de M^me^ Fidler, elle n'avait pas agi de mauvaise foi. Il a donc rejeté la demande de dommages-intérêts punitifs de M^me^ Fidler.

Sun Life a interjeté appel de l'attribution de dommages-intérêts majorés et, M^me^ Fidler, du rejet de sa demande de dommages-intérêts punitifs. La Cour d'appel a rappelé le [TRADUCTION] « principe général » selon lequel la souffrance morale découlant d'une violation de contrat n'est susceptible d'indemnisation que si le contrat a pour objet la tranquillité d'esprit ((2004), 27 B.C.L.R. (4th) 199, 2004 BCCA 273). Concluant qu'il s'agissait d'un tel contrat en l'espèce, la Cour d'appel a statué, confirmant l'arrêt Warrington, que [TRADUCTION] « des dommages-intérêts majorés peuvent s'ajouter à l'indemnité si l'assurée établit qu'une violation de ce contrat [pour la tranquillité d'esprit] lui a causé une souffrance morale » (par. 39), et elle a refusé à l'unanimité de modifier la décision du juge de première instance d'accorder des dommages-intérêts majorés.
